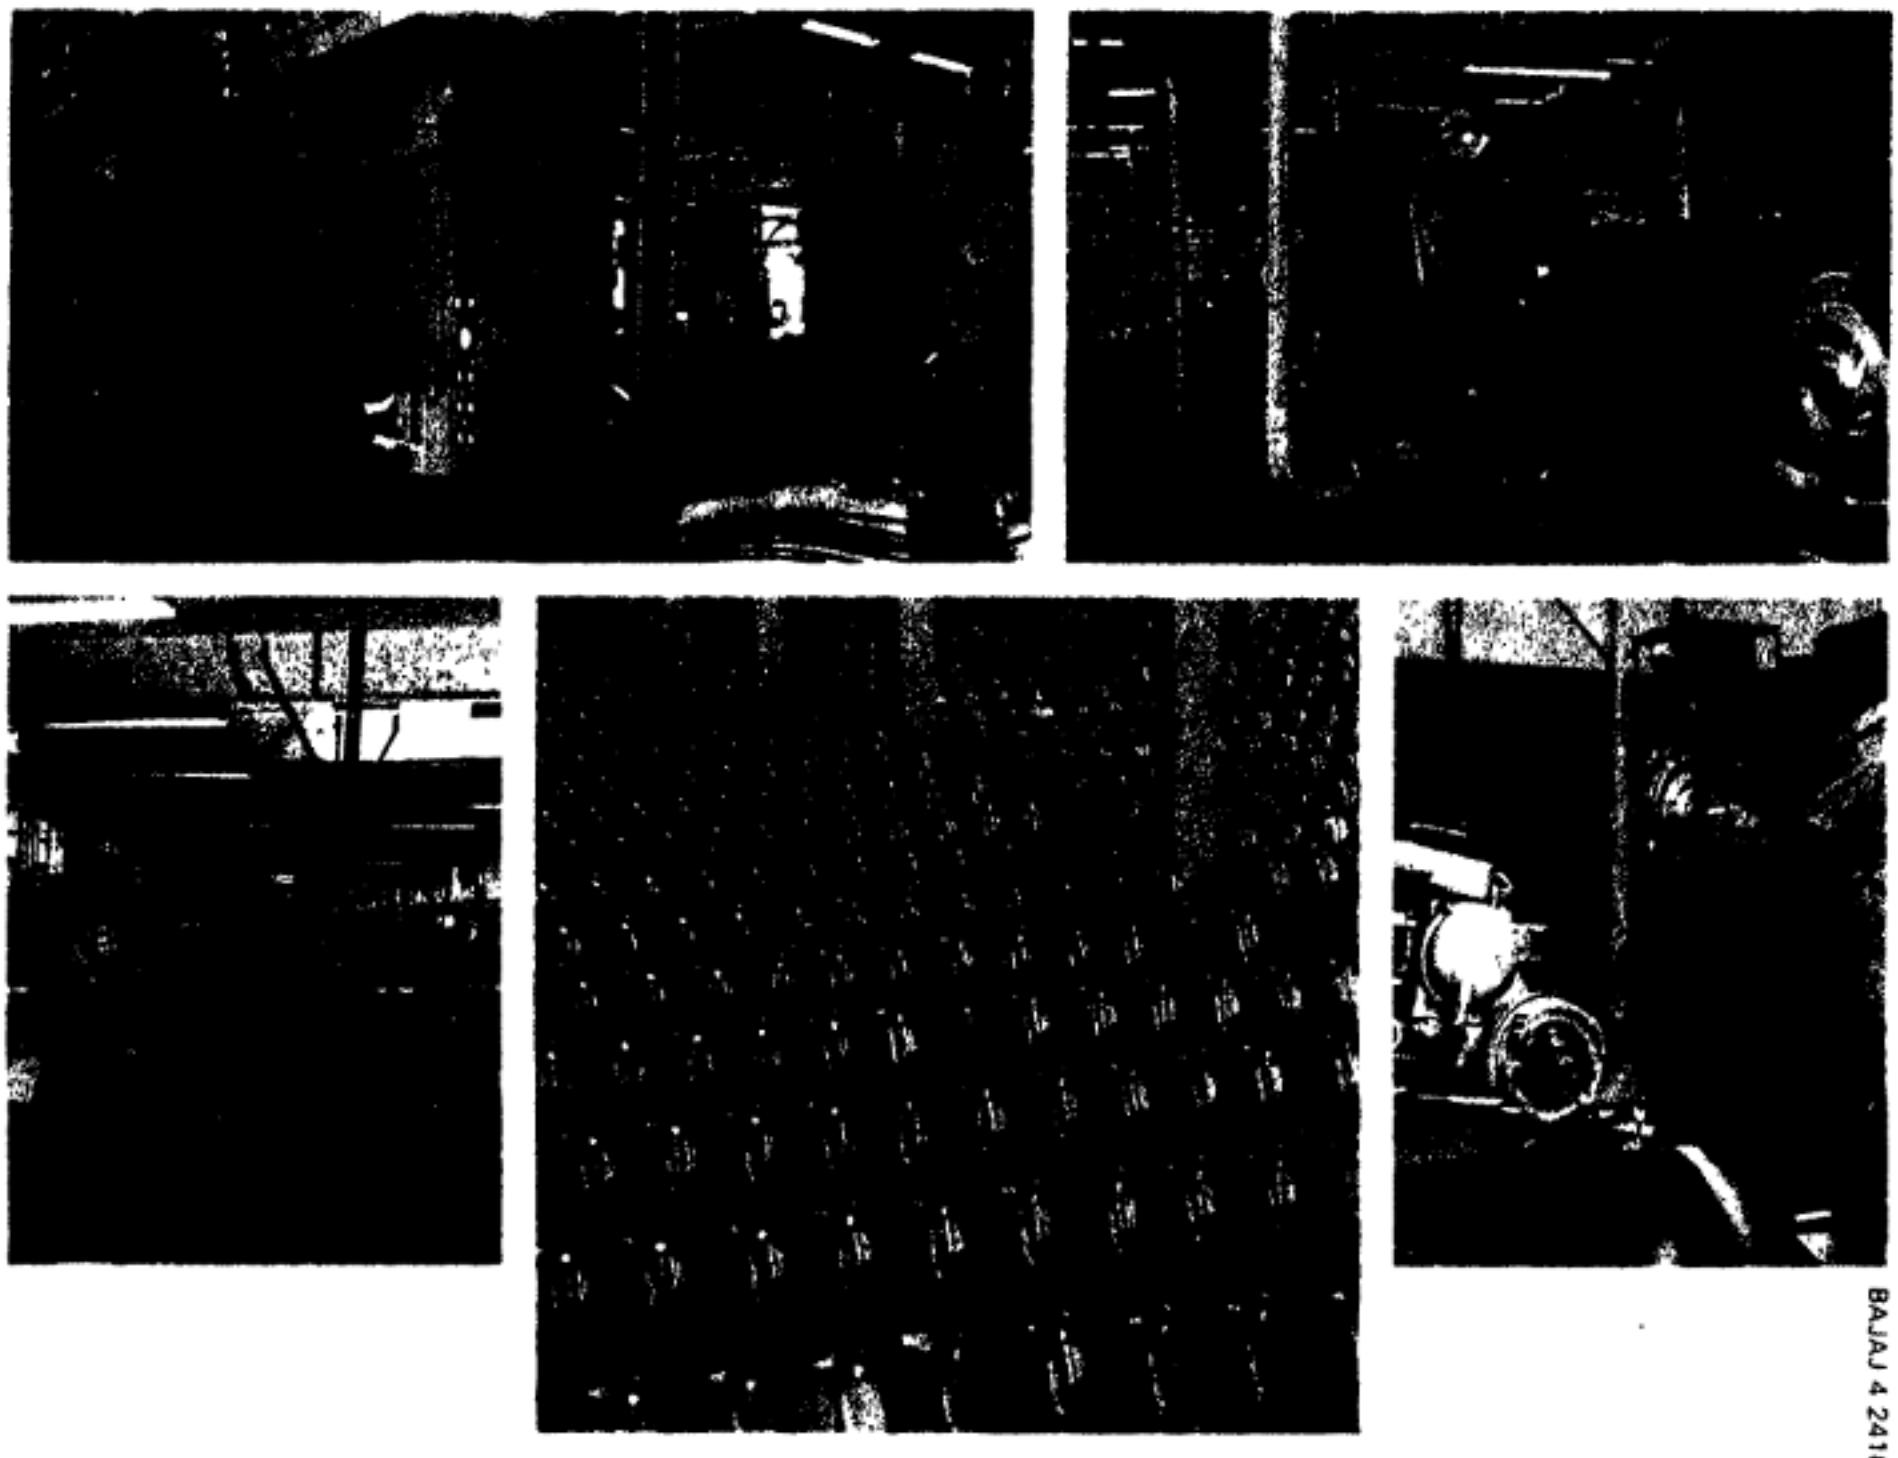
The Haryana Accord



Bhajan Lal

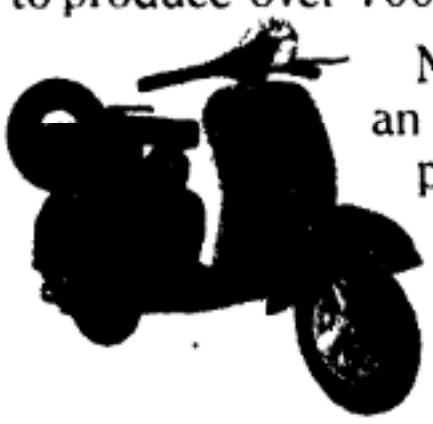
While there is no solution in sight in Punjab, an interesting accord seems to have been reached in neighbouring Haryana. Chief minister Bhajan Lal and railway minister Bansi Lal (the former strongman and builder of Haryana) are said to have buried the hatchet. Soon after the Lok Sabha elections, pro-Bansi Lal men in Haryana were gunning for Bhajan Lal and their main plank was that fresh polls should be held in the state. But when elections were not announced for Haryana along with the other states, Bansi Lal did not even whimper. A Bansi-Bhajan rapproachement could be the only reason for this.

D.E. Nizamuddin

Pears'
The original glycerine soap.

Regd. No. WB/CC/256/TN/MS(C)376 MH-By-South-680.

BAJAJ 4 2416



Bajaj Automatically

If someone asked you to name India's largest scooter manufacturer, whose name would come to mind first?

If you were told there is a plant in India which turns out one scooter every minute, who would you think of first? Bajaj Auto, automatically.

But the waiting list for Bajaj scooters is too long even for such a plant; though it is as big as any single scooter plant in the world.

So, Bajaj Auto is setting up two new plants which will help us to produce over 700,000 vehicles a year.

Normally, it takes years to commission such an operation. But with our experience, we plan to start production at Aurangabad by 1985 and Agra by 1986.

Which should keep Bajaj Auto the leader for years to come; automatically.

bajaj auto ltd

Value for money, for years

FEBRUARY / MARCH 1985 • AN ASIAN AMERICAN PERSPECTIVE

Tom Nossiter on the Decline of the Leftists

SUNDAY

RE HA: TWO EEN
D 985

Queen Bee

You are looking at our new International selection of suitings.

SUITINGS FROM THE Cezari COLLECTION

BOMBAY DYEING

If you want to show who you are, buy a Mercedes.
But if you mean business, get a Safari.

A famous car will turn many heads including some pretty ones. But when the key out-of-town supplier stops despatches, you want action of a different kind. Take the first flight out and confront the man. This is the high tension world of Safari.

This is the time when your luggage must match your mood. Something practical just like the hard-nosed businessman that you are.

Safari. The luggage built the way it should be. The vast difference in quality comes from attention to many small details. Chrome plating on the components gleams year after year. The buckle down flap keeps clothes in perfect shape. The six lever vault lock is pilfer proof.

Safari. It survives.

safari

The luggage that knows its business.

ULKA-SL-100-84

The perfect gentleman.
He always wears a Cherry smile.

JJNTAS(C)/CR/94/2416

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 □ ISSUE 16 □ RS 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

Queen Bee

From her unsteady, faultering steps in 1965, Rekha has travelled a long way and has matured into one of the most talented actresses. Akshay Upadhyaya profiles the actress who is now the queen of the Hindi filmworld. Plus an interview with Rekha.

Who Will Replace the Angry Young Man?

Who will fill the vacuum created by Amitabh Bachchan joining politics? Girija Rajendran discusses the present talent in the Hindi filmdom.

Old Themes in New Reels

The country's film studios churn out 800 feature films and 650 short films on an average every year. But there is very little innovation in terms of themes. Nikhat Kazmi takes a look at Hindi films produced over the last three years.

Page 14

SUNDAY SPECIAL 31

The Decline of the Leftists

Tom Nossiter and Bipan Chandra assess the performance and prospects of the Leftist parties in India.

SPECIAL REPORT 46

Children of Despair

Numerous youngsters leave the comfort of their homesto eke out a living in the wayside eating houses. Nirmal Mitra finds out about them.

COMMENT

Dateline M.J. Akbar 7
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 9
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12
Guest Column Ranjit Sau 44
Essay 50

VARIETY

Science 66
This India 67
Sundayweek 68
Chess/Bridge/Quiz 69
Teasers 70
Khaas Baat 73

PUNCHLINE/KUTTY

Cover: Still from Utsav

Editor M.J. Akbar

Associate Editor Tooshar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Bindu K John, Henry Jacob,
Rajiv Nagchi, Srinjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi:
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi:
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow.
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay.
Olga Tellis
Bangalore
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad:
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati:
Seema Guhi
Srinagar:
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Sudipt Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex Delhi

Power transmission lines that talk

Power Line Carrier Communications from BPL. For better management of electrical power.

Simply put, it means an effective voice and data communication system that uses existing power lines in the Electricity Board network.

In operation for over 12 years in Electricity Board networks all over the country, Power Line Carrier Communication units help monitor and control critical factors in electrical power management.

Communication electronics from BPL also means Telemetry, Supervisory and Control Systems, Telephone and Switching Equipment.

There are other vital areas that BPL serves too. With Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement), Computers, Components, Office Automation and Consumer Electronics.

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Siemens, West Germany; RFL, U.S.A. and Trench Electric, Canada. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL: Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nationwide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has.

BPL-INDIA

In pursuit of perfection

Computers • Communication • Components
Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement) • Office Automation • Consumer Electronics

1115

DATELINE / M.J. Akbar

Bhopal: People look back in wonder now, quite unable to comprehend exactly why they had been chosen for a tragedy of Old Testament proportions. 'Nightmare' (an unpleasant dream: a dream accompanied by pressure on the breast and a feeling of powerlessness to move or speak—personified as an incubus or evil spirit; a horrifying experience, says the dictionary) has acquired a new dimension in Bhopal. The first indication that something was wrong came with the sound of coughing. Quickly the isolated spells of choking became a general bedlam, and suddenly people realised that there was something horrible and murderous in the air. Death seeped in, white and evil. Those who could, escaped. Those who could not, died. Perhaps this is really how the world will end- not with a bang, but a whimper.

The Union Carbide factory near the railway station looks still and innocent, its rows of shiny silver roofs a precise copy of the traditional factory design. The turret from which the gas leaked has become a bit of a tourist attraction, but it is wrong of course to blame the metal. Human beings were at fault that night, and it is they who must be made answerable. This is an issue over which chief minister Arjun Singh or Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi cannot be partisan: this is beyond Congress and opposition politics: this is a national tragedy which we, as a nation, must learn from. Bhopal can happen again, and in many cities.

It is fascinating that the people have understood this much better than their leaders. It is the poor who first lost their lives and their small wealth in the form of milk or egg-producing animals, it is the middle class who panicked on the day the MIC was being diluted, and sold off their gold at Rs 500 a tola before escaping to a city without a Union Carbide factory. But they did not blame the ruling party for what had befallen them. Bhopal, still shivering from the shock in late December, went to the polls only on January 28. The BJP, smashed everywhere else in Madhya Pradesh, tried to salvage something in Bhopal and campaigned on the alleged negligence of the state government. Gruesome posters (hand with long nailed fingers dripping with blood et al) can still be seen on the city walls exhorting the citizens to teach the Congress(I) a lesson. Without making any fuss, the people voted for the Congress(I), and in overwhelming numbers. But it would be criminal negligence on the part of Mr Arjun Singh if he took that victory as an excuse for complacency. The people were right in feeling that the Congress(I) did not deliberately engineer this tragedy, but they are hardly going to condone any kind of a cover-up. Nor will activists like Anand Sadgopal of Kishore Bharti, whose social work makes one proud, allow any cover up to take place. Death by gas has become an unforgettable chapter in the history of Bhopal; many generations will be told of the night when the world became a deathly blur of white. And mothers of today and tomorrow will want to know who sent children to their death on 3 December 1984.

Has anyone seen an Assembly election hiding anywhere? We know it is out there somewhere, and simply can't understand why it won't show its face. Its presence has been formally announced, and it is bound by law to be visible on 2 and 5 March. What then is the coyness all about?

Till the moment of writing, there was hardly a sign that within a matter of days ten governments would be elected all over the country. That is no small area. The number of people voting even in this sectional election is more than that which voted in the American presidential poll. The task before the political leaders was sizeable. It seemed, however, that everyone was exhausted after the mammoth effort of the general elections. The opposition did not have much by way of resources even in the more important round; this time it was the petty cash box which was being emptied in an effort to find the bare petrol money. With the balance of money power tilted so heavily in favour of the Congress(I), it is doubtful if Mr Rajiv Gandhi's generosity is going to extend so far as to introduce a few more electoral reforms and provide state funding for election campaigns, as for instance happens in the United States. The main resource of the opposition in 1984 was simply that they were in opposition to Mrs Indira Gandhi. That, as we have seen, did not carry them very far in December. How far will opposition to a new and confident Rajiv Gandhi take them? One gets the feeling that the opposition has given up already, apart from the charismatic Ramakrishna Hegde in Karnataka, the dogged Sharad Pawar in Maharashtra and the brave Biju Patnaik in Orissa.

Certainly the Bharatiya Janata Party, allegedly the sole opposition party in Madhya Pradesh, did not look like an organisation marching vigorously towards victory. Truth to tell, it did not look like any kind of party at all. The main argument in Congress(I) circles, as far as the results were concerned, was whether the ruling party would win 300 seats or more. (There are 320 seats in the MP Assembly.)

The main opposition party in Madhya Pradesh, incidentally, is not the BJP but the Congress(I). To put it more clearly: one section of the ruling party rules, the other section opposes. With the party nominations a clear victory for chief minister Arjun Singh, the real interest in Bhopal lay in finding out to what extent his khadi-clad enemies would hurt their own party's candidates. Unlike in a parliamentary poll, where a constituency is so large and the issues so critical that dissenters get submerged in one tide or the other, rebels have some hope of effective sabotage in an Assembly election. A switch of two or three thousand votes can easily turn victory into defeat. If there is any hope for the BJP, it is in such civil wars. But that, at the end of the day, does not amount to a great deal.

It is not apathy which gives the Assembly poll the aura of a non-election, but merely the conviction that it is not much of a contest. Most of the opposition leaders know too that their next real chance will come only when they are five years older; in other words, when Morarji Desai is 93, Charan Singh is 87 and Jagjivan Ram is 81.

Death by gas has become an unforgettable chapter in the history of Bhopal; many generations will be told of the night when the world became a deathly blur of white. And mothers of today and tomorrow will want to know who sent children to their death on 3 December 1984.

Stop bad breath. Fight tooth decay.

Give them the Colgate Ring of Confidence!

Regular brushing with Colgate gives your family clean, fresh breath, strong healthy teeth. That's the Colgate Ring of Confidence.

This is how Colgate's trusted formula works for you every time you brush:

Bacteria grow in food particles trapped between teeth, causing bad breath and tooth decay.

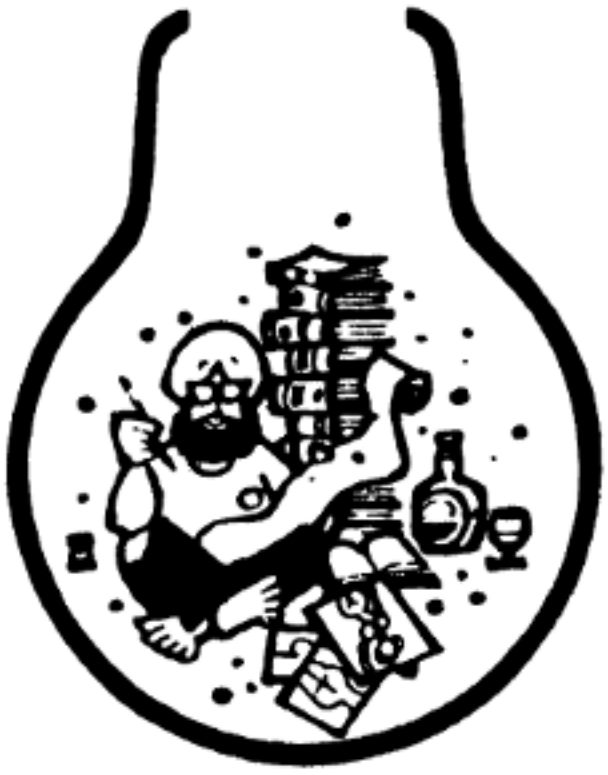
Colgate's unique active foam reaches deep to remove odour-causing food particles and decay-causing bacteria.

Regular brushing with Colgate gives you clean, fresh breath and strong, healthy teeth.

Make sure your family brushes with Colgate after every meal.
Stop bad breath, fight tooth decay.
Give them the Colgate Ring of Confidence.

You'll love its fresh minty taste!

GK&E 884 55



Neither Heaven Nor Hell

Mankind continues to cherish the illusion of divine justice; if not in life on earth, then in life hereafter. I who do not believe in life hereafter, continue to be obsessed with the prevalence of injustice in the world. I would like to ask believers in after-life: "Where is Bhindranwale now? Roasting in the fires of hell as his detractors hope, or seated beside the throne of the Lord as his followers believe? Where are the thousands of innocents who were massacred in the anti-Sikh riots in northern India or perished in the embrace of poison gas in Bhopal? What about the living who perpetrated these crimes? It is evident that none of them will be punished on earth; on the contrary all of them are free, many still in possession of loot and some holding positions of importance. Will they meet their desserts only after demise?

Even the Hindu family of religions (Jainism, Buddhism and Sikhism) which do not subscribe to notions of heaven or hell as places of reward and punishment but in samskara, the unending cycle of birth, death and rebirth, have succumbed to the notions of swaraga and narak. Although theologically they stick to the idea of moksha as release from the process of being born, dying and being reborn, in fact that bera paar (life's boat reaching the opposite shore) is regarded as attaining vaikunth—paradise where their souls mingle with God.

To get out of the dilemma of injustice perpetrated by a God assumed to be just, men of religion indulge in convoluted logic. Mother Teresa explains the famine in Ethiopia as an opportunity to give in charity "till it hurts." If she is right, God makes Ethiopian children die of hunger so that the living feel the hurt caused by parting with money for charity. This makes no sense to me.

Christians are bothered by the idea of everlasting damnation. Surely even the vilest sinner should be given a chance to at one for his misdeeds and gain forgiveness! "Yes indeed!" they answer. "For the small-time sinner there is the purgatory where he is purged of his evil deeds and made wholesome enough to enter paradise." One of the joys that the righteous are promised in after-life is a free seat to watch sinners being tormented. That apparently is the justification for public floggings, tortures and executions which are regarded by many as good entertainment. Christians divide sins into two categories; those that can earn forgiveness and those that entail endless punishment. The Bible says: "When the wicked man dieth, his expectations shall perish and the hope of the unjust man perisheth." (Book of Proverbs). To this statement the venerable Bede added, "When the righteous man dies, his hopes do not perish."

Gossip sweet and sour

KHUSHWANT SINGH

So there is a place in after-life which is neither heaven nor hell. You are in limbo as if in a railway station waiting room awaiting the arrival of the right train. The pure board the air-conditioned Rajdhani for paradise; the unpardonable are herded in the cattle truck train bound for eternal damnation. A third train, a slow passenger, stops at every station where minor sinners are purged of their minor sins and ultimately also arrive at paradise.

Islam also has the notion of a middle place, the pulsaraat. It is a kind of bridge of doubt over which you have to pass before you reach your ultimate destination. I have always regarded this bridge as a period of uncertainty between declaration of love and response from the beloved. To wit the famous Punjabi Sufi poet, Inayat Qadri:

Pahlee pauri Prem dee
Pulsaratey dera;
Haaji makkay haj karan
Main Mukh dekhaan tera.
Ai Inayat Qadri,
Hath pakreen mera.

(The first step of love I make my home on Pulsaraat. Men of faith make pilgrimage to Mecca, I keep looking at your face. O Inayat Qadri Hold my hand and help me across!)

As far as I am concerned, I believe that a clear conscience makes life on earth a paradise and a guilty one makes it hell. My authority for saying so is my philosopher-guide, Allama Iqbal:

Amal Say Zindagi bantee hai,
Jannat bhee Jahannum bhee;
Yeh khaaki hai, apnee fitrat mein
Na nooree hai na naari hai

(T's how we act that makes our lives;/We can make it heaven, we can make it hell,/In the clay of which we are made/Neither light nor the darkness of evil dwell.)

Swastika

The Kipling Journal published by the Kipling Society of which I am a member has a letter from the owner of a book store dealing in rare books about the Swastika symbol on the earliest editions of Rudyard Kipling's works. He complains that customers object to it as Nazi emblem till he explains to them it is "Ganesha's symbol" and that Kipling had dropped it after Hitler took it on.

There are many misconceptions about the Swastika, the most popular being that it is exclusively Aryan. Nothing of the sort. It has been found in China, Egypt, Greece, Rome, Scandinavia, Mexico and Peru. However, while in other civilisations it went into oblivion, it is preserved by the Hindu to this day. The word is used extensively in Hindu ritual following the sacred invocation, Om. It is made up of three syllables, Swa meaning "well", asti meaning "is" and Ka which is its noun ending. Put together Swastika means "it is well." Hence its use on auspicious occasions. That also explains why the yogic posture for meditation is called the Svastikaasana or the good luck pose.

The arms of the Hindu Swastika are in the opposite direction of those of the Nazi—although the Nazi shape can also be seen in Hindu temples and homes.

I was curious to know why Kipling regarded it as the Ganesha symbol. He was born in Bombay. It is during the Ganpati festival during the monsoon that you see more Swastikas than at other times as Maharashtrian women draw it on floors of their houses and worship it.

Your savings with Peerless are just as secure

Because Peerless doesn't take any chances with your hard-earned money.

When you save through Peerless, all your money is put in Government custody in the form of fixed deposits with nationalised Banks and other Government securities. This money cannot be withdrawn except to pay certificate-holders and that too after obtaining prior permission from the authorities concerned. This is total security of the kind that makes Peerless so different from any other non-banking savings company. Because no other company of this type can assure their investors of this type of foolproof 100% security.

Where lies the secret of the phenomenal success that is Peerless? Unquestionably, in the unique Social Welfare Schemes introduced in 1956. Based on scientific actuarial principles, these savings schemes aimed at mobilising savings among men of small means; to give them new hope for the future. Reached throughout the land to even the most remote village by a team of dedicated workers, the Schemes were welcomed by all, gaining popularity year upon year.

Today, one out of every fifty Indians is a Peerless certificate-holder. Proof of people's complete trust in India's largest non-banking savings Company.

Total investment in Government custody over Rs 500 crores.

The Peerless General Finance & Investment Co. Ltd.
Peerless Bhavan 3 Esplanade East
Calcutta 700 069

India's largest non-banking savings Company

PGI 5724

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Collectors' Authority Has Eroded

Once when Jawaharlal Nehru went on a tour of a district town in a state, he was exasperated to find the collector, the superintendent of police, the district engineer, the civil surgeon and many other officers and politicians had gathered to receive him. On his return to New Delhi he wrote to the state chief ministers to issue instructions to the collector (called deputy commissioners in some states) not to disturb their work to attend to VIPs. His letter said: "The collector has to perform certain duties in a year. He arranges his programme with an eye on his inspections, arrangements for appeals, development works, on the spot discussions and so on. To expect him to call off these arrangements for the sake of just attending some occasions where his presence is not essential is unfair to him and unjust to the administration. Once a programme of the collector is out, not only should he uphold it, but everybody should help in doing so, unless there are special reasons to the contrary. The harm done in the collector neglecting normal work is incalculable."

The reaction of Rajiv Gandhi, like his mother's, has been that of tacit acceptance even during the election tours, the collectors have been present wherever he has gone. He has told both ministers and officers to cut their foreign tours and to be punctual but he has said nothing, for example, against the practice of the collector receiving and seeing off a dignitary. At present if the collector is busy in his work and does not show up, the visiting minister or even MLA holds this against him. There are examples when officers have been punished for the "lapse."

Rajiv's first task should have been to tone up district administration because inefficiency, corruption and harassment are rampant there The first note that Lal Bahadur Shastri wrote as Prime Minister was about district administration. He realised how important it was to have development in the districts and how apathetic the local administrators were becoming There was a flicker of interest in remedial measures, but Shastri died within 20 months of assuming office and after him the exercise got buried under more notes and directives.

The entire effort directed towards cleanliness that Rajiv is making, should start in the district. The machinery must work there to ensure that a doctor is in his dispensary and does not sell medicines elsewhere from the limited stock he gets from the headquarters; a teacher is in his school and does not disappear on a part-time job; a gram sahaik (village-level worker) helps in the field and does not extract money or misappropriate most of the government's assistance.

One reason for the present condition is the fact that the authority of the collector, once the most feared and respected in a district, has been so reduced that even a petty police official can defy him with impunity. He is held responsible for a mishap, but has no say in the functioning of the law and order machinery, which is directly under the charge of the superintendent of police. There may be something in the criticism that an Indian Administrative Service (IAS) man is made the collector within six to seven years of his joining the service, and is usually too immature for this post. And there is probably a case for senior officers to go into the field to improve the tone and tenor of administration at the grassroots. But the question is not that of the quality of the officer or his age, it is that of his authority: to have to function efficiently, he should have the power to take steps in the best interests of the administration.

Some chief ministers are increasingly setting the collector and the SP against each other so that control of the institution rests with them. Ministers pick up one or the other to show favour and this has played havoc with the administration. But our political masters are primarily concerned with their own interests. In fact, the SP is usually favoured by the politicians for he can help them; the collector can only fret and fume over some of the doings of the SP and even if he were to complain about them in his reports to the chief secretary, he knows that nothing would be done.

There cannot be two points of power. An SP cannot be incharge of all matters in the district because he is a specialist, an expert in law and order and related matters Only the collector can be familiar with all the problems of district administration and take an overall view. But he also competes with the SP in currying favour.

Perhaps the fight for supremacy between the collector and the SP has always been there, but the collector was considered to be in overall charge In a few states he still writes the confidential report (CR) of the SP. The Police Act, which is yet to be amended, gives this right to the collector. It is assumed that in a district the buck stopped at the collector's desk. But now his authority is devalued.

What is important is that the collector be given more undisputed authority. He is the channel through which all government policies and programmes are funnelled and their success or failure would depend on how they are implemented. And it is the collector who has to implement them.

Some chief ministers are increasingly setting the collector and the SP against each other...Ministers pick up one or the other to show favour and this has played havoc with the administration.

Purposeless Revolt

The special report on Jayalalitha's Revolt (3—9 February '85) made interesting reading. Nobody in the AIADMK baring MGR has a mass base. In all probability, Jayalalitha was stripped of her post on the advice of MGR. Or else why would Jayalalitha be absent from the reception given to MGR on his arrival from USA?
K. Srinivasan, Madras

• SUNDAY gave undue importance to Jayalalitha. It is preposterous to claim that she has the backing of 60 AIADMK MLAs. All she has is the support of a few disgruntled elements in the party. Jayalalitha's statements to the press questioning the mental condition of MGR has alienated her from the people of Tamil Nadu. Jayalalitha is now a spent force and her future in AIADMK is bleak.
E. R. Rajnarayanan, Madras

• Anita Pratap was correct when she said that if the impression that Jayalalitha has turned against MGR gains strength, her mass base will crumble. Her utterances have proved to be her undoing. The people of Tamil Nadu have turned against her and this was evident the day MGR returned: Jayalalitha was nowhere to be seen.
S. Appu, Madras

• The ruling 'coterie' in Tamil Nadu tried to take revenge on Jayalalitha on the assumption that MGR would not survive. But by god's grace, he survived and now the group has been pushed to a corner.
N. Sundararajan, Madras

• The vitriolic attacks on Jayalalitha by the honourable minister, Kalimuthu, amused me. The minister, who claims to be a doctorate, does not even know the basic etiquettes of civilised life: throughout the interview he refers to Jayalalitha as "it."
B. Uthamanarayanan, Erode (TN)

Picture Power

Photographs can be more telling than the printed word. Sunil Dutta's photofeature on the Gangasagar pilgrimage (In Quest of Salvation, 27 January—2 February '85) was a welcome departure from long boring narrations. I hope SUNDAY will make such features a regular issue. There are many incidents taking place around us.
Shyamal Gupta, Burdwan

Inaccuracies

It is not true that Rajiv Gandhi was born in Allahabad in 1944 as stated by Tariq Ali in the extracts from his book, The Nehrus and the Gandhis: An Indian Dynasty (The Nation's Grandchildren, 27 January—2 February '85). Our Prime Minister was born in Bombay.
K. J. Joseph, Shillong

• Sanjay Gandhi married Menaka in 1974 and not in 1975 as claimed by Tariq Ali. By the time the Emergency was imposed, Sanjay was a married man. Moreover, after going through the portions about Rajiv Gandhi, I was still ignorant about the educational qualifications of our Prime Minister. I do not know why the author ignored this aspect.
Ashok Narayan, New Delhi

The Great Betrayal

The investigative cover story, Bureaucrat, Diplomat, Industrialist, Spy (3—9 February '85) read like a crime thriller. It is no use blaming foreign governments for meddling in the affairs of our country. There are Indians who are far more harmful to the nation than the foreign hand. As rightly pointed out by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, moneybags wield immense power in Delhi. Things have come to such a pass that in India today one could buy anything with money.
Nirjhar Das Gupta, Calcutta

• The government should take immediate steps to root out corruption from the bureaucracy.
Rudra Dutta Satapathi, Rourkela

• The assassination of Indira Gandhi and the spy scandal has laid bare the cracks in our intelligence set-up. I was alarmed to learn that the spy ring operated for the last 25 years. Coomar Narain's disloyalty will surely go down in history as one of the worst betrayals.
Sangram Mishra, Cuttack

• The entire intelligence organisation should be reconstituted in the wake of the spy scandal.
Rajesh Sahay, Hazaribagh

• I was shocked at the degradation of moral and ethical values in public and political life. Corruption at the highest level is destroying our country. The spy scandal should serve as an eye-opener to all concerned.
M. H. Rama, Bhubaneswar

• The Russians are Here has convincingly exposed the activities of the KGB in India. Saumitra Ba. erjee and Shubhabrata Bhattacharya have rightly pointed out that the Russians exploit the communist parties in India to achieve their objective. We only blame the CIA but the KGB is also a serious threat to India's security. We should not be deceived by their firendship. When it comes to the question of the nation's security, we should treat all foreigners alike.
M. G. Mansharmani, Delhi

• Certain vested interests are creating the impression that the CIA is the real threat to India's security and that the Russians are our friends. The confessions of Coomar Narain has exploded this myth. It is time we realised the real intensions of the Russians.
J. S. Pathania, New Delhi

• I was ashamed at the great betrayal of my fellow citizens. Those who were supposed to protect the country turned out to be traitors. I would advise the strictest punishment for the traitors.
Ramachandra Tripathy, Madras

• SUNDAY has rightly observed that the rupee trade arrangement has helped the KGB to operate in India. The government has given preferential treatment to the USSR which has been utilised by the KGB to divert funds for espionage activities.
Tilak Raj Kapoor, New Delhi

Sporting Spirit

M.J. Akbar's write-up on the winter in Calcutta was a delightful diversion from his regular gift of hackneyed politics (Dateline, 3—9 February '85). The anticipation of the colourful winter is what keeps Calcuttans going through the sultry summer and damp monsoon.
Padmakar Vyas, Howrah

• Like a true sportsman, Mr Akbar has apologised to his readers for his predictions regarding the fate of the filmstars in the Lok Sabha polls. Like him all journalists should have the courage to admit defeat.
G.M. Ningoji, Yelburga (Karnataka)

• M.J. Akbar has correctly pointed out that "strong doses of courage and ideology" are needed for the survival of the Janata Party (Dateline, 6—19 January '85). It is a matter of great regret that the opposition learnt nothing from past mistakes. Why blame the Congress(I) for establishing dynastic rule? The people did give the opposition a chance to rule in 1977. But did the leaders honour the people's verdict? All the opposition leaders were busy furthering their personal ambitions. The author has also rightly praised Rajiv Gandhi for appointing ministers with relatively clean images.
Param Hans Singh, Arrah

Noble Ambition

The efforts of NTR to launch a political party at the national level is certainly laudable (The Ambitions of NTR, 27 January—2 February 1985). After the Lok Sabha elections the opposition is thoroughly demoralised and badly in need of a leader who can invigorate them. NTR, I am sure, will gradually emerge as a powerful opposition leader. However, it would be wrong to compare NTR with JP.
Bijaya Rath, Kakiriguma (Orissa)

• I was delighted to hear that NTR has decided to extend his visions beyond Andhra Pradesh. The Telugu Desam, being a regional party, can never cater to the aspirations of all the people of India. N.T. Rama Rao's decision to launch the Bharat Desam was timely as the country is in need of an united opposition. NTR's popularity will certainly attract a lot of people towards him.
Dipendra Adhikary, Dhubri

• The Telugu Desam is the only party that can provide some kind of resistance to the Congress(I). After the defeat of most of the opposition leaders, NTR has emerged as the sole hope of the opposition. I am sure the Bharat Desam will help in unifying the opposition.
Muyyam Rajan, Singrauli (MP)

N.T. Rama Rao: charismatic

• In an age when most political leaders are hungry for power and money, NTR's statement: Politics is Not for Power, It is for Service, came as a relief to many like me. The Bharat Desam will certainly fulfil the aspirations of the common man.
P. Rajaiah, Hyderabad

Akalis: To Ban or Not to Ban?

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya's statement in his article, Should the Akalis be Banned? (20—26 January '85), that the President gave undue importance to the Sikh high priests by seeking forgiveness only shows the little knowledge the author has about the discipline prevalent in the Sikh community. The congregation at the funeral of the President's son-in-law was very thin solely because Gianiji was declared a tankhaiya by the priests. This depressed the President and he soon realised the consequences of the punishment. There was no alternative but to seek forgiveness. Such strict discipline has always helped the Sikhs to preserve their unity and identity.

Moreover, it would be wrong to identify the Sikhs with the Akalis. There are very few Sikhs who have anything to do with the Akalis. The Akali Dal is a political party which does not even enjoy the support of the majority of the Sikhs in Punjab. It was the Akali Dal and the Congress(I) that created Bhindranwale.
Taj Singh Lakhmna, Jamshedpur

• Banning political parties like the Akali Dal, though a very revolutionary idea, will not solve problems like the growing militancy of the Sikhs. Such a bold step should have been taken much earlier and now any such promulgation will be labelled as an act of supression. Thanks to SUNDAY for the provoking cover story.
Ajay Pant, Moradabad

• The cover story presented a distorted and biased picture of the aims and objectives of the Akali Dal. Never did the Dal raise demands for Khalistan. It was the Congress(I) which wanted to reap political harvest out of such slander.

To a Sikh, religion is supreme. So there is nothing unusual about a President being declared a tankhaiya. Instead of following the path of confrontation, the central government should amicably solve the problems of the Sikhs. It would be a mistake to use force to supress religion. The Sikhs are a brave race and they will resist all such attempts.
T.V.S. Shastry, Warangal (AP)

• The Akali Dal should give up its obstinate stand that the government should first release all Akali leaders under detension before beginning negotiations. Enough harm has been done to the country and now the Akalis should cooperate with the new government to solve the Punjab tangle.
N. Ellango, Tirunelveli

• Tirthankar Ghosh's report on the incident at Maloya (The 'Martyr' of Maloya) in which a handful of irresponsible people glorified the act of Beant Singh disturbed me. While condemning such behaviour, I would appeal to SUNDAY not to publisize such happenings as it will lead to bloodshed once again.
N. Akhileshwar, Bombay

• I was surprised that the prefix 'martyr' s being used by some people before the name of Beant Singh. A killer has been placed on the same platform as that of other Sikh martyrs like Guru Govind Singh and Arjun Singh.
Satyabrata Pattanayak, Markona

COVER STORY

REKHA: TWO SCREEN DECADES, 1965—1985

Queen Bee

"It would be so good if serious filmmakers like Satyajit Ray would start making films with Rekha. For then only can Rekha's vast innate talents and capabilities be fully exploited." Coming from as experienced a director as Hrishikesh Mukherjee, this could not have been yet another sweeping statement made by a fan rather than a serious filmmaker. He has worked with the actress long enough to know her inherent possibilities. He adds: "Rekha is the only perfect actress in the film industry today. Despite the presence of such talented actresses as Shabana and Smita who are suitable only for certain kinds of roles, Rekha stands out as someone who can take on any role. Besides, Shabana and Smita do not have the required glamour. Rekha, on the other hand, has both undisputed glamour and tremendous talent. If ever I can make a film entirely of my choice, I will prove this. And make the film I will even though it may be my last work." Some compliment this.

Hindi films happened to Rekha almost two decades ago. And ever since she has created and shattered many a myth—both about the industry and about herself. The enigma she has woven around herself has made her critics throw up their hands in helplessness. Rekha is a riddle many want to solve but few can. It is difficult to uncover the real person under so many shrouds and images to find the different and real Rekha amidst all the epithets that comprise her reputation.

Her film career began in 1965, two decades ago. Rekha has travelled a long way from the early days when she was known for her petulance, irresponsibility and self centredness. The maturity is a mix of public success and personal disappointments. She has won and lost; there is now the objectivity to look at the world's praises with an older eye. Today, even on winning the national award of utmost significance, she says: "I don't deserve the award. It at all this award for best actress should have gone to anyone it is Jennifer Kapoor for her performance in 36 Chowringhee Lane." Ten years ago this modesty from Rekha would have been unimaginable. But this phenomenal transformation in the star's personality has not taken place overnight.

Rekha's childhood was far from a dream. The daughter of Tamil screen superstars, Gemini Ganesan and Pushpavalli, Rekha witnessed the hard truths of life at a very early age. In her father, she saw the arrogant chauvinist man; in her mother, the helpless woman trying to maintain an equilibrium in domestic life. Finally, she saw her home broken when her parents separated.

Her teens found her whimsical, fat and a tomboy, detesting the thought of anything that did not please her. She protested against all that she was forced to do. It was at this stage, in fact, that the trauma of a broken home began to set in, only to manifest itself in various ways later in her life. Her petulance, then, was not so much due to her hot temper, but the culmination of a bitter past she had left behind. Today, however, there is a difference in her attitude: earlier she did not know how to express her personal experiences and feelings; now she is more composed about it.

Rekha grew up to be a mother's daughter but was totally averse to any kind of compulsion. "Nobody tried to explain the importance of things I ought to have done, with love and affection. If only they had," Rekha regrets, "I would have achieved so much more." It was in this process of understanding others and the desire to be understood that Rekha eventually had to succumb to her mother's designs for her—acting in films. Soon she landed at the Mecca of Hindi films, Bombay. Little did she know then of the life that lay before her. Exposed to one bitter experience after another in the 'big bad world,' Rekha realised the truth of existence and discovered how ugly it was.

When she arrived in Bombay, she was dark and fat and totally unfit for a film career. The search for a godfather was tough, considering she had absolutely nothing to offer to the box-office. It was at this juncture of life that she came across Shatrujit and Kuljit Pal, who signed her on for Do Shikari, a film that was to be her first as a heroine, with the then busy star, Biswajit, in the male lead.

Rekha with Vinod Mehra in Ghar

◁ Rekha in *Utsav

But the going was not so easy. Realising the gullibility and naivete of the girl they had found, the Pal brothers decided to take the fullest advantage. They put up a host of conditions before signing the contract, one of them being 'the kiss.' Rekha agreed and their purpose was achieved. For the first time in the history of talkies, this bold kiss was publicised as never before. News spread like wildfire in the industry and many a producer, eager to exploit the 'new talent' appeared on the scene. A dumb, plain teenager turned into the 'kiss girl' overnight. Not only did the national dailies and magazines splash the news, Life magazine too had something to say about the new star.

This took care of her first transformation. But the irony lies in what ensued: Do Shikari was shelved and the producers disappeared. It is with a lot of bitterness that Rekha remembers them and the trap she had fallen into. Lapsing into a bout of intense nostalgia she recalls, "I never had any misconceptions about myself. In fact, I used to go around asking people if I had any acting talent and could make it in films as a heroine. Believe me, I was very sincere to people, but what did I get in return? I was frank and vulnerable, and people pounced at even the slightest chance to misinterpret my doings and to malign me. It was then that I first realised how mean people could be."

That was not all. Her off-screen bindaas image had so overtaken the actress in her that whoever came to sign her demanded that she indulge in cheap gimmickry under the guise of acting. Her dreams were further shattered and she soon found herself sinking into a depression. Hope reappeared with Mohan Sehgal who realised Rekha's worth and cast her in her first film Saawan Bhadon opposite Navin Nischol. A box-office hit in more ways than one, the film catapulted Rekha to higher horizons, though only with limited success. While on the one hand it had widened the scope of her career, it had also narrowed the possibilities. She came to be known, at the most, as a successful B-grade Hindi film heroine, and perhaps a replacement for Mumtaz. Her name began to sell, but merely as a good mass entertainer.

Not only for directors but for her audiences too, Rekha was no more than an actress whose talent lay confined only to cheap and popular song-and-dance sequences. And with this came the reputation of being whimsical, scatterbrain and cantankerous. Producers and directors thought twice before signing her, as tales of Rekha's 'I'm-not-in-the-mood-for-shooting' were rife. She suddenly disappeared from the sets and sometimes never even reported for shooting despite promises. All this and more: she also acquired the reputation of a desperate woman, ready to have affairs with any and every hero she worked with—right from Biswajit through Navin Nischol, Jeetendra, Vinod Mehra and Kiran Kumar. Her off-screen romances became the talk of the tinsel town, and star wives grew wary of the flirtatious Rekha.

Starved for love through her childhood, Rekha was emotionally insecure. Deprived of paternal love altogether, Rekha's search of a man who would love her also carried the quest for a father's love. And as

Rekha: the Brigitte Bardot of India

Rekha relates: "What was I to do? At a tender age, when I should have been playing with dolls, I was burdened with a profession in which I had no interest whatsoever." And whenever she got a chance to get away from the cumbersome world of films, she ran back to the familiar world of juvenile tomfoolery. "Here too, no one ever tried to understand my predicament or to analyse why I was so. On the contrary, only vulgar stories about me were circulated."

A time came when she got so worked up by the tales that were doing the rounds, that she lost whatever little politeness she had left in her. She was a confirmed eccentric and a moody actress as far as the industry was concerned. What is interesting, however, is that despite all the damage the grapevine could do, Rekha's image as a mass entertainer was not affected in the least.

And then it happened: an angry young man walked into her life. He was different from the others and took her seriously. True to the serene and strong image he exuded on the screen, he was the first man in Rekha's life who made her aware of what she really was. With love and caring concern, he opened up a whole new vista of life in front of her. It was he who eventually transformed Rekha into what she is today.

As for Rekha, she found the perfect balance of a father and a lover in Amitabh Bachchan, who brought her search for emotional security to an end. With him, she explored the compassionate side of life and saw meaning to it. The metamorphosis was intense and soon Rekha saw it reflected in others' behaviour too. People who had hitherto scoffed at her began to respect her maturity. She was overjoyed at the change and realised the absolute necessity for it. She learnt to take care of herself and took her work more seriously. This marked the beginning of a new phase in Rekha's life and career—the second phase. Says Rekha: "I now feel that my enemies were all pygmies compared to my friend who is the greatest for me."

The change that first pervaded her personal life now began to affect her work too. Her aspirations grew anew and she devoted herself to her work to achieve untouched heights. With Namak Haraam, came a surge of new and different films for Rekha, through Alaap, Muqaddar Ka Sikandar, Silsila and Khubsoorat.

Her clowning was gone in no time and the audiences were surprised at the new look she had acquired so suddenly. Her application and dedication became so exemplary that even art filmmakers began to vie for her. A new name was added to the already existing short list of brilliant actresses fit for serious acting—Rekha. With off-beat films like Kalyug and Umrao Jaan, came the offer for Jabbar Patel's Musafir and Rekha felt the importance of being an actress, not just a filmstar.

Today, Rekha is the Brigitte Bardot of India with her extraordinary good looks and brilliant histrionics. She is the fantasy of every man. Unlike other heroines, Rekha's personality has gone from strength to strength over the last two decades. In the twenty years that have passed by, she has achieved new dimensions, both as a person and as an actress.

Yet she stands alone on the shores of the world of transient joys and sorrows, reminding one of Rilke's lines:

She stands on the cathedral's vast ascent
Simply stands there near the window-rose
With the apple in the apple pose
Even henceforth guilty/innocent

Akshay Upadhyaya

Translated from Hindi by Susmita Gupta

'I Am a Rare Person'

Rekha tells Akshay Upadhyaya

Prem & Ghosh

Prem & Ghosh

Nanik Ghosh

Jayanta Das

Q Don't you feel you have changed a lot of late?

A: Yes, of course. All human beings change with time.

Q: And how do you feel about it?

A: I feel nice and more than anything else, I feel the change was necessary.

Q: Then, can one infer that the change was deliberate on your part?

A: Oh no, not at all. These things just happen, you know. They come about with the various experiences you have in life, with the different kinds of people you come across and incidents, whether good or bad.

I too underwent the change while the process was on. I never felt anything while it was happening and neither did I calculate the effect of those things on myself. So how can it be preplanned? The change came all of a sudden. I realised it much later and when I did, I felt good Initially, of course, when I first became aware of it, I was rather apprehensive about the whole thing. I wondered what I was heading for and why it was happening at all.

Q: But what was there for you to worry about since the change was not preconceived, as you said?

A: Let me put it this way. I was more curious than apprehensive to know why I had started reacting differently to things and people. I was sure something was happening to me that was inducing me to behave so differently. In fact, I used to do just the opposite of what people expected of me. When they thought I would laugh, I wouldn't and things like that. That's when I first realised I was changing. Naturally I became concerned. But when I noticed it was a change for the better, I was not anxious at all.

Q What made you so sure that the change was something for the better?

A: You see, by then I had seen quite a bit of the world, in the sense that I had learnt to judge people on my own. I could see through them. During my childhood, my parents, rather parent (I never knew what a father was), my mother taught me to look at the world. She told me that if I would behave spontaneously with people, they would respond in the same way. So I learnt to behave naturally and spontaneously. I used to be a simpleton, you know and believed that everyone I met was simple and straight just like me.

But I was proved wrong when I came to Bombay. I realised that what I learnt through my childhood was all wrong, that people were not all so simple as I thought them to be. Now, I am mature enough to know better than to take people at their face value. I have seen enough to conclude that genuine people are rare.

Q: You just said that you have matured. Haven't you also become cleverer, and isn't this why you can judge people better?

A: Well, cleverness would mean narrowmindedness, meanness and a scheming nature perhaps, which is not what I meant. When I say matured, I mean I have grown up and have learnt to draw conclusions about people on my own. I do find, of course, a majority of scheming people in society

Q: What do you think is the reason for this?

A. This happens only in big cities. Go to any small place, Hyderabad for instance. This too is a city, but the people there are so simple. I feel Bombay is full of such scheming people.

Do you know how easy it is for people to fool others in Bombay? You can sell anything you want and get an exorbitant amount for it. This is possibly because of the glamour and status symbol this city offers. It's amazing the way people from all over India, be it the north or the south, want to come and settle down in Bombay. I don't understand what is so great about this place.

Q: What then brought you to Bombay?

A. I never wanted to come to Bombay. I came here because my mother wanted it. Besides, when I came here I was so young that I wasn't even aware of the place.

Q. Was it because of your desire to work in films or was it just sudden—your arrival here?

A. As I told you, it was all my mother's planning. I was only a kid, a child star working in south Indian films—Tamil, Telugu and Kannada. I was in the ninth standard, when my mother decided that Bombay was the place for me. She wanted me to achieve national fame and not just remain confined to the regional market of the south. She dinned this into my little head and I agreed out of plain unawareness. I was never, in any case, very ambitious and frankly I never wanted to become an actress.

Q: Everyone has aspirations to become something. You too must have had your own dream world or did you never feel the need for this?

A: This reminds me of a joke prevalent in our industry. I mean when filmstars are asked when they first became interested in films, they answer: 'Since childhood.' I'm sorry I can't say that, because truly I never wanted to have anything to do with films.

You see, my mother was an actress and hardly spent any time at home. I grew up imagining that actors and actresses had no domestic life whatsoever. This upset me and I decided that come what may, I would never enter the film world.

No love can be complete without the agony it brings with it. I can say this because I have experienced the pains and agonies that come with love.

I was very fond of dancing. My mother herself was a good dancer and singer. Every girl at home—my cousins and sisters—had to learn dancing. These things are absolutely a must for girls in our family. I too was made to learn dancing. Though interested in the art, I hated the way I was forced to learn it. It ruined my keenness for it. A tomboy that I was, I was interested in other things, and detested the thought of being compelled to do something which did not appeal to me. I still remember being asked to get up early every morning to do puja. It's because of that compulsion that I still hate the word puja. Not that I don't believe in God, I just can't bring myself to perform puja the way it is done.

In the same way, when I found I was being coerced into learning how to dance, I became indifferent to it. I protested. Today, I regret having abandoned the dance practice, for I could have learnt so much. But then nobody had the patience to explain the importance of these things to me with love and care. Instead of convincing me why I should take interest, my mother used to scold me and say that I should do it because she said so. Consequently, I have not trained myself in any field.

Q. I can now understand how this attitude of revolt came to stay in your character. Even when you were getting misunderstood, you probably felt people were imposing their wishes on you and perhaps that is why you were so bitter.

A: That's right. Everything I had done till then, I had been forced into. I wanted to become a dancer, even though I had not trained properly for it; I had plans to become one and used to imagine that some day I would have a troupe of my own and go abroad for performances. I was simply crazy about the idea of going abroad, and had even applied for an airhostess' job because of that. Anyway, when I came here it was because I had to become an actress. I was only 13, did not know a word of Hindi leave alone carry on a conversation in the language.

Q: Then how did you manage your way about this place?

A. In English. While shooting, I used to repeat the assistant manager's words. He used to call out my dialogue. I had a good memory so that was easy. Gradually, I picked up the language.

Anyway, to get back, in Bombay I met these hardcore professional producers, who treated me most ruthlessly. They never realised the child in me. It was only a few people like Mohan Sehgal and Hrishikesh Mukherjee who treated me well. So, disinterested in a film career, I was fed up with the shooting schedules I had to follow round the clock. Thanks to my first film, Saawan Bhadon which was an instant hit, I was loaded with at least 20 to 25 assignments which meant double shift shooting right away. It was exasperating. You must have heard all kinds of tales about me and my tantrums about how I used to walk out of the studios at will, irrespective of whether shooting was on. That was ten years ago but people haven't forgotten that. They can't for it's always the bad things that people remember, never the good things.

Q: No, but can you explain why at all you behaved like that?

A: As I told you, I was extremely fed up of films, shootings etc. Like other girls of my age, I too wanted to shop around, to have outings and a social life. Work had started telling on my nerves. Even on Sundays I had to work contrary to my wish. Adamant and stubborn that I was, I just decided I wouldn't take it any more. And at the slightest chance I got to escape from the grind of the studios, I used to drive away in my new car to places I liked. I used to go to the Juhu beach and sit around, have an icecream and while away the time. I had no friends and because I used to talk so much, I was always getting misunderstood. These days I talk much less.

Q: But there is no reason why people should misunderstand you only because you talked a lot.

A: Well... it's not just that. As I was telling you earlier, I was very spontaneous in my reflexes. I was bindaas and hardly ever conscious of the fact that I was a girl and that I should behave differently. So, used to having my brother's friends around the house, I behaved the way I felt. I used to slap their backs and talk just as they did. Even when I grew up, I could never understand why I should have to discipline myself.

Q: Tell us, how did you eventually prove to people that they were wrong about you?

A: I'll tell you how. Let's start with my performance. A lot of people today feel that I am a good actress, but a good actress I've always been. Many believe that I've improved over the years. Possibly, for many an actress does. But not me, because I was an instinctive actress. Acting came naturally to me right from childhood.

But the fact that I am a good actress, people first realised when they saw me in Ghar, in which I played a completely different kind of role. People thought that my performance was many shades better.

Q: You mean you created an environment so that people could think differently about you?

A: Well, if you ask me, I don't think anybody has the time to listen to what you are trying to say, or even give you a chance to speak for yourself, unless you are a 'somebody'. You may be talented, an excellent human being, even reasonably rich, but no one is going to be interested in you till you achieve some standing in society.

It's just that with Ghar people noticed this big change in my performance and started attributing it to something in my personal life. They wondered what it was that had brought about such a transformation in my looks and my work.

Q: Was it really due to some incident in your personal life?

A: Well, people thought it was because of my interaction with some people in off-screen relationships which had led to the change. So they got curious.

Q: When did you first realise that you were changing?

A: I don't know when it all began. I wasn't even conscious of the fact that my looks had changed and so had my gait and behaviour. It was only when others started behaving differently with me that the change dawned on me. I felt something was happening. People who used to be impolite with me suddenly started showing respect. Instead of slapping my back roughly as they used to, they now greeted me with a graceful namaste. At first I was amused, then surprised, till I finally realised that they were serious. I wondered why and traced it back to the change in my personality which was gradually manifesting itself.

Q: If I am right, the change in your personality was operating on two levels. One was on the physical side of your person and the other on the mental level. Did the transformations set in simultaneously or did one follow the other?

A: In a way, the physical change set in first. That's a long story. Those days I used to suffer from a massive complex regarding my obesity. All through school people had teased me about it and scoffed at me saying: 'She's an actress' daughter, she'll never become one herself.' Even at home I was the fattest of the lot and constantly subjected to comments. I used to be so fretful that I used to retaliate with 'Any-objections?' if I was told I was getting fatter.

Another thing is that nobody takes a fat person seriously. He or she is simply a subject of fun and ridicule. Invariably though, you'll find that fat people are also the jolliest. But their happy-go-lucky attitude is just a front put up to counter the dejection brought by their fatness. I used to feel the same way. Though I had tried everything possible from dieting to the works to reduce weight, I had failed. Oh, it was so difficult, I remember.

You may be talented, an excellent human being, even reasonably rich, but no one is going to be interested in you till you achieve some standing in society.

And then I fell seriously ill. I hadn't fallen so sick in years. I landed at the hospital with typhoid for two months. It was all, of course, because of the endless shooting schedules and all the impossible things I had to do for films. Anyway, it was the long ailment that did the trick. I realised then how drastically I had lost weight.

Q: Normally when one is ill one reflects on the realities of life and comes face to face with many a bitter truth of existence Did you also experience any such feelings?

A: Of course. And for me it was worse, for I was not just physically sick, I was mentally sick too. I was exhausted coping with the film career I had been forced into. While I was sick, I almost died, you know. One day my blood pressure went so low that I was near blindness This is the first time I am revealing this to someone.

Q: How did you feel then?

A: I felt I was dying. My blood pressure was collapsing with such rapidity that even the doctors could not diagnose the cause I was trying to speak but couldn't, I could not see anything. All I could hear were faint voices fading into the distance just as you see in films: 'What's happening to you? Call the doctor quick, the doctor came, I felt pins and needles in my back but that's about all. Nothing the doctor did could bring me back to normalcy before eight o'clock the next morning.

Q: Did you have any hallucinations when you felt you were going to die?

A: Oh, I felt terribly lonely and helpless. Anxiety and insomnia had made things worse. I remember how I used to talk to God. God, in fact, has been my dearest friend ever since childhood. I'll tell you how. Whenever I felt hurt and angry with others, at school or at home, I used to run off to the church nearby and spend hours talking to Jesus Christ. I love the peaceful surroundings of a church, which is precisely why I dislike the noisy atmosphere of the temples and particularly the tradition of offering money before God. In any case, like I said earlier, I do not believe in puja.

Q: Would you care to explain what you understand by puja?

A: Today I can say I understand all the dimensions of puja, but in my early years puja to me only meant getting up at five in the morning and chanting some Sanskrit shlokas. However, I feel puja in the truest sense of the word, is synonymous with love. To worship is to love.

Q: And why does one love?

A: Essentially for joy. Love brings joy both to the lover and the beloved.

Q: Do you think there is anything such as ideal love? If there is, how would you define it?

A: Well, there can be nothing called ideal love, because love does not manifest itself in a particular form. It has no limits either. Love is love and it is really as simple as that. Love is something you can only feel and experience. I don't think I can exemplify any one relationship as one of ideal love and aspire to achieve those standards myself. There cannot be any strict measure. All I know is that the love I have given people and the love I have got from them is great for me.

There is another thing I feel strongly about. No love can be complete without the agony it brings with it. I can say this because I have experienced the pains and agonies that come with love and which is what has made my love complete.

Q: Can you explain that a bit more?

A: I'll put it this way. Suppose a person I love suddenly hurts me and shatters my dreams about life, I start hating that person and gradually the hate turns into indifference. I develop a don't-care attitude till I think I've forgotten the person. But no, suddenly, this pain tugs at my heart and reminds me of him. So it is the pain that constantly keeps reminding you of the fact that you loved that person. It works like a reminder and keeps you alert.

Q: Do you mean that you have learnt to cope with the agonies of love?

A: No, that's not what I mean. The pain is important but it does not make one happy. I am basically a happy person, and want to make everyone I meet happy. I enjoy it thoroughly when people laugh at my jokes. I want them to make me laugh too. And mind you that's a rare quality in human beings. There are very few people who are jealous of me. Take it from me, there's nobody who hates me. I know a very important and unusual person who smiles every time he sees me. I make him happy and vice versa. He tells me about so many things and also shares his sorrows with me.

Q: Why do you say he is important and what makes him so unusual?

A: Everybody knows he is a famous man. And unusual because he has given me so much. Achieving so much——fame, etc at such a young age is indeed a very big thing for me. I have achieved so many things in life. These remembrances will keep inspiring me through life, just as they have been prodding me to make myself into what I am today. His inspiration has given me the support to face life with all its joys and sorrows. I have learnt to confront situations with courage, anger and even a competitive spirit. This is one thing very close to my heart.

I am basically a happy person and I want to make everyone I meet happy. I enjoy it thoroughly when people laugh at my jokes. I want them to make me laugh too.

Another thing which I value a lot is freedom, and I don't mean living in a free country. By freedom I mean liberty from responsibilities, liabilities and commitments that spring from, say, love. In this respect, I have been very lucky. I have no commitments whatsoever and no responsibilities either. I am responsible only for myself. I have decided that in future too, I will do everything for myself. It may be yoga or anything else for that matter. This, however, does not mean that I am being self-centred.

Q: I appreciate this for I too feel that people who claim to be living for others are actually putting up a facade.

A: Yes, exactly. They are hypocrites. I just cannot bring myself to do such a thing, for I have never been a hypocrite. I can't become one either. And this I feel is one of my strongest points. I am satisfied today for I am free. I am neither married nor do I have children which save me the trouble of obeying my spouse's orders and having responsibilities about my children. I don't have to put up any facades.

I just do what appeals to me, to my 'self.' Lest this be interpreted as a justification for my flirting, let me tell you that I've a lot better to do. But the freedom is essential. Yes, there's one thing which I am very careful about. I try not to hurt anyone intentionally.

Q: Would you call yourself a complete woman?

A: Well, to tell you honestly, I haven't yet become a complete woman, though I want to. Of course I have entered the process of turning into one and it does feel great to be told that I have all it takes to be a complete woman. Again, however, as I said in my interview in Ravivar, no woman can be complete till she becomes a mother.

Q: Will you explain this a little more? Are you trying to say that motherhood, which is a projection of another aspect of a woman's personality, is the consummation of womanhood?

A: Yes, that's right... I am proud of being born as a woman, and I pray that I be born a woman, even if I were to live ten more lives.

Q: Is this because you feel that every woman has something of a God within her, which enables her to produce another life?

A: I said that almost a decade ago—that a woman is a mini-God of sorts. Woman, I feel, is a born mother. You can see the maternal instincts in a girl right from the days she starts playing with dolls. Even in a marital relationship, despite the many claims the husband makes of his superiority over his woman, in reality it is the other way round. When a husband comes home to his wife, she mothers him, bearing with all his tantrums and whims. So you see, woman is the epitome of motherhood.

Q: As you must be aware, you are the dream girl of many an individual. What is remarkable is the wide range of your fans, which includes an illiterate rustic on the one hand and very creative intellectuals on the other. How do you feel about that?

A: I should say I am very lucky to be thought of in this way. And that is why I call myself a rare person. As you said, when a villager sees me on screen, he identifies in me a typical young Indian beauty—sprightly, buxom and long haired. He concerns himself only with the designs are for men.

ask any woman.

Dinesh suitings. In an exclusive range of subtle designs. Elegant pin stripes, whip cords, cavalry twills and more. In a wide range of superb finishes. Quiet. Distinctive. For suits, trousers and safari suits.

Only Dinesh designs the essential difference.

dinesh

Worsted Suitings

everest/84/SDM/106

The tinkle of crystal,
the sparkle of talk and laughter...
and Gold Flake.
Great quality...
For the gracious people.

GOLD FLAKE
KINGS
Quality that's forever

CLARION C-GFK 1

WILLS GOLD FLAKE cigarette bears the name
WD & HO WILLS

STATUTORY WARNING CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

physical side of my person. Whereas an intellectual finds me bright and intelligent. He concerns himself with the mental level of my person. According to them, I have a rare balance of intelligence and modesty. Though mind you, I have no desire to call myself modest. Modesty today is all humbug. I'd rather be what I am. But I must admit that I have in me a unique combination of physical and mental assets, for which I am very grateful to God.

Q: Do you maintain this attitude in your personal life too? In other words, would you give equal importance to a rustic who simply tills the land and at the same time to Husain whose artistic approach to life you admire?

A: Yes, of course, I admire each person whatever he or she may do—even the maid who comes home to do the dishes. It amazes me the way she works—she is so fit considering she has eight children and the working hours she keeps! I often wonder if I could do that. I appreciate everything that I cannot do myself. There are so many things I would like to do and cannot do for lack of time. I often ask myself why God made only 24 hours to a day and not more. I love painting, for instance, and can hardly devote serious attention to it.

Q: Were you keen on painting from childhood itself?

A: Yes, I never trained in art but I used to paint occasionally, but not since I came here. I used to do oil painting and sketches.

Q: What kind of paintings did you like?

A: I love fantasies and even when I used to paint myself, I loved weaving fantasies into reality. From memory I used to recreate scenes I had come across and then blur them with touches of fantasy.

Q: Have you ever shown any of your paintings to any painter, who might be able to interpret them?

A: No, I want to show them to Husain Sahab, but when I am alone.

Q: Do you have any particular liking for some artists?

A: Yes. I like Husain's horses, Prabha's fisherwoman and there is another artist in Hyderabad by the name of Lakshman who is good too.

Q: Although you are already in the medium of communication, have you ever felt the need to widen the spectrum of expression through another medium perhaps?*

A: Actually film itself is a wonderful medium, but occasionally I do feel like writing. And I do—in English. I write poems, but they are so juvenile I hardly ever recite them nowadays.

I have no desire to call myself modest. Modesty today is all humbug. I'd rather be what I am.

Q: Given a chance to make a film, what kind of film would you make?

A: You'll see it when I make it.

Q: No, don't you feel you should venture into something different, and make films which have not already been made?

A: Of course we definitely need some really good films; India can hardly boast of any.

Q: What then do you plan to do?

A: I cross my bridges when I come to them. In any case, what's the use of contemplating the future when I am not even sure whether I am going to last for long. It's better to concentrate on what you are doing at present and derive satisfaction from it. As far as I can foresee, I should be able to sail through easily for another two years. But one never knows, I may not be around in the next six months. After that I plan to go into direction. Actually, one can't say, I might even get married in the meanwhile. Not that I'll be upset if I don't. I have no such plans about myself. Like my mother tells me, everything—marriage and children——has its time and place, and that I have crossed the age for all that. She may be right, you know. However, if my destiny has marriage in store for me, well and good.

What matters more to me is the friendship in any and every relationship. Whether it is my mother, sister, brother, daughter, I'd like to put friendship before everything. Even with my husband, he has to be a friend before I marry him.

Q: Just as we think of you as a glamorous personality, do you consider anyone more glamorous than yourself?

A: America is full of such people.

Q: No, I'm talking about Indians.

A: There's Gayatri Devi and there was Indira Gandhi. And there's my mother of whom I can say so much. She is beautiful both within and without. I can never be like her and that is why she's the only person I'm so jealous of.

Q: Among Indian males, do you consider anyone to be glamorous?

A: For me, a glamorous man must be a total man, irrespective of whether he is perfect. Do you know who I consider a complete man? Shiva. Yes, he was ill-tempered and smoked a chillum. So what? I still admire him. Shiva stands out— with his expressive eyes and his overall personality. And what is more, he was so simple. I also admire the way he handled two wives with so much love and care.

Q: You are deviating. Isn't there any such male in India now who you idolise?

A: Yes there is a man in whom I found a glimpse of my hero, Shiva. I cannot name him. He has so much in common with Shiva-- the same serene quietness on the surface and the strength and depth within. Just as Shiva used to give vent to his frustration through tandava, which was his special way of expressing himself, this man too has a special way of expressing his feelings. When he is angry he doesn't yell, he doesn't chide me, but explains things to me with love and caring gestures.

Q: How can you gauge that he is angry?

A: From his eyes. And then intuition. Actually once you get to know a person well, you can decipher even his unsaid wishes.

Q: Is it true that you had once tried to commit suicide? Have you actually contemplated such a thing?

A: Oh, suicide attempts have been a part of my life ever since I can remember. I have made several attempts and frankly I am not at all ashamed to admit it.

Dramatic Decades

10 October 1954: Born, Bhanurekha, to Gemini Ganesan and Pushpavalli in Madras. Later to be second of six children.

1964: Chubby little girl in school, known as Big Lotta. Was only interested in reading comics and "Moral science was the only subject that interested me." Family needed money as father had deserted them, so opted for films "where I didn't have to use my brains." Ran away from boarding school chasing celluloid dreams.

1965: Her first film in Telugu. Age: still to complete 11.

1967: Her first film as a heroine in Tamil. Age. 13, studying in class nine.

1968: Spotted by top Bombay filmstar Biswajit at Gemini Studios, Madras, who recommended her to producers from East Africa, Shatrujit Pal and Kuljit Pal. Was signed on for her first Hindi film as heroine, Anjana Safar, later retitled Do Shikari, starring Biswajit.

1969: Moved over to Bombay. Age: 15. The "sexy new aspirant" began attending every Filmfare Awards function with the ambition of winning an award some day.

1969-end: The sensational kissing scene with Biswajit on the sets of Anjana Safar. It created a stir to the extent of being picked up by Life magazine, which published the picture of the kiss. The scandal upset her emotionally and was "the first blow" to her mental equilibrium in her film career. Even today, she has unhappy memories of it and says: "They said, poochha tha. What poochha tha? I didn't know the language, I didn't know anything, I thought I would be raped when I went back to the hotel."

1970: Photographer and publicist Dhirendra Kishen took her under his wing and introduced her to filmmaker Mohan Segal. Cast in Saawan Bhadon with co-star Navin Nischol.

January 1971: Her first Hindi film, Saawan Bhadon, released and was an instant hit, along with the catchy songs of Sonik/Omi, Verma Mallik like Kaan mein jhumka, chaal mein thumka. The film was a silver jubilee hit. Rekha signed about 50 films in the next five years. Age: 16.

1971: Began being publicised as the replacement for Mumtaz, though was clubbed more often with vamps like Bindu and Faryal.

1973: At around this time it was revealed that she had got married secretly to Vinod Mehra and also broken up soon after, thanks to Moushumi Chatterjee's extra-curricular interest in the affair. The "Black Rose's" best friend, "Pinky" (Yogita) offered a consoling shoulder and ended up losing her own beau to Rekha—Kiran Kumar. Prior to that, however, Rekha attempted suicide by swallowing Tik 20 and later explaining it away as a cockroach in her upma! Vinod Mehra's sister remarked on the suicide bid then: "A couple of Rekha's films are being released shortly. So this is just her way of building up publicity for them." In June, she went on record as having said: "Gossip is a very small price to pay for fame." In Stardust Annual's popularity poll, Jaya figured as No. 1 as the most talented actress (followed by Waheeda Rehman and Hema Malini) and Rekha was second to Mumtaz, but ahead of Zeenat Aman, in the listings for the sexiest actress.

1975: Her friendship with Amitabh grew. Ten years later, she was to state: "I never had a best friend. Never had a best friend till ten years ago. When I met this best friend of my life. Who has remained one. Mr Bachchan."

1976: Dulal Guha's Do Anjane (with Amitabh) released. For the first time, her acting talent reared its beautiful head. Rekha entered a new phase in her career. The new influence, Amitabh, on her life seemed evident. She also did Hrishikesh's Alaap (Amitabh), somewhat in the Jaya mould but being the first film of Amitabh portraying him against his "angry young man" image, flopped badly.

Rekha in Dharam Karam

1977: The period when her affair with Kiran Kumar was at its strongest.

1978: Manek Chatterjee's Ghar (with Vinod Mehra) hit the headlines. Rekha as an actress came into her own: her finest performance to date and a film in which she looked more gorgeous than ever before. Ghar was her first Filmfare award nomination. A step away only from her ambition ten years ago. That year, Nutan got the award for Main Tulsi Tere Angan Ki. Met father Gemini Ganesan for the first time.

1980: Mission accomplished. Hrishikesh's Khubsoorat (Rakesh Roshan) conclusively proved that Rekha was an actress of undeniable calibre. A superhit with which Rekha won her first (and only, so far) Filmfare award for best actress.

1981: Did two very important films: Shyam Benegal's Kalyug and Muzaffar Ali's Umrao Jaan Said Benegal: "I saw her in Khubsoorat and realised she had a lot of potential." Hrishikesh Mukherjee himself said: "Her role in Khubsoorat was written specially for her." Yash Chopra's much talked about Silsila was made based on the real life story of Amitabh, Rekha and Jaya, each of them playing their real life roles and Jaya making her comeback specially on the persuasion of Amitabh that he would put an end to his affair. The film, however, flopped.

1982: Rekha wins the Urvashi National award for Umrao Jaan from President N. Sanjeeva Reddy.

1983: Gemini Ganesan attempts suicide on 26 September.

1984: Rekha goes on a health kick a la Jane Fonda with her Mind and Body Temple video cassette and classes.

1985: Important films like Girish Karnad's Utsav, (Shashi, Shekhar Suman, Anooradha Patel) and Dr Jabbar Patel's Musafir (Naseeruddin, Moon Moon Sen) among others. "My reign as No. 1 was over a long time ago," she says today. "But I'm still the best. I'll always be the best."

Anil Grover

Who Will Replace the Angry Young Man?

Despite the talent available in the Hindi filmworld, Amitabh Bachchan is irreplaceable

As yet, nobody clearly knows whether Hindi cinema's loss is Indian politics' gain. But it is certain that Amitabh Bachchan's loss will be keenly felt by an industry which derived its life-breath from him. Not without reason was he known as the "The One-Man Industry." For, over the past ten years, the Hindi film industry had grown and prospered with this actor as at no other time with any single artiste. Not even Rajesh Khanna enjoyed the stupendous commercial clout that Bachchan did. For the simple reason that, at the time when Rajesh Khanna ruled the box-office waves, the overseas market had not opened up the way it did with Amitabh Bachchan.

No wonder the industry breathed and almost died with Amitabh after his near-fatal encounter with death. A pall of gloom spread through the industry when Amitabh was struggling for life. Never before has such a vast and powerful industry depended on one man's health.

But then, as box-office wizard Manmohan Desai, who with Amitabh formed an incredible fantasy-weaving team, puts it: "If anyone really cares to study the box-office graph, he will divine that Amitabh Bachchan has indeed been the sole contributing factor to the soaring fortunes of his starrers. It's no exaggeration to say that Amitabh was number one, two or three—going right up to seventh place. Any other

Raju Upadhyay

(Top) Kamalahasan and (bottom) Deepak Parasar with Salma Agha

actor, no matter what his histrionic stature, came only after that seventh position."

"No other actor," said Manmohan Desai, "could ever sell a film all on his own as Amitabh can do even today. If he quits films, as rumoured, it will take a long, long time for the industry to adjust to the metamorphosed situation. No matter how much those who do not depend on this superstar may want to wish him away. With Amitabh in the cast, producers did not have to worry about either their finance, or their crowd-pulling power. Even films like Inquilab, Nastik and Pukaar, which are touted as Amitabh flops, have in truth grossed much more than their investment. If producers and distributors still grumble, it is because, with a superstar like Amitabh, colossal returns were expected. That way, no Amitabh starrer has been a disaster."

In spite of the fact that TV and video piracy have cut into the box-office collections of theatres, the fact remains that not one film of Amitabh has really ruined any producer. "This itself is a feat, you will agree, when, even before the master print leaves the laboratory, you find its pirated video cassette flooding the market," says Desai.

Will Amitabh's absence bring about a sea-change in the industry? Manmohan Desai sincerely feels it will, in fact, change the industry's commercial anatomy. As he puts it: "It will make a world of difference at the box-office. If you study the last ten years' collections, you will find that more than 70 to 75 per cent of gross takings have been from Amitabh films. Without him, you just can't expect the same return. Amitabh was a built-in insurance against your film's failure. Suppose the same Inquilab, Nastik or Pukaar had featured any other actor, it would have been an unmitigated disaster. Today, my Coolie is in its 59th week and still going strong all over India."

"Yet, from Amitabh's personal point of view," concedes Desai, "the man was really overdoing things. Especially after his second illness. This was a rare kind of disease in which a patient had to be on medicines for long. Amitabh and his family knew that he could not go on for ever—not at the pace at which the industry was expecting him to work. I knew, for instance, that he had to call a halt to it, sooner rather than later. He had stopped signing new films and had also completed the three films in hand: Giraftar, my movie Mard and Purnachandra Rao's film. He had kept the industry going long enough all on his own."

Jackie Shroff (above) and Amitabh Bachchan

But Prakash Mehra, the man who transformed Amitabh from a fledgling actor to the stature of a demi-god with Zanjeer, feels that though the superstar may not have either the time or the inclination to be as involved in films as before, he may not altogether quit films. "He's said he won't retire from films," points out Mehra. "And I believe him. He may do a film or two in a year. As for me, it will make a very big difference, naturally, since Zanjeer, we have made films together right up to Sharabi, which is a hit. So, if Amitabh does decide to withdraw from films, it will be a very great loss for one and all."

"I had an English film planned with Amitabh in mind for the lead," said Prakash Mehra. "True I hadn't discussed it with him, for he was busy then with his elections. Now he's become an MP. The film, being in English and for the foreign market, is to have a number of 'hot' scenes. But, now that the situation has qualitatively changed, I don't know how keen Amitabh will be about it. As I said, I had no time to discuss its script with him. If he does decide to work in a couple of films a year, I'm sure he and I will come together again. For you'll never get a more disciplined or better organised artiste."

By contrast, Yash (Deewaar) Chopra, who had parted ways with Bachchan after the dismal showing of his much-tomtommed Silsila, feels that, in this industry, nobody, no matter how powerful he may be at the moment, is irreplaceable. Says Chopra: "Every time a film personality has departed, be it Nargis, who chose to retire from films, or Amitabh, who's now gone into politics, it has ultimately not made any major difference to the industry. Amitabh or no Amitabh, this industry will not stop making films. And a good film made out of a strong story is going to sell, star or no star. Look at my own brother B. R. Chopra's Nikaah. It did not have any top stars—in fact, its heroine, Salma Agha, was a new face. Raj Babbar was then far from being a top-selling actor, while Deepak Parashar was only a top model. Yet the film minted money all over India and abroad. Govind Nihalani's Ardh Satya did not have any glamour appeal at all in its star-cast, yet look at its collections! "The industry," I feel, "will find its own substitute for Amitabh. And, when I say a substitute, it's not necessary that another action-oriented hero should take over. When Rajesh Khanna was replaced by Amitabh, Bachchan was not a romantic hero like his predecessor. So now, when a newcomer takes over, it needn't necessarily be another man with an action-oriented macho image. For instance, already we have a toughie-softie in Jackie Shroff. Of course, he has a long way to go before he can really be hailed as another superstar. But what I'm saying is that this industry is throwing up new talents every once in a while. So we needn't despair."

Sunny Deol

Added Yash Chopra, "Mbreover, with the advent of TV and with video a reality, it's a moot question if the industry could have really continued to afford the kind of super-budget films that Amitabh starrers inevitably were. Maybe production costs will now come down as a result of smaller returns. And, with them, star markets. I never really subscribed to this view that ours is a 'One-Man Industry.' It can't afford to be that, no matter how big a star. Of course, right now, I agree there's no one in sight to replace Amitabh, as we know his star personality. But, as I said, the replacement need not necessarily be another Amitabh. The film market will not collapse as a result of Amitabh's going. This industry has an immense inner resilience to adjust to all kinds of change, as it has shown time and again."

Jeetendra, the only actor who at one stage showed signs of outstarring Amitabh, had to shift operations to the south to remain in the public eye. Jeetendra, of course, has always been a great favourite with southern producers, since he leaves their idea of a box-office formula undisturbed. His successful films made in the south, are mainly those based on Tamil, Telugu or Kannada hits, so that his contribution by way of originality is nil even while his success is assured in the light of regional box office experience.

It was once expected that the star-sons Kumar Gaurav, Sunjay Dutt, Sunil Anand and Sunny Deol would do what their fathers couldn't—offer stiff competition to Amitabh. But they flattered to deceive. The only star-son to pose some kind of challenge was Sunny Deol—big-built like his father—who acted well in his first film, Betaab. But, as Manmohan Desai says, it is a long haul still for Sunny to consolidate his position and rise to Amitabhian heights.

Jackie Shroff, having the height of Amitabh but not his build, turned up a winner in an author-backed role in Hero, a film on which director Subhash Ghai lavished all his attention so as to "teach the star-sons a lesson." But the distance between Jackie Shroff and Amitabh Bachchan is still the distance between a mere star and a superstar.

A much-touted name is Rajnikanth, the south's Shatrughan Sinha, who somehow held his own opposite Amitabh in Andha Kanoon. Rajnikanth may be accepted in the south as a superstar, but has miles to go before he can rule the rest of India the way Amitabh did.

Kamalahasan on whom a lot of hopes were pinned after his stupendous success in Ek Duje Ke Liye, has now proved to be only a super talent, not a superstar. Today, he is neither in Bombay nor in Madras. Anil Kapoor has been showing promise, but has neither the personality nor the build to take over. You cannot expect a David like Anil to down a Goliath like Amitabh.

Most of the established names, like Rajesh Khanna, Dharmendra, Shatrughan Sinha and Rishi Kapoor, seem to have gone out of focus as far as filling up the yawning first-place gap is concerned. In fact, filmmakers seem to feel that it will be one of the newer crop who will replace Amitabh. That is, if he is replaced at all.

As Yash Chopra pertinently puts it, we may come to have an entirely different definition of a superstar. We may even do away with a one-man superstar image and in his place, have a galaxy of stars lining the horizon in films with more to say and less to pay.

Amitabh Bachchan was the angry young man who came in from the cold and stayed. So long as he was around this industry could jingle-jangle to the rhythm of dishum-dishum. The Hindi film industry, for ten long years, was, his private property. The film world was his oyster and he the pearl.

Girija Rajendran

HINDI FILMS

Old Themes in New Reels

What is new in Hindi cinema is the handling of the theme and not the theme itself

From the silent Raja Harishchandra (1913) to the three dimensional Chotan Chetan (1984, original Malayalam title My dear Kuttichatan), Hindi films have been gaining in popularity. For a population, 80 per cent of which cannot read the titles that splash on the screen and 60 per cent of which live below the poverty line, films have become the only transient escape from reality. The country's film studios churn out more than 800 feature films and about 650 short films every year, and an average of 1.25 crore people watch films every day in theatres across the country. This does not include those who watch films on TV or other open-air shows

As a medium that has an octopus-like grip on the Indian psyche, the film has and will have no parallel. As a mirror of popular culture the film works at two levels, the conscious level where there are obvious changes in physical appearance to match those of the film hero or heroine and the sub-conscious level whereby moral values are influenced. As Mrinal Sen puts it: "Even a lullaby is propaganda. It wants to put to sleep one who doesn't want to sleep. So I conclude that all art is propaganda."

The working group on national film policy appointed by the government of India in 1979 recognised the importance of cinema as a medium and it was believed that cinema is the largest disseminator of popular culture and is a major industry in India. Consider these statistics:

- The film industry gives approximately Rs 200 crores annually to the government as entertainment tax.
- Export earnings from films in 1980 were Rs 150 million.

The reach, impact and wealth of the industry is thus mind-boggling. But what about the quality of the films that come out of the assembly lines at an incredible rate of two full length and three short films a day? The Karanth committee estimated that about 65 per cent of the films are flops—or in other words—rejected by the people. About 25 per cent barely manage to recover their investments. Only the remaining 10 per cent of films make sizeable profits and out of these a mere two per cent are block busters.

The year 1983 was a particularly bad year for Hindi cinema as over 70 per cent of the films flopped and a mere two per cent including Andha Kanoon, Himmatwala, Mawaali, Justice Chowdhary, Avtaar, Souten, Betaab, Masoom, Ardh Satya and Beabroo made big money. Films which did just above average in 1983 were Mujhe Insaaf Chahiye, Subah, Katha, Dard Ka Rishta and Arth. Of the 64 films released in the first half of 1984, barely a dozen can be termed successful. A few more will recover investments after running in 'B' and 'C' grade theatres. The only films to celebrate silver jubilees were Coolie and Hero which were spillovers from last year.

Despite the setbacks, films keep on coming in torrents, bursting on the Indian mind with the same old story in new colours. For how long will a gullible populace be fed on such glorified rubbish? Is it just the mediocrity and callous arrogance of the filmmakers who preside over the destiny of Hindi filmdom, or is the audience responsible in any way? The filmmakers say that their's is just a case of demand meeting supply. If that is the case, why do filmgoers often reject what they "demand"? Are all the hit films great studies in human character or comments of social or political significance, retort the filmmakers. What then, are Hindi films propagating? A content analysis of Hindi films made between 1981 and 1984 show that thematically they can be compartmentalised into ten categories (love stories, revenge, sacrifice, lost and found, political and social comedy, historical/devotional, family, women and anti-establishment) with occasional overlapping of themes.

Let us take the example of Coolie, an excellent "formula film" in the sense that it includes practically all the categories mentioned above. It has the lost-and-found theme where the sons (Amitabh Bachchan and Rishi Kapoor) are separated from their parents due to the evil machinations of the villain, Kader Khan; the revenge theme where Amitabh avenges the disintegration of his family and the maltreatment of his parents; the love theme where childhood lovers Rishi Kapoor and Shoma Anand are separated and the coolie Amitabh who falls in love with a first class passenger, the daughter of a top-ranking official in the railways; the political plane where the coolie contests the elections against the villain and propagates socialism from the podium; and the social level where it preaches inter-communal harmony by depicting the case of a Muslim boy brought up lovingly by a Hindu coolie. Similarly, Sholay (1975) contains comedy (Veeru's clowning), tragedy (Jai's death), the revenge theme (Sanjeev Kumar seeking vendetta against Amjad Khan playing Gabbar Singh, the social theme (advocating widow remarriage) and the allegorical/mythological themes (in the personification of a mythological demon Ravan in Gabbar Singh).

Along with recurrent themes and situations there are also types of characters that are portrayed again and again. For example the image of the angry young man is so often repeated that it becomes difficult to distinguish between Amitabh in Lawaaris, Coolie, Shakti, Nastik, Kaalia, Rajnikant in Andha Kanoon, Meri Adalat, Raj Babbar in Aaj ki Awaaz, Dharmendra in Baazi, Qayamat, Shatrughan Sinha in Mangal Pandey, Bheema, Maati Mangey Khoon, Sunjay Dutt in Mera Faisla and Jeetendra in Meri Awaaz Suno, Himmatwala. Mawaali and Zakhme Sher and many others. Whether it is a single person or a group of persons or a particular system that has enraged them, the fact remains that they are all angry and are out to wreak vengeance on the cause of their fury. Bloodshot eyes, clenched jaws, hammering fists, flying kicks, high-pitched hysteria and a general attitude of scorn, cynicism and bottled-up hate are characteristics of this type who always emerges victorious in his mission of good versus evil.

The development of this kind of a character is particular to societies where three-fourths of the population is powerless and in seeing such a figure each one experiences a personal sense of power. The hero's battle against oppression becomes the viewer's private war against reality and his victory becomes their victory, even though it is a short-lived one. However, the development of the "vigilante mentality" is an attempt at duping the individual and reflects a fascist tendency. It provides a mere punching bag, a fantasy solution, whereby the repressed individual, sitting before the screen can give vent to his fury vicariously through the single messianic figure on screen. Once a viewer emerges from the hall he is purged of all those "impure feelings" of hate, anger and violence, for has not he been matching the hero fist for fist, fury for fury for the past three hours and all that is left of him now is a triumphant hero?

This is akin to the "hate sessions" that George Orwell talked about in Nineteen Eighty-Four, whereby all citizens were purged of their unhealthyemotions by chanting violent slogans against the enemy in frequently repeated two-minute "hate sessions." Moreover, the solutions offered through these movies are escapist and tend to beg the question of emancipation by showing that the responsibility of ameliorating one's condition rests on individuals alone: each has to take up arms and fight his own violent battle through the system. Even a new wave film like Ardh Satya perpetuates this false belief when at the end of the film the disillusioned police officer kills his tormentor in order to overcome his sense of impotence.

One wonders if that is the solution to corruption in the law and order machinery. If that is, then who is there to reap the benefits of this emancipation? Not Anant Welankar at least, for he will end up in jail. And no one likes to do that. Second, what kind of solution is this? One Rama Shetty will be replaced by another Rama Shetty. The only option left for the common man is to live like Inspector Haider (Shafi Inamdar) with blinkers on.

The second popular character type is the courting hero, either of the Devdas variety as in Painter Babu or the macho man in Betaab. There is of course the eternal mother figure, who is a paragon of strength, determination, devotion and virtue, the Mother India image as in Kaamyab, Ghar ek Mandir, Namak Halaal, Coolie, Nastik and Rishta Kagaz Ka. There is also the erring wife who undermines the worth of her husband even though he indulges in an extra-marital affair (Ek Hi Bhool), or he relegates her to the background vis-a-vis his family (Thodi si Bewafaai) or she may have erred in maintaining herself after marriage (Grihapravesh) or she may have transgressed the limits of morality by indulging in a pre-marital affair (Bezuban, Patthar Ki Lakeer) or she may be the erring daughter-in-law of Ghar ek Mandir, Mazdoor, Rishta Kagaz Ka, Teri Kasam. In any case, she has to end up at the feet of her husband if she wants salvation, otherwise she is doomed forever.

Another popular image is the sacrificing man or woman. Be it the sister in Tohfa or Jeevan Dhara or the friend in Raaste Pyar Ke and Bemisaal, the two wives in Asha Jyoti, the beloved in Apnapan, Mehndi Rang Layegi or the ailing lover boy in Prem Tapasya. The philosophy thereby propagated is that happiness lies not in acquiring but in distributing. It is only the weak and the wily who want to amass. The noble and the divine are those who have nothing in terms of wordly goods and worldly possessions and it is only the evil and the ignoble who would not like to be noble and divine. Does not this kind of propagated asceticism somehow advocate and perpetuate poverty, loneliness, deprivation and unhappiness?

Still from Mandi

Amitabh Bachchan in Coolie

Women by far have got a raw deal in Hindi cinema. Society offers no social or moral sanction to the westernised woman (Sareeka in Shriman Shrimati, Patthar ki Lakeer), the assertive woman (Tina in Souten, Poonam in Teri Kasam, Rati in Mazdoor, Rishta Kagaz Ka, Shabana in Thodi si Bewafaai, etc.), the fallen woman (Rekha in Prem Tapasya, Maati Mangey Khoon, Shabana in Doosri Dulhan, Mandi etc.), the other woman (Parveen in Yeh Nazdikeeyan, Sinita in Arth, Rekha in Silsila, Sareeka in Grihapravesh). These are all transgressors of the moral law and can only be accepted back into the fold after they have sought pardon from their guardians and have pledged to refrain from all further transgressions. The only movies where women have managed any kind of infringement of the so-called moral code with impunity are Ek Baar Phir where the woman walks out on an insensate husband unlike ShrimanShrimati, Swarg Narak and others where the virtue of the woman lay in trying to adjust with boorish, drunkard husbands; Arth where the woman refuses to accept an adulterer husband unlike Yeh Nazdikeeyan and Ek Hi Bhool; Subah, where a woman walks out on a conservative family realising that when it comes to a question of choice, her role as a member of society is more important than her role as a wife and mother; Mujhe Insaaf Chahiye, where the woman goes to court to fight for the legitimacy of her unborn child; Insaaf Ka Tarazu and Beaabroo, where victims of rape do not commit suicide but take revenge by picking up the threads of their life once again unlike so many other raped sisters of Hindi cinema for whom the only option left is to either become the mistress of the rapist (Reena Roy in Inteha) or to join the flesh trade (Geeta Khanna in Shrant) or the ultimate redemption of jumping down a well, a building, a moving train or taking recourse to the fruit knife or the saree's noose (Rashmi in Aaj ki Awaaz).

In most of the recent films there has been an unabashed repetition of themes and character types so much so that it has become difficult to distinguish one from the other. There can easily be a blind shuffling of titles without any major change in content. The word "contemporary" to denote present-day Hindi films is a misnomer. Most of the films owe their genesis to the Forties and the Fifties and some can even trace their origin to the era of silent films. It would be small wonder if an octogenarian witnessing the exploits of Amjad Khan in Himmatwala proclaims that he had seen him somewhere before, and if memory does not play tricks, he will triumphantly reveal that the landlord/moneylender in Himmatwala is just a parody of the moneylender in Baburao Painter's Savkari Pash (Indian Shylock) of 1925.

What is new in Hindi cinema is the handling of the theme and not the theme itself, since the issues raised in most of the films have already been raised in the early period of Hindi cinema. An analysis of the films that have been hits in recent years shows that anything that has been different has been applauded by the audience. The rest which have been remakes, re-remakes and some further remakes have been ruthlessly rejected. Zanjeer was a success because it was the first of its kind heralding the angry young man. This spawned many other films of this genre and most of them are being increasingly rejected by the audience. Similarly, a survey of the box office hits or the successful films of 1982, 1983 and 1984 clearly shows that a new theme or a new kind of presentation or handling of an old theme has ensured the film's success. Ek Duje ke Liye was a typical love story but it was topical and new in the sense that for the first time language was the impediment in the lover's path. Himmatwala and Mawaali dealt with the same old theme of the hero's fight against the landlord's oppression. Yet it ushered in a new genre of comic villains. The audience received enough material to build their fantasies on. The theme did not matter much.

However, the failure of Akalmand, Maqsad, Kaamyab, etc. proved that sex is no guarantee for success. Insaaf Ka Tarazu, Andha Kanoon and Aaj Ki Awaaz were successful because once again, for the first time, the legal system was attacked and the audience felt that at last their plight as victims of a faulty legal system was being depicted on screen. Arth, Ek Baar Phir, Saath-Saath were welcomed by the urbanised, westernised middle-class families. Ardh Satya exposed the corruption of the police, which had been brought to light so frequently through newspaper reports on police excesses and police brutalities, hence it had tremendous appeal. Bazaar and Chakra were brilliant expositions of the plight of brides. No one had talked of them before. Beaabroo, besides being loaded with a lot of masala had the woman out on a mission of vengeance against pimps and rapists. Chashme Buddoor and Angoor, those light-hearted comedies were like a breath of fresh air after the mangled, murky world of Amitabh, Jeetendra, Dharmendra and Shatrughan. Hence they did well at the box-office.

The examples are many but the fact is that the audience cannot be easily duped. The average filmgoer is perceptive enough to shun redundancy, irrelevancy and obscurantism and applaud innovation and relevance. The increasing number of flops bear testimony to this fact. Then why is it that these kind of failures are repeatedly produced by the filmmakers? Are they not perceptive enough? Then why the impasse when filmmakers keep on making films and audiences keep rejecting them? Having acknowledged the importance of cinema both as an essential means of income and as a medium of social change, why is it then so grossly misused? In a country where all the resources must necessarily be utilised to the fullest possible extent, if the cause of development has to be furthered, is it not necessary to harness this resource too? There are people willing to wait and watch.

Nilufar Kazmi

The Decline of the Leftists

Tom Nossiter assesses their performance and prospects

Of all the constitutional arrangements that India inherited from the British the most arbitrary—and perhaps the most significant—was the electoral system: single member constituencies and simple majority voting. Whichever candidate gets the most votes in a seat becomes MP even if he or she has far less than 51 per cent of the poll.

In Britain itself the system has led to some oddly democratic results: twice since the war the party with most votes nationally has lost the election and in the last election of 1983 Mrs Thatcher won an overwhelming victory with only 43 per cent of the votes. But Britain—apart from Northern Ireland—despite its relative economic troubles is a united kingdom where the choice of parties has long been straightforwardly Labour or Conservative.

India by contrast is infinitely more complex. No one can say whether, if India had operated on some form of proportional representation, it would have been better or worse governed but we can be sure the Lok Sabha would have been a different place. It is not to diminish Mr Rajiv Gandhi's skill as a campaigner, nor to minimise his appeal that we should remind ourselves that in the 1984 Indian election—as in every one of India's general elections—the percentage of seats in the Lower House bears no relation to the distribution of votes in the country. In 1984, 49 per cent of the popular vote has yielded 78 per cent of the seats in the Lok Sabha. Had Punjab and Assam gone to the polls the figures might have been shaved a little. But when all caveats have been entered the fact remains that Rajiv Gandhi did win a bigger share of the vote than his famous mother or his illustrious grandfather. The opposition has been even more savagely mauled than in 1980. Why, is the question that exercises the leaders of India's Marxist parties who collectively form the largest opposition group in Parliament. In particular, how should the CPI(M), the premier Left party, react.

The first thing to be said is that to have salvaged so much from the political holocaust was creditable. In terms of votes cast, the CPI(M) has in fact more or less retained its six per cent share of the national vote. In Tripura, the CPI(M) held on to both seats; and in West Bengal the Left Front lost 12 seats to reduce its share of the seats from 38 out of 41 in 1980 to 26 out of 42 in 1984 with the

Ashok Bose

(Left to right) Samar Mukherjee, Harkishan Singh Surjeet, Jyoti Basu, B.T.Ranadive, Krishnapada Ghosh and E.M.S. Namboodiripad at a CPI(M) plenum in Howrah

CPI(M) coming down from 28 to 18. The Congress(I) on the other hand went up from four in 1980—a perversely low figure for 36 per cent of the poll—to 16. Last time round the Left Front secured 54 per cent of the poll; in 1984, 49 per cent, the same percentage as the Congress(I) in the state this time—and the same as Congress(I) nationally.

The real haemorrhaging of support for the Marxist left, however, is in Kerala. There the Congress-led United Democratic Front won 17 of the state's 20 seats and with a little more care could have emulated the clean sweep achieved (against the national tide) in 1977. The CPI lost all its four seats including Trichur which it had held ever since 1957 and Adoor which the party had occupied since 1967. Of the 12 seats won by the Left Democratic Front (LDF) in 1980 six had been held by the CPI(M); in 1984 the party won only one, Kottayam—from the Kerala Congress (Mani). All sitting members were beaten including the Politbureau member, Mr Balanandan, and in Alleppey, Mrs Susheela Gopalan, widow of the legendary A.K. Gopalan.

What makes the Kerala result so dispiriting for the LDF is that it is in the opposition. In a politically volatile state, governments are supposed to lose support; and Communists relish anti-government agitation. Further the United Democratic Front (UDF) government has slipped on almost as many banana skins as there are varieties of the fruit in Kerala. Yet the gap between the LDF and the UDF has grown between the 1983 Assembly elections and 1984 from one lakh to one million votes. Particularly interesting—and from the CPI(M)'s standpoint, worrying—is the fact that Kerala has fallen into line with the country as a whole. The state which has consistently shown great electoral independence of mind from 1957 and the first Communist victory through 1977 and 1980 now appears part of the national political system. At least in West Bengal the Left Front can argue—in private—that one can reasonably expect some erosion of support by vice of being in government especially when in key respects one is not master in one's own house. The decline in support for the Left Front in Bengal between 1980 and 1984 is in fact five per cent. The electorate is not entirely the same—deaths, first time young voters and abstainers—but the overall loss of support is only equivalent to two-and-a-half people in every hundred electors. The Congress(I) on the other hand has gained 13 per cent, a figure which presumably must, therefore, have been topped up by electors who in 1980 voted for third force candidates like the Janata. Not all the results are yet to hand but it is already clear that there were two distinct forces at work: Indian and Bengali. Although West Bengal was to some extent insulated from the national mood, the country-wide factors were evident: the desire for a new start, fear for India's unity, and the appeal of clean-limbed and modest youth. So far as we can tell, women, young voters and Muslim proved especially susceptible.

Dr Tom Nossiter is Professor at the London School of Economics. He is the author of Communism in Kerala and is working on a book on the Left Front governments in India

Nripen Chakraborty

The national dimension was, however, powerfully cross cut by the provincial. In the Communists' old heartland of the urban industrial south there were stunning losses for the CPI(M). The Congress(I) never for a moment expected to win Jadavpur, Dum Dum or Barrackpore. Indeed the Congress(I) really had little organisation there at all, so poorly did it regard the prospects. Nor can the defeats be attributed to middle class disillusionment with the Left Front. Preliminary analysis suggests that the working class were almost as much affected by dissatisfaction with the provincial government as the lower middle class and the professionals.

By contrast the results in the rural areas are much more heartening for the Left Front. Despite some shift of opinion among small farmers the poor have stayed with the Front partners and the Marxists have maintained their position in the new bases established after 1977 in Midnapore—except Contai—in Bankura, in Purulia and in North Bengal. For both programmatic and tactical reasons the Left Front has concentrated its efforts on rural society at the expense of the urban industrial areas. If choices have to be made, the switch has proved a shrewd calculation. Even after the Lok Sabha election setback, the Congress(I) can only expect to win 120 of 294 Assembly seats.

Kerala is quite another matter. The result is almost as bad as it appears. If there was an Assembly election tomorrow the ruling UDF's tally of seats would rise from 77 to 113 of a total of 140. It is true that the loss of LDF votes between the parliamentary elections of 1980 and 1984 at some six per cent is not significantly different from the Left Front's loss in West Bengal. But in Kerala the trend has long been downwards. It is worth remembering that in 1960 the united CPI won 39 per cent of the Assembly poll against a formidable combination of vested interests, a determined Congress high command and injections of foreign money. By 1982 the CPI(M), the effective heir to the old CPI, managed only 19 per cent. It was of course part of a front but even on a generous assessment of what constitutes a Marxist party, the Marxist vote amounted only to 30 per cent. In Kerala, the Communists have not only been losing old bases; they have been failing to establish new ones. The significance of the contrasting results in Kerala and West Bengal is obvious from the fact that two-thirds of the membership of the dominant Marxist party, the CPI(M), is concentrated in Kerala (38 per cent) and West Bengal (30 per cent). E.M.S. Namboodiripad once said that every vote recorded in favour of the Communist party was the vote of a soldier fighting for the proletarian revolution. On that basis the party has experienced a minor setback in West Bengal but is losing the war in Kerala.

Why are the Communists doing so badly in Kerala? The state has always been very different from any other Indian province. In the past its uniquely high levels of literacy served the Communist cause well. As early as the 1940s literacy was widespread among the poor and this undoubtedly facilitated a genuinely massbased movement. By 1947 virtually every village of any size had its reading room where the Communist party skilfully placed so many of its workers or sympathisers. The radical schoolteacher was equally important. Now the general literacy rate in Kerala is up to 69 per cent—in West Bengal 40 per cent—but that very literacy is working against the party. In the past the CPI successfully mobilised the underprivileged because its message chimed with popular aspirations. Today the daily press magnifies the real and imagined failings of the left from end to end of the state; the cinema constitutes a kind of south Indian Hollywood, and recently has produced films of great cynicism on politics; and now television is occupying leisure hours.

Education and public employment have become avenues of social mobility for backward castes and communities. The late 1970s and the 1980s have seen a resurgence of caste as opposed to class as the basis of Kerala politics: and this has presented all manner of problems for the Communists: at a theoretical level and at a tactical level.

One powerful new factor in the revival of caste and community in Kerala as channels of political action is the impact of Gulf employment and expatriate remittances. This has overnight transformed Kerala into a materialist society. At any one time there are probably nearly 200,000 Keralites in the Middle East and the flow of funds has certainly been Rs 220 crores a year and may have been a good deal more. Hardly a village in the state has been untouched by lavish modern houses, cars and the consumer goods of an electronic age The impact is the more profound because its beneficiaries have been chiefly the formerly disadvantaged Moplahs, Ezhavas and Latin Christians. The once dominant Nair caste, reluctant to engage in manual work, have been left out. In communal terms the result is a measure of levelling out of differences between incomes.

Among the new political forces provoked by these changes the RSS has gained a real hold in Kerala. Its membership may be as much as half that of the CPI(M). Black money has also enlarged the scale of corruption in politics and public life. While the Communist parties have more or less maintained their traditional standards of probity, the situation is highly problematic: Gulf money not only contributes to the monetisation of Kerala politics, it also erodes the parties' actual and potential bases of support. And as class and caste become more loosely related, the CPI(M) faces a dilemma. Ideologically they are committed to a class analysis of society. In the past it was fair to equate caste and class when tackling such key issues as reservation. Now as the gap widens between caste and class the party finds itself torn between the expediency of supporting its notionally backward Ezhava constituency and its doctrinal purity.

In the face of such trends in the political economy of Kerala it would have taken a remarkable party to hold the line. Certainly in some respects the CPI(M) has grounds for being pleased with its achievements: party membership has grown; the A.K. Gopalan Centre has been constructed; and the battle has been courageously fought with the more extreme communal forces. Nevertheless, the CPI(M) does seem to have surrendered its hegemony. On the evidence of the party's own reports it does not appear to be well organised; it has fallen down badly on education; and in this correspondent's view it has lost its sense of direction. Class analysis is honoured in the breach; and the last 1980-81 Left Democratic government was the palest shadow of the first and famous Communist government. It was symptomatic that its collapse should have been precipitated by an inept handling of the law and order issue. If one adopts the parliamentary road—and there is no alternative in India—then one cannot give such hostages to fortune as allowing the headload workers to hold the 20 per cent of Kerala who live in pucca houses to ransom. Jyoti Basu—witness the fact that Calcutta is arguably the safest city for a tourist in the world—would not make such elementary mistakes.

The picture in West Bengal though not without blemish is altogether different. From the late 1960s through to 1977 the West Bengal left went through fire; and when the Left Front went to the polls in 1977 it was with a cadre who had suffered deeply for their convictions and who could put before the electorate—especially the rural voter—a 36-point programme of substantial character, notably on land reform. The Lok Sabha results in 1980 and the Assembly election results in 1982 basically demonstrated a widespread confidence in a government which has systematically tackled the rural problem. In the urban areas, as the recent election shows, the Left Front's record was nowhere near so good. In part this arises from a simple political choice: the power base of West Bengal lies in the countryside. In part it arises from the brute economic facts of West Bengal's situation: the loss of the East Bengal hinterland; old plant and machinery; and distance from markets. West Bengal has obviously also suffered from some degree of Central neglect; and the Front's political enemies have taken their opportunities to disrupt industrial life.

However, the government's own performance has not been up to the mark. In transport, power and urban development the failures are real as well as beyond the state government's control.

The CPI(M) attributes some of these problems to growth. Party membership has indeed increased rapidly as has the membership of mass organisations: but quality control has not kept pace. How does one find 47,000 candidates in 1978 for the panchayat elections in West Bengal when the party membership then was only around 30,000? How does a small and elderly politbureau cope with all the demands upon it? How can one free the sort of talent required to think through the problem of breaking out of the redoubts in Kerala and West Bengal when inevitably all the talent available is required in those states?

Realistically the Marxist left can only proceed on the parliamentary road, slow and halting though that trek is. Election results and governmental performance are not the only indicators of the success of a left movement in India; but it is hard to resist the conclusion that the West Bengal unit of the CPI(M) is more vindicated by events since 1977 and by the Lok Sabha poll than its Kerala counterpart. Without the Left Front government's record surely West Bengal would also have been swept aloft by the Rajiv Spring tide. No friend of India could not but wish India's Prime Minister success but at least the Communists' conception of the good society will stand in sharp contrast to that pursued by Mr Gandhi, if his vision is not fulfilled.

At least in West Bengal the Left Front can argue—in private—that one can reasonably expect some erosion of support by vice of being in government

The Left: An Uncertain Future?

Not if it becomes a broad movement with a coherent orientation, writes Bipan Chandra

Ever since the emergence of the Left as a social force in India in the late 1920s, its future has looked bright. There have been special sunny patches in the left's long history during 1933-41, 1945-47, 1952-59, 1967-71 when a breakthrough occurred or looked imminent. Its achievements in giving a reformist and Left turn to nationalist forces in the 1930s and in helping keep India on an independent, democratic, secular and reformist course after independence have been of a very high order. In post-Independence India, conditions of extreme poverty, inequality, injustice, social oppression, inhuman exploitation, bureaucratic inefficiency and corruption, widespread communalism and caste oppression, destruction of nature and environment, etc., have created a permanently favourable soil for the growth of the Left. Increasingly, since the early 1930s, the people and the intelligentsia have been oriented towards socialism.

Yet, there have been prolonged periods of setbacks and stagnation. Today, as India changes before our eyes, as it prepares to enter the 21st century, as the old leaders of the Left, entrenched for decades have passed or are passing away, though the poverty and oppression are still with us, a question mark has been raised around the fate of the Left: Has it a future? And many political Indians—some with glee and others with sadness—are even expressing the feeling that the Left may get marginalised in Indian politics as has already happened in the USA, the Scandinavian countries, and in Mexico and to a certain extent in Britain and West Germany.

But the question cannot be answered astrologically or in the abstract. Its answer depends on what the Left does in the coming few years. The fears can prove right if it does not make a sharp break with its approaches and politics of the past. Above all, its future depends on its capacity to understand the changing Indian reality and the moods of the people.

In the past, too, it has missed opportunities and, therefore, a bright future. In the course of the nationalist movement, the leaders and followers of the Left made heroic sacrifices, toiled hard in the cause of nationalism, and earned the reputation of being the most uncompromising of anti-imperialist fighters. But the Left, as a whole, except for some of the socialists and to some extent Jawaharlal Nehru, failed to evolve a correct relationship with the actual, existing nationalist movement led by the Congress and Gandhi. And, consequently, it remained a minor, though not insignificant, force among the people.

After independence, India entered a period of democratic and self-reliant, though capitalist, development. The presence of the Left—and fear of its resurgence—played an important role in keeping India on the right track in several areas of life, for example, foreign policy, civil liberties, secularism, and a measure of land reforms, especially in regions where Left-led peasant movements were strong. But once again the Left failed to grasp the changing reality; it took some of the parties on the left nearly eight years to even recognise the fact of India's becoming free in 1947. The Left's politics got increasingly distanced from reality. While the socialists gradually faded, the Communists entered long periods of debate and division. Constant political opportunities came the Left's way; and there were always fresh accretions of members and followers. But often the old ones left and the party stagnated.

Which are some of the areas of life and politics that the Left has to rethink if it is to open the way to a brighter future? One major lesson of the last 60 years, reemphasised once again by the recent elections, is that the Left needs to come to terms with the process of the nation-in-the-making and with nationalism. Because of the prolonged colonial rule and the constant threats of foreign penetration and neo-colonialisation, nationalism has a different meaning in the ex-colonies than it had in the European context. Here it is not merely or even primarily a bourgeois phenomenon or the ideological reflex of bourgeois interests. Here it does not reflect the befogging of the people's minds by bourgeois ideology; it reflects the correct grasp of an important aspect of the reality by the people.

A correct grasp of this aspect would enable the Left to reconsider its attitude towards such problems as centre-state relations. It would also enable it to see in a clearer perspective the role of an uncompromising political and ideological struggle against communalism and casteism—a struggle which the Left has neglected for many years now and which it alone has the ideological capacity to wage.

The Left has also to come to terms with a civil libertarian and democratic polity. Such a polity is not just another polity to which civil liberty and parliamentary democracy have been added. It is not enough to see it as a class polity plus democracy. It is not enough to see it as a bourgeois democracy. Despite its class content, it involves a historical leap. The doctrine of the sovereignty of the people and the rights of free speech and press and organisation and association, including the right to form trade unions and kisan sabhas, mean a basic change in the rules of political behaviour.

The Left has got to work out the full implications of political work in such a polity. It can be helped by the study of the rich European experience in this respect. But it still has to make its own, original effort, for the Left in Europe has also not been able to find an answer so far. And the experience of authoritarian Tzarist Russia or Kuomintang China or Batista's Cuba has only a limited value.

Unfortunately, with rare exceptions, the Left in India has failed to even pose the problem. It has got itself repeatedly bogged down in problems posed in abstract such as revolutionary versus non-revolutionary path, violent versus non-violent means, parliamentary path versus armed struggle, and so on. But the real problem was, and is, what does it mean to be revolutionary in the context of the India of today? Electoral and parliamentary politics can lead to absorption or co-optation of the Left, but they cannot be bypassed; nor are they to be encompassed by the traditional notion of using them as mere forums of propaganda and measures of the Left's strength. They have to be seen as the political channels through which social transformation is to be brought about. Worked one way, the civil libertarian polity can lead to the perpetuation of the social structure; worked another way, it opens the path to social transformation.

One thing is, however, clear. The Indian people will not accept the Left unless it is clearly seen as a firm champion of democracy, including its bourgeois version. Socialist democracy must appear as an advance over existing democracy and not as its negation. The Left must distinguish here between the old, Cold War anti-Communist propaganda and today's demands by the people that the Left should show full understanding and appreciation of the democratic system and incorporate it in their day-to-day functioning, especially in states where it comes to power.

The need to understand the changing Indian reality and the imperatives of working within a democratic polity point to the need for certain innovations in certain other fields. For one, the role of intellectuals has to be perceived differently. I refer to their role and not attitude towards them. The latter has, of course, to change, for a certain negative attitude towards them has developed in the last few years. But even at its best, the Left has seen intellectuals as merely an important social and political stratum which is an important part of its social base. Its other role is to act as the propagator of socialist thought and Left parties' programmes. But the role of intellectuals as the interpreters of reality has been usually ignored. This latter role has been assigned to the party leaders. It has been performed with some success by leaders like Lenin and Mao. This was for two reasons: These were exceptional individuals and the reality they interpreted was relatively simple.

India (and, perhaps, the world) of today does not possess such leaders and its reality is extremely complex. It can no longer be grasped without intense intellectual effort. Nor can the lacuna be made up by collective leadership embodied in a central committee whose membership is often engaged in time-consuming day-to-day organisational tasks and, what is more important, lacks the technical competence to grasp the complex social, cultural, economic and political realities. Today, this lacuna can be made up only by teams of intellectuals who are trained for the task and who, at the same time, possess the requisite social outlook and commitment. In other words. the intellectuals need to be seen as thinkers of the movement along with the Left party leaders. Many should, perhaps, even be absorbed in the higher organs of the Left parties as is now the case in Italy and to a certain extent in France and Britain.

This is not to deny the creativity of the masses in political motion. That is also basic. But this creativity cannot reveal itself, cannot concretise its results on its own or in an immanent fashion. Even to benefit from it, even to 'realise' it, it has to be grasped by an intellectual effort. Indian people have been quite creative in their politics; quite often they have been creative under Left leadership. But the Left leaders have failed to analyse and, therefore, benefit from the creativity of the masses active under their own leadership. The requisite intellectual effort has been missing.

B.T.Ranadive (centre) at a conference in Howrah

One aspect of this failure has been the absence of any serious analysis of the Left's own past or present politics. Past politics have been often denounced after they have proved failures in practice, but they have seldom been analysed. Nor have the successes been studied. There is no serious history of the growth of the socialists during the late 1940s and early 1950s, nor of the Communist growth in Kerala and Bengal or earlier in Andhra. Similarly, the experience of the Left Front government in Bengal, now in its eighth year, remains unstudied. So long as elections are won, this experience will be celebrated. If they are ever lost, it will be denounced.

The Left in Kerala or Bengal would have benefited immensely if it had studied the experience of the Congress governments in the provinces during 1937-39. The experience was very much akin to theirs and had a lot to teach, if approached with humility and not seen in the main as a compromise by the Congress with imperialists, capitalists and landlords. One reason for the failure to take a critical look at the Left governments' experiences in Bengal, Kerala and Tripura and the denunciation as anti-Communist of those who would try to do so from outside the Left parties' ranks has been the fear of washing one's dirty linen in public. But isn't it better to do so oneself and to ask one's friends to do so, rather than have the job done by hostile forces or leave it undone? During 1937-39, Gandhi, Nehru, Subhash Chandra Bose and the Socialists and Communists constantly evaluated and criticised the doings of the Congress ministries quite publicly. No harm came to the national movement from this. Rather it improved the functioning of the ministries and enhanced the prestige of the movement and its leaders.

There is, then, also the need to encourage fresh and creative thinking and open debate. No tinkering with past politics will do. Nor will any amount of repair. And it is precisely here that a major weakness of the Left has lain. Not a single new idea has emerged on the Left for the last decade or two. The naxalites, who made the effort, merely parroted other people's slogans and tried in vain, though heroically, to ape other people's practices. Some of the new Left do the same—and often they are not even able to see through the old, right-wing wine served in new, left bottles.

This weakness is revealed by the fact that in the last few years the world of Marxism, in the realms of theory as well as practice, has been stirred by a whole range of profound debates; but the Indian Left has contributed nothing to them. Even the issues raised by Euro-Communism were dismissed as revisionist, though India was the only country where the Communist had exercised political power in the states under parliamentary democratic conditions. Similarly, the Indian Left's contribution to the problems of Third World development has been nil, even though India has had rich experience, both positive and negative, in developing an independent economy and a democratic political structure in an ex-colonial society.

The Left should also ponder over the problem of evolving a party structure that is responsive to the needs of the present Indian society. Can the left parties grasp the social reality, analyse their own experience, evolve correct political strategy and tactics, and win the confidence of all strata of Indian people without openness of information and debate within their own ranks? In other words, is it not time to at least question whether not only the distorted Stalinist model evolved in the 1930s but even the original Leninist model of a democratic centralist party is suitable to the present-day needs of building a party devoted to and capable of transforming society? And can today such a party be constituted basically by a band of whole-time cadre paid and, therefore, controlled from the top?

And what does it mean to claim success or failure for the Left? First of all, the Left must emerge as the bearer of an alternative social development. It must represent an alternative social vision and not just an alternative party or government. This means that it cannot have a general alliance with any party that stands for capitalist development. And it can certainly not work or ally with the right-wing parties standing for reactionary versions of capitalist development.

But the Left's task is not exhausted by standing out as a virtuous revolutionary alternative which will capture power one day when the people vote for it or rise in an armed uprising under its leadership. It must struggle for influencing existing development in the direction of its own vision. This means fighting for reforms, not merely to expose the rulers and the social system but to actually realise them in practice. It means posing concrete alternatives and not promising what it will do when it comes to power. A few historical examples may be given. The Left was largely responsible in the 1930s for the National Congress acquiring a radical socio-economic content. Instead of claiming this as a positive feature, many in the Left acted as carping critics of the Congress for not going further. In the early 1950s, the Left movement compelled the government in the PEPSU states and in Telengana to pass and implement radical agrarian legislation. But by asserting that this legislation was bogus, the Left surrendered the consequent political goodwill to the Congress. It has been pointed out by me that the Left has been a major influence in India maintaining or developing some of its positive features. But it has not seen this influence as a part of its success and therefore of the possibilities of its own future.

The Left has also to escape some of its recent shibboleths. For example, the notion that because it is weak in many parts of the country, it must help develop an opposition, whatever its character. The Socialists committed harakiri in adopting this view during the 1950s and 1960s. In recent years, the Communists have taken up the theme of ending the one-party monopoly of power by developing an alternative or an opposition. But is the two-party system at all favourable to the Left except where the Left forms the second force, the alternative? Even a cursory reading of politics in other countries as well as in India would show that the opposite is the case. In Britain and USA, there is no monopoly of one party; the two-party system prevails and there is regular alternating of political power among the two. The Communists are marginalised for decades in the two countries and even the Labour Party left does not know how to escape the firm grip of the logic of the two-party system. On the other hand, the only European country where the Left has succeeded in becoming a force is Italy where one-party rule has existed since 1944. In France, where the Communist Party was quite strong when one-party rule prevailed, it is gradually getting marginalised with the emergence of the two party system. This is also the case in India. In Punjab, Jammu and Kashmir, Tamil Nadu and Andhra, the strong Left presence has been marginalised as the two-party system has emerged. On the other hand, the Left is strong in Kerala, West Bengal and Tripura where the Left emerged as the second, alternative force.

The Indian people will not accept the Left unless it is clearly seen as a firm champion of democracy, including its bourgeois version. Socialist democracy must appear as an advance over existing democracy and not as its negation.

This is particularly the case where regionalism, casteism and communalism are concerned. They are harmful to national unity and integration and to the stability of the state. But they can still provide functional politics to the existing social structure. But they are deadly to the Left. Idealism and emotion around them take the place of idealism and emotion around the ideals of socialism and social justice. They are much more of an alternative to the left than to the forces of status quo. NTR or Akalis, not to speak of the BJP and Muslim League, have eroded, and will erode, the Left in a very basic manner.

In the end, it may be pointed out that the Left's growth as a hegemonic force in any country depends above all on its capacity to assume the leadership of social development as a whole. It has to become the leader of society as a whole. In the narrower sense, this means the Left taking up every aspect of social development as part of its activity, from improvement in education, spread of scientific temper and advances in science and technology, to every aspect of culture, to fight against the caste system, to independence, integrity and security of the nation and the nation-state. People should once again learn to look up to the Left where each and every progressive cause affecting society is concerned.

At a wider level, this means that the Left has to be a party which is simultaneously a movement. It has to play the sort of role that the National Congress played before 1947, and assume some of its structural features with, of course, the difference that the latter fought for freedom and the former must fight for socialism even while defending freedom. This means that like the pre-independence Congress, the Left has to accommodate all those desirous of, and willing to work for, basic social changes. There will be contentions among different trends; but they will work together even while each tries to convert others to its point of view. There will be openness, even while there is a minimum of necessary discipline. There will be prestigious leaders, even while there is scope for opposing and displacing some.

The Left has a great future if it becomes a broad movement with a coherent orientation; it will be increasingly marginalised if it fails to adapt itself to the needs of the Indian socio-political development and remains divided into increasingly coterised parties and groups.

'Our Performance Has Not Been Miserable'

CPI(M) leader E.M.S.Namboodiripad told SUNDAY

Q: The performance of the Left has been miserable in the last elections though the vote bank has not been substantially eroded. What do you think is the reason?*

A: I do not agree that our performance has been 'miserable.' In fact, the Left parties have done better than the bourgeois opposition parties.

Q: In West Bengal your party is in power and in Kerala in the opposition. You have failed in both the roles as the results signify. Has the party taken measures to bring about better administration in West Bengal and to function as a more active opposition in Kerala?

A: Success or failure in an election should not be judged on the basis of winning seats. There are several other factors which have their impact on the future of political parties. To take a few instances, the Communist Party failed 'miserably' in the 1946 elections even in states like Bengal, Kerala and AP where the party was very strong. Similarly, the entire opposition suffered a defeat in 1971 but could defeat the Congress in 1977. Again, the Congress came back to power in 1980. On the eve of the recent elections, i.e., just before Indira Gandhi was assassinated, a leading figure in the Congress made the public declaration that the party might not secure a majority and on that ground suggested that the present system should be changed to elected Presidents or elected Prime Ministers. These changes in the fortunes of political parties are inherent in the situation.

Q: The defeat of Suseela Gopalan in Alleppey was particularly surprising.

A: I do not understand why you should be surprised. Our party was earlier defeated in Alleppey, for instance, in 1977, 1971 and so on.

Q: In Kerala, why is it that the party did not raise any issues and fight on that as the leading opposition party? Is it because of an ageing, indifferent leadership? The maladministration of the UDF, for instance...

A: We did raise the issues of maladministration, repression, corruption, on the part of the UDF. But the election being for the Lok Sabha and taking place immediately after the assassination of Indira Gandhi it was national issues that were highlighted.

Q: Many observers feel that the slap that the Left Front got in Kerala was because of the blatant communal politics that you follow. You put up, as an exception, a bright young Hindu candidate, Suresh Kurup, in Kottayam, a Christian bastion, and he won convincingly. Wasn't that a signal?

A: I reject the suggestion that we are following blatant communal politics. In Kottayam, you will be interested to note, we got the votes of the substantial sections of Christians in what you call a communal bastion. If at all it is a signal it shows that even the bastions of any particular community are not as vulnerable as one thought.

Q: What will be the party's attitude towards the new government?

A: Our attitude is the same as it was to earlier Congress governments which means: first, basic opposition since it is a government of bourgeois landlord classes and therefore pursues anti-people policies; second, cooperation on those issues of foreign policy where the government adopts correct policies together with criticism of an opposition to policies which are wrong; third, independent mobilisation of the people on the basis of political policies which strengthen the non-aligned movement.

Success or failure in an election should not be judged on the basis of winning seats. There are several other factors which have their impact on the future of political parties...The entire opposition suffered a defeat in 1971 but could defeat the Congress in 1977

Q: What is the party's view of the spy scandal? At least two communist bloc countries were involved in it.

A: Espionage is an integral part of the state regardless of whether it's a capitalist or socialist state. That is why it has become the normal practice of all capitalist and socialist states to declare these people persona non grata when they are caught in the act. The point of relevance for us now is the fact that it has been going on in our country for the last quarter century without any effective steps being taken against it. This is a matter of serious concern for every patriotic Indian.

Q: Are there any unity efforts with CPI in the offing?

A: The unity of action, including electoral unity, has been developing and is a continuing process. Whenever there are problems due to which unity cannot be maintained we try to resolve them though we have not succeeded everywhere. Beyond this there is no proposition for unity in the sense of merger since the reasons for which we split still continue.

Q: The CPI(M) has never bothered to groom a second line of leadership. Could that be one reason for the slackness in your party both in West Bengal and Kerala?

A: As a matter of fact we have been and are continuing to train and develop not only the second, but the third line of leadership as well. You can see this if you look at the composition of our party's committees at all levels. It is, however, true that while developing younger comrades we utilise the services of experienced cadre though advanced in years, who are capable of discharging their responsibilities. I also deny the assumption of 'slackness' in our party.

Q: Will you continue to be allied with the All India Muslim League? If it suits you will you align with parties like the Kerala Congress and NDP?

A: Our alliance with the AIML, as with the united ML earlier, is based on their cooperation with us in the struggle against the Congress; a common programme which is accepted by them and us; our freedom of action in relation to the struggle against religious obscurantism and communal separatism on which they may not agree with us. As an instance of the latter, the AIML differs with us on the question of Muslim personal law on which they carry on propaganda which is in opposition to ours. The AIML has not, up to now, expressed any desire to depart from these basic principles. As for the other parties the question does not arise now since they are in the Congress camp and since they insist on their religious obscurantism, caste separatism and so on.

Interviewed by Binoo K John

Stepping O
Into a Ne

The blind want no sympathy self-reliant members of society captures their progress i

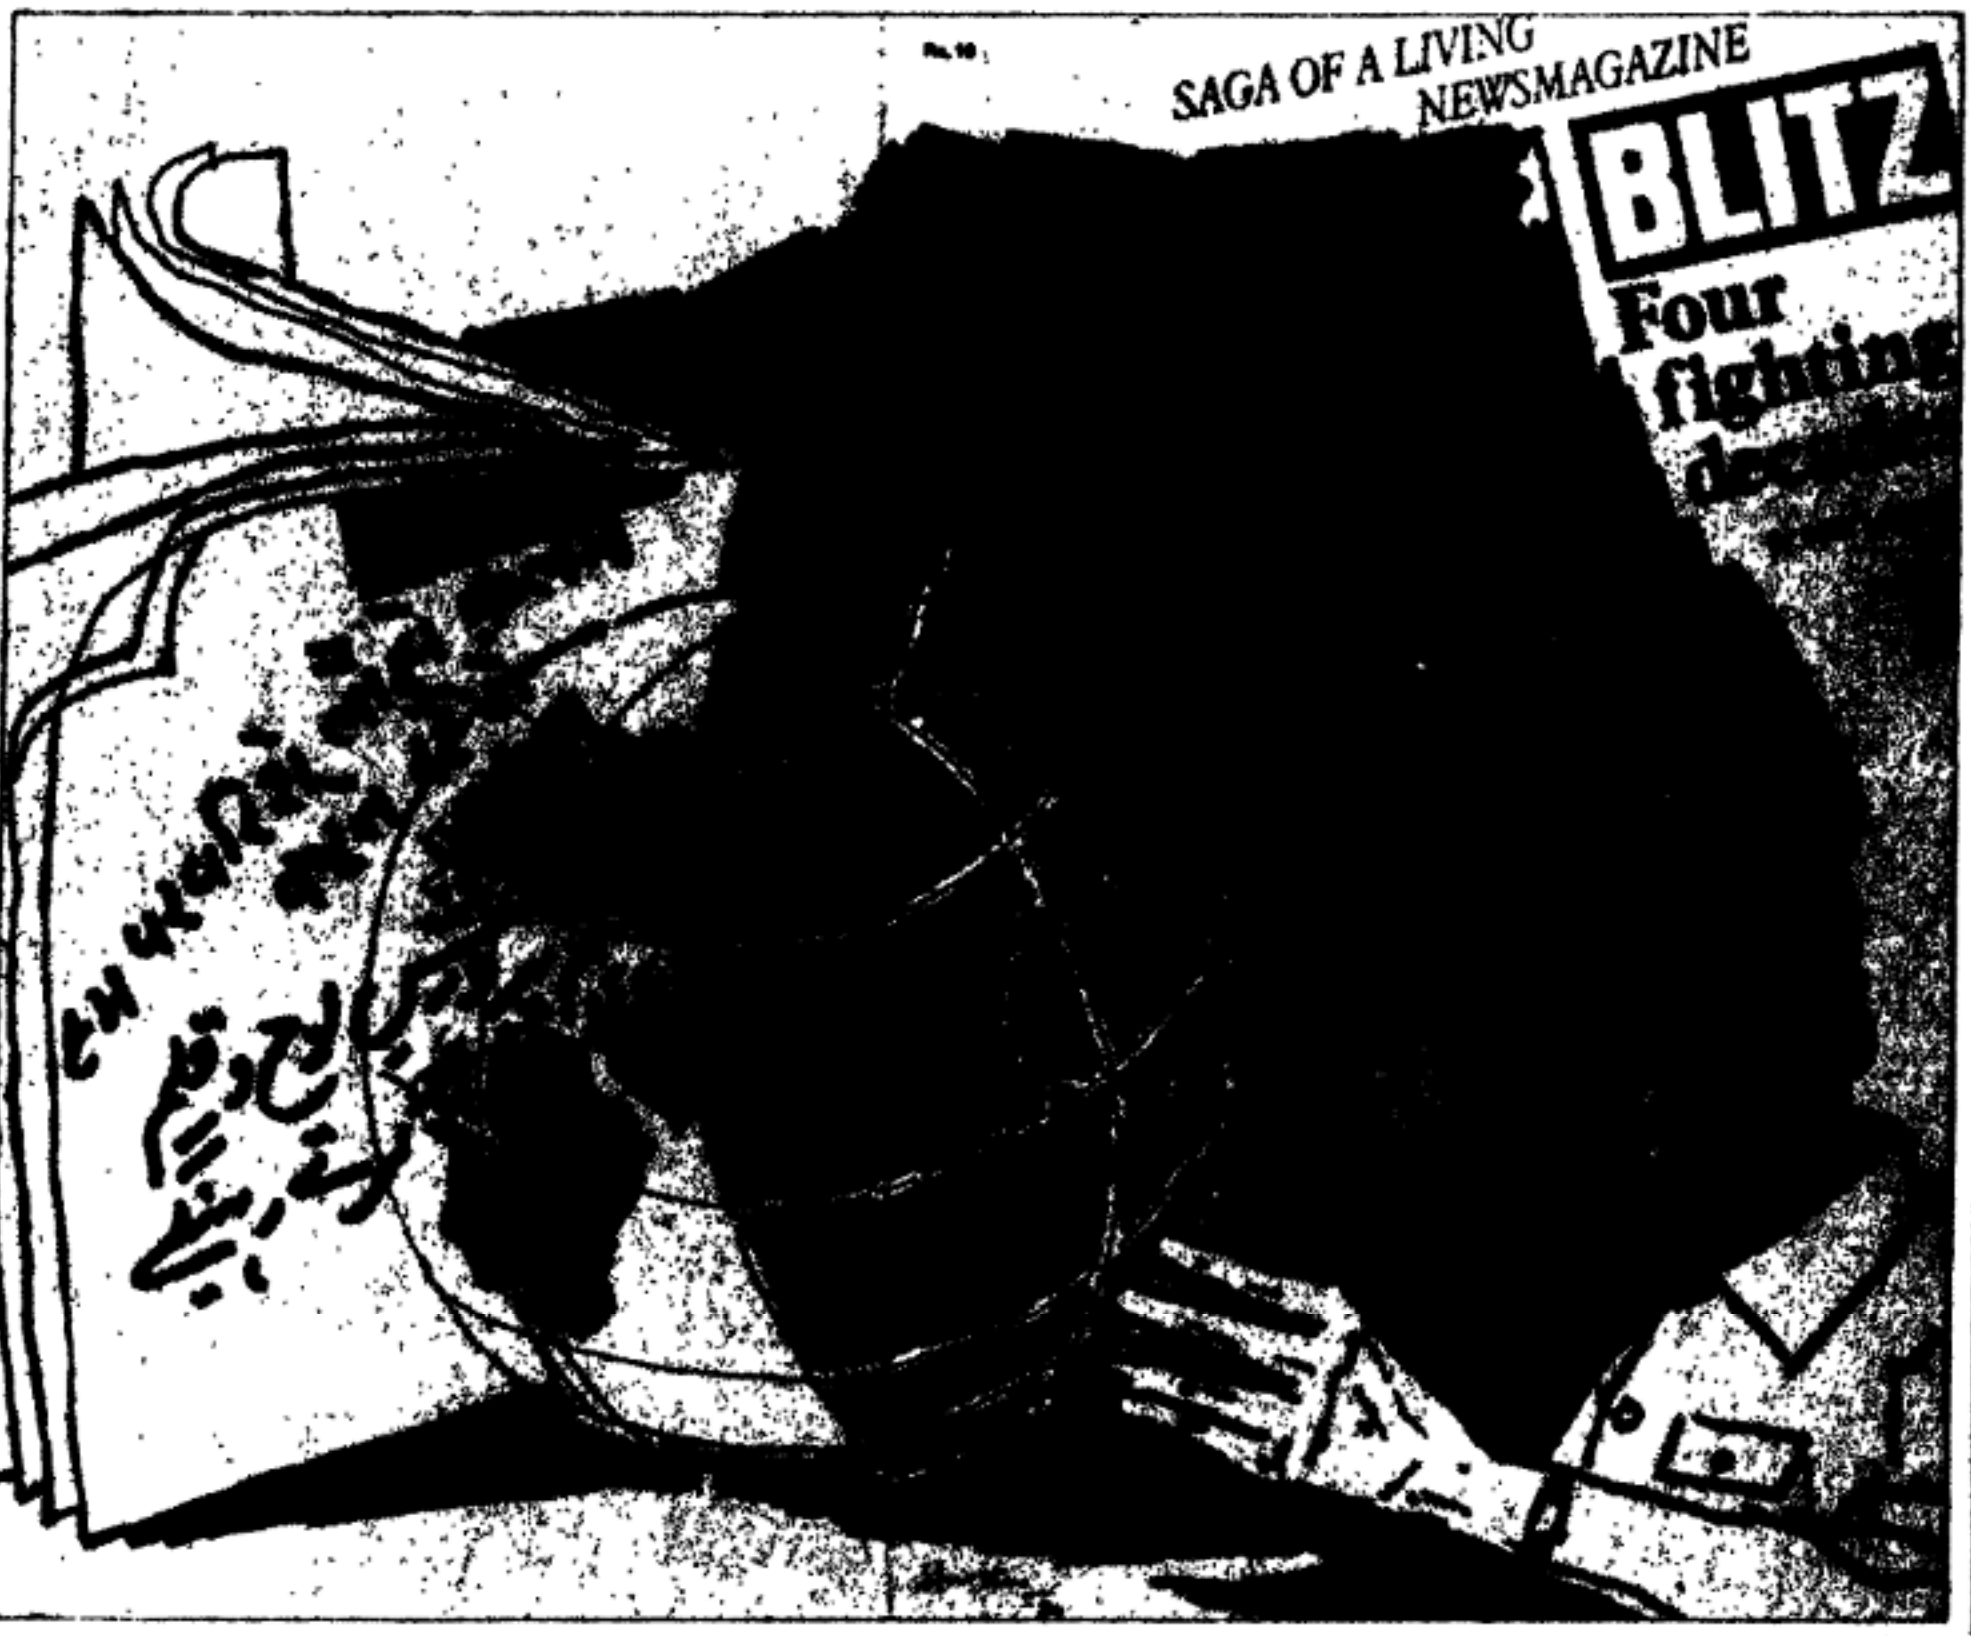
(Clockwise from left) Trying to read through the B
(above) weaving

Out Bravely
New World

...hy ... pity, but want to be seen as
...ety. Our photographer, Sunil Dutt,
...s in ... world they cannot see.

B... ...ham; checking the time; enjoying music and



A Forty Year Blitz

A volume to commemorate four decades of Blitz

On 12 December 1940, three men sat around a table at the Wayside Inn, a restaurant near the Flora Fountain area of south Bombay. Nearby, a group of Congress satyagrahis who were marching to the Council Hall were being lathi-charged. The air was filled with the shouts of the satyagrahis and the muffled blows of the British policemen's truncheons. One of the men leaned forward. "Well, how do we name the baby?" he asked. Seeing the hesitancy of the others, he continued, "Why not Blitz? It epitomises the spirit and purpose of the paper we are planning." The other two were in full agreement. Outside, the British had been forced to beat a retreat by the sheer number of the satyagrahis, and the three sitting in the restaurant could now hear the Congressmen's voices raised in song. It was like a benediction. Blitz soon became one of the most influential newspapers of its time, and is still going strong in its fourth decade.

All the three men around the table that fateful evening—Dinkar Nadkarni, Benjamin Guy Horniman (who proposed the name) and Russy Khurshedjee Karanjia—were to be associated with Blitz for the rest of their lives, but none more so than the last named, Russy Karanjia, who has been the paper's editor for over 40 years, and remains one of the most charismatic Indian journalists on the scene today.

The story of the christening of Blitz is just one of the many fascinating tales that are recounted in Four Fighting Decades, a compilation of the best of Blitz. Written by Homi Mistry, a member of the Blitz team for nearly 35 years, the volume is in tabloid form, peppered with dramatic headlines, illustrations, cartoons and pictures culled from over 2,000 issues of Blitz. The cover has been designed and drawn by the inimitable M.F. Husain, and depicts his impression of the psyche of the man who is responsible for Blitz's distinctiveness, R.K. Karanjia.

The cover of Four Fighting Decades : Husain's tribute to the paper

Characteristically, Karanjia's introduction to journalism was through a controversy, although a self-generated one. Fuelling a debate that was raging about Hollywood films, Karanjia, then a young graduate from Bombay's Wilson College, sent a letter to the Times of India expressing his opinion. When this was published, the emboldened young man wrote three more letters, all under assumed names and all expressing contradictory points of view. All these letters were published by the Times as well. When Ivor Jehu, then deputy editor of the Times, met Karanjia by chance at a party and came to know the truth, he was at first annoyed, and then asked Karanjia to meet him at his office the next day as he liked his spirit and style of writing. Karanjia was offered a proofreader's job which he acepted. It did not take him long to become subeditor and then correspondent.

He was subsequently sent to London to serve as an apprentice with the Evening Standard. However, Karanjia's restlessness was beginning to surface and he now began to dislike the staid and official style of journalism being practised by the Times and the Standard in those days. One of the early influences on him in London was that of Hugh Cudlipp, editor of the Daily Mirror, a tabloid whose style was closer to Karanjia's heart. (Cudlipp later wrote the famous Published and be Damned, which was to become the unofficial motto of Blitz).

Back in India, Karanjia left the Times and joined the Sunday Standard as deputy editor, later becoming editor. His next job was as editor-in-chief of the Morning Standard, which he intended to make the country's first tabloid daily. But various managerial and financial crises forced him to resign; he also had reason to feel that the proprietors lacked a clear editorial policy. Along with a group of other staffers who also left the Morning Standard and under the guidance of Guy ('Guv-'nor') Horniman, he started Blitz.

On 1 February 1941, the first issue of Blitz hit the stands. It was designed as a weekly tabloid with 20 pages and cost one anna (six paise). The initial capital was just Rs 3,000 and the entire paper had to be set by hand. Very often, the young editor and members of his staff would rush to the press to help the compositors set a paragraph or so to help complete a page. But the very first print order of 10,000 copies fell short of the demand, and a further print run of 5,000 copies was rushed through.

Blitz's early policy was to champion the cause of anti-imperialism and nationalism and to give wholehearted support to popular movements 'All for the people' became the paper's crusading slogan, and this was, forty years later, to be reflected in the motto of the group's latest newspaper, The Daily: 'We're on your side.' In its first editorial, Blitz emphasised, 'We have no axe to grind—only yours.' This theme was repeatedly stressed and soon won for the paper widespread support.

One of the earliest battles that Blitz fought was for the acquittal of a gardener who had been wrongly accused. A Mrs Crawford had written to the paper in November 1941 that the mali who was responsible for tending the garden attached to her bungalow had been falsely accused, in her opinion, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment on the charge of brewing illicit liquor. On investigating the case, Blitz reporters suspected that a person who stayed in an outhouse attached to the bungalow was more likely to be the actual culprit. Blitz published the letter prominently and in an editorial note, appealed for lawyers to arrange for the mali's defence. Within hours of publication, half a dozen lawyers offered their services. Initially, the mali was released on bail and ultimately, the Bombay High Court reversed the lower court's verdict, acquitting the mali honourably.

In a more serious case, Blitz, and especially Karanjia, was vociferous in demanding a reversal of the judgment of hanging that had been imposed on K.P.R. Gopalan, a Congressman. Gopalan had been sentenced on suspicion of causing the death by stoning of a police officer during a lathicharge on a meeting of peasants, called by the local unit of the Congress. On the initiative of Blitz, a mammoth public meeting was organised at Chowpatty to protest the sentence. Posters displayed there read, 'Gopalan must not hang.' Even Jawaharlal Nehru, in a message to Karanjia, backed the paper's stand and offered his full support. Ultimately the British government had to bow to public pressure and the sentence was commuted to one of life imprisonment.

Not that the pages of Blitz remained confined to local affairs.

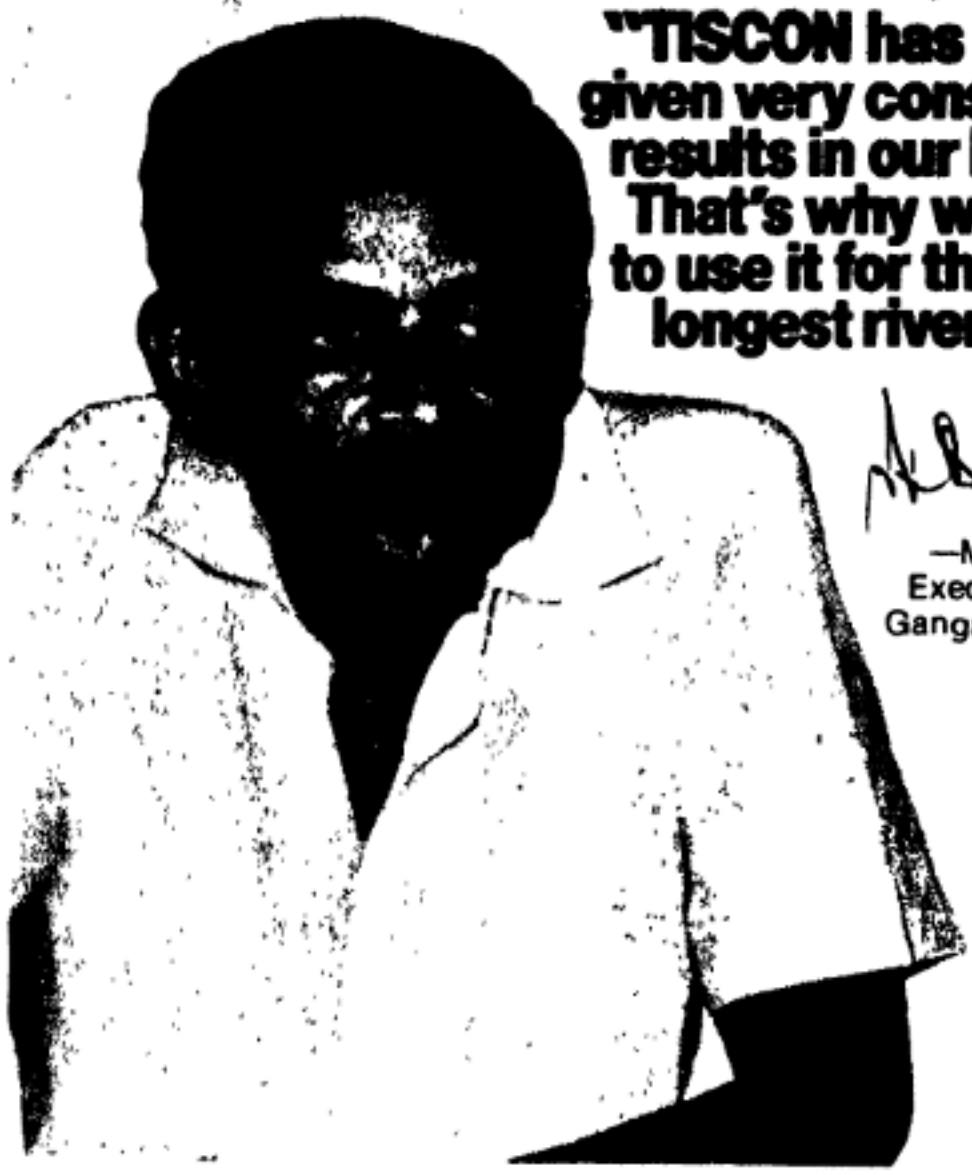
Saturday August 4 1945

GIVE A HAND TO THE 'NEHRU WEEK'!

BLITZ

"GIVE—TILL IT HURTS!" —SAYS STUDENT CHIEF

Saturday December 9 1944



"RELEASE NEHRU!"

BLITZ

THOUSANDS OF READERS FROM ALL PARTS OF INDIA HAVE ASKED 'BLITZ' TO LEAD A HELL-BENT AGITATION FOR NEHRU'S RELEASE. WE, THEREFORE, MAKE 'RELEASE NEHRU!' OUR SLOGAN TILL THE IDOL OF INDIA IS FREE AGAIN. WE WANT YOU TO MAKE THIS SLOGAN THE IMMEDIATE SPEARHEAD OF INDIA'S STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM. ALL ELSE CAN WAIT. FOR WE WANT THE BRITISH RAJ TO REALISE THAT THE CONTINUED IMPRISONMENT OF JAWAHAR IS AN INTOLERABLE THING TO THE INDIAN PEOPLE ..(SEE PAGE 3)

Pre-Independence issues of the paper: attacking the British

Four Fighting Decades by Homi D. Mistry (Blitz Publications, Rs 10)

"TISCON has always given very consistent results in our labs. That's why we decided to use it for the world's longest river bridge."

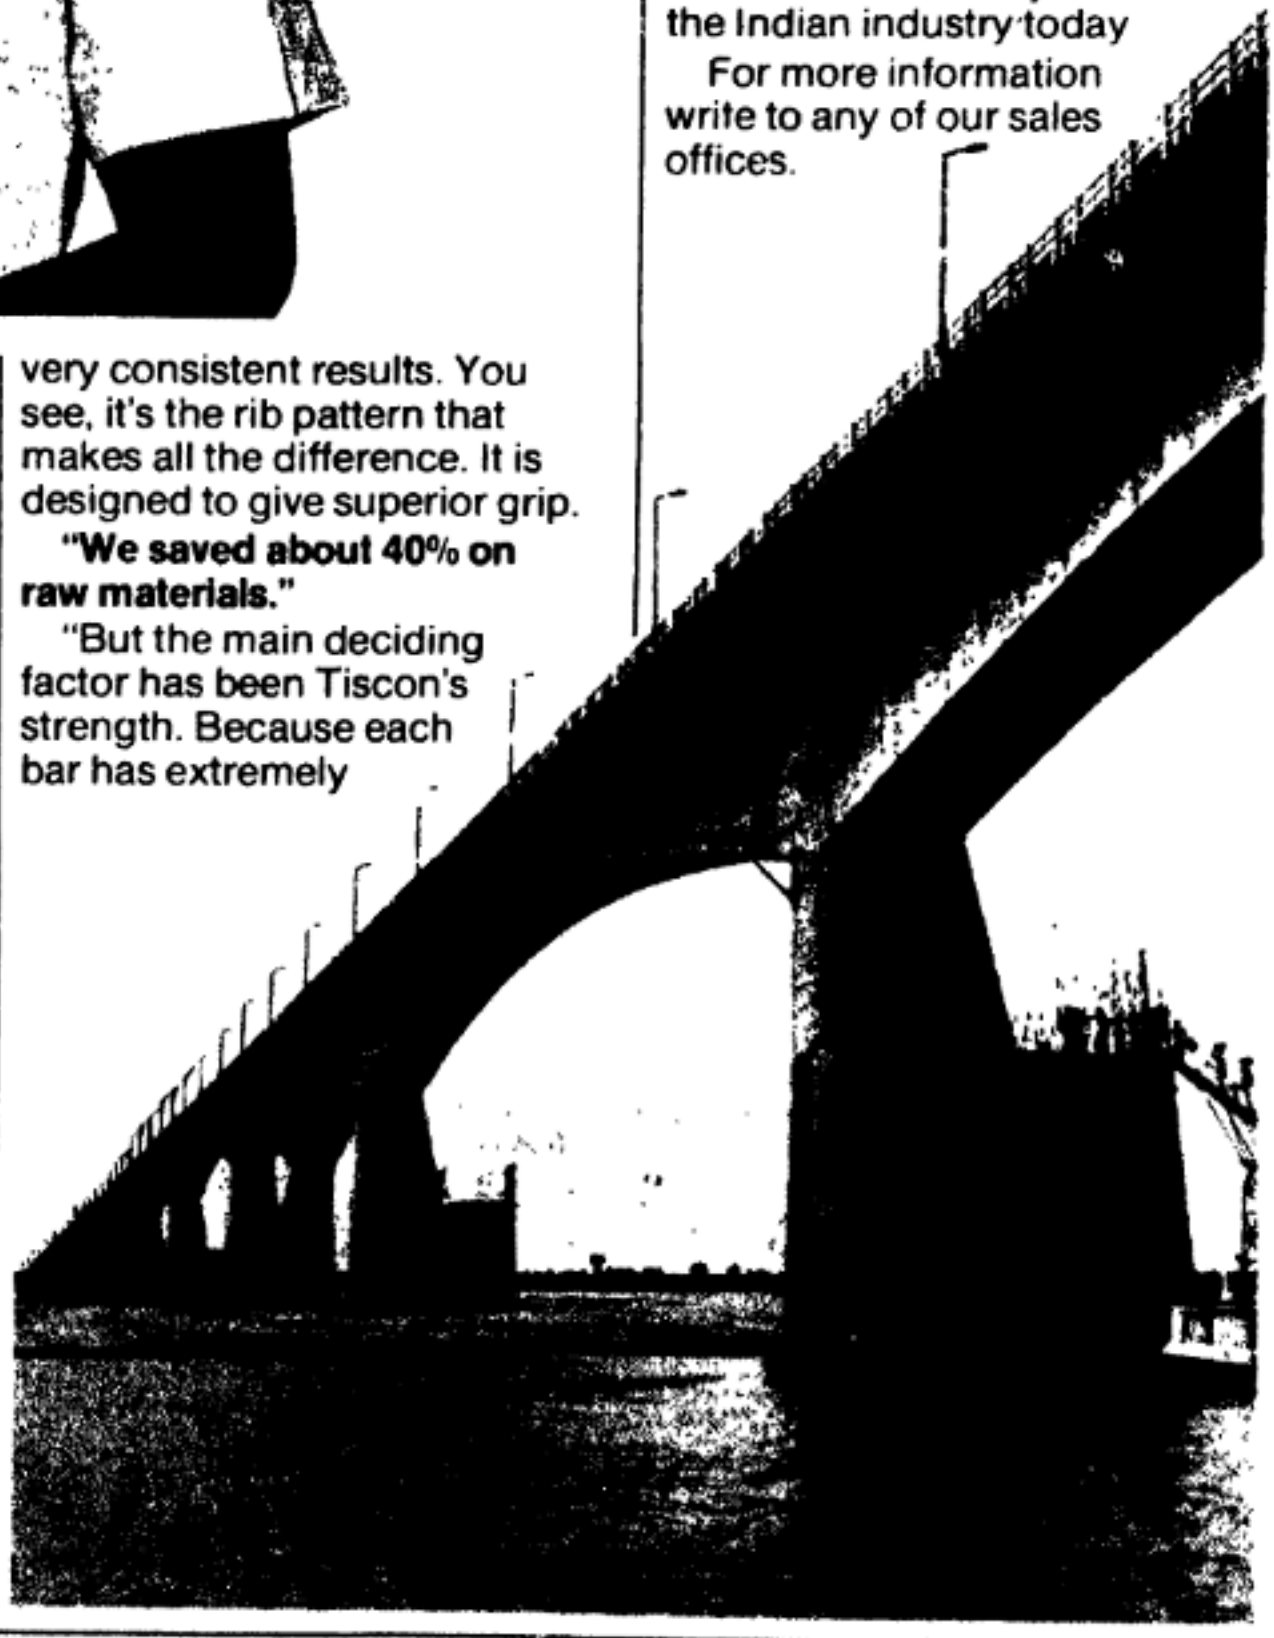
—Mr A K Bhagat
Executive Engineer
Ganga Bridge Divn. III
Patna

The 5.575 km long Mahatma Gandhi Setu, the main link between North and South Bihar, is the longest river bridge in the world. While constructing it, Mr Bhagat had to keep two important things in mind.

The Bridge had to cater to a discharge of 1,13,300 m^3/second with navigational facilities. It had to be designed for a 'Live Load' of class "70R" or two lanes of class "A" whichever gave the severest effect. As in the past, he found the desired structural support in Tiscon—the superior ribbed reinforcing bar from Tata Steel. Let us find out from him why he chose Tiscon.

"It's the rib pattern that makes all the difference."

"Actually, before deciding on a particular steel, we test it at our own laboratories. And Tiscon has always given us very consistent results. You see, it's the rib pattern that makes all the difference. It is designed to give superior grip.



"We saved about 40% on raw materials."

"But the main deciding factor has been Tiscon's strength. Because each bar has extremely high proof stress and ultimate tensile value, the total quantity of bars consumed is much less. We saved about 40% on raw materials. This isn't the first time I'm working with Tiscon. It has given me very positive results in the past.

"I would use it always, without any reservation."

Not only Mr Bhagat. Most top designers and architects in India are specifying Tiscon nowadays. The proof can be seen in almost every major project in the country. And all because of Tata Steel's obsession for quality. A quality that's become the by-word of the Indian industry today

For more information write to any of our sales offices.

TISCON

The superior ribbed reinforcing bar

TATA STEEL

TIS-5553

Even a casual glance at Four Fighting Decades will confirm this. Throughout the turbulent years of the freedom struggle, Blitz constantly reported on and encouraged the activities of the main freedom fighters. Blitz was the first to break the news of Netaji Subhas Chandra Bose's gallant Indian National Army. Prior to this, all that the Indian papers had published about Netaji's activities abroad had been pure speculation; the real story remained unwritten because of the strict censorship of the British. Blitz was also the first to publish pictures of Netaji addressing his INA. At the time of the INA trials too, Blitz stood solidly behind the army officers and helped to build up a vigorous campaign for their release. Later, a grateful Sarat Chandra Bose was to write, "Blitz's noble work will be remembered not only by those unfortunate people but also by a grateful posterity."

After independence, Blitz came to be accepted as a non-party Left wing paper. The movements it backed were those of the common people, and though it never professed a specific ideology through its pages, it invariably attacked corrupt big business and businessmen, and did not hesitate in exposing those in the upper echelons of power. It became a trendsetter by its sensational reporting and exposes, which provided a stark contrast to the staid policy followed by the Times of India. In many ways, it was the harbinger of a new type of journalism, and it gave impetus to later magazines and periodicals which tried to emulate its style. Blitz was attacked and dragged to court on many occasions, but always emerged with its head bloody but unbowed. Karanjia himself stated in an interview many years later, "We have been called 'black', 'red' 'yellow'...all the colours possible, but so long as I am read, I mean read, I care a damn about all this."

An interesting aspect of Four Fighting Decades is a number of 'boxes' which provide fascinating and sometimes humorous sidelights into the way in which Blitz obtained and reported the news, and with many pithy comments about the personalities involved. One such 'box' deals with Jinnah's death (which occurred on 12 September, 1948). On 24 August of the same year, Blitz frontpaged a story which declared, 'Jinnah Dying: Blackout on news of Mr Jinnah's illness: Doctors give up hope of cure.' At that time, barely half a dozen close officials around Jinnah knew the truth, and to the rest of the world, the news came as a complete surprise. Blitz secured this scoop by intercepting the text of a top secret message between two high-ranking Pakistani officials and by corroborating it with Jinnah's doctor in Bombay. Another such 'box' deals with 'the romance of Nehru's red rose', and recounts two (possibly apocryphal) stories associated with Nehru's habit of wearing a red rose in his buttonhole.

Editor R.K. Karanjia

According to an article by Mrs William Randolph Hearst (the wife of the press baron), a young woman who had never known, nor been formally introduced to Nehru, used to stand and wait outside his house every morning. As Nehru appeared to leave for work, she would shyly hand him a rose, which Nehru was gracious enough to slip into his buttonhole. This continued for many weeks until one day the woman stopped her daily visits. Nehru decided to continue the habit, and asked for a fresh rose to be provided to him every morning.

The other story is more down-to-earth, both metaphorically and literally. Sir Girija Shankar Bajpai, who was before independence a member of the Viceroy's executive council, was vacationing in Lyons, France, when he was attracted by a variety of rose grown (as he found out) by a French millionaire in memory of his beloved. Sir Girija brought back a graft of the bush and planted it in the garden of his house. Subsequently, Lord Wavell (then commander-in-chief and later Viceroy of India) became enamoured of the flower, and had it replanted in his living quarters. This later became the official residence of the Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru. The flower soon caught his eye, and he began the practice of wearing a fresh rose in his buttonhole everyday. Later, Sir Girija narrated the story of the rose to Nehru, who then started taking personal care of the plant.

No mention of the fortunes of Blitz over the years without reference to the activities of its editor would be complete. Prensa Latina once termed Karanjia a 'chronicler of revolutions, biographer of revolutionaries.' Russy Karanjia has lived up to this title with the panache of a buccaneer. By constantly frontpaging the travels and exploits of its editor, Blitz came to be inextricably linked with the name of R.K. Karanjia in public memory.

Karanjia is a widely travelled man and possibly the most peripatetic editor alive. There is hardly an area of significance in the world that he has not visited. His interviews with prominent foreign personalities appeared constantly in Blitz. A headline in Four Fighting Decades proclaims him to be India's ambassador extraordinary; this was hardly an exaggeration in the Fifties and Sixties. Khruschev, Castro, Chou en Lai, Nasser, de Gaulle, Tito, Churchill, Soekarno, Ho Chi Minh, Kennedy, Haile Sellasie: these are just some of the world leaders that the editor of Blitz has encountered. At the same time, he also built up a store of goodwill for India on his travels.

Karanjia had always shared a special relationship with the Egyptian President, Nasser, and it was this relationship that was the bedrock of his crowning triumph in the field of international relations. It was mainly because of Karanjia's mediatory efforts between Nasser, Khruschev and the Iraqi Prime Minister, General Kassim, that the USSR agreed to help finance and build the Aswan Dam on the mile. In recognition of his efforts, Nasser bestowed upon Karanjia his country's highest honour, the Republican Order of Merit (Grade One) in June 1965. Inscribed on the medal in Arabic were the words: 'To one who merits the best.'

Towards the end of the volume, the author states, "Perhaps no other paper in the world has been banned, burnt, bayoneted and bludgeoned umpteen times not only in India but in far off places like Kenya, East and South Africa, Pakistan and even Nepal, than Blitz.' The paper's impact has, indeed, been tremendous and Four Fighting Decades shows that over the years, Blitz has lived up to the promise of 'free, frank, fearless' displayed so prominently beside its editorials. The volume is not merely an effort to commemorate four decades of Blitz; it is also a personal tribute to its editor, a genius of Indian journalism.

Sanjay Sipahimalani

GUEST COLUMN/RANJIT SAU

Poised for the Great Leap

The refrain is thrilling; it makes you look forward; it lifts your sight to the horizon : On to the next century. It is appearing in every stanza of the chorus in Delhi. India is setting out to enter the new era with poise and dignity. How would the world look like then? What would be the scenario around us? Where would Europe and America be by that time in terms of technology and production.What would socialist countries be doing then? Can India meet the challenges and seize the opportunities? What are the challenges and opportunities, any way?

Economists would be hard pressed to face these questions. Many of their apple carts have been upset; many a theory reversed; umpteen corollaries set aside, by the march of events during the past three decades. If they are still not a vanishing species, their resilience must be remarkable. Indeed, the economy is more like an organism that grows and ages, than a machine that can be refixed by changing defective parts. There is a basic difference between physics and economics. Unlike the laws of physics, the laws of economics are subject to evolution, because the economy itself evolves; with it economic theories.

Ronald Reagan: deficit budget and defence spending

During the early part of postwar period the policy stance of West European and North American countries was inclined towards fiscal measures; taxation, public expenditure, and welfare programmes were the main instruments for steering the economy. Conventional wisdom had it that the primary responsibility of government was to provide the right level of aggregate nominal demand; if it was done, the supply side would take care of itself. In the second half of this three-decade period, almost the opposite of it came to be the dominant creed; it is now the supply side that is said to be in need of official attention. If President Kennedy could be considered the most prominent representative of the demand-side school that ruled earlier, we would have a bit of a difficulty to choose the chief spokesman of the currently fashionable supply-side doctrine, for there is a keen competition in this respect between President Reagan and Prime Minister Thatcher.

While the mood and tone in campuses have a strange ability to set itself in line with the gyration in official economic philosophy, the fact remains that perhaps there is an objective reason why economic thinking has taken such a 180-degree turn. In West European countries, for instance, public expenditure had risen phenomenally, from some 25 per cent of the gross national product to over 40 per cent, within a span of about two decades; and with it had risen the marginal tax ratio to the point of hurting incentives to work, save and invest. With this alteration in such vital parameters of the economy there had to be a change in conventional wisdom.

Among the advanced capitalist countries including Japan it is evident that the United States alone had succeeded in making a sizeable recovery from the recent recession; others are on the way, but their signals are rather feeble. There are two interesting sidelights in the story. First, even though President Reagan's name has got so closely stuck with supply-side economics, his actual actions are, in nature, distinctly demand-including Keynesian: huge budget deficit, enormous defence spending, and tax cut. Second, the advanced capitalist countries are following widely divergent paths. While the US is on an expansionary fiscal track, Japan, West Germany, and the UK are moving in the opposite direction. If, nevertheless, we have to extrapolate into the next century on the basis of such bizarre data, we would hazard the following guess. The so-called 'Reaganomics'— in its unique combination of myth and reality— will inform much of policy making and university teaching in the coming two decades that will coast into the new century. The world capitalist economy has lived so long with Keynesian ideas; now it will lend its ears to Professor Milton Friedman for a while.

The decline and fall of the Bretton Woods arrangement in the early 1970s is a watershed in international economic relations. The regime of fixed parity that had been in place so far gave way, around 1973, to a system of floating of major currencies. This switchover raised great expectations. Fixed exchange rate entails a diminution of national economic sovereignty; whereas free exchange rate means greater freedom. Or so it was thought. If you have a fixed exchange rate to defend then all your domestic economic activities have to be subordinated to that end; your entire economy in that case becomes vulnerable to disturbances from without. Instead, if you let your exchange rate modulate keeping with world market conditions, this particular variable can absorb a good deal of external shocks leaving you at peace to adopt domestic policies at will. So goes the argument. In the post-1973 theatre of floating currencies the advanced capitalist countries, accordingly, dreamt of being economically somewhat immune from overseas interference. But in fact the experience turned out to be entirely different. An uncounted factor crept on to the scene: huge amounts of hot money moved across national boundaries often at the speed of an electronic impulse. Indeed, exchange rate variation was too weak an instrument to stem the tide of dollars of various shades frantically seeking interest rate differential. The economies of the US, Japan, France, West Germany, and the UK are once again found to remain exposed to each other as ever before. Flexible parity has brought no additional freedom.

Meanwhile, one notes that the latest US economic recovery owes no less to the downward adjustment of real wage rate as to the active fiscal policy. It also transpires that the US has lost export competitiveness mostly in those industries where the trade union has been strongest. The United States would probably meet the situation in days ahead by keeping the demands of labour subdued. Other capitalist countries are likely to follow suit, since they are all in the same boat of inter-dependence, or, if you like, of fierce mutual competition. The pattern of technological development will be chiselled to fit the occasion.

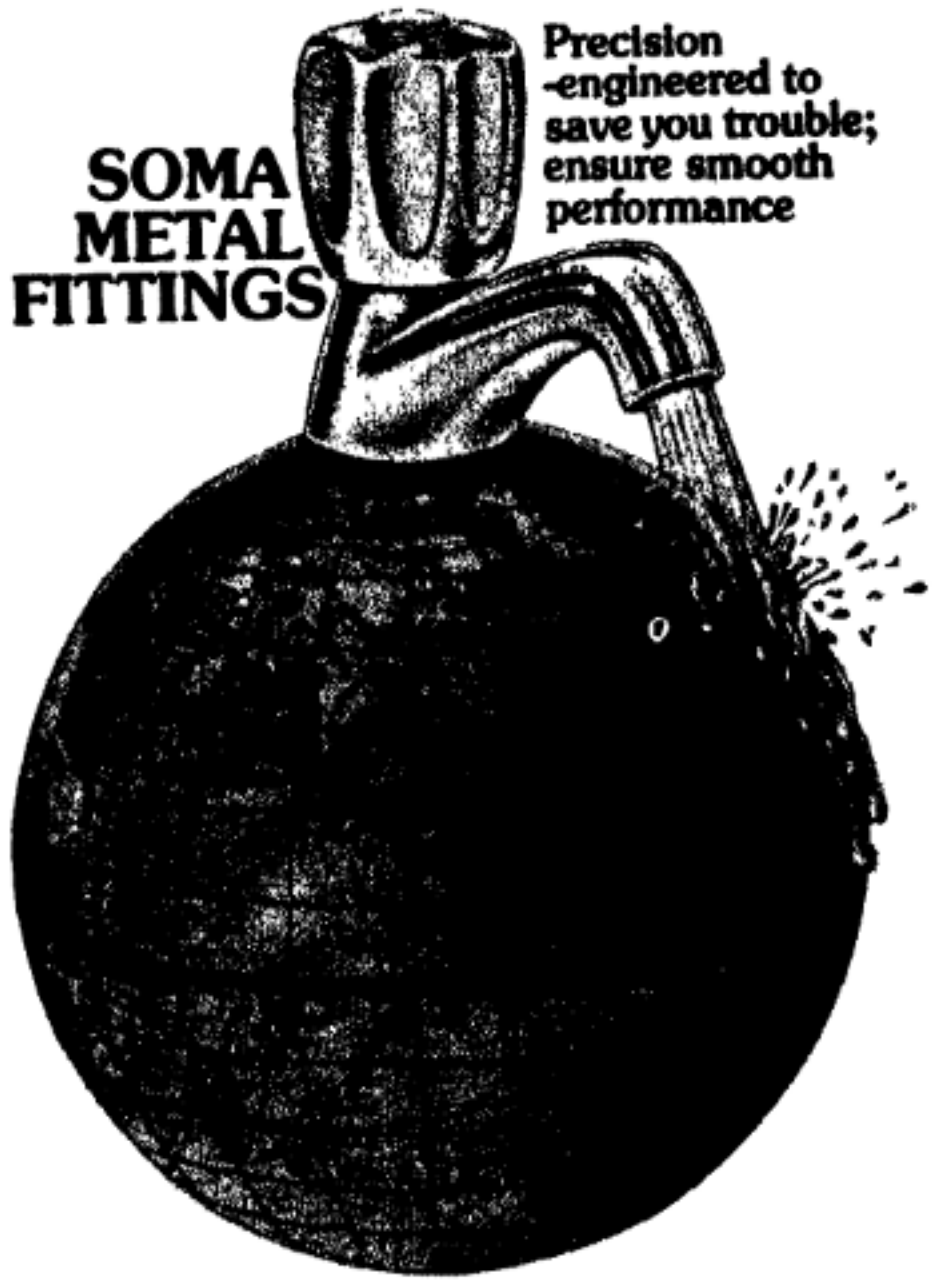
It is much more difficult for us to make similar prognosis for socialist countries. So our sketch of the kingdom come is incomplete. Anyway, how would India find herself at the turn of the century? In one sense the contrast between India and the advanced capitalist countries would be sharper. When the latter would be increasingly pressing for labour-saving devices, India would be desperately trying to grapple with the problem of creating more jobs for its teeming millions. At the same time, India has to modernise the economy in terms of technology and productivity. Reconciliation of these two sets of conflicting imperatives is the hardest item in the country's agenda for the proposed glorious entry into the next century. The plant and equipment which would be available from advanced capitalist countries would ferociously dismiss labour; they would be more so than ever before because the reigning doctrine there believes in keeping a bit of unemployment for the sake of moderation in wage rate. India, therefore, will have to bridge the disjunction that prevails between modernisation of the economy by means of advanced technology and equipment, on the one hand, and the attainment of full employment, on the other. In a way, this is an ancient question on which economists have debated by now for nearly two centuries.



There have been ups and downs in economists' approach to the problem of mechanisation vis-a-vis maintenance of employment opportunities. They have woven their theories, as is expected, with the yarn of contemporary historical records. From the criss-cross of their numerous theorems a few principles stand out in bold relief. It is often possible, with appropriate programming, to introduce new technology and more efficient machines without a negative impact on total employment in the country. At least three things are necessary for this. First, the volume of investment must be stepped up as far as possible. Second, the labour-intensity of technology has to vary over types of industries in a certain way. There are two kinds of industries : one produces 'basic' goods like minerals, steel, power, railway services; while the other gives outputs like TV, motor car, textiles, etc. Which are meant for household consumption. It is in the over-all interest of labour that the former industries are run at minimim average cost regardless of the effect on their direct employment, and that the possibility of greater absorption of labour is explored in the technological frontier of only the second category of industries. The public sector should take special note of it because most of the basic industries fall in its purview. Third, in every industry the capital cost should be economised even at the price of a higher operating cost, subject to the condition of profitability.

If you ask five economists , it is said, they would come up with six opinions. And John Maynard Keynes would possibly have two of those. But on the three principles, given above, the scope of disagreement is hopefully much less.

World-class quality that's so easy to maintain —even at home!

SOMA METAL FITTINGS

Precision -engineered to save you trouble; ensure smooth performance

SOMA Specialities

Attractive, easy-grip handles in chromium — all interchangeable

Choice of Elegant and Heavy-duty models

Easy maintenance — at your fingertips

Always keep a replacement cartridge handy — it's available wherever you buy SOMA fittings. Should your tap malfunction, simply unscrew the top, ease out the cartridge, slip in the refill and secure the top.

SOMA PLUMBING FIXTURES LIMITED

SAA/SPF/7A 2

From the makers of

VITREOUS HINDUSTAN SANITARYWARE

2 Red Cross Place, Calcutta 700 001, India

Children of Despair

They flee their homes only to enter a world of cruelty

Sujit Ghosh

A girl carries bricks at a construction site: heavy burden

Every year, thousands of anguished little children from poverty-stricken areas of Nepal, Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and West Bengal, kicked and beaten by their parents for "doing nothing" to earn their keep, flee their homes, only to enter another world of cruelty and deceit: in the numerous roadside dhabas (eating places), hotels and restaurants of Lucknow and Kanpur. They travel alone, with the little money they have stolen, or saved up, and stray into Lucknow's Charbagh railway station, where they loiter about in search of work, ragged, hungry and broke. Hawkeyed "agents" on the lookout for cheap hands, pick them up, promise them good jobs and hand them over to the dhaba-owners for a "commission" of Rs five on each boy. The promises, of course, are a dupe: it is a miserable existence; many of the children are hardly ever paid their dues, and some not paid at all; they are given two meals of dry rotis and sabzi a day if they are lucky, and sleep on the pavements outside the dhabas, or on the cold, hard floor. Some are sexually assaulted by their owners or the older employees. Absence from work or broken glasses invite loud abuses, often violence. The owners spare no one. And the children suffer in silence, if not in the hope of getting paid some day, at least for the food they can never hope to get at home. Those who cannot bear the hardship return home as they came—hopeless and broke. For the hotels and dhabas, business is brisk. Running expenses are few, and on a hot summer day, with items like lassi and fruit juices being served too, earnings could go up to Rs 200. The labour, too, is cheaper then, with the harvest season over, unemployment widespread, and the children fleeing to the cities in vast numbers.

Akbar Ali, surprisingly mature for his 15 years, was dressed in a tattered shirt and dirty trousers, and running a slight fever when we met him in Lucknow's GPO park. He looked tired and forlorn, and told us that he had not showed up for work for the last two days. "Why should I?" he asked, rubbing the sleep off his eyes. "He has not paid me yet." Akbar had been hoping he would get his dues, Rs 400 or so, and go back home, but in vain. He had worked in Mushtaq's Park Hotel, a dhaba beside Capitol cinema in front of the GPO park for just over a year. "I have kept an account of my dues. He (the owner) also has a book. But when I found he was not keen on paying me, I stopped going to work."

Akbar's father Hussain lives at home in Liluah, near Calcutta, with his little brother Asghar (8) and sister Munni (16), both of whom go to school. His mother had died long ago. Hussain, a worker in a local jute mill in Liluah, had been out of a job for nine months after the mill closed down. "There was no money to feed us. I, too, couldn't find work in Liluah. So, one day, I left with two friends, Amar and Pappu. We took the train to Benares. I fell ill on the way. My friends asked me to accompany them when they got off at Benares. But I didn't. The train went on to Lucknow. I reached Charbagh at 8 am. For the journey I had Rs 50 with me, which I had earned by selling sugarcane in Liluah. I had spent it all. I was hungry and went looking for some water to drink. Then I met Ishtiaq. He offered me a job in Mushtaq's hotel, for Rs three a day. I served water and cleaned tables. They gave us lunch at 12 noon. We slept in the hotel. There were five others like me. And none had been paid their dues."

Did he keep in touch with his father? "I can't write. Never went to school. And I have not met my father since I came away last year. They don't even know I'm here." He wiped the sweat off his forehead. "But now I want to go back. They hit me in the face. I am looking for another job. If I don't find one, I'll go back home."

Akbar also complained of homosexual advances from an older waiter in the dhaba, Thomas. "He comes after us at night, usually. But you should ask the younger boys, Ajoy, for instance, what he does to them." Thomas also does business on the side as a pimp. Homosexuality seemed widely prevalent in most hotels and dhabas where children are employed.

Asked what he planned to do in future, Akbar said, "I myself have not been able to go to school and get a proper education. But I want my brother and sister to keep studying. I will work and earn for them." He said he had not heard anything as yet about the jute mill in Liluah which had closed down, but he hoped it had reopened and his father had started working again. "I'm going home anyway."

Thirteen-year-old Ajay Kumar Singh, from a fairly well-to-do Rajput family who own ten bighas in the village of Chauhan ka Purwa, Chhattarpur, had less convincing reasons to venture into Lucknow's dhabas for work. But he came, nonetheless. He was never treated well at home, as the black sheep in a family of three brothers Ajay, Vijay (11), Vinod (6), and three sisters Usha (10), Uma (5) and Kanchan (3). His father Laldas Singh (45) and mother Sita (35) do not know he is in Lucknow. Ajay had studied up to class seven in the Junior Basic Vidyalaya, Chhattarpur, near his village, but later dropped out. A recent recruit in Mushtaq's dhaba, he has been working there for the last four and a half months.

"My father beat me because I wasn't working. We have a lot of land. We grow arhar, wheat and paddy. Our house has seven rooms. We are fairly well off. But he still wanted me to labour. So I ran away." Is he in touch with his parents? "He can't write letters. He's illiterate."

Gopinath Kochare

Akbar Ali (15) at GPO Park, Lucknow

Bhagwan Das (14), another of Mushtaq's cheap hands, is from the village of Phagaura in Faizabad district. His father Ram Deo (45), lives at home with his mother and three brothers, Om Prakash (12), Budha Ram (6) and Bhagwandin (22). Three of his sisters had died in the floods. "Nikai se aadmi bach nahi saktey (No one can be safe from the floods)," he says, remembering the disaster. The family has some land but the wheat and arhar they grow on it is not enough to see them through a year.

"I've been working for five months in Lucknow. I came here with Sant Ram (14), also from my village. He works in Charbagh I ran away from home after I was beaten up for doing something wrong," he said. "Rakesh got me into this job. First they promised to pay me Rs 90 a month. But they gave me only Rs 120 for five months' work." Bhagwan said Mushtaq treated his boys well only when he had a lot of people coming to his dhaba and business was good. And that was usually when there was a "good" film running at the movie hall nearby, Capitol. "All they need is money. Once people stop coming, they abuse and beat us. Now there's a hit coming, and I think I'll leave."

The dhabas in Charbagh, which attract a lot of customers from the crowded railway station, are probably the largest employers of child labour in Lucknow. The jobs are often for the asking. Any child found wandering about in the neighbourhood is instantly recruited—though hardly ever paid. Each dhaba for this reason, has a high turnover of waiters.

We found Om Prakash from Sultanpur walking disconsolately towards a movie hall after he had decided to stop going to work in a nearby dhaba. It didn't even need a question to search his thoughts: "They don't pay us, saab. They give us nothing," he said as we walked alongside. He was finding it tough surviving without money and said he wouldn't mind working in somebody's home as a fulltime servant. As we walked towards the station, Om Prakash was accosted by an "agent" and whisked away before we could even speak to him again.

The trade in child labour in Lucknow which has remained subdued for the last few years, seems to have begun again in full swing. According to one estimate, about 30 persons function as "agents" for recruiting children at Charbagh railway station. Most of the children belong to Nepal (as many as 50 per cent) and the rest to Bihar, West Bengal and Uttar Pradesh's Gorakhpur, Basti, Sultanpur and Deoria districts, among others. The average monthly wage promised to each is Rs 75, which is never paid in full. Four years ago, a racket in child labour had been busted by the police, and the culprits arrested. Later they were all released on bail, and now allegedly operate with the connivance of the GRP and RPF at Charbagh.

"The problem of child labour," says Mr A. B. Lal, director of the Bureau of Child Research and Welfare, a voluntary body engaged in a variety of child welfare projects, "is not only unique in our country but also in other developing countries. As a social problem, it has more or less become a characteristic feature of social welfare and consciousness."

In March 1979, the then labour minister, Mr Ravindra Varma informed the Rajya Sabha that India

Bal Kalyan Royal Bumper

WIN TEN FIRST PRIZES

RS. 50

TOTAL PRIZES 2,11,110

ONE PRIZE GUARANTEED IN A BLOCK OF 5 TICKETS

LAKHS EACH

100 2nd PRIZES
RS. 1 LAKH EACH

1000 3rd PRIZES
RS. 10,000 EACH
AND OTHER ATTRACTIVE PRIZES

SHARD 824

Offering Prizes worth Rs. 10.50 CRORES

TICKETS ISSUED 10 LAKHS ONLY

Issued by CHILD WELFARE COUNCIL CHANDIGARH,

Organisers: JASMINE & CO.
(The millionaire Makers.)
14, Hotel Continental Annexe,
Regal Building, New Delhi. Ph 322411
ASSOCIATES—OM PRAKASH & CO,. Ludhiana.

TICKET RS. 200/-
DRAW : 22.3.86

had the largest number of child labourers in the world, constituting 4.7 per cent of the total child population, according to the 1971 census. Mr Varma also said that the total number of beggars and vagrants below the age of 14 in the year 1971 was 1,47,963. This figure should have increased considerably by now.

A study conducted by the National Institute of Public Cooperation and Child Development, New Delhi, came to the conclusion that it would be an unrealistic attempt to reduce the population of child labour, as this would only aggravate the misery of the poor. The institute, in another study on working children in Bombay, found that the economic factor compelled children to work, and they often acted as the sole breadwinners for their families. In fact, if the Minimum Wages Act was strictly enforced, the study found, the adults in a family would not force the children to take to work. It said that more than 50 per cent of parents and employers were against the abolition of child labour; rather they preferred working conditions to be improved. Also, a large number of working children were ready to avail themselves of educational opportunities, if offered any. As many as 79 per cent of the employed children and 66 per cent of the self-employed children expressed a desire to take up education provided it did not disturb their work schedule. About 94 per cent of the parents thought education was essential for their children.

The fundamental rights granted by the Indian Constitution fully protect the rights of children. They state that "no child below the age of 14 shall be employed to work in any factory or mine or engaged in other hazardous employment" (Articles 15-24). Article 39 states, "The state shall, in particular, direct its policies towards securing the health and strength of the workers, men, women and children, and that citizens are not forced by economic necessity to enter avocations not suitable to their age or strength." Children and youth have been legally protected against exploitation and against moral and material abandonment

Has enough been done to attempt to fulfil these solemn directives in Uttar Pradesh, India's most populous state, with a population of 11,062,000 roughly 40 per cent of whom are children? Today, UP has the highest infant mortality rate in India—159 per 1,000 live births—and infant deaths account for 35.1 per cent of the total deaths in the state. A large number of children also suffer from diseases like polio, diarrhoea and goitre.

Gopinath Kochunni

Kids at work at a dhaba near Charbagh

As for the problem of child labour, in spite of the fact that various Acts have been passed by Legislatures to prohibit child labour, a large number of children continue to work in exploitative conditions mainly in agriculture, and small-scale and cottage industries, where labour is unorganised. To make things worse for children, agriculture is seasonal, and after the planting and harvesting seasons are over, they have to migrate to the cities to earn whatever they can. About 80 per cent of India's labour force is agricultural, but labour is employed for an average of only 189 days a year in agricultural pursuits. There are other forms of rural employment, too, but an agricultural labourer still faces about 100 days of total unemployment each year. During this period, women go to the cities, even with babies in their arms. They sometimes force their children to beg. The situation in a year of drought or floods can well be imagined.

It is important, therefore, to provide for some alternative means of livelihood during these 100 days of unemployment. The government should also look into the problem of child labour to see if it cannot be abolished for socio-economic reasons at this stage, or later. What are the various measures necessary to protect the health of working children, and provide for their education and development? Are existing laws adequate to regulate child labour? And can a comprehensive single Act be formulated to regulate the working conditions of children wherever they are employed so that their health is not damaged and growth not stunted?

"What is needed is a coordinated and integrated approach to child welfare," says Mr Lal. According to him, the state government officials often pose as major obstacles in the way of child welfare: "Under the present set-up, although there are some very good schemes for child welfare, like the Integrated Child Development Scheme (ICDS), which is very realistic, they are never properly implemented." Since all child welfare schemes are planned, and funded by the central government and it is left to the states to implement them, a great deal depends on a state government's bureaucratic efficiency, "The Uttar Pradesh government cannot even implement its own schemes, let alone others'. All the government officials do is pass the buck."

Mr Lal said that the involvement of people in general, and voluntary agencies in welfare schemes was essential for their success. It was because such participation was lacking in the state that the massive increase in expenditure on child welfare over the years has proved fruitless. "About Rs 16 lakhs has been spent on various projects. The ICDS programme which was started in 1975 to reduce child mortality and child morbidity is now being expanded. The scheme had clearly envisaged participation of people and voluntary agencies. But we have been left out. As a result, the state government demands the fuel and rent for the anganvadi centres, though these centres should be in the charge of villagers. The government should involve the people at large if it wants to improve the lot of children."

Can Uttar Pradesh's children wait?

Nirmal Mitra, Lucknow

ESSAY

How Valid Are Confessions?

The spate of confessions in the Patiala House Courts in the capital in recent days has thrown up the question: How valid are confessions made by the accused in the eyes of law? Except if a crime takes place in a fit of passion, like murdering a paramour found in bed with his wife, where the man surrenders to the police in remorse, of course with a sense of job accomplished, voluntary confession by a criminal is rather rare. Even in the case of the Abhayankar murderers in Pune or the Chopra children murderers in Delhi, the criminals went on pleading their innocence till the time of going to the gallows. Criminal laws lay down the steps to follow in detection of crime and the procedure to investigate and bring the culprits to book. At the same time, the golden thread that runs through the entire set of criminal laws is that the accused is presumed innocent unless proved guilty beyond any doubt. He is given all the facilities to defend himself to prove his innocence.

Around 1872, when the Indian Evidence Act was being codified, Justice Stephen defined confession as a statement by a person charged with a crime as distinct from a statement in a civil matter. The term 'confession' has not been defined in the Evidence Act. In 1881, Chief Justice Sherwood said, "There is no branch of the law of evidence in such inextricable confusion as that relative to confessions." From the standpoint of reason, a confession may be subject to grave infirmities as it is extremely improbable that a person should accuse himself of a serious crime. It may have been made from some false hope of benefit, or fear of injury. The mind of the criminal may be excited or morbid and the confession may be an offer of compromise to the prosecution.

Judges are not unanimous about the judicial value of confessions and have treated them as a class of evidence by themselves. A voluntary and genuine confession is legal and sufficient proof of guilt. The confession of an accused is substantive evidence and a conviction can be solely based on it. There is no legal bar to a conviction being based on a voluntary confession, if believed to be true. This 'if' is crucial as how do we believe that a confession has been voluntarily made? For, paid informers, treacherous associates, angry victims and overzealous police officers—these are the persons through whom an alleged confession is often presented.

That is why the law requires that the criminal, intending to confess, be kept in judicial custody, tells him that the confession may be used against him and warns him that he is under no obligation to confess. He is given enough time to reflect before he comes forward to confess. Even after recording the confession, the magistrate has to certify that he was satisfied that the criminal was not under any threat, inducement or pressure from anyone, and that he confessed voluntarily. The environment under which a criminal is confessing must be absolutely free and even a slight doubt vitiates the nature of the confession. A voluntary confession of guilt proceeds only from penitence and remorse and it usually comes from a person who commits a crime in a fit of passion. A person who is committing crimes over a period of time would not be in such a frame of mind to volunteer a confession.

As confessions are voluntary, the persons making them are not under oath and they cannot be subjected to cross examination, as in the case of a witness giving evidence. Despite such a tenuous link between confession and other evidence as required by the criminal law, the police and the CBI for over a decade have taken the easy way out and collected evidence by securing confessions through repeated pressures on the persons implicated. As the investigation begins, the implicated persons are not told whether some of them would be the accused or witnesses for the prosecution. By calling them for 'informal' interrogation at an office, they are questioned extensively and their answers recorded, tallied with the answers of others and the investigation proceeds only according to such statements. After a few months, the implicated persons are given typed pages, arranged through statements in such a way that a continuous reading in a court would secure conviction, according to law. One group of persons would be asked to swear them as affidavits, as if they were taken from witnesses, and for more hardened ones, in the shape of confessions. The list of witnesses for the prosecution and the accused is kept open and interchangeable till the last moment, depending upon how the persons implicated are behaving in swearing affidavits or confessions.

Once in a serious criminal case, the CBI was caught at their own game. A senior government official, implicated in the case along with others, went on meeting the CBI officials in 'informal' interrogation and answered all kinds of questions put to him, spread over a few months. The answers were dictated by the CBI official to the stenographer and typed statements prepared regularly. On the pretext of correcting the answers, the implicated official without knowing whether he would be witness or an accused, used to write a few words or sentences in his own hand on those typed pages. One day he was given a few neatly typed pages with the instruction to go and swear it as his affidavit in a court. On reading he found it contained many points not mentioned by him during interrogation by the CBI. On the plea of refreshing his memory, he asked for the corrected pages which were given to him. He quietly took photocopies of those pages and showed them to the court. Later, at the time of his giving evidence on oath he told the court that his affidavit was prepared by the CBI for swearing and it was not his own. The evidence was tutored and fabricated to suit the case and forced upon the witness.

A suspect in the recently busted spy case being taken to the court of Bharat Bhushan

Further, in the Indian Evidence Act, there is an extraordinary provision in Section 30 which reads, "When more than one are being tried jointly for the same offence, and a confession made by one of such persons affecting himself and some other persons is proved, the court may take into consideration such confession as against such other person as well as against the person who makes such confession." It is an exception to the rule of English law which clearly lays down that a confession by an accused is evidence only against the maker and not against others who may be tried along with him. Under Roman law also, confession of a prisoner is not admissible against his accomplice. This provision has been adversely commented upon by various judges as it creates an exception to the fundamental principle of criminal law.

The Supreme Court of India observed in a case, "A co-accused who confesses is naturally an accomplice and the danger of using the testimony of one accomplice to corroborate another has repeatedly been pointed out. The danger is in no way lessened when the evidence is not on oath and cannot be tested by cross examination." At another place in a separate case, the Supreme Court said, "Though confession may be regarded as evidence in that general sense because of the provisions of Section 30 of the Evidence Act, the fact remains that it is not evidence as defined by Section 3 of the Act" (which mentions statements by witness, and not accused persons).

The term 'confession' has not been defined in the Evidence Act. In 1881, chief justice Sherwood said, "There is no branch of the law of evidence in such inextricable confusion as that relative to confessions."

In a trial of a murder case, a famous writer once narrated a real life testimony of a witness which might be of interest here. It was not the case of a confession in the strict judicial sense. In a dispute over a plot of land, there was a fight among the villagers and a person died of injuries on the spot. About ten persons were accused of killing the man and had to face trial in the local court. They engaged an English barrister to defend them. In the course of the trial, the statements of the witnesses for the prosecution were recorded, except that of the widow of the murdered person which was scheduled for a particular day. The barrister arrived in the town the evening before and heard the local defence lawyer. After he left, a young man spent some time with the barrister.

The next day, after the statement of the widow was recorded and she, as the only eyewitness to the murder, had identified all the accused persons, the barrister took permission from the court and produced the young man before her, and asked whether he was at the place where the murder took place. The widow said no, he was definitely not there and he had no part to play at the time of the quarrel leading to the murder of her husband. Then the barrister placed the young man as the only defence witness. At the witness box, the young man narrated how he had come running from his house to the field, holding in his hand a wooden dumb-bell with which he was exercising. In the confusion, during the quarrel and the fight, he tried to separate the people who were fighting, when the dumb-bell struck the head of the person who died on the spot. On the basis of this statement, all the accused were let off, but the police did not arrest the young man as no evidence was available independently to implicate him in the crime except his own statement.

A Legal Correspondent, New Delhi

CONSUMER COMES FIRST

BAZAR ON WHEELS

NEW DELHI: "Bazar on Wheels" has registered a record sale of Rs. 2 crores, 38 lakhs and 83 thousand since its inception in October, 1983 till December, 1984. The share of the Delhi State Civil Supplies Corporation in this is Rs. 1 crore 51 lakhs and 75 thousand and that of Delhi Consumer Co-operative Whole-sale Store is Rs. 87 lakhs and 8 thousand.

Disclosing this, Jag Parvesh Chandra, Chief Executive Councillor said that the Bazar on Wheels was launched by Delhi Administration to protect the interests of consumers specially in areas where people of the weaker sections live. It is selling essential items of day-to-day consumption at reasonable prices at the door steps of the people in resettlement colonies and Harijan Bastis. To the inhabitants of these areas, who have a lean pocket and can ill-afford to purchase essential items from the open market, this regular alternative market on wheels is proving a boon.

He recalled that the Bazar, comprising 34 vans (23 of Delhi State Supplies Corporation and 11 of Delhi Consumer Co-operative Whole-sale Store), sells these items daily through its 95 outlets in different parts of the city: sugar, tea, pulses, exercise books, vegetables, mustard, coconut and imported oils, controlled cloth, soaps, spices, potatoes and onions. Items like tea, sugar, and pulses are provided in sealed plastic bags of 1 kg. and those of vegetable oil in special polythene packing of the same weight.

SPY SCANDAL

Are the Russians Involved?

A few Russian embassy officials have returned to Moscow

The spy case, which has been the only exciting development in New Delhi, apart from the ruling party revolt, in 1985 so far, has thrown up some interesting sidelights. A few questions have been answered. Too many suspicions have been raised. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has created history by bluntly telling the visiting Prime Minister of Poland, General Jaruzelski, that he did not consider spying by the Polish embassy personnel posted in New Delhi to be a friendly act. Normally when spies are discovered in foreign embassies, the host government expels them from the country. In this case, while the government has confirmed that France, Poland and East Germany were involved in the spying activities of Coomar Narain, the principal accused in the spy scandal, no one has been declared persona non grata. The French deputy military attache, Colonel Bolley, left quietly. The French government on its own recalled its ambassador to this country (and the foreign office accorded him a farewell too). But in the case of the East Bloc countries, no such departures from the missions in New Delhi have been made public. Why was this silence maintained? Was it because India values its traditional ties with the Soviet Bloc and thereby did not want to embarass the Warsaw Pact nations? This could not be the reason, because had it been so, then the Prime Minister would not have been so blunt with a visiting foreign dignitary. The only plausible reason why silence has been maintained about the activities of the East Bloc embassies is that something is being hidden.

According to informed sources, two members of the Russian embassy staff who left the country after the Coomar Narain episode did not do so on their own accord. They were not asked to leave either. But when the confessions revealed the involvement of some members of the Russian embassy staff, the embarassment was avoidedby their quiet departures to Moscow. If the Polish and the German Democratic Republic embassies were involved with Coomar Narain, it is axiomatic that the KGB was lurking somewhere behind. One wonders why the Russian involvement, is being zealously kept secret. If there was any Russian involvement, then that should be disclosed. Conversely, if the Russians are clean on this score, that too should be clarified. A leading daily, the Indian Express, had carried reports to the effect that the Soviet embassy too was involved in the case.

Rajiv Gandhi (right) with Polish Prime Minister General Jaruzelski

If an official spokesmen can be so frank as to tell the press that the Prime Minister of India had spoken to General Jaruzelski about the spying case, then similar staightforwardness about the Russian involvement too should be forthcoming.

The counter-intelligence wing of the intelligence bureau, which handled the case mainly, has now become the butt of criticism in a section of the press. Such a case of busting a spy ring has been unprecedented. And coming close on the heels of the Larkins case, credit should be given where it is due. Some questions, however, are unanswered. It is a fact that the former defence production secretary, V.M.C. Sarin, had sought routine clearance for his staff from the IB last year. In the case of both Amrik Lal and Jagdish Arora, clean chits were issued. In Amrik Lal's case, the clean certificate came as late as December 1984. According to this clearance report, nothing adverse had been noticed about Amrik Lal "since 1948." One wonders how such reports were given. If Amrik Lal had been under surveillance for the past few months, then December 1984 was hardly the time to clear him. Possibly it was a strategic move, to keep the spy ring going till the time was ripe to strike. But in that case, clearance need not have been sent, it was a routine clearance after all, and certainly no one would have pursued the matter.

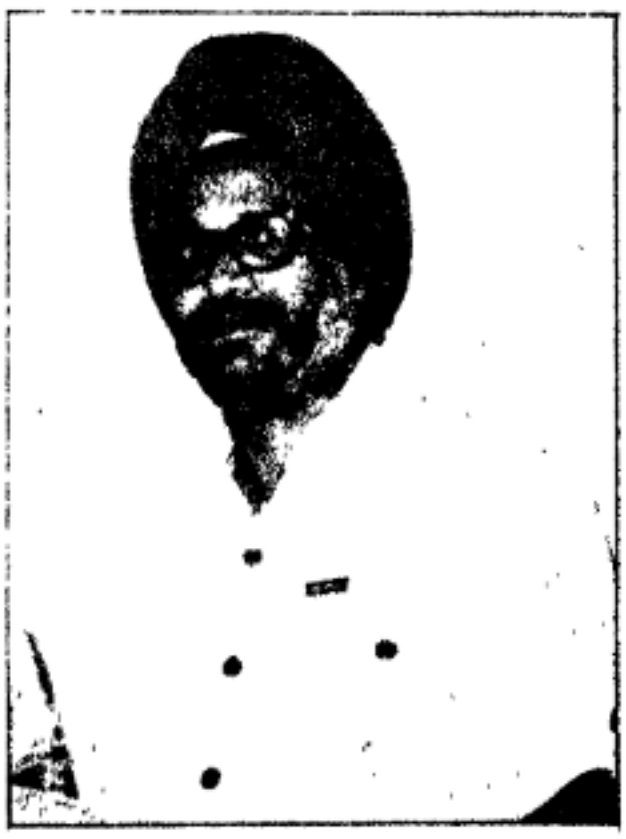
Another disturbing aspect in the case has been the way in camera proceedings of the confessional statements have been made public. Only the presiding magistrate and his staff and the lawyers present could be privy to the hearings. Who leaked the details ? However, there is a silver lining : in his confessional statement, Coomar Narain has not said that he was spying for 25 years, as press reports so far have alleged. What he is believed to have said is that he was serving the firm, SLM Maneklal, for 25 years. His spying activities began in the early part of this decade. It is heartening to know that the multinational spy, who basically worked for the Eastern Bloc, was not active for a quarter of a century. The fact, however, remains that his activities were discovered only latc last year and the culprits were nabbed in record time. With the dust slowly settling down, it may also be appropriate for the government to announce if any senior officers were at all involved with Coomar Narain. To keep the bureaucracy under a cloud for too long is not healthy. If no senior bureaucrat is involved, that should be announced.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

MRS GANDHI'S ASSASSINATION

The Accused are Charged

But the charge-sheet leaves many questions unanswered



One hundred and two days after Mrs Indira Gandhi's assassination, a charge-sheet has been filed in the courts. Four persons (including the deceased Beant Singh) have been accused of murdering the late Prime Minister and 144 persons, including her personal aides R.K. Dhawan and M.L. Fotedar and her valet, Nathuram, have been cited as witnesses. Fresh light has hardly been thrown in the eight-page challan, which has left many questions unanswered.

The charge-sheet, filed on 11 February, has named constable Satwant Singh, Balbir Singh and Kehar Singh as the prime accused persons in the case. Sub-inspector Beant Singh is the deceased accused. The accused persons are charged under Sections 120 B, 109 and 34 of the Indian Penal Code (IPC) read with Section 302 IPC and substantive offences under Sections 303, 307 IPC and 27/54/59 of the Arms Act. The charge-sheet handed over to the three surviving accused on 11 February reads: "All the four accused were party to a criminal conspiracy to commit an illegal act, to wit, to commit the murder of Smt Indira Gandhi, the then Prime Minister of India."

It describes lucidly the well-known sequence of events which led to the murder: "At about 0910 hours, accused Beant Singh opened fire from his revolver and accused Satwant Singh fired from his SAF carbine at Smt Indira Gandhi, as she was approaching the TMC gate. Accused Beant Singh fired five rounds, whereas accused Satwant Singh fired 25 shots at her... Indira Gandhi sustained injuries to her person due to the shots fired at her by accused Beant Singh and Satwant Singh and fell down on the pathway. Smt Indira Gandhi was immediately taken to the All India Institute of Medical Sciences, New Delhi, where she succumbed to the injuries the same day."

The charge-sheet concludes: "Accused Beant Singh died on 31 October and the charge against him abates. The charge-sheet against accused Satwant Singh, Kehar Singh and Balbir Singh is submitted on the evidence mentioned in it... the accused are in judicial custody since 29 November, 5 December and 6 December respectively. They may please be summoned and tried according to law."

The charge-sheet was filed in the court of S.L. Khanna, chief metropolitan magistrate maximum, before the period of 90 days judicial remand could expire and an appeal could be filed to release any of the accused on bail. The charge-sheet was handed over to the defence counsels of the accused persons, without any other relevant documents in the case. Enclosed with the challan was the list of 91 documents relevant to the case and not the documentary proof itself. The list includes the FIR report, inquest report, remand papers, postmortem report and the conviction slip and other circumstantial evidence collected by the investigating agencies after the assassination.

Kehar Singh

Another revealing document placed before the court along with the charge-sheet is the list of 144 witnesses in the case. The list includes some of the people closest to the late Prime Minister including Rajinder Kumar Dhawan, her special assistant, who was only a step behind the Prime Minister when she was shot down, Makhan Lal Fotedar, her political adviser, Nathuram, her personal valet and Rameshwar Dayal, her special security officer. There are several other persons listed who have become witnesses to the assassination. The statements of each of the 144 persons will constitute evidence against the accused and will be responsible for influencing the final verdict of the court.

The charge-sheet is in some respects a disappointing and incomplete document for it leaves several questions unanswered:

- Under what circumstances was Beant Singh, who fired the first shot at the Prime Minister, himself killed?
- Why did the commandos of the Indo-Tibetan Border Force (ITBP), (who were posted on duty at the Prime Minister's house at the time of the crime), fire at the two assassins, killing Beant and critically wounding Satwant when they have strict instructions not to fire above the waist in such an emergency?
- Was there a third assassin who was party to the crime, as had been disclosed earlier, and if there was, was he of Hindu or Sikh faith?
- Who besides the prime accused in the case are the other persons suspected of involvement or complicity in the assassination?
- Are there any charges against Simranjeet Singh Mann and against Jasbir Singh who are undergoing preventive detention for the case under NSA?
- What about the alleged involvement of a foreign power or a "foreign hand" in the murder?
- How were the chief accused in the case financed and who were the masterminds behind the conspiracy to kill the Prime Minister?
- How was there a total collapse of security arrangements once the shoot-out had occurred?
- Have those accused in the case confessed to their crime, and if so what are the contents of their confessional statements?

The charge-sheet does not provide the answers to any of these questions. In fact, it throws very little new light on the case and discloses very little about the antecedents, background and motivations of the accused persons. The picture that the charge-sheet paints is that both Satwant Singh and Beant Singh were the chief executors of the crime and were instigated and assisted by the other two accused persons, Balbir Singh and Kehar Singh.

It is clear, however, that the most vital link (and now the most important undertrial in the country) is Satwant Singh, the 22-year old constable from Gurdaspur who fatally wounded the Prime Minister by firing 25 shots at her from his SAF carbine No. WW-13980 at point-blank range. Though the challan does not state this, Satwant Singh immediately after the act threw up his hands in surrender, which further deepens the mystery as to why Satwant was himself attacked. Satwant Singh was a few minutes later transported in an ambulance to the Ram Manohar Lohia hospital, where he was treated for multiple bullet injuries.

As prime accused and only surviving assassin, Satwant Singh became the focus of attention for the various investigating teams and the intelligence networks working on the case. Satwant Singh was transferred from the hospital to the capital's Tihar Central Jail and remanded to judicial custody. Considered a "VIP prisoner," Satwant was kept in solitary confinement in ward number one of the "A" class prisons at Tihar, protected by a 250-strong force of the Tamil Nadu Police (TNP). Satwant Singh is believed to have recorded his first (and perhaps only) confessional statement on 1 December before Bharat Bhushan Sharma, additional metropolitan magistrate in the presence of his own counsel, I.U. Khan. According to Khan, in the statement, Satwant Singh categorically admitted that he had killed the Prime Minister at the behest of Beant Singh. The confessional statement which will be the most vital piece of evidence against him, ran into 15 pages and took two-and-a-half hours to be recorded during the in-camera proceedings within the cell of the accused.

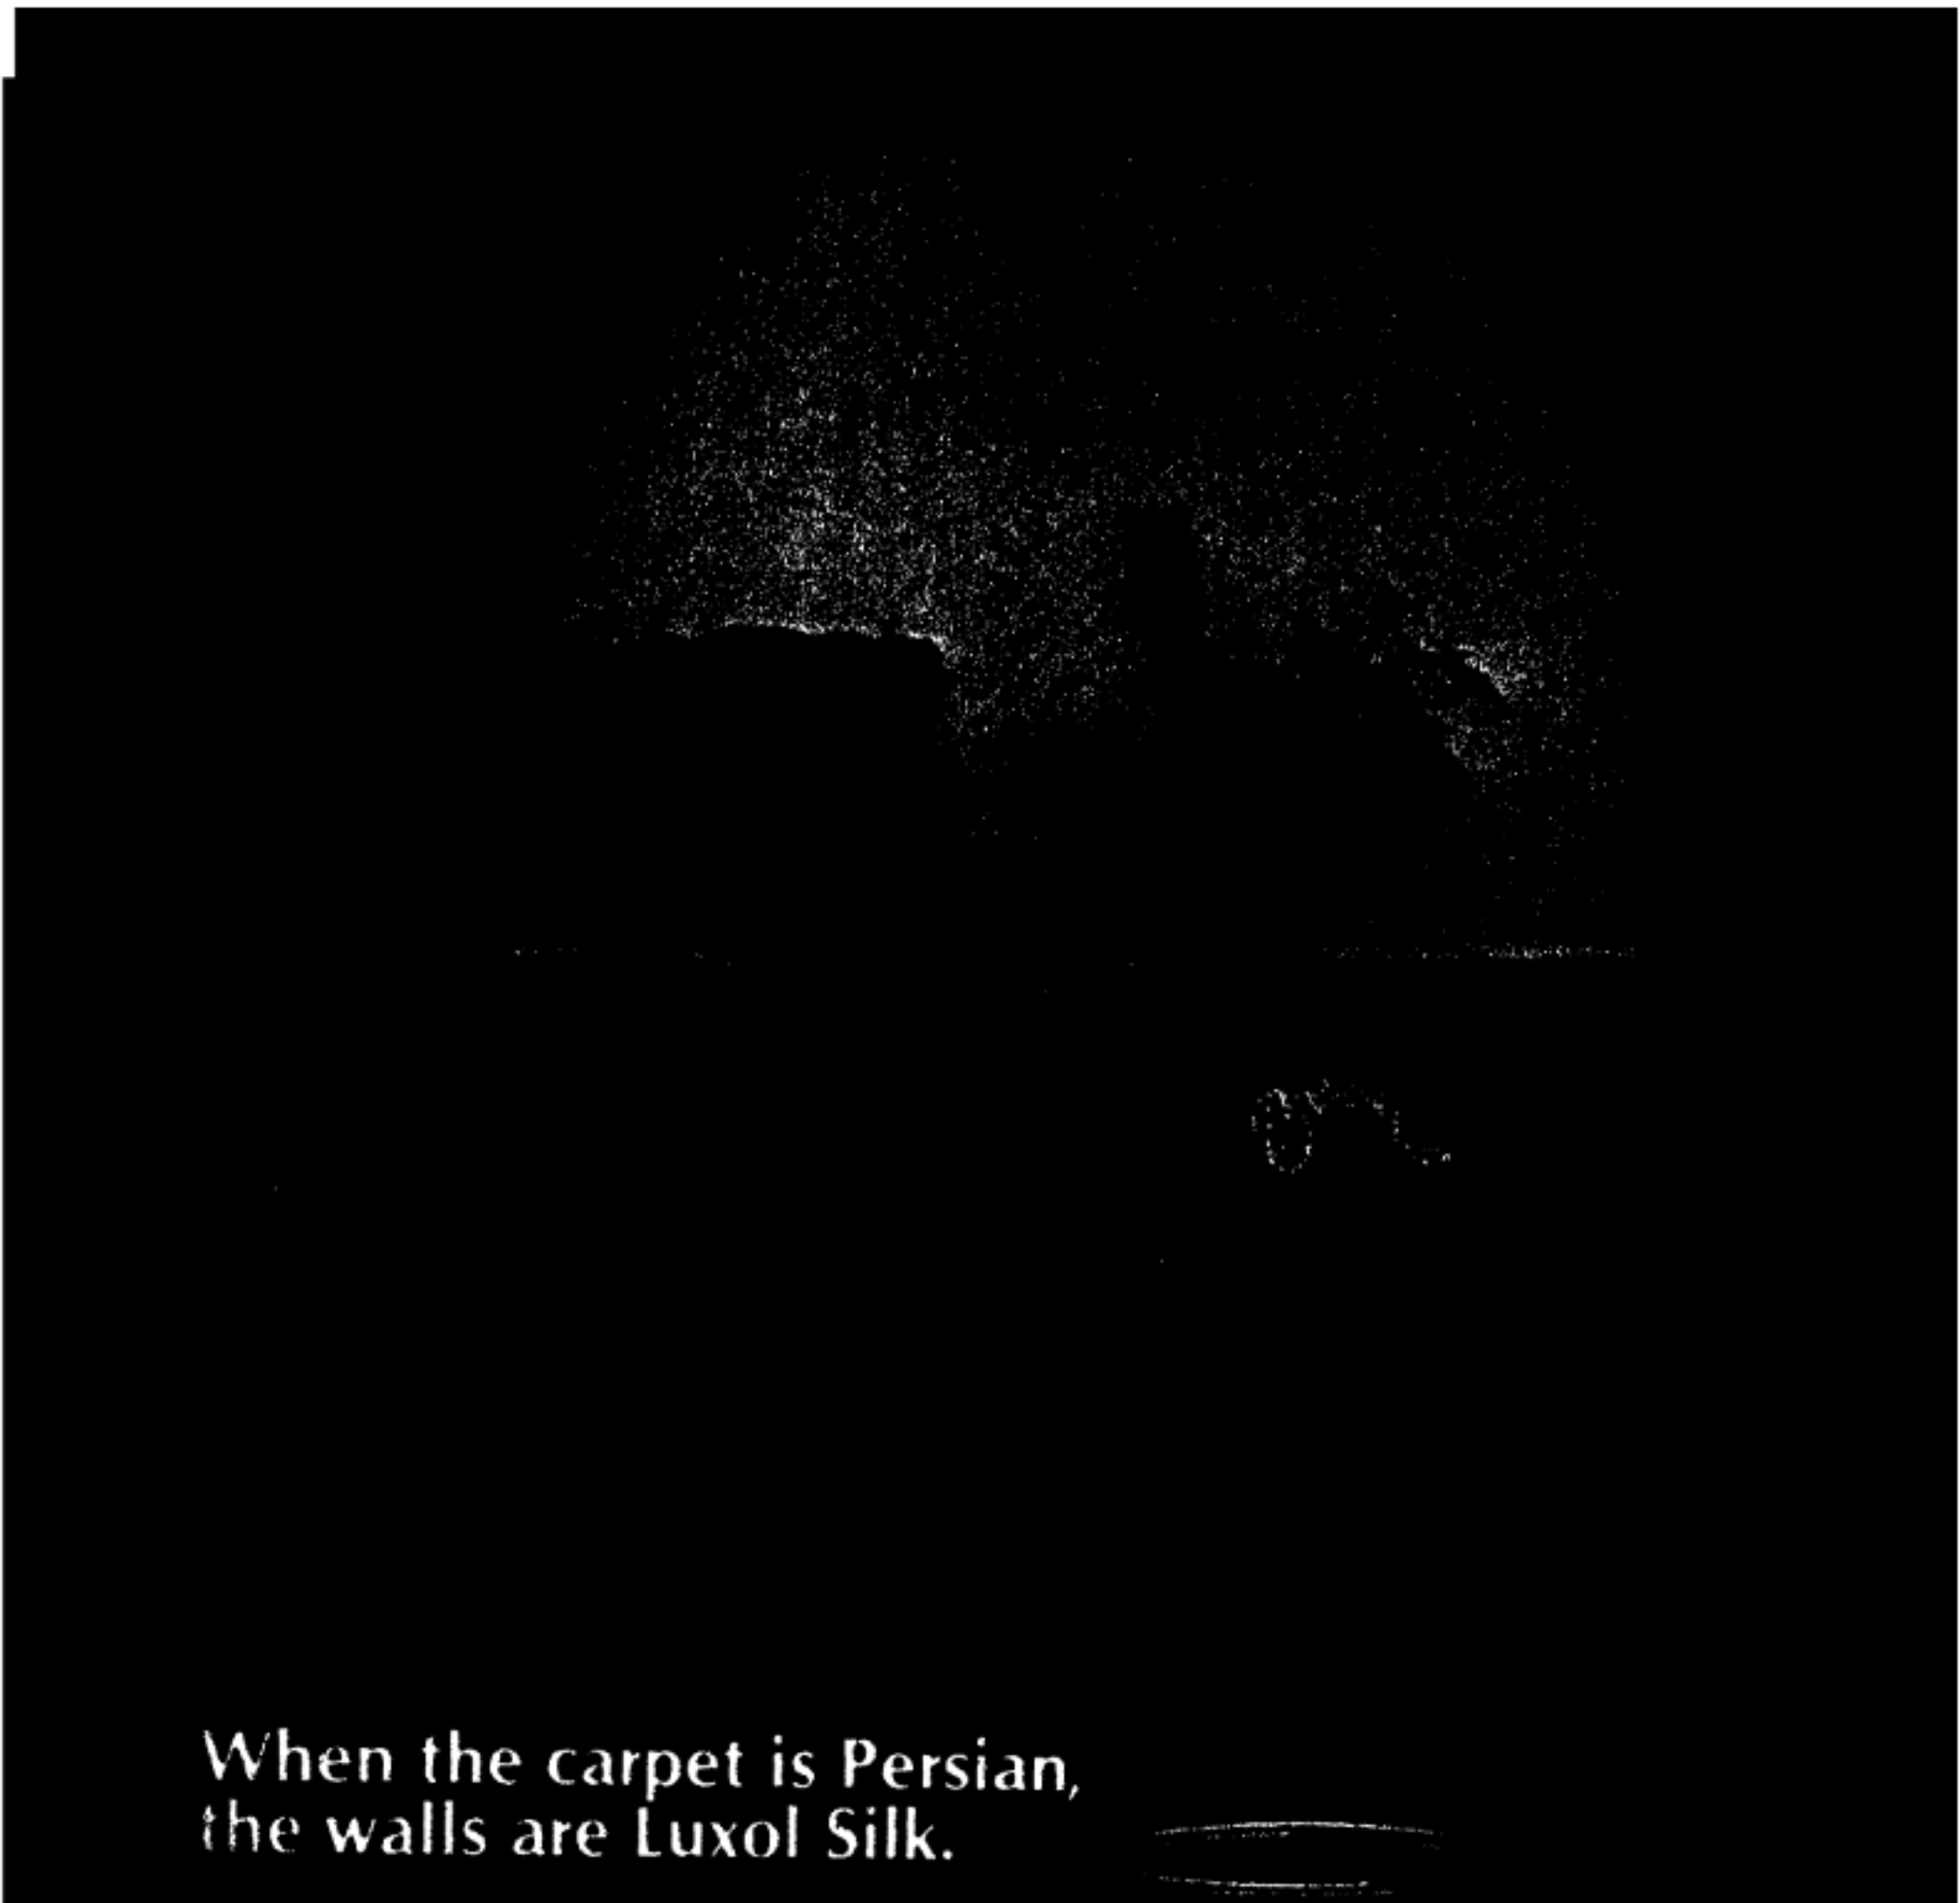
After providing Satwant legal protection for a short while, Khan refused any further involvement in the case. Satwant Singh's power of attorney or wakalatnama was later transferred to R.S. Sodhi, a Supreme Court lawyer and convener of the Sikh Soldiers, Legal Aid Society, who had previously taken up counsel for Kehar Singh. The other accused in the case and is also the defence counsel for the third accused, Balbir Singh. Sodhi is being assisted by a junior advocate Ashok Aggarwal. According to Aggarwal, Satwant Singh has in the weeks following the assassination, given the intelligence men and police a confused picture of the plot. Aggarwal told SUNDAY: "He (Satwant) has no mental balance and changes his version every time he is approached by us. He has even given contradictory reports of the murder to his father, Tirlok Singh when he met him in jail."

According to those known to Balbir Singh and his lawyers, this acount of the involvement of Balbir Singh, a Delhi Armed Police sub-inspector as stated in the charge-sheet in the conspiracy is by far an accurate one. Ashok Aggarwal told SUNDAY that during his interviews with Balbir Singh, the latter had openly confessed that he had been contemplating the assassination of Mrs Gandhi since June, last year. Balbir had approached several persons who could assist him, including Gurbaksh Singh, Dilip Singh and Virendra Singh, now all witnesses against Balbir. Aggarwal also disclosed that Balbir had in fact, planned to use a remote control process to "do the job" whereby the residence of the Prime Minister could be blown off with the pressing of a button.

On the day of the assassination, Balbir Singh was not on duty at the Prime Minister's house. He was picked up from his house at Najafgarh Road on 2 November after Vimla Devi Khalsa, wife of Beant Singh had named him as one of the chief conspirators. At the time of his arrest, a hand-written note was recovered from him. The note, (which is listed as item No. 21 in the list of documents) indicated planning, movements and conduct relevant to the assassination of the Prime Minister in chronological order. Presently under judicial custody in Tihar Jail, Balbir Singh is believed to have told his lawyers and relatives several times: "If Beant had not done the job, I would have soon accomplished my mission."

Beant Singh (standing) at Kehar Singh's son's wedding

The third accused, Kehar Singh, son of Atma Singh was an assistant in the Directorate General of Supplies and Disposals and is a maternal uncle of Beant Singh. According to the charge-sheet, Kehar Singh is alleged to have "taken accused Beant Singh to the Golden Temple in Amritsar on 20 October where accused Satwant Singh was also to join as part of the mission..." Kehar Singh is also charged with making both Beant Singh and Satwant Singh undergo an "amrit chakra ceremony" on 14 November and 24 November respectively.



Kehar Singh was once again named as a co-conspirator in the case by Beant Singh's wife and was picked up from his residence at Quarter No. 171, Sector XII, Rama Krishna Puram. At the time of his arrest a gold kara and gold ring, belonging to Beant were recovered from his residence. The items are now listed as number 51 in the list of properties of the case. After his arrest, the services of Kehar Singh were suspended and on 12 February, he was dismissed from service under Article 113 of the Constitution by a Presidential order.

The family of Kehar Singh alleges that he is being kept in judicial custody without any charges being filed against him. Kehar Singh's wife, Jasbir Singh told this correspondent how immediately after her husband's arrest, both of them were taken to the Yamuna Velodrome for interrogation and alleges that her husband was tortured physically to make him confess to a crime he had not committed. "They used to throw hot pepper in his eyes and beat him up. At the velodrome they did not let him sit down for six days. When I saw what they were doing to him, I used to faint and seeing my poor health the police sent me home."

Aggarwal feels that among the three accused persons he was defending in the case, Kehar Singh is by far the most composed and straightforward. He explained that the IB wanted Kehar Singh to turn approver in the case and make false allegations against some persons.

Meanwhile the work of the Anand Ram enquiry team is in full swing. Many prominent persons have been summoned to its office in the Vigyan Bhavan complex and questioned. Recently, a senior Delhi police officer, Dr K.K. Paul has been posted in the team. The charge-sheet apparently is quiet on many aspects of the enquiry being conducted by the Anand Ram team.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

When the carpet is Persian, the walls are Luxol Silk.

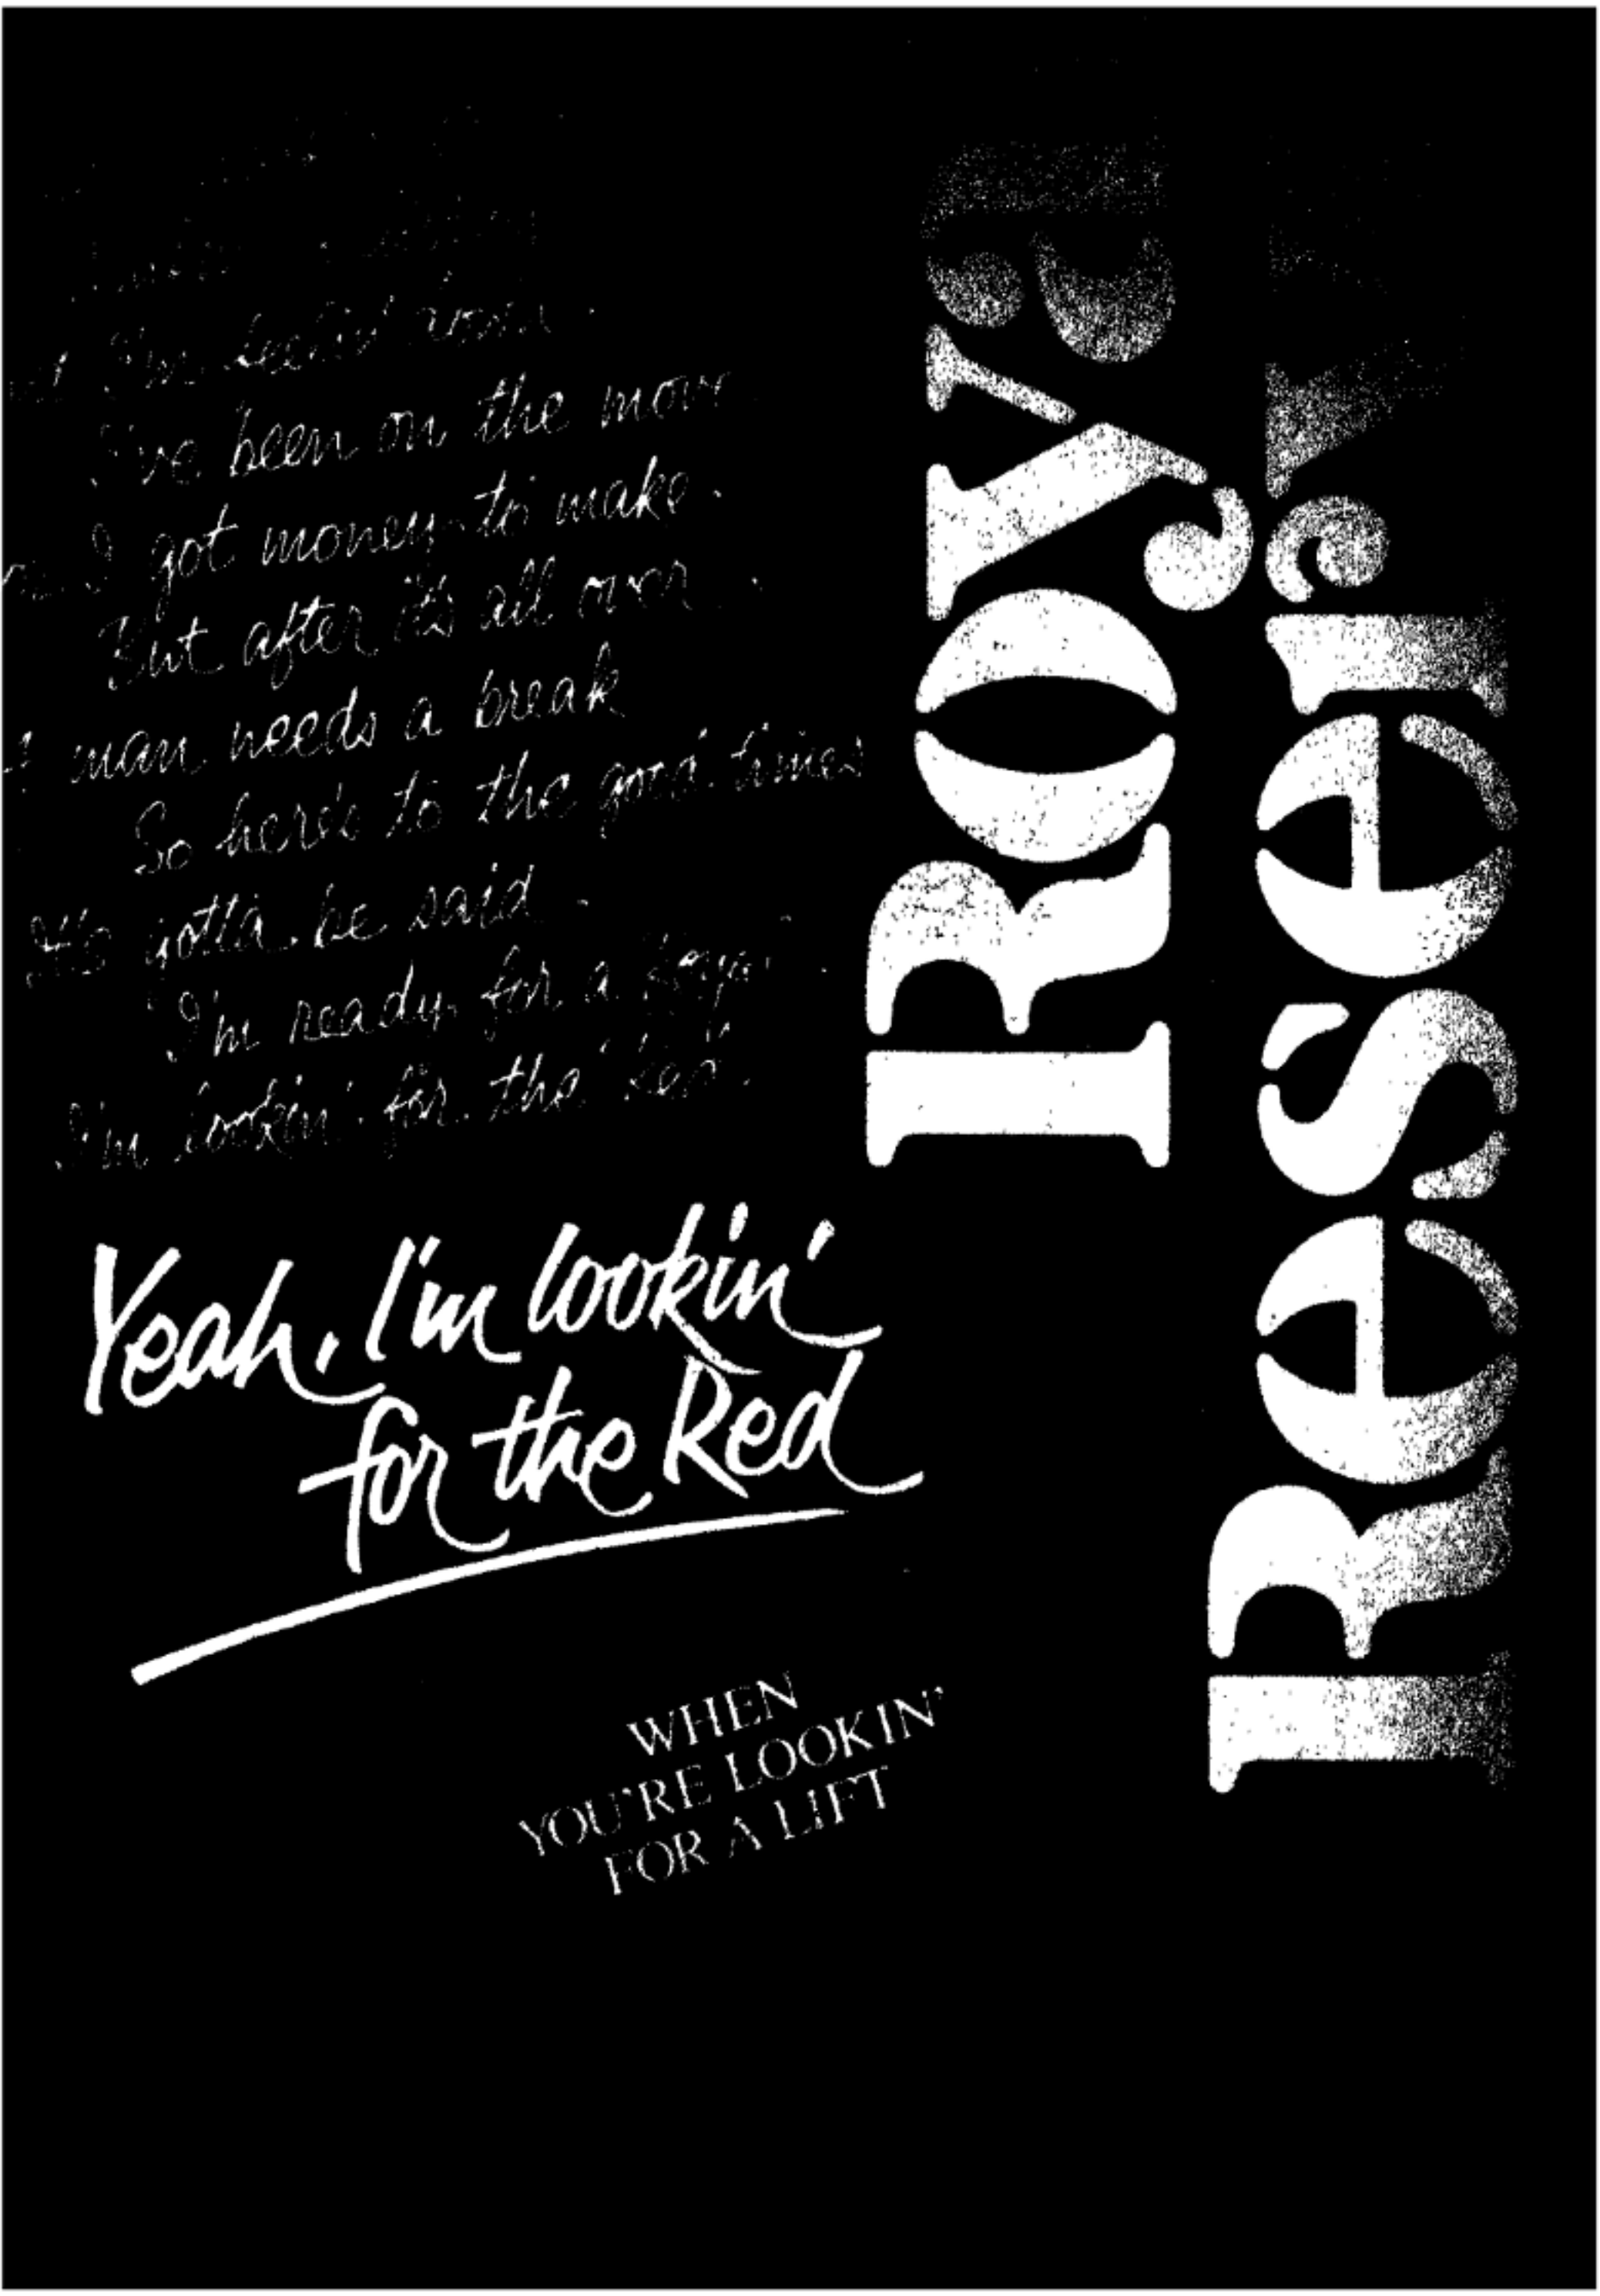
Luxol Silk. It's the only emulsion paint you can feel with your eyes closed. Just run your fingers over the finish – super smooth, isn't it.

Luxol Silk. Its perfect silk brush makes it so easy to wash. It's the longest and best looking for years and years.



Luxol Silk. Choose from over forty shades of silk and from a whole new range of whites that whisper.

Drape your walls with Luxol Silk the richest emulsion in the world

Luxol Silk

Luxol Silk

British Paints
BERGER

I've been on the move
I got moves to make
But after it's all over
I sure needs a break
So here's to the good times
We gotta be said
I'm ready for a lift
I'm lookin' for the Red
Yeah, I'm lookin' for the Red
WHEN YOU'RE LOOKIN' FOR A LIFT
Red

TAMIL NADU

Setting the Party in Order

MGR restores normalcy in the AIADMK

M.G. Ramachandran's political strategy even after his brush with death continues to be based on suspense, surprise and secrecy. Within a week after his return, complete political normalcy was restored with MGR in total control of the situation.

When he met the Governor on 7 February, MGR had stated he would submit the list of the council of ministers on 9 February. That day he sprang his first surprise—only he would be sworn in on 10 February and the list would be handed over in two days. As everybody realised that the list would be the index to MGR's mind, there was tremendous anticipation and MGR chose to sustain the suspense for another two days.

On 14 February the list was finally released and two senior ministers V.R. Nedunchezhian and S. Ramachandran (Panrutti as he is called), were sworn in a day ahead of their other cabinet colleagues. The third 17 member MGR cabinet had the same ministers with the same portfolios. Only eight junior ministers (the previous MGR ministry had a strength of 25) were dropped. MGR, at present, is fitter than before and contrary to the impression given by Nedunchezhian, Veerappan and the doctors treating him, (that it would be advisable for him to be CM without portfolio), MGR has not only retained all his original portfolios but has taken an additional nine portfolios. Another important aspect of the ministry is that the main rival groups in the party of Nedunchezhian, Veerappan and Kalimuthu have been left intact. The only minister whose portfolios were reduced was Thirunavukkarasu.

But the compensation comes in the form of the special treatment to Panrutti. Unlike Thirunavukkarasu, Panrutti, who supports Jayalalitha and the Congress(I), had kept a low profile even though Veerappan's close friend Musiriputhan (president of MGR fans association) openly accused him of being Tamil Nadu's Bhaskara Rao. MGR has demonstrated since his return from New York that Panrutti and K. Rajaram, speaker of the dissolved Assembly, are his favourite and most trusted lieutenants. Of all the partymen, MGR has held the maximum number of 'briefing sessions' with Panrutti.

Speculation is rife about the events that took place during MGR's hospitalisation. From very reliable sources, SUNDAY has learnt what really happened. Soon after MGR had his stroke, doctors said that it would be impossible for MGR to function again. The lobbying began and Veerappan took the lead.

As the interim chief, he felt Mrs V.N. Janaki, MGR's wife, would be the best bet and to curry favour, he launched the scathing diatribe against Jayalalitha. Though Janaki was nervous of being CM, she relished the idea of becoming kingmaker and to vanquish Jayalalitha, her husband's other woman. The best person in the circumstances however, was V.R. Nedunchezhian, the seniormost person in the AIADMK, and acceptable to all sections of the party. The anti-Jayalalitha stance of Veerappan attracted people like P.U. Shunmugam (party general secretary), K. Kalimuthu and Musiriputhan. This coterie began to strengthen its hold over the party and the government. Veerappan wanted to prop up Nedunchezhian till such time MGR returned from New York and till then he (Veerappan) would mobilise all the MLAs. On his return, MGR could be made CM without portfolio, while Veerappan would become the most important centre of power.

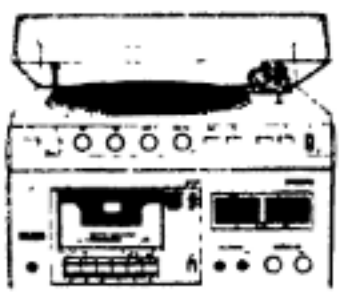
Unfortunately, Nedunchezhian, and his wife, B. Vishalakshmi, an ambitious woman, realised what Veerappan was up to. He saw no reason why he should not attempt to strengthen himself instead of being Tamil Nadu's perennial number two man. He established links with chief secretary K. Chockalingam and formed a coterie within a coterie. Nedunchezhian transferred K. Mohandas DGP in charge of crime and intelligence. At that point MGR returned and surprised everyone by the extent of his recovery.

MGR is naturally angry with both Nedunchezhian and Veerappan for their machinations. But the latter is a loyalist and with MGR back, is content to remain subservient. Nevertheless, MGR has put both in their places and has often curtly instructed Nedunchezhian to leave the room.

SUNDAY's report that the coterie was taking decisions without MGR's knowledge was vindicated when one of the first things MGR did as CM was to reinstate K. Mohandas. SUNDAY learns from a reliable source that MGR was unaware of the decision to divest Jayalalitha of her post as deputy leader of the AIADMK Parliamentary group. At the time of going to press, Jayalalitha had not yet met MGR which was surprising considering that MGR has seen a large number of people. By maintaining a low profile, Jayalalitha is hoping, though not very confidently, that she will get justice from MGR. A source close to MGR told SUNDAY, "Why doesn't Jayalalitha get off her high horse and meet MGR at the secretariat? This is no time to sit on her pride." The source added that there would be a reconciliation between MGR and Jayalalitha though the former was very piqued by her outburst.

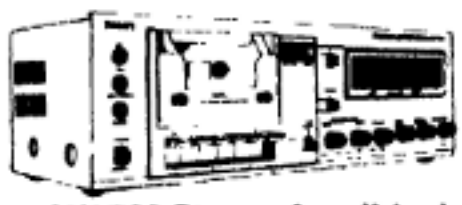
Now that MGR is fully in control, the AIADMK will remain cohesive. MGR can ruthlessly axe anyone he wants and there is little anyone can do about it because his popularity is at an all-time high.

Anita Pratap, Madras



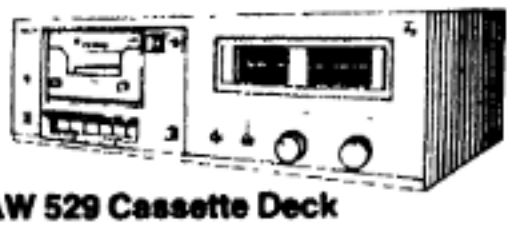
Governor S.L. Khurana (left) with MGR

PHILIPS

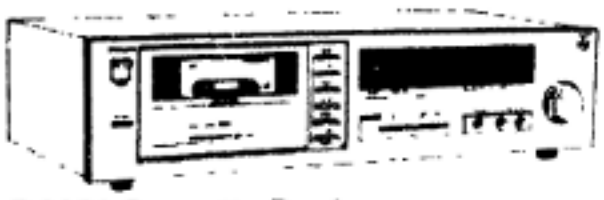


PHILIPS

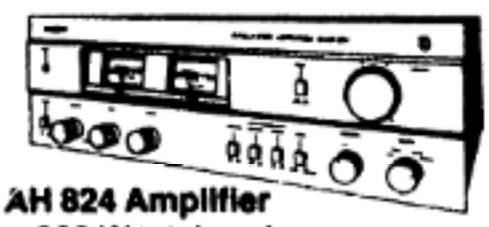
MUSIC



Whatever the source, when it's Philips, you're sure

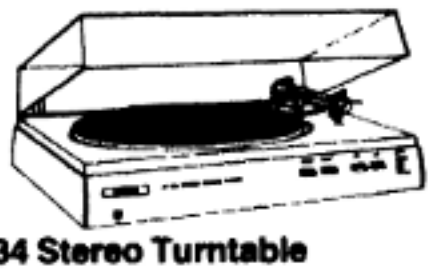


New AF 549 Music Centre: Amplifier-Cassette deck-Turntable-in-one
- 65 W total peak music power



New AW 729 Stereo Amplideck
- 65 W total peak music power

AW 529 Cassette Deck
- Electronic motor speed control



F 6121 Cassette Deck
- Servo mechanism for smooth operation
- Dolby* NR System
- Metal tape compatibility

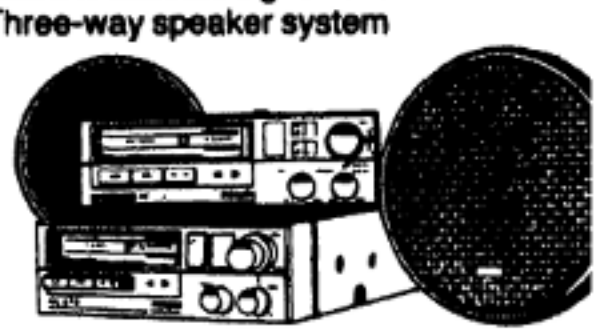
AH 824 Amplifier
- 300 W total peak music power

AF 834
Electronic Speed Control Turntable
- Stroboscope pitch control and magnetic cartridge

AF 734 Stereo Turntable
- Compatible with most stereo two-in-ones and amplifier systems

AF 534 Compact Stereo system
- 65 W total peak music power

AH 719 Tuner Amplifier
- 120 W total peak music power



AH 718 Tuner Amplifier
- 65 W total peak music power

Philips Rack System
- Comprises of F 7226 Direct Control Turntable, F 6121 Cassette Deck, AH 824 Amplifier and AH 426 speakers

F 7226 Direct Control Turntable
- Quartz speed control

AH 426 Speakers
- LEDs to indicate signal level
- Three-way speaker system

AC 028 Car Cassette Player
- 2 × 20 W RMS
- Dolby* noise reduction

AC 018 Car Cassette Player
- 2 × 6 WRMS
- Auto reverse

*Trademark of Dolby Laboratories Inc

Recommended Stereo System Combinations

System	Turntable	Amplifier	Cassette Deck	Speakers
A	F 7226	AH 824	F 6121	AH 426
B	AF 834	AH 719	F 6121	AH 425
C	AF 734	AH 718	AW 529	AH 435
D	← AF 549 (Music Centre) →			AH 435
E	AF 734	◀ AW 729 (Amplideck) ▶		AH 435
F	◀ AF 534 (Stereo System) ▶		AW 529	AH 435

Just walk into any Philips Showroom and take a look at the range. When you listen to them, you will agree that nobody understands music like Philips does.

We have music for everyone

Philips – the trusted Indian household name for over fifty years

OBM/38

ASSEMBLY ELECTIONS

Congress(I) versus Congress(I)

The unrest is affecting party morale

Even if the rebels do not pose a threat to the Congress(I)'s poll prospects in the March elections, they will certainly have a tremendous "nuisance value." Much is being said of the number of rebels in the field. Officially, the party claims their number is not large but it is a fact that the number of rebels runs to thousands.

The ruling party would like the people to believe that the emergence of rebels proves how popular the Congress(I) is. There is some truth in this assertion but the emergence of such a large number of rebels also indicates that those denied tickets are in no mood to take this lying down. This has already had, to some extent, an adverse impact on the unity, discipline and morale in the party. "If we are corrupt, so are those who have been given tickets," say the rebels. They point out that numerous relatives of important politicians have been given tickets. "Who says that bhai-bhatijawaad in the Congress(I) has ended?" they ask angrily.

Obviously, while Rajiv Gandhi and party leaders will in their election campaign emphasise the "clean image" of the party, the rebels will do their best to show how "unclean" the chosen ones are. Irrespective of whether the rebels make a dent or not in the Congress' fortunes, it is apparent that the targets of attack will be the husbands, sons, wives and daughters of those who have been dropped.

How can the son or the wife be clean if the head of the family has been denied a ticket? Why should the "ticket" remain within particular families? Why are those involved in scandals being nominated by the ruling party? If they have been nominated because there were only wild allegations against them but no evidence, then why has the same criteria not been applied in the case of those who have been rejected, especially the sitting MLAs?

These are the questions the rebels are asking. They are finding it difficult to break away from the Congress party whose members they have been for several years and which has made them into lakhpatis and crorepatis. But they are finding the humiliation too much to bear. So while some are mentally prepared for expulsion, many others feel that it will be in their own interest to bide their time and wait for happier days when their keenness to "serve the nation" will be rewarded. Hence, the promises by axed ministers to faithfully serve the party even though they have been dropped. They have promised to work for the success of the official nominee in the hope that their "unflinching loyalty" (a euphemism for self-survival), will not go unnoticed.

While such rejected aspirants may be playing their political cards right, the rebels too can be regarded as making a major contribution to the cleansing of Indian politics by highlighting the seamier side of the Congress(I) nominees. Quite apparently, many disappointed partymen are of the view that Rajiv Gandhi could not be expected to know the background of each and every candidate. He has gone by the advice and recommendations made by chief ministers, PCC(I) presidents, AICC(I) observers, central ministers and other sources.

Had he known that relatives of dropped ministers and legislators were being given tickets, would he have not taken action, ask the rebels. They claim that Rajiv Gandhi has been kept in the dark by vested party interests who wanted their nominees included in the final list by hook or by crook. These "not-too-serious" rebels are inclined to give Rajiv Gandhi the benefit of the doubt. But the "hardline rebels" reject this theory. Rajiv knows everything, they maintain. He has allowed "bhai-bhatijawaad" because he was not serious about implementing the party's guidelines.

The Congress(I) has a lot of explaining to do about certain figures. It was officially claimed that the number of sitting MLAs dropped was 1,000. But it is certainly not more than 600. Again, though there was a ban on relatives being given tickets, how is it that nearly 160 relativs have been nominated? These include two nephews of the Bihar chief minister, Chandrashekhar Singh, and the son of the speaker, Radha Nandan Jha, in Bihar, sons of four dropped ministers in Rajasthan, sons of two dropped ministers in Maharashtra and the husband of another dropped minister in that state along with the son of a member of the selection panel, and as many as 25 "relatives" in Madhya Pradesh.

Will this affect the chances of the Congress candidates? It is quite likely that the chances of quite a few nominees might be ruined. But, if another "Rajiv wave" develops, then all these factors will be swept aside.

Gopal Mohite, New Delhi

A Binaca Toothbrush is safer than any ordinary toothbrush

You can see why

Only Binaca has safe 'rounded bristle tips'

Ordinary bristle tips tear the gums

Binaca Baby

Binaca Junior

Binaca Standard

Binaca Angular Deluxe

Binaca Transparent Angular Deluxe

A choice of so many colours, so many varieties!

Binaca®

India's largest selling toothbrush

ULKA-HCG-BT-7-84

CONGRESS(I)

Sitaram Kesri to be Removed?

AICC(I) treasurer's days may be numbered

Many eyebrows were raised when, during the reshuffle in the AICC(I) by Congress(I) president Rajiv Gandhi, the treasurer, Sitaram Kesri, was not dropped. New general secretaries and joint secretaries were appointed, but Sitaram Kesri continued as treasurer. However, the axe is likely to fall soon after the Assembly elections. Kesri has survived so far only because Rajiv Gandhi wanted to make sure that all the relevant records regarding payments were taken away from him. He might have also wanted time to think of a successor.

Rajiv Gandhi's eagerness to replace Kesri is in keeping with his determination to provide a clean and efficient administration in the government and in the party. While Kesri may be efficient, there are serious allegations that some people in the AICC(I) office receive a 'cut' in every deal that the AICC(I) enters into. This includes the production of election material like flags, posters, pamphlets, bindis and also the utilisation of vehicles like trucks, tempos and taxis.

Sitaram Kesri

For the seven years that Kesri has "faithfully" served the AICC(I), he has allegedly been a key beneficiary in all monetary transactions. Even in the distribution of party funds to candidates, Kesri is alleged to have cornered his share. Within the AICC(I), it is said that Kesri and a few of his henchmen in the administration have been ruling the roost. Not a single file requiring financial sanction by Kesri is signed unless the "cut" is paid, it is alleged. Kesri's days are numbered. His replacement may come from the Youth Congress, as Rajiv Gandhi may choose to place greater trust in some young MP who he thinks can fit the bill. One general secretary of IYC, who had served in the National Students' Union of India (NSUI) earlier, may be Kesri's replacement.

Two other 'VIPs' likely to be dislodged after the Assembly polls are Mr M.L. Fotedar and Mr Chandulal Chandrakar. Fotedar will have to go because Rajiv Gandhi does not desire anyone from among his mother's close aides to remain close to the centre of power. Fotedar may be accomodated as a minister in Jammu and Kashmir if Rajiv Gandhi wishes. Chandrakar is likely to be eased out because of his incompetence in dealing with a major ministry like rural development where a lot of dynamism and hard work is necessary. Moreover, Chandrakar had hardly acquitted himself successfully as an AICC(I) general secretary in charge of press relations and publications. His replacement, Srikant Verma, despite shortcomings, has proved that Chandrakar could have done better.

Gopal Mohite, New Delhi

DMKP

A Crumbling Edifice

The Jats at Chhaprauli revolt against Charan Singh

The octogenarian DMKP leader, Chaudhary Charan Singh, faces a revolt from his partymen at Chhaprauli, an Assembly segment of the Baghpat Lok Sabha seat, considered to be his domain for the past three decades. In this Assembly election, the Chaudhary has given the DMKP ticket to his daughter, Saroj Verma which has led to a major revolt among the dominant Jats of Chhaprauli. The nomination of Saroj Verma was opposed by ten block pramukhs of the constituency but the Chaudhary ignored all protests and the Jats of Chhaprauli have now decided to join the Congress(I).

The Jats in the Chhaprauli Assembly segment have always voted for the Chaudhary since the pre-independence days. But now, for the first time things are looking difficult for the Chaudhary. The Jats are now openly coming out against the "dynastic attitude" of the Chaudhary. The pradhan of the Kaithal village in Chhaprauli, Chaudhary Jagnu Singh told SUNDAY, "We have always supported Chaudhary and his candidates, in all the elections we always gave lakhs of rupees to the Chaudhary, but this time the Jats will not support him and his daughter. We are not bonded labour of the Chaudhary, as he thinks, we also know how to show him our teeth." This opinion is shared by other influential Jats of the area as well. Casteist politics has its pitfalls: the Jats resent the fact that Saroj Verma has married outside the caste. And Satpal Malik, a Congress(I) MP and once the most trusted man of the Chaudhary and former general secretary of Lok Dal was responsible for the volte-face in attitudes.

Why did the Chaudhary give the ticket to his daughter? According to party sources, Mr Charan Singh feared that his daughter would join Mr Ram Naresh Yadav's Lok Dal (R) and gave her the ticket only to keep her in the party. But he never thought that the Jats of the Chhaprauli area would rise up in revolt. In fact, they have suggested that the DMKP support independent candidate Ram Pal Singh and retire Saroj Verma. The Jats of Barnawa and Baghpat Assembly constituencies too are unhappy about the nominations of Bhopal Singh and Sahib Singh, respectively

The DMKP, once the "dominant party in the north" were wiped out after the Lok Sabha elections as only three candidates including Mr Charan Singh won and of them, Mr Vijay Kumar Mishra, Member of Parliament from Bihar has defected to the Janata Party along with Rajya Sabha member Mr Hukumdeo Narayan Yadav. Mr Ramashankar Singh, a lone party MLA in Madhya Pradesh and party state president has defected to Congress(I) with about 5,000 supporters and Mr Ram Naresh Yadav, who has now been expelled from the party, has filed his nomination as an independent and formed the Lok Dal (R). As he has a better image in the state compared to many DMKP leaders, it is a blow to Charan Singh. With the Jats of Chhaprauli also in revolt, DMKP's "dominant" image is fading away.

Jagmeet Uppal, New Delhi.

NAVJEEVAN BUMPER LOTTERY

(IN AID OF ASIA'S LARGEST HOSPITAL FOR SPINAL INJURIES)

Marching ahead with the tune

WIN OVER

Rs. 12.50 CRORES

IN PRIZES

1 st PRIZES
Rs. 5 LAKHS x 60
UPTO 3 CRORES

2 nd PRIZES
Rs. 2 LAKHS x 60
UPTO 1.20 CRORES

3 rd PRIZES
Rs. 1 LAKH x 120
UPTO 1.20 CRORES

4 th PRIZES
Rs. 50,000/- x 120
UPTO 60 LAKHS

5 th PRIZES
Rs. 10,000/- x 600
UPTO 60 LAKHS

Special Attraction

MID DRAW on 1.3.85

1st PRIZES Rs. 1 LAKH×60 Rs. 60 LAKHS

2nd Prizes Rs. 500/- × 6000 Rs. 30 LAKHS

And Lakhs of other attractive prizes.

TICKET PREPAID Rs. 5/- each

FIRST TIME IN BUMPER LOTTERY FOR BUYER'S + AGENT'S + SELLER'S + 18 PRIZES GUARANTEED IN A BLOCK OF 100 TICKETS

Special Attraction for Sellers.
50% Sellers Bonus on 9th PRIZE.

DRAW : 31.3.85

Buy your Ticket TODAY.

Indian Spinal Injuries Centre

Managing Trustee
Indian Spinal Injuries Centre
New Delhi

Organising Agent
VIMAL LOTTERY AGENCY
12, Sriman Srinivas Street,
Venus Colony
Madras-18

Associates :

SANJAY AGENCY (P) LTD.
F-79, Bhagat Singh Market,
New Delhi-110 001. Phone : 323772

Crescent

DISASTER

Floating Inferno

34 die in liner blaze

It was a gruesome combination of The Poseidon Adventure and The Towering Inferno. On Monday, 12 February at about 2.00 pm a fire broke out in the 'D' deck of the prestigious passenger liner M. V Chidambaram while it was at sea killing 34 persons and injuring many more. The ship plies between Madras and Singapore, via Kuala Lumpur. Narrating the tragic events of the day, Captain Rakesh Anand said that the fire was noticed in one of the exhausts of the galley in the 'D' deck. Even as the crew and some passengers were trying to put out the fire, the flames spread into the bunk class of the 'D' deck, the cheapest accommodation on the ship containing nearly 300 passengers. The liner can accommodate a total of 1650 passen gers and nearly 200 crew.

Many passengers were sleeping when smoke engulfed them. In the stampede for the exits, many could not escape because of the confined space and the narrow exits. The inflamable foam cushion seats and baggage that contained large quantities of synthetic fabric made the 'D' deck a furnace. Trapped in the confined space, they were charred to death. In fact, parts of the bodies could not be differentiated from the burnt bits of luggage.

It took five hours of vigorous fire fighting to bring the flames under control and it took 16 hours to extinguish the fire. Apart from the 34 dead, many were injured and goods worth lakhs of rupees were destroyed. The 19-year-old Chidambaram which was due to be scrapped in June 1985 andwas making its last voyage was totally crippled

The fire had broken out when the ship was 300 nautical miles away from Madras. When the fire was finally put out, the ship was found to have listed by ten degrees. But since the engine was working, the captain declined to evacuate the passengers and decided to return to Madras. The ship was finally berthed at the North Quay of Madras Harbour at 5.30 am on 14 February. However, it was only at 9.05 am that the first passenger walked out.

It was a nightmare for them and they were glad that it was over. But the frightful images are etched in their memory. The 65-year-old Thangarasu recollects that awful moment when he saw a father and son clinging together and clawing the air desperately as they were engulfed in the billowing smoke The passen gers had done a lot of shopping either for themselves or to resell in Madras. The Chidambaram has always been used for smuggling in goods. In fact, a number of agents are usually sent by big smugglers to bring in contraband goods. The Port Trust authorities, Customs officials, are all involved in the rackets.

It has been established beyond doubt that the fire fighting equipment in the ship was inadequate. Captain Anand and Admiral R K. S Gandhi, the chairman of the Shipping Corporation of India (SCI) that owns the ship, however, claimed that the fire safety equipment had not been faulty. Given the extent of devastation it is clear that the fire raged on for hours something that would not have been likely had the equipment been in working condition. Several passengers testified that none of the fire extinguishers worked and that they had to put out the fire by pouring buckets of water, which took considerable time resulting in extensive damage. Another aspect that indicts the crew of negligence is that five of the eight exits of the bunker section were either locked or jammed.

If the crew had the presence of mind, they could have tried to open these exit points. Several passengers who were lucky to have escaped stated that they had tried in vain to open some of the exit doors. The crew is also guilty of misleading the passengers Shortly after the fire broke out, it was announced on the public address system that a fire had erupted in the 'D' deck, but had been contained when the fire was still spreading. This led to a rush by the passengers to try and retrieve their belongings, stopping people from trying to escape from within. According to forensic science experts, a number of the passengers could have died of asphyxiation.

Though they were handicapped by the failure of the fire fighting equipment some of the crew fought valiantly to control the fire. But for the crew and passengers, the fire could have easily spread. A number of passengers testified that Capt. Anand kept his cool throughout the crisis and was prompt and effective.

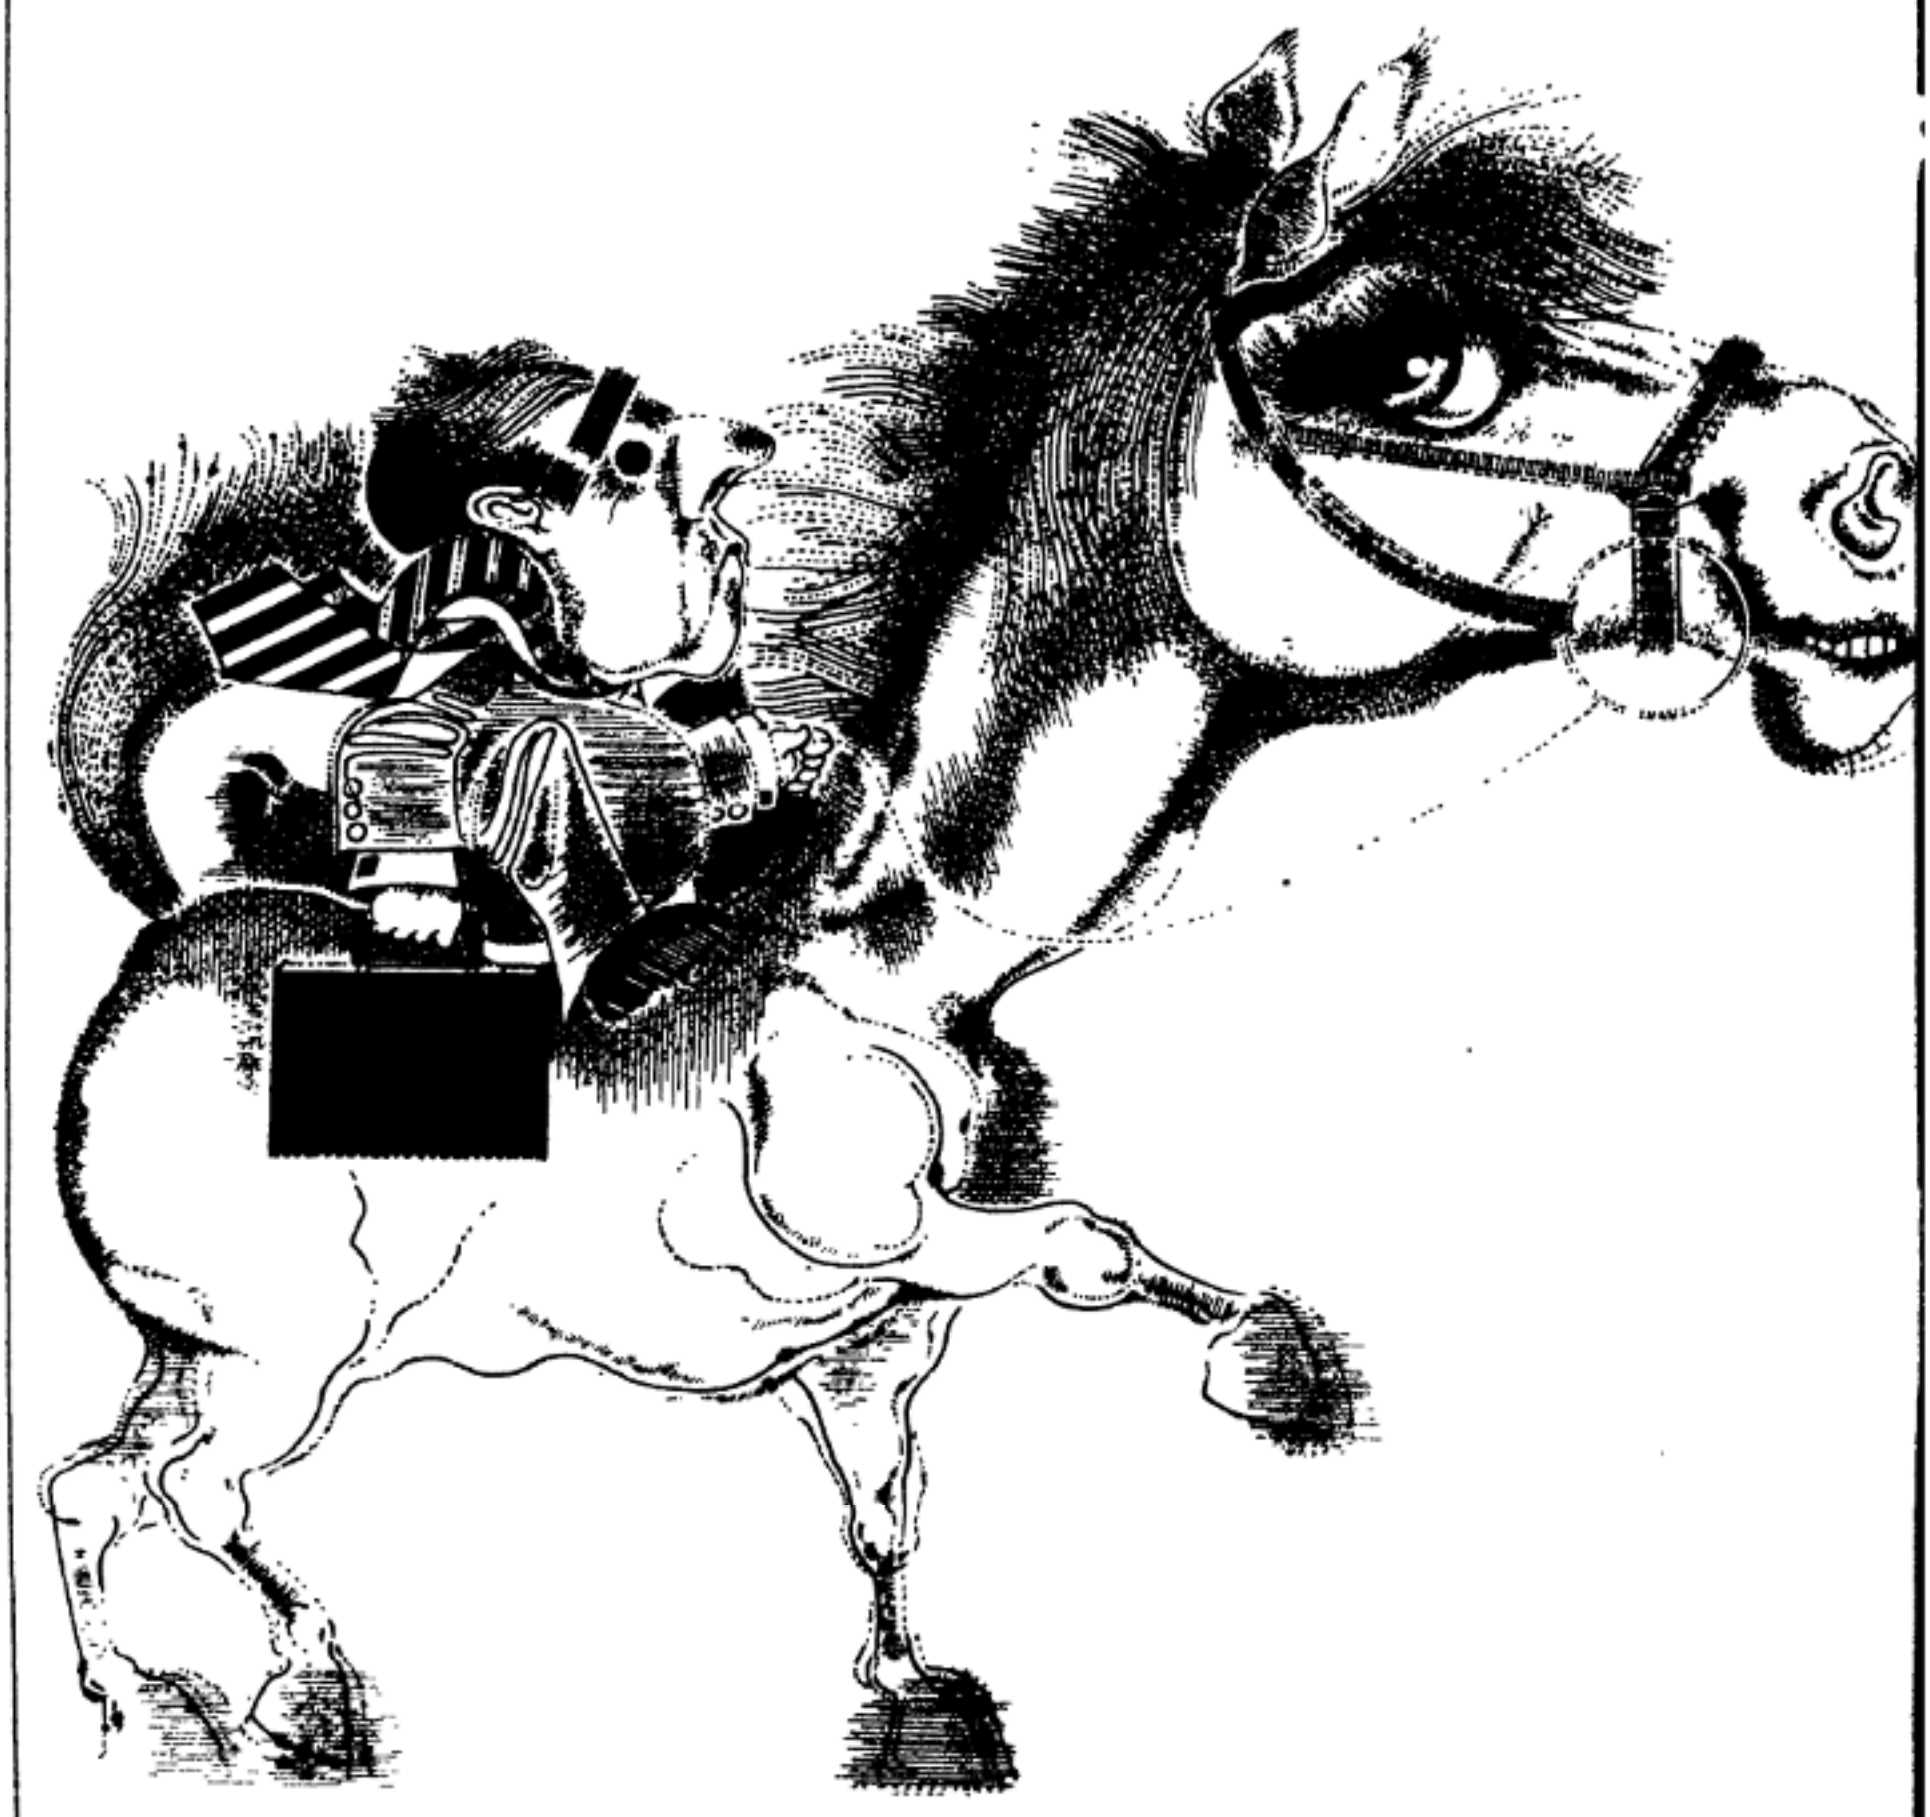
Anita Pratap, Madras

BUREAUCRACY

Removing the President's Men

Are all the bureaucrats who came to the capital after Giani Zail Singh shifted to the centre being shunted out? The answer is. yes. Giani Zail Singh came to the centre in 1980, when he was made the union home minister. Before that the present President of India had confined himself to Punjab politics. It was but natural that Gianiji's presence in New Delhi would bring in its fold the posting of some of his chosen officers. Five IAS officers from Punjab were brought by Giani Zail Singh in 1980: S. P. Bagla, I.J.S. Bindra, S L. Kapur, A. S. Chhattar and K. S. Bains. The tenure rule is now being used to send all of them back.

S. P. Bagla was an important bureaucrat in the days when Giani Zail Singh was the home minister He was the joint secretary and establishment officer in the department of personnel and was secretary to the cabinet's Appointments Committee and all top-level postings were processed by him. A few months before Giani Zail Singh became the President in 1982, Bagla was sent to Washington as the minister, economic affairs in the Indian embassy there. His three-year term is now over and Bagla has been posted back to Punjab.



The return to Punjab of I. J. S. Bindra has raised eyebrows. He was the special assistant to Giani Zail Singh in the home ministry and is now the President's S.A., a post in which he should normally be allowed to continue till the President desires his services. The insistence on tenure rule for Bindra is being made despite the President being keen to retain him in Delhi.

S. L. Kapur was brought in by home minister Zail Singh as joint secretary in charge of broadcasting and TV in the information and broadcasting ministry. He has now gone back to Punjab as transport secretary. Two other men of Gianiji's who are in the reversion list are A. S. Chhattar, joint secretary in charge of foreign trade in the commerce ministry and K. S. Bains. joint secretary in charge of foreign collaborations in the industry ministry. Both officers have been given their reversion orders and are likely to be posted to Punjab in the next few months.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

If you believe petroleum conservation is an arty social issue that just sounds good but means nothing, let's talk instead of a national loss of Rs. 800 crores annually.

And a drastic change in your lifestyle.

Riding to work is not as far fetched a situation as you believe. Within the next 50 years we will probably even have to select a horse. And let's not dismiss the situation by saying "Oh, I won't be alive". Because our children will.

The problem

The world's petroleum resources are not going to last much longer especially at the present rate of growth in consumption.

India has to import oil utilising invaluable foreign exchange. In spite of this we waste petroleum worth Rs 800 crores every year.

Scientists are working hard to develop alternate sources of energy. But this takes time. And we are wasting fuel so fast that we are not going to give them that time.

You can help in 4 areas

PCRA has identified 4 areas for immediate action If you follow a few tips for the efficient utilisation of fuel both you and India will benefit. We don't have space for all of them. But here are some

Conservation on the road

Drive at the right speed Plan your route. Don't ride your clutch. Don't use your brake too often Avoid congested "stop and go" traffic. Use the right spark plugs Tune and maintain your engine Check oil drips.

Follow these and a few other tips and you can save 10% of your fuel bills. And India's!

Conservation at home

Don't leave your burners on unnecessarily. Use the right sized container Use the small burner as often as possible Keep the water quantity to the bare minimum. Use the pressure cooker. Soak ingredients and allow frozen food to reach room temperature before cooking them.

Use the lid on a vessel to avoid heat loss. Clean your burners and wicks regularly.

These and a few other simple "tips" will help you save 25% of your fuel bills And India's!

Conservation in agriculture

In tractors: Stop diesel leaks. Turn your engine off on long stops. Drive in the right gear. Check your tractor if it smokes too much and keep the air filter clean Plan your field run and match hauling capacity with load.

In irrigation pumps our experience proves that farmers can save 30 to 40% diesel with a few minor changes.

Conservation in industry

Because of eight primary reasons boilers in Indian industry are wasting up to 25% of the total fuel oil used. The reasons are different but the same is true for industries that utilise furnaces. This results in an annual loss of fuel worth Rs. 270 crores 1299 industries in India, however, have followed PCRA's advice and have saved substantial amounts immediately.

What you can do to help

We are all probably responsible for wasting fuel in at least one or probably even three of these areas.

Remember, ultimately we have to bear the cost, as user, consumer, manufacturer, shareholder or as a citizen of India

So let's work to end this waste. In some areas you can begin today In others areas you may need to get in touch with us Do that We'll work with you

PCRA

Petroleum Conservation Research Association

306, Sethi Bhawan, 7 Rajendra Place, New Delhi-110 008

PCRA is a Government sponsored organisation and a representative of India's petroleum companies in areas related to conservation.

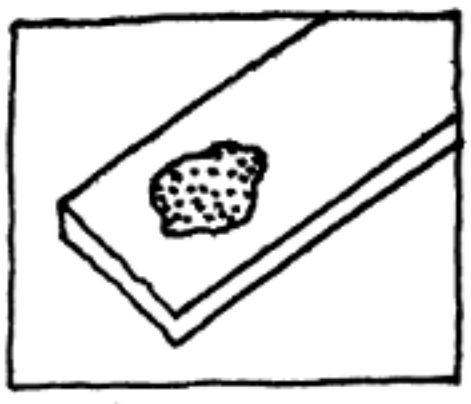
PCRA's four major conservation targets are the Industrial, Agricultural, Domestic and Transport sectors.

PCRA's services are free. Savings achieved by PCRA through conservation exceed Rs. 100 crores per annum.

Oil isn't going to last much longer. Use it with wisdom.

ULKA-D-PCRA-058/2A

An Experiment in Smoking



An experiment in anti-smoking health education carried out in England has succeeded in dissuading a good number of children from smoking. The first 12 months of a two-year project to assess the effects of smoking on children aged between 11 to 18 years, has shown that a high proportion of them have given up smoking as a result of the project, which was supervised by Dr Peter Travers of the School of Education at Exeter university in south-west England.

In the project, rules for the lung functions were laid down and the effects of smoking upon the lungs demonstrated. A simple and accurate spirometer (which measures air inhaled and exhaled during respiration) was developed by Dr Travers. This allowed schoolchildren to make their own lung function tests. "It has already been shown that smoking does produce respiratory obstruction in the lungs," said Dr Travers. "Another interesting result showed that children who are non-smokers are liable to have poor lung function test results if their parents are heavy smokers. As a consequence, some parents have given up smoking."

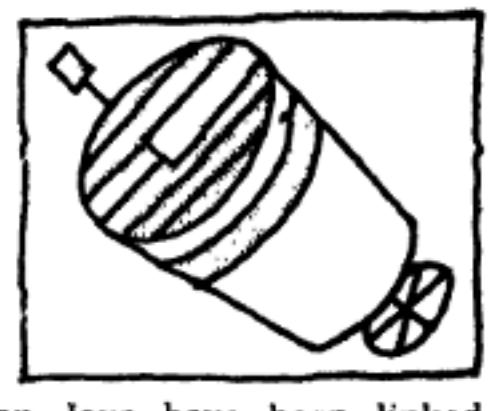
No Toothpicks, Please

Those of you who use toothpicks after lunch or dinner are advised to refrain from such a practice: it could be fatal. A researcher at the Centers for Disease Control, Atlanta, has called attention to a public health threat that injures some 8,000 people every year. Many of the injuries are minor, but there have been a few deaths and close calls. In one case, a man was suffering from symptoms similar to those of AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome). Doctors found a toothpick lodged in his liver.

Keeping Blood Fresh

Blood clotting comes as a relief to most people, but not to biochemists, whose problem is keeping blood samples fresh while they are being delivered to laboratories. To help facilitate biochemists, Britain's Corning Medical and Scientific has recently come up with an ingenious adaptation of the familiar syringe plunger that helps withdraw blood, mix it with an anti-coagulant and seal the container, all in a go. To take samples, the plunger is set at the desired volume and the needle inserted into the artery. Blood then fills the sampler until it touches the plunger, immediately displacing all the air through three equally spaced channels around the plunger. When a microporous hydrophobic filter positioned above these pores is touched by blood, it seals immediately. It is also preloaded with fast dissolving heparin, and this anti-coagulant mixes with the sample as it is taken. It can be operated with one hand so that needle movement can be kept at a minimum thus reducing patient trauma.

The "Heimlich Manoeuvre"



If you find someone choking or having an obstruction in his throat, don't slap him on his back. Try the "Heimlich manoeuvre." This involves encircling the victim from behind so that the rescuer's grasped hands press hard into the abdomen, forcing the diaphragm upward and creating a rush of air that expels whatever may be stuck in the windpipe. This anti-choking strategy has been discovered by Dr Henry Heimlich, of Xavier university in Cincinnati, USA, who recently won the Albert Lasker award, one of the most prestigious prizes in medicine. Dr Heimlich states that should the victim be alone, he should thrust his fist into his abdomen or if that fails, lean over the back of a chair or the edge of a table in such a way as to apply pressure just below the rib cage. He maintains that his technique is so simple that in one case a four-year old boy saved his younger brother. This discovery has won Dr Heimlich plenty of recognition from the 10,000 Americans it has saved from death since 1974.

Hope for the Blind

Air France, one of the world's leading airlines, has come up with a unique system of integrated bureautics for the blind. This system, which was designed by a blind, young engineer, Mr Philippe Balin, gives them access to textual information in Braille that has so far prevented them from joining the working world. The advantage offered by this system is that a blind person can use it with as much ease as anyone else and that, to have access to the stored data (in Braille or otherwise), the operator who is not blind does not have to know Braille and the blind operator does not need to be able to read.

Teaching Through Satellite

The remote Eastern Island universities of Indonesia, using two channels of the country's recently upgraded communications satellite, have established a satellite curriculum. Teachers and technicians at 11 classrooms on Java, Borneo, Sulawesi, Seram and Irian Jaya have been linked together by PALAPA, which orbits about 700 kilometres above Jakarta, bouncing messages to a total of more than 100 receiving dishes scattered across 3,000 miles of the archipelago. Using 11 of these "earth stations," the Indonesian Distance Education Satellite System, or INDESS, is seeking ways to make up for a shortage of teachers.

The INDESS student sits in a normal classroom—except there is a microphone on his desk and a video "blackboard" in front of him instead of a teacher. He hears the teacher's voice "live" and there is a tutor at each classroom. The student can discuss questions with his tutor and, if necessary, speak directly to the teacher.

Illustrations Prabir Sen

THIS INDIA

Illustration Debashis Deb

BOMBAY: A BEST single-decker bus was stolen from the Wadala depot on 23 January. Strangely enough, it was none other than the BEST driver Appa Rajaram Kunte who had taken it for a joy ride to Satara. ACP Anpat and senior inspector Takne of R. A. Kidwai Marg police station who received a complaint about the theft of single-decker bus No MRL-5655 on route No 61 spread their dragnet all over the city in vain. Later, they were informed that it had been driven to Satara—The Daily (D.N. Rajan, Kalwa)

FARIDABAD: Candle makers of Haryana never had it so good, thanks to the cut in power supply to domestic consumers between ten pm and six am. Never did the industry earn so much even during Diwali days. The situation has come to such a pass that wax, that was being quoted at a discount till November last, is sold at 100 per cent premium today—The Times of India (B.K. Salwan, 99 APO)

TRICHUR: Mr M.V. Cheeran, president of the Voters' Forum at Kunnamkulam, can now rejoice by shaving off his drooping beard. It has been the resolve of this 71-year old man since June 1982 not to shave his beard till the central government introduced legislation banning political defection. The first thing Mr Cheeran did after he came to know of the passing of the Anti Defection Bill was to send a letter to the Prime Minister congratulating him on his bold initiative in introducing the bill—Indian Express (A. V. Ramamurthy, New Delhi)

JAIPUR: Brishbhan, an employee of the erstwhile union territory of Ajmer, who was deprived of his promotional benefits following the merger of Ajmer with Rajasthan in 1956, finally got justice after nearly 30 years of continuous struggle. Brishbhan was working as an accounts officer at the time of the merger. He was reverted to a junior position by the Rajasthan government despite the directions by the central government to give him his due under the States Reorganisation Act, 1956—Indian Express (N. Balan, Madras)

CALCUTTA: A convict involved in a bank dacoity and sentenced to life was found by a Calcutta detective police officer in the Chetla area. Nilmoni Ghosh, on being challenged, produced a release order passed by the Alipore Central Jail authorities on the strength of a Supreme Court acquittal order, dated 12 December 1983. But the judges—Mr Justice P.N. Bhagawati, Mr Justice A.N. Sen and Mr Justice R.N Misra—had not passed any such order. The West Bengal chief secretary, Mr S.V Krishnan, said the Supreme Court order looked "valid" but subsequent investigation revealed that the judges did not sign any acquittal order of Nilmoni Ghosh and another accused, Jagjit Singh. Nilmoni Ghosh has been rearrested—The Hindu (K. Vittal Shetty, Bangalore)

BOMBAY The Bombay Telephones have not learnt anything from the barrage of press criticism on its efficiency. Recently, the general manager of Bombay Telephones, who was unable to attend a press conference due to illness, tried to call Patrakar Sangh, the venue of the meet. All he got were wrong numbers—Free Press Journal (K. S. Mahalingam, Bombay)

NEW DELHI: Kishan Lal Kohli, a Bombay businessman, duped another businessman of Rs 50,000, courtesy wrong telephone connection He was however later arrested by the police Mr Kohli was staying in a hotel at Asaf Ali Road Mr Rakesh Kumar, a businessman of Karol Bagh, came to the hotel to make the payment of Rs 50,000 to Mr Jagjit Singh, who was also staying in the hotel Mr Rakesh Kumar did not know or recognise Jagjit Singh and was going to make the payment as part of a business deal following a call from his own relation in Bombay. When Rakesh Kumar asked the telephone operator to connect him to Jagjit Singh his telephone was wrongly connected to Kohli, who impersonated himself as Jagjit Singh and called Rakesh Kumar to his room. After a brief discussion he took Rs 50,000 from Rakesh Kumar—The Hindustan Times (R. Behera, Rourkela)

WITHOUT COMMENT

We have done in weeks what could not be done in 20 years—Rajiv Gandhi, on the Anti-Defection Bill

Elections in Mizoram are like going to church—clean and cheap—Lal Thanhawla, chief minister of Mizoram, in The Herald Review

Mizo people are very peace loving. There has never been a murder case for 20 years—Mizo leader Laldenga in Weekend Review

He (MGR) went to America as our chief minister, underwent treatment there as our chief minister, and has now returned to us as our chief minister—Tamil Nadu finance minister Nedunchezhyan in The Week

For development one has to be a bit rash. One has to be a little strong to get the development work done—Bansi Lal in The Sunday Observer

I used to eat puchkas sitting on the pavement and I'm prepared to do it still. It may not be what people in my position are expected to do—but I'm not a parrot in a gilded cage—Rasi Mody, TISCO chairman, in Gentleman

A serious 'art' film which only ten people want to watch and understand isn't cinema. It's a waste of celluloid—Bhagyaraj in The Illustrated Weekly of India

I've never been read much in India. Also, if you're not 100 per cent Indo-phile, you're automatically assumed to be Indo-phobe—Ruth Jhabvala in Asiaweek

If I was to be reborn as a man, I would like to be Amitabh Bachchan. And if I was to be reborn as a woman, I would like to be Lata Mangeshkar!—Jagjit Singh, ghazal singer, in The Sunday Observer

BEGINNING 24 FEBRUARY 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) The stars shine brightly on all financial deals finalised this week. Businessmen should not hesitate to take risks. This is an equally lucky period for lovers: you can materialise marriage plans. The domestic front will remain calm but avoid arguments with elders in the family. However, the phase is not good for professionals exercise tact while dealing with your superiors.
Good dates: 24, 26 and 28
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: South-east

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) This week you will come in contact with an influential person who will be of immense help to you in future. A journey undertaken during the middle of the week will prove financially profitable. On the professional front some of you may be promoted Businessmen will also make steady progress This is an excellent period for marriage negotiations. Watch your health closely.
Good dates: 25, 27 and 1
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: North-west

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) Financially, your position will improve this week but avoid extravagance. This is the ideal time to solve legal problems Businessmen and professionals will make steady headway The domestic front will provide you with all the energy to embark on new ventures. However, this is not a favourable phase for love and marriage negotiations Your health will also bother you
Good dates: 26, 28 and 2
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 8
Favourable direction: East

CANCER (15 July—14 August) This is a particularly lucky week for lawyers and politicians Those employed in the private sector will also be rewarded for their service. Businessmen are likely to bag lucrative deals. At home your relatives will be a source of joy. Friends will prove to be very helpful to you. This is the ideal time to get married. Your health will improve markedly.
Good dates: 24, 25 and 27
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: West

LEO (15 August—14 September) The stars are particularly favourable to businessmen this week. Push your efforts to the utmost and do not hesitate to undertake risky ventures. Things are not so bright for those in service: despite your honest efforts, you may incur the displeasure of your superiors. However, this is a good phase for matrimonial negotiations. Keep a sharp eye on your health and diet.
Good dates: 25, 26 and 28
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: North-west

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) Enemies will be active during this period: do not take even your close friends and relatives for granted Financially you will run into rough weather. Someone at home may suddenly fall sick adding to your financial burden. On the business front things are not so bleak go ahead with expansion plans. The period is also favourable for love and marriage negotiations.
Good dates: 26, 27 and 1
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 4
Favourable direction: South

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) If you are in love and willing to get married, this is the opportune time to do so. Prospects are also bright for businessmen and professionals. Artists and sportsmen are likely to win rare honours. The domestic front will remain inspiring. However, you should avoid unnecessary arguments with friends and relatives. Those above 40 should be careful about their health.
Good dates: 27, 28 and 2
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: South

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) Students are advised not to fritter away precious time: try to make full use of the opportunities that come your way. This period is extremely favourable for servicemen: a promotion cannot be ruled out. Businessmen will also find this phase lucky. The domestic front will remain calm. Your financial position will improve.
Good dates: 24, 27 and 1
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: North

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) This is a lucky week for all of you. Superiors will recognise the good services of professionals while businessmen will get an opportunity to expand their business. Speculative ventures will yield fruitful results. Financially, some of you are likely to gain money or property through an unexpected source. The period is also lucky for lovers and eligible bachelors.
Good dates: 25, 28 and 2
Lucky numbers: 5, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: North-east

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) This is an extremely lucky week for most of you. The domestic front will remain inspiring. Financially most of you will gain money or property through inheritance Sportsmen and artists will benefit from this favourable phase. A letter at the end of the week will bring pleasant surprise. However, this is not a good period for lovers. avoid adventurous plans.
Good dates: 26, 27 and 28
Lucky numbers: 1, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: West

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) This week you should avoid quarrelling with family members at home. Your children may be demanding but deal with them sympathetically. Your health will add to your worries. However, you will make steady progress on the professional front. This is also a good period for businessmen. Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans. A letter will bring good tidings
Good dates: 28, 1 and 2
Lucky numbers: 6, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: North-west

PISCES (15 March—14 April) An unexpected journey is in store for you this week. You will be busy with social engagements but do not overstrain yourself as this may have an adverse effect on your health. For professionals a promotion cannot be ruled out. Businessmen will also make steady headway. The period is also good for marriage negotiations. The home front will remain peaceful.
Good dates: 24, 25 and 26
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: South-east

For those born on the 25th, 26th or 27th of any month:

Most of you have a casual approach to life. You fail to utilise the opportunities that come your way. You rely too much on fate and are god-fearing by nature. Most of the problems that you face are your own creations but you tend to blame your fate for them. Constitutionally most of you are weak and this leads you to shun adventurous and challenging plans. Women born during this period are very popular and hardworking.

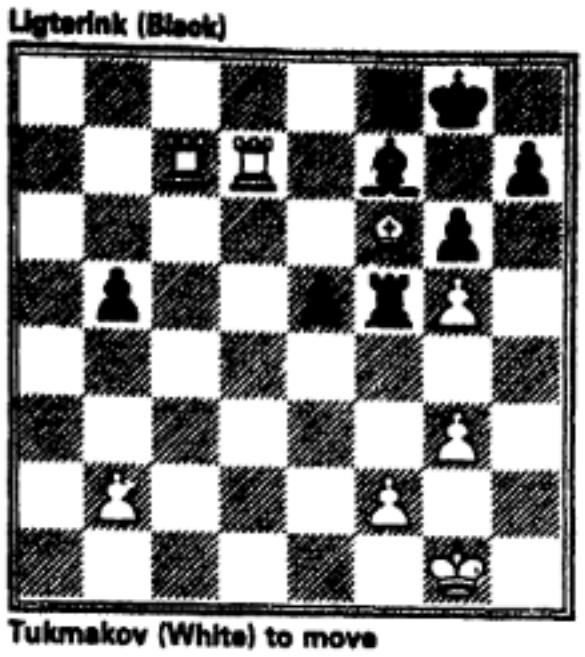
VARIETY

CHESS

A new game in an old variation can sometimes rekindle interest in abandoned theoretical territory. The following game for example could well be instrumental in sparking off some exciting battles in a line long considered just a bit too wild.

White: V. Tukmakov. Black: G. Ligterink. King's Indian Defence. Wijk aan Zee 1984.

1 P–Q4 N–KB3 2 N–KB3 P–KN3
3 P–KN3 B–N2 4 B–N2 0–0
5 P–B4 P–Q3 6 N–B3 N–B3
7 0–0 P–QR3 8 P–KR3



If at once 8 P–K4 B–N5 gives Black easy play.

8 . . . R–N1 9 P–K4 P–QN4
10 P–KB1?

An intriguing moment. This thrust is well known after a preliminary exchange of pawns, viz. 10 PxP PxP 11 P–K5 N–Q2 12 N–N5 PxP!! 13 BxN PxP 14 NxNP R–N3! 15 NxQP N–N1!! with better prospects for Black (!), so what difference does the omission of 10 PxP make? My guess is 10 . . . N–Q2 11 P–K6!? PxP 12 P–Q5 PxP 13 PxP! (13 QxP+? K–R1 14 QxN B–N2!) followed by 14 N–Q4 with dangerous compensation for the pawn. Ligterink is not tortured by curiosity.

10 . . . PxKP 11 PxKP QxQ

Ligterink (Black)

Tukmakov (White) to move

12 RxQ N–Q2 13 P–K6! PxKP
14 PxP PxP 15 B–B4

The dust momentarily settles with White holding an obvious initiative for his half-pawn investment. Tukmakov is a wonderfully fluent player of such positions.

15 . . . P–K4 16 B–K3 N–B3
17 QR–B1 B–Q2 18 N–Q5 NxN
19 RxN B–K1

Sad necessity, 19 . . . B–K3 failing to 20 N–N5. Black's position is becoming a horrible jumble.

20 N–N5 N–N5 21 R(5)–Q1 P–B3
22 B–B5 N–Q4 23 BxN+

Good judgement and calculation, leading by force to a winning endgame.

23 . . . PxB 24 BxP B–R3

The main point of White's play was 24 . . . R–B4 25 P–KN4 R–B5 26 N–K6 R–B2 27 B–Q6 and if 27 . . . R–N3 28 R–B8!

25 P–KR4 BxN 26 PxB

The opposite bishops offer no salvation. The activity of White's forces is overwhelming.

26 . . . R–B4 27 RxP B–B2
28 R–Q7 BxRP 29 B–B6 B–B2
30 R(1)–B7 R–KB1 DIAGRAM
31 P–B4!

Displaying an evil sense of humour. If 31 . . . PxP 32 P–KN4 R–Q4 33 RxR BxR 34 R–N7+ etc.

31 . . . P–R3 32 BxP Resigns.

After 32 . . . PxP 33 P–KN4 RxP 34 BxR PxB 35 P–N5 Black is in a hopeless state.

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE

There is a special quality about the bridge played in the London Business Houses League. Just glance at the East hand below. What result would you anticipate on his cards? Perhaps, on a lucky day, a small penalty against Four Hearts or Four Spades. No, it was 1700 from Five Clubs doubled!

Dealer North E-W vulnerable

	♠ Q 8 ♥ K ♦ Q 10 9 7 6 2 ♣ K 7 4 2
♠ A K J ♥ A Q J 9 ♦ A ♣ A Q J 6 3	N W E S	♠ 10 9 7 6 2 ♥ 8 7 6 4 2 ♦ J 8 4 ♣ —
	♠ 6 4 3 ♥ 10 5 3 ♦ K 6 3 ♣ 10 9 8 6

At the first table there were two passes and South then tried a psychic One Club. The bidding continued:

South	West	North	East
—	—	No	No
1♠	dble	2NT(1)	No
3♣	dble	No	3♥(2)
No	4♥(3)	5♣(4)	No
No	dble	No	No
No

(1) Conventionally showing the values for a double raise in clubs.

(2) Three Spades would be more natural.
(3) A little dull, but perhaps he had played against . . .
(4) . . . this opponent before.

East-West collected 1700. At the other table:

South	West	North	East
—	—	No	No
1♥	2♥	3♦(1)	No
No	4♣	4♦(2)	4♥
No	4NT	No	5♣
No	5NT	No	6♣
No	6♠	all pass

(1) Very unsound when you know that your side is outgunned.
(2) Still there, however!

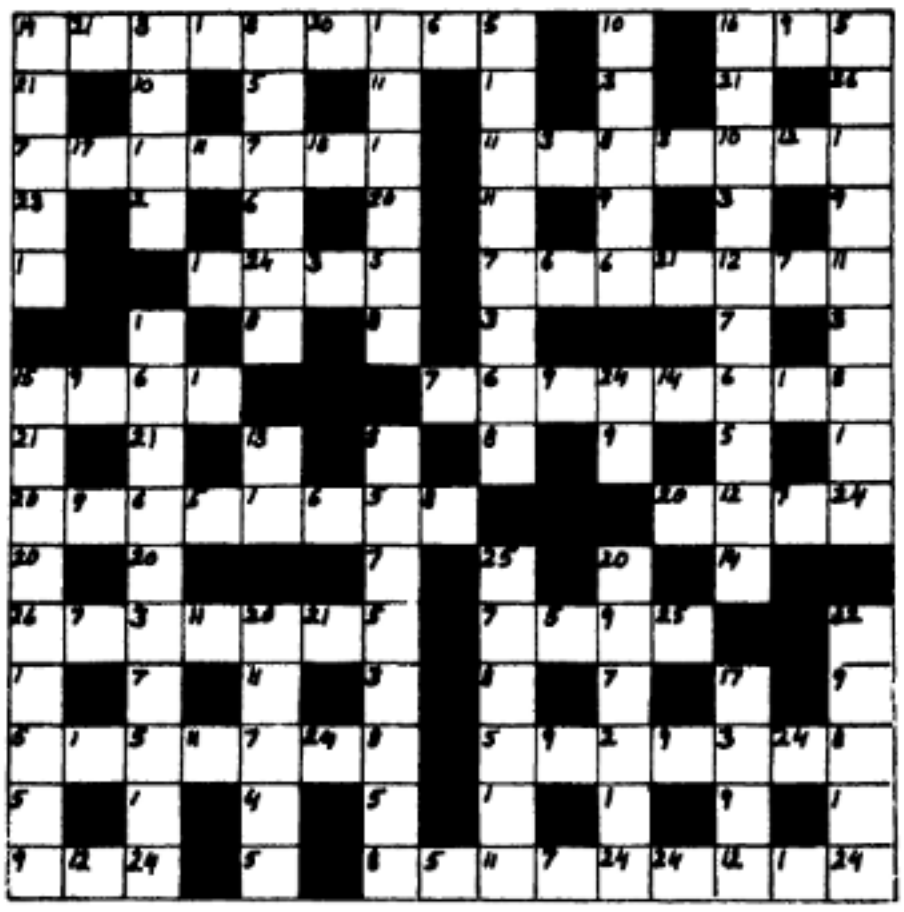
East managed to go one down for a swing of 1800, an unusual number.

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. The main waterway of which European city is called the Grand Canal?
2. What are skerries?
3. Which capital city of the world is named after a British Prime Minister and the victor of a famous battle?
4. To whom is the authorised version of the Bible dedicated to?
5. What is the thermal barrier in aircraft construction?
6. Name the only mammal in the animal kingdom which flies?
7. In India it is the Param Vir Chakra, in England it is the Victoria Cross. What is the French military cross called?
8. Name the nine headed serpant in Greek mythology which grew two heads every time one head was cut off
9. Gold Coast is the former name for which African nation?
10. Indian test cricketer Ravi Shastri recently equalled a world record by hitting six sixers in a first-class match. Who was the bowler?
11. The Arc de Triomphe was built to celebrate what events in history?
12. In medical terminology, what is acute coryza?



ANSWERS

1. Venice
2. Rocky islets just off the Norwegian coast which protects the mainland from the cold Arctic winds.
3. Wellington in New Zealand.
4. James I of England, also known as James VI of Scotland.
5. It is the maximum heat, (generated by friction when the aircraft moves through the atmosphere,) an aircraft can stand.
6. The bat.
7. The Croix de Guerre.
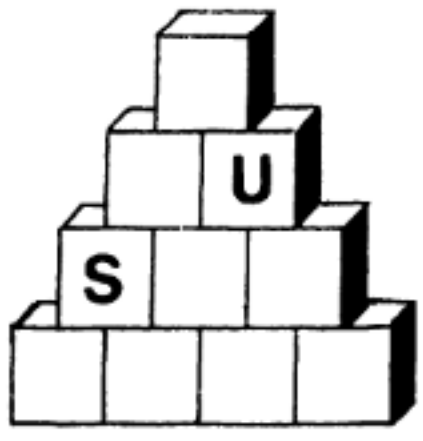
8. The hydra.
9. Ghana.
10. Tilak Raj.
11. The military victories of Napoleon Bonaparte.
12. The common cold.

TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

Cryptocross



REFERENCE GRID

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13
				T				O

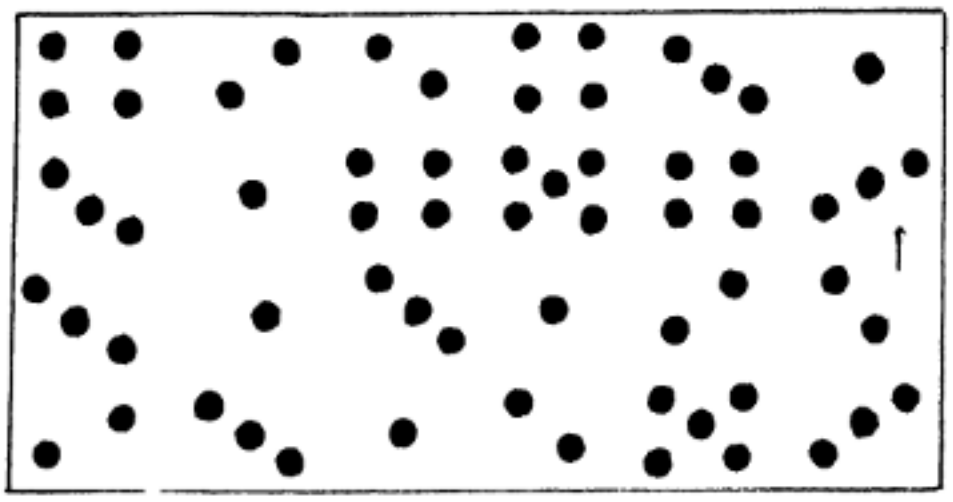
14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26
						C

Each number in this grid represents a letter. The same number always stands for the same letter. Three letters have been given to you in the reference grid to help you make a start. Can you now substitute the rest and complete the grid?

Blockbuster

C,T,T,L,L,R,A,U,S,E

Fill in the ten letters given above into the squares of the blank pyramid so that these form eight four-letter words reading downwards.



Witsharpener

By a strange coincidence, five men living in adjoining houses on Nehru Road are all very keen gardeners. But they specialise in growing a different flower and vegetable each, for which they always win a prize at the local flower show. The numbers of their houses are 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 and they grow between them, roses, nasturtiums, chrysanthemums, dahlias and gladioli, and cabbages, peas, radish, cauliflowers and lettuce. We know that:

1. The man who grows gladioli also grows cabbages and he does not live at no. 1 Nehru Road.
2. Girish is the chrysanthemum expert.
3. Rajiv, who does not grow dahlias lives at No. 5.
4. Indranil does not live at no. 4 where roses are grown.
5. Cauliflowers are grown at no. 2.
6. Bahadur wins a prize each year for his radish.
7. The number of the house where Samir lives is three less than the house of the person who grows peas.

Can you work out the number of the house in which each man stays and indicate in which flower and vegetable he specialises?

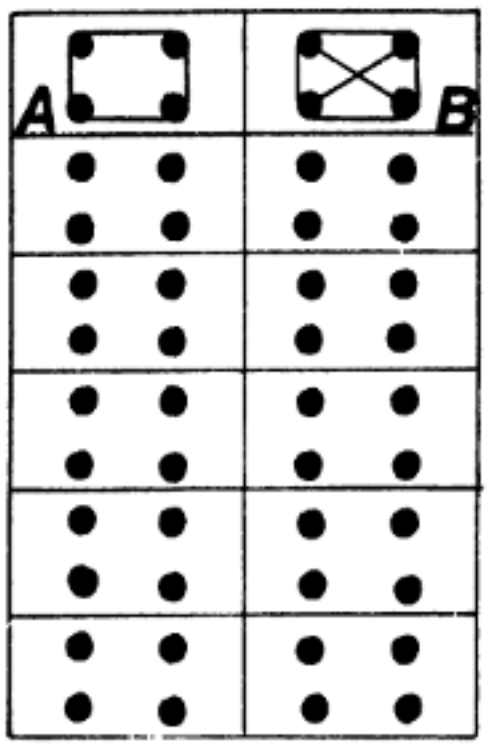
Figure it Out

Here is a box of scrumptious chocolates. Can you divide them into eight lots of three boxes, each set of three containing the identical number of chocolates?

What's in a Word?

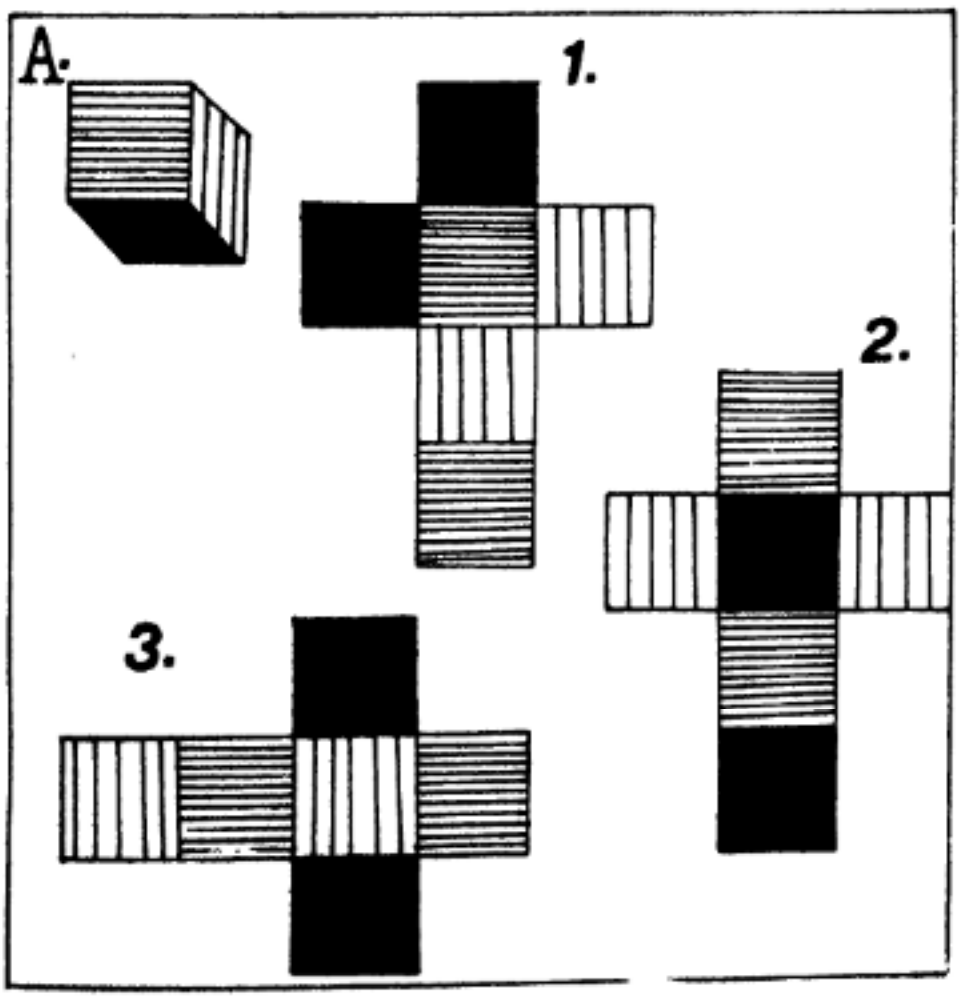
How good is your vocabulary? Without looking at a dictionary, can you match up the following list of words with the correct description?

1. DACHA	A. A tropical fever
2. DAPSONE	B. To lynch
3. DARIOLE	C. A Russian country house
4. DENGUE	D. Harsh settlement
5. DIKTAT	E. A drug used for leprosy
6. DEWITT	F. A shell of pastry



Scrambles

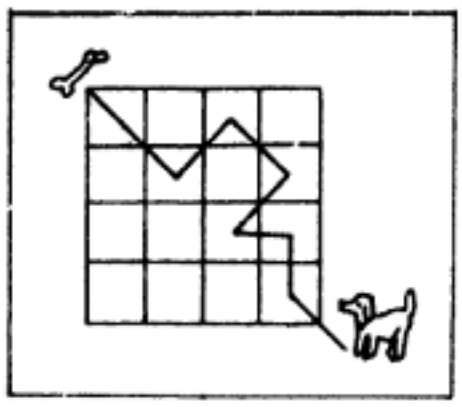
Using the letters of ASPEL, make suitable words to fill in the blanks and complete the sentence.



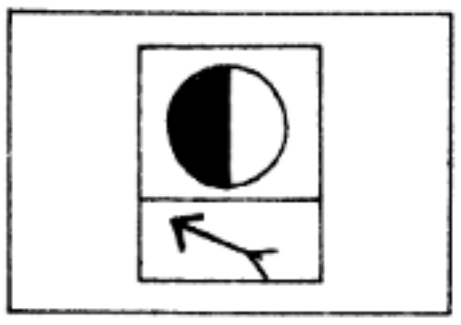
When Mr ASPEL has a —, he behaves in an extraordinary manner. He rushes into the garden and — around to the accompaniment of — of laughter, kicking at each and every — of stone and tearing off the — from each flower, with all his wife's — to control himself falling on deaf ears.

Mindbender

You can see in the picture given below how four dots have been joined by 4 lines (A) and 6 lines (B). Can you now find ten other ways of joining remianing groups of dots using 5, 4 and 3 lines?



Shape Sleuth



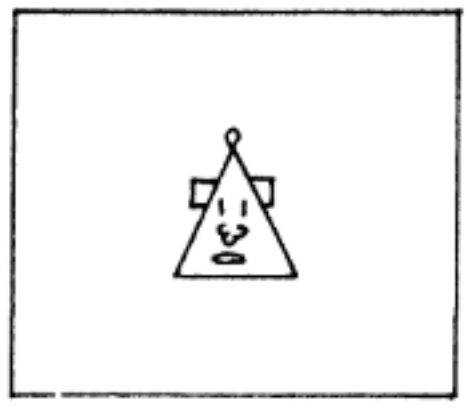
Which shape will make a cube which is identical to cube A?

Solutions to last week's Teasers

Mindbender:

Mindbender:

Face Facts:



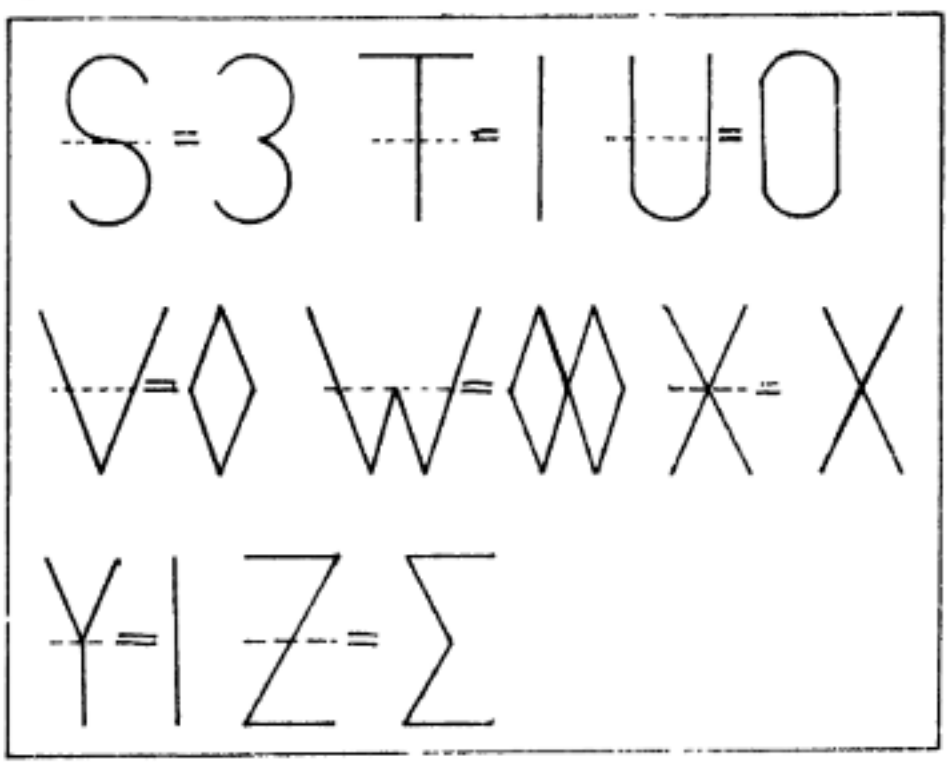


Figure it Out: 1—B, 2—C, 3—A

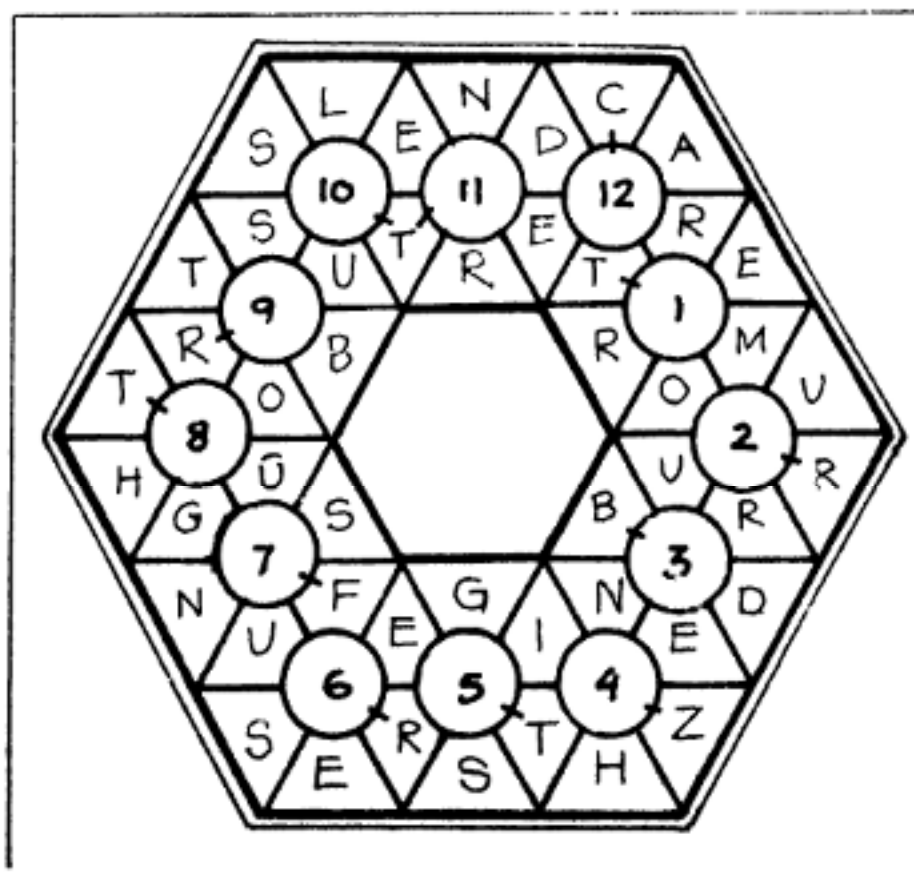
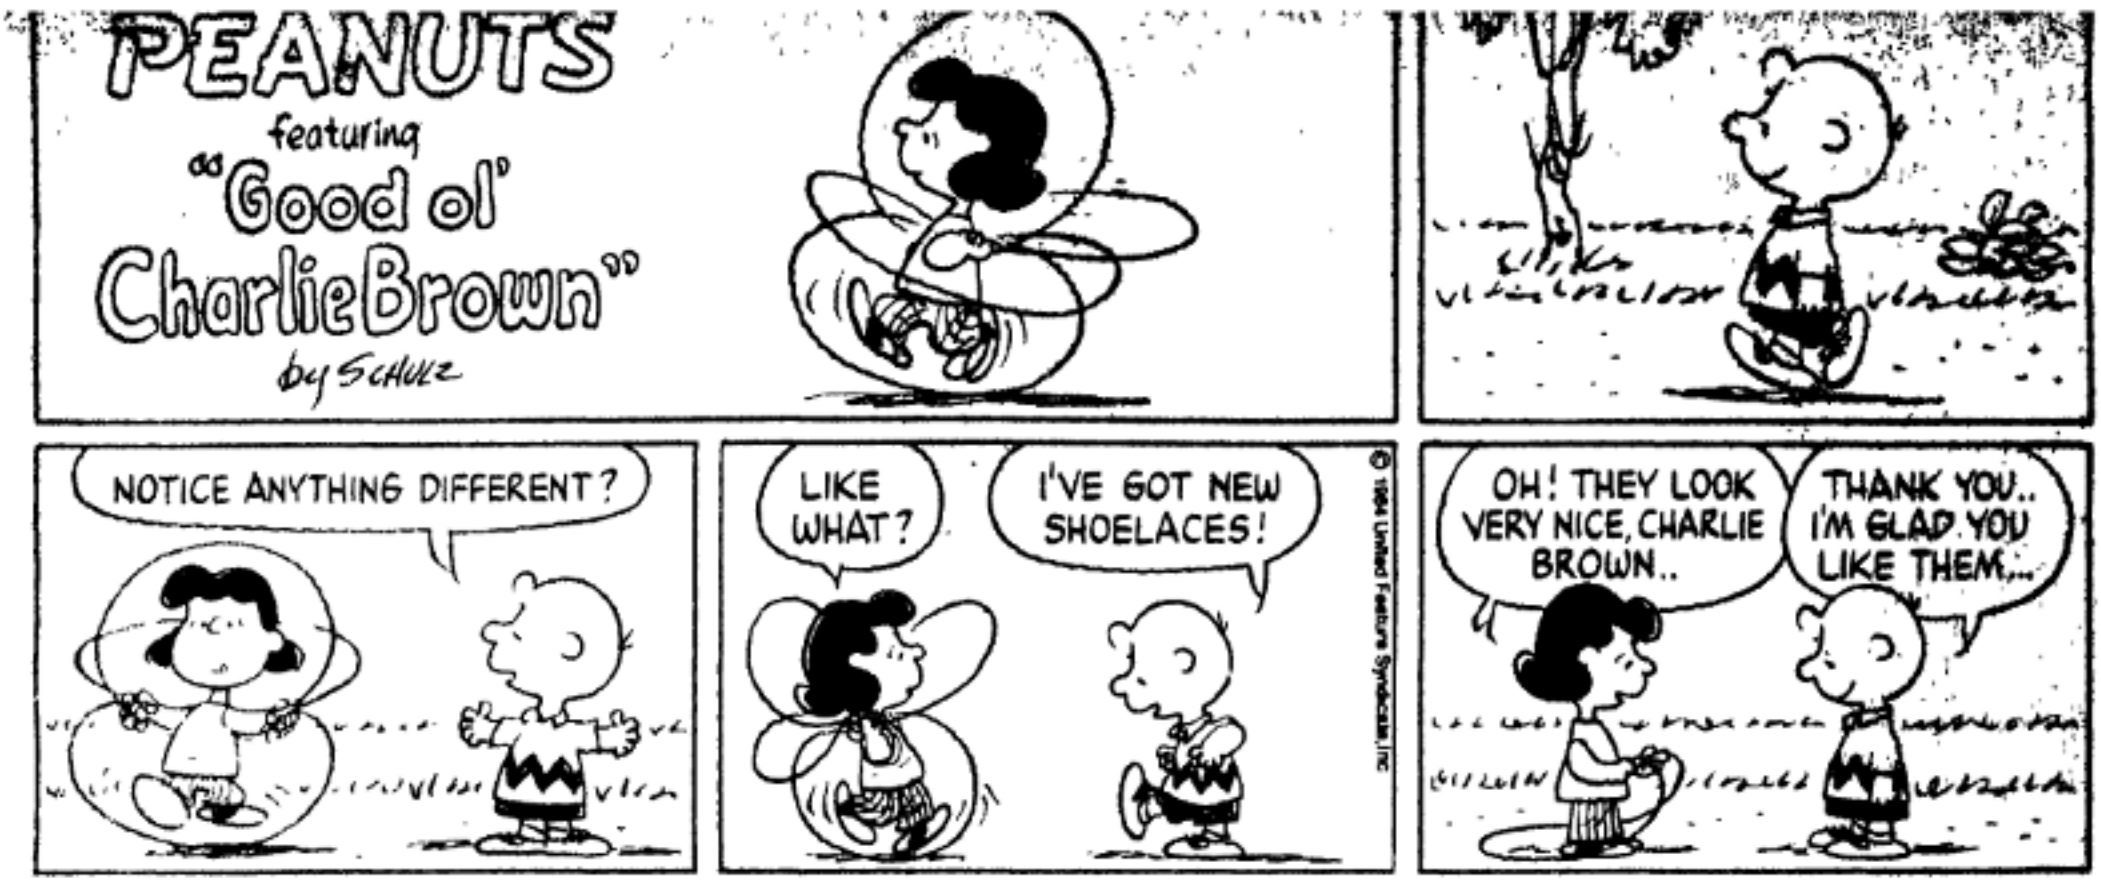


Quick Think: 6009



Eye Wash: The odd one out is no. 5

Quizzbizz:

Wordplay:

SCIENCE

Scanning the Tumour

A new way of spotting breast cancer—based on scanning with a light beam instead of ultrasound or x-rays—could promise a screening method that is cheap and consistent, and, most important of all, able to detect malignancies at an early stage.

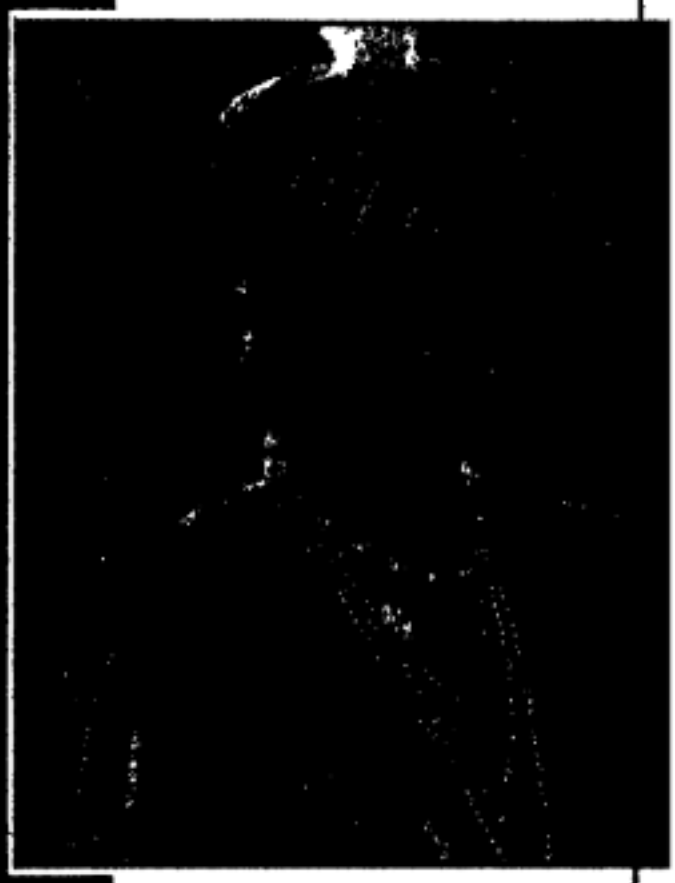
Nine out of every ten women discover their own malignancies by touch or by sight. But doctors fear, with good reason, that a tumour large enough to be felt or seen has gone too far to be curable. Yet, found early, breast cancer can be cured about 85 per cent of the time. Found at stage two (of four medically recognised stages), it is cured in just 40 per cent of all cases. The final two stages are more often fatal. So, the problem is not simply to find the cancer, but to find it at its origin.

The new screening method is the result of work done by a company called Spectrascan in South Windsor, Connecticut, on an instrument that views the interior of the breast as a child with a flashlight might study the anatomy of its hand. An intensive lightsource is directed to six areas on the breast, and the emerging rays are measured according to their wavelengths and brilliance. Lightscanning locates cancers because malignant tumours absorb and transmit light differently from other tissue within the breast.

The device refines a technique first suggested in 1929 by Max Cutler who worked basically with a flashlight. The new machine, called Lite Scan, is a good deal more complex. It uses alternating bursts of infrared and red light which are shone through the breast. An infrared sensitive video camera records the invisible rays as they emerge, then passes its picture to a computer and colour encoder for analysis, and thence to a television screen for display.

Recent studies of 2,000 women by Mr Christopher Merrit, a radiologist at the Ochsner Medical Clinic in New Orleans, indicate that a high ratio of infrared to red light transmission denotes a potential cancer. The television monitor shows such an area as a bright blue patch. The picture can also be displayed in black and white to measure luminescence. For reasons yet to be grasped, malignant tumours absorb light to a greater degree than all other substances within the breast. Cysts filled with clear fluid, fat and mammary glands all permit more light through. The dark contrast of the tumour appears clearly on the screen.

For the present, lightscanning will be treated as a complement to x-rays and ultrasound. X-raying continues to be the leading technique; it finds about 85 per cent of all cancers.



The x-ray method provides inaccurate information on the dense breasts of younger women. It misses many cancers; and even diagnoses some that do not exist, causing unnecessary surgery. Furthermore, young women with a family history of breast cancer—who are therefore considered high risks themselves—undergo years of x-ray screening. This means frequent exposure to the ionising radiation that can stimulate the very disease it is designed to eliminate.

By arrangement with The Economist

...ing
...such
...re signs for
...They also re-
...each other to
...and that is why
...penned in so
...ples. "That
...such a fantastic
...don't know why
she has to play second fiddle to an actor like Raj Babbar. She is now doing second-rate roles in third-rate films. Love is alright but love and career are two different things." Smita's close friend who wants to go unnamed remarked. But the truth about their "beautiful relationship" is still a secret.

The only positive outcome of the film which Simi tried to make in America with money from two Indians settled there, is that it brought Marc Zuber and Anooradha close together. The film overshot its budget and production has been stalled but the Zuber-Anooradha love affair shows no signs of stalling. The artistes who were involved in the film have started work elsewhere and Simi is desperately running hither and thither. The death knell for the film, it seems, will soon be sounded. But for Marc Zuber and Anooradha it might soon be wedding bells.

If all actors had understanding wives like Anil Kapoor's Sumita, then their domestic lives would have been more peaceful for them. Anil has been teamed with almost all the young sexy heroines and the gossip press has written everything to project him as a man of many women. The girls linked with him include Meenakshi Sheshadri and Sridevi but Sumita takes all these stories with "bags full of salt because I know my husband." Is Anil Kapoor laughing behind poor Sumita's back?

Sensuous Sen from Calcutta is now like the moon paled by clouds. She is sick and tired of all she did to promote herself, all the exposure of her body she resorted to in order to get more exposure in the gossip press. Moon Moon Sen now wants to concentrate on her career.

...'s group, and (inset) Anil Kapoor: many women?

DELHI DIARY

Arun Versus Arun

Arun Nehru

Arun Singh

Of the two Aruns around Rajiv Gandhi, Arun Nehru seems to have fallen back in the race. Parliamentary secretary Arun Singh is way ahead. In the tickets distribution for the Assembly elections, Arun Nehru, who was the supremo during the Lok Sabha polls, had to take a virtual backseat. His senior in the ministry, finance minister V.P. Singh, had a greater say in Uttar Pradesh matters this time. He, however, is not being totally ignored. When the king of Bhutan came to the capital in early February, Arun Kumar Nehru was made his minister-in-waiting. This is not a weighty job. For instance, when a foreign dignitary goes to meet the Prime Minister, the minister-in-waiting is literally made to wait in the ante-room, while the dignitaries talk to each other. Another development on the Arun Nehru-Arun Singh front has been that being the parliamentary secretary, Arun Singh meets the PM regularly. As minister of state for power, with a cabinet minister above him, Arun Nehru's official engagements do not include frequent meetings with Rajiv Gandhi. And of late the Prime Minister's office has been insisting that nobody should meet the PM without prior appointment and ministers of state are given appointments only if there is some genuine work and when the cabinet minister authorises him to discuss something with the PM.

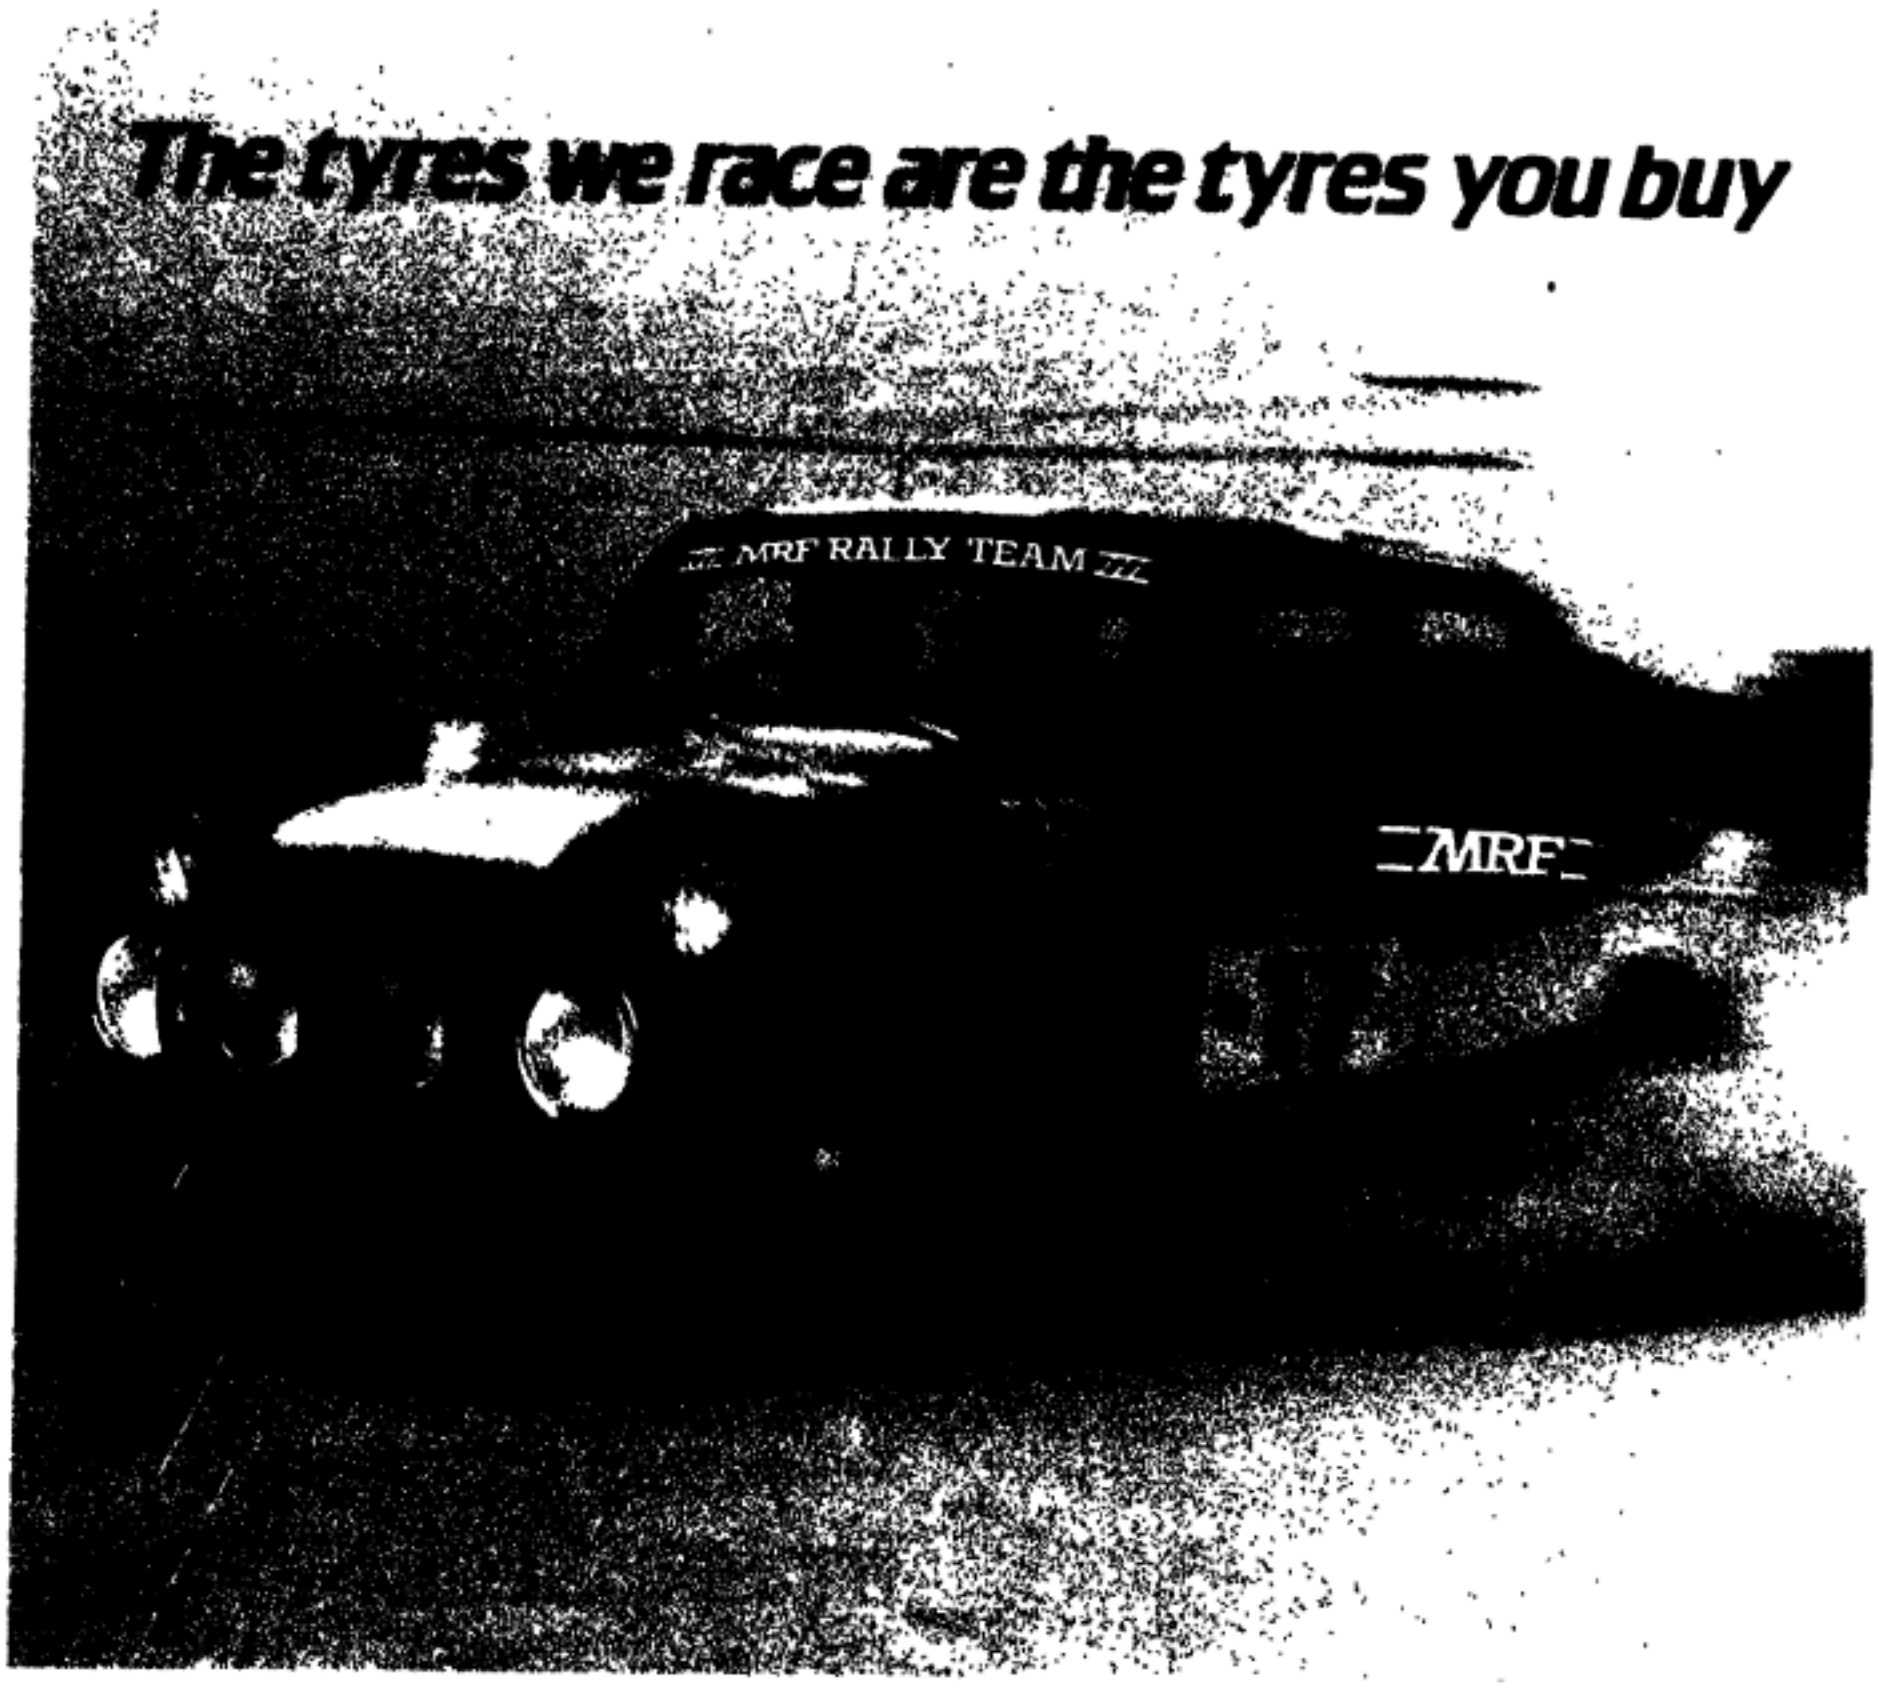
Unrecognised

Rarely do hijackers surrender without preconditions. Even more rare are instances of hijackers being extradited to the country where the crime was committed, after the hijacking is over. In the case of Indian Airlines Boeing 737 which was hijacked to Dubai via Pakistan in August last year, both happened. The person whose diplomatic skills brought about this unprecedented surrender and extradition was Romesh Bhandari, the new foreign secretary, who was then one of the secretaries in the ministry of external affairs. But he was not among the senior government officers who received awards on the Republic Day. Three secretaries to the government have been given Padma Bhushans and Padma Shri awards this year. Romesh Bhandari's name too had been considered. But someone in the foreign office hierarchy canvassed against him. Thus an unprecedented effort went unrecognised.

Audit Blues?

Mahesh Chandra Sarin, who has proceeded on leave from the post of defence production secretary, would not have been in his present state but for a major departure in procedure made last year. The post of the comptroller and auditor-general of India (CAG) has been a post traditionally manned by a member of the Indian Audit and Accounts Service (IAAS). Last year, when the post fell vacant, M.C. Sarin was the seniormost IAAS officer and Mrs Indira Gandhi had almost cleared him for being the CAG. But at the last moment, departing from past practice, the then union home secretary, T.N. Chaturvedi, was made the CAG. Before him no civil servant, including those of the prestigious ICS, had held this post. Why was the top audit post given to an IAS bureaucrat and not a seasoned auditor? The grapevine has it that with the accounts of the Asiad-82 coming up for audit, mere experience in the audit and accounts service was not found sufficient. Hence the rejection of M.C. Sarin, who, like his illustrious brother H.C. Sarin, ICS (presently India's ambassador to Nepal) had a clean record.

Majestic House



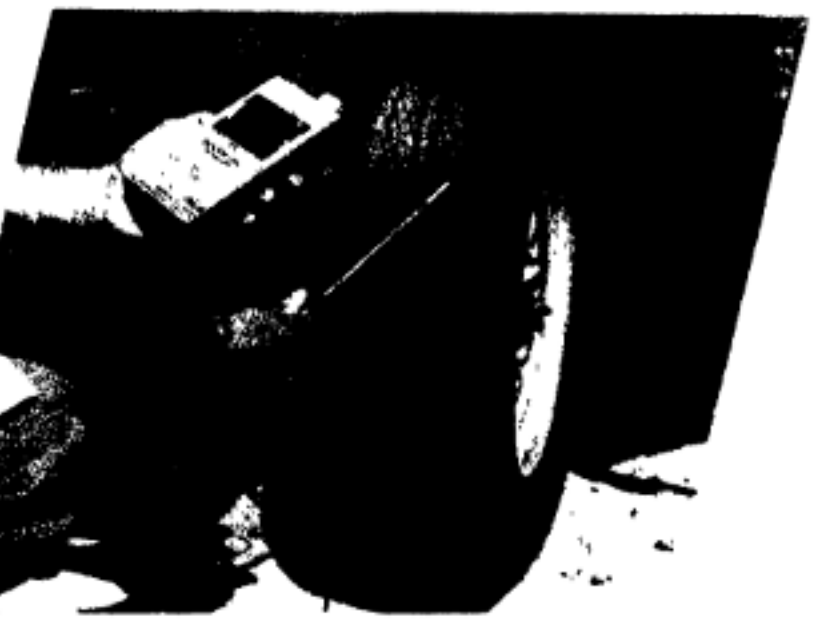
The houses in the Asian Games village were majestically built. Now that they are offered for sale, many public sector companies have opted to buy them, for accommodating their top executives. The State Trading Corporation (STC) too had acquired a house in the "village." But this will be no ordinary house. Renovation running into lakhs of rupees is being undertaken: the entire flooring may be of marble soon, it is learnt. Even when the two houses on Race Course Road were renovated recently for shifting the PM's residence, marble flooring was not thought of. Someone in the STC certainly has a better idea of living.

Trusted Foreigners?

Crude are the ways of the Indian Oil Corporation (IOC). In its export and import deals, it trusts foreigners while ignoring Indians. Nearly Rs 8,000 crores worth of imports and exports are being undertaken annually these days. The refineries in India are not properly equipped yet to process Bombay High crude. So this is exported. Apart from the crude oil, the imports include kerosene, diesel, naptha and furnace oil. Even at the going rate of a minimum of six per cent commission the amount involved as kickbacks alone could be anywhere near Rs 500 crores. Only foreigners are being entrusted with these transactions, with tenders not being given to Indians at all. The advantage of this arrangement is that corruption, if any, is done abroad. The shores of India are not affected by the kickbacks of these deals.

D.E. Nizamuddin

The tyres we race are the tyres you buy



It's true! The very same tyres that you use on city-roads, are repeatedly tested by MRF on race and rally tracks around the country

There's a simple reason why. On a race-track a tyre is subjected to severe torture and strain. In just six hours on the track, a tyre goes through more than half its life. Something that would take more than a year on a city road.

Which means we get our test results that much faster. And you get an improved product that much quicker.

It's a testing technique developed by our collaborators B F Goodrich of the USA, people who build tyres for the NASA Space Shuttle Programme.

And since MRF tests city-tyres on the race-track, you can be sure that when we win, you too are winning. With tyres that are setting new standards for grip, handling, mileage, durability and sheer staying power.

At the end of the race, it's over to the MRF technicians. Testing for heat build-up in a tyre with an electronic pyrometer.

The race-track is our laboratory.

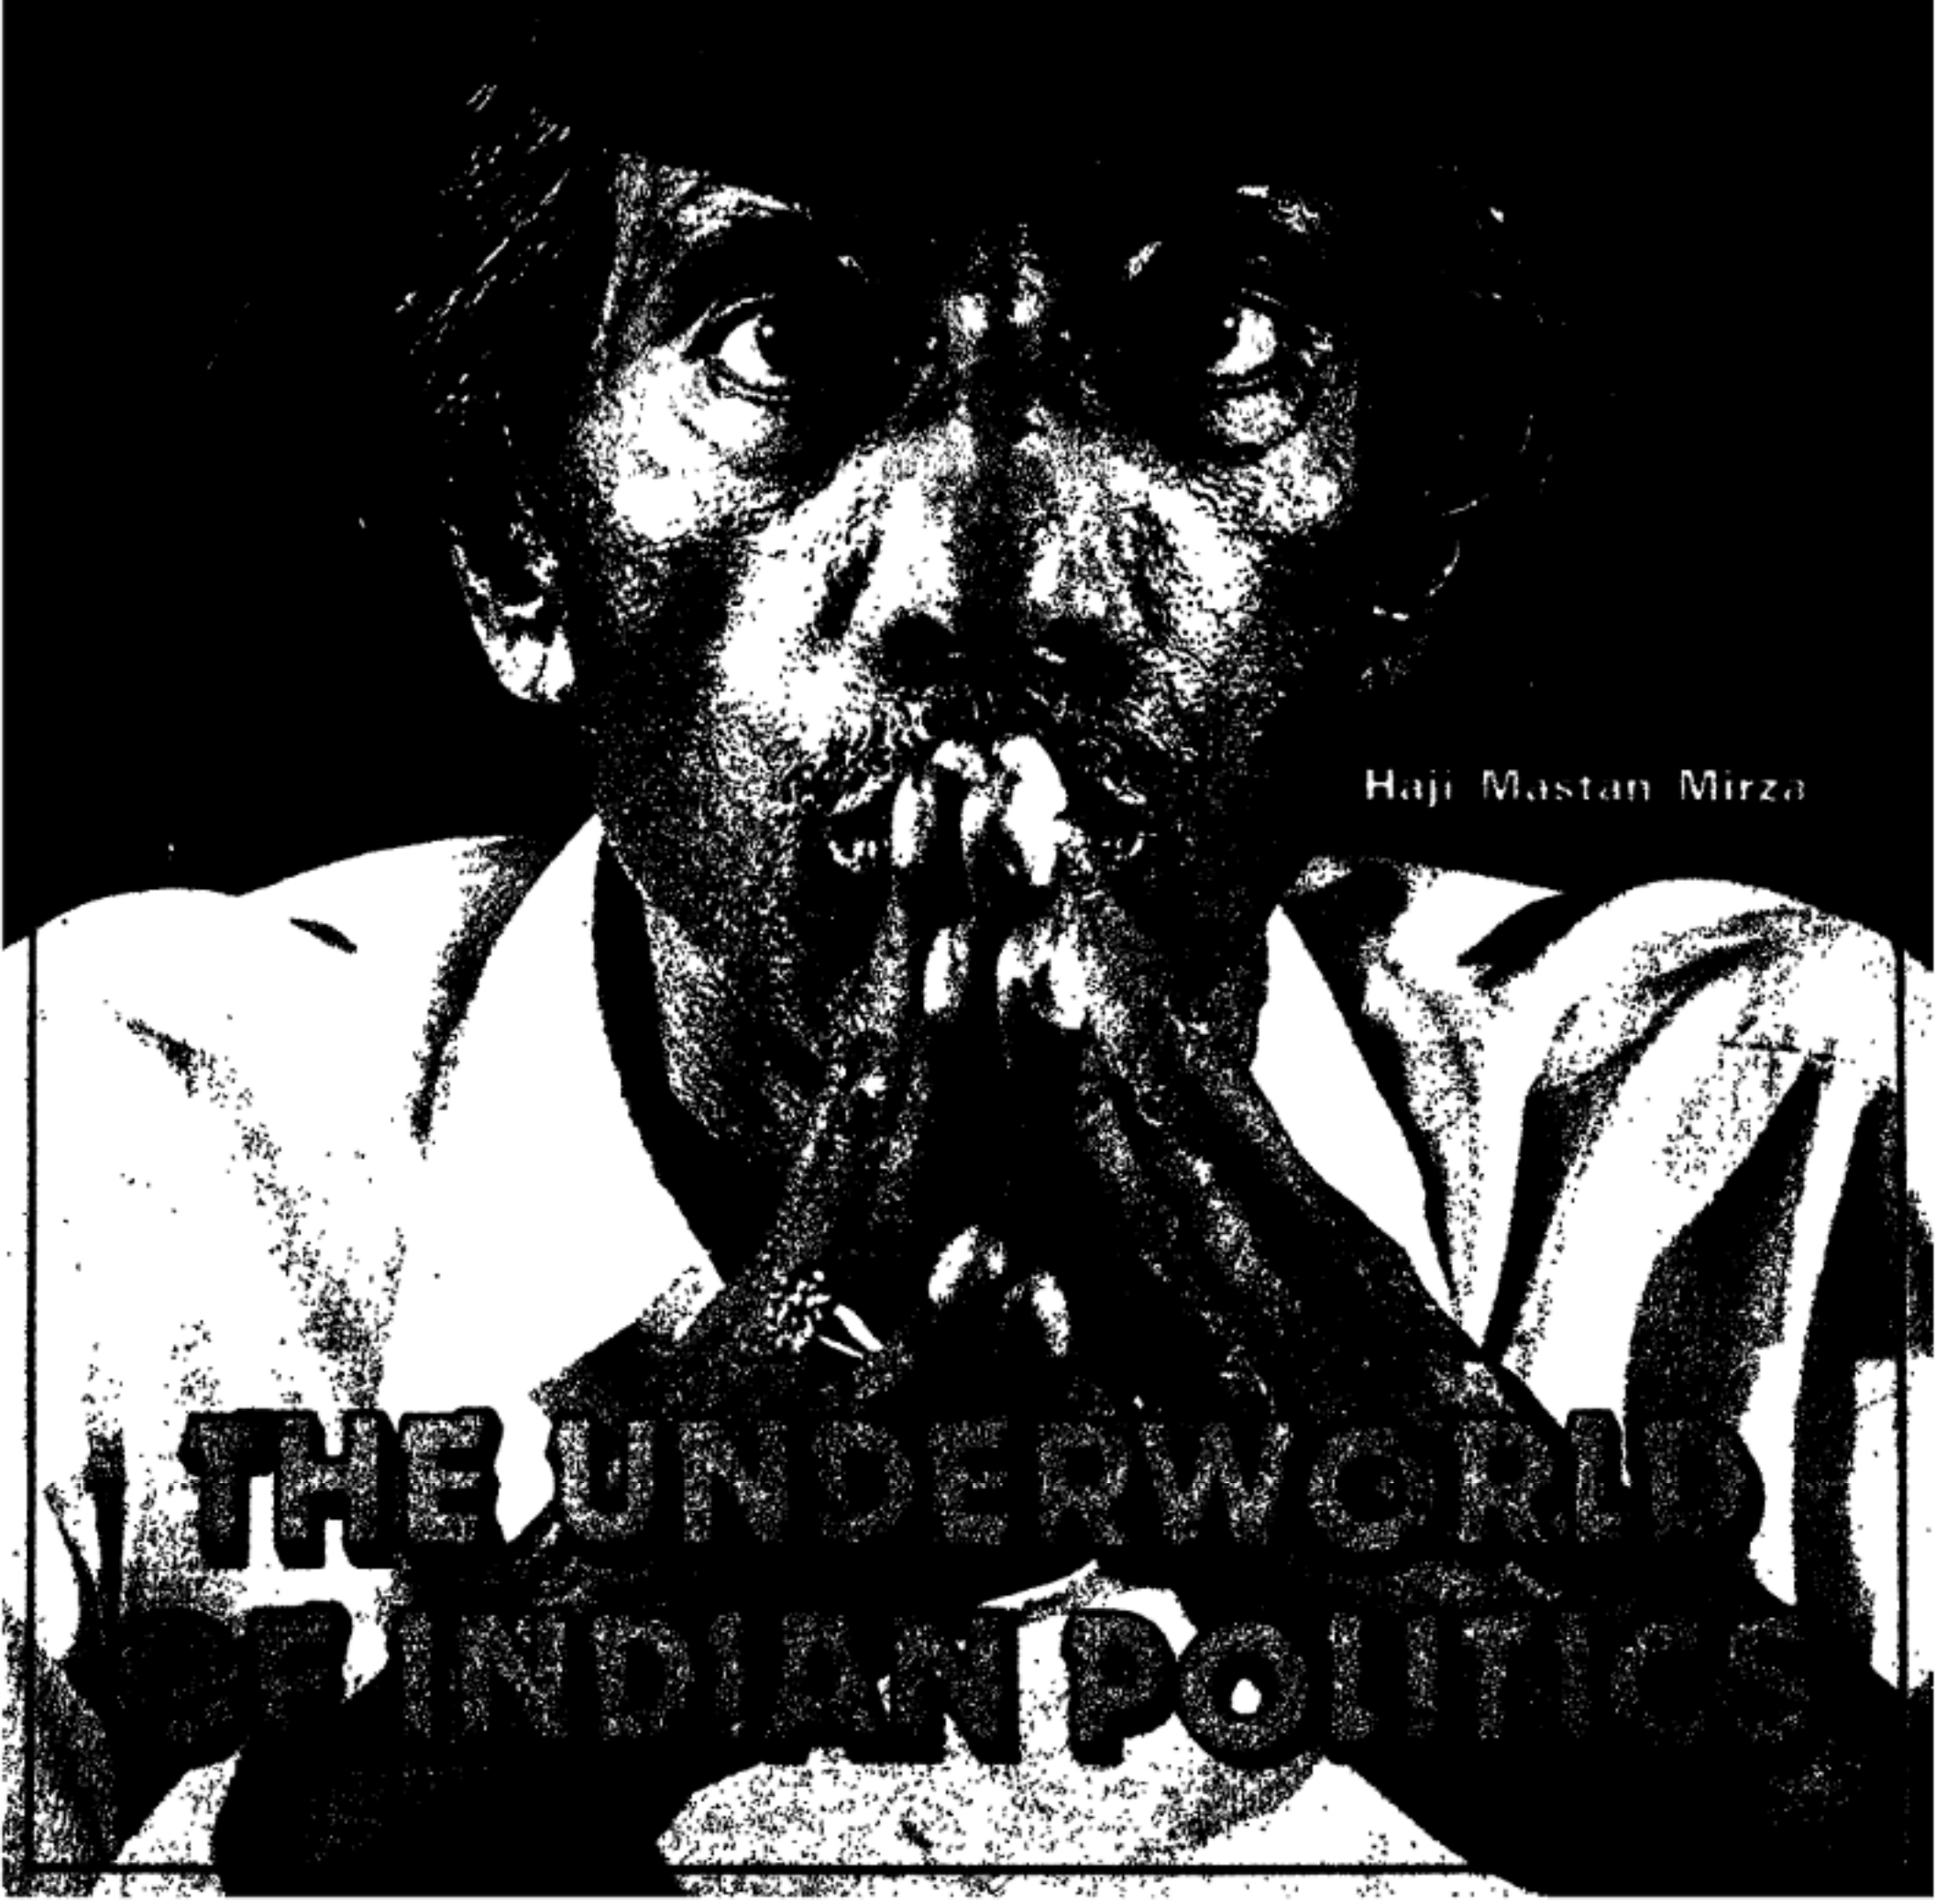
MRF TYRES

Tyres with Muscle

MRF Tyres are made in technical collaboration with B F Goodrich Company of U.S.A.

LINTASIM-MRF-NCT-16a

Sunday Weekly 24 February 1985. Regd. No. WB/CC/256/TN/MS(C)376 MH-By-South-680.



THE SUITING RANGE FROM RAYMOND'S

MARCH 1985 ■ AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION ■ RS 4.00

Investigation: Crime and Politics

SUNDAY

Made for each other

Wills Filter set the filter trend in cigarettes long years ago. Today it's still the finest. In taste, in satisfaction. Hand-picked virginia tobaccos married to an efficient filter make it so. Millions of smokers have discovered it, then stayed with it.

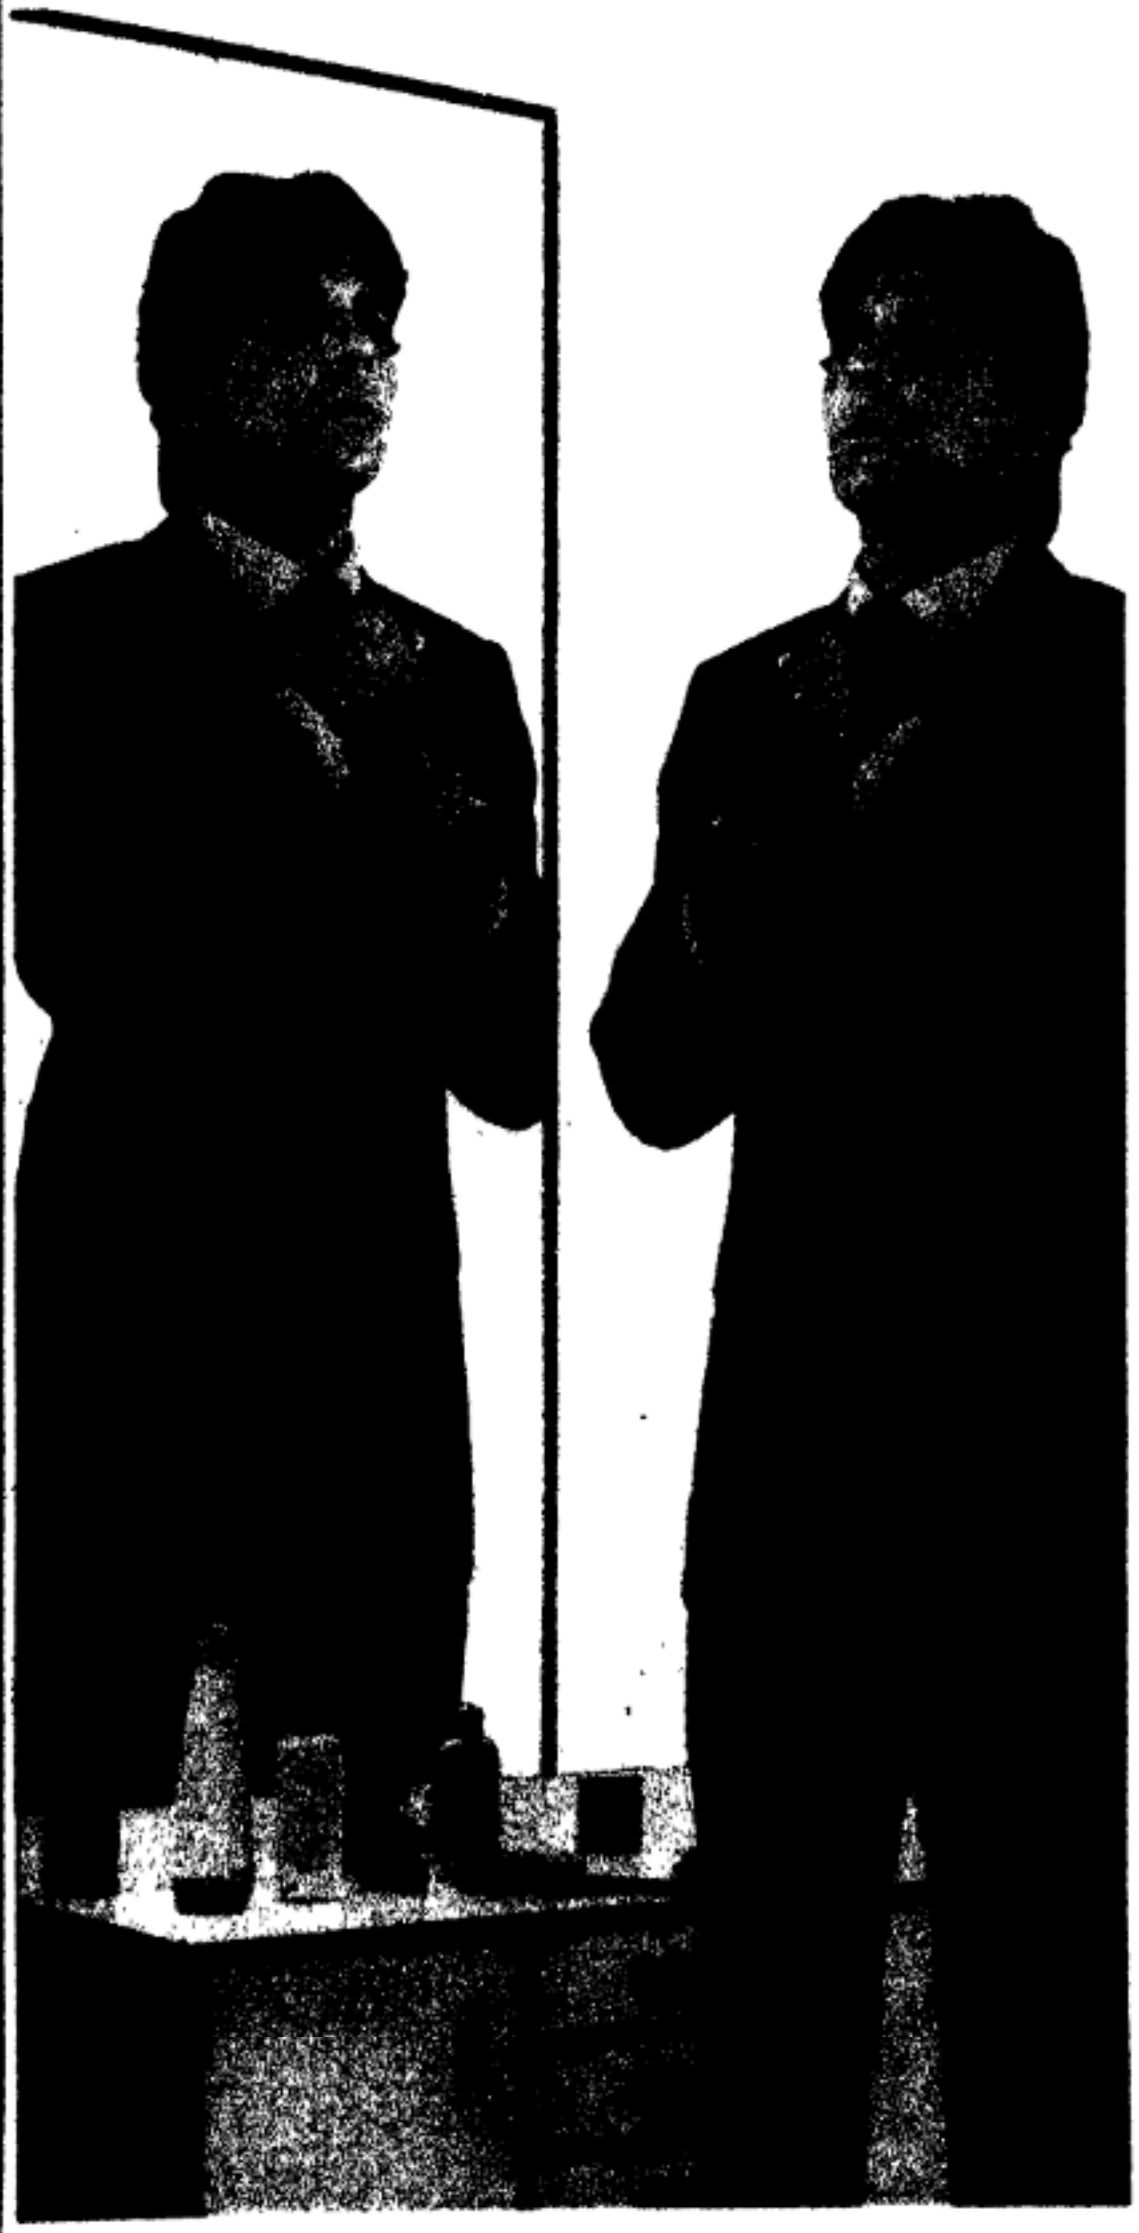
WILLS FILTER

Filter and tobacco perfectly matched

WILLS

FILTER TIPPED

CIGARETTE SMOKING IS HAZARDOUS TO HEALTH



WF-5470

UTORY WARNING
GARETTE SMOKING IS

HINDON RIVER MILLS

DCM SILK MILLS

Catch your true reflection in these live, vibrant fashions.

Rich textures, subtle shades. In a wide range to complement your every mood. Woven on sophisticated, fully automated machines, stamped with the excellence of intensive R&D and indeed recommended by top fashion designers. An exclusive collection brought to you through India's most enlightened and largest chain of showrooms and retailers.

Suiting. Shirting.
Dress Materials.
Sarees.

HINDON RIVER MILLS

DCM
SILK MILLS

Two of India's most sophisticated textile mills.

Available at more than 500 exclusive DCM Retail Stores and other leading textile stores.

Take a coffee break!

Amul

introduces coffee

MILK CHOCOLATE

Soft and creamy like Swiss chocolates ...

its creaminess sealed in silver foil ...

and foil-board carton to keep it fresh.

3—9 MARCH 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12□ ISSUE 17□ RS 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

The Underworld of Indian Politics

A large number of Congress(I) and opposition candidates contesting the Assembly elections have criminal records. Sankarshan Thakur visited Bihar and Uttar Pradesh to take a look at the murky side of Indian politics. Plus Olga Tellis investigates into the criminal-politician nexus in Bombay.

'Politics Mein Sab Chor Hain'

An exclusive interview with Haji Mastan by Dhiren Bhagat

SUNDAY SPECIAL 48

A Haven for Smuggling

On 6 February the customs authorities intercepted a mechanised sailing vessel,Al Saras, and three other vessels at the Mandvi port in Kutch and recovered contraband goods worth Rs 4.5 crores. It was the biggest-ever haul in recent years. A report from Tushar Bhatt.

Page 14

Page 43

SPECIAL REPORT 32

Assembly Line

SUNDAY correspondents analyse the pre-poll scene in the states where Assembly elections will be held on 2 and 5 March.

SPECIAL REPORT 43

Sri Lanka's Unwanted Tamils

Ever since the outbreak of the ethnic riots in Sri Lanka, the exodus of Sri Lankan Tamil families to India continues unabated. Anita Pratap reports from the Mandapam refugee camp near Rameshwaram on the plight of the refugee families and the steps taken by the Indian authorities to meet this influx.

COMMENT

Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 9

Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Delhi Diary 78

PUNCHLINE/ABU

Cover: Courtesy Imprint

Editor M.J Akbar

Associate Editor Tuoshar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Binoo K John Henry Jacob
Rajiv Bagchi Srinjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi:
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow:
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay.
Olga Tellis
Bangalore:
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad:
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati:
Seema Guha
Srinagar.
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex-Delhi

Tomorrow begins here

Computers from BPL. For better information processing.

They are being used increasingly, even for unconventional applications...

In the engineering entrance exams for instance. Where the computer evaluates answer papers, prints out results and maintains academic records.

Like the Computer, BPL's other Office Automation Products also go a long way in increasing efficiency and productivity. Small Business Systems, Word Processors, Automatic Plain Paper Copiers, Electronic Scanners and Private Automatic Exchanges.

There are other vital areas that BPL caters to. Medical Instrumentation (Industrial Medical & Measurement) Computers, Communications, Components and Consumer Electronics.

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Texmate, USA; Sanyo, Japan and IMS, USA. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL: Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nationwide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has.

BPL-INDIA

In pursuit of perfection

Computers • Communication • Components
Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement) • Office Automation • Consumer Electronics

SUNDAY

10 MARCH AND 17 MARCH ISSUES

A DIALOGUE WITH RAJIV GANDHI

M. J. AKBAR INTERVIEWS THE PM

SUNDAY

THE BEST REPORTING

DAVANGERE

Fashion Fabrics

Stylish and relaxed in Starlite Terene*
cotton fabrics

THE DAVANGERE COTTON MILLS LTD
Hanumanthappa Buildings
Chitradurga Road
DAVANGERE 577 002

Show Rooms at Cauvery Bhavan Bangalore 560 009
Dajibanpet Hubli 580 020
Chitradurga Road DAVANGERE 577 002

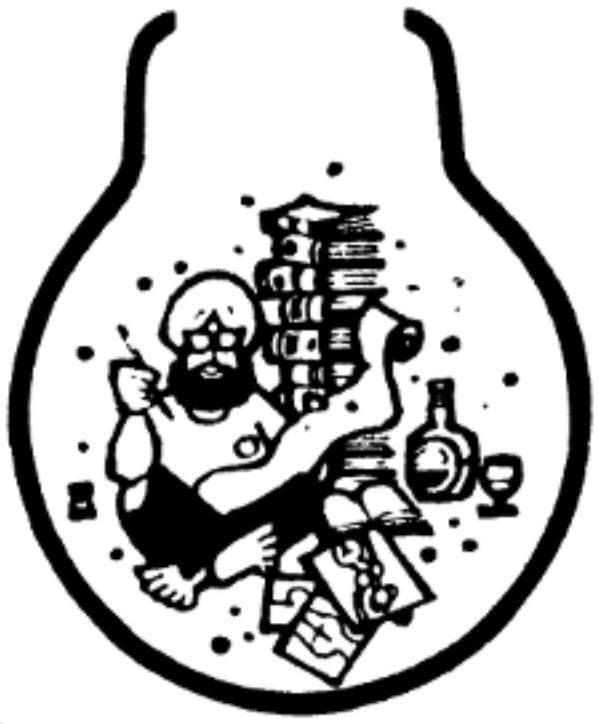
* Terene is a Registered Trademark of ICI AFI

THOMAS/8402 B·ENG

India: The Future

My friend D. P. Das specialises in collecting books with the most bizarre kind of information. One series entitled The Book of Lists contains information such as "men and women who slept with three or more celebrities...preserved sex organs of famous men...authors who had books published by the age of ten...the most boring authors of all time...prominent people put on trial after they were dead," and so on. The latest of his acquisitions which he presented to me on my birthday is entitled The Book of Predictions in which scholars, scientists and astrologers have expressed their opinion on what the world and its citizens will be like in the centuries to come. My knee-jerk reaction on receiving this book was to turn to the index and find out what these gentlemen had to say about India's future.

1. "Between 1982—1992 India along with South America, Africa, the Muslim world and South-East Asia—because of commitments to traditional fanatic religions—will have collapsed into violence, famine and disease. By 1992 the entire world except for North America and Australia will be communist controlled."



2. "By 1995 parents will be able to choose the gender of their children before conception. Hence in countries like India where male offspring are desired there will be significant changes in gender proportions in the population."

3. "By 1987 India will be one of the nations, including several Arab countries and Brazil, to have its own satellites in orbit."

4. "In the winter of 2025 an outbreak of a new, unidentified and particularly lethal influenza virus will appear in India and then spread rapidly throughout the overpopulated cities of that subcontinent...untold thousands of people worldwide will succumb to the new flu strain before it finally burns out six months later."

5. "Between 1982 and 1992 continued crop failures due to world climatic changes will coincide with population growth. The result will be mass starvation and food riots. Deaths will be counted in the hundreds of thousands, then the millions. Relief measures will be only a drop in the bucket. It will appear to the developed countries that the situation is insolvable."

6. 1985: "A bloody conflict will erupt between India and Pakistan." This is predicted by a psychic lady named Bertie Catchings of Texas.

Larry Siegel of California puts the Indo-Pak confrontation to 1989 when "both sides will use nuclear weapons, destroying major population centres."

The only comment I make on these predictions is in one word: hogwash

Gita Psychology

I have this unhealthy obsession with sex, religion and death. The first I have experienced and laud as the most rewarding experience of life. The second I indulge in the hope of finding answers to the whence from and why for of my existence. The third I await with considerable trepidation because the closer I get to it the more I am convinced that it is the final full-stop. There is no heaven or hell, no life hereafter, no reincarnation.

However, no sooner I get a new book on any of these three topics I put aside other reading to see if it has something I have not seen before. The latest arrival on my table is Swami Rama's Perennial Psychology of the Bhagavad Gita. Not philosophy but psychology. And by a Shankaracharya who resigned the high honour to practise yoga (presumably Hattha) and was able to demonstrate that he could stop his heart from beating and come back to life when he willed.

I have read many interpretations of the Geeta. Tilak's, Gandhi's, Vinoba Bhave's and Dr Radha Krishnan's each with a distinct emphasis of its own, but largely veering towards it as the supreme gospel of work ethic (karma yoga) without concern for profit or loss: nishkama karma. I had not seen it as a treatise on psychology because apart from enjoining the need for conquering one's ego and self-discipline, I found little that could be regarded as antidote to psychological problems. However, Swami Rama has extracted quite a lot out of the shlokas which may be read with profit. His translations of the original is excellent, his commentary very illuminating. What I find somewhat off putting is making an essentially spiritual pursuit in the quest of the self into a business with meditation centres, organised tours and sale of gew-gaws such as medallions, meditation shawls, cushions, yoga asana suits and agarbattis. Swami Rama's Himalayan Institute is as much a business enterprise as those set up by Acharya Rajneesh, Maharishi Mahesh Yogi and Yogi Hari bhajan.

The best summary of what I regard as the essential message of the Bhagavad Gita is contained in Kipling's short poem, If

If you can keep your head when all about you
Are losing theirs and blaming it on you
If you can meet with Triumph and Disaster
And treat the two impostors just the same
If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue
Or walk with kings—nor lose the common touch
If you can fill the unforgiving minute with sixty second's worth of distance ran,
Your is the earth and everything that is in it,
And—which is more—you'll be a Man my Son!

Gay Mughals

I am not sure of the precise meaning of the word gay. Does it apply to males who are exclusively homosexual? Or does it include men who normally consort with women but occasionally deviate and have sexual relations with other men? If the latter, then a sizable proportion of celebrities could be described as gays. Shakespeare's sonnets reveal his passion for a boy. Sultan Mahmud's love for his slave, Ayyaaz, is as celebrated an example of consuming passion in Urdu poetry as that of Majnoon for Laila. Mughal Emperors, despite their well stocked haremns confessed to lusting after boys. I had read of Babar's crude comparisons of parts of the male anatomy to water melons but had not realised that his son, Humayun, inherited the same trait till I chanced upon a couplet composed by him:

I saw a Hindu boy arrayed in battle,
His face was flushed as if with wine,
"Your ruby-red lips bewitch me," said I,
"Humayun, they are not made of stone," was his reply.

গ্রাহক নেওয়া চলছে

অভাবনীয় আনন্দ-উপহার

এক খণ্ডে

শরৎসাহিত্যসমগ্র

এককালীন গ্রাহকমূল্য ৯০ টাকা

সম্পাদনা ও দীর্ঘ ভূমিকা : সুকুমার সেন

অমর কথাসাহিত্যিক শরৎচন্দ্র চট্টোপাধ্যায়ের যাবতীয় উপন্যাস ও অন্যান্য সমুদয় সাহিত্যকর্ম এক মলাটের মধ্যে ছাপা হয়ে বেরচ্ছে আনন্দ পাবলিশার্স থেকে। সুকুমার সেনের সম্পাদনা-ও দীর্ঘ ভূমিকা-সমৃদ্ধ এই অখণ্ড গ্রন্থের নাম 'শরৎসাহিত্যসমগ্র'। বাঙালী পাঠকের ঘরে-ঘরে অপরাজেয় কথাশিল্পীকে পৌঁছে দেবার মহান সংকল্পে উদ্বুদ্ধ এই প্রকাশনার মান যেমন উঁচু, দাম তেমনি সুলভ।

সব-সেরা টিস্যু কাগজ। সুবিধাজনক ও শোভন আয়তন। সামনে পড়া যায় এমন ১২ পয়েন্ট ফোটো-সেট হরফ। অফসেটে ছাপা। দামী কাপড়ে ও বোর্ডে বাঁধাই। প্লাস্টিক ল্যামিনেটেড জ্যাকেট। বাজার-চলতি সংস্করণের ফোটোকপি নয়, নতুন ভাবে সাজানো। কেউ যদি প্রিয়জনকে এই অমূল্য গ্রন্থ উপহার হিসেবে পাঠাতে চান, তারও ব্যবস্থা রয়েছে।

অখণ্ড শরৎসাহিত্যসমগ্র'র মূল দাম ১২০ টাকা। আগাম গ্রাহকদের জন্য এককালীন গ্রাহকমূল্য ৯০ টাকা।

দু-কিস্তিতে দিলে গ্রাহকমূল্য ৫০ টাকা করে ১০০ টাকা। ডাকে নিলে সবক্ষেত্রেই ৬·৫০ পোস্টাল চার্জ অতিরিক্ত দিতে হবে।

তিন ভাবে গ্রাহক নেওয়া চলছে

- ৬৭-এ মহাত্মা গান্ধী রোড, কলকাতা ৯ ঠিকানায় অবস্থিত আনন্দ পাবলিশার্স এর ছোটদের বইয়ের দোকানে মুদ্রিত আবেদনপত্র পূরণ করে টাকা জমা দিয়ে, গ্রাহক হবার ব্যবস্থা রয়েছে।
- আনন্দ পাবলিশার্স প্রা. লিমিটেড ৫ বেনিয়াটোলা লেন কলকাতা ৭০০০০৯ এই ঠিকানায় ডাকে টাকা পাঠালেও সরাসরি গ্রাহক করে নেওয়া হচ্ছে। সেক্ষেত্রে মুদ্রিত আবেদনপত্র পূরণ করতে হবে না। এখানে টাকা পাঠাতে হবে মনি অর্ডারে কিংবা ব্যাঙ্ক ড্রাফটে। বাইরের স্টেশনের চেক নেওয়া হবে না।
- ইউনাইটেড ব্যাঙ্ক অব ইণ্ডিয়ার সারা ভারতের নির্বাচিত ১২৯টি শাখার মাধ্যমেও গ্রাহক হওয়া চলছে। তালিকা নীচে দেওয়া হল। ব্যাঙ্কে মুদ্রিত আবেদনপত্র পূরণ করে, টাকা জমা দিয়ে, গ্রাহক হতে হবে। যিনি যে-শাখায় গ্রাহক হবেন, সেখান থেকেই তিনি বই পাবেন।

যাঁরা এর আগে প্রকাশকের ঠিকানায় গ্রাহক হবার জন্য টাকা পাঠিয়েছেন অথচ বই পাঠাবার ডাকখরচ হিসেবে অতিরিক্ত ৬·৫০ পাঠাননি তাঁরা দয়া করে অনতিবিলম্বে ৬·৫০ টাকার পোস্টাল চার্জ পাঠিয়ে দেবেন।

ভি· পি পিতে অখণ্ড 'শরৎসাহিত্যসমগ্র' পাঠানো হবে না। গ্রাহক হবার পর মোটামুটিভাবে চার মাসের মধ্যেই যাতে গ্রাহকরা বই পান, তার জন্য সব রকমভাবে চেষ্টা চলছে। বই বেরুলে কাগজে বিজ্ঞাপন দিয়ে জানানো হবে।

List Of Selected U.B.I. Branches

CALCUTTA 1 College Street 2 Dalhousie Square 3 Dharamtala 4 Netaji Subhas Road 5 Old Court House Street CALCUTTA METROPOLITAN 6 Baranagar 7 Behala 8 Bhowanipore 9 Deshapriya Park 10 Dhakuria 11 Dum Dum 12 Dunlop Bridge 13 Ganguly Bagan 14 Gariahat 15 Gorabazar 16 Hazra Road 17 Howrah 18 Jadavpur 19 Kadamtala 20 New Alipur 21 New Manicktala 22 Salkia 23 Salt Lake 24 Sealdah 25 Shibpur 26 Shyambazar 27 Tollygunge 28 Ultadanga Station WEST BENGAL 29 Adra 30 Alipurduar 31 Amta 32 Andul 33 Arambagh 34 Asansol 35 Bagnan 36 Balurghat 37 Bankura 38 Barasat 39 Barrackpore 40 Baruipur Choudhury Bazar 41 Basirhat 42 Batanagar 43 Berachampa 44 Berhampur 45 Bishnupur 46 Bolepur 47 Burdwan 48 Burnpur 49 Canning 50 Chandernagar Tematha 51 Chinsurah 52 Contai 53 Cooch Behar 54 Darjeeling 55 Diamond Harbour 56 Durgapur 57 Garbeta 58 Habra 59 Jalpaiguri 60 Jhargram 61 Kalimpong 62 Kanchrapara 63 Kandi 64 Katwa 65 Kharagpur 66 Krishnanagar 67 Malda 68 Midnapur 69 Nabadwip 70 Purulia 71 Ranaghat 72 Raniganj 73 Serampore 74 Siliguri 75 Suri 76 Tamluk 77 Uttarpara ASSAM 78 Bongaigaon 79 Dibrugarh 81 Digboi 82 Gauhati 83 Jorhat 84 Karimganj 85 Panigaon 86 Silchar 87 Tezpur 88 Tinsukia MEGHALAYA 89 Shillong NAGALAND 90 Dimapur MANIPUR 91 Imphal TRIPURA 92 Agartala BIHAR 93 Bhagalpur 95 Bokaro Steel City 96 Darbhanga 97 Deoghar 98 Dhanbad 99 Gaya 100 Ghatsila 103 Giridih 104 Kishanganj 105 Muzaffarpur 106 Patna 107 Purnea 108 Ranchi ORISSA 109 Balasore 111 Bhubaneswar 112 Cuttack 113 Puri 114 Rourkela UTTAR PRADESH 115 Allahabad 116 Kanpur 117 Lucknow 118 Varanasi DELHI (UNION TERRITORY) 119 Chittaranjan Park 120 Connaught Place 121 Karol Bagh MAHARASHTRA 122 Bombay 123 Chembur 124 Nagpur 125 Poona GUJARAT 126 Ahmadabad TAMIL NADU 127 Madras 128 Mount Road KARNATAKA 129 Bangalore

আ ন ক Ananda Publishers Private Limited 5 Beniatola Lane, Calcutta 700009

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Are Naxalites Dedicated?

"Power flows from the barrel of a gun," is a slogan I have seen scribbled in red all over Hyderabad That quotation from the late Mao-Tse Tung's obsolete Red Book is a sure sign that some Naxalites are still around. That is not very surprising, because it was in Andhra Pradesh that the Naxal movement had the greatest impact soon after Charu Mazumdar and Kanu Sanyal launched a violent uprising in Naxalbari in West Bengal in 1967.

Some of those who had participated in or sympathised with the Telengana movement in 1948 were the ones to react and start the new movement in the state. There was an outburst of violence in Srikakulam district It was so "effective" that the 1970 political report of the Naxalites, who had by then organised themselves into the Communist Party of India (Marxist-Leninist), linked it to the "prairie fire" which, they hoped, would spread to other parts of India in the form of an "armed peasant guerilla struggle."

Fifteen years later, Srikakulam, to quote police sources, is "the quietest district" in Andhra Pradesh. Not even a whisper of revolt is heard and the state government which has a special force to combat, what it describes, "the Naxalite menace," has withdrawn it from there. The Naxalites themselves admit that "the parliamentary system has overtaken the district."

The real reason is that the elan of the movement has suffered and the dedication and idealism which distinguished the Naxalites from the general run of Communists has declined. Ideologically too they have suffered with Mao and what he stood for declared outdated even in China. Though one-third of the Naxalites in the state are highly intelligent and motivated, the others are anti-social elements who have joined the movement to make money for themselves. The government's estimate is that besides extorting money from villagers, the Naxalites or those who parade as such get at least Rs 12 to Rs 15 lakhs per year by terrorising arrack-sellers.

Those whom the so-called Naxalites kill or attack are not always landlords, moneylenders or police informants. Several small landholders have been killed because someone has bribed the "Naxalites" to settle a personal account "Many times ordinary men have been killed," the police sources say This could well be true, though the People's Union for Civil Liberties (PUCL) at Hyderabad does not corroborate this. In fact, the PUCL alleges that police wrath is directed against anyone who talks of civil liberty and "N.T. Rama Rao has punished even some of those who had agitated for him after his government's dismissal in August 1984."

Despite differences in ideological beliefs, many in the student community are still sympathetic to the Naxalite cause One-third of the college-going population is believed to be under the influence of Naxalites.

Vengal Rao, a former chief minister—when he was in office in 1967 made a concerted drive against the Naxalites—believes that all universities and colleges have been "affected by the Naxalites." K. Ramachandra Reddy, then inspector-general of police, who defended the police action before the Bhargava Commission was appointed to inquire into Naxalite activity in Andhra Pradesh, supports Vengal Rao's contention but blames the "starry-eyed liberals for condoning murders by the Naxalites " He has no hesitation in saying that "the Naxalbari uprising was a manifestation of the cult of violence to capture political power" contrary to the dictates of the democratic system.

If one were to judge by statistics, the Naxalites are guilty of more violence than before According to official figures, during 1984 they committed 44 murders and 383 other offences, including eight dacoities and five cases of amputation of limbs, against 26 murders and 389 other offences in 1983. Police sources consider the motive for these crimes to be "loot, murder and rapine," without any ideology behind them. The truth lies somewhere in between. the Naxalites have lost leaders like T. Nagi Reddy and most of the squads and dalams they formed from 1969 to 1977 in different parts of the state are now shorn of any ideological thrust. Many of those calling themselves Naxalites have acted as "hired assassins wherever engaged by political or local factions." The "true" Naxalites have links with the Chinese communists, and continue to get Chinese publications and writings for inspiration, though much that they contain devaluing Mao's "thoughts" must be demoralising for them They are anti-Soviet and pro-American in their approach, and this often puts them in odd company.

Whether all those who claim to be Naxalites remain firm in their conviction or not, the fact is that their influence has spread to one-fourth of Andhra Pradesh, particularly in the districts of Warangal, Karimnagar, Khammam, Adilabad and Nizamabad (the People's War Group is active in these areas).

Nonetheless, the Naxalites have lost much of their credibility with liberals by indulging in indiscriminate killings Their association with criminals has also caused a serious setback to the genuine movement. But as long as the climate of exploitation by contractors, zamindars and similar people remains Andhra Pradesh continues to be a fertile ground for resistance to grow, however wanting the new crop of Naxalites may be.

The movement has suffered and the dedication and idealism which distinguished the Naxalites from the general run of communists has declined...The Naxalites have lost much of their credibility with liberals by indulging in indiscriminate killings

OPINION

Spicy Gossip

It would be more apt to christen Khushwant Singh's column, Gossip, Sexy and Spicy. Mr Singh never loses an opportunity to write on sex and related matters. Of late he has started writing provocative and biased articles. I took particular exception to the article where Mr Singh made martyrs out of the two assassins of Indira Gandhi.
B.R. Dinesh Chandra, Bangalore

• It is time SUNDAY stops publishing Khushwant Singh's vulgar jokes.
Zafre Alam Khan, New Delhi

• I would rather have Khushwant Singh write on sex than to read his articles on the Punjab tangle. Mr Singh is causing a lot of resentment and I would advise him to stick to light topics in the interest of the nation.
Eravinalloor Karunakaran, Calcutta

• I welcome Mr Singh's suggestion that the government should institute a judicial enquiry into the anti-Sikh riots following Indira Gandhi's assassination (Gossip, 10—16 February). But what about conducting a similar investigation into the violence unleashed by Sikh extremists against Hindus in Punjab prior to Operation Bluestar?
Subhendu Rath, Rourkela

• Khushwant Singh has once again stressed the need for a judicial enquiry into the Delhi riots. In support of his demand Mr Singh has quoted two reports compiled by eminent citizens implicating some Congress(I) leaders. While the demand seems reasonable, I wonder where Mr Singh and the eminent citizens were when innocent people were being killed in Punjab. Why didn't Khushwant Singh raise his voice when extremists had taken over the Golden Temple?
S. Venkatasubramaniam, Calcutta

• I had always found Khushwant Singh's column thought-provoking. But I could not understand Mr Singh's logic of referring to 1985 as the 'Year of the Ass' (Gossip, 10—16 February). The youth of India, let alone the youth of the world, cannot be represented by the young MP whom Mr Singh ridicules. It would be unfair to label the youth as relations of the much-ridiculed beast.
Ahalya Hejmadi, Bhubaneswar

• I took exception to Khushwant Singh's description of 1985 as the Year of the Ass.
Laya Adhikari, Krishnanagar (WB)

A Bold Step

There was nothing unusual about the cover story, Women in Rajiv's Politics (10—16 February). Ever since the days of Sarojini Naidu there have been no dearth of women in Indian politics. Only till recently, our country was ruled by a woman. In India men and women enjoy equal opportunities and the call for 'emancipation of women' is nothing but a political gimmick. Political parties have raised this slogan whenever they were in need of votes. I would advise our Prime Minister to tackle much more burning problems like poverty.
G. I. D'Souza, Bangalore

• Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's emphasis on the role of the women for the progress of the country seems to have created a sense of euphoria among many sections of the public. The landslide victory of the Congress(I) in the parliamentary elections is believed to be due to the massive support the ruling party got from women voters. It is thus natural that Rajiv Gandhi will flatter this vote bank. Only time can tell whether the intentions of the Prime Minister are honest.
Satish Shirali, Bahrain

• Rajiv Gandhi's emphasis on improving the plight of Indian women was encouraging. Women should be made equal partners in nation-building and I am sure that they will be able to shoulder responsibilities thrust on them. The interviews with eminent women personalities made interesting reading.
P. Govind, New Delhi

• The Prime Minister has rightly stressed the role of women in national politics. Indian women have lagged behind only because they were denied opportunities to prove their worth.
Radha Kanta Rout, Bhubaneswar

• The decision to make education free for girls upto the high school is a bold step taken by the Prime Minister. I also welcome the formation of a separate ministry for women.
Bithika Mohanty, Keonjhar

Factual Errors

This has reference to Tariq Ali's The Nation's Grandchildren (27 January—2 February). The very first line of the extract is erroneous: Rajiv Gandhi was born in Bombay and not in Allahabad.
Veena Kulkarni, Bombay

• Tariq Ali writes that Amethi had been Nehru's constituency and after his death his sister Vijayalakshmi Pandit represented the constituency. But neither of them represented Amethi. In another place the author talks of Rajiv Dhar, the son of the D.P. Dhar. The author is mistaken: the person concerned is Vijay Dhar.
C.B. Tripathi, Bhubaneswar

The extract presents six characters: Motilal Nehru, Jawaharlal Nehru, Feroze Gandhi, Indira Gandhi, Sanjay Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi. But the author has very little to say about Sanjay and Rajiv Gandhi. In particular I expected a lot more on our Prime Minister. I only hope that Rajiv Gandhi understands the woes of the poor and the deprived since he never struggled in life like his grandfather or his mother.
Kartikeswar Behera, Anandapur (Orissa)

Welcome, Teasers

I would like to compliment SUNDAY for introducing two pages of Teasers every week. All my family members are great lovers of puzzles and quizzes and there are few Indian magazines that cater to such needs with the result that I had to depend on books and magazines from abroad. I am sure that there are many others who feel the same way as I do. What about reviving the Science for Children column?
A. Khanna, Calcutta

Right Move

Rajiv Gandhi's efforts to ban political defections are certainly laudable (Anti-Defection Bill: A New Beginning, 10—16 February). In India politics is nothing but just another trade. It is thus natural that politicians will switch sides whenever they find their party in trouble. Banning defections by law will certainly infuse morality in Indian politics. The birds of a fair season should be taught a lesson.
Abir Padhy, Berhampur

• While appreciating the Anti-Defection Bill, I would also recommend a law prohibiting a person from contesting from more than one constituency.
Suman Narayan Misra, Balasore

Sane Voices

Anita Pratap had correctly analysed the basic causes underlying the Tamil problem in Sri Lanka (Sri Lanka's Voices of Reason, 10—16 February). Inspite of the moderate Sinhala's demand for a political solution, the haughty attitude of the Sinhala Buddhists is worsening the situation. Moreover, some vested Western power blocs are deliberately keeping the tension alive in Sri Lanka. Things have come to such a pass that even the cabinet of President Jayewardene is divided regarding the Tamil issue: the President had to sack a minister.The army is not the answer to the problem. Unless the ruling party realises this the country is heading for a fresh crisis.
Rathesh Jha, Bhagalpur

Image-building

People are anxiously waiting to herald the birth of the Bharat Desam (The Ambitions of NTR, 27 January—2 February). The opposition badly needs a leader and a plank to stage a comeback. NTR's brainchild will surely provide the much needed alternative to the Congress(I).
A. Shajahan, Trivandrum

• The proposed launching of the Bharat Desam is a desperate attempt by the Andhra Pradesh chief minister to project himself as a national leader. If NTR has genuine intentions of serving the downtrodden Indians, he would not have launched the Telugu Desam which serves the interests of only a section of the population. I am sure the Bharat Desam will be a flop. The people have reposed faith in Rajiv Gandhi thereby indicating that they will not tolerate regionalism.
P.P. Beeran, Hafr-Al-Batin (Saudi Arabia)

Violence Should be Condemned

I do not agree with Kuldip Nayar's view that Appeasing the Sikhs (3—9 February) is the first reasonable step towards solving the Punjab problem. The government has always been generous to the Sikhs and is willing to compromise on a number of issues to solve the Punjab tangle. But the Sikhs have shut their eyes to reason. Certain vested interests are deliberately trying to build a wall between the Hindus and the Sikhs. Unless the moderates among the Sikhs condemn extremist activities and unless they extend their hand of cooperation, there is no way out
Param Hans Singh, Arrah

• I differ with Mr Nayar regarding the appeasement of the Sikhs. From the very beginning the Sikh leadership did not condemn the extremists with the result that the unfortunate decision to send in the army to the Golden Temple had to be taken. Even now the Sikh high priests hesitate to decry violence.
Falguni Basu, Calcutta

• I welcome Kuldip Nayar's suggestion to establish a National Security Council on the pattern of that in the USA (The Foreign Office Mess, 27 January—2 February). However, unlike its counterpart in the USA, the NSC should not meddle in the affairs of other countries.
Neeraj Cummar Bansal, Moradabad

Our Politicised Bureaucracy

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya rightly highlighted the link among the Bureaucrat, Diplomat, Industrialist, Spy (3—9 February). Corruption among the bureaucracy has endangered the security of our country. It is high time the government took note of such people. The intelligence set-up should also be revamped
K. Rachappa, Hyderabad

• It would be preposterous to assume that we can dispense with bureaucrats. They have become an integral part of our political set-up and the only way out is to inculcate in them a sense of patriotism. What this generation needs are patriots.
Banamali Panda, Puri

• The investigative cover story on the spy scandal failed to answer the question as to why the persons concerned were selling secrets to both the CIA and the KGB. It isridiculous to suggest that the two superpower intelligence agencies were sharing secrets.
Sanjib Raut, Keonjhar

• The Decline and Fall of the Indian Bureaucrat was illuminating. The political leaders are to be blamed for the corruption that has seeped into the bureaucracy. During the early Sixties, the political masters were dedicated individuals inspired by noble ideals. They were always willing to heed the advice of bureaucrats. But the picture is quite different now: politicians run after money and power and they use bureaucrats to their advantage. The bureaucracy has become highly politicised. The bureaucracy should first be freed of political pressures if the country wants to be restored to its old glory.
Subir Lahiri, Calcutta

Printer's Devil

In Delhi Diary (10—16 February) the name of Woomesh Chandra Bonnerji has been misspelt due to a printing error. This is regretted—Editor

The following information is published in compliance with Rule 8 of the Registration of Newspapers (Central) Rules 1956.
1. Place of publication 6 and 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street, Calcutta 700001.
2. Periodicity Weekly.
3. Printer and publisher Bijit Kumar Basu Indian 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001.
Editor M. J. Akbar Indian 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001
5. Names and addresses of individuals who own the newspapers and partners or shareholders holding more than one per cent of the total capital.
(i) Owners Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd. 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001.
(ii) Shareholders holding more than 1% of the total capital. Aloka Sarkar, Aveek Kumar Sarkar, Arup Kumar Sarkar, Adhip Kumar Sarkar, Asani Kumar Sarkar Arup Kumar Sarkar on behalf of minor son Aritra Kumar Sarkar. 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001.
I Bijit Kumar Basu hereby declare that the particulars given above are true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Bijit Kumar Basu
1 March 1985 Publisher

COVER STORY

THE UNDERWORLD OF INDIAN POLITICS

A large number of candidates with criminal records are contesting the elections to the Bihar and UP Assemblies

Photographs: K.M. Kishan

In early February, Bir Bahadur Singh, an independent MLA from Bihar strode into one of Patna's posh hotels with his band of armed bodyguards. The tall, bearded, brusque man tugged a goat which his men hacked to pieces in public and then had it cooked in the hotel's kitchen. The gruesome picnic over, the gang strolled out. Not a word of protest was uttered by the hotel authorities.

Bir Bahadur Singh is an impulsive, short-tempered man, some say, a schizophrenic. It takes little for him to resort to the drastic. Sometime back he pushed a ticket collector out of a running train just because he had asked for a ticket and, on another occasion, almost gagged a friend with whom he was drinking. There are few crimes that Bir Bahadur is not charged with committing: murder, abduction, rape, molestation, gangsterism. He carries unlicensed arms, stays at any hotel that he pleases without paying, roughs up any woman that catches his eye and is a professional jailbird. This is the only reason why he is also an MLA. His image is an asset and his flourishing career an apt commentary on the socio-political state of Bihar.

Bir Bahadur Singh was just another son of a Rajput landlord from Bhojpur till the murder of his father at the hands of a backward caste man. He avenged it and soon established his reputation as the lord-protector of Rajput interests in the area. He became a ruthless killer whose personal army struck terror specially among the backward castes. Followed pats from caste-brethren in the political world and secret requests for assistance. Then, in 1980, Bir Bahadur used the muscle he had assisted others with for himself and became an independent MLA from Jagdishpur. Since then, the honourable representative of the people has been to jail, and even detained under the NSA, several times. And all this time the Congres s(I) government buttressed, patronised and used his talents to score political points. During the byelections he was even bailed out of jail to oversee booth-capturing operations. Today, Bir Bahadur is preparing for his second election, again as an independent MLA from Jagdishpur. Most observers feel he would have no problems getting the mandate, or to put it otherwise, forcing it. He might not even have to actually capture booths this time: the people of Jagdishpur do not want to earn Bir Bahadur Singh's wrath by

◀ Independent MLA Bir Bahadur Singh

Sanjeev Toni

Ram Naresh Singh

आशकरन संखवार

182, साऊथ एवेन्यू
नई दिल्ली -110 001.

लोकसभा क्षेत्र, घाटमपुर, कानपुर देहात।

दिनांक : 31.1.1985

सेवा में,

माननीय श्री राजीव गांधी
प्रधानमंत्री, भारत सरकार एवं अध्यक्ष,
अखिल भारतीय कांग्रेस कमेटी (इ)
नई दिल्ली -110 001.

विषय : श्री शिवनाथ सिंह कुशवाहा, पर्यटन राज्यमंत्री, उत्तर प्रदेश सरकार के विरुद्ध भ्रष्टाचार एवं आतंक के सम्बन्ध में संलग्न प्रमाण-पत्रों सहित प्रार्थना-पत्र।

माननीय महोदय,

विनम्र निवेदन है कि 294 घाटमपुर विधानसभा क्षेत्र से श्री शिवनाथ सिंह कुशवाहा विधायक चुने के बाद उत्तर प्रदेश सरकार में राज्यमंत्री के पद पर मनोनीत किए ---। इन्होंने अपने कार्यकाल में पांच लाख से अधिक मीट्रिक टन गन्ना खरीदने के ठेके दिलवाए हैं। इनके परिवार के सदस्यों ने पचासों बन्दूकें, रायफलें -- लाखों परिवारों की लूट -

Shri Rajiv Gandhi
Prime Minister of India and President AICC(I)

182 South Avenue
New Delhi 110001
Dated 31/1/1985

Respected Sir,

I humbly beg to say that after being elected from the Ghatampur Assembly constituency, Mr Shivnath Singh Kushwaha was made a minister of state. During his five years in office, scores of dacoities have been committed, dozens murdered, thousands of families looted and even breasts of some women were cut off by his nephew and dacoits whom he patronises. He has struck terror in the region and the entire population of Ghatampur Assembly constituency is pained. His repeated assertions that he has nothing to do with his nephews are absolutely baseless. As proof I would like to say that one of his nephews who is studying, stays at his official residence in Lucknow. His brother and another nephew have forcibly acquired a contract to supply sugarcane. They opposed me in the Lok Sabha elections and even kept all the election material for their own purposes.

In these circumstances, I pray to you not to select him as a candidate from the Ghatampur Assembly constituency. At the same time I should like to say our image in the region has been tarnished and winning the election is impossible.

With respects
Your humble servant,
Ashkaran Sankhwar

Letter written by Ashkaran Sankhwar to Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi levelling charges against Shivnath Singh Kushwaha, a minister in the UP cabinet defeating him.

Crime has become an inextricable part of politics in Bihar and the nexus between criminals and politicians almost endemic. People with gory criminal antecedents have held cabinet posts. Smugglers and bootleggers have run ministers, rapists have dominated proceedings in the Assembly where mafia dons and gangsters come loaded with arms and guarded by gun-toting musclemen. The custodians of Bihar have proclaimed, with some pride, that they maintain gangs of goondas and that doing so is "necessary for political survival." So is, perhaps, holding the masses in general at ransom. A slogan being used by candidates in several constituencies this time is: "Send me back to Patna as your legislator or else you shall not live in peace." It is a threat the people know can be carried out with impunity.

Illustration Bulbul Sharma

"We are just waiting for the day when the percentage of criminals in the Assembly crosses 50," remarked a senior Bihar MLC and added, perhaps with a touch of humour, that the state Legislature could then pass a law that a woman resisting rape could be convicted. While this might be a bit far-fetched, the rise in the number of people with criminal backgrounds entering politics is alarming. A record lineup is contesting the Assembly elections this time. Many of them will win while Bihar's slide into barbarism continues.

Nothing makes it more evident than the Congress(I) list of candidates itself. After all the brooming and pruning, the number of people with criminal records behind them is between 35 and 40 while the count of those who have links with or shield criminal elements, much more. Some of them are caste barons too important to be displeased, others simply too resourceful to the party to be ignored.

Take the case of Sagir Ahmed, the Congress(I) candidate from Raxaul, on the Indo-Nepal border. His men have been caught and charged for various offences, including smuggling, on many occasions. He himself has been at the centre of such a scandal that even a chief minister like Dr Jagannath Mishra had to drop him from his ministry. Sanjeev Prasad Toni, contesting the elections from Phulwarisharif near Patna, is still known as the local dada of Patna: a man who has seldom flinched from using muscles to gain political strength. There is Kumud Ranjan Jha whose behaviour towards women has not been appreciated by many and his accomplice in many an escapade, Satyadeo Singh alias Sahdeo, is the Congress(I) nominee from Khagaria. Harilal Ram from Bechahan is charged with the rape of a minor harijan girl and Raghunath Pandey from Muzaffarpur is so powerful that he runs a parallel administration of his own, defying the authority of the government. Then there are the mafia bosses of south Bihar: at least ten of them are in the fray from various constituencies in Dhanbad, Palamau and Hazaribagh. Some of them have even migrated to other constituencies in central and north Bihar which is already buzzing with candidates who are said to have helped in capturing booths for VIP candidates of the Congress(I) in the last Lok Sabha elections. Among them are the two men who personally "looked after" the polling booths in the constituencies of Mrs Manorama Singh, the wife of the Bihar chief minister, and Satyendra Narain Sinha, the Rajput chieftain of Bihar. But, perhaps, the most surprising is the choice of candidates brought in on the "new and clean" criterion. In several cases, the "unclean" have been replaced by candidates whose pasts are just as murky. Malo Devi, known to be a bootlegger, and who has a couple of warrants of arrest against her head, has got the ticket from Farwah In the 1984 Lok Sabha elections, this lady was accompanying the local Congress(I) candidate on his campaign rounds. But the moment he came to know of her antecedents, he told her he no longer needed her services. Ask any knowledgeable person in Patna and he will tell you that the Congress(I) list in Bihar abounds with such "colourful" personalities. And how many more such characters lurk behind the new names nobody knows today.

Rashtriya Sanjay Manch leader Vinod Singh with the president of the RSM, Menaka Gandhi

The Congress(I) is not the only party that has in its ranks such criminal and dubious elements. Crime has become a political necessity, something without which any party or group finds the going difficult. The opposition parties this time have an equal share of gangsters and criminals representing them. In the forefront is the Janata Party which, apart from fielding the notorious Dhanbad mafia don Suryadeo Singh, has also adopted some who were cast away by the Congress(I) because of their criminal backgrounds. The party leadership openly justifies and accepts it Answering questions at Patna sometime ago the Janata Party leader Syed Shahabuddin said that assistance could be taken from all kinds of people for electoral purposes In another statement Karpoori Thakur, a former chief minister of Bihar, did not hesitate to say that his men would fight the elections with guns this time. Karpoori Thakur was, perhaps, more desperate in his intent but he knows only too well that elections cannot be won without resorting to the gun in Bihar. His own government at one time was assisting politics to the dirty depths it is in today.

But, perhaps, the grip of crime on politics and society is best exhibited by the number of independent MLAs who rule the roast by sheer muscle and firepower: Vinod Singh, the "sadist" of Palamau, Sardar Krishna Singh, the terror of Gaya, and the dreaded Birendra Singh Mohabia, of Jandaha.

Vinod Singh who, according to the police is a "sadist who enjoys killing people" at one time faced more than 70 criminal charges He can kill people in public, threaten and abuse senior police officers, dodge the law with impunity and still remain an honourable MLA. Sardar Krishna Singh, a bhumihar landlord-turned-Sikh from Gaya, began as a caste gangster terrorising harijans and giving protection and assistance to upper caste politicians. By 1980, when he won the Assembly elections as an independent candidate from Arwal, there were already half a dozen serious charges, including murder and abduction, against him. He was, in the early part of his career as an MLA, used and patronised by the then chief minister Dr Jagannath Mishra. It was only when he became too much of a liability that Dr Mishra felt obliged to expel him from the party. But there was nothing that could stop Krishna Singh's rise in politics. The tall hefty Sikh who is

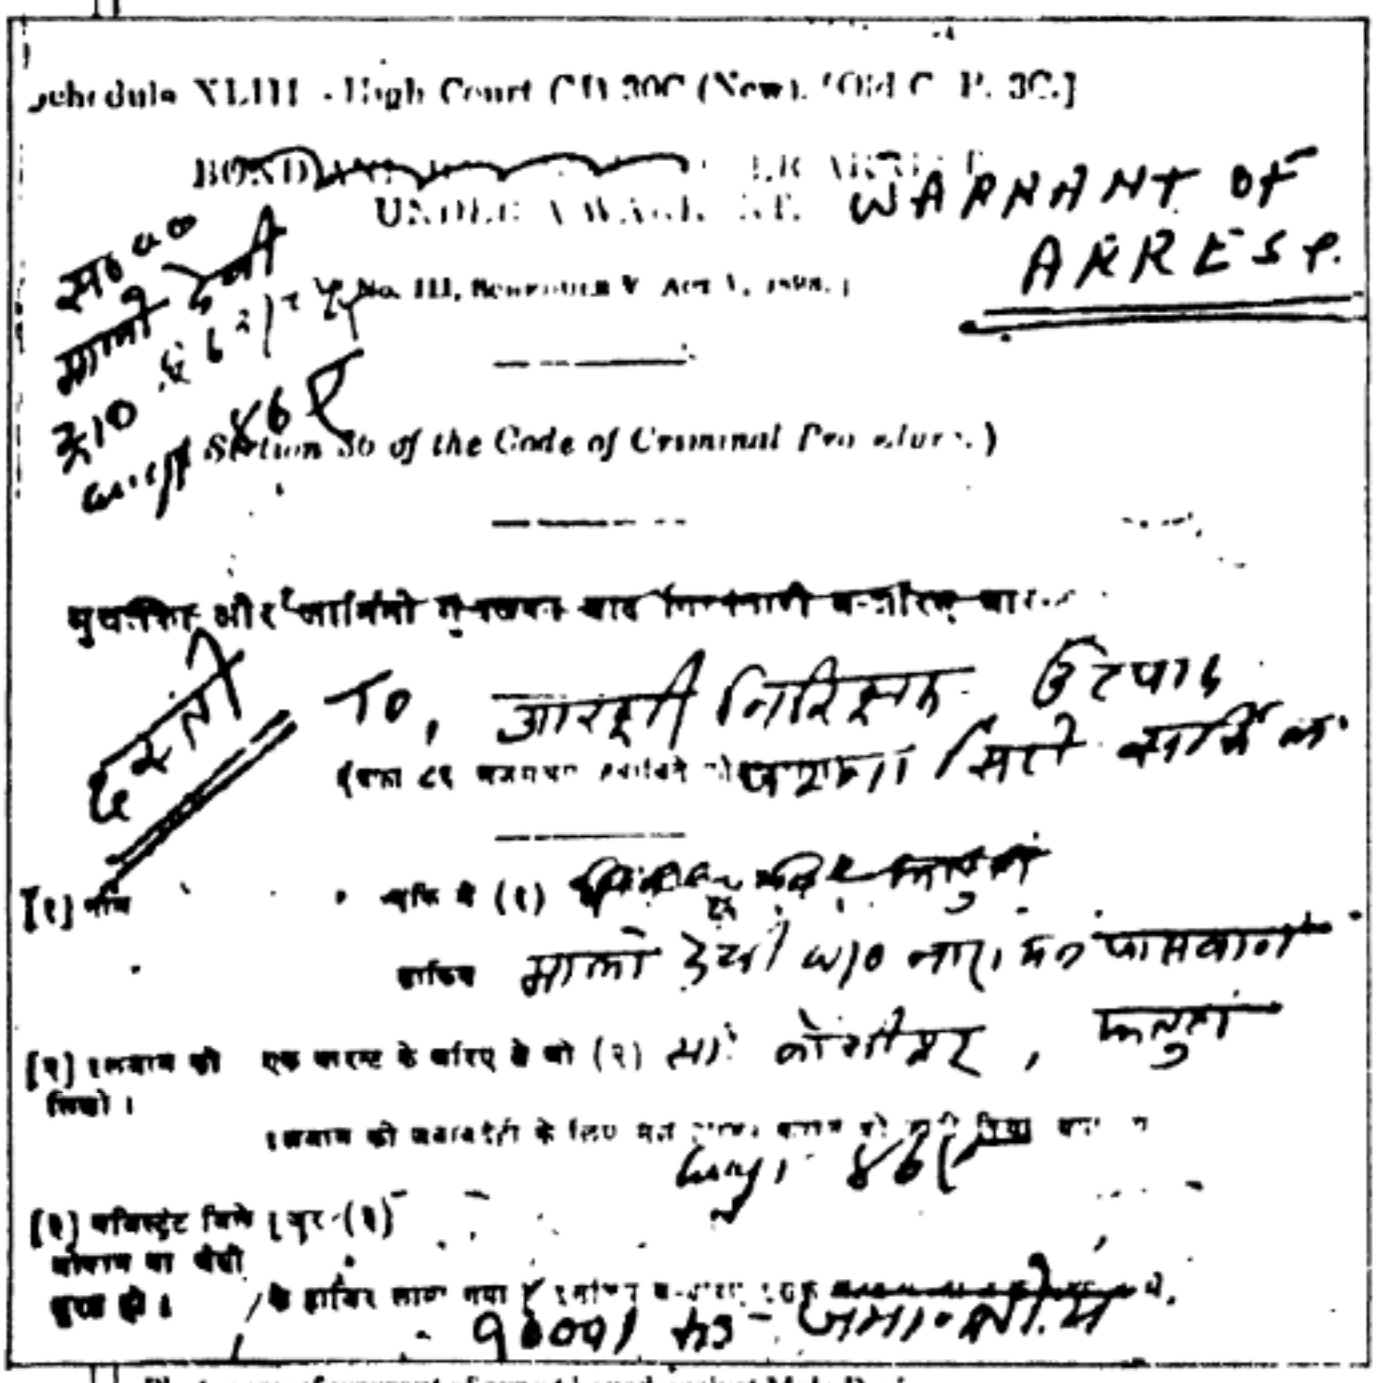
Mala Devi: The Congress(I)'s "Clean" Candidate

Mala Devi has suddenly become a much-talked about woman in Bihar. Not because she allegedly runs a few bhattas of illicit country liquor, has two warrants of arrest against her and is wanted by the excise department but because she has been given the Congress(I) ticket for the Assembly elections: one of the "new and clean" faces that the party is bringing in. Even senior Congress(I) leaders were surprised how someone like her could have been given the nod in the midst of "operation cleanup." Some protested and it was hoped her name would finally be struck out but Mala Devi, known affectionately as Malo Devi by men around her, stuck on and filed her nomination papers at the Patna collectorate on 6 February.

She could have been taken into custody that day. Excise officials were watching her from their office right beside the collectorate but they did not dare. How could they? As one senior excise official put it, "Do I stake my job by arresting someone who has been given a ticket by the chief minister?" So Malo Devi roams around freely on the campaign trail today, promising "cleanliness and efficiency," with all the respectability of a Congress(I) candidate around her.

Malo Devi's activities are an open secret. The bhattas that she runs single-handed, are famous in and around Fatwah, a highway township 25 kilometres east of Patna. Her job, they say, is to smuggle in industrial alcohol from the West Bengal border and convert it into liquor at her bhattas. She has been running this illegal trade successfully for years allegedly with the connivance of the local authorities. Once when an excise inspector by the name of Ghaffar tried to conduct a raid on her establishment, she and her patrons beat him up. Malo Devi herself proudly admits having done so. The police did not interfere. According to some Fatwah locals, they are, in addition to being "indebted" to her, also afraid of the muscle-power she has at her command.

K.M. Kishen



Mala Devi

"Galat aarop lagane waale ko aisa hi karna chahiya (This is the treatment that should be meted out to a man who levels false charges)," she says, sitting inside her dingy Fatwah hutment surrounded by drunken "campaign strategists." It is late in the night and she has just returned from her rounds. "She is an extremely popular woman in the area and very simple too. Don't ask her too many questions," says one of the many men around her, perhaps, afraid that she might speak indiscreetly in her excitement. She has already committed a lapse in telling us that she has received promises of support from "some underground people."

She claims that all her earnings come from the fishing contracts that she has and says the warrants were inspired by people who had become jealous of her. But right outside her house, people talk openly of the "woman of many ways" and cut nasty jokes. In Patna, leaders express shock at how this unlettered, non-political, "uncivil" lady got herself a ticket.

Sankarshan Thakur

Schedule XLIII - [High Court Cr. P. C. 30C (New) / Old Cr. P. C. 30.]

BOND / UNDER SECTION ... WARRANT OF ARREST.

[See Form No. III, Rule ... Act V, 1898.]

(See Section 80 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.)

To, ... Constable

(Name and designation of police officer or other person to whom the warrant is directed.)

[1] Whereas ... has been charged before me (1) ... and has failed to appear when required and whereas it is probable that he will abscond;

[2] You are hereby commanded to arrest the said ... and to bring him before me (2) ... to answer the said charge [or to give security for his appearance before me for the purpose of answering the said charge].

[3] You are hereby directed to cause the said ... to be detained in custody until he shall be delivered by due course of law.

Dated this ... day of ... 19...

Photocopy of warrant of arrest issued against Mala Devi always surrounded by armed bodyguards is now contesting elections from Arwal once again, even though the Congress(I) has "disowned" him. His musclemen maintain that their leader will always be an asset to the ruling party. His campaign headquarters in Patna is full of posters depicting Rajiv Gandhi as his leader.

Birendra Singh Mohabia is another MLA with a gory track record. His main platform in politics is terror. When he goes out campaigning, he openly proclaims that if the people want to live in peace they must send him to the Assembly. "If I remain here, your lives and properties shall never be safe," he said. Some time ago, just to give more teeth to his threats, Mohabia bought a mad elephant from the cattle fair in Sonepur and let it run amuck whenever he pleased.

Most of these lawless elements, even though they are independents, enjoy the patronage and protection of the powers that be. The relationship works smoothly, to the benefit of both sides. The birth of the criminal elements in the state's body politic has taken place in the lap of the feudal set-up with its deep-rooted caste rivalries and economic backwardness. It was usual for most landlords and zamindars to keep packs of lathaits (those who wielded the lathis) and criminals at their beck and call, to terrorise the poor tenants and extort money from them. Though officially zamindari is no more, the same ethos still pervades the countryside of Bihar. The economic advancement of the backwards and the social awareness among the harijans has only aggravated the tensions in the rural areas of Bihar. Since it was, by and large, the upper castes which ruled the roast in government and politics, the oppressors got away with the worst of crimes, whether it was rape or plunder The politicians who depended on them for capturing booths during the elections or keeping the wrong castes at a safe distance were only obliged to bail them out when they got on the wrong side of the law. The politician-gangster nexus in Bihar has come to be the rule rather than an exception.

Sagir Ahmed

Even today the name of Kamdeo Singh, the bhumihar gang leader of Begusarai, comes up every time one talks about the relationship between crime and politics. The top leaders of Bihar, right from the days of "Bihar Kesari" Sri Krishna Sinha, made it their business to pay court to the so-called "Robin Hood of Begusarai," specially those belonging to Singh's caste. Even Dr Jagannath Mishra thought it discreet to call on the family members of the dead gangster (Kamdeo was killed in an encounter in 1980) before starting his election campaign.

Soon it was not a mere nexus between politicians and gangsters, both working in tandem. Came a time when gangsters themselves got into politics, fought elections and became MLAs, even ministers. Both crime and politics pursued the same goal: power. And, at one point, merged.

Compared to Bihar, the neighbouring Uttar Pradesh may seem almost a haven of peace. But only comparatively speaking. The crime-politics nexus is as much a reality in UP as in Bihar, except that the terror here is not so open, so naked. The various ministries in the last decade-and-a-half have had men with criminal pasts. Smugglers, drug-runners, patrons of dacoits, hijackers, murderers, you name it. No less than nine NSA detainees are contesting the Assembly polls.

It is in Uttar Pradesh that the Illegal country-made firearms seized by the Bihar police

Rajiv Gandhi axe is said to have fallen the heaviest on men with shady records. Yet the list of Congress(I) candidates bristles with nearly three dozen people who have been or are involved in all manner of nefarious activities. Perhaps, the most glaring case is that of Shiv Nath Singh Kushwaha, an MLA from Ghatampur in Kanpur district and minister of state in the present government. Apart from being involved in the sugarcane scandal which attracted the attention of the Lokayukta, Kushwaha is alleged to be the patron of a ruthless gang that has struck terror in Ghatampur. One of his nephews, is today an NSA detainee, and another is said to have forcibly wangled a profitable sugarcane contract. While the UP tickets were being discussed in Delhi, Aashkaran Sankhwar, the Congress(I) MP from Ghatampur, had written to the Prime Minister about Kushwaha's misdeeds and pleaded with him not to give the ticket to the man. But he got it. His political godfathers are all over the place, from Lucknow to Delhi. Even the Lokayukta's report against him, in the beginning of 1984, did not deter his patrons.

Gulab Singh, who ironically became the first Congress(I) winner in the present elections (unopposed from Chakrata), had a thriving poppy farm near Dehradun. When this was detected, the then chief minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh bundled him out of the ministry. The moment V.P. Singh resigned, Gulab Singh bounced back into the ministry. Sripati Mishra obviously had different standards for his colleagues. What new considerations prompted the ticket distributors this time in spite of the cleanliness drive is not known.

Gulab Singh and Kushwaha are not the only jarring names in the "clean list" from Uttar Pradesh. Rajdhar Mishra, the Congress(I) candidate from Karvi in Banda, has a record too. Devendra Pandey, the well-known hijacker, was selected while his co-hijacker Bhola Pandey was guillotined for having a bad image. Markande Chand, the ruling party nominee from Gorakhpur, is said to have snatched the revolver of a police officer sometime ago, and has been charged for that offence. The record of Umeshwar Pratap Singh, the party candidate from Karnailganj in Gonda, is at best dubious. At one time he was charged in a murder case, and though he was acquitted, there are complaints from prominent people in his constituency that he was involved in the rape of a harijan woman.

Prominent people in the party have also been patronising a dreaded gangster like Harishankar Tewari of Gorakhpur, an NSA detainee who is contesting the elections from jail as an independent. In his gang wars with Birendra Pratap Shahi, his rival in east UP, more than a hundred people have died during the past year. Gorakhpur is something like Bihar's Dhanbad, a honeycomb of criminals and dacoits. Interestingly, the Congress(I) candidate now opposing Tewari had himself been expelled from the Congress(I) during the Lok Sabha elections for supporting Tewari. The man, Bhringunath Chaturvedi, was perhaps considered the best bet against Tewari.

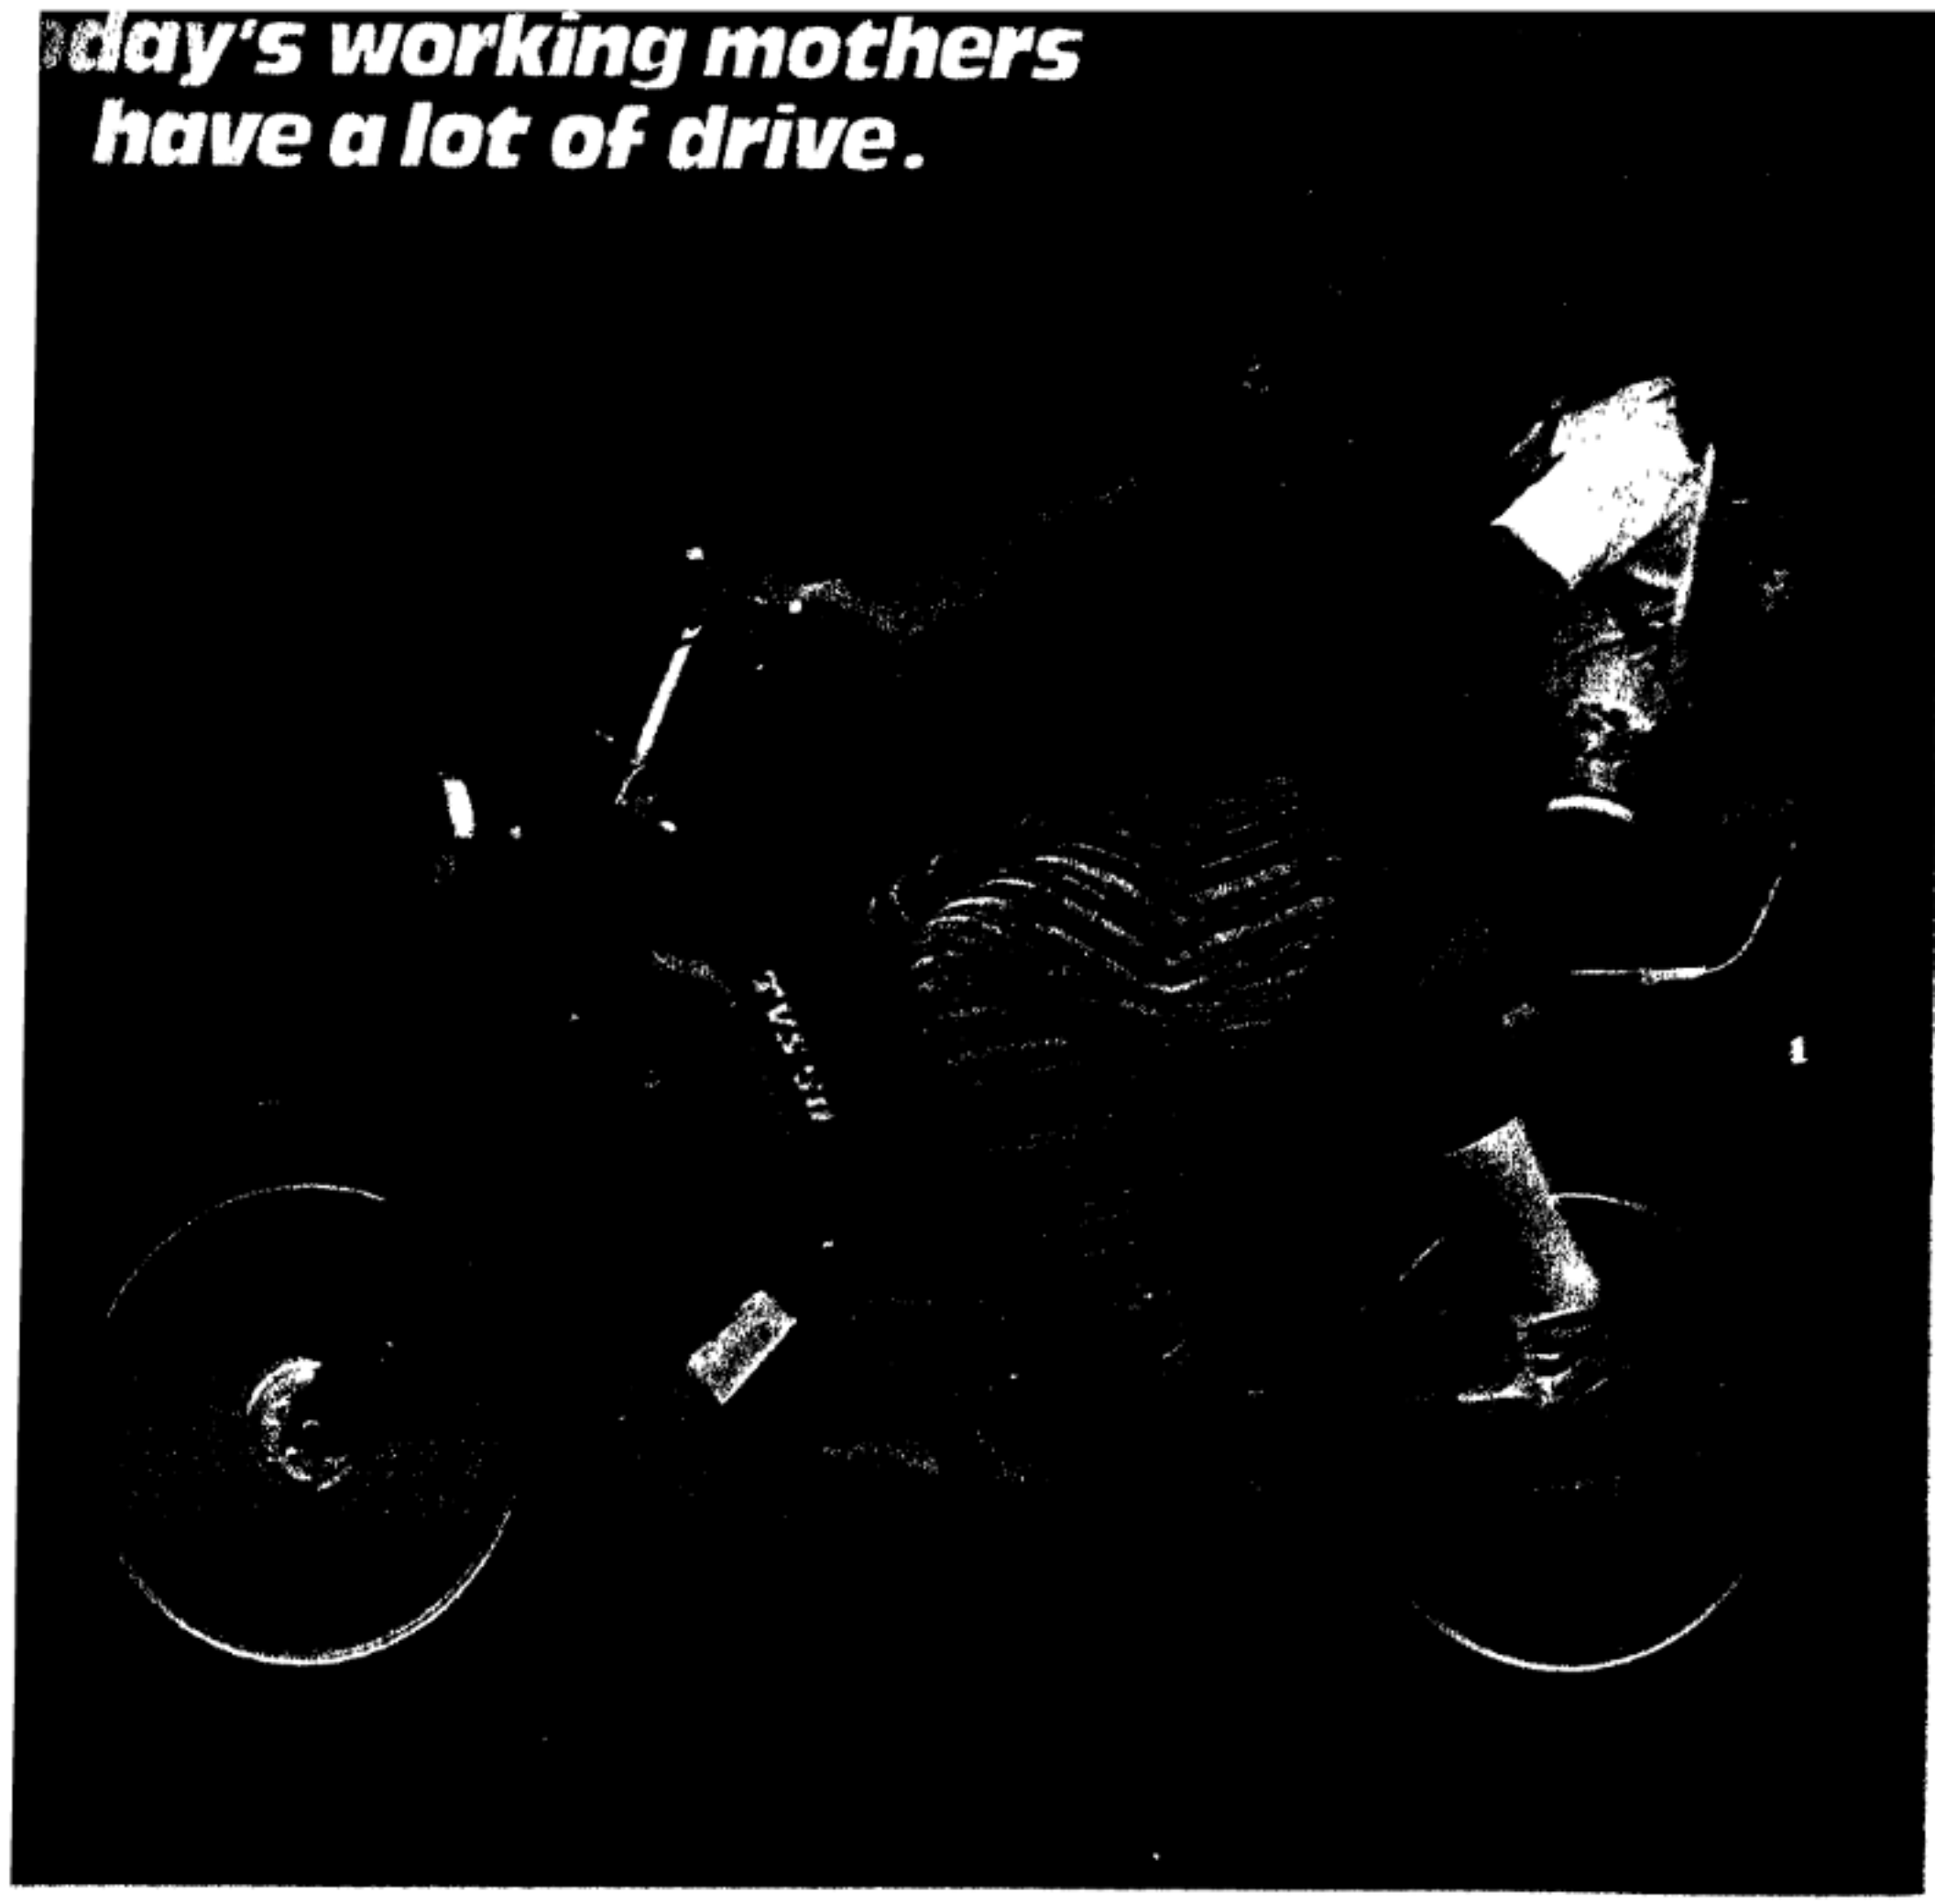
Suryadeo Singh

Sardar Krishna Singh

The opposition parties are of course not far behind in setting up men with tarnished records to fight the elections. Laturi Singh, a former Congress(I) MLA, now adopted by the DMKP (Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party) was at one time facing murder charges. Anwar Mohammed Khan, also of the DMKP, and facing similar charges, is in the fray from Kayamganj in Farukhabad. The Janata Party has fielded, in Jaunpur, a man who was involved in the sensational theft at Varanasi's Vishwanath temple. The CPI can boast of having set up at least two men who have similar records.

But all these are perhaps just small fry compared to the great dons of politics under whose arms they thrive. Far more perverse and damnable are the powerful pillars of society, the bosses in high places who get away with the worst of crimes, the ones who use the petty criminals for their own ends and then discard them to keep up their own veneer of cleanliness and incorruptibility. While they thrive, the charade of cleanliness in politics can only remain a mockery.

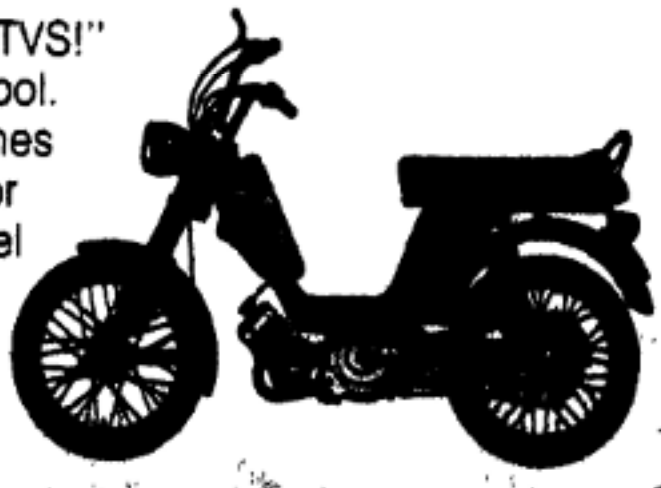
Sankarshan Thakur, Patna and Lucknow



We've got the whole world at our feet.

NORTH STAR

It's a great feeling



Available at select [illegible] & [illegible] Stores day's working mothers have a lot of drive.

ley get a lot more done, lot faster, on a TVS 50 XL.

lunning a household is a full-time job. If in addition, also go to work, hats off to you, lady! With these sentiments, asked a young mother how she manages it.
ith a little help from my friend," said she. "My TVS!"
n my way to work, I drop my son off at his school.
so glad my TVS can safely take two. Sometimes ke a friend out to lunch. Or we go shopping for gains. It's so nice to be independent. To travel omfort. Save time. And save money too.
TVS is so economical to run, it hardly makes nt in my pay packet. Goodness! I've got going. Taking my sister out to a movie!"

TVS 50 XL

We make it better for you.

CLARION/BUTVS/182275

Crime and Politics

In Bombay the criminal-politician nexus is well-entrenched

The new Prime Minister, Mr Rajiv Gandhi talks convincingly of bringing in cleanliness into the administration. He even told a police meet in Jaipur recently that "from now on there will be no interference in the working of the police, so there will be no excuses." But if anyone tries to clean up the mess caused by the biggest name in Bombay's underworld, Varadarajan, he would probably meet his Waterloo in the creeks of Dhravi or Matunga. Varadarajan, a Tamilian from the Mudaliar community controls dock thefts, bootlegging, matka and has at least some of the MPs of Tamil Nadu in his pocket. For instance, over a year ago, when he was to be detained under COFEPOSA for smuggling on the Konkan coast, it was reportedly the home secretary of Maharashtra Mr B.D. Chowgule himself who turned down the demand for his detention. Even the customs officials were upset about this.

Nearly three years ago, a new deputy commissioner Y.C. Pawar took charge of the Matunga police station. Since Pawar would not kowtow to him, Varadarajan tried his best to get him transferred. When he failed he brought pressure from three MPs of Tamil Nadu, one each from the Congress(I), the AIADMK and the DMK. Through these MPs he allegedly got the AICC(I) general secretary K. Moopanar to speak to Maharashtra chief minister Mr Vasantdada Patil about it and got Mr Venkatasubbaiah, the former union minister of state for home, to discuss the transfer with the director-general of police, Maharashtra, Mr K.P. Medhekar. Perhaps, this is the only case where Varadarajan has not had his way. But he has not spared Mr Pawar: he has tried to break him psychologically and physically. His gang has filed four criminal cases against Mr Pawar in the magistrate's court and no less a criminal lawyer than Mr Ram Jethmalani has been engaged for this purpose. The case has been dragging on for two years and Mr Pawar has had to appear nearly a hundred times in court wasting nearly three hours every time. This way the police officer is kept engaged in the court and subjected to humiliation and stress. Pawar, according to one source, has stopped all the illegal activities of Varadarajan in his "domain" that stretches from Matunga to Dharavi and Sion. Antop Hill at Wadala is the hub of his empire. Pawar, a police officer brought to Bombay nearly three years ago from the mofussil area is probably one of the few persons that Varadarajan has been unable to purchase. His trouble with Varadarajan, it is said, started when while travelling in his official car he gave chase to a vehicle carrying liquor. The vehicle would not stop and on the contrary the vehicle driver and his accomplices dashed against his car and even threw stones at it. Pawar finally caught them, and the next day he hauled up the owner of the vehicle, Thomas Kurien alias Khaja, beat him up and humiliated him in public. On that day the move to oust Pawar began with a vengeance. Khaja owns 20 cars which he uses for transporting illicit liquor and now this lucrative trade has been stopped.

Khaja and his gang members made a complaint against Pawar to the magistrate but the complaint was turned down on the grounds that sanction was not given by the government under the Bombay Police Act. They then went in appeal to the Bombay High Court which said there should be a preliminary enquiry by the police. The judges made remarks that Pawar had acted in a high-handed manner and it is very reliably learnt that the government pleader had tried to suggest to the police commissioner that Pawar be transferred. The police commissioner, however, did not yield.

Another official who is now under pressure due to the political clout wielded by the underworld is G.R. Khairnar (43), ward officer of 'G' North ward. There are 42 unauthorised places of worship on pavements between Prabhadevi and Sion, an area of 10.9 sq km. It is estimated that in the whole of Bombay there could be 450 such unauthorised places of worship. It is mostly the underworld characters who are behind these places. They are not only a means of earning money from gullible devotees (anywhere between Rs 100 to Rs 500 daily) but is a cover for drug peddling, prostitution and gambling. In the second week of February, Khairnar had demolished some of the unauthorised places of worship in the Mahim area. There was a hue and cry on the first day until the citizens realised that these were really dens of anti-social elements.

Khairnar had hit at the lucrative trade of a number of underworld dons, believed to be underlings of Varadarajan. They even called for a bandh in the area the following day but it was a partial success. Among those who protested against the demolition was said to be the chief minister Mr Vasantdada Patil's brother-in-law Mama Phalke. The Phalkes, who are brothers of ex-MP Shalinitai Patil, have their base in Mahim. According to reports, Mama Phalke had told the inspector of the police station there that he had got the permission of the chief minister to rebuild the temples that were demolished. Accordingly, his people began reconstructing the temples but they were demolished again. Around this time there was a call from the Mantralaya to the Bombay Municipal Corporation (BMC) enquiring about the goings-on. While the BMC spokesman refused to say what the call was about, stories soon spread that Varadarajan had seen the chief minister and that Khairnar would be transferred. A citizens' committee headed by Mr Nilakant Khadilkar, editor of Navakal backed Khairnar and so did every man in the municipal corporation. Khairnar, however, is still there, but he has been asked to stop demolitions of all illegal places of worship.

It is understood that while the temples were being demolished, a known flunkey of Varadarajan came and requested the corporation employees that the demolitions be stopped but they did not pay heed to him. Varadarajan then appeared on the scene and it was made known that he would be seeing the chief minister. Khairnar has had several encounters with Varadarajan's men. Once they came and occupied all the chairs in his office. Khairnar escaped by locking himself in his room. Police help came after more than half an hour though everyone knew what was happening. The same story was repeated during a raid on Antop Hill where a former collector of Bombay was personally supervising the demolitions. The collector was abused by the members of the Varadarajan gang and had to bear it silently. In fact, some police officers themselves have reportedly told Khairnar that he should "adjust" himself with Varadarajan. In 1978, Khairnar was transferred on a request from a Janata legislator and orders from Sharad Pawar who was then the chief minister.

Another underworld name is that of Kheshav Bhosale who has been involved in the Raj Bhavan smuggling case and innumerable other rackets. He is presently detained under COFEPOSA but is contesting as an independent candidate from an Assembly constituency in Raigad district. Bhosale has asked for parole and so powerful is he even now, that the government did not bother to oppose it when the application came up for hearing on 19 February. The police had sent their representatives to court but the judge said that they had no locus standi. The police had to then ask the government to send someone to oppose the parole order on 20 February. Bhosale has had his way in everything until now. A dismissed constable, he joined the Congress(I) and had even contested, unsuccessfully, the municipal elections some years ago. He was close to Mr Ramrao Adik, the former deputy chief minister and Mr Jambuwantrao Dhote. When he was caught for the Raj Bhavan smuggling case, he was found hiding in the home of a minister owing allegiance to Mr Dhote and Mr Adik.

Bhosale's links with the Mantralaya are well-known. When the police refused to give him a licence for a hotel, the minister of state for home, Mr Vilasrao Deshmukh, personally overruled the police objections. In fact, Mr Deshmukh has overruled all objections the police have put up to guest houses in the Colaba area, which are misused for nefarious activities.

How do people like Varadarajan destroy the quality of life of the people and a city? Describing Varadarajan, a senior police official said that if the chief minister runs the government and the police commissioner is in charge of law and order, then Varadarajan is in charge of all the counterforces to these two institutions. He cannot operate unless he gets the cooperation of these two institutions: the government and the police. In fact, he could not stay out of jail for a single day if he did not have their backing. Money is of no consequence to him. He has a large insatiable ego. He gives money in plenty and is even believed to have financed the wedding of the daughter of a police official. He plays on the religious susceptibilities of the people and has direct contact with politicians. His activities which range from illicit liquor, drug peddling, matka, gambling and prostitution affect the lives and well-being of the people both young and old. It saps their will, energy and morale.

If one wants to improve the quality of life in Bombay, one will have to tackle Varadarajan and his empire politically. The police alone will not be able to stop the activities of the dons of Bombay's underworld. Among the first people to wait on the home of a candidate who has got a ticket to contest an election—whether Lok Sabha, Assembly or municipal corporation—is the underworld "dada" or his flunkey who may have a more "respectable" image. The message is simple: "We are always at your service should you need us." Political parties, particularly the Congress(I), have no cadre of their own and so they take the "services" of the vast hordes of unemployed on the payrolls of the underworld "dadas" for pasting posters, putting up banners, shouting slogans, packing morchas and padayatras and then as election day nears, keeping a track of those on the voting lists who are either out of town or unlikely to vote and then arrange for bogus voting on the day of actual voting. It is all done so professionally that it is difficult to pinpoint bogus voting. Slum-lords, because of boothwise counting, are in a position to terrorise slumdwellers who do not vote as they are told. So, the candidate is beholden to the underworld "dada" from the day he gets a ticket. And if he wins the election, it is an endless process of quid pro quo. That is where the political clout comes in.

Sandeep Shankar

Haji Mastan in the docks at Bombay where he once grew up as a labourer

Mr Nilakant Khadilkar, editor of Navakal, a Marathi daily and probably better known as the father of the chess queen Rohini Khadilkar, said, "The present election system requires a candidate to have a minimum of Rs 25 lakhs. Where is this going to come from except from capitalists and the underworld? The present political parties also do not have a clear ideology or cadre to work for them and so they are forced to depend on the underworld. I have watched Murli Deora's election from South Bombay and saw this in action. All propaganda becomes easy when you make friends with the underworld."

In Bombay, where the underworld wields political clout in proportion to his capacity to terrorise and kill, though Haji Mastan Mirza is one of the best known names in the city's underworld, his colleagues and those who know him say he cannot be called an underworld person. He was only a big-time smuggler and today he commands the "respects" of the underworld because he is the oldest surviving member of the fraternity. Mastan also worked for the Galadaharis. The real underworld characters who wield clout are people like Varadarajan of Matunga and his associates, Darshan "Tilu" Singh and Khaja.

Varadarajan and Yusuf Patel, who is primarily a shrewd businessman, have been responsible for the transfer of several honest policemen, municipal engineers, municipal ward officers who did not do what they said or who exposed them. Yusuf Patel, it is alleged, has been responsible for wrecking the career of a brilliant IAS officer Arun Bhatia who was collector of Bombay. Finally even the honest municipal commissioner D.M. Sukhtankar had to leave overnight for insisting on demolishing eight floors built illegally by Patel in a building at Warden Road. He also insisted on giving notices to buildings like Zia Cooperative Housing Society, Om Chambers, Arihant and Tirupati.

Yusuf Patel

Arun Bhatia who was collector of Bombay in 1983-84 had exposed construction irregularities in four properties belonging to Yusuf Patel. The illegal increase in the use of area totalled 9,195 sq yards which would mean a profit of crores of rupees for Patel and his brothers who own the property. As both the corporation headed by the municipal commissioner Sukhtankar and the anti-corruption bureau soft-pedalled on the issue, Bhatia sought the help of the press to expose what seemed likely to be pushed under a carpet of silence. The result was that Bhatia was transferred after less than a year in office as collector. In fact, he was reverted to a lower designation in the Mantralaya home department. Strangely enough, only in February 1985, after Mr Rajiv Gandhi was Prime Minister for nearly four months with his "accent" on clean government, did the state government sanction the prosecution of Mr P.D. Haval, superintendent of the Bombay city survey and land records department of the collectorate of Bombay and two of his staff members "for FSI (Floor Space Index) malpractices in conspiracy with Yusuf Patel and other builders." However, prosecution has yet to be launched against Yusuf Patel and his associates.

Meanwhile, the then municipal commissioner who was accused by Bhatia of non-cooperation himself became a victim of the FSI scandal when he insisted on demolishing eight floors built off Warden Road. About 2,737 sq. metres of the 36-storeyed building had to be demolished. Mr Sukhtankar would not play the mantralaya's game quietly, so he was transferred back to the Mantralaya overnight. The new administrator in his place stayed the demolition in December 1984.

Another instance of the nexus between the mantralaya and the underworld which gives the latter political leverage, is the one involving the minister for transport and jails, Prof. S.M. Aseer, a former MPCC(I) president. Incidentally, both Prof. Aseer and Mr Vilasrao Deshmukh have got tickets to contest the coming Assembly elections. In August last year, two allegedly notorious criminals, Babu Resham and Ramakant Naik, who were sentenced to life imprisonment, were let out on parole by the minister Prof. Aseer. This would not have come to light had not two petitioners, Mr J.V. Shetty and Mr S.K. Shetty, filed a writ petition in the Bombay High Court asking for details regarding the conditions under which parole was granted. These two criminals and a third person, Arun Gawli, who were involved in the Parasnath murder case were given bail while their appeal against the life sentence was pending in the Bombay High Court. The government itself got this bail order cancelled. But during that period they had murdered Sridhar Shetty, relative of the petitioners. Justices S.P. Kurudkar and N.M. Qazi charged Prof. Aseer with gross contempt of the High Court as he passed parole orders despite an order to the contrary of the Bombay High Court. The government quietly withdrew the parole permission.

Olga Tellis, Bombay

'Politics Mein Sab Chor Hain'

Haji Mastan told Dhiren Bhagat

Beyond Bhiwandi lies Kalyan. It is a small town in Thana district whose inhabitants operate powerlooms, grow watermelons and rice. One-fifth of them are Muslims, another fifth Dalits. Earlier this year, when Haji Mastan Mirza announced his intention of opening the Dalit Mussalman Mahasangh office in Kalyan—an illegal pink-walled shed no more than eight feet by fifteen, clumsily erected overnight—the deputy commissioner had issued an order prohibiting him from entering the town for 21 days.

On 19 February, Mastanbhai finally entered Kalyan. I was with him in his ramshackle 1960 model Fiat. It was dark, a little before midnight. The driver didn't know his way, and anyway Mastanbhai had thoroughly rattled the poor man with his sharp backseat supervision (light bandh: dekh ke nahin chalta; etc.). Then, suddenly the crowd began surrounding us, began crushing the doors. Some sat on the bonnet, others danced in front of the car slowing us to a crawl.

More than a thousand shouting figures dragged the vehicle through Kalyan's smelly gullies, finally taking us to the chowk where the blue-and-white pandal stood. ("Neela Daliton ka rang hai, safed hamara," I later heard Mastan explain to an Urdu journalist from Delhi.) "Safed hamara?" the journalist asked, incredulous. "Haan," came the ingenious reply. "Mussalman ko sirf aman chahiye."

I saw only one bearded face that night. No kurtas, not even the shiny blue and violet Bhindi Bazaar specials, no pajamas, no tehmats. Only shirts and trousers and the occasional dark jacket. No sherwanis. I suspect that every Muslim boy in Kalyan had turned up that night. They were cheering lustily. After all, during the riots last May, how many rich Muslims had bothered to visit Bhiwandi distributing medicines, or guns?

The speakers were angry and the crowd wanted them to be angry. "Ham Hindustani hain," a short dark speaker yelled into the microphones. "Ham Hindustani hain aur ham Hindustan lekar hi rahenge. Hamen Pakistan nahin chahiye." Applause. "Kyaa ham bewakoof hain ki apna hi banaya hua Taj Mahal ham chod ke kahin aur chale jaayen?" Delirious applause.

In contrast, Mastan was cool. No shouting, no noise. In the manner of a jocular compere he sang out shers and latifas. If Khushwant Singh ever campaigned for the Assembly elections, I imagine his speeches would be quite like Mastan's; the shers would be better, the latifas just as crude.

"Ham aapko ek sher sunainge," began Mastan.

"Jab bhi gulshan ko khoon ki zaroorat padi
Sab se pehle Musalmaanon ki gardan kati
Phir bhi kehte hain yeh eh-le-chaman
Yeh chaman hamara hai, tumhara nahin."

What do you expect? It went down like a shot.

"Chalo, ek aur sher sunainge," said Mastan.

Dushmano ne to dushmani kee hai
In puleeswaalon ne bhi kyaa kami kee hai?"

Then there was no holding him back.

"Ham aapko ek aur sher sunainge ab." That was greeted with laughter.

"Bhes badla, kyaa huaa
Dil ko badalna chahiye
Dalit aur Mussalmaanon ko takraane ke liye
Gaay ka kaleja chahiye."

Haji Mastan Mirza.

Mastan is particularly proud of this sher. One of his boys in Aurangabad, he claims, is in jail because of it. As he begins the last line he holds his palms apart as if he were holding a football: the young boys lap it up.

"Ek aur sher sunainge ham." Loud laughter. It is his takiya kalaam. He has hit the right note. He will now pile on sher upon sher: excess is the key.

"Sarfaroshi ki tamanna
Dalit aur Mussalmaanon men hai
Dekhna hai zor kitna
Baazu-e-Patil men hai."

Mastan always dresses in white, white or cream. For the meeting in Kalyan he wore a cream terylene Jodhpuri with matching trousers. The next day for the hunger strike at the Nagpada police station, he was wearing a loose white terycot shirt. He looks like a very clean peon. He has few obvious extravagances. The State Express cigarettes he chainsmokes remind you of his affluence. In his Mohammed Ali Road office too, there is a curious mixture of new technology and old ways: the dial of the black Bombay Telephones receiver is locked to prevent unauthorised calls. But when Mastanbhai wishes to speak to someone, a sidekick flicks the buttons on a remote control job and the call goes through the shiny black receiver.

Mastan speaks in a Bombay dialect of Hindustani (khallas meaning "finished" is a favourite word). He is clueless when it comes to dates and does even keep track of the precise number of candidates he is fielding in the elections. (When I asked him, he said 23, later 24. In Kalyan, I heard a party worker being told 20. Someone told the press it was 50. "Woh bhi theek hai," Mastan said to him gently, "Ham support to bohat ko kar rahen hain.") He frequently forgets names. But for all that, there is a way in which he is always alert. He misses nothing. His dark sticklike frame is constantly animated, his glazed bulbous eyes are always watching. One of his men had warned me that he was a man of few words and that he would soon dry up when I began the interview. They were wrong. He was loquacious, voluble and spoke excitedly for an hour-and-a-half.

Q: Let us start with your ancestors...

A: I never saw my grandparents, not even my father. I was born here in Maharashtra, in poverty in a jhonpda.

Q: Who were your ancestors?

A: They were businessmen from the south. From Tamil Nadu. Ramnath.

Q: When did your family turn Muslim?

A: We have been Muslims from before. Sunni Mussalman ka yahi matlab hai, sun kar iman liya. Eighteen people came to India, Mughals or whatever: today there are 20 crore Muslims in India.

Q: When did your family first hear of the Paigamber?

A: I don't know, I don't remember.

Q: Where did you grow up?

A: Crawford Market.

Q: People say you grew up in a packing case...

A: No, no. Not a packing case. We lived in a jhopadpatti. Musafirkhana, Saboo Siddique Road.

Q: When did you start work?

A: From my childhood I have been a mazdoor.

Q: What was your age at that time: five or six?

A: Haan. Badmaash tha main. I would run about, not attend school, for 15 days at a time I would not attend school. It was a municipal school: Fatima Bai School, near Crawford Market.

Q: What jobs did you do?

A: I sold tea, sold chikki, sold magazines in a cinema, sold liquor, everything. Everything a man should do I did. What an animal should do I never did.

Q: Then you became a coolie...

A: Coolie. That's what I was all along, a coolie. Everything I have said to you, all these jobs, they were coolie jobs. Then, from the age of 12, I worked in the docks. After that I had a cycle shop, a beedi shop. That was my idea all along, that I should own something. I used to see everyone's cars. I had to come to Mahim on a cycle. I wanted to travel in a car.

Q: When did you buy your first car?

A: I have never bought a car.

Q: But what about the Fiat we were travelling in?

A: That too is not mine (laughs).

Q: When did you first travel in a car?

A: I was about 30 then. I was still a coolie.

Q: What do you dream of at night?

A: Only frightening dreams. Shaitaan aaya, bhoot aaya (laughs). What passes through the brain all day, that is what one sees at night. I have only frightening dreams.

Q: When did you learn to read and write?

A: During the Emergency, when I was in jail. I learnt Hindi then.

Q: Why Hindi? Why not Urdu? Was it because it is the national language?

A: No, no, no. Hindi was easier to learn, that is all. I was alone in the cell. I had no teacher. I asked for some books by which one may teach oneself. A, B, C, D, bhi pada hamne, phir chod diya. If I had the time I would have learnt Urdu as well.

In this world everyone is corrupt, has to be corrupt: the businessmen, the poor, the government. If they did not have to do badmaashi, phir Allah ne Jannat aur Jahannum kyon banaaya?

Q: When did you decide to enter politics?

A: I have always been in politics. I have always done political work in my area. Jahan baat chalti thi, madad karta tha.

Q: Did you do union work?

A: No, but when (Maharashtra CM) Vasantdada put me in jail after Bhiwandi, I distributed medicines to those who had been beaten, who had been burnt, distributing clothes, medicines, unke phursaane haal poochte the ham. The government did not like this, they caught me and put me in jail under NSA for 25 days, without any proof...

Q: Which jail were you in?

A: Thana jail.

Q: What is it like in jail?

A; Bhai, jail to jail hi hai. There were all of us in jail, the Shiv Sena people, ourselves. We used to talk to them. Caste, community, one forgets all this in jail. Yeh baaten bhar ki hain. This chap Jai Gurudev, he was with me in jail once in Agra. We got on famously. There was no question of jaat, I used to give him tea. I, a Muslim. He would drink tea made by me.

Q: What else do you recollect of your stint in jail?

A: What memories does one have of jail? In jail, I was considered a particularly dangerous character. They would take me in alone, with 20 or 25 guards around me. Uspe ek sher bolta hoon main:

Kaamp rahi hai...(pause)
Kaamp rahi hai...(long pause)
Baad men batayenge.

Q: You were talking about why you entered political life...

A: Yes. I said to myself, why be afraid of them? If they can put us in jail when we are innocent we might as well do something and then go to jail. Why be afraid of them? They are putting us in jail anyway.

Q: How many times have you gone to jail?

A: Two, three, four times.

Q: When was the first time you went to jail?

A: In 1964, when the Emergency was on.

Q: Which Emergency?

A: Indira Gandhi's Emergency. Just before that.

Q: You mean the 1975 Emergency. What happened?

A: There was this director of revenue intelligence. He took me in and asked me: 'What are you up to?' I said: 'What shall I say?' He said you did such and such (thing). I said, yes I have done it. But when he took the pen and asked me to sign the statement, I said, 'What are you doing?' I denied it all. I said: 'I don't know what you are talking about.' He said: 'I won't leave you.' Maine kaha mat chodna. Aur kyaa karoge tum? What other power have you got? I left his office, found out about a girl he used to visit, got her to implicate him. She went and told him about it. He had me arrested. For nine months I was under arrest. Ram Jethmalani tried to get me bail, no luck. I even hired Kumaramangalam, had to go to the High Court. Finally, I got out on Rs 20 lakhs bail. It was the highest bail till then. Phir main choot gaya us case men. Till today nothing has been proven against me in a court. But while the case was on the direc-

Mastan: The Politician

Haji Mastan — Sondeep Shankar

The government has thrown a spanner in Haji Mastan Mirza's election machinery. The news that Rs 1.5 crores has been received by Mastan from Saudi Arabia has caught his followers by surprise. The general secretary of the Dalit Muslim Suraksha Mahasangh (DMSM), the young Syed Hamid said, "This is a conspiracy to malign us. Our money is deposited in our account at the Moreland Road branch of the Memon Cooperative Bank. The account is in the name of the Mahasangh and it is operated by me and two other secretaries. We have about Rs 10,000 which has been collected from membership fees (Rs 14 a year). You can look into our accounts." Hamid sees this as the government's "first step to try and crush us."

For the Lok Sabha elections, the Mahasangh had two candidates. One of them, Sceraj Mirza, a former journalist, polled the highest votes in the Nagpada and Chinchpokli constituencies, in fact, higher than Dr Datta Samant and the Congress(I)-supported candidate Mrs Rosa Deshpande. Their other candidate Khalil Zaheed, editor of the controversial Akbar-e-Alam also polled around 70,000 votes in Aurangabad. They claim they were responsible for the defeat of the Congress(I) candidate, a former minister of state, Mr Abdul Azeem. Said Hamid, "We can at least throw out the Congress(I) wherever we have our candidates. So this is the reason they want to crush us. This is only the first step."

However, Hamid could speak only for the Mahasangh. He could not say whether Mastan had received this money personally. He emphasised that it had not come to the party. According to the government, the National Commercial Bank of Jeddah purchased Indian currency worth Rs 1.5 crores from an Indian Bank and this amount was allegedly earmarked for the election campaign of Haji Mastan's party. If such money has come, the office-bearers of the Mahasangh have obviously not been taken into confidence. Hamid claims that "we have no money even for posters and propaganda material on the scale that is needed." He added that "it is obvious that the government is scared of our agitation, protests and resistance to oppression." He explained that hitherto there were no organisations to voice the oppression of the minorities and said that the Mahasangh for the first time was doing this. "We are aggressive in our democratic, progressive actions," he said.

That the government is apprehensive about the nuisance value of Mastan's entry into the election fray is obvious in the arrest of the candidates and supporters of the Dalit Muslim Suraksha Mahasangh. The joint president of the Mahasangh, Prof. Jogendra Kawada, was detained under the National Security Act on 22 February at ten in the night when he was scheduled to address a meeting of the party's candidate. Syed Dawood, at Kannad tehsil near Aurangabad. Jogendra, a young fiery Dalit leader and professor in Ambedkar college, Nagpur, heads his self-styled Dalit Liberation Army and has joined hands with Haji Mastan Mirza to form an organisation for the uplift of the minorities and the scheduled castes. The Mahasangh has fielded six candidates in Bombay and seven in the rest of Maharashtra while they are supporting five candidates of the Muslim League in Bombay and nine in the rest of Maharashtra. One of their candidates, Sarfraz Arsu from Nagpada has been on indefinite fast since 21 February, to protest against the harassment of the party's candidates. Among those arrested was the Bhiwandi candidate, Isa Azim, editor of the Bhiwandi News which was responsible for inciting Muslims. This had sparked off the riots in May 1984. Isa has since been released. The other candidates are mostly "businessmen" and one is a builder. One of them, Arif Ahmed, is an ex-councillor and office bearer of the Janata Party which he has since quit.

Olga Tellis, Bombay

tor began publicity against me. Government ne mujhe mashoor kiya.

Q: There is all this talk of clean government these days. What do you make of it?

A: All this is (only) talk. What can Rajiv do? A man spends Rs 30 lakhs to get elected, buys one-and-a-half lakh votes at Rs 19 a vote, what will he do? He will have to convert it to Rs 300 lakhs. Paagal kutte ne to nahin kaata ki siyaasat men apna paisa kho daale. Yeh haqeeqat hai. This is the reality. A man has got to provide for his children, for his grandchildren. Paagal to nahin, paise lagga doon... There is a system. People don't just get into politics for nothing.

Q: Is there no escape from the system?

A: The system can only begin to get clean when you pay a policeman a minimum (salary) of Rs 2,000 a month. Start him at Rs 2,000 and go up to Rs 5,000. Instead, they start the policeman at Rs 300. At Rs 300 a month, how can a man be honest? You say: Do bachche bas. But do you know how much it costs to give a child milk for the month? Rs 150. For two children, Rs 300. And then the policeman has to feed his children, clothe his children, give his wife a sari. Yahaan to system rakhana chahiye London ka. Here, after retiring, a man becomes an insect. Worse than an insect. But in London, after a man retires he knows he will be taken care of. Not just for the police, all government servants. Agar aadmi ka pet bhara ho to woh do rupye maangneke liye nahin jaayega. Why does a man rob? Why does he do wrong? because his stomach is empty. When he is hungry he will do anything in the world, no matter how terrible. Kyonki pet men aag lag rahi hai. When his stomach is full he will say: no I will not do this. But all they say these days is: We will clean up this, we will clean up that, we will remove the bank directors. If you want to clean up, you have to give people what they need. You must understand their difficulties. In our Islam, in the time of Hazrate Umere Farooq, the Hazrat would drape a cloth and walk in the city at night, hearing everything: who needs what, who is hungry, who is thirsty? And, before the morning the needy would get what they needed. In this world everyone is corrupt, has to be corrupt: the businessmen, the poor, the government. If they did not have to do badmaashi, phir Allah ne Jannat aur Jahannum kyon banaaya?

Q: Given this reality, do you think Rajiv is capable of really changing anything?

A: The fact is, he has come under the influence of the RSS. Whatever the RSS says, he does. Aur RSS inko dubaa dene waali hai, yeh aadhi chaddi waale.

Q: What proof do you have of this. Why do you say this?

A: We have a candidate, Ameen Khandwni, in BHINDI Bazaar. He used to do things for the Muslims, built a musafirkhana for the hajis. The Congress party has denied him a ticket, has given it to a Hindu woman. This is the work of the RSS. Then there is Maulana Kachoochi. They didn't give him a ticket because he speaks up. In Aurangabad, Chaturvedi is a good man, he speaks against the RSS, (they) didn't give him a Congress ticket. Those Muslims in the Congress, they are worse than dumb buffaloes, (but) a dumb buffao has its horns.

Q: Some people feel that people like Gandhiji did more for the Muslims than any Muslim has ever done. Do you agree?

A: No, he didn't do much for the Muslims. Oopar se shanti shanti kehta tha, andar se kranti.

Q: What sort of kranti?

A: Maaramari, hallad., This is no new thing. Bhiwandi is no new thing. It was not the first hallad I have seen. I have seen three such disturbances. I was young when the navy hallad took place. We threw stones, chasing the goras. The leaders told us: "No one will fire on you." To ham bohat himmatwalle ban gaye the: ham pe koi goli nahi maarega. Then they began the firing: tha, tha, tha. Many died. I survived. I hid behind a barber's shop, near Crawford Market. Before that too, I had seen riots, Hindus and Muslims killing each other. They used to cut people into pieces and throw them in the gutter. British karva raha tha. Kabab men haddi. They had to do it, had to rule here.

Q: Could it not be the case that he who has to rule has to do such things?

A: Yes, absolutely. Definitely. Otherwise you cannot rule.

Q: Since you are so realistic about these matters why then do you blame the government for its role in riots, for its failure to do things? Ho sakta hai yeh bhi maajbooriayaan hain sarkar ki?

A: I agree sarkar has to do badmaashi, the business*wallahs* too have to do badmaashi, kaala karna padta hai, peela karna padta hai.

Q: Then why do you get so upset when they lock you up under NSA?

A: It is their job to punish troublemakers. I agree. You have caught me. But why have you not caught Bal Thackeray? I was troubled. When you have caught me, why have you not caught Thackeray? (If Bal Thackeray had been arrested) Then I would have said: Barabar kiya hai. If we do wrong, catch us by all means, but catch them as well: that is justice. Krishna Menon used to say no gun has been manufactured that can

Mantan with a friend

The most envied colour TV within a stone's throw!

Does what I want to make some of such a beautiful TV! Mentally thought many might some of your neighbours' interest

Welcome to your new ONIDA colour television. It's not only classy, futuristic look. And the picture boundary true to life colour the viewers some of TV's worst. And have been deeply registering the fact that they're stuck with colour TVs that are obviously a generation behind!

You may of course argue, your neighbours are the nicest lot. Such violent emotion, would never cloud their noble minds no matter how much they envy your ONIDA TV. Well lucky you!

ONIDA is the Authorized Service Centre of JVC. Action in case you want more details rush to the nearest Dealer

ONIDA

20"colour TV with cordless remote. It's been worth waiting!

Avenues O 119 85

fire in only one direction. But our Maharashtra government has manufactured such a gun.

Q: Given your view of the badmaashi in India, do you think Sanjay Gandhi was a good man?

A: Yes, he was a very good man, clever, strong. (He) could control people. I liked him a lot. He was the right man for India. He was daring. Kuch tod bhi deta tha to kehta tha: Dekho, bhai maine tumhara masjid nahin toda, tumhare masjid ke agal ka angaan toda hai. He was strong enough to say that. He would break houses, temples. I think his mind worked on Amercian lines, not Russian lines. A very good man. He thought, why should the Tatas and the Birlas alone do well? Let everyone come in, let everyone do well. Why should one businessman have a monopoly? Now all his men have been destroyed. Even in Indiraji's time (this happened), but whoever was left has been finished now. Take Kamal Nath. He was a good man.

Q: What do you think of the Muslim leadership in this country?

A: They have all been traitors. Not one Muslim leader has done anything for the Muslims.

Q: What about Syed Shahabuddin? What do you think of him? Have you met him?

A: No, I have not met him. Don't know much about him.

Q: What about Syed Bukhari?

A:(He is) Useless.

Q: What about Antulay?

A: His biggest fault was that he took cheques. Fool. Why did he have to take cheques? .Such an idiot. I don't know how he passed his barristeri (law). And then he talks too much. His other big mistake was he left the Congress party. Now he is finished.

Q: What do you think of Dumpy (Akbar Ahmed)?

A: Dumpy men himmat nahin hai. I have seen this. He came here, to my home, attended my daughter's wedding. Dumpy (then) made a statement: 'I had gone to Mastanbhai because he had given the Congress so much money.' Why are you afraid to say you had come to my house? If I had gone to a daku's house and I was asked about it, I would not say: 'No, I haven't been there.' Dumpy is not strong enough...he won't make a good leader.

Q: What do you think of Rukhsana Sultan?

A: Good woman. I have known her, haven't met her for a while though. She can become a leader, she is a good woman. I had said to her: 'Work for our party.' She turned it down. You see, she is an old Congress supporter. She's a strong woman.

Q: People think of you as a criminal...

A: People call me a badmaash. To this day I have never carried a knife in my pocket. Films like Deewar are bakwaas.

Q: I understand you are acting in a film.

A: Yes, my picture is being made. I am acting as the hero. Like this Gandhi film, this will be a film of my story. Ali Raza is writing the story. It will be called Paatal Ganga. Yehi hai, bhai kismat hoti hai, yeh hota hai, woh hota hai, maramari hoti hai, goondon ko maarna...

Politics mein sab chor hain. Do you think any election can be fought without black money? Of course, the Congress has spent black money. Why don't you call Rajiv Gandhi a criminal? Nothing has been proved against him, nor has anything been proved against me.

Q: But you say you have never carried a knife in your pocket.

A: Yes, it won't be like Deewar. Ali Raza has said himself, I was talking to Mastanbhai and he was speaking with his eyes. Yeh aankhon ka tazaara nazaara vahan batayenge. Like the Godfather, a very good film. I didn't like the second part, but the first part is very good. As long as the Godfather is alive, tab tak bade maze ki baat hai woh. There are some very good things in the film: he never tells anyone to kill people. Par jo aadmi khade hote hain paas men, woh khud samajh jaate hain kyaa hai man men iske. This is what it is like in real life. Goondas don't yell when they tell their story. They look at their boss, and they understand what he wants. But in Paatal Ganga I will also fight.

Q: Have you ever fought in your life?

A: No. But otherwise it will be just a documentary. Cinematic rakhna hai.

Q: People have begun to get worried now that criminals like you are entering politics. How do you respond to that charge?

A: Politics men sab chor hain. Do you think any election can be fought without black money? Of course the Congress has spent black money. Why don't you call Rajiv a criminal? Nothing has been proved against him, nor has anything been proved against me. And anyway as for the people if they call me something why don't they call Valmiki anything? Haan wohi Valmiki jisne pothi likhi, Ramayana likhi. He was a daku. Today, people speak of him with respect. Insaan galti ka putla hai, galti men insaan paida hua hai. He can change.

Q: What evidence is there that you have changed?

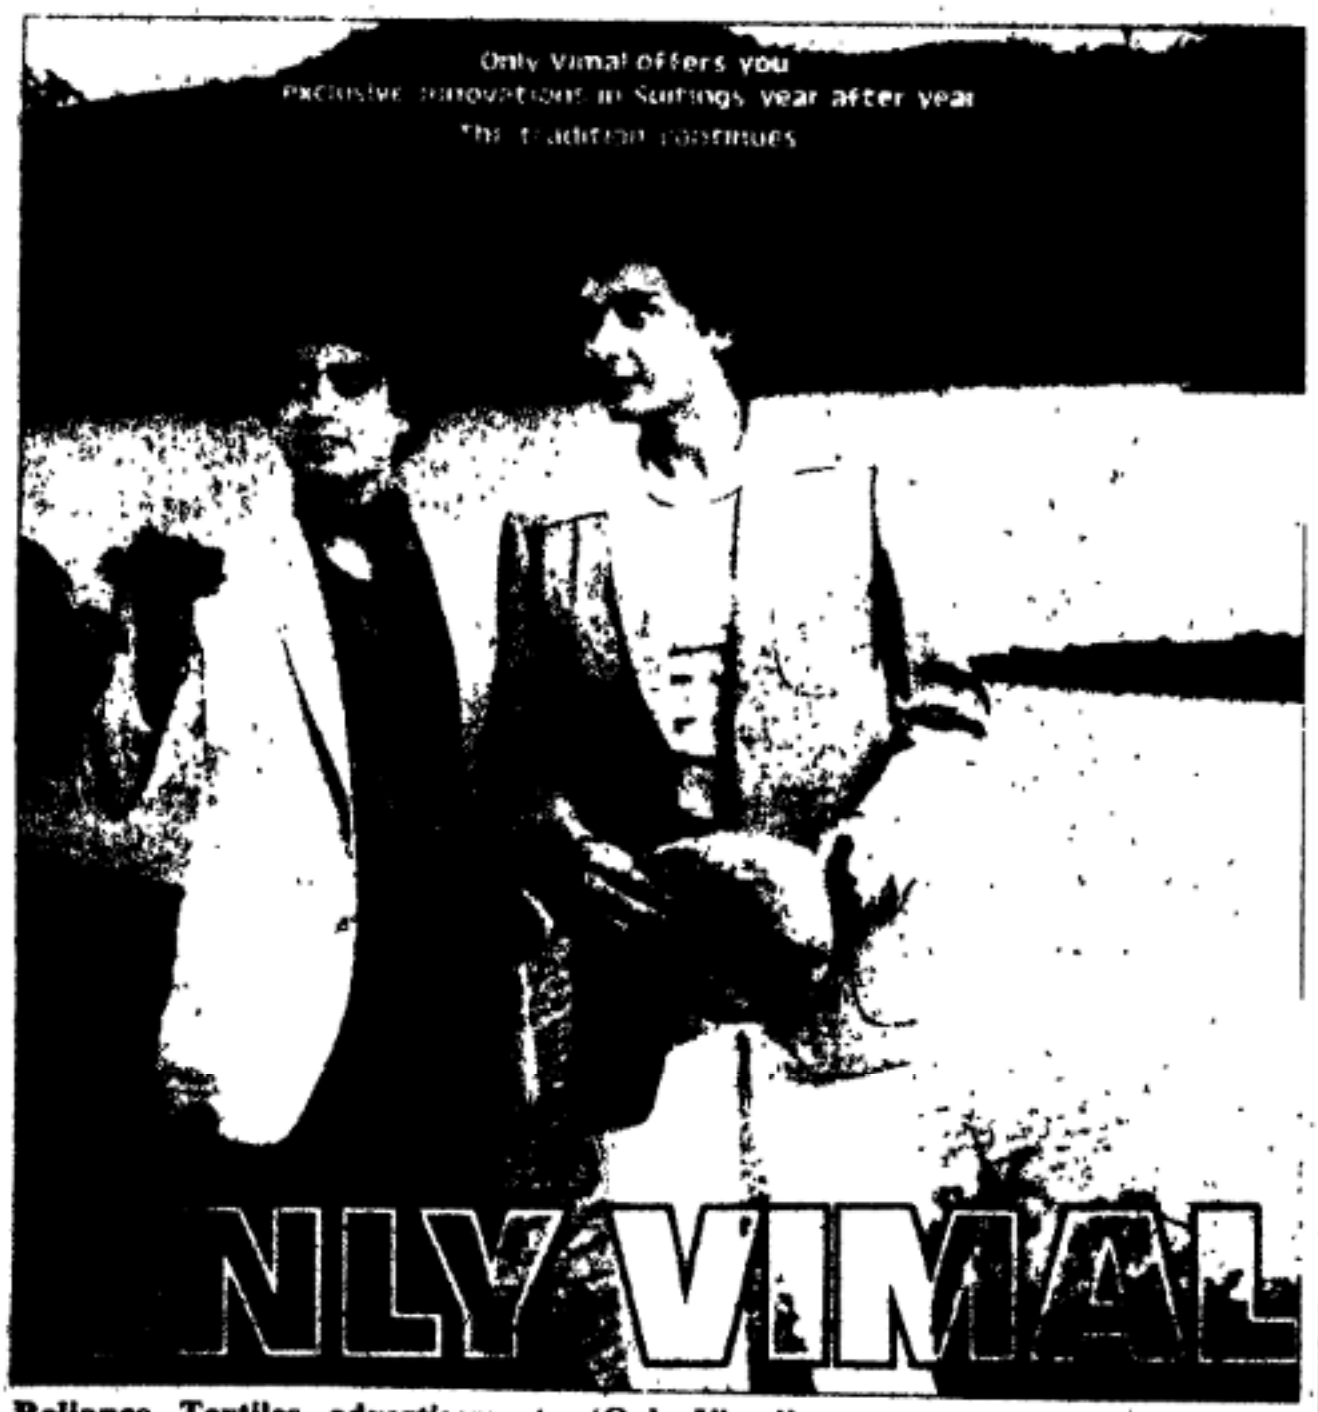
A: I myself am the evidence before you.

Q: Why did you withdraw your nomination for the Lok Sabha from Bombay South? Many people feel you had a deal with Murli Deora and that your political activity was merely a way of cashing in on your popularity among the Muslim youth. That popularity could only get you something with which you could bargain with the Congress in the state.

A: That is not true. I withdrew my nomination because I had fielded two other candidates and I felt I had to campaign for them, in Aurangabad and in Bombay. In both constituencies we defeated the Congress candidate even though we did not win ourselves. Aurangabad is a huge constituency and it is very far from Bombay. I stood down so that my boys could do better.

Q: Will you ever contest an election again?

A: No, never. I will put up candidates, campaign for them, support them, but never contest an election.



Q: Why not?

A: To earn a name one does not have to contest an election. (Take the case of) JP: which election did he stand for? Gandhi: which election did he stand for?

(Of these states, only UP had Swadeshi Polytex's unit; the rest were virgin areas.) So, not only was the stipulation regarding the size of the plant reversed, but a plant was allowed to be set up in Maharashtra when Dhirubhai Ambani moved the application for his staple fibre unit at Patalganga. Besides, the concept of joint sector ventures was forgotten. Thus, while giving the letter of intent to Reliance, the Maharashtra government's rejected application for joint-sector ventures was forgotten. Many applications from other parties in the Gujarat and Maharashtra region, which had been turned down, too were ignored. At one go three stipulations were overlooked.

In the case of Ambani's TPA plant also, major policy formulations were swept under the carpet. The feedstocks of the Mathura Refinery in Uttar Pradesh is capable of producing 1,50,000 tonnes of TPA annually. The Planning Commission and the petroleum ministry officials had envisaged a joint-sector project based on Mathura's paraxyline, which was to be located at Salempur in UP. Paraxyline is the raw material for TPA and DMT (dimethyl terephthalic), both of which substitute each other as inputs for polyester production. (While Ambani is setting up his TPA plant at Patalganga, the Wadias of Bombay Dyeing are also putting up a DMT plant in the same place. As a result, the entire DMT and TPA capacity in the country is being installed at the same location.) Suddenly, when Reliance applied for the TPA licence, the size of the Salempur plant was slashed to half and it was decided that while Ambani would set up a 75,000 tonne plant based on Mathura's paraxyline in Maharashtra, the project in UP would be of 75,000 tonne capacity. The then petroleum secretary, Lavraj Kumar, did not appreciate this scheme. Overnight, he was replaced by A.S. Gill. The TPA project of Ambani sailed through and both the licence and foreign collaboration clearance for this "prestige" project were given in October 1984. (A.S. Gill was among the 17 officers superceded by P.K. Kaul for the post of cabinet secretary. Gill recently quit the government.)

By getting the licence for MEG, Reliance would now become its largest manufacturer in India. At present two firms are producing MEG: the Baroda plant of Indian Petro-Chemicals Ltd (IPCL) and the Thana-Belapur belt unit of Nocil. While the IPCL unit's capacity is 20,000 tonnes, Nocil's capacity is 10,000 tonnes. The IPCL proposes to set up a new plant at Usar in Maharashtra, but the combined capacity of these units will not be able to match Ambani's Patalganga plant's 40,000 tonnes. Thus; thanks to Pranab Mukherjee's efficiency, Reliance will have the largest staple fibre plant, the largest MEG plant and, ultimately, due to the captive nature of the TPA and MEG production of Reliance, "Only Vimal" will not remain merely successful advertising copy but be an economic reality as well. The Reliance stranglehold over polyester will surpass any monopoly control seen before.

Reliance Textiles advertisement : 'Only Vimal'

Thapar, DCM, Mafatlal, Birla, Bombay Dyeing, Goenka, Modi, Orkay, Godrej—these are blue chip names. But Reliance surpasses them all not only in the sharemarket but in wielding influence in New Delhi as well. While Ambani's projects have been cleared one by one, rather at one go, the projects and interest of these houses have been affected in one way or the other. In many cases these corporate giants have watched with amazement the impunity with which Ambani's files have moved. Apart from textiles, Ambani has now turned his attention to detergents. In August 1984, he was granted the licence for a 50,000 tonne capacity linear alkyl benzene (LAB) plant. LAB is a raw material used in making detergents. The foreign tie-up was cleared in October. The location of the plant is still undecided, though Ambani is boasting about this diversification. At one stage, Vishakhapatnam was rumoured to be the proposed location. Now it is said that Ambani's favourite area, the west coast, will be the site of the LAB plant. A location near Hazira is being considered, it is said. While Reliance moved its application for LAB (it is an imported item now) which is a bio-degradable input for detergents produced from petroleum, the union government had before it a joint-sector proposal of the Gujarat government and Godrej for a similar project. The Godrej proposal, which was submitted before the Reliance LAB plan, was for the production of alpha olefin, which is also a bio-degradable input for detergents and is made from rice-bran oil. Someone in the government realised that there was a dearth of rice-bran oil in India, hence the alpha olefin project was shot down. The combined strength of the house of Godrej and the Gujarat government wilted before the might of Reliance. When the LAB plant goes on stream, Reliance will slowly extend its stranglehold on the detergents industry as well. People of India will not only be dependent largely on Ambani for textiles, but for detergents too.

Another Ambani project which went through in the days when Pranab Mukherjee was the finance minister was his purchase of the Chembur unit of Union Carbide. It is said that the Reliance link-up with Union Carbide was to have extended to Bhopal as well, but providence saved Ambani. This deal was in its infancy when the gas tragedy took place. The Chembur unit in Bombay, which has been purchased by Ambani, used to produce polyetheline, ethelyne oxide, propelyne benzine and acetiline black. Ambani proposes to produce linear low density polyetheline and high density polyetheline. Low density polyetheline is so far not made in India. It has a higher strength than the existing polyetheline available in the country, which is made by Polyolefin Ltd., a Mafatlal group company. Ambani is slowly reaching for monopoly control in this field too.

The latest Ambani project which has not attracted much attention is not located within the Indian peninsula. The Andaman and Nicobar islands will soon have a large mechanised farm unit of Dhirubhai Ambani. Production of edible palm oil is Ambani's latest venture. Permission has been granted to him to move to the erstwhile "Kalapani" and strike gold.

The Ambanis have controlled the union government's decision-making machinery to their benefit for the past decade. Now some strains have begun to show. To begin with, there are reports of differences within the family. Dhirubhai Ambani's brother, Ramniklal Ambani, is said to be having differences with Anil Ambani, the younger son of Dhirubhai, over the functioning of the Ahmedabad plant, which is an ultramodern textile unit. Last year there was some labour trouble in this unit, but somehow the news was suppressed in the media. More than these, the new posture of the government may worry the Ambanis. Apart from three proposals being held up, the way the excise duty on polyester yarn was suddenly rationalised in the second week of February shows that the influence of Reliance may be on the wane. In the duty policy formulated by Pranab Mukherjee, there were three duty slabs. The government had declared yarn upto 350 deniers as textile yarn and put a flat duty of Rs 90 per kg. Between 350 and 749 deniers, the duty was Rs 65 per kg and above 750 deniers, it was Rs 18.75 per kg. In this scheme, big manufacturers, notably Reliance, Orkay and Petrofils benefited to the tune of Rs 70 crores per annum. The government's exchequers received Rs 70 crores less of duty because the big manufacturers, taking advantage of latest technology, showed the product of 750 deniers and 355 deniers yarn used to draw out finer deniers for texturising. In one stroke of the pen, finance minister V.P. Singh rationalised this and made an uniform duty of Rs 83.75 per kg applicable on all yarn. As a result small units, which were paying Rs 90 till now, will pay less. For big units the hike from Rs 18.75 to Rs 83.75 is a big jump.

The political influence of the Reliance group, however, can never be underestimated. Since V.P. Singh refuses to meet individual industrialists, it is difficult to float rumours about "proximity" to the finance minister. Equally inaccessible to hangers on is the Prime Minister's principal aide and personal friend, parliamentary secretary Arun Singh. Reliance men, however, have been spreading stories about the "friendship" between Arun Singh and Dhirubhai's son, Mukesh Ambani. To stress their point, they point out that when Rajiv Gandhi (then AICC general secretary) went to Geneva last year accompanied by Arun Singh, Mukesh Ambani too had been taken along. While it may be true that Mukesh Ambani was in Geneva simultaneously with Rajiv Gandhi and Arun Singh, no indications are available so far that the Ambanis were part of the VIP team. Such stories, however, have to circulate. When a bubble is created, myth and fiction have to be relied upon to keep it from bursting. One has to see how the new wave government, which has been relentlessly talking of "clean" administration tackles such pressure-tactics. Surprisingly, while in the field of fertilisers the government had split up the investment into many hands in the private sector, in an allied field, petrochemicals, a monopoly was allowed to grow. Will the "clean" government undo the wrongs of former ministers like Pranab Mukherjee?

Despite difficulties now being faced by Ambani, the clearances already given by Pranab Mukherjee have brought Reliance Textile Industries on the verge of emerging as India's biggest private conglomerate in the next few years.

Four in a Row

In the government's latest list of foreign collaborations which it has approved, Reliance Textile Industries figures in five places. In the list published in February, which details the tie-ups cleared in the last quarter of 1984, serial numbers 166, 167, 168 and 169 are all related to Reliance. The Ambanis have gone one step further than a hattrick.

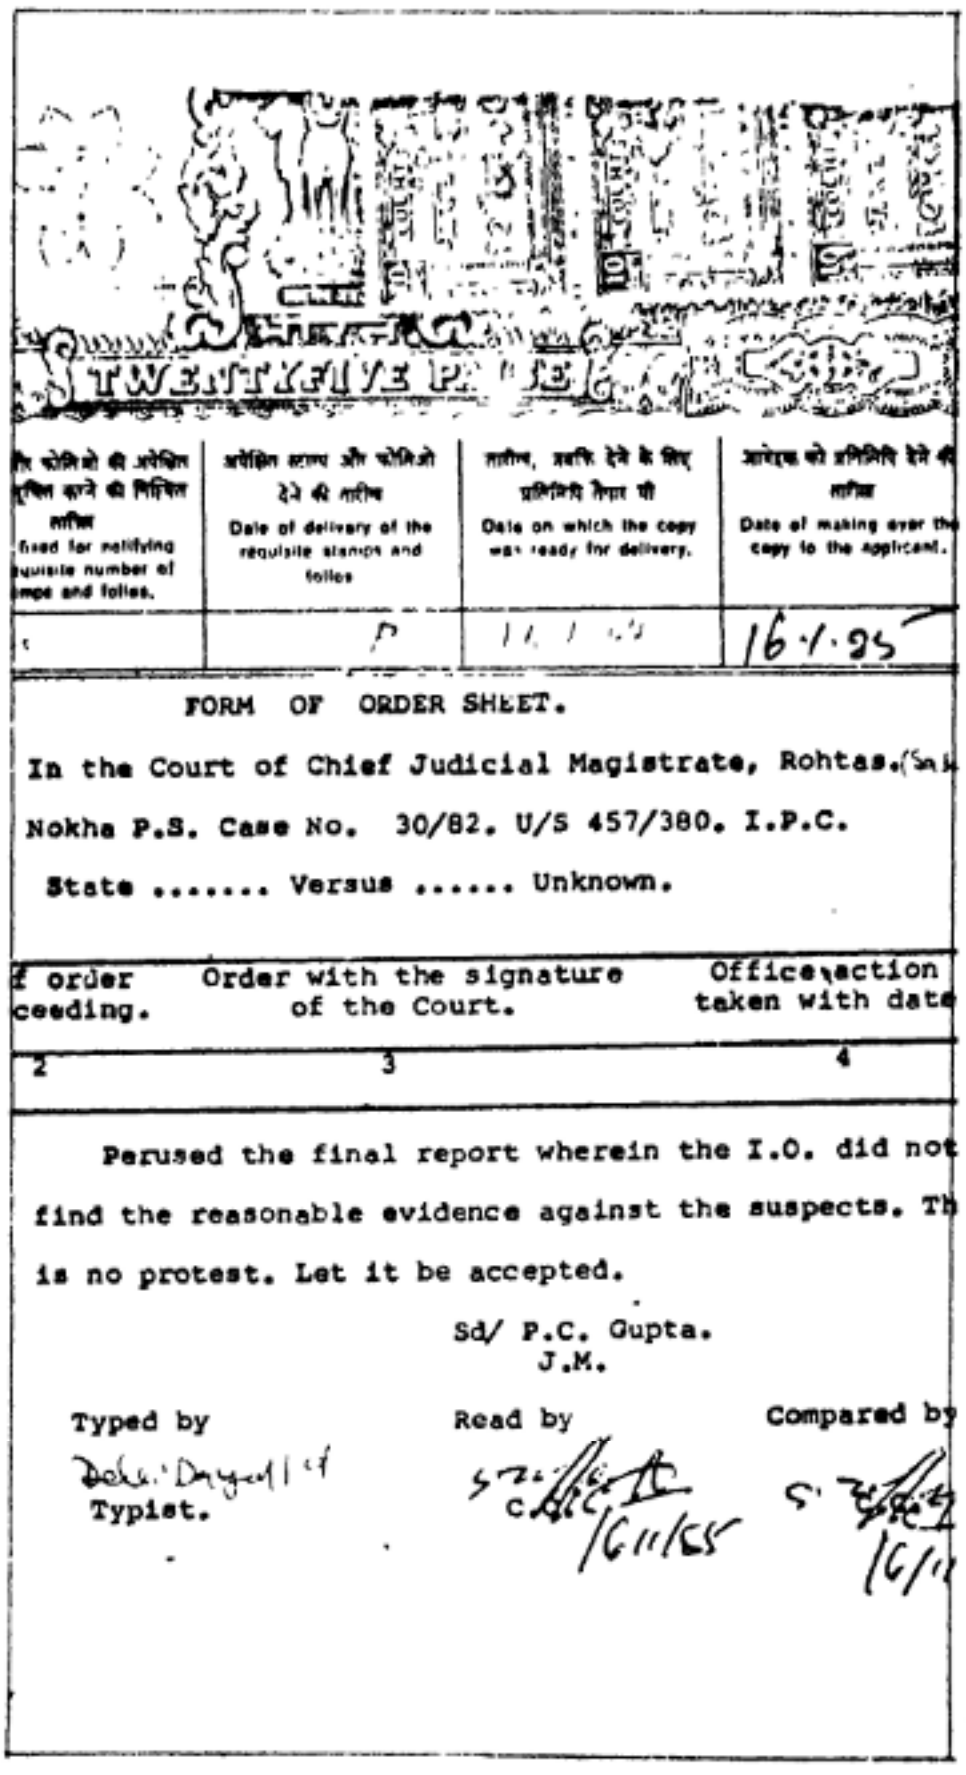
A total of 193 tie-ups were approved between October and December 1984. Apart from Reliance Textile Industries Ltd, 222 Maker Chambers IV, Nariman Point, Bombay 400021, no other name is repeated in the list. The tieups listed by the government are:

- Serial number 132: Reliance with Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd, UK for purified terephthalic acid (PTA): technical collaboration.
- Serial number 166: Reliance with UOP Processes International (Inc.) USA, for PTA: technical collaboration.
- Serial number 167: Reliance with UOP Processes International (Inc.) USA, for linear alkyl benzene: technical collaboration.
- Serial number 168: Reliance with Union Carbide Corporation of USA, for mono ethylene glycol and its byproducts: technical collaboration.
- Serial number 169: Reliance with E.I. Du Point, i.e. Chemtex Fibres Inc., 850 Third Avenue, New York: collaboration for (I) production of polyester yarn of triobal cross section, and (II) production of low denier per filament: designs and drawings.

Even the Tatas and Birlas could never have bagged four consecutive serial numbers in the same clearance list. After all, Reliance is different.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya

INVESTIGATION



Innocents in Bihar Jails

A racket in fake warrants thrives in Munger

Nageshwar Tanti had just started arranging the trays in his sweet shop in Murgiachowk, Munger (about 200 km from Patna), when he heard someone call him from the road outside. Wiping his hands, he stepped out and saw the havildar of the local police station. What does he want now, this early in the morning, the young sweet-seller thought to himself, cursing the policeman under his breath. Policemen from the nearby Kharagpur police station visited the shops in the bazaar at least once a day to pick up whatever they fancied without, of course, paying a single paise for them. Perhaps, the havildar wants a kilo of sweets, Tanti thought to himself, and decided not to entertain him.

"Do you know I can arrest you?" the havildar started the conversation. Shocked, Tanti had no reply. He had never stolen, never done anybody any harm. Why, then, was he being arrested? "Come with me to the police station. I will show you your warrant of arrest," said the havildar.

By then a number of people had assembled around them and as is usual in such cases, people started cutting nasty remarks about the sweet-seller. Humiliated, Tanti had no other alternative but to follow the policeman. At the police station, Tanti was shown his arrest warrant. It was signed by the judicial magistrate

TWENTYFIVE P...E

...ीसों की अपेक्षित ...ुचित करने की निर्धारित तारीख fixed for notifying requisite number of stamps and folios.	अपेक्षित स्टाम्प और पोथियों देने की तारीख Date of delivery of the requisite stamps and folios	तारीख, जबकि देने के लिए प्रतिलिपि तैयार थी Date on which the copy was ready for delivery.	आवेदक को प्रतिलिपि देने की तारीख Date of making over the copy to the applicant.
...	...	11/1/85	16.1.85

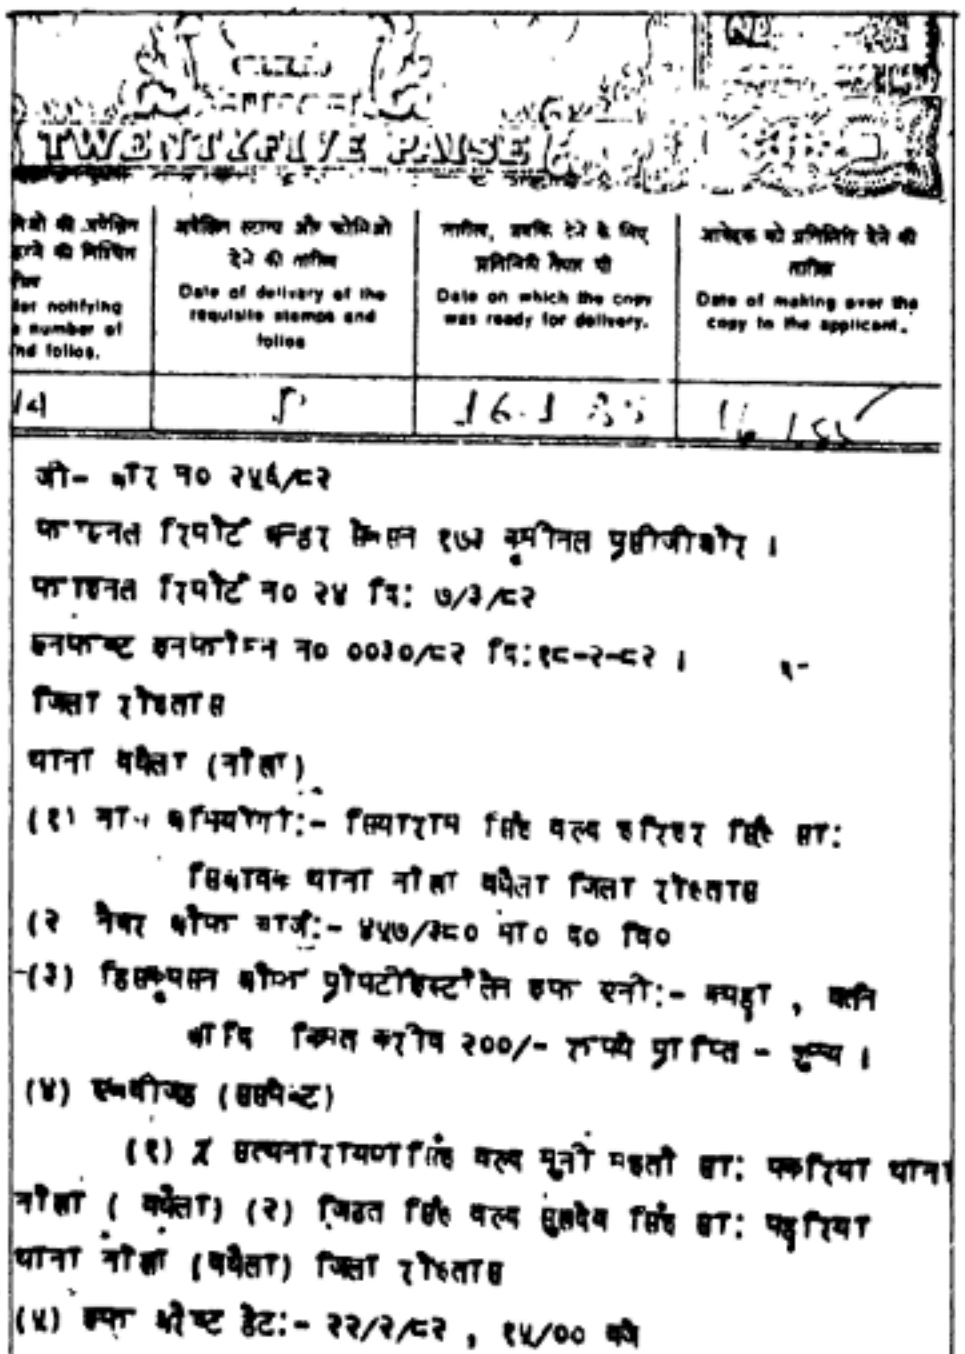
FORM OF ORDER SHEET.

In the Court of Chief Judicial Magistrate, Rohtas.(Sa...

Nokha P.S. Case No. 30/82. U/S 457/380. I.P.C.

State ..... Versus ..... Unknown.

...f order ceeding.	Order with the signature of the Court.	Office action taken with date
2	3	4



Perused the final report wherein the I.O. did not find the reasonable evidence against the suspects. Th... is no protest. Let it be accepted.

Sd/ P.C. Gupta.
J.M.

Typed by — Typist.

Read by

Compared by

TWENTYFIVE PAISE

...ीसों की अपेक्षित ...ुचित करने की निर्धारित तिथि ...ber notifying ...e number of ...nd folios.	अपेक्षित स्टाम्प और पोथियों देने की तारीख Date of delivery of the requisite stamps and folios	तारीख, जबकि देने के लिए प्रतिलिपि तैयार थी Date on which the copy was ready for delivery.	आवेदक को प्रतिलिपि देने की तारीख Date of making over the copy to the applicant.
14	15	16.1.85	16.1.85

जी- कॉर नं0 २५६/८२

फारवर्डिंग रिपोर्ट अन्डर सेक्शन १७३ दण्डित प्रक्रिया संहिता ।

फाइनल रिपोर्ट नं0 २४ दि: ७/३/८२

इनफार्मेशन नं0 0030/८२ दि:१८-२-८२ ।

जिला रोहतास

थाना नोखा (बबेला)

(१) नाम अभियोगी:- सियाराम सिंह वल्द हरिहर सिंह सा:

सिकरिया थाना नोखा बबेला जिला रोहतास

(२) मैसर कौफ चार्ज:- ४५७/३८० भा० द० वि०

(३) डिसक्रिप्शन कौफ प्रोपर्टी/हिस्टरी केस इफ एनी:- क्यूड , कैश

बरामद किया करीब २००/- रुपये प्राप्त - शून्य ।

(४) एक्यूज्ड (डिफेन्ट)

(१) X सत्यनारायण सिंह वल्द मुनी महतो सा: पकरिया थाना नोखा (बबेला) (२) जितन सिंह वल्द सुखदेव सिंह सा: पकरिया थाना नोखा (बबेला) जिला रोहतास

(५) डेट ऑफ हेट:- २२/२/८२ , १५/०० बजे

(६) कालम नं0 ६ नील

(७) कालम नं0-७ नील

(८) कालम नं0 ८

यह कांड दि:१८-२-८२ को वादी सियाराम सिंह वल्द हरिहर सिंह ग्राम सिकरिया के पार्ट ब्या न के आधार पर विरुद्ध भारत धारा ४५७/३८० काफ किया गया ।

इस कांड में बरामद करीब कोई छूटी दिखाई पड़ी

Certified copies of the case under which Nageshwar Tanti was served a fake warrant

Nageshwar Tanti in his sweet shop: bewildered.

(first class) of Sasaram, P.C. Gupta. The warrant had been issued in case No GR 256/82. Tanti's crime: violating Section 379 of the IPC. The policeman said that since the warrant had been signed by the Sasaram magistrate, the crime must have been committed in Sasaram district.

"But I have never been to Sasaram in my life," Nageshwar Tanti stuttered. The policeman did not know anything. It was a warrant from the court and all that he was doing was carry out the court's orders. However, if Nageshwar Tanti could give him some money, he was willing to suppress the warrant for a few days. Otherwise, threatened the police man, Tanti would have to go to jail.

Within the hour Tanti had paid the policeman. One of the constables from the police station offered Tanti some advice. If he was indeed innocent, as he had been saying all along, all that he needed to do was get a certified copy of the case from the judicial magistrate's court in Sasaram. Early next morning, Tanti went to Sasaram and with a lawyer's help located case No. GR 256/82. The case, in fact, had been settled on 7 March 1982.

This correspondent was shown a certified copy of the case. The complainant was one Siaram Singh of Siwak, police station Nowkha, Rohtas. He had lodged the case against Satyanarain Singh and others also from Siwak. Only after Nageshwar Tanti placed the certified copy of the case with the police was he allowed to go free.

Nageshwar Tanti is one of the lucky ones. Not many possess the money needed to hire a lawyer. A large number of people, similarly implicated, have had to spend a number of days in jail before it was finally found out that warrants under which they had been arrested were false. According to Lokenath Kuswaha, an advocate's clerk-turned-social worker, who has been keeping track of such cases, "There are at least 5,000 such cases in Munger district alone."

It is easy to acquire and send a fake warrant in any one's name. According to a senior police official in Munger, such warrants have been in circulation since 1975. The whole thing is handled by two or three intelligent, educated people with connections in the courts and the police set-up. All they have to do is get hold of a requisite warrant of arrest form which is easily available with junior officials of the district courts or can be bought for a nominal sum of 10 paise from most stamp vendors in the court premises. The form is then filled in: the case number and the sections of the IPC do not matter. It is then stamped with the round rubber seal of the concerned judicial magistrate. Such rubber seals can be easily manufactured at any rubber stamp maker's shop. All that remains to be put on the form to make it look authentic is an initial of the judicial magistrate. A government of India envelope is then acquired from the despatch department of a court through a peon or a clerk. The warrant is then sent to the office of the superintendent of police from where it is referred to the officer in charge of the police station in whose jurisdiction the alleged "criminal" lives. It is from here that the police take over.

In most cases, those who receive such warrants are illiterate and too scared of the police. Naturally, when the police demand money to suppress the warrant, the hapless people have no other alternative but to pay up or suffer the humiliation of being paraded through the streets in handcuffs.

It all started in 1975 when a large number of people from Sundarpur village on the outskirts of Munger town started receiving such warrants for crimes they had never committed. Informed an elderly Baleswar Mandal, "Ours is a small village and

NOW ON SALE

SAMVIT

The Journal of Sri Sarada Math
The independent monastic organization for women of the Ramakrishna Order

DAKSHINESWAR
SPECIAL ISSUE
MARCH 1985

Price Rs. 10/-

Cheques in favour of Sri Sarada Math

Subscribe to:

The Publisher, SAMVIT

C-8A, Hauz Khas, New Delhi-110016.

Subscription rate:

Only for 1985: Rs. 15/- 1 year (2 issues)
Published in March and September.

Lokenath Kuswaha with xeroxed copies of fake warrants: a one-man crusade most of us did not want to be humiliated. What else could we do? And for those of us who are in government service, we could tell no one in authority that we were going to be arrested. For then, we would be sacked. Neither could we argue our innocence with the police."

The villagers decided to talk to Lokenath Kuswaha, a young man from the village who had a lot of connections in the Munger court because of his work as an advocate's clerk. Remembers Baleswar Mandal, "We sincerely believed Lokenath would be able to help us." Kuswaha tried his best to unravel the mystery of the fake warrants but he was unsuccessful. Perhaps, the whole racket would have gone undetected if a lawyer practising in the chief judicial magistrate's court in Munger, Bhajan Mani Chakrabarti, had not received a warrant of arrest in his name.

Recalled Mr Chakrabarti, "It was around April 1977 that the officer-in-charge of the Kotwali, Mr Nisar Khan, summoned me from my house in Sakin Raigarh. He told me that there was a warrant of arrest in my name. I did not realise that the warrant was a fake one. I told the officer to show me the warrant." Mr Chakrabarti, an elderly gentleman, continued, "I had been charged under Section 376 in PS case No. 21(4)/77. Section 376 deals with rape. Me, an old man, was charged with the rape of a girl in Hirapur, near Dhanbad." Mr Chakrabarti sent off a petition to the chief judicial magistrate, Munger, saying that he had been wrongly accused and that the warrant was a fake one. Could the authorities look into the matter? "So many years have passed but nothing has been done yet," said Mr Chakrabarti.

There was, however, one man who was trying to do something. It was Lokenath Kuswaha, Around November 1976, said Kuswaha, "I often wondered to myself why so many people from my village were being implicated through such false warrants." At the end of that year, Kuswaha had given up his job to devote himself full-time to social service. "My father had died and I thought of doing something for society," said Kuswaha. However, before leaving his job, Kuswaha had asked one of the young, educated men from his village, Devender Prasad, who just hung around the court doing odd jobs, if he would like to take over as the advocate's clerk. Devender readily agreed.

Soon afterwards, Kuswaha received a complaint that Devender was throwing his weight around in the village. He would often threaten the simple villagers with dire consequences if they did not do as he ordered. Most of the times, the tussles between the villagers and Devender occurred over simple things: who would fill water at the village well first, etc. Said Kuswaha, "Brahmdev Mandal's wife, Gayatri Devi, had a fight with Devender's wife over something, one day. Within a week, the police came searching for Gayatri Devi with a warrant of arrest. Again, when some cows belonging to Rameswar Shaw trespassed into Devender's garden, a warrant of arrest was found in the name of Shaw." By then, Lokenath Kuswaha was sure that Devender was behind the fake warrant racket. And, in fact, when Kuswaha did confront Devender with his hunch, he was told to mind his own business.

One person took it upon himself to defend those who had been served such fake warrants. In fact, he still does that if he gets a chance. He is Mr Basisht Lal, a senior practising lawyer in the Munger court. According to him this practice of serving fake warrants "started in collusion with the police and the court staff. It is merely done to implicate innocent people and put them in trouble. Of course, in the process, the police make a little."

Chand Kesri, a railway employee was one such person whose case had

Subhas Mandal (right) with two of his relatives in Sundarpur who have received fake warrants been handled by Mr Lal. "Kesri had been served a warrant from the court of the chief judicial magistrate, Bhagalpur," said Mr Lal. After detailed discussions with Kesri and preliminary investigations, Mr Lal was certain that the warrant his client had been served with was a fake one. "I had two options open before me," said Mr Lal, "One, to advise Kesri to surrender to the police or to apply for anticipatory bail." An application for anticipatory bail was made but before it came through, Kesri was kept for a week in the police lock-up. In that period, Mr Lal sent a special messenger to Bhagalpur court to get the certified copies of the case his client had been charged with.

K M Kishan

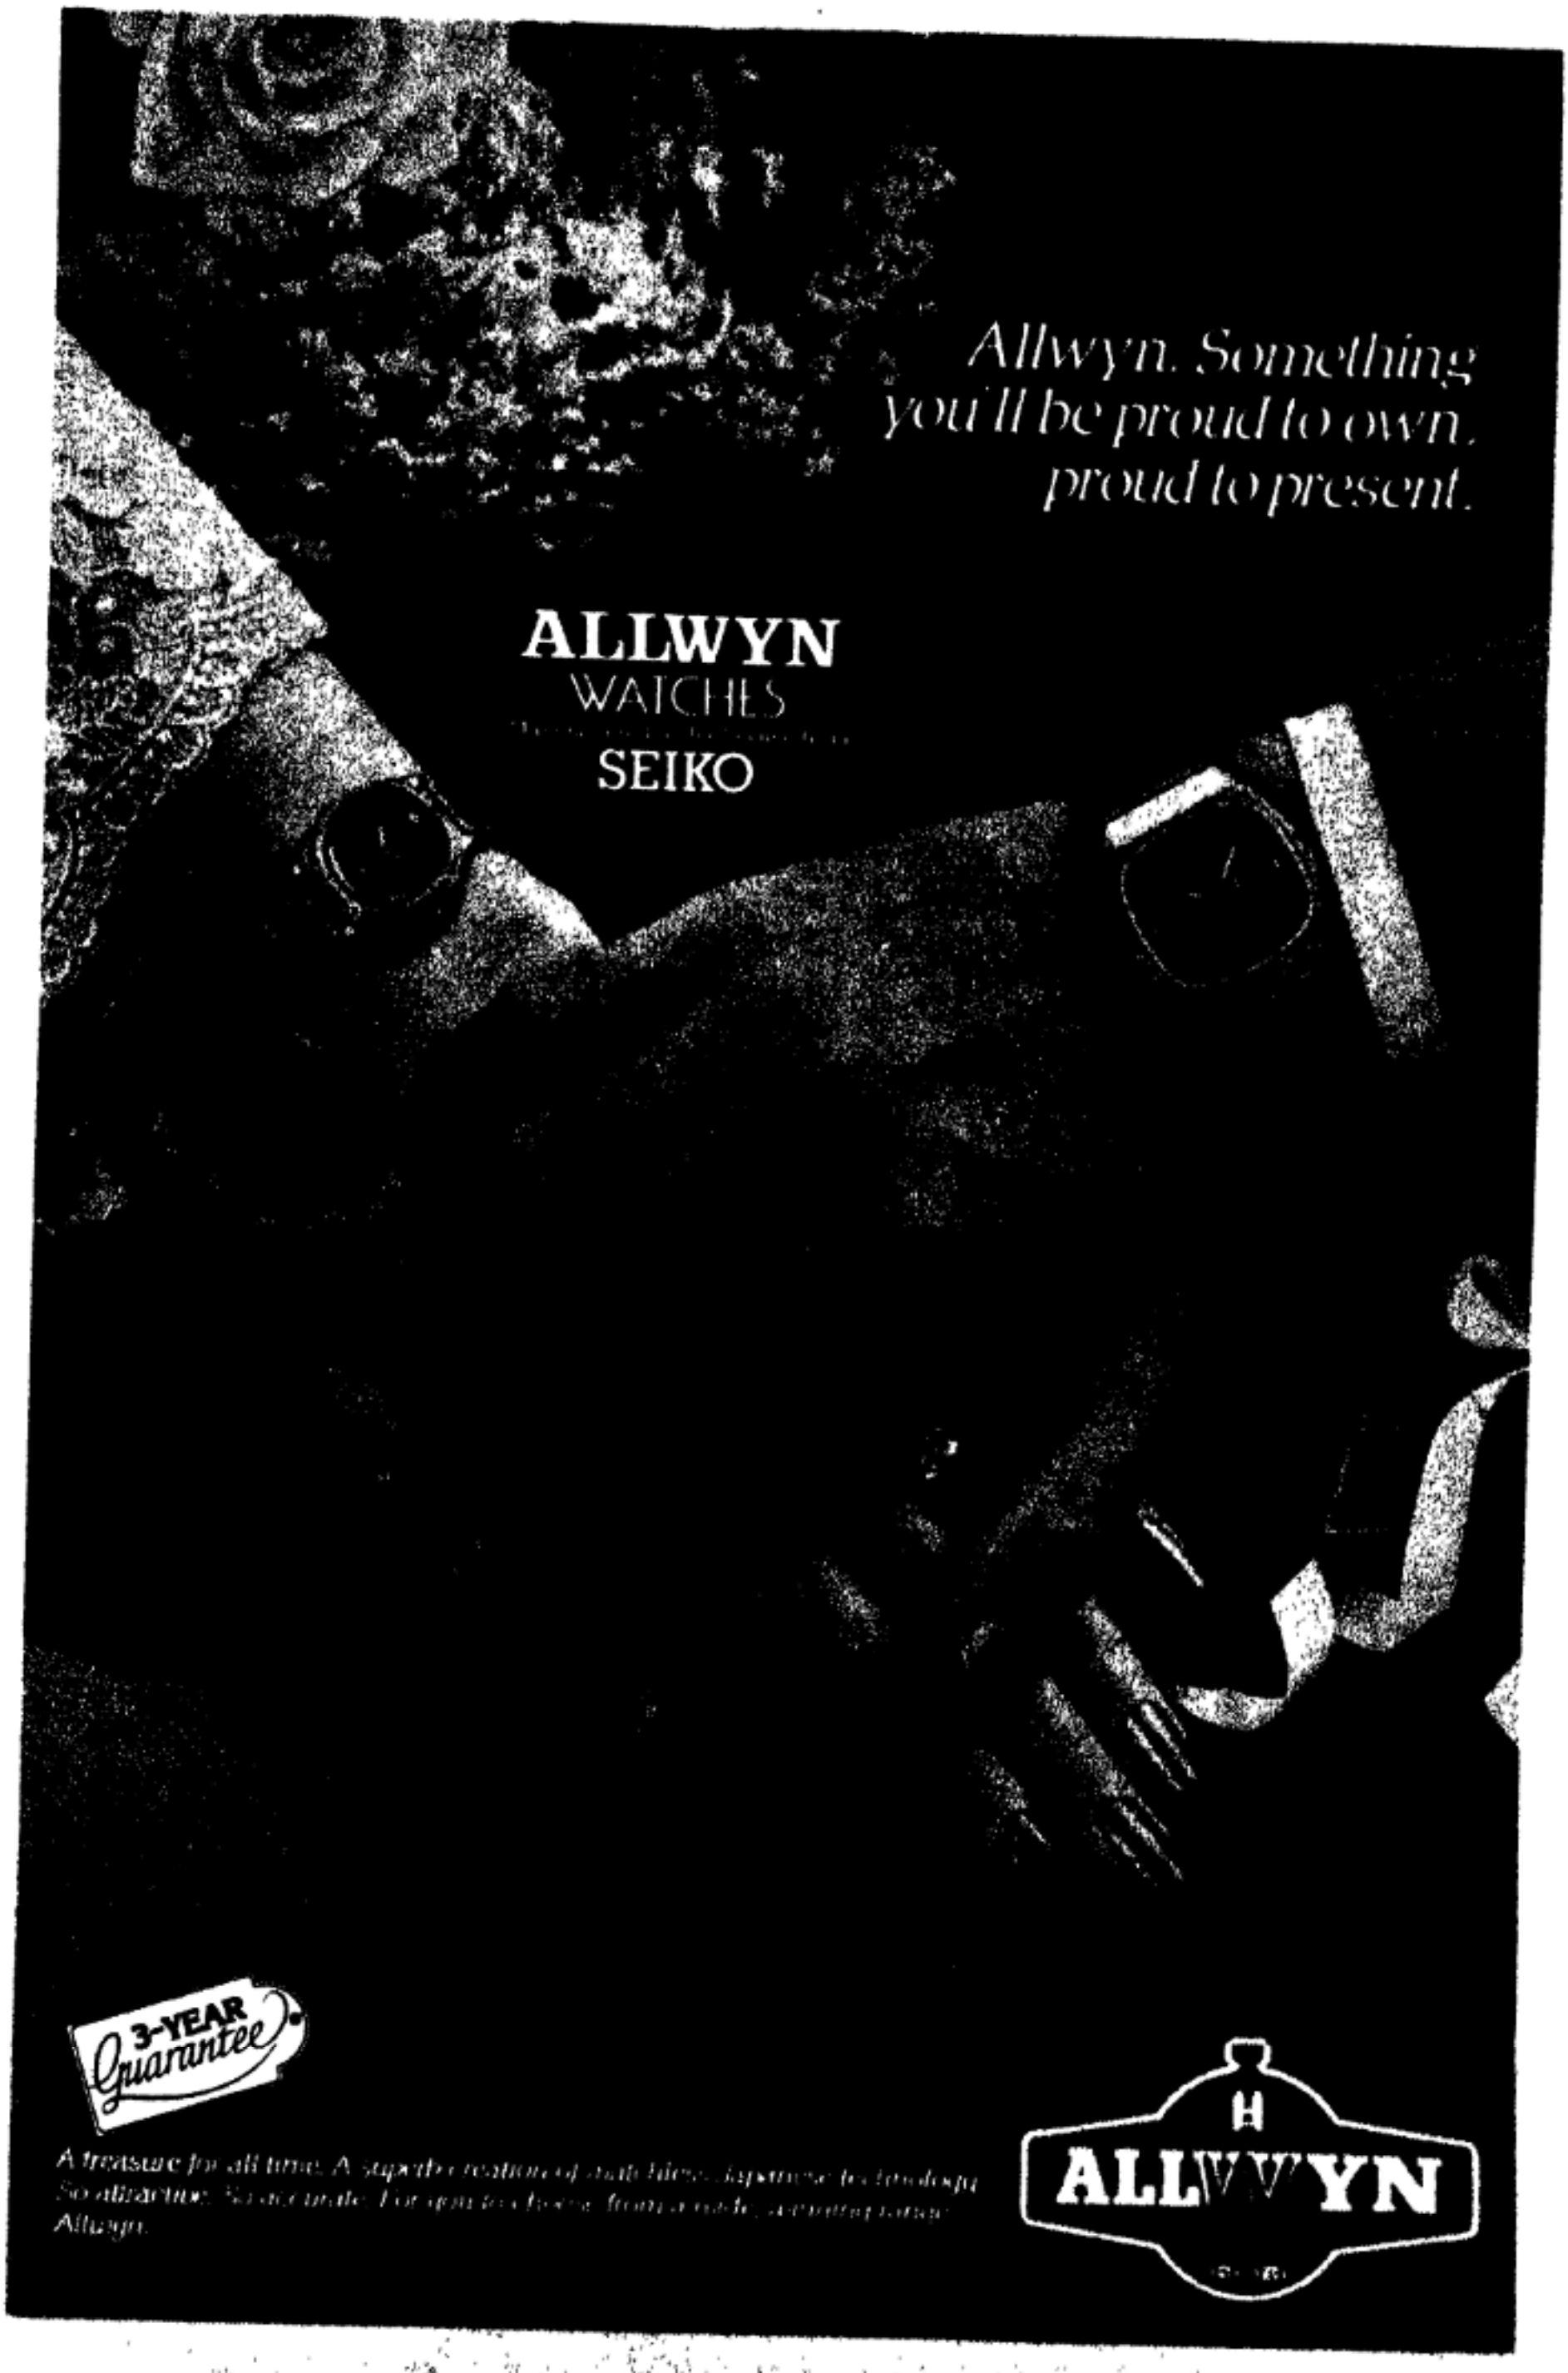
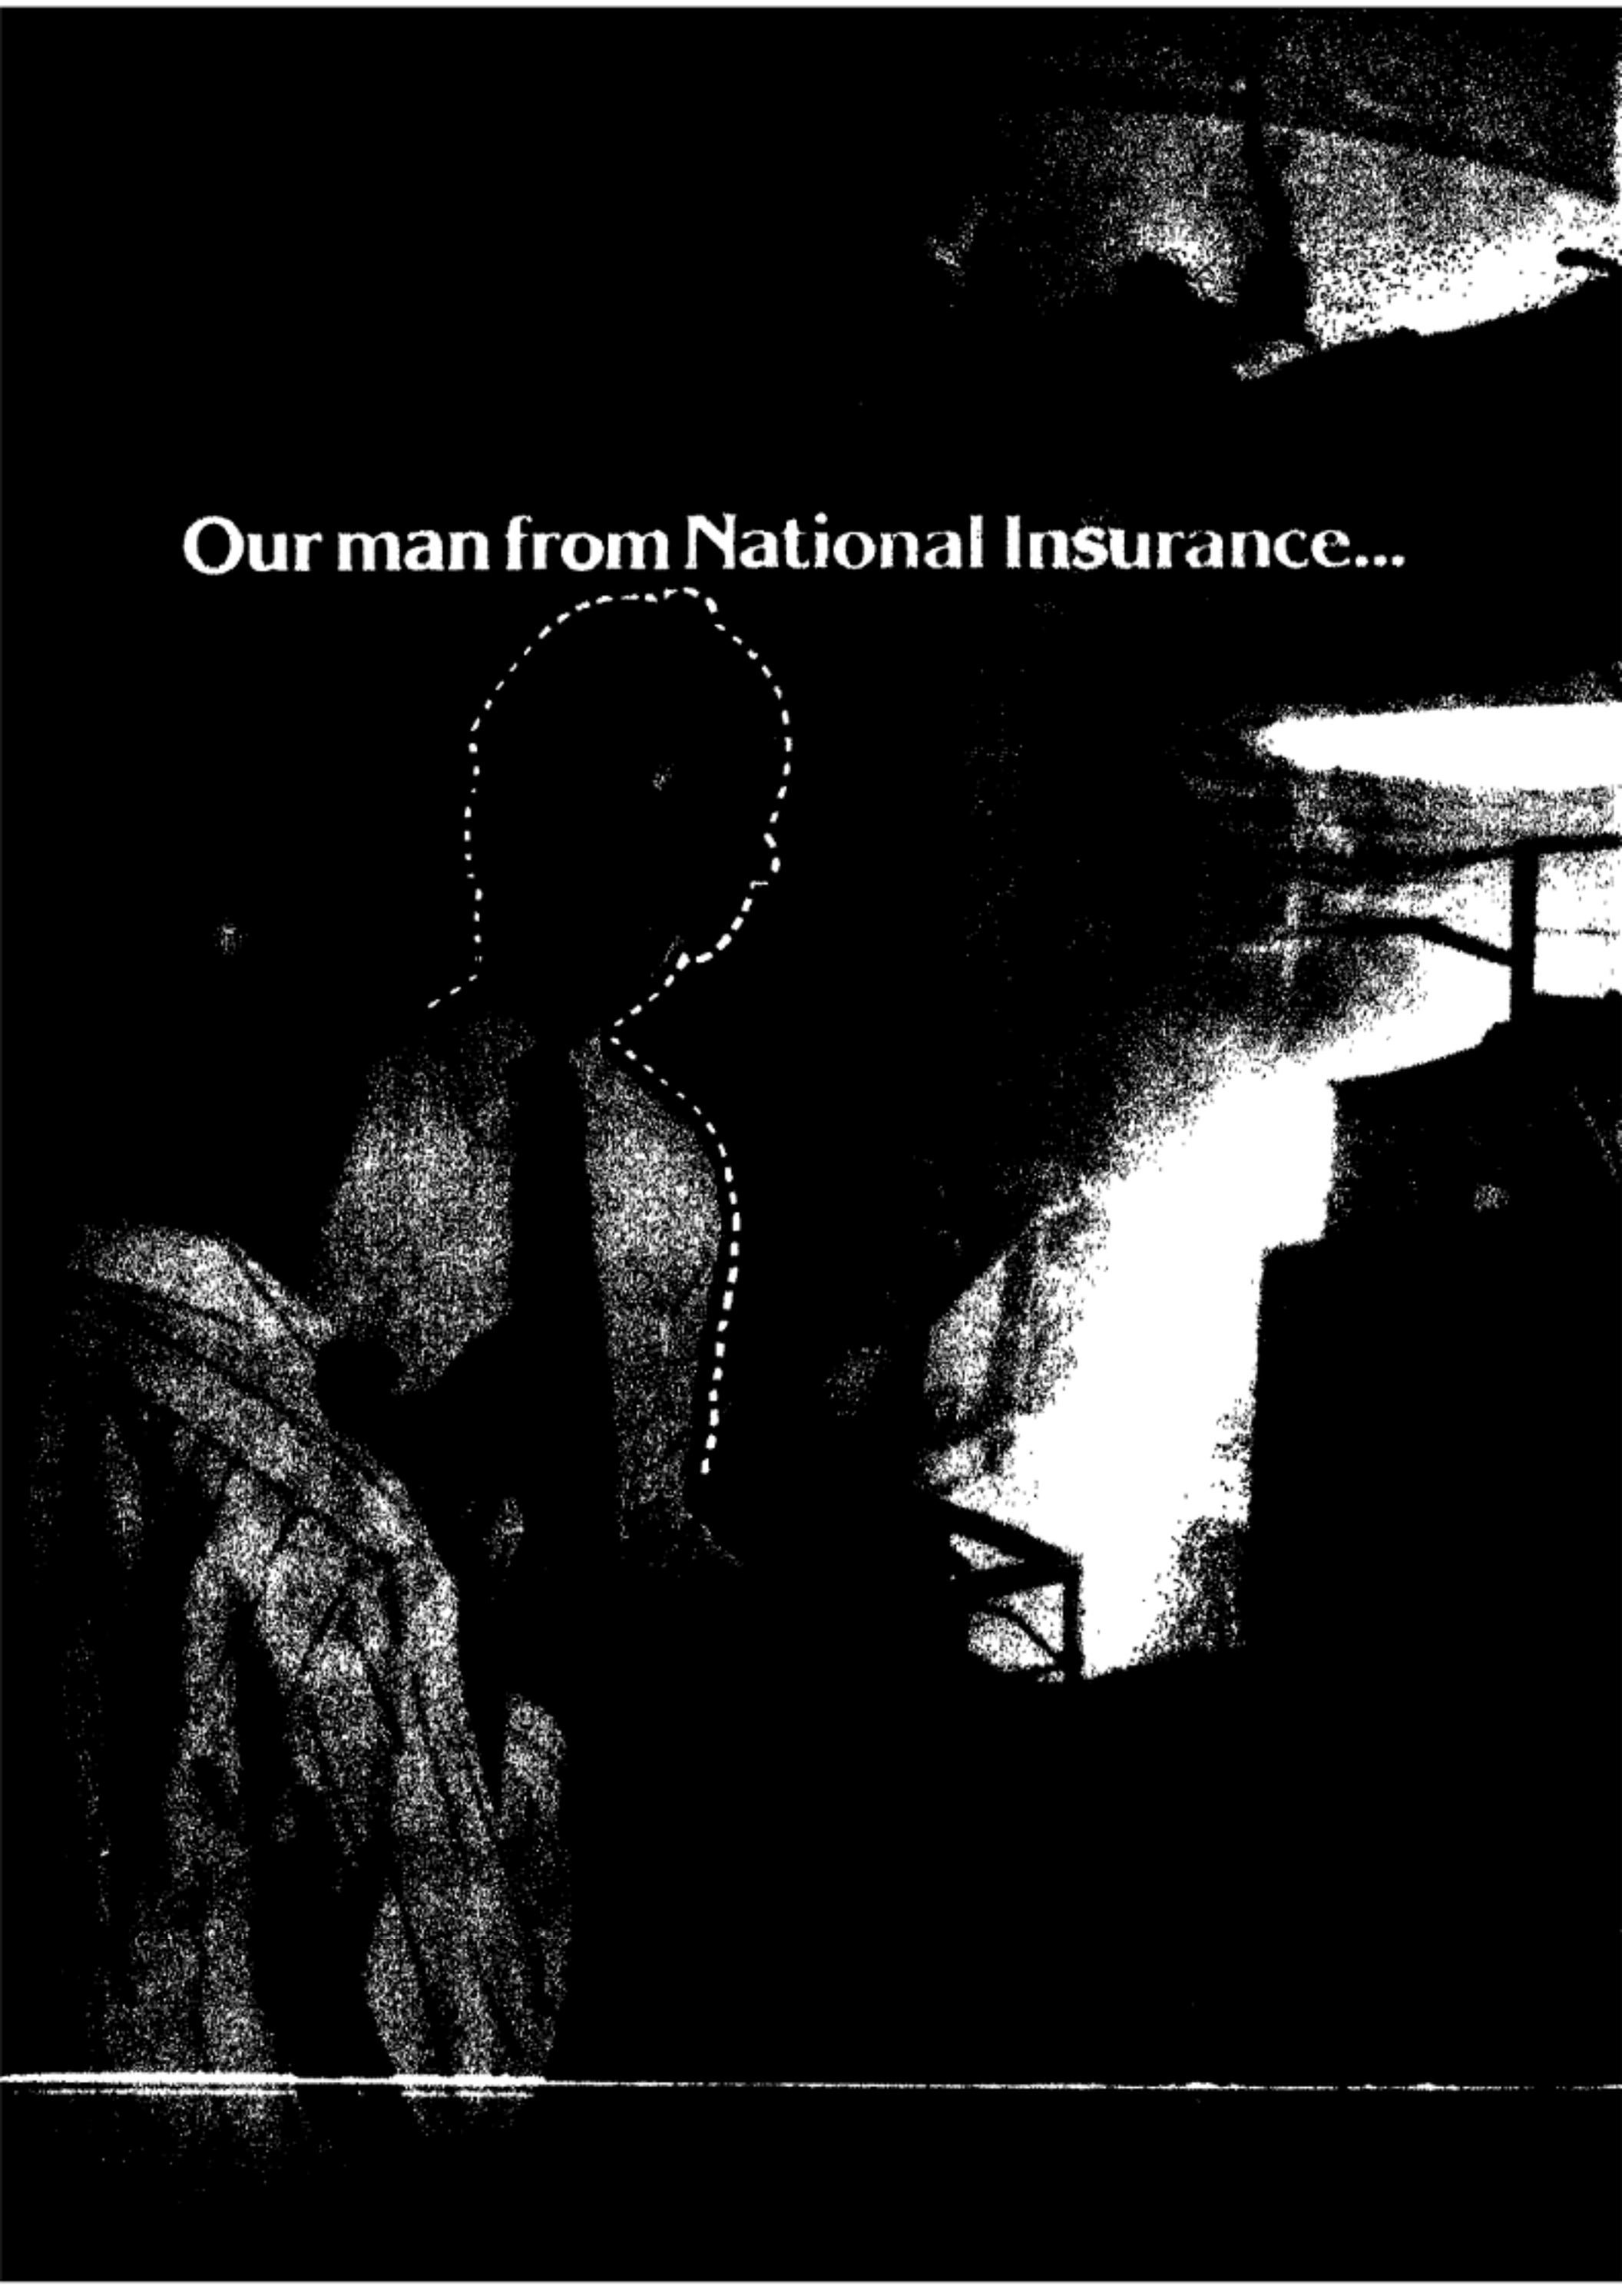
Another case which Mr Lal remembers vividly concerns Company Paswan of Jamalpur. Paswan, also a railway employee, was told by the police that there was a warrant of arrest for him. It had been issued by the chief judicial magistrate, Dhanbad. When Mr Lal appeared in court on behalf of Paswan, the then chief judicial magistrate, Munger, Mr G.N. Chandra dismissed the case in no time at all. Mr Chandra later told Mr Lal that the signature on the warrant was fake. "Mr Chandra knew," said Mr Lal, "because the chief judicial magistrate at Dhanbad was his childhood friend."

According to Mr Lal these fake warrants can be eliminated altogether if the police is a little more vigilant. The police should not accept those warrants which are not sent through the messengers of the court or by registered post. Three years ago, in fact, the then chief judicial magistrate of Munger, Mr Bindeswari Dubey, issued strict instructions to the Munger jail authorities in a fake custody warrant case that the jailer should not accept warrants sent by ordinary post. Mr Dubey's instructions continue to be on the files serving only as a record, never to be followed.



Meanwhile, the racket flourishes thanks to the police. Lokenath Kuswaha had with tears in his eyes complained to the superintendent of police, Munger, Mr Rakesh Jaruhar, to investigate the matter. "I had shown the SP sahab, the xerox copies of one of the fake warrants." said Kuswaha. "I told him to search Devender Prasad's house but someone tipped him about the raid and no incriminating evidence was found."



When this correspondent met Mr Jaruhar, he said that he had heard about the racket from his other officers. "Everyday there are hundreds of cases which take place in my jurisdiction The warrants which come to me are sent directly to the police station concerned. It is not possible for us to check and verify each warrant before serving them."

Today, there are a number of people in Kuswaha's village, Sundarpur, who have been unfortunate enough to receive such fake warrants and undergo the consequent harassment more than once. Kuswaha recounted the case of Subhas Mandal, a worker in the Munger ITC factory. On 1 February 1985, as Mandal was preparing to take rest at around 2.30 in the afternoon, the police from the local police station informed him about a warrant of arrest in his name. "I was there when Mandal was shown the warrant by the police," said Kuswaha. "I have seen so many such warrants that this one was not new to me. From the handwriting, I could make out that it had been filled up by a child. But the police was unable to help Mandal. He had to spend a few days in jail till the investigation was completed." There are some other villages like Sundarpur, whose inhabitants have had to undergo the harassment of fake warrants. These villages around Munger are: Sherpur, Shyampur, Nayagaon, Sitakund, Dilwarpur and Gharhara. Hundreds of families in these villages have been reduced to penury because of such fake warrants. Said a senior police official who did not wish to be named, "These warrants, you see, are a source of blackmail. The local policemen who go to serve these warrants mark the 'victim's' houses. Whenever the police feel like they can go and extort some money from people saying that there is a warrant of arrest in their names. Everyone tries to keep as far away from the police as possible so people pay up willingly to avoid problems."

In these circumstances, it is Kuswaha alone who has been waging war single-handedly against the fake warrant racket. "I have had to sell my land and the little I possessed to release my relatives who had been trapped with such warrants. My wife and children hardly get two square meals a day. But I will see the end of this before I die," he promised.

Tirthankar Ghosh, Munger

Allwyn. Something
you'll be proud to own,
proud to present.
ALLWYN
WATCHES
SEIKO
3-YEAR
Guarantee
A treasure for all time. A superb creation of multi-faceted brilliance, expressive in its timeless Sophistication. Exquisite detail. Each piece is a work of art, a creation of pure Allwyn.
H
ALLWYN

Our man from National Insurance...

at home inside giant plants, covering the risks in steelmaking.

Huge buckets carrying tonnes of molten, white hot steel. Overhead cranes moving about menacingly. The deafening clang of metal upon metal. Sparks flying about everywhere.

This is life inside a steel plant. With its constant risk of accident...either during operation or from overlooked errors in the construction of plant and machinery, that could result in loss to life and installation.

All this only shows the imperative for comprehensive coverage when you're dealing with multicrore rupee projects like steel plants. The kind of coverage one has come to expect from National Insurance. Because, even though National is, essentially, an insurance company, it has field personnel who know steel plants and their problems like the back of their own hands.

Now, this makes a world of difference when you're looking for insurance that provides comprehensive cover in high-risk, high-investment projects. National does it—foolproof. And within your budget.

National Insurance. Well connected with India's core industries. Not just iron ores and steel, but oil, tea, jute, shipping, chemicals—the lot.

National Insurance Company Limited

(A Subsidiary of General Insurance Corporation of India)

Professionals at work for the Nation

CLARION C NIC-2

The `CLASSIC´ look by

Raymond

–the name you can trust

Mafatlal Suiting

The Chikan Workers of Lucknow

It's a cruel trade that thrives on debt and poverty

A strange silence pervades the dusty, sun-baked Muslim village of Chhanayya on the Lucknow-Hardoi road. A small cluster of mud and concrete houses on either side of a winding dirt-track, the village strikes the intruder as a strictly private place: the women and children are wary of outsiders, especially when their menfolk are away, speak in undertones and stay indoors nearly all day, glued to their work—embroidering piles of kurtas and sarees to fine patterns with threads of varied colours. The women, many of them with babes in arms, squat in the courtyards or on their doorsteps, stooping to peer at each stitch they make. The work must go on all the year round—even if the workers' backs ache and their eyesight fails—for the precious 25-75 paise it brings them per piece from middlemen who carry the clothes away to cloth dealers in Lucknow's Chowk and Aminabad bazars, for sale on the local, national and foreign markets at whopping profits.

Ravi Kapoor

A Chikan worker in Chhanayya

It is a cruel trade that runs on two premises—that finesse and craftsmanship be damned; and it is the trader at the head of the line who alone dictates terms because the workers and middlemen, far from being his partners in business, are slaves bound to 'serve' him by continuing debt. For the workers there is only misery. And even those free from debt must work with needle and thread to survive because their men can hardly earn enough to feed their large families. They are a few of the 50,000-odd Chikan workers' families—seven or eight members in each—spread over Sandila, Malihabad, Kakori, Lucknow, Bakshi ka Tal, Chinhat, Barabanki, Masauli, Sitapur, Rae Bareili, Sultanpur and Mohanlalganj.

Salma (30) spoke shyly from the threshold of her house in Chhanayya, while a crowd of girls peered from behind: "Earlier the dalals gave us 40 paise for each kurta, now they give 50 paise. They give the thread. I manage to make two to three kurtas a day. All of us work here but still it isn't enough." It takes her three days to finish a ladies kurta, she said, the kind she was working on, a light blue kurta embroidered in white. "Sarees take much longer. We don't take sarees because kurta work is faster and easier." Salma's family, among the poorer in the village, are landless.

Fatima (25) sat down on her doorstep to speak to us: "We have been doing this for ages. Women in most homes do this work. We all started when we were the age of these laun- diyas (girls) you see here," she said, pointing to a couple of ten-year-olds who were standing by, listening. "We have no land at all, so we have to survive on Chikan work. When our eyes grow weak, we go to doctors in town. There are no doctors around here, only one in Dubhagga." Another woman worker in Fatima's family said that middlemen were preferred because it saved the women the trouble of stepping out of their homes and dealing with traders. "They are our men," she said. "We know them for long."

Hamida (47), robust and stocky, at first mistook us for a couple of entrepreneurs. "They're interested in starting some business in Chikan clothes. That's why they're asking us questions," she thundered, intervening in a hushed discussion among some women on the purpose of our visit. She knew the market value of Chikan clothes very well. Later, she yielded to our questioning: "These traders make quite a sum on these clothes, and look what we get. For a ladies' kurta we get 20 annas, and it takes us two to three days to finish one. But the men's kurta comes in different types and qualities. For high quality work we charge more. It varies from 25 paise to 50 paise. The dalal (middleman) pays us all right: if not in a week, at least every 15 days. Sometimes he gives us the thread, sometimes we have to buy it." Has her eyesight weakened? "Of course, our eyes are affected. Aur kya? Aankhen phorna hai, haddiya phoro... (What else? Our eyes are blinded, our bones are broken). She seemed bitter at the mention of how the work affected their health. Hamida said she and her two elder daughters worked throughout the year on Chikan embroidery, even though her family was better off than the others in the village. "We work in all seasons, there is constant demand for the work. There are 50 houses in this village, and all have Chikan workers."

The ordinary Chikan worker is homebound and shy, so the middleman is a vital link in the trade. Today, according to an estimate, not more than ten per cent of workers deal with traders directly, particularly because the traders are too shrewd and calculating. The middlemen, many of whom are related to the workers, are in a better position to tackle traders because they deal with a number of them simultaneously. "If one of us disappoints them," said a trader in Chowk, "they can always go to another." On an average, depending on the type of work done on it, a middleman charges the trader Rs 15 on each saree he gets embroidered by 'his workers.'

Middleman Hakimuddin outside a Chowk shop

Before giving the clothes to the middleman, the trader has to get them tailored and printed and after receiving the embroidered clothes, gets them washed, and netted (with jaalis), a kind of work normally assigned to Chikan specialists in the city. It costs one rupee to print each saree, another two rupees to wash it, Rs 15 to get it embroidered, and, finally, another rupee to get each netted. Total costs for the trader come to Rs 50. And yet, the price of an ordinary Chikan saree is never less than Rs 65, which yields a neat profit of Rs 15 on each sale for the wholesaler; for the retailer, of course, the price is a matter of hard bargaining. As one buyer in Chowk said, "The sky is the limit" for the unscrupulous.

Hakimuddin (40), a middleman who has been in business for 20 years, uses a motorcycle to carry stitched plain kurtas and sarees from shops in Chowk bazar to Chikan workers in villages in Barabanki and alongside Kursi road, on the outskirts of Lucknow. He keeps an account of how many pieces he has given to each family, and after the workers have embroidered them, brings them back to the wholesaler for sale. "All I get is a small cut. Believe me, there is nothing for me in all this," he lamented. Hakimuddin has to buy the thread for the embroidery at Rs 26 to Rs 28 a kilo. A kilo of thread suffices for 400 kurtas or five or six sarees. He said that he usually brought back bundles of kurtas from the workers in eight days, and larger ladies'kurtas in 15 days. Sarees could take more than a month to embroider, he said. In addition to expenses on thread and 'fees' at octroi checkposts, he has to spend at least Rs 20 a day on petrol while on tour. "In the end, all I get is a cut of 60 paise on each large kurta, 10-15 paise on each small kurta and about a rupee on each saree. I buy each saree for Rs 30 a piece from the wholesaler, and give it back to him, embroidered, for Rs 45. Of the Rs 15 that I get from the wholesaler, I hand over ten rupees to the worker, two rupees to cover the price of thread, and another two rupees cover the overheads. This leaves a profit of about one rupee."

Hakimuddin has a wife and five children to look after, besides an aging father. "All the children go to school. The eldest goes to Shia College, here in Lucknow. He is the only one in the family who helps me out, besides my father, with his advice. After all, he was the one who led me into all this." Hakimuddin is unhappy that he has no bank account, although he has to get a daughter married. "When we have enough money," he said, "my son Shakeeluddin and I hope to give up this line and start a new business."

The wholesalers, he said, were helpful in general, but worked subtly to exploit them. "They give us loans whenever we need money, for marriage or if someone in the family falls ill. But at 24 per cent interest." Hakimuddin does all his business transactions in the name of his father Amruddin Beg. "I'm just carrying on his work. I go to the same traders he visited."

He agreed that workers in faraway villages were easily exploited. "But we middlemen are not to blame but the traders who make a fortune out of Chikan. They put their own prices on the stuff when they sell them on wholesale markets and when they export them and give us nothing for our work. Isme majdoori bahut hai (A lot of effort goes into this). But the people are so poor, they are happy with just a rupee or 75 paise on each piece. You should see them queuing up in front of my door; such long queues even for so little money." But in spite of the exploitation, he said, the personal nature of relationships between workers and middlemen (often part of an extended family) and middlemen and traders made things more humane: "I help the workers when they are in need. And the traders help me when I'm in need. Once a trader I was doing business with landed up in my house when I fell ill, although he is a lakhpati."

An almost exclusively Muslim trait, Lucknow Chikan was first popularised in the heyday of the last ruler of Oudh, Wajid Ali Shah, who is known to have rewarded women who excelled in the art. Many in Lucknow believe it to be 'an inherited art,' which probably explains why a Muslim girl develops an aptitude for the work while most Hindu girls do not. But the Chikan that now sells in the market is a mere shadow of its past. In its original form, the embroidery is an intricate combination of a variety of patterns and stitches that do not involve 'tearing up' the fabric. Some of these are jaali (network), murri (surface work), ulta bakhia (shadow work), and designs like taka, bijli and phanda. A number of these are specialised jobs; the jaali, for example, is something only workers in chosen areas can be trusted with. The skills are highly individualised, too. Some famous craftswomen are Miss Badar Anjuman, Miss Shamim Jahan, Miss Akhtar (whose father is a famous craftsman also) and Mrs Humaira Khatoon, who have won national awards for their work.

But the handicraft is on the decline. Said Jagesh Tandon, an exporter, "Chikan work comes in two types, one for the discerning elite, the other for the masses. The city is the place where you get all the delicate work done; for mass production, you have to go to the rural areas where the majority of workers live. But the village Chikan worker does not care much for finesse. She is not trained in that art. She can only work through large quantities of cloth quickly to meet the commercial need. And her labour is very cheap. So it is to her that most of the work is assigned these days. And this is what has caused the decline of the handicraft."

Mr Tandon, who seemed more concerned about the intricacy of the craft than the condition in which most rural workers live and toil, said poor quality Chikan accounted for a reduced demand from connoisseurs, and growing demand from the ordinary public: The demand for the embroidery abroad, he said, existed partly because of humanitarian reasons—because it involves great labour, and the workers are poor—and partly because, as a unique handicraft of Lucknow, it is intricate and beautiful. "But the mass production of Chikan kurtas and sarees has commercialised the handicraft. People abroad also are beginning to realise that what they are getting is of poor quality. Exporters and wholesalers, in their attempts to undercut each other, end up selling bad stuff. In Chikan, price varies directly with the quality of work."

Mr Tandon also complained that a large number of Chikan exporters were based in Delhi and knew nothing about the embroidery and its intricacies. "They cannot make out the difference between various kinds of work, they export cheap clothes." Even in India, Chikan clothes are the cheapest alternative to formal wear, Mr Tandon said. "You can never buy a shirt for the price you pay for a Chikan kurta." Hence the mass production.

More important than the decline of the handicraft, however, is the problem of poverty among the lakhs of workers in Lucknow and its suburbs. Most of the families live in congested houses, amid filth and squalor, and work to supplement their menfolk's meagre earnings. Bina Duggal, a Congress(I) MLC who is president of the Chikan Karigar Union and the Chikan Vikas Parishad, two bodies set up for the welfare of Chikan workers in 1974, believes that education is the best way to rehabilitate the women because ignorance is always their worst foe. "They need money for marriages and to pay for their sick, so they borrow from the wholesalers and end up in slavery." She claimed that a Chikan production unit opened in Lucknow by the Uttar Pradesh government which runs under her supervision attracts about 700 regulars from surrounding villages. "But this number is still not enough, considering there are so many of them. However, we try to teach these 700 how to conduct themselves in society. They take their money directly from us."

Was the experiment any help? Far from it. "Government schemes and projects have been miserable flops," said Jagesh Tandon, "All that the government does is set up units, appoint teachers, and these people walk off with their salaries. There is no work done."

Although he regretted that traders like him were destroying a beautiful craft, Mr Tandon denied exploiting workers: "You've got to see that all our cloth is blocked up with the middlemen. If we give them 100 pieces, they return 90, and say the rest are torn. In the workers' houses, you will find them using the kurtas as bedclothes and curtains. The workers take up quite a bit of the garments themselves. And who among us doesn't have health problems?"

Though Mr Tandon, sitting in his palatial house in a labyrinthine Chowk bylane (luxury strikes you out of the blue in Chowk) thought otherwise, the workers' health problems are real, weak eyesight, spondylitis and TB being major complaints. Said Dr Ram Kapoor, an ophthalmologist who has held a number of eye camps and treated Chikan workers, "The women have eye trouble first because they work in very dim light, and second because the nature of their work is very minute. Thus they come up with complaints which are quite natural in anyone with normal eyesight. Then they go to quacks, saying that they are having difficulty threading the needles, although their eyes are normal. The quacks, eager to sell off their stocks of spectacles, give the workers plus lenses which are only magnifying glasses, even though the workers are young. Many of them start using plus lenses at 25. Normally, plus one lenses are given to people aged 35, and plus two to people aged 50. The workers' eyes grow weak, and when they age, have to start using minus lenses, which should never happen." TB among workers was common, Dr Kapoor said, because of their living conditions and also on account of the fact that they sit close to each other, often coughing on one another, spreading bacterial infection.

Bogged down by the pressure of an exploitative trade on the one hand, and large families on the other, the Chikan workers of Lucknow continue to live like wretches, desperate to survive. Will the government ever help?

Nirmal Mitra, Lucknow

GUJARAT

Violent Protests

Agitation over the state government's reservation policy

An uproar against the increased reservations in jobs and education for the backward classes in Gujarat in the second half of February, has began another round of caste conflict in the state where Gandhi was born. The Solanki ministry, trying to keep everybody happy before the 5 March state Assembly polls, has failed to take effective steps to defuse the explosive situation. The current controversy dates back to January when the state government announced its decision to increase reservation of seats for the socially and educationally backward classes (SEBC) from ten to 28 per cent. This was in addition to the 21 per cent statutory reservations for the scheduled castes and scheduled tribes, and took the total reservations in government jobs and courses like medicine and enginering to 49 per cent.

The government's decision was partly based on the findings of a commission of inquiry, headed by a retired High Court Judge, Mr C.V. Rane, set up in 1981 to explore which new groups and communities should be added to the list of 82 communities belonging to the SEBC. These are communities deemed as backward as the scheduled castes and tribes but are not beneficiaries of the statutory reservations.

There was not much reaction to the decision till 19 February when preliminary examinations were due to begin in colleges in Ahmedabad. Complaining of injustice, a students' committee called the All Gujarat Education Reform Committee (AGERC) was formed and classes were boycotted. College examinations had to be postponed and the government reacted swiftly by persuading schools and universities in Ahmedabad to close down immediately to prevent the anti-reservation stir from gaining momentum.

The gambit was only partly successful because trouble broke out, buses were burnt and classes boycotted by students from Baroda, Rajkot, Godhra, and other cities. By the end of February nearly 20 vehicles, of the Ahmedabad Municipal Transport Service and the State Transport Corporation had been damaged. The protests included an Ahmedabad bandh called on 25 February and bandhs in other towns. But none of them were successful and the agitation seemed to be petering out. However fears of an escalation in violence increased in late February when an irate mob of anti-reservationists set a bus on fire on Nadiad city in central Gujarat and a passenger on board was burnt alive.

The state government has asked the CID to investigate the incidents. Once the elections are over, the stir is likely to spread even further. Although the students have formed a committee, and similar committees have been formed in different cities of Gujarat, the stir does not seem to be very organised.

While the Solanki ministry had taken a firm stand four years ago against the stir, it seems to be hedging on the issue this time. With the elections very close, it wanted to woo the poor, but at the same time did not want to alienate the upper castes too much. The wavering led to serious problems for the administration. The government had to explain its stand to the people but no political leader would do so. Eventually, the task fell upon Mr Niranjan Singh, an IAS official and secretary to the social welfare department. This happened on 1 March, nearly ten days, after the agitation began.

Mr Singh's explanation led to confusion. In 1972, the Gujarat government had set up the Baxi Commission to identify socially and educationally backward communities (SEBC) under Article 15(4) and 16(4) of the Constitution. This was done with effect from 1, April 1978

However, there were complaints that the list of SEBC groups mentioned by the Baxi Commission was not exhaustive and that many deserving groups had been left out. As a result, the Rane Commission was set up in 1981. The decision to raise the quota of SEBC from ten to 28 per cent (raising reservations to 49 per cent) was criticised because, the Rane Commission had given its 215-page report in October 1983, and the government accepted it only 16 months later, on 11 January 1985 just before the Assembly elections.

The second reason for the uproar was the government's curious decision in determining the new reservation policy. It has accepted the Rane panel's recommendation to increase reservations to 28 per cent but it did not accept the commission's recommendation to determine educational and social backwardness on an income-cum-occupation criterion. The Rane Commission had serious doubts about the efficacy of identifying social and educational backwardness on the basis of caste. It said there were "inherent defects" in this method. The object of the Articles 15(4) and 16(4), said the commission, was to achieve equality by removing inequality. Using the caste factor for identifying socially and educationally backward people would perpetuate the evils of the caste system. Another point against the use of the caste factor was that it is a method applicable to Hindu communities only.

Political expediency could be chief reason for the manner in which the decision was announced. But, more curiously, although the decision was made public on 11, January, it remained only on paper till the end of February. The social welfare department secretary, Mr Singh, explained that government decisions taken at the cabinet level took time to implement because of procedures. In the second half of February the Gujarat High Court granted a stay on the implementation of the increased quota till a petition before it was disposed of.

The delay in implementation was in sharp contrast with the announcement in January when it was stated that the increased quota in jobs in government would come into force immediately and in education from June with the new academic year. Mr Singh complicated matters more by declaring that the Rane Commission's suggestion to determine backwardness on the basis of income and occupation rather than caste "will not be legally justified" and the government was sticking to the Baxi Commission criteria that included some ten tests including caste, economic status and income to determine the backwardness of any group.

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

Policemen guarding shuttered shops

Shyamdev Bhatkar

TAMIL NADU

A Happy Reunion

Jayalalitha gets back her former position

When a state has a filmstar-turned politician for a chief minister, political developments often run along the same lines as the plots of a typical formula film-boy meets girl and love blossoms. Unfortunately, a nasty misunderstanding crops up. But towards the last few reels, the problems are sorted out and then there is a happy reunion It appears to be the same for MGR and Jayalalitha and their political relationship.

Soon after being divested of her post as deputy leader of the AIADMK Parliamentary group, Jayalalitha had fumed that the coterie responsible for her ouster would ensure that she was expelled from the party soon after MGR's return to Madras. But MGR took both the coterie and Jayalalitha for a ride—neither was Jayalalitha expelled nor was she reinstated. It was a state of suspended animation for all concerned While MGR met even the unimportant AIADMK MLAs, he did not meet Jayalalitha for a full fortnight after his return. In despair, Jayalalitha felt she would not get justice from her mentor, MGR. Her chances of being reinstated to the exalted position she enjoyed seemed slim as MGR went about accommodating the coterie, instead of punishing them for taking decisions without his knowledge and sanction. Jayalalitha also had no idea when MGR would meet her. But SUNDAY's report 17-23 February that there would be a happy reconciliation between MGR and Jayalalitha was vindicated when on 19 February she took the initiative and met MGR at the secretariat.

What transpired between MGR and Jayalalitha is not known, but it must have been an emotional reunion—MGR is moved easily. At the end of the close door session, both came out beaming, which was proof that their differences had been patched up.

The drama over, the first sign that Jayalalitha had been reinstated to her former prominent status in the party came a few days later with a statement issued by MGR. He stated that he wanted the AIADMK to remain cohesive and homogenous and forbade anyone from criticising Jayalalitha. The diktat has effectively stemmed bickering in the party about Jayalalitha. As long as MGR holds the party's reins, one is not likely to hear any criticism about Jayalalitha from her detractors within the AIADMK. In his statement MGR went a step further and stated that Jayalalitha would be campaigning for the Congress(I)-AIADMK combine in Pondicherry and Andhra Pradesh (she is campaigning in Andhra Pradesh for Congress(I) on Rajiv Gandhi's instructions) with MGR's blessings. Jayalalitha is emerging as a star campaigner and MGR has even directed his partymen to help her make arrangements for her election tour. The AIADMK party machine is once again at Jayalalitha's disposal.

Jayalalitha had been strongly criticised for meeting Congress(I) leaders at the centre including Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in early January, immediately after she was thrown out of Tamil Nadu House in New Delhi. The AIADMK general secretary Mr P.U. Shunmugam had even warned that such actions would be construed as anti-party activities. At that time Jayalalitha had claimed that it was only a courtesy call and that she had not discussed politics.

MGR is obviously enjoying himself playing a political see-saw game. He appointed Shunmugam as the protem speaker, (a blow for Jayalalitha) and soon brought him back to earth by bestowing a rare honour on Jayalalitha: When Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi stopped over in the middle of the night at Madras during his whirlwind election tour, the only other person from the AIADMK to meet the PM, besides MGR, was Jayalalitha. It was as if MGR wished to prove that he did hold against her the earlier meeting with the PM, but in fact encouraged it. But this seemed only for public consumption.

MGR communicated his sincere gratitude to Mr Gandhi and his mother for their help regarding his medical treatment by going to the airport to receive him at 3.05 am. It was an emotional meeting, with the PM wiping off the tears rolling down MGR's cheeks. Later at the Raj Bhavan in the course of their 40-minute talk, MGR thanked Rajiv Gandhi again and focussed upon the problems generated by the inflow of refugees from Sri Lanka. Normally Mr S Ramachandran acts as MGR's ambassador as the former is fluent in English. But MGR made Jayalalitha and not S. Ramachandran meet the PM. One needs no further proof of Jayalalitha's reinstatement to the exalted, prominent position in the AIADMK. In ensuring such a status quo, MGR has turned the clock back to his pre-illness days. But no one in the AIADMK, not even Jayalalitha can be free from worries—their fate after all depends on MGR's whims. And MGR is a very whimsical man.

M.G. Ramachandran

Jayalalitha

Anita Pratap, Madras

SMUGGLING

Through the Diplomatic Channel

Somali envoy caught by the Customs

A Somali diplomat, Mohammed Ali Abdi, has landed himself in the Customs net. Though his involvement is being investigated, it is certain that he was being used as a conduit by smugglers. On 6 February, suspicious of the unusually heavy consignments booked in the diplomat's name, the Customs authorities at the Central Warehousing Corporation opened his unaccompanied baggage, booked from Hong Kong and seized contraband worth Rs 50 lakhs. The cooking range imported by this second secretary in the Embassy of Somalia contained 200 gold biscuits, weighing 100 grams each.

Though officials at the Indian foreign office claim that the presence of the diplomat on the spot was a coincidence and that he had been called there to provide the Customs with serial numbers of the goods, customs officials said that the consignment was inspected because they suspected it contained contraband. According to A.S. Ahluwalia, superintendent of Customs in charge of unaccompanied baggage, who was present at the time of seizure, they had taken a calculated risk in asking for the baggage to be inspected. A protest would have been lodged by the embassy of Somalia if the baggage was found "clean". Fortunately, the risk paid off and 2,000 tolas of gold was discovered hidden inside the outer layers of the cooking range and flower vases. It was one of the largest seizures of gold made in the capital. Investigating officers present on the spot succeeded in recording a written statement of the diplomat in which he alleged the involvement of his mail-order agent, Vijay Kumar Gujral and denied any knowledge of the contraband in the articles imported under his name. Vijay Gujral is a nephew of former union minister and envoy I.K. Gujral and has six Customs cases pending against him. There have been a number of cases in the past three years when diplomats have been implicated for carrying contraband in their personal or unaccompanied baggage. Some of the diplomats who have been involved in Customs cases are:

- Leon Wright, senior diplomat in the American Embassy, from whom wrist-watches, medicinal powder and other articles worth Rs 13 lakhs were recovered on 3 December 1984. Wright gave a confessional statement to the Customs officials which ran into 113 pages.
- Mehamood Moshari, counsellor in the Embassy of Iran was recalled to his country when on 3 April 1983, nine video cassettes worth Rs 1,98,000 were recovered from his baggage.
- Bong Yong Wan, first secretary of the North Korean Embassy in India is registered for being in possession of 7,500 US dollars, 13 diamond stones and wrist-watches, valued at Rs 1,15,000. A diary written in code was also confiscated from him.
- Beatrice Eboh, a Nigerian diplomat was in possession of 2,200 wrist watches worth Rs 1,29,925 on 27 July 1983. The case is listed in File No. viii (AP) 10/62/p and 1/83.
- Andre Jost, an attache at the French Embassy was found to be carrying three video cassette recorders and four video cameras worth Rs 1,20,000 on 11 September 1983.
- Dr Jean Luc Lethency, another diplomat of the French Embassy was found to be in possession of three portable video cassette recorders and three video cameras on 13 October 1983, valued at Rs 3,75,000. The case is listed in File No. viii (AP)10/135/p and 1/83.
- Petko Dillic, a Yugoslav diplomat on 24 June 1983 handed over contraband items worth Rs 16 lakhs to Customs officials. The goods included several hundred wrist-watches, computers and high speed cassettee printers.

According to Customs authorities, a large number of Indian agents pay the diplomats for their services and later dispose of the contraband. There is also a larger network of foreign agents who duly pack the consignments to New Delhi or Bombay and probably are the financers of the entire network. In the present

Ananda Bazar Patrika Limited requires
Trainee Sub-Editors/Reporters for

SUNDAY

If you are
- At least a Graduate preferably with Honours in English and a consistently good academic record
- Below 26 years of age
- Willing to work long hours
- Have a lively interest in the world around you

Then you could be the person we are looking for. During training, you will be paid Rs. 1000.00 (consolidated) per month. Apply within 10 days giving your bio-data along with a 500-word news report on any incident you consider newsworthy. If you are found eligible, you will be called for a written test.

Address your applications to: The Personnel Adviser, Ananda Bazar Patrika Limited, 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street, Calcutta- 700 001.

case of Mohammed Abdi, the involvement of V.K. Gujral, who had ordered the goods from Hong Kong is certain. Owner of the Capital Refrigeration Company with showrooms in Jor Bagh Market and Khan Market, Gujral runs a flourishing mail-order business and is believed to have imported and supplied electronic goods and household equipment to hundreds of diplomats.

After the recovery of 6 February, Gujral has been eluding the investigating agencies. By the time the gold biscuits were recovered and Abdi had named him as the person who had arranged for the goods to be imported, Gujral had gone underground. The team of Directorate of Internal Revenue (DRI) and Customs officials who reached with a search warrant against him and searched his house in Kailash Colony and shops in Jor Bagh and Khan Market, failed to recover any incriminating evidence. His wife Shiela Gujral, who has worked at the Kuwait Embassy and is believed to be well-connected in diplomatic circles told the officers that her husband was "out of the country on business." Though Gujral is said to be in London, workers at his shop claim he is away to Romania and is likely to be away "for some time."

With Gujral absconding, investigations in the case have come to a dead end. Customs officials complain that not being able to search and interrogate the diplomat has put them at a great disadvantage. If Mohammmed Abdi had been interrogated, he might have disclosed whether he was an innocent carrier or part of a large network in which he was used as a conduit because he enjoyed diplomatic immunity. The Somali Embassy has openly denied his involvement in the case in a statement made to the national press. The announcement said, "The involvement of Somali Embassy and a diplomat in the smuggling activities are baseless, untrue and highly unfounded." After this, the Customs officials, again reiterated their stand publicly and called the denial made by the Somali Embassy nothing more than a "face-saving device."

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi.

DELHI WAKF BOARD

Deeper into the Morass

The chairman of the board resigns in protest

The Delhi Wakf Board, which has been facing administrative problems and financial bankruptcy for the past two decades is at the crossroads again. On 6 February, the board's chairman, Imtiaz Ahmed Khan, sent his resignation to Lt. Governor, M.M.K. Wali. The board's working had been criticised at the recent three-day session of the metropolitan council where Janata councillor, Mirza Siddiqui Ali and Congress(I) councillor, Anwar Dehelvi severely criticised the functioning of the board and demanded the ouster of the chairman.

The Delhi Wakf Board, set up after independence is one of the most important Wakfs (meaning endowment) in the country. With land prices in the capital shooting up, the board responsible for maintaining all Muslim properties in New Delhi, is said to be the richest board in the country. It now maintains 765 masjids 160 datgahs, 465 quabristans and 151 makbaras of the capital. In accordance with the Wakf Board Act, the board is run by a chairman and 11 members, who are considered spokesmen for all matters concerning Wakf property and are largely responsible for the welfare of the ten lakh Muslims living in Delhi.

Several eminent Muslims have held the honorary post of chairman, Delhi Wakf Board. The late President, Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed and the present Governor of Haryana, H.M. Burney had held the post. Imtiaz Khan, a senior IAS officer was nominated chairman on 19 November, 1983 by the then Lt. Governor, Jagmohan. When Khan took over the board's chairmanship from Mirza Iqbal Shah, expectations from him were high. Khan was a brilliant bureaucrat responsible for pulling the Delhi State Industrial Development Corporation (DSIDC), of which he is the managing director, out of the red. With him at the helm of affairs of the Delhi Wakf Board, there was hope of improvement of the Board's affairs.

To those unfamiliar with the controversies surrounding the board, the resignation of Khan came as a surprise. But for others, aware of the constant bickering within the organisation, it was something which was quite expected. This is not the first time that the chairman has resigned. In fact, Burney who is Khan's father-in-law had also resigned before he could complete his five-year tenure as chairman. Others are also known to have resigned after bitter quarrels with board members, and one chairman was physically assaulted before he submitted his resignation.

Khan, who resigned because of "large scale corruption in the board," is believed to have informed the Lt. Governor about the malpractices that exist in the board's functioning. Though the resignation has still not been accepted by the Lt. Governor, the Delhi administration is worried about finding a new successor. It is believed that several prominent Muslim Members of Parliament are vying for the post. Mr Tajdar Babbar, president of the Delhi Pradesh Congress Committee, is also a possible candidate.

The members of the board, however, feel they should be allowed to choose a chairman themselves. After the move by Khan they held an emergency meeting and passed a resolution requesting the Lt. Governor to accept the resignation of the chairman and permit them to elect their new leader. Said Maulana Jameel Ahmed Illiazi, member of the board and president of the All Indian Imams' Organisation: "We will elect a chairman and fulfil all the wishes of the Muslim community which we were not permitted to do because of the autocratic behaviour of the chairman."

After the recent happenings within the board, Muslims of Delhi have suggested to the Delhi Administration to abolish the system of running the board through a chairman and members. Various representations have been received by the Lt Governor's office to appoint an administrative officer in charge of the Wakf Board as in Haryana and Punjab or set up a Wakf Development Board as in Uttar Pradesh. This is, according to some, the only way the board can be saved from further disintegration.

The Delhi Administration was changing the set-up of the board when matters came to a head with the resignation of the chairman. An amended Wakf Board Bill was passed by both Houses of Parliament last year and only a few weeks ago received the consent of the President. The amended Wakf Act has some pertinent suggestions. First, that a tribunal be set up to expedite litigation in all cases in which the board is involved. (At present, there are over 1,400 civil cases pending with District Courts concerning Wakf property.) Second, five MPs be nominated as members of the board and that a

Towering all Bumpers

FIRST TIME IN HISTORY

WIN OVER PRIZES RS.

20 CRORES

ANDHRA LAXMI

SUPER DELUXE UGADI BUMPER

TICKET Rs. 200/-

ONE PRIZE GUARANTEED ON EVERY TICKET

DRAW 22.3.85

GREATEST

1ST PRIZE

Rs. 1 CRORE

2ND PRIZE (10)

Rs. 10 LAKHS EACH

3RD PRIZE (100)

RS. 1 LAKH EACH

FIRST TIME IN BUMPERS OFFERING 64% PRIZES for-all

Organisers

CHANDRA AGENCIES

HOTEL CONTINENTAL ANNEXE REGAL BUILDING, NEW DELHI PH : 311351, 311208.

CHANDRA AGENCIES FOR PROSPERITY

Issued by Convenor Raffle Committee, D.D Hospital, Hyderabad.

SHARAD 838 ALUB

senior judicial officer be appointed as Wakf commissioner, with powers to go against the decisions of the board members, who will replace the Wakf board secretary, the present chief executive officer.

In fact, relations between the board chairman and the board secretary have always been a matter of dispute. The present case which began with murmurs of resentment by board members against the chairman, snowballed into a major crisis when in November last year, the chairman sent orders of repatriation to the board secretary, Mašud Raza and sealed all documents and papers of the board at its office in Darya Ganj.

It was this action by the chairman that brought the internal wranglings between the members of the board into the open. Masud Raza, once private secretary to Tajdar Babbar, was appointed secretary to the Wakf Board on 1 July, 1983 and was posted there from the health department of the Delhi administration. Though there were enquiries about how a junior official could be given such a responsible post, nobody questioned the authority of the secretary till the chairman demanded his withdrawal. Khan later explained that he was forced to issue the order because he was convinced of the secretary's involvement in the sale of a plot of land at the Allahu Masjid measuring 25,000 sq. metres which was let out at a nominal rent of Rs 200 per month.

After receiving his marching orders, Masud Raza pressed his case before the court claiming that the chairman was incompetent to serve him such notices and any action such as the sealing of the board's office should have had the consent of the Lt. Governor. He later received an order from the court and resumed charge of his duties. At that time the Lt. Governor, P.G. Gavai, had ordered a probe into the Allahu Masjid case, the findings of which have not yet been disclosed.

The Allahu Masjid case, which became crucial for the functioning of the board, is one of the hundreds of such disputes involving Wakf property before the courts. A list of 204 such cases was placed before the government in the Burney Commission report of 1976, but a majority of these cases are yet to be decided. Only recently a stay order was received by the Vishwa Hindu Parishad after the government had announced that they would give ownership of 123 properties to the Wakf for 99 years. One of the properties in the list is Jama Masjid which is Wakf property but not owned by the board. There are hundreds of graveyard plots in Delhi which have been allegedly encroached upon by the public and some by the Delhi Development Authority. While such a situation exists board members complain that though the monthly income of the board is Rs 27,000, more than Rs 20,000 from this is spent by it on litigation.

Khan had proposed to change the whole scenario and instil a sense of confidence among Muslims in the Wakf Board. He had announced last year that a task force would be set up to look into charges of graft and corruption and had declared that welfare measures would be adopted to improve the lot of the community. He now says that he faced resistance every time he wanted to take action. One case cited by a member was the proposed construction of a market on two plots of land of the Wakf in Darya Ganj, but other members sabotaged the scheme and spread word that a mosque was being constructed and immediately obtained a stay order for any construction there. According to the chairman, it was a battle between honesty and corruption. "I was helpless in the face of inefficiency and corruption. A chairman alone cannot redeem the affairs of the Wakf Board, under pressure from politicians and corrupt members."

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

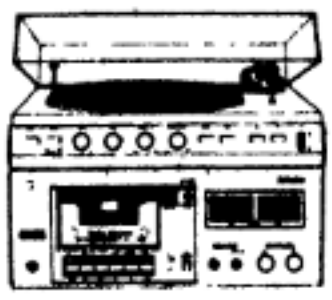
MRS GANDHI'S ASSASSINATION

A Controversial Confession

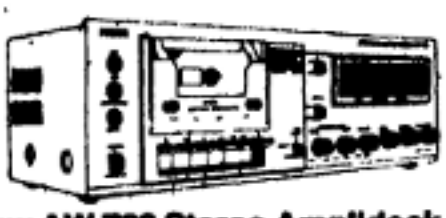
Satwant was "drugged" during his confession says lawyer

Satwant Singh's confessional statement fits comfortably in two typed sheets. Towards the end of it, he admits his guilt. "Around 9 or 9.15 am, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, R.K. Dhawan, Fotedar, two others and Narain Singh who was holding an umbrella, emerged from 1, Safdarjang Road and were coming towards 1, Akbar Road. The Prime Minister was about seven or eight steps away from us when Beant Singh took two steps forward and fired four or five times at the Prime Minister. I had an S.A.F. sten gun. I cocked the sten (gun) and fired on the left part of the Prime Minister's body. I had loaded 20 bullets in the sten gun, I emptied all of them on the Prime Minister. Some hit the Prime Minister, others hit the road. The Prime Minister fell after the first bullet hit her..." These lines will perhaps form the core of the argument against Satwant Singh, in some measure because the very worth of the confession is now becoming a matter of some debate.

The judicial authorities seem to have handled the formalities before and after Satwant Singh's confession with clinical care. Their eagerness to preserve its legal validity is evident from the "memorandum of the record of the confessional statement" made by Satwant Singh under Section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code inside Ward number one of Delhi's Tihar Central Jail on 1 December 1984. The memorandum is as long as the confession itself. Bharat Bhushan,the additional chief metropolitan magistrate (ACMM) of Delhi and the link magistrate in this case (ACMM S.L. Khanna is the main magistrate) who recorded the confession, has put down every formality in the attested memorandum. About 45 minutes before Satwant Singh began confessing, Bharat Bhushan had him examined by Dr Vijay Kumar, the medical officer of the Tihar Jail. He certified that "the accused in Ward Number one is in my opinion fit to make his statement." Dr Vijay Kumar was then asked to leave the ward, only Bharat Bhushan and Satwant Singh remained. According to what is written in the memorandum, Bharat Bhushan again explained to Satwant that he was not bound to make any statement and that if he did so, it could be used as evidence against him. Another 35 minutes were given to Satwant to "think over" the matter after the lapse of



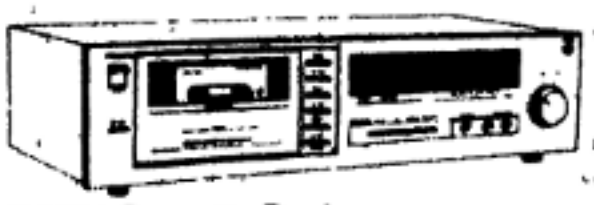
Beant Singh



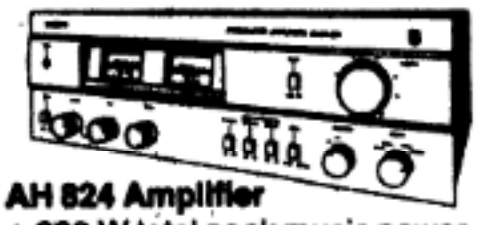
PHILIPS

MUSIC

Whatever the source, when it's Philips, you're sure



New AF 549 Music Centre: Amplifier-Cassette deck-Turntable-in-one
- 65 W total peak music power

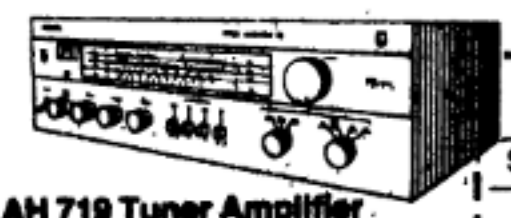


New AW 729 Stereo Amplideck
- 65 W total peak music power

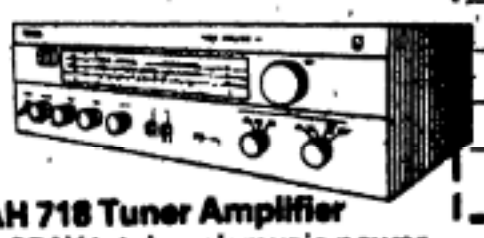
AW 529 Cassette Deck
- Electronic motor speed control

F 6121 Cassette Deck
- Servo mechanism for smooth operation
- Dolby* NR System
- Metal tape compatibility

AH 824 Amplifier
- 300 W total peak music power



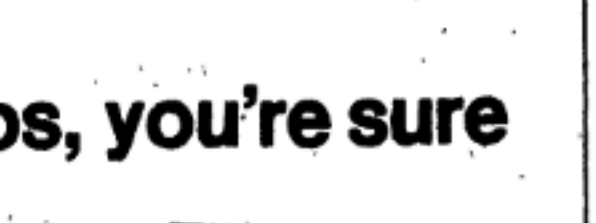
AF 834
Electronic Speed Control Turntable
- Stroboscope pitch control and magnetic cartridge



AF 734 Stereo Turntable
- Compatible with most stereo two-in-ones and amplifier systems

AF 534 Compact Stereo system
- 65 W total peak music power

AH 719 Tuner Amplifier
- 120 W total peak music power



AH 718 Tuner Amplifier
- 65 W total peak music power

Philips Rack System
- Comprises of F 7226 Direct Control Turntable, F 6121 Cassette Deck, AH 824 Amplifier and AH 426 speakers

F 7226 Direct Control Turntable
- Quartz speed control

AH 426 Speakers
- LEDs to indicate signal level
- Three-way speaker system

AC 028 Car Cassette Player
- 2 × 20 W RMS
- Dolby* noise reduction

AC 018 Car Cassette Player
- 2 × 6 WRMS
- Auto reverse

*Trademark of Dolby Laboratories Inc.

Recommended Stereo System Combinations

System	Turntable	Amplifier	Cassette Deck	Speakers
A	F 7226	AH 824	F 6121	AH 426
B	AF 834	AH 719	F 6121	AH 426
C	AF 734	AH 718	AW 529	AH 435
D	← AF 549 (Music Centre) →			AH 435
E	AF 734	◀ AW 729 (Amplideck) ▶		AH 435
F	◀ AF 534 (Stereo System) ▶		AW 529	AH 435

Just walk into any Philips Showroom and take a look at the range. When you listen to them, you will agree that nobody understands music like Philips does.

We have music for everyone

Philips – the trusted Indian household name for over fifty years which Bharat Bhushan asked him four questions "in order to ascertain the fact as to whether he (Satwant) is actually under coercion or pressure or otherwise." A verbatim reproduction of the question-answer session between Bharat Bhushan and Satwant follows:

Q: Since when are you in jail?
A: I am in jail for the last two days.
Q: Has any police officer come to meet you during this time? Has there been any pressure on you to admit your crime?
A: No. Nobody has told me. I want to tell the truth on my own. Nobody has put pressure on me, neither has any police officer come to meet me in jail.
Q: Where did you work?
A: I was a sepoy in the Delhi Police.
Q: Do you understand that the statement you are going to give me can become the basis of your punishment?
A: Yes, I have been told beforehand that you are a magistrate and I know well that my statement in front of you will bring me punishment but nevertheless I want to give my statement. It may be recorded.

Legal procedures for a confession of this kind were taken care of according to ACMM Bharat Bhushan. The counsels for Satwant Singh, however, have their own doubts. R.S. Sodhi, a Supreme Court lawyer now handling Satwant's brief under Pran Nath Lekhi, a senior advocate of the Delhi High Court, says that his client was "drugged and delirious" at the time of his confession. The counsels also contend that pressure was applied on Satwant to name R.K. Dhawan in the statement and they have already lodged an application in the court on this matter. Satwant Singh himself has added to the confusion by giving contradictory statements to people he has met of late, including his family members and lawyers. In such circumstances a retraction, based on the plan of the argument being prepared by the defence counsels, cannot be ruled out.

It is believed that I.U. Khan, the lawyer who dropped Satwant's case after being assigned his defence by the government, had made two statements about Satwant Singh's confession which seem incorrect. He had said that the confession ran into 15 pages while actually it is confined to two pages. Further, he reportedly claimed to have been present while the confession was being recorded on 1 December 1984. But ACMM Bharat Bhushan has clearly mentioned in his memorandum that "There is none else except the accused and myself" in Ward number one of Tihar Jail where the confession was recorded.

A large portion of Satwant Singh's statement is about Beant Singh, and his efforts to persuade Satwant to join the plot to kill Mrs Gandhi. It speaks of their initial meetings while on duty at the Prime Minister's residence, the sealing of their friendship on 29 September 1984 and the repeated invitations by Beant to Satwant for a visit to his house. Satwant Singh has named four people as being involved in the conspiracy. It was initially hatched, he says, by Beant Singh and Balbir Singh, another sub-inspector at the Prime Minister's residence. He also named Amarjeet Singh, an SIO posted at Mrs Gandhi's house, and Harbans Singh, a "battery-wala" from Mori gate in Delhi and a relative of Beant's from Faridabad who was "stout, dark and about 45 years of age." In the confession Satwant names Makhan Lal Fotedar as one of the several persons accompanying Mrs Gandhi on her way from 1, Safdarjang Road to 1, Akbar Road on that fateful morning. Curiously enough, neither the FIR (No. 241/84, Dated 31.10.84 u/s 302/307/120B IPC and 25,27/54/59 Arms Act) lodged at the Tughlaq Road police station, nor the statement given by M.L. Fotedar himself says that he was present with Mrs Gandhi at the time of the incident.

SPY SCANDAL

Maneklal's Misfortunes

The spy scandal is taking its toll on the fortunes of the firm, SLM Maneklal. Ever since the arrest of the firm's Delhi representative, Coomar Narain, and ultimately the managing director, Yogesh Maneklal, the firm's shares have been dwindling at the stock market. Apart from shareholders, the firm's depositors too are panicky.

At the end of February, a hundred rupee share of SLM Maneklal was quoted at Rs 77 on Dalal Street. In 1983, the shares were quoted at Rs 170. Last year was a bad year for the firm due to the slump in the textile industry. SLM Maneklal, which is primarily a textile machinery manufacturer, did not declare dividends in 1984. Last year, the shares had dipped to Rs 99, but slowly moved up to Rs 131.25. With Yogesh Maneklal having become the principal accused in the spy case, SLM Maneklal's future looks bleak.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, Bombay

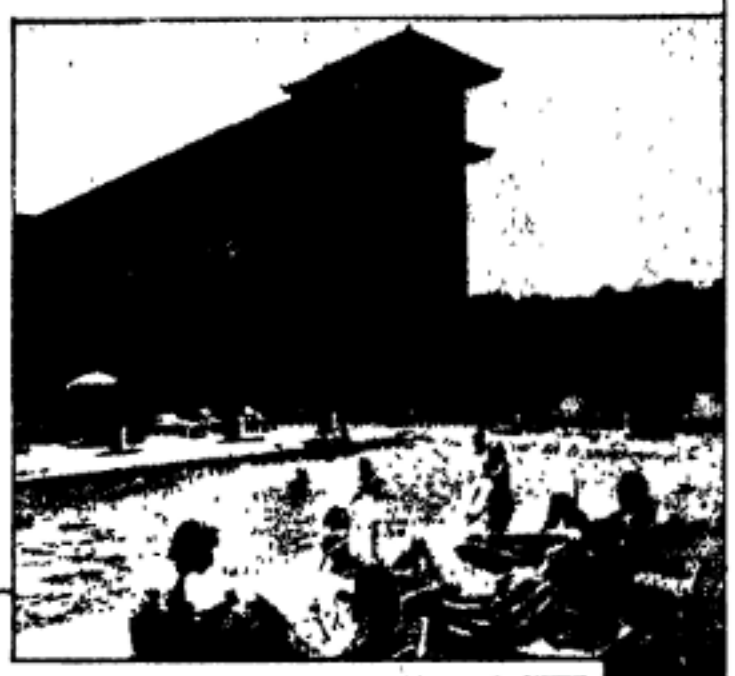
Another intriguing aspect of the confession is the reference to R.K. Dhawan, the special assistant to Mrs Gandhi. Satwant Singh quotes Beant as saying that Dhawan was his "good friend." In his own statement, Dhawan has indirectly confirmed that he knew Beant Singh. When Dhawan first named Satwant Singh in his statement he clearly stated in parenthesis that he came to know his name later, something that he does not say about Beant Singh. Political observers in the capital however, do not attach much importance to the "Dhawan-angle."

From the attitude of Satwant's counsels it seems that the case could have more political overtones than expected. Lekhi openly says: "This is not an ordinary murder trial." He goes on to complain that the charge-sheet levelled against his client stinks of political prejudice; it says that all the four accused "are Sikh by faith."

For Satwant's counsels, his confession does not seem to be very important. They have been concentrating on gathering material on the political background to the assassination and plan to "review" the entire Punjab problem during the course of the arguments. According to people close to them, they are already in possession of "explosive" documentary evidence by which they propose to show that the assassination was the result of the Punjab policy of the ruling party itself.

Meanwhile, the additional chief metropolitan magistrate of Delhi, S.L. Khanna has already extended the judicial remand of Satwant Singh and the two other accused, Balbir Singh and Kehar Singh to 11 March on the plea that they needed time to go through the 270 pages of case documents handed over to them at the Tihar Jail on 25 February. In this exercise Satwant will no doubt be assisted by his lawyers who have been seeing him regularly. During these meetings, they do not converse, but only exchange notes because one of Satwant's lawyers claims he saw a "bug" (a listening device) in the cell.

The trial will begin in late-March and will be held, in all probability, inside Tihar Jail. It is believed that the authorities may try and hold the trial "in camera." If that happens, Lekhi and the other lawyers will almost certainly challenge it. Sources close to the defence counsels of Satwant Singh say that they are not prepared to compromise on this issue. The trial, they insist, must be public, even if they have to construct a new entry-gate to the Tihar Jail.



Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

From Sita, Mercury and Casino Nepal:

The Soaltee Surprise

Escape to the new world of an ancient kingdom in Kathmandu.

Combine a perfect retreat with the most luxurious holiday at the Soaltee Oberoi: 4 days, 3 nights of unmatched pleasure. Your choice of Continental or Indian breakfast every day. Two deluxe half-day city sight-seeing tours. Free accommodation for 2 children up to 12 years in the same room without extra bed. Free airport-hotel-airport transfers.

Plus

Free-play casino-coupons worth Rs. 1,200

All, for Rs. 1,234 per person on a twin-sharing basis (Rs. 1,830 for single-occupancy) — inclusive of all taxes. (Prices indicated in Indian rupees.)

Hotel Soaltee Oberoi

REACT/03326/85

For bookings and details, contact your nearest Sita, Mercury or Oberoi Instant Reservations office or a bonafide travel agent.

Phone numbers: Bombay SITA 240666 MERCURY 273116 OBEROI 2024343 Ahmedabad SITA 78530 OBEROI 26037 Delhi SITA 43103 MERCURY 312008 OBEROI 699571 Srinagar SITA 78891, 77186 MERCURY 78786 OBEROI 71241 Kanpur SITA 68171 Jaipur SITA 68226 Agra SITA 66181 Varanasi SITA 52945 MERCURY 62021 Calcutta SITA 247224 MERCURY 443555/59 OBEROI 230181 Madras SITA 88861 MERCURY 83521 OBEROI 478156 Bangalore SITA 578091 MERCURY 577681 OBEROI 53444 Hyderabad SITA 223629 MERCURY 34411 Cochin SITA 34634.

NEW DELHI

The PM's New House

Six architects vie for the contract

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, still living in 1, Safdarjang Road, is soon to shift to a new house and is in the process of approving plans for his permanent residence. Though there were indications that the Prime Minister would shift to his temporary accommodation at 5 and 7 Race Course Road by the first week of February, and later, the first week of March, a visit to the site has made it clear that there may be further delay. Renovation is complete but the finishing touches and the interior decoration of the Prime Minister's house and office began only in late February.

Security personnel at 1, Safdarjang Road till then had not received any instructions about the Prime Minister's change of residence and weresurprised at the announcement by Congress(I) general secretary, Srikant Verma, that he would do so by 5 March. The Prime Minister himself was away on election tour and was scheduled to return to Delhi only on 6 March. Besides, the house had to be handed over to the family at least a week before for interior decoration.

Since 1, Safdarjang Road is going to be converted into a memorial for Mrs Gandhi, most of the furniture and fittings there will be left intact. According to indications, new furniture for the PM's residence will be provided by the Central Public Works Department (CPWD) and the wall hangings, paintings and objets d'art will be chosen by Mrs Sonia Gandhi who is taking a keen interest in the new house.

The renovation of the two bungalows has been done without much expenditure since the Prime Minister is expected to stay here only till 1987. At present, outside both the bungalows, now painted white, barricades have been erected and searchlights fixed on the roof. Armed guards equipped with walkie-talkie sets have already taken position all around the bungalows. The horticulture department of the CPWD has transported hundreds of flower pots and arranged them in the bungalow's lawns. Even in the selection of flowers and plants, the choice of the Prime Minister and his wife, both of whom are fond of gardening, was kept in mind. There is also a proposal to put up swings in the lawns for the Prime Minister's children. With most of the masonry and carpentry work over, there is an air of expectancy among the workers who have toiled round the clock for ten weeks.

Once the renovation and decoration of the PM's temporary house is finished, the CPWD and the works and housing ministry will begin work on the second phase of their operation. For the first time, a new house is to be constructed for an Indian Prime Minister. The site selected for the PM's permanent residence is close to the Rashtrapati Bhavan. The polo ground of the President's Body Guard, at Willingdon Crescent is being cleared to construct an impressive residence and office complex. A reception area, VIP guest rooms, a board room and a servants wing will also be constructed.

An eagerly awaited announcement was the name of the architect who will design the PM's new house. It was rumoured that a national competition would be organised and architects all over India would be requested to contribute designs for the house, as in other important projects. However, contrary to expectations, a select few architects of the capital were contacted by the Prime Minister's office last month and were asked to submit proposals for the residence by 1 March. The architects were briefed by the Prime Minister himself about the logistical requirements and security constraints to be kept in mind.

The six architects who had been chosen for the important project are Satish Gujral, Sharad Das, Raj Sharma, Kanvinde and Associates, Raj Rewal and Associates, and Kothari and Associates, considered among the country's best architectural talents. Nevertheless, after the news that six architects had been asked to furnish the Prime Minister's office with models and designs of the new residence became known, other architects demanded why the competition was restricted to private architects of the capital. Prominent among those whose names were missing was Charles Correa, the only Indian to be recipient of the gold medal of the British Institute of Architects. Said one architect: "The selection of names has been done at random. No professional criterion has been considered. That is the reason why the name of Satish Gujral, who is a painter and has no qualification as an architect has been included."

The six architects in the mean time, are working overtime to submit their plans and models before the deadline. Each is keeping his design a closely-guarded secret and hoping to be the one to win the prestigious contract. The final decision will be taken by the Prime Minister himself, but the design will have to be cleared from the department of environment, urban arts commission, the intelligence Wing and city planning before the go-ahead can be given to the CPWD to commence construction on the house. For the next two years, all eyes will be on the now vacant plot of land at the polo ground which will house the Indian Prime Minister for several decades and will, like the Rashtrapati Bhavan, become a historic landmark.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

The entrance to Rajiv Gandhi's new house on Race Course Road

SCHOOL OF CORRESPONDENCE COURSES

ANDHRA UNIVERSITY-VISAKHAPATNAM-530 003

ENTRANCE EXAMINATION NOTIFICATION

Entrance Examination for direct admission into B.A./B. Com. courses without any formal academic qualification.

...

Applications are invited from the candidates residing in India for Entrance Examination for admission into I Year B.A./B. Com. degree courses for the academic year 1985-86 through the School of Correspondence Courses.

No minimum qualification is required to appear for the Entrance Examination, except that candidates should have completed 20 years of age by 1-7-1985. Candidates who pass the Entrance Examination are eligible for admission into I Year B.A./B.Com. course in the School of Correspondence Courses and complete the course of study through Correspondence Courses only.

Applications will be issued from 19th February, 1985. Duly filled-in applications should reach on or before 9th April, 1985. Applications received after the due date of 9-4-1985 will be accepted on payment of the penal fee at the following rates.

Upto 11-4-1985 (For First two days)	..	Rs. 2/-
Upto 19-4-1985 (between third and tenth day)	..	Rs.10/-
Upto 29-4-1985 (between eleventh and twentieth day)	..	Rs.50/-

Applications received after 29-4-1985 will not be accepted even with maximum penal fee.

Intending candidates may write to the undersigned by DESIGNATION for application from, syllabus and model question papers by sending Rs. 5/- by Demand Draft drawn in favour of the Director, School of Correspondence Courses, Andhra University, Waltair along with one self-addressed envelope of 9"×6" size (without affixing postal stamps). The candidates may also remit cash at the cash-counter in the school towards application form. Postal Orders, money orders and cheques will not be accepted.

The School has no agents and takes no responsibility for the prospectus issued and promises made for admission by any other institution.

NOTE: The students of Introductory Course of this School need not pay Rs.5/- towards the cost of application form, syllabus, etc., and also need not send the requisition letter for the Entrance Examination application form. The School will send the necessary application form to the students of Introductory Course. However, the duly filled-in application form should be returned to the School with all the necessary enclosures on or before 9-4-1985.

WALTAIR
7th February, 1985

Prof. V. ABRAHAM
DIRECTOR

N.B.: The applicants should clearly mention whether they require Entrance Examination Application form either for B.A. or B.Com.

MEDIA

Independent Ventures

Will privately made TV films reflect political sympathies?

The surgeon who created history a few years ago by buying Menaka Gandhi's magazine Surya, is now starting a studio for producing television programmes. Dr J.K. Jain, a supporter of Rajmata Vijayraje Scindia of Gwalior and Sardar Angre, the former prime minister of Gwalior state, is by his own admission associated with the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS). By purchasing Surya from the then Prime Minister's daughter-in-law (Menaka Gandhi's troubles began with the Surya sale), Dr Jain, a successful medical practitioner, branched out into journalism. Now, he is on the threshold of entering the audiovisual media as well.

Dr Jain, and his wife, Dr Ragini Jain, run a successful nursing home in the capital's posh South Extension area. When N.T. Ramarao rushed to Delhi soon after his open heart surgery to protest against his unconstitutional dismissal, he stayed in Dr. Jain's nursing home and drove to the Rashtrapati Bhavan in an ambulance of the Jain Medical Centre. Any new venture by Dr J.K. Jain, therefore, arouses interest.

Doordarshan's decision to allow 100 private parties to produce TV programmes has prompted Dr Jain to jump into the fray. His studio is located in the Scindia villa—a sprawling 50-acre complex off Chanakyapuri. The owner of the premises is the Rajmata of Gwalior, a vice-president of the Bharatiya Janata Party.

What are Dr Jain's reasons for setting up such a studio? He explained that he wanted to introduce audio-visual technology in the field of medicine. In the studio, now nearing completion, he will produce TV and video films on education and medicine, to be telecast over Doordarshan and later sold abroad. "After some time, we can shift our attention to making entertainment films," Dr Jain added.

The construction of Dr Jain's studio has been kept a secret and visitors, even on request, are not allowed in. In fact, even Madhavrao Scindia, the minister of state for railways and the estranged son of the Rajmata was unaware that a studio was being set up in the Scindia Villa. "I though the place was being used for making pottery and ceramics," he said expressing surprise. (The Gwalior Potteries are located in the Scindia Villa).

The studio, which will produce films for the "Medical Television Company" (the name was suggested by Dr Jain) has, according to Dr Jain, been set up at a cost of Rs 50 lakhs. Though the studio was to be inaugurated on 26 January this year, he now hopes to commence production in early March. "Depending upon the success of the films and the usefulness of such films in India and abroad, I will decide on the future utility of the studio," he said.

J.K. Jain

The decision to allow the private sector into an area which has always been considered the preserve of the government has created a great deal of controversy. The first person who was granted permission to set up a sophisticated television studio was Dhirendra Brahmachari. Though Brahmachari had received a go-ahead to produce TV and video films on yogic research, it is widely known that the popular serial Hum Log telecast thrice every week on prime time, is being produced at Brahmachari studios at Silokera near Gurgaon.

It appears that the Doordarshan authorities have no control over the kind of programmes being produced by private companies. There is thus a grave threat of a misuse of the facilities being set up in the private sector. When Dhirendra Brahmachari and Dr Jain are among the private producers, the political links of the studio-owners may play an important part.

Both the studio projects of Brahmachari and Dr Jain have been shrouded in secrecy. Brahmachari himself is extremely sensitive about his studio, which he has set up at an enormous cost, after acquiring about 90 acres of agricultural land. The studio of Dr Jain is also the subject of speculation and curiosity. Workers at the studio claim that N.T. Ramarao is involved with the project and will be helping Dr Jain establish a first-class studio like the one he owns in Hyderabad. Dr Jain, however, strongly denied the rumour: "He (the chief minister) has nothing to do with the studio and perhaps does not even know such a project is being financed by me."

Another company which is producing TV programmes is the Independent Television Company (ITV). This private studio is owned by industrialist Sanjay Dalmia. The ITV had its first taste of success with a series of programmes on the recent general elections. The programme by the ITV on election night is estimated to have been watched by 40 million viewers. Time magazine, hailing the achievement of ITV in a recently-published story quoted journalist Rashid Talib: "I think ITV has started a revolution." However, according to Ashok Raina, chief executive of the ITV and another journalist turned-broadcaster, the revolution has yet to take off.

Raina explained that out of the 100 private parties approached by the government, only 25 came forward to actually set up video programme producing units like his own. According to him, both Brahmachari and now Jain are going ahead with their plans against the guidelines issued by the government. This is because all 25 companies were restricted to purchase equipment from the Gujarat Communication Electronics Limited (GCEL), which in collaboration with Sony, manufactures video equipment. Orders for importing sophisticated machinery from abroad are awaited. Complained Raina, "Brahmachari obtained the licence to import duty-free equipment under the garb of producing films on yoga, which have still not been aired. I wonder under what guise Jain has imported the equipment, for which we will be required to pay 200 per cent import duty."

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

THE DAWOODI BOHRAS

A Struggle for Change

The crusade against the Syedna continues

Without any musical accompaniment, the voice sang softly in Gujarati, "Ame Chalte Rahyan (We marched on and on)" as the audience in the auditorium at Ahmedabad's Premabhai Hall listened in hushed silence. There was no anger, no menace in the words of the welcome song and yet it expressed and summed up the quiet Gandhian determination of the reformist movement in the Bohra community. The occasion was the first session of the fifth All World Dawoodi Bohra Conference where a record number of 800 delegates came to show their determination to fight against the authoritarianism of the clergy in the Bohra community.

A discussion during a seminar on "Women and Youth" Shukdev Bhachech

When the three-day conference was over, Asghar Ali Engineer, honorary general secretary of the conference, told SUNDAY, "The Ahmedabad conference will go down in our reformist movement history as a landmark." For the first time, the reformists' biennial gathering passed off very peacefully "We had feared violence but there was not even a demonstration masterminded against the reformists by the priesthood." Among the delegates who came to Ahmedabad were participants from various centres of the Bohra community in India who had come for the first time. Also present were people who had journeyed from far-off places in the UK, Sweden, Kuwait and Thailand. And what was more remarkable was that more than 300 of the delegates were women, the worst sufferers of the oppression of the priesthood.

If the Bohras came in large numbers there were also prominent non-Bohra citizens from all over the country to lend support. The former Gujarat chief minister, Babubhai Patel, summed up their attitude: "How can there be any question of not associating with the reformist Bohra movement because what they are fighting for is a fight not related to any religious demands? They are fighting for human dignity, social justice, rational approach and against exploitation, authoritarianism, terrorism and communalism." The oppression perpetrated by the clergy on the Bohras was not an oppression of a section of any sect but an oppression of a section of our Indian society, for authoritarianism either of the state or the clergy can never be tolerated in our nation." Supporters of the high priests in the Bohra community had earlier tried persuading Patel and other delegates like Mrs Hemlata Hegisthe, a noted social worker, from going to the reformist meet. Also attending the conference were Jinabhai Darji, the dissident Congress(I) leader, noted poet Uma Shankar Joshi, former judges V M. Tarkunde and Narendra Nathwani, former Tamil Nadu Governor Prabhudas Patwari and N. G Goray.

The conference is held once every two years to highlight the crusade of the reformist Bohras against the stranglehold of the clergy on their community. Their fight is now more than half-a-century old. It basically aims at securing freedom of opinion and conscience of the individual in a society where the words of the clergical establishment headed by Syedna Mohammed Burhanuddin are more powerful than law. The reformists have been complaining of coercion by the priesthood culminating often in social boycott of the reformists; in 1979, a commission headed by Mr Narendra Nathwani, then a MP, had effectively brought out the woes of the Bohras. But thus far no protection has been given to reformists against the pernicious weapon of social sanctions.

"Social boycott is even worse than untouchability," said Engineer. Nobody is barred from talking to an untouchable but among our people a person victimised with baraat (social boycott) would be barred even from talking to his near and dear ones," he added.

The fifth conference called upon newly elected members of Parliament and legislatures in Maharashtra, Gujarat, Madhya Pradesh, Andhra Pradesh, Rajasthan and West Bengal to unanimously adopt a legislation against the inhuman practice of social boycott still being freely practised by the orthodox clergy to persecute the reformists The reformists also wanted an account of all Bohra properties and incomes. It said that in addition to extracting crores of rupees from the community every year through levies, the priesthood was also busy bringing all charitable property belonging to the community under its absolute control Recently, a number of such charitable properties in Bombay were either disposed of or converted into commercial projects to line the pockets of a few. The conference quoted the Daut Bagh property and Safi high school building as two such instances.

Mr Engineer said that the struggle of the reformist Bohras was a struggle for change and not one against religion. Our correspondent, who spoke to a cross-section of the delegates, found that these were not mere empty words but formed the cornerstone of the reformist movement. Said a young delegate from Madhya Pradesh, Asghar Ali, "We should intensify our efforts against the orthodox clergy even by undertaking sacrifices. If entry to a place of prayer is denied or any other injustice perpetrated we should be prepared to enter these places and fight injustice at all costs." Said Imran Ali, an advocate who is more than a hundred years old, "The reformists should take recourse to legal action to expose the misappropriations and other deeds of the clergy." Ali, who is known as Vakil Saheb of Nagpur among the Bohras, has been fighting the oppression of the clergy since 1934. He had even presented

70/30, Silver, SZ, Silkcraft, Lincoln,
Executive & Millionaire Suitings.

SUITINGS
THE PERFECT FABRIC

Only once in a lifetime comes a luxury like this. Walls that feel as smooth as velvet and glow with the soft sheen of pearls. That's the unique offering of DULUX Velvet Touch. A premium wall finish in 29 shades, including 4 Natural Whites. Apple White, Rose White, Heather White and Lily White.

Such an exclusive range is a beautiful persuasion to create different moods for your home. So that you can come home to luxury every time.

Dulux
Velvet Touch

The feel of velvet, a glow of pearls

Come home to luxury with Dulux Velvet Touch

CLARION C-ADCOM-1

his case in the privy council (before independence) in the cause of reformists. Mrs Zainax Poonawala, a woman delegate, asserted that the reformists were on the right path in opposing the oppressive tactics of the priesthood. Rashidah, yet another woman delegate, said that all those who took part in reformist activities faced harassment from the orthodox elements but that would not deter her or her family.

The conference adopted a five-point programme of action to intensify its agitation. The programme envisages peaceful satyagraha near Badri Mahal in Bombay and near the places of the Syedna's representatives, the Amils in other towns. The reformists will also organise a peaceful march in Delhi during a parliamentary session and organise boycott of payment of zakat, levies and other taxes imposed on the community by the clergy.

Asghar Ali Engineer — Shukdev Bhachech

What was the impact of the fifth conference on the Bohras themselves? Replied Engineer, "That the conference took place without any incidents of violence or even a demonstration indicates that the power of intimidation of the clergy was decreasing. We have always had the latent support of more than 80 per cent of the one million-strong Bohra community in the world. The Ahmedabad conference has come as a morale-booster because it would encourage many dormant supporters to come out in the open against oppression. Fear has been the key in the hands of the priests in maintaining their hold on the community. This fear has kept many people from speaking out. We hope in the next conference many more would come and speak up against the clergy establishment."

No one seems to know when they will finally succeed against the oppression but the crusade appears to be getting stronger with each passing year. One day it will become a whirlwind and uproot the strongholds of religious authoritarianism. With this hope, the reformists march on and on.

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

ENERGY

Power From The Sun

Aircraft firm plans to sell non-conventional energy devices

A group of high-powered executives of McDonnell Douglas, the top aircraft manufacturing firm, have arrived in India. Their mission not to persuade the Indian Airlines or Vayudoot to buy passenger aircraft, but to sell, interestingly, in a totally unrelated field, some non-conventional energy devices.

More specifically, the McDonnell Douglas team met officials of the newly set-up Department of Non-conventional Energy Sources (DNES), the Rural Electrification Corporation and other public and private sector agencies trying to sell the "mini-grid" power generation concept using the solar dish panel mounted Stirling engines developed after nearly 12 years of research. The research alone cost 50 million dollars (Rs 48 crores) in research funds.

According to the McDonnell Douglas officials who were in Madras to participate in a workshop on new technologies and strategies for the power sector, organised by the Association of Indian Engineering Industry AIEI (southern region), it costs 25 million dollars (Rs 23 crores) to set up a complete facility to generate power equivalent of twelve-and-a-half megawatts (MW). This does not include the land cost necessary to set up the 500-odd dish shaped solar panels with their Stirling engines mounted at the centre of each.

The cost compares favourably with the cost of setting up a thermal power plant within the country. According to the state electricity boards, it costs anything between Rs 150 to Rs 190 crores for provision of 100 MW of power using the conventional thermal power plants. This compares well with the McDonnell system which costs a little over Rs 200 crores for the same amount of power "The overriding advantage is that the expense for the 'Stirling' type of power plant is that there are no recurrent costs except for maintenance purposes," said Mr Robert Powell, a member of the McDonnell team.

"A seven feet by seven feet surface of solar array could replace as much as 60 barrels of oil in terms of fuel use to generate the same amount of electricity, with no pollution effect," Mr Robert Powell said. This is one of the reasons why there is so much of interest in this type of technology. While the nuclear and the thermal power systems are state-owned, the non-conventional energy systems are entirely left with the private sector in the United States with the result that as much as 4,000 MW—equivalent to double the annual consumption of power in Tamil Nadu state is being generated in California alone by over 120 non-conventional energy systems, Mr Powell informed.

McDonnell Douglas had formed a joint venture with United Stirling of Sweden in 1983 to market Stirling engines and thermal electric systems. The company plans to tap India's domestic market and establish India as the base for the company's international marketing strategies to penetrate the South-East Asian markets. "Right now, there is enough demand for us to produce equipment capable of generating five MW of power It costs as much as Rs 40,000 for one kilowatt (KW) of power for the user which is definitely on the high side. However, once commercial production on a large scale gets established, the costs could be brought down to as little as Rs 20,000," Mr Powell added.

Even at this level, the energy could be costing four times the conventional form of energy for the Indian user. "This type of comparison could at best be a misnomer. We have to see the long-term benefits of such an energy programme rather than evaluate the economies at the initial stage itself. It is the question of availability of power," says K. Balagangadharan, a member of AIEI. According to him, in Tamil Nadu alone, as much as 30 per cent of the total power supply is absorbed by a million small pumpsets of five horse power and less. "It is this source that could be supplied with such a non-conventional form of energy. The conventional power supply to this sector is replete with huge transmission losses and high uncertainties," he added.

T. Raman, Madras

NAVJEEVAN BUMPER LOTTERY

(IN AID OF ASIA'S LARGEST HOSPITAL FOR SPINAL INJURIES)

Marching ahead with the tune

WIN OVER

Rs. 12.50 CRORES

IN PRIZES

1 st PRIZES
Rs. 5 LAKHS x 60
UPTO 3 CRORES

2 nd PRIZES
Rs. 2 LAKHS x 60
UPTO 1.20 CRORES

3 rd PRIZES
Rs. 1 LAKH x 120
UPTO 1.20 CRORES

4 th PRIZES
Rs. 50,000/- x 120
UPTO 60 LAKHS

5 th PRIZES
Rs. 10,000/- x 600
UPTO 60 LAKHS

-: Special Attraction :-

MID DRAW on 1.3.85

1st PRIZES Rs. 1 LAKH×60 Rs. 60 LAKHS

2nd Prizes Rs. 500/- × 6000 Rs. 30 LAKHS

And Lakhs of other attractive prizes.

TICKET PREPAID Rs. 5/- each

FIRST TIME IN BUMPER LOTTERY FOR BUYER'S + AGENT'S · SELLER'S 18 PRIZES GUARANTEED IN A BLOCK OF 100 TICKETS

Special Attraction for Sellers.
50% Sellers Bonus on 9th PRIZE.

DRAW : 31.3.85

Buy your Ticket TODAY.

Indian Spinal Injuries Centre

Managing Trustee
Indian Spinal Injuries Centre
New Delhi

Organising Agent
VIMAL LOTTERY AGENCY
12 Sriman Srinivas Street
Venus Colony.
Madras 18

Associates :

SANJAY AGENCY (P) LTD.
F-79, Bhagat Singh Market,
New Delhi-110 001. Phone : 323772

Crescent

RAJASTHAN

Caste War?

What made DSP Bhatti shoot Man Singh?

Was the Deeg incident an outcome of caste rivalry? The general feeling is that Kahn Singh Bhatti, the Rajput deputy superintendent of police (DSP) of Deeg killed Raja Man Singh since he was a Jat. But, in fact, it has little to do with the Jat-Rajput conflict. People relate this incident with the one which took place in Ajmer a couple of years back. Mr Bhatti was DSP, Ajmer, at that time. After a feud between two groups of college students, some Jat students complained to the police that their lives were in danger.

The day this complaint was lodged, Pradeep Chaudhary, a Jat student, was murdered. The Jat students launched an agitation in various parts of the state, especially in Ajmer district, demanding the arrest of KahnSingh Bhati. They alleged that Bhatti was responsible for the murder since he took no steps to protect Pradeep Chaudhary in spite of being aware of the danger to his life and a formal complaint. Subsequently, the DSP was recalled from the district and sent to the police lines.

A senior police official told SUNDAY that KahnSingh Bhatti is an officer who is easily drawn into controversies. While he was posted at Jaipur, a Sindhi died of a heart attack when the police were trying to arrest him. It is alleged that the Sindhi died because of Bhatti's negligence. Similarly a few years ago, it was alleged that he was responsible for the burning of the Guru Granth Sahib in Raisingh Nagar. He was then suspended and kept away from active service for over a year.

Rioting in Deeg after the DSP shot Man Singh

In April last year, a woman was raped by two police constables in Kotputli which led to tremendous resentment in Jaipur and Alwar districts. When the district administration in Alwar sent an SOS for more police forces to contain the agitation, the services of KahnSingh Bhatti were also placed at its disposal. Bhatti was made incharge of the Khairthal area where he created more problems by resorting to uncalled for firings.

In Deeg too, he used more force than what was required. A police officer rightly said that for 24 hours after the state helicopter was damaged by Raja Man Singh, Bhatti sat in the Kotwali like a coward. At present, Kan Singh is under suspension and a CBI inquiry has been instituted to find out the truth. The state government has also ordered a judicial inquiry headed by Justice V.B. Giani of the Madhya Pradesh High Court.

Milap Chand Dandia, Jaipur

Headache?

The one solution
ANACIN

Trust its extra pain relieving power

Anacin contains more of the pain reliever doctors the world over recommend.

Effective for the aches and pains of colds and flu, headache, toothache, backache and muscular pain.

Trust only Anacin.

Now in a protective foil pack.

Strong and trusted MANNERS ANACIN*

India's No.1 pain reliever

* Licensed user of T M Geoffrey Manners & Co Ltd.

GM-1-R 84

BIRLA-YAMAHA

Getting together.
To bridge the generator gap!

When two well-known names come together,
it's always big news
When the names are Birla and Yamaha and the products are generator sets, the news is nothing short of electrifying
Birla and Yamaha Both giants in their own right Birla. A pioneer and a leader in so many different fields
And Yamaha A name that's synonymous with technical excellence the world over Excellence in products ranging from motor bikes to generator sets

Birla-Yamaha will make light of power problems everywhere

Take power shortage areas
Even when there's darkness all around, there can be light in your house with Birla-Yamaha
If you're in a power-sufficient area, you can now have power you can take along with you, wherever you will In a mobile van, for instance
Of course, where no power is available at all, out in the wilds where no electric pole has ever been sighted, Birla-Yamaha will bring light
At last!

This is the end of the Dark Ages

Every time power fails, you are made dramatically aware of the significance of something you've taken for granted all your life

You face the hottest Indian summer in 20 years without even a fan to come to your aid

Or you're a shop owner who has come face to face with the unpleasant fact that no power can mean no business, at peak festival time .

It's a lot worse in an operating theatre where the cost of power failure is as dear as life itself

Well, now things are going to be different.
Thanks to Birla-Yamaha

Enter the Little Genie

Birla-Yamaha generators will certainly help bring some of the magic back to life
Appropriately, we've called our generator the Little Genie At the turn of a switch it puts power at your command When you want it.. where you want it.

These generator sets with outputs ranging from 0 5 to 4 KVA are ideal for homes, clinics, shops, petrol pumps, banks, offices, video parlours, outdoor film/video shooting units, defence camps, mobile vans , almost anywhere

Putting quality and service together

With the Little Genie, compact, fuel-efficient generators will be available for the first time in India
Little Genie generator sets will be made to the same standards that have set Yamaha generators apart on the international scene

Now you can get Yamaha quality right here at home Actually, you get a lot more than international quality You get the confidence of spares being available at any time
You get the advantage of efficient service that's always on hand when you need it

Leave it to Birla-Yamaha

Yes, Birla-Yamaha is here to tackle one of the larger problems that you are faced with today Because while electricity is one of the biggest boons of modern life, it has also spoilt us a little We find it difficult to live without it
Even for a few hours
Well, now there is a standby From the manufacturers who stand by their product

Birla-Yamaha

It's going to be a bright future ahead for all of us

BIRLA-YAMAHA LIMITED

1st Floor, Dalamal House, Nariman Point, Bombay 400 021.

Bringing the Little Genie into your life.

Sista's-BY-631/84-R

World-class quality that's so easy to maintain —even at home!

SOMA METAL FITTINGS

Precision -engineered to save you trouble; ensure smooth performance

SOMA Specialities

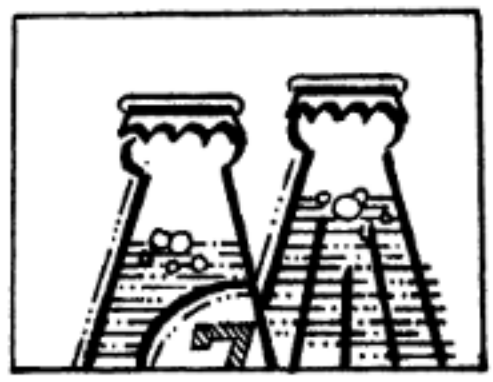
Attractive, easy-grip handles in chromium — all interchangeable

Choice of Elegant and Heavy-duty models

Easy maintenance —at your fingertips

Always keep a replacement cartridge handy — it's available wherever you buy SOMA fittings. Should your tap malfunction, simply unscrew the top, ease out the cartridge, slip in the refill and secure the top.

SOMA PLUMBING FIXTURES LIMITED



From the makers of

VITREOUS HINDUSTAN SANITARYWARE

2 Red Cross Place, Calcutta 700 001, India

SAA/SPF/7A 2

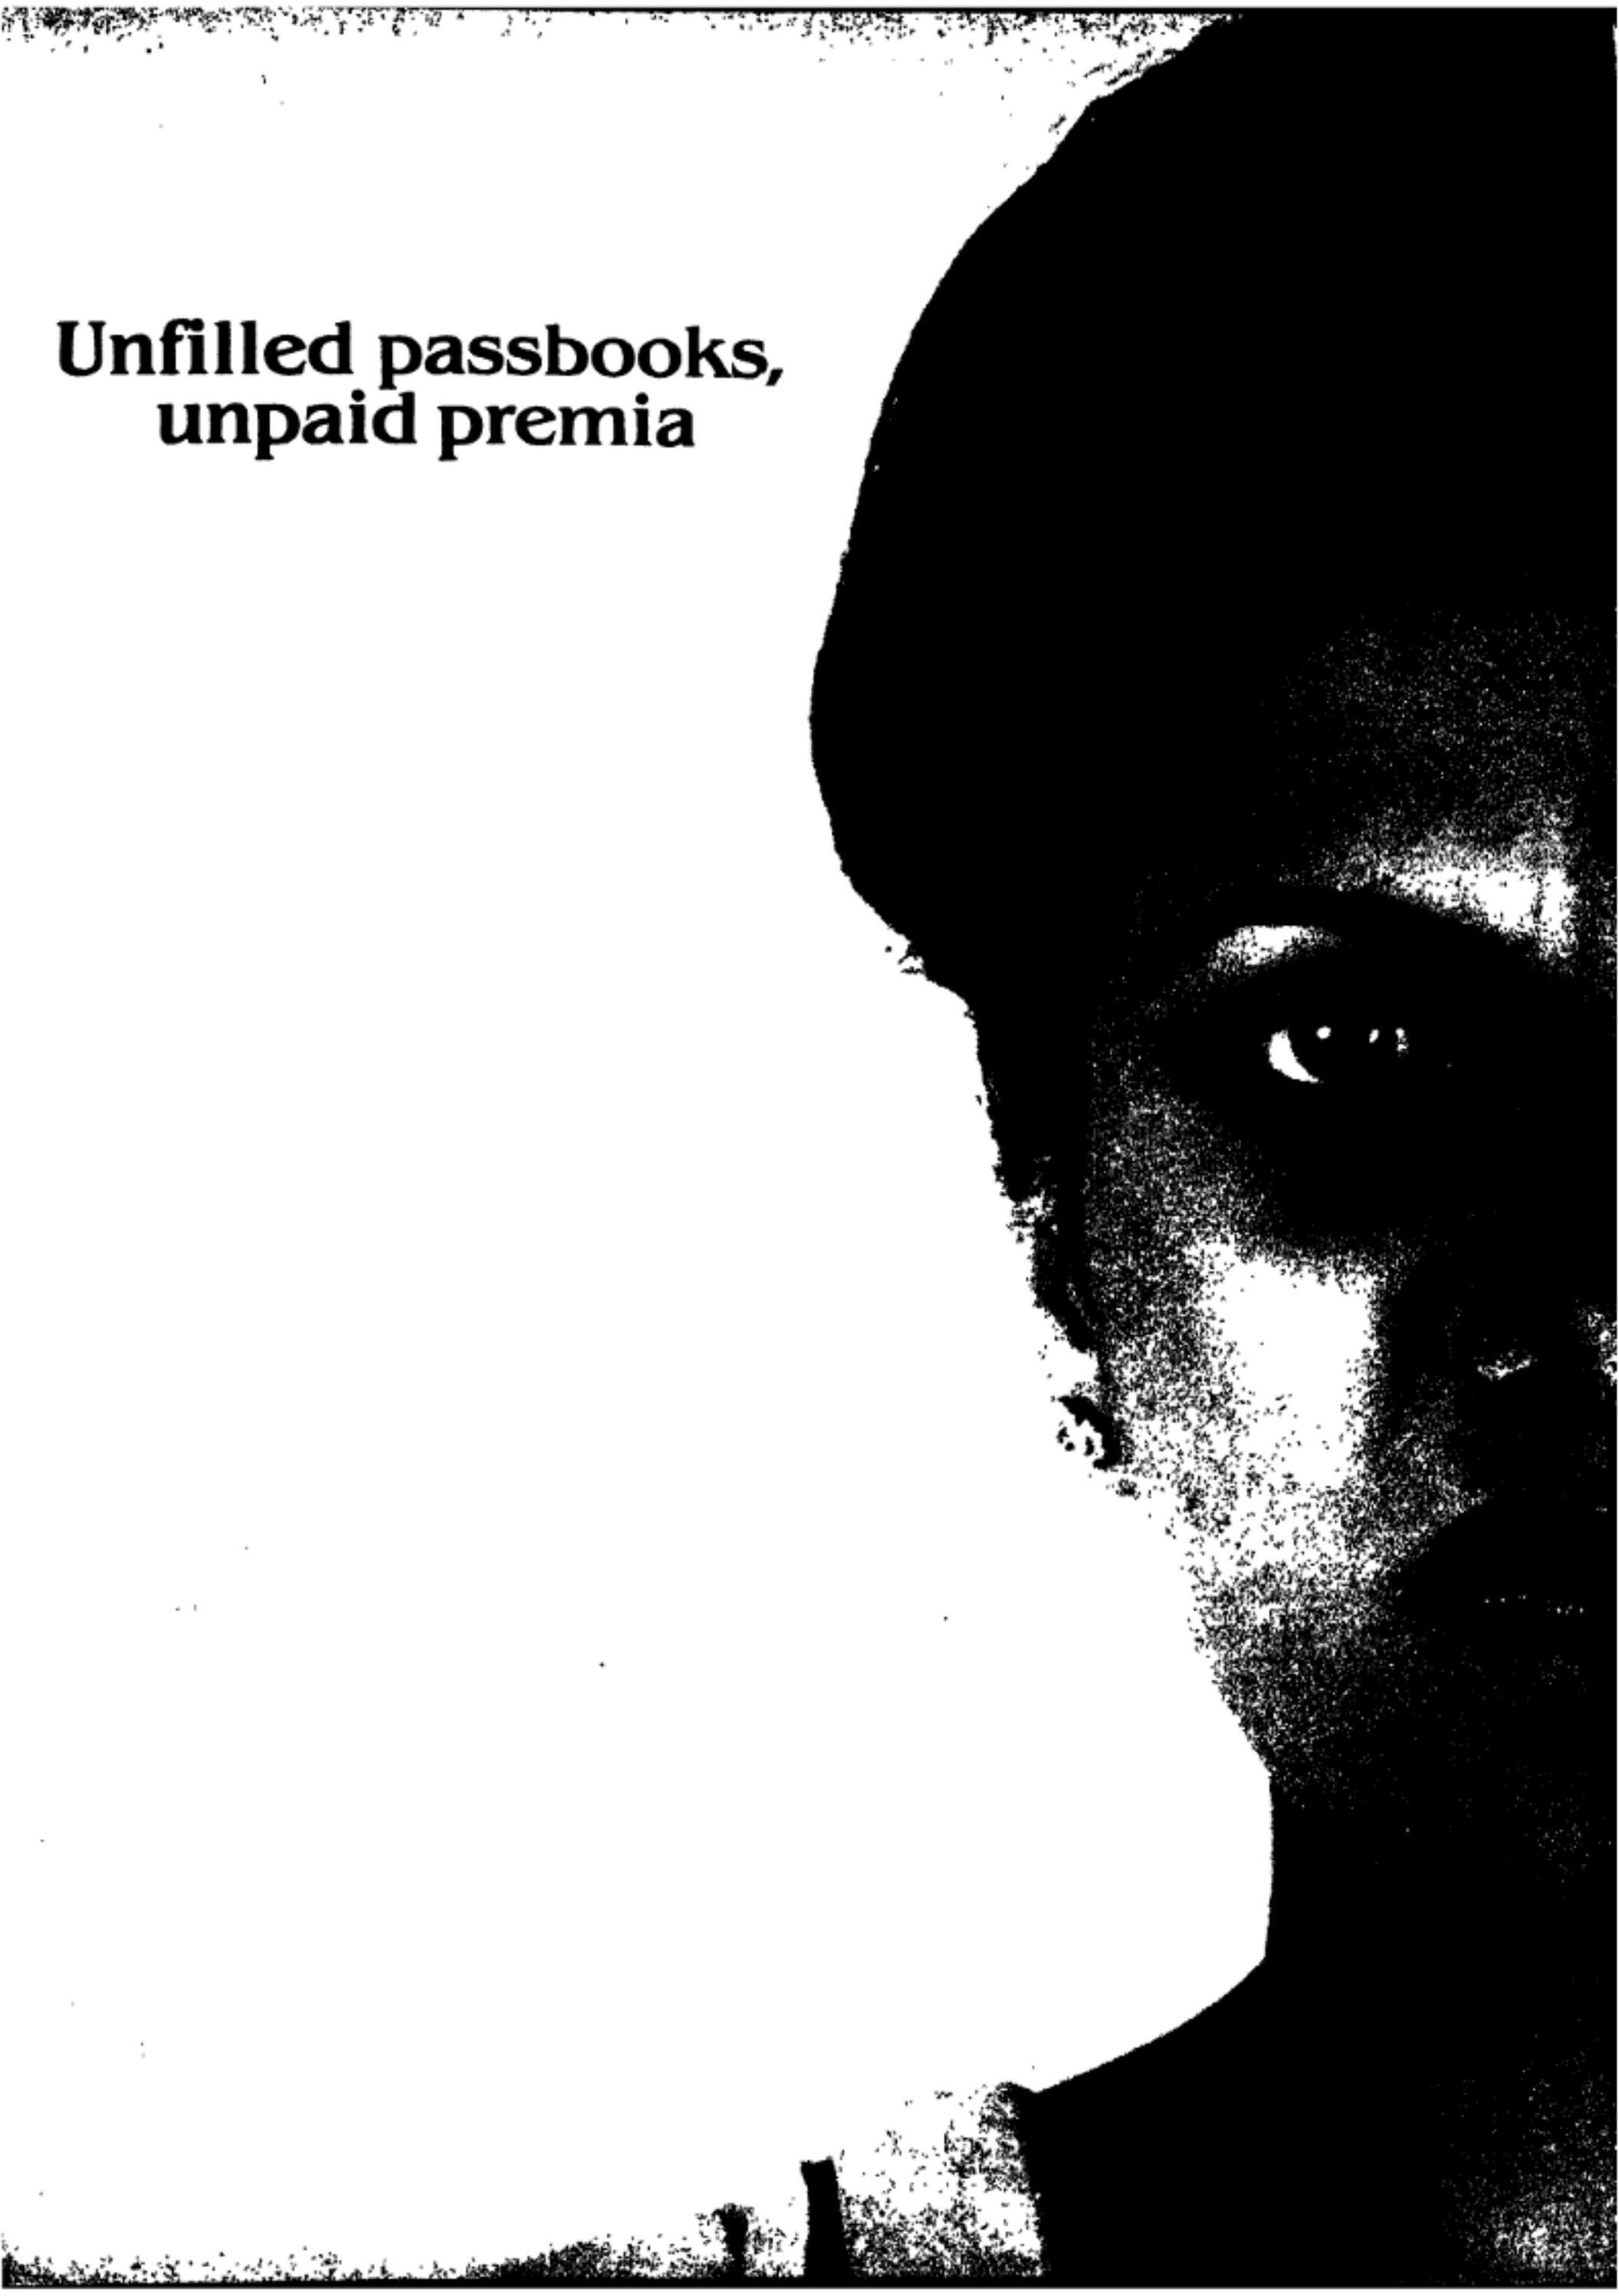
The French Love Soft Drinks

Chronic alcoholics in our country should take a cue from the French: their consumption of liquor is on the wane. Instead, more and more people in France are resorting to soft drinks like lemonade, cola and bitters. In a country where wine holds a pride of place, this piece of news is rather startling. Those between the ages of 15 and 25 years make up the main part of soft-drink buyers. For instance, consumption of fruit juice went up by 31.5 per cent between 1980 and 1981 and is continuing to grow. Sugar is the main ingredient of these drinks. Contrary to what one notices in different countries, particularly in the United States, in France, the only permitted sweetener is sugar (saccharose).

Spraying Pests with Virus

For the first time, scientists in Britain have developed a safe and effective way of controlling pests by spraying affected sites with a commercially produced virus agent. Its advantage is that it is an effective alternative to chemical agents and is also pollution-free. According to Prof. Glen Schaefer of the Cranfield Institute of Technology in eastern England, where much of the research has been carried out, the secret of the new method is to see that the virus agent is used against a particular pest in its larval form. Successful trials have been carried out in Scotland for a three-year period against the Pine Beauty moth whose larvae eat the new buds of the trees.

Sharks: Slow, Clumsy Fish



For those of you who have seen films like Jaws or the like, the image of the shark must be quite repelling: big, swift, dangerous killers. But the actual picture is different: they are big, slow, clumsy fishes. This is the view put forward by John McCosker, director of the Steinhart Aquarium at the California Academy of Sciences in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco, who recently studied sharks off Australia. McCosker also found out that the speed of sharks was less than three miles an hour.

Codeine Can Prove Addictive

Codeine, a drug used in compounds to treat coughs, can prove addictive. According to Prof. Hermann Roth of Tubingen, West Germany, codéine could be converted into morphium in the body by a process known as biotransformation; hence, an increasing number of teenagers are resorting to the drug. Up to 40 per cent of codeine, he said, could he transformed into morphium in the body.

Illustrations Prabir Sen

Unfilled passbooks, unpaid premia

VARIETY

THIS INDIA

Illustration: Debashis Deb

PUNE: On 15 February the Peshwa park here witnessed a unique spectacle: the "wedding" of three pairs of tigers. A pandit chanted mantras to signal the ceremony of the tigers and tigresses christened Amar, Akbar and Anthony and Ganga, Laxmi and Rukmini respectively. The four-and-a-half-year-old tigers and the two-and-a-half-year-old tigresses lolled in their "bridal" chambers oblivious of the scene outside. The host of the function—the municipal commissioner Mr Arun Bongirwar—was unwittingly prevented from reaching the spot by the milling crowds. The "wedding" was organised by the municipal corporation on its anniversary to create an awareness among the people about the necessity to preserve wildlife. A remarkable visitor to the function was an elephant with a mahout atop. It stood majestically at the entrance of the park, greeting the people—The Times of India (S. Kamneikhup, Bombay)

MADURAI: Television viewers in Madurai have gone back to the days of silent movies with the failure in the audio system since 14 February. The television programmes seen here are those telecast by the Delhi Doordarshan on the national hook-up and relayed by the Kodaikanal Relay Centre. The audio failure was caused by a minor repair in the relay equipment at Kodaikanal—The Hindu (Waheed Khan Bawadiwale, Hubli)

BOMBAY: Bus conductors, by the very nature of their job, have to deal with very tricky situations sometimes. Like the one in a 6 Ltd bus to Colaba recently. Six women who settled into the front seats of the bus at V. T. told the conductor in no uncertain terms that they did not intend paying their fare to Hutatma Chowk. They were joining a morcha at the chowk for more wages and could not afford tickets, they told him. The conductor did not lose his cool. He explained to them patiently that they would probably not mind spending time arguing with him or his superiors if he diverted the bus to a depot, but other commuters would be inconvenienced. Besides, if a ticket inspector caught them without tickets, his job would be in jeopardy. "If you have enough money among you to buy tickets, please buy them. After that I will donate Rs 10 for your cause from my wallet," he told them, offering them a ten-rupee note. That did the trick. The chastened group bought tickets and declined to accept the donation, despite the conductor's insistence—The Times of India (Urmila Dongre, Bombay)

BASTI: Candidates in Basti district of Uttar Pradesh are not asking for votes alone but also for a kilogram of flour. In the Khalilabad reserved constituency, the Bharatiya Janata Party candidate, Mr Shiram Chauhan, goes from door to door not requesting for votes alone but also for a kilogram of flour. He returns with the entire collection to his office from new localities every day. Mr Chauhan said that he collects flour to provide meals to his party workers engaged in his election campaign—Indian Express (R. C. Goyal, Solan)

MADRAS: Ever heard of a public telephone from where you can make free calls? Such a phone exists in the city and that too at the GPO, thanks to the laxity on the part of the telephones department. The department personnel have not bothered to collect the 50 paise coins from the phone's coin chamber for days together. The result: it is so full of coins that the direct line has been kept open. All one now has to do is lift the receiver, dial the number and start the conversation. Don't bother to insert any 50 P coin; you just can't anyway—Indian Express (Ali Akbar Teherally, Madras)

WARANGAL: Fools rush in where angels fear to tread: this was rightly proved by a drunken rickshawpuller who had resorted to the foolhardy act of grabbing a crawling snake and eating it bit by bit when many stepped back in fear on seeing it near a toddy shop. Benumbed by an overdose of toddy, he began swallowing the snake which was writhing in his hand and followed it up with more ale. No sooner had he finished eating than he turned blue and swooned—Indian Express (G. Pradosh, Bangalore)

WITHOUT COMMENT

Pride and self-respect will be there when one stands on one's own legs and not when one runs after overdrafts—Rajiv Gandhi, ridiculing the talk of self-respect, the main plank on which NTR won in 1983

A Rajiv Gandhi can only be challenged by another Rajiv Gandhi. If there is none such at present, he will have to be created—M.V. Kamath in Surya India

If you support Rajiv Gandhi then you must vote for Janata and Ramakrishna Hegde—Vinod Mehta in The Sunday Observer

Since when have Congress ministers started owning "moral responsibility" for the sins of their subordinates?—L.K. Advani, on Shiv Charan Mathur's resignation, in The Times of India

I was providing escapism to the masses, and now I have to fight against the very reasons for which I was providing the escapism—Amitabh Bachchan in The Illustrated Weekly of India

We are not usurpers—Gen Zia-ul Haq, quoted in The Telegraph

We will fight for the competence of Indians. They've demonstrated competence. They're in the space age. They're in the nuclear age. They're very capable people—Warren Anderson, Union Carbide chairman, quoted in The Telegraph

When the public votes a Rajiv Gandhi to power you accept it. But when the same population supports Hema Malini or Amitabh Bachchan, you look down upon their choice—Mahesh Bhatt in Filmfare or a bank that takes pride in promptness.

The choice is entirely yours.

You can continue to put up with the laxity and the lapses, balancing your passbook yourself and reminding your bank every month about standing instructions.

Or you can find a bank that treats you the way a bank should. With a little courtesy. A little attention. And a little enthusiasm.

At HongkongBank you will find all three in plenty. What you won't find is the aloofness that some people seem to read into an international name.

Walk into our nearest branch. Look around and see the difference for yourself.

And make your choice.

HongkongBank

The Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation

Bombay Calcutta New Delhi
Madras Visakhapatnam
Merchant Banking Division Bombay
The British Bank of the Middle East Bombay

Because your money deserves a little more respect.

ULKA-HKB-CU-2

BEGINNING 10 MARCH 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) This is a week of mixed fortunes On the financial front you might suffer reverses. The domestic front will add to your worries One of your close relatives may suddenly fall sick adding to your financial burden. However, things look bright on the professional front This is also a favourable period for those in love and intending to get married Watch your health.
Good dates: 10, 11 and 12
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 4
Favourable direction: South

LEO (15 August—14 September) This is an extremely lucky phase for lovers. you can go ahead with marriage plans. Financially this is a bright period and some of you may even gain money or property through an unexpected source. Friends and relatives will prove very helpful Businessmen and professionals will make steady headway Those above the age of 45 should keep a vigilant eye on their health and diet
Good dates: 11, 12 and 14
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: South-west

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) Financially, this is a bleak period and you may have to draw upon your savings to see you through this phase. However, this is an excellent week for those in love. The period is equally favourable for those in service: you are likely to receive a transfer order. This is also a good time for singers and performing artists. Your health will show signs of improvement.
Good dates: 11, 13 and 15
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 8
Favourable direction: South

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) The stars foretell a bleak period for all of you Enemies will be active during this phase and one of your close friends will be working to embarrass you The economic front is equally disheartening and you may have to borrow money to tide over this period Your health will steadily deteriorate Lovers are advised to avoid adventurous plans. Take care of your diet.
Good dates: 14, 15 and 16
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: North-east

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) This week domestic problems will keep you occupied but do not neglect your work Do not take hasty decisions regarding your career Businessmen should be wary of deception However, the period is favourable for love and matrimonial negotiations The financial prospects are also bright but do not be extravagant Your health will improve markedly during this phase.
Good dates: 12, 13 and 15
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North-west

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) Prospects are bright for businessmen this week do not hesitate to undertake risky ventures. Lovers will find their parents in a compromising mood Friends and relatives will keep you busy during the week-end. However, professionals will find the going rough. Students are advised to avail of the opportunities that come their way Watch your health closely
Good dates: 10, 12 and 13
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: North-east

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) This week you will get an opportunity to change your career do not take hasty decisions and consult your elders before finalising plans. Your financial prospects look bright. The domestic front will also remain inspiring This is the opportune time to carry out marriage negotiations A letter will bring good tidings. However, do not overstrain yourself
Good dates: 12, 13 and 14
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 6
Favourable direction: West

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) A week of mixed fortunes lies ahead of you The domestic front will continue to bother you Friends and relatives will be working to embarrass you On the professional front you may come in for severe criticism from your employers Businessmen too will pass through difficult times. However, this is an ideal time to get married.
Good dates: 10, 12 and 14
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 4
Favourable direction: North

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) There is good news for those of you who are unemployed: a job is in the offing. Students intending to go abroad for higher studies will also benefit from this lucky period The domestic front will remain calm Your financial status will improve some of you may even win a lottery But this is not a favourable period for lovers.
Good dates: 13, 15 and 16
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 7
Favourable direction: South-west

CANCER (15 July—14 August) Professionals are advised to be tactful while dealing with their superiors Businessmen too should be cautious in their dealings with customers Financially this is not a good week and you may have to borrow money to tide over this period The domestic front will add to your worries However, the period is favourable for courtship and marriage negotiations
Good dates: 10, 11 and 13
Lucky numbers: 5, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: East

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) Success in all your activities is a surety for most of you this week Businessmen will bag lucrative contracts while a promotion cannot be ruled out for those in government service The domestic front will be a source of inspiration The stars shine brightly on the economic front But do not neglect your health.
Good dates: 13, 14 and 16
Lucky numbers: 3, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: West

PISCES (15 March—14 April) This is a lucky week for professionals: chances of going abroad are bright. Businessmen can materialise expansion plans If you have legal problems relating to property, this is the right time to settle it. The domestic front will remain inspiring This is also a favourable phase for courtship. Those above the age of 45 should be careful about their health.
Good dates: 10, 15 and 16
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 8
Favourable direction: East

For those born on the 11th, 12th or 13th of many month:

Most of you are short-tempered by nature If you can curb your temper you will do well in life. You have a commanding personality and can easily influence people. Friends and relatives look upon you for advice. Most of you are also ambitious and you will do well if you join politics or the administrative services. Women born during this period are sociable by nature and they make good housewives.

VARIETY

CHESS

Game of the month

The term 'grandmaster draw', which alludes to the outcome of the meeting of two minds commonly indisposed towards combat, should be distinguished from a draw between grandmasters. Indeed if one ever has the opportunity to examine the games from a tournament bulletin in depth, it will quickly become clear that some of the most interesting and illuminating ideas are buried in these all too quickly forgotten peace treaties. I give a typical example of such a game, rich in ideas and only lacking a positive result.

White: Andersson. Black: Adorjan. Wijk aan Zee 1984. Queen's Indian Defence.

1 N–KB3 P–QB4 2 P–QB4 P–QN3
3 N–B3 B–N2 4 P–K3 N–KB3
5 P–Q4 PxP 6 PxP P–K3
7 P–QR3

This move is held to give White an edge, threatening as it does P–Q5 without allowing the counter . . . B–N5. Black must commit himself prematurely.

7 . . . P–Q4 8 B–N5 B–K2

Adorjan (Black) to move

Andersson (White)

9 BxN BxB 10 PxP DIAGRAM

Posing problems. If 10 . . . PxP 11 B–N5+ or 10 . . . BxP 11 NxB QxN 12 Q–R4+ with discomfort in either case. Adorjan finds a dynamic and wholly unexpected solution to his difficulties.

10 . . . 0–0! 11 PxP PxP
12 B–B4 N–B3! 13 BxP+ K–R1

Suddenly White is in a quandary with two extra pawns and a tottering position. To risk 14 P–Q5 N–K2 15 P–Q6 BxN+ 16 PxB N–N3 followed by . . . N–B5 would be insane, so material must be returned.

14 0–0 NxP 15 NxN BxN
16 B–Q5

A sensible decision forcing a draw. Against two such bishops White's remaining extra pawn offers no real prospects of success while obliteration might lurk round any corner.

16 . . . BxN 17 BxB BxP
18 BxR BxR 19 B–K4 QxQ
20 RxQ B–B3 21 P–QR4 R–Q1
22 RxR+ Draw agreed.

An enterprising and instructive miniature.

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE

If it is not too early in the morning, see how you would have fared with this hand:

Dealer South Game all

♠ J 10 8 6
♥ 6 3
♦ K 10 7
♣ A K Q 4

♥ 7 led

♠ A K Q 9 3
♥ A Q 4
♦ J 9 6 4
♣ 3

A fairly optimistic auction might go:

South	North
1♠	2♣(1)
2NT	4♠
6♦(2)	No

(1) A trifle under strength for a force, according to modern ideas, North plans a delayed game raise.

(2) Sensible enough!

West leads a heart and you win with the ace. Trumps fall in two rounds. You cash the queen of hearts and ruff a heart, on which East discards a diamond. On the fourth round of clubs East again shows out. You ruff and now have to take a view in diamonds, holding J 9 opposite K 10 7.

Well, it won't be a good view! The point is that East has turned up with precisely two spades, two hearts and three clubs. So he must hold all the diamonds. The full hand was:

♠ J 10 8 6
♥ 6 3
♦ K 10 7
♣ A K Q 4

♠ 5 4 — ♥ J 9 8 7 5 2 — ♦ — — ♣ J 9 7 6 2 — ♠ 7 2 — ♥ K 10 — ♦ A Q 8 5 3 2 — ♣ 10 8 5

(N / W E / S)

♠ A K Q 9 3
♥ A Q 4
♦ J 9 6 4
♣ 3

All you had to do – if you were counting – was discard another diamond on the fourth club, knowing that West would then be forced to give you a ruff-and-discard.

My book The Expert Game, a strong runner for 30 years, is published for the first time in paperback (Robert Hale, £2.95).

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. How is poly (cellulose nitrate) more commonly knows as?
2. The work on the Qutb Minar in Delhi was begun during the reign of Qutbuddin Aibak. Who finally completed the monument?
3. Name the Latin American novelist who won the Nobel Prize for literature for his book A Hundred Years of Solitude?
4. When did All India Radio begin the Vividh Bharati service?
5. What is Stygiophobia the fear of?
6. What do the following have in common: Farmer, Fishbed, Flogger, Foxbat, and Fulcrum?
7. What is the name given to the single continent wich existed on earth around 200 million B.C., before it broke up to form the present continents?
8. Reach for the Sky is a biography written by Paul Brickhill about a famous legless pilot who fought in the Battle of Britain during World War II. Name him.
9. Steamboat Willie is the most well-known film of which famous film-star?
10. Running Commentary is the autobiography of which top British athlete?
11. Where in Norse mythology, do the gods live?
12. What is acarology?
13. Which Indian cricketer is nicknamed Jimmy?

ANSWERS

1. Celluloid
2. His successor Iltutmish.
3. Gabriel Garcia Marquez.
4. 3 October 1957.
5. The fear of hell.
6. They are all code names of Russian fighter aircraft. Farmer is MiG-19, Fishbed is MiG-21, Flogger is MiG-23, Foxbat is MiG-25, and Fulcrum is MiG-29.
7. Pangaea.
8. Douglas Bader.
9. Mickey Mouse.
10. David Moorcroft.
11. Asgaard.
12. The study of lice or tics.
13. Mohinder Amarnath.

"The utmost economy has to be exercised in the use of petrol, petroleum and diesel products.

Energy Audit should become an annual feature of the activities of all major industrial enterprises."

Conservation. Is it time to legislate?

ULKA D PCRA-058 1

We were warned that several species of wildlife would soon become extinct But civilization did not listen We were warned about deforestation but we still cut trees We were warned of the dangers of air and water pollution But civilization didn't listen

The Panda and a drop of oil

The illustration in this advertisement presents a Giant Panda cupping a drop of oil An animal almost extinct saved because mankind came to its senses almost too late, reminding us about something else that is on its way to extinction

Legislation was the only way mankind could safeguard wildlife and prevent deforestation and pollution

Is the same necessary for petroleum? Is it too early? Or is it already too late?

A champion for conservation

You're probably wondering who made the statement in inverted commas, on the left It was made by our late Prime Minister, Indira Gandhi on October 11th, 1980 when she handed over India's first two indigenous offshore oil platforms She was a great believer in conservation and she never lost a moment to remind us that it is a cornerstone in any energy programme

What is "Energy Audit"

Energy Audit is sane and necessary It is not a step back but a logical step forward What it implies is that we should use fuel efficiently And to make sure we do this we have to inform our consumer, our country and the world how much energy was used to make something or to carry out a process

In Japan, for instance, Energy Audit has been in practise for years You can turn over a cup and saucer in Japan and find out how many units of energy were used to produce them

Time is running out for petroleum

Every year Rs 800 crores are lost because of carelessness or "taken-for-granted" wastage in the use of petroleum . petrol, diesel, kerosene, cooking gas and fuel oils

Is it time to legislate against this wastage? Or should we wait? Just like we waited with the Giant Panda or our lush green forests Give it a thought

Let's give our scientists a fighting chance

All over the world work is on to find new sources of energy and to make renewable sources of energy viable on a mass scale. This kind of effort, however, takes time If we work at conservation and allow petroleum to last 30 years longer the transition to a new source could be smooth. If we don't we may not have an energy source in between

"Thank You"

PCRA wants to thank you for the efforts you have made to help petroleum last longer Today we are proud of the fact that together we are saving Rs 100 crores per annum for India by following a few simple 'tips" and guidelines for the efficient utilisation of petroleum It was only possible through team work.

If you are not part of the team get in touch with us today

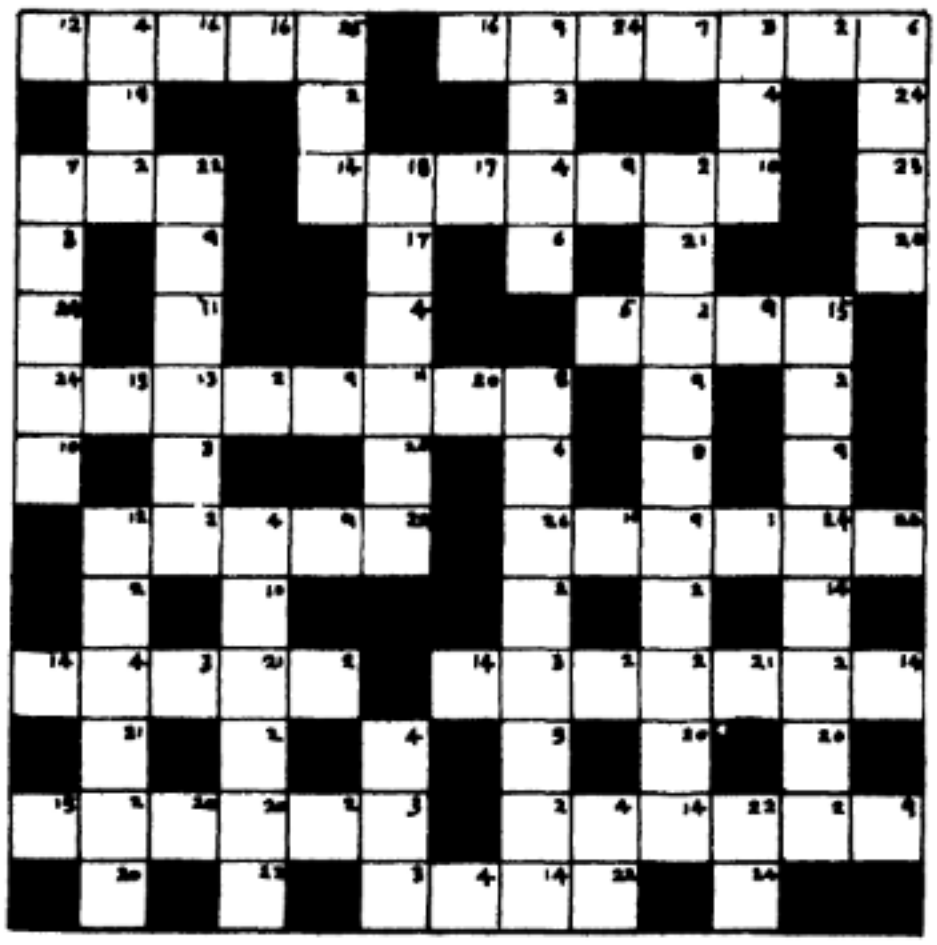
P C R A

Petroleum Conservation Research Association

306, Sethi Bhawan, 7 Rajendra Place
New Delhi-110 008

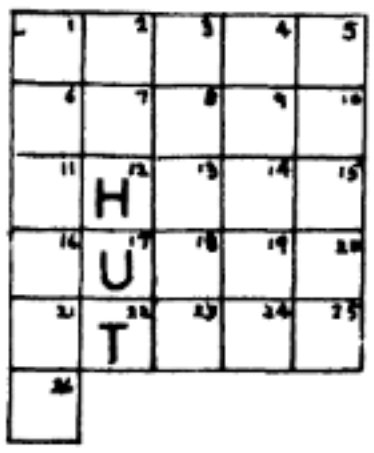
PCRA is a Government sponsored organisation and a representative of India's petroleum companies in areas related to conservation

PCRA's four major conservation targets are the Industrial, Agricultural, Domestic and Transport sectors



PCRA's services are free Savings achieved by PCRA through conservation exceed Rs 100 crores per annum

Oil isn't going to last much longer. Use it with wisdom.



TEASERS

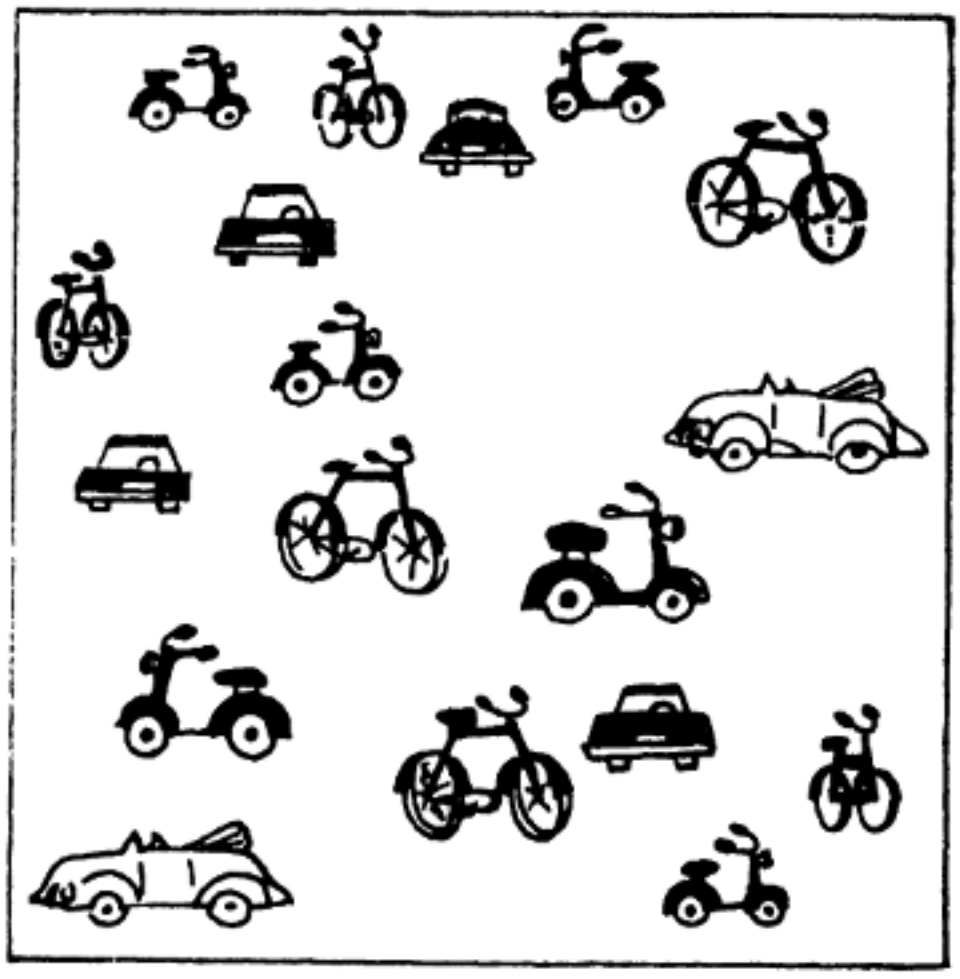
BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

Cryptocross

REFERENCE GRID

Each number in the main grid represents a letter. The same number always stands for the same letter. To help you make a start, three letters have been given. Can you now substitute the rest to complete the grid?

Word Power



Can you boomerang right back in 6 steps? What you have to do is to take the last three letters of each word and start a new word with them. For example, if the first word had been PESTER, it could have been followed by TERMINAL. To make the path easier, we have given you the number of letters in each word to get you back from BOOMERANG to BOOMERANG. However, you are welcome to ignore these blanks and use different words.

Blankagrams

There is AN explanation for the man's behaviour, insisted his friend. He saw the crowd and-----to join it. When he came-----he was suddenly surrounded by a group of people who as good as caught him in a-----. Though he struggled he could not escape, and finally the police picked him up. But he is innocent. Idle curiosity was the------for his being near the site of the crime, not------.

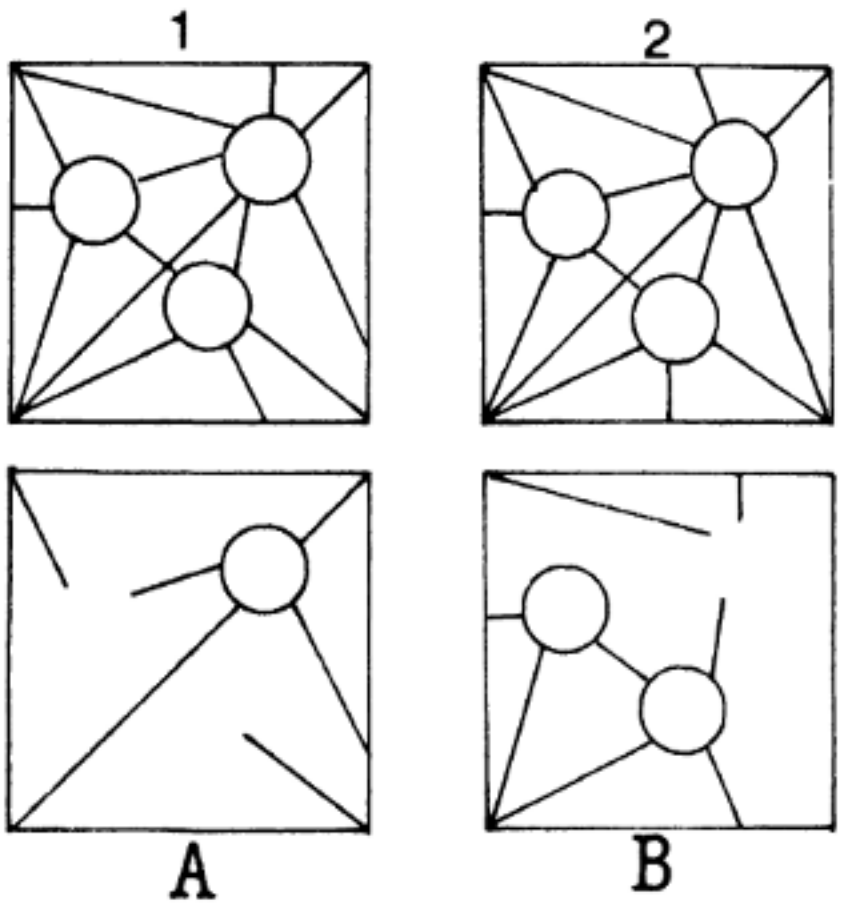
This is a progressive anagram. Add one letter to the initial word (all capitals) and rearrange these letters to fill the first blank. Then add another letter to this word and rearrange to fill the second set of blanks. And so on.

Figure it Out

Here is an assortment of motorbikes, bicycles and scooters. Can you draw 3 straight lines to divide the area up into six sections each containing a motorbike, a bicycle and a scooter?

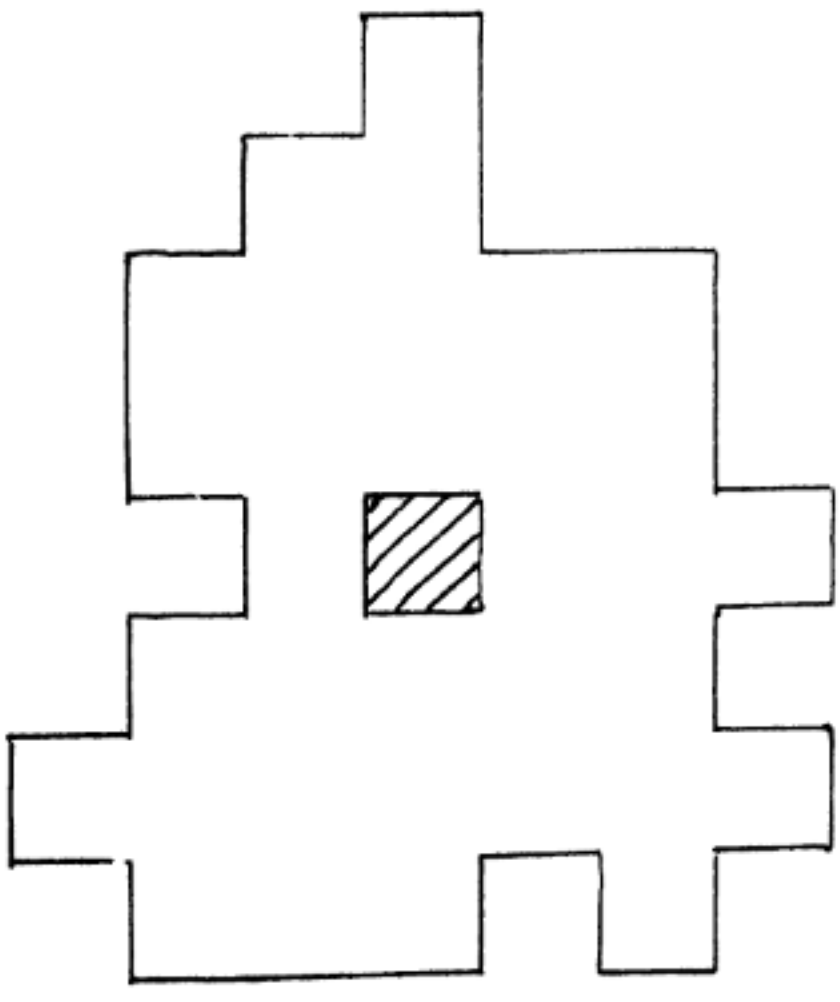
Blockbuster

Fill in the ten letters given below to form eight four-letter words reading downwards. To help you out we have already placed two of these letters in the blank pyramid.



R,E,T,E,A,L,D,C,O,N

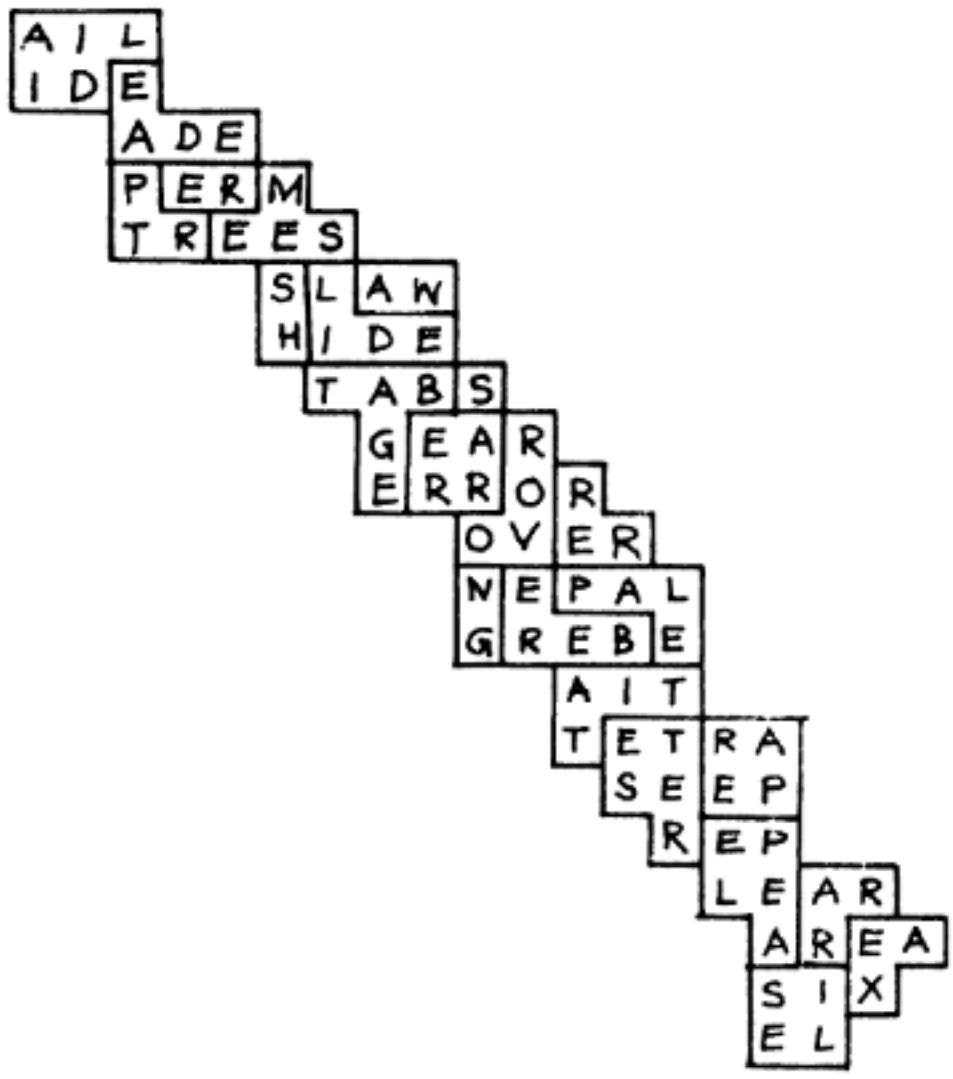
What's in a Word



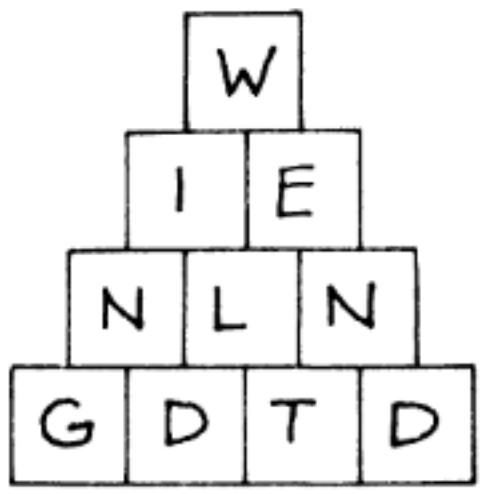
Can you say what these are?
a) a Chinese can
b) a can that covers you
c) a can in Panama
d) a musical can
e) a card playing can
f) a deep, deep can.

Quick Think

If A is superimposed on B, will it produce 1 or 2?



Shape Sleuth



This odd shaped floor needs to be covered completely with tiles. It will need 11 tiles of exactly the same shape and size. Can you work this out and cover the area?

Solution to last week's Teasers:

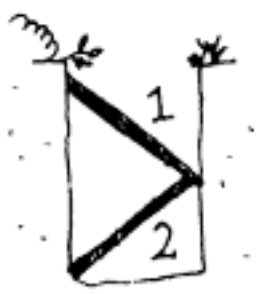


Figure it out:

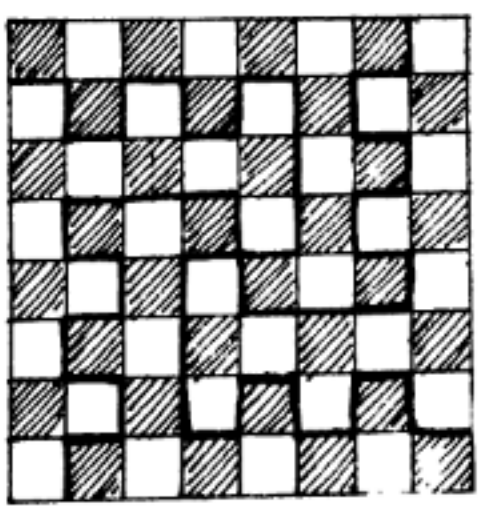
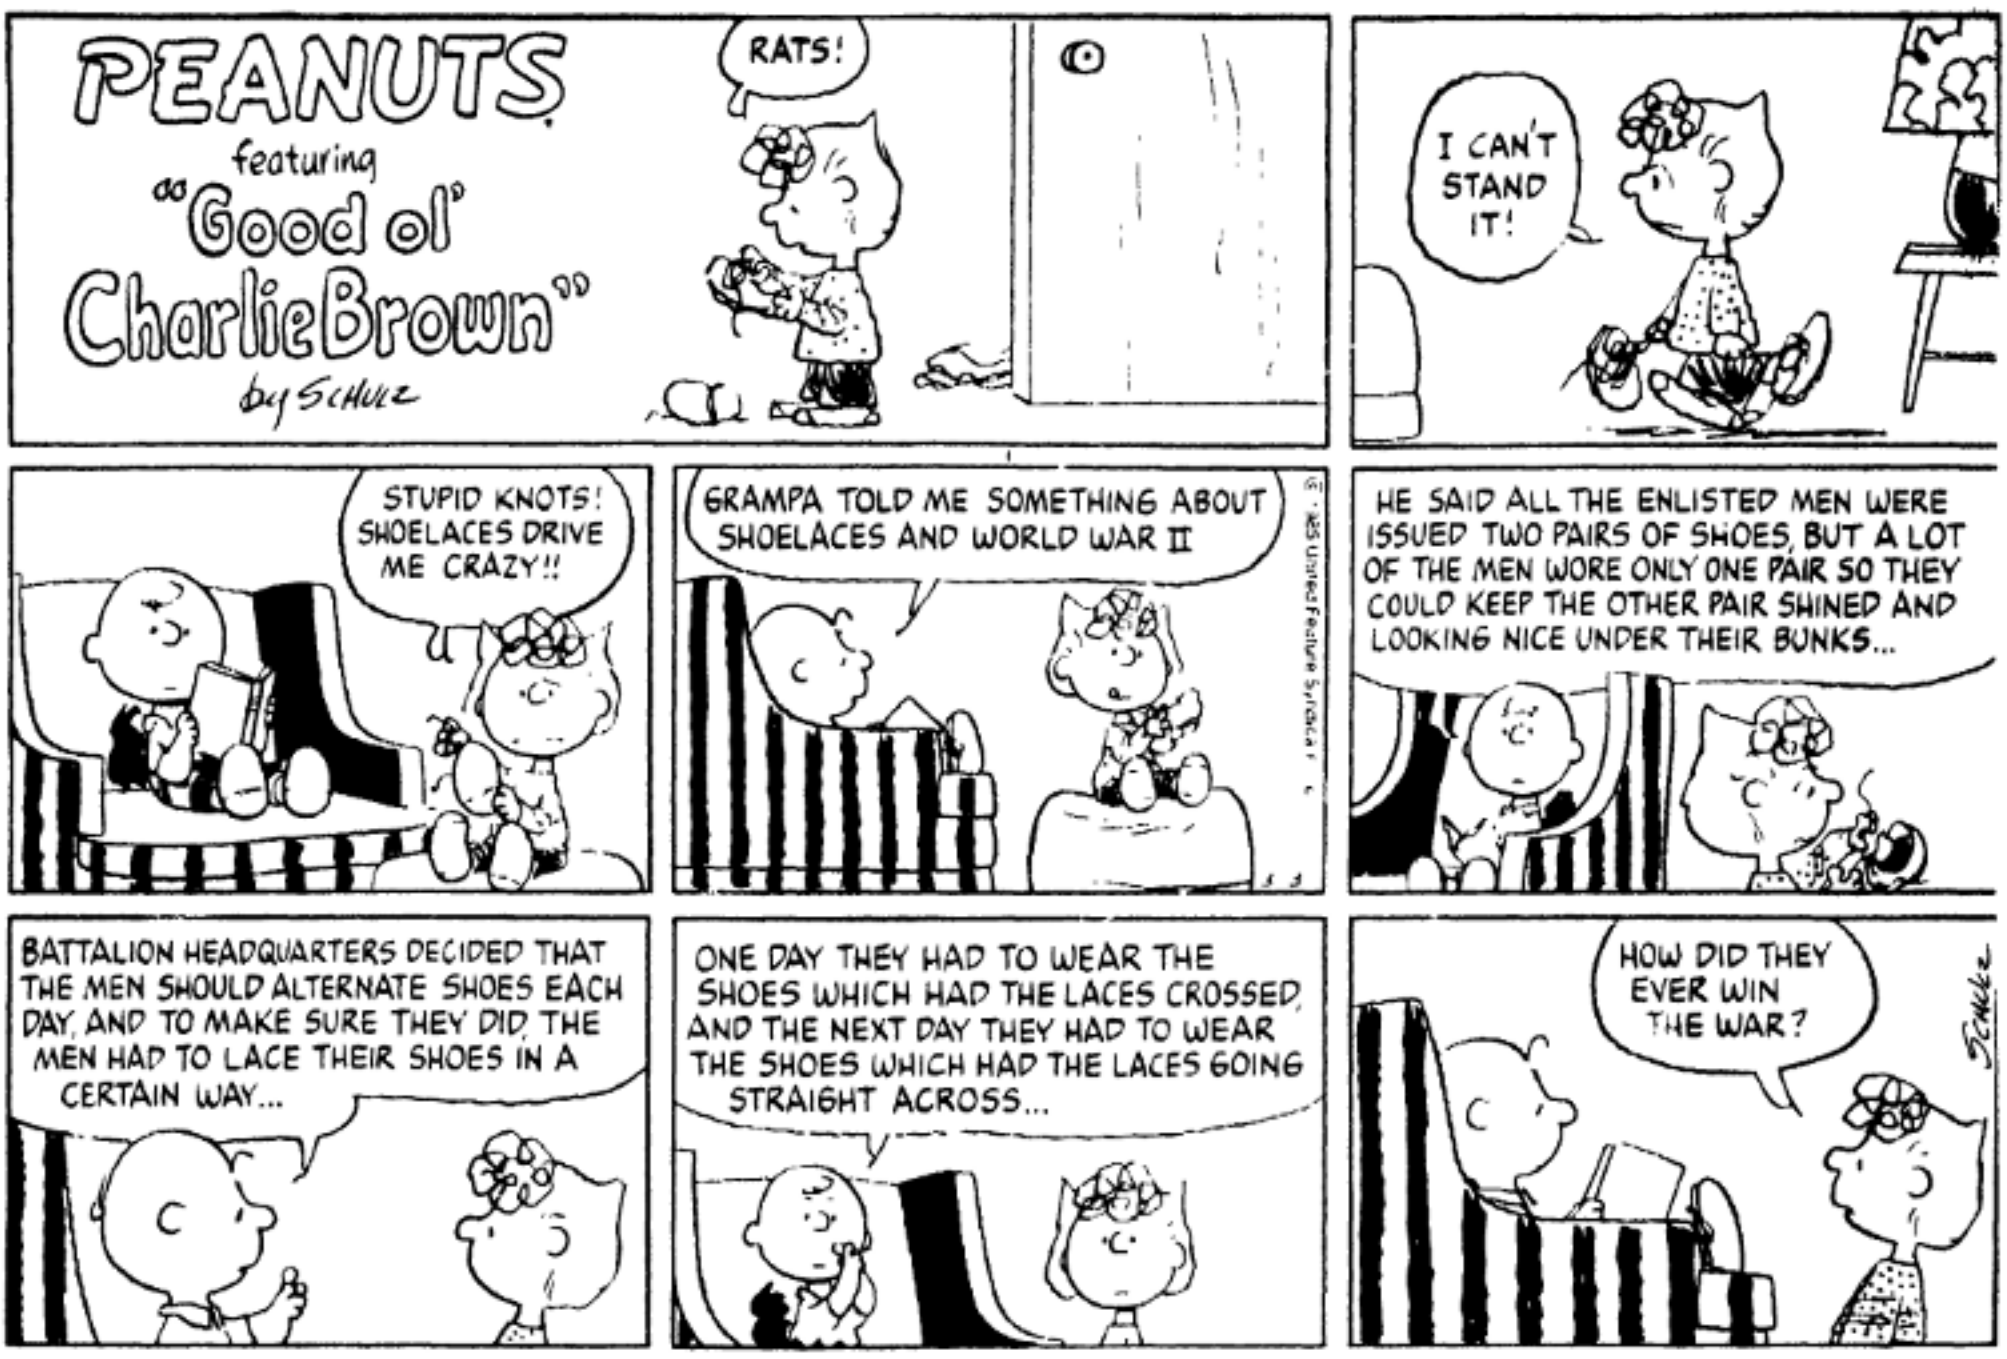


Blockbuster:

Quick Think:



Shape Sleuth:

Word Power: The ten pairs are: Black bile, chilly hot, dry ice, entirely broken, holy war, inside boundary, jumbo prawns, truly false, war games, white chocolate.

Model Mix-up: DI and LIV can both be read as roman numbers, as also MIX.

Wit Sharpener: Meenie Wadhwa dealt in object d'arts and lived in the cottage by the sea; Eenie Uptown, worked with stained glass and lived in a flat and Mynah Osman embroidered and lived in a bungalow.

SCIENCE

Wanted: A Potassium-rich Diet

The latest recommendations for a healthy diet: orange and grapefruit juice, bananas, melons, mushrooms, skimmed milk, potatoes and nearly all vegetables. These foods are rich in potassium. Dr Louis Tobian of the University of Minnesota thinks that a lack of potassium damages the arteries and is responsible for the prevalence of heart disease, stroke and kidney failure.

Prehistoric peoples got most of their food from roots, nuts and fruits, supplemented by the occasional kill of game or fish. Their bodies became extremely efficient both at conserving sodium and getting rid of potassium. With the start of crop growing about 10,000 years ago, diets became rich in sodium and low in potassium.

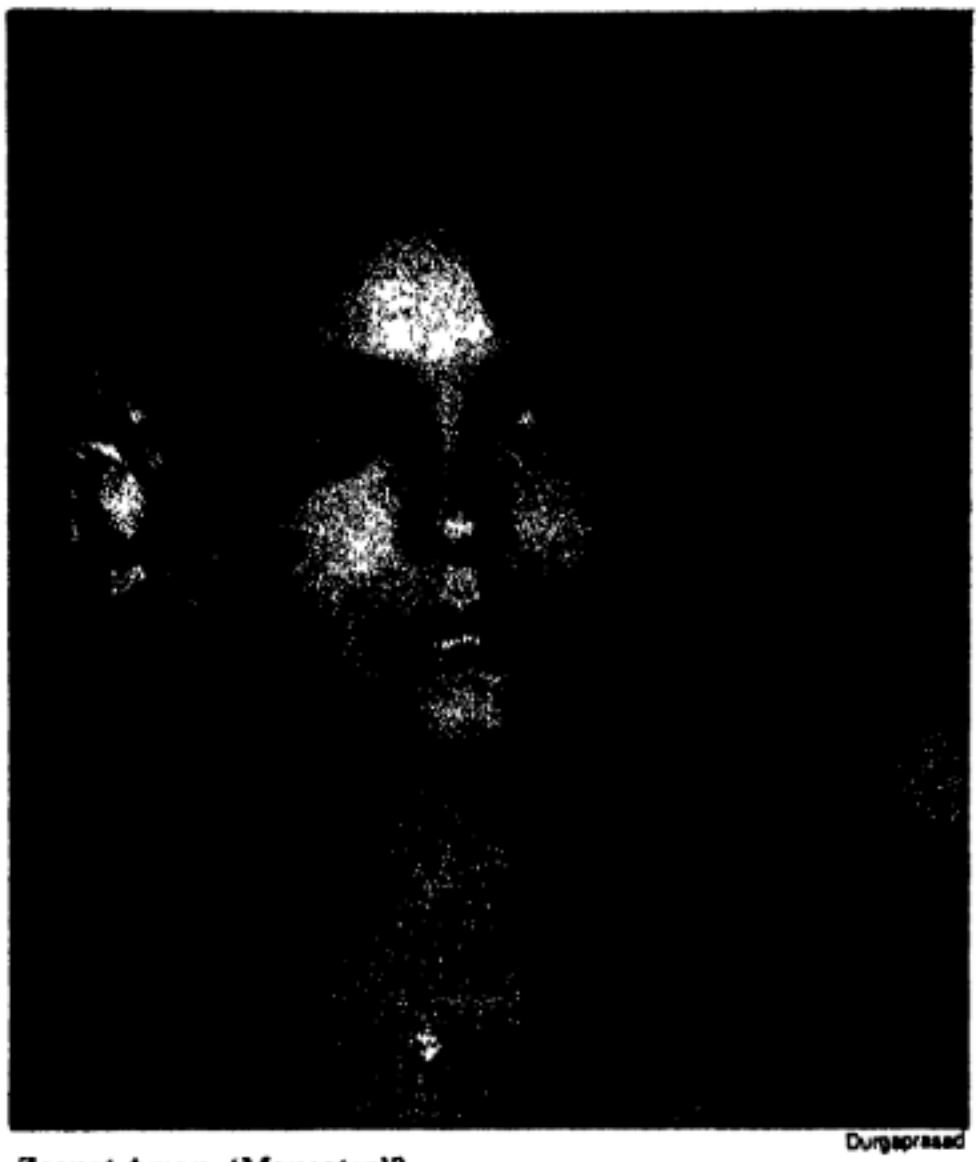
As evidence that hunter-gatherer societies subsisted on sodium-low, potassium-rich diets Dr Tobian points to the high vegetable content of petrified human faecal matter discovered at prehistoric sites and to the diets of remaining pockets of Stone Age man—such as Amazonian Indians, Kung bushmen of the Kalahari desert, African pygmies and Solomon Islanders.

A relationship is also claimed between specially low potassium diets and susceptibility to hypertensive kidney failure and stroke. These diseases take a disproportionate toll on poor blacks in the south-east United States, who consume only about a sixth as much potassium as most Americans.

Coincidence? Experiments on strains of rats, which become hypertensive or stroke-prone when fed amounts of salt comparable to those consumed by humans, suggest not. Dr Tobian and his colleagues did not find that potassium reduces blood pressure, but that the ability of blood vessels to handle a given pressure seems to be enhanced.

In one experiment, some hypertensive rats were given extra potassium and some were not. After ten weeks, 55 per cent of the non-supplemented rats were dead but only four per cent of the others. When survivors of both groups were killed, autopsies produced further evidence of the protective effect of potassium. Extreme thickening of the artery walls—a response to high blood pressure and a contributor to strokes and kidney failure—was apparent only in the rats that had not received extra potassium.

Dr Tobian told the American Heart Association's meeting in Monterey that prehistoric man typically got ten grams or one-third of an ounce of potassium supplements in his daily diet. Short of potassium supplements in pill or liquid form, which he does not advocate for the healthy, modern people cannot expect to do so well.



Nonetheless, he believes that a worthwhile five grams a day can just be attained by prudent eating. Two notes of caution. Processed tomato juice, while rich in potassium, is too heavily salted to be a good bet. And potatoes should be baked. Their potassium leaches out into the water if they are boiled.

By arrangement with The Economist

Producers are vying with each other to get Anooradha Patel to sign up for their films. But she is not willing to please them. It all started with Love in Goa, her first film, where the producers wanted her to reveal her curves. But Anooradha would have nothing of it. They wanted her to take off most of her clothes in Phir Ayee Barsaat but she refused again. However, the wily director found a way out. He made her dress in white and drenched her to the skin. In the next film, Shashi Kapoor and Girish Karnad made Anooradha take off her blouse. "If an actress like Rekha can do it, why can't you?" they argued. In Patthar, she did some provocative scenes with Om Puri and the film was banned. Poor Anooradha, her body is the cause of all her problems.

The two MPs, Sunil Dutt and Amitabh Bachchan, are busy fighting on two fronts. On one flank they have to keep off the producers who want both of them to complete the films they have in their hands and on the other they have to attend to their electorates. The voters of Bombay and Allahabad want their MPs to do what has not been done for the last 37 years. "It is going to be difficult. They want water and electricity and houses overnight. They want us to work miracles. We are also human beings. We can't perform miracles. We can only work very hard for the people who have put all their faith in us," said Amitabh Bachchan.

Parveen Babi has been located somewhere in New York. She lives in an apartment with some good friends and she is trying hard to forget her past. Parveen is determined not to come back to Bombay or the filmworld again.

Durgaprasad

Zeenat Aman: 'Maneater'?

It is difficult to keep track of the men who walk in and out of Zeenat Aman's life. While gossip magazines have a field day reporting Zeenat's off-screen activities, there are people in the industry who constantly refer to her as a "maneater": a term which means many things to many people. First, there was Dev Anand, the man who discovered her. She became involved with many people thereafter but her affair with the handsome Pakistani cricketer Imran Khan hit the headlines. There were talks of the two getting married but everything fizzled out almost as soon as it had started. Just when scribes were resting their pens, Zeenat went and married Sanjay Khan, a man who was not only married but a father of four children. The torrid affair lasted for a brief season. Soon she met Frank Norino in America, while shooting for Hrishikesh Mukherjee's Namumkeen, and even dreamt of getting married to him. But even that affair came to an end.

However, according to very reliable sources, Zeenat has not been pining over her broken love affairs. She is now being courted by an Arab multi-millionaire. What next, Zeenat?

Ashok Bose

Parveen Babi: forgetting the past

Kumar Gaurav has just returned from his month-long honeymoon abroad and is only too willing to concentrate on his career again. Accordingly, he has decided to start all over again and has sent feelers to filmmakers. And what is surprising is that Kumar is now willing to work under any conditions. "Only the role should be good," he is believed to have said. That is surely a comedown for the star-son who was demanding anything between Rs 20 and Rs 22 lakhs for a film after Love Story. For just Rs one lakh, Kumar signed up for Aaj directed by Mahesh Bhatt. Rajendra Kumar, Kumar's father, is certain that it is only Mahesh Bhatt who can boost the sagging career of his son. And if rumours in this tinsel city are true, then the senior Kumar has done a worthy job by pressurising his son to get off his high horse.

DELHI DIARY

A Ministry for Women?

Sandeep Sharma

Mohsina Kidwai

Sandeep Sharma

Yogendra Makwana

The new government's desire to promote women has not only resulted in the creation of a new ministry for women but another ministry has now become woman-dominated. The health and family welfare minister is Mohsina Kidwai and the reshuffle of secretaries has brought Sarla Grewal as the new secretary. This leaves the minister of state, Yogendra Makwana, cornered. He is in a ministry which is dominated by women

Bulldozer for Ram Lall?

Ram Lall, the former Andhra Pradesh Governor, who demolished all democratic principles last year while dismissing the government of N.T. Ramarao and installing defector Bhaskara Rao (with Congress-I support) is facing the bulldozer now. The Shimla municipality has served him a notice, declaring certain portions of his house as being "unauthorised construction." The notice was served recently and the former chief minister of Himachal Pradesh and the ex-Governor has taken the plea that as he will be away in Delhi for a while, the notice be kept pending. It is unusual for a person of influence like Ram Lall to receive such municipal warnings. But the clean image of the government, which has become a creed in New Delhi only recently, had affected Shimla earlier when Veer Bhadra Singh was made the chief minister replacing Ram Lall. The unauthorised constructions in the state capital alarmed V.B. Singh and he looked around for an honest officer who could clean up the mess. The choice fell on D.S. Minhas, a police officer who had investigated the forest scandal which had roped in relatives of Ram Lall while he was the chief minister. Minhas found to his dismay that houses of VIPs violated the rules. He went to V.B. Singh for clearance, which was granted immediately. Thus the demolition threat has been held out to Ram Lall.

Welcome Reversal

Finance minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh has spelt doom for many vested interests who had thrived during the regime of his predecessor. Recently, he streamlined the customs duty structure on the import of polyester yarn and thus busted the monopoly of some big industrialists, who had been benefitting from the policies brought in during Mr Mukherjee's time. The small crimpers, who had been hard hit by the duty structure, came to Delhi with a petition for V.P. Singh in the middle of February. They went back to Bombay somewhat disappointed when the minister did not meet them. What they did not appreciate was that the finance minister's office had politely accepted the petition, while refusing an appointment. Within four days, the policy changes sought by the aggrieved parties were announced. The reputation of the union finance minister in the trade circles has shot up now. Many grievances of the past are now being referred to him and many decisions of Pranab Mukherjee are being reversed.

Oily Palms

The Andaman and Nicobar islands are no longer taboo. In the British raj, transportation to the Andamans, then referred to as Kalapani, was the maximum punishment, short of death, which the rulers used to mete out. Now, going to Andamans is becoming a boon. Dhirubhai Ambani's Reliance Textile Industries have now set sail for Kalapani. No, an industry is not being set up in those islands. Ambani intends entering into mechanised farming and palm oil will be the end product of his efforts. With Ambani entering the Andamans, palm oil will be easily available in the country.

Heart Problems

Abdur Rehman Antulay, the former Maharashtra CM now facing prosecution, may be going abroad soon. He is said to be suffering from a heart ailment and the famous Dr Denton Cooley has asked him to go to the USA for treatment. The Antulay case will be affected not only by the departure of the principal accused, but by the prosecution lawyer as well. Ram Jethmalani, the eminent lawyer and BJP leader, who is leading the prosecution team, too is heading for the USA for the treatment of his heart. Earlier, as both Antulay and Jethmalani were contesting the Lok Sabha elections, the case had been delayed.

Muneesh (Daily)

A.R. Antulay

D.E. Nizamuddin

Exclusive safaris for a walkover!

Move right to the top in safaris from Gwalior Suiting's range of:

Prudential, Mandate, Landslide, Silk Glow, Viking, Playboy, Summer Fancy, Summer King.

"Leaping lion", silver with gold gilt.
Rajasthan, contemporary.

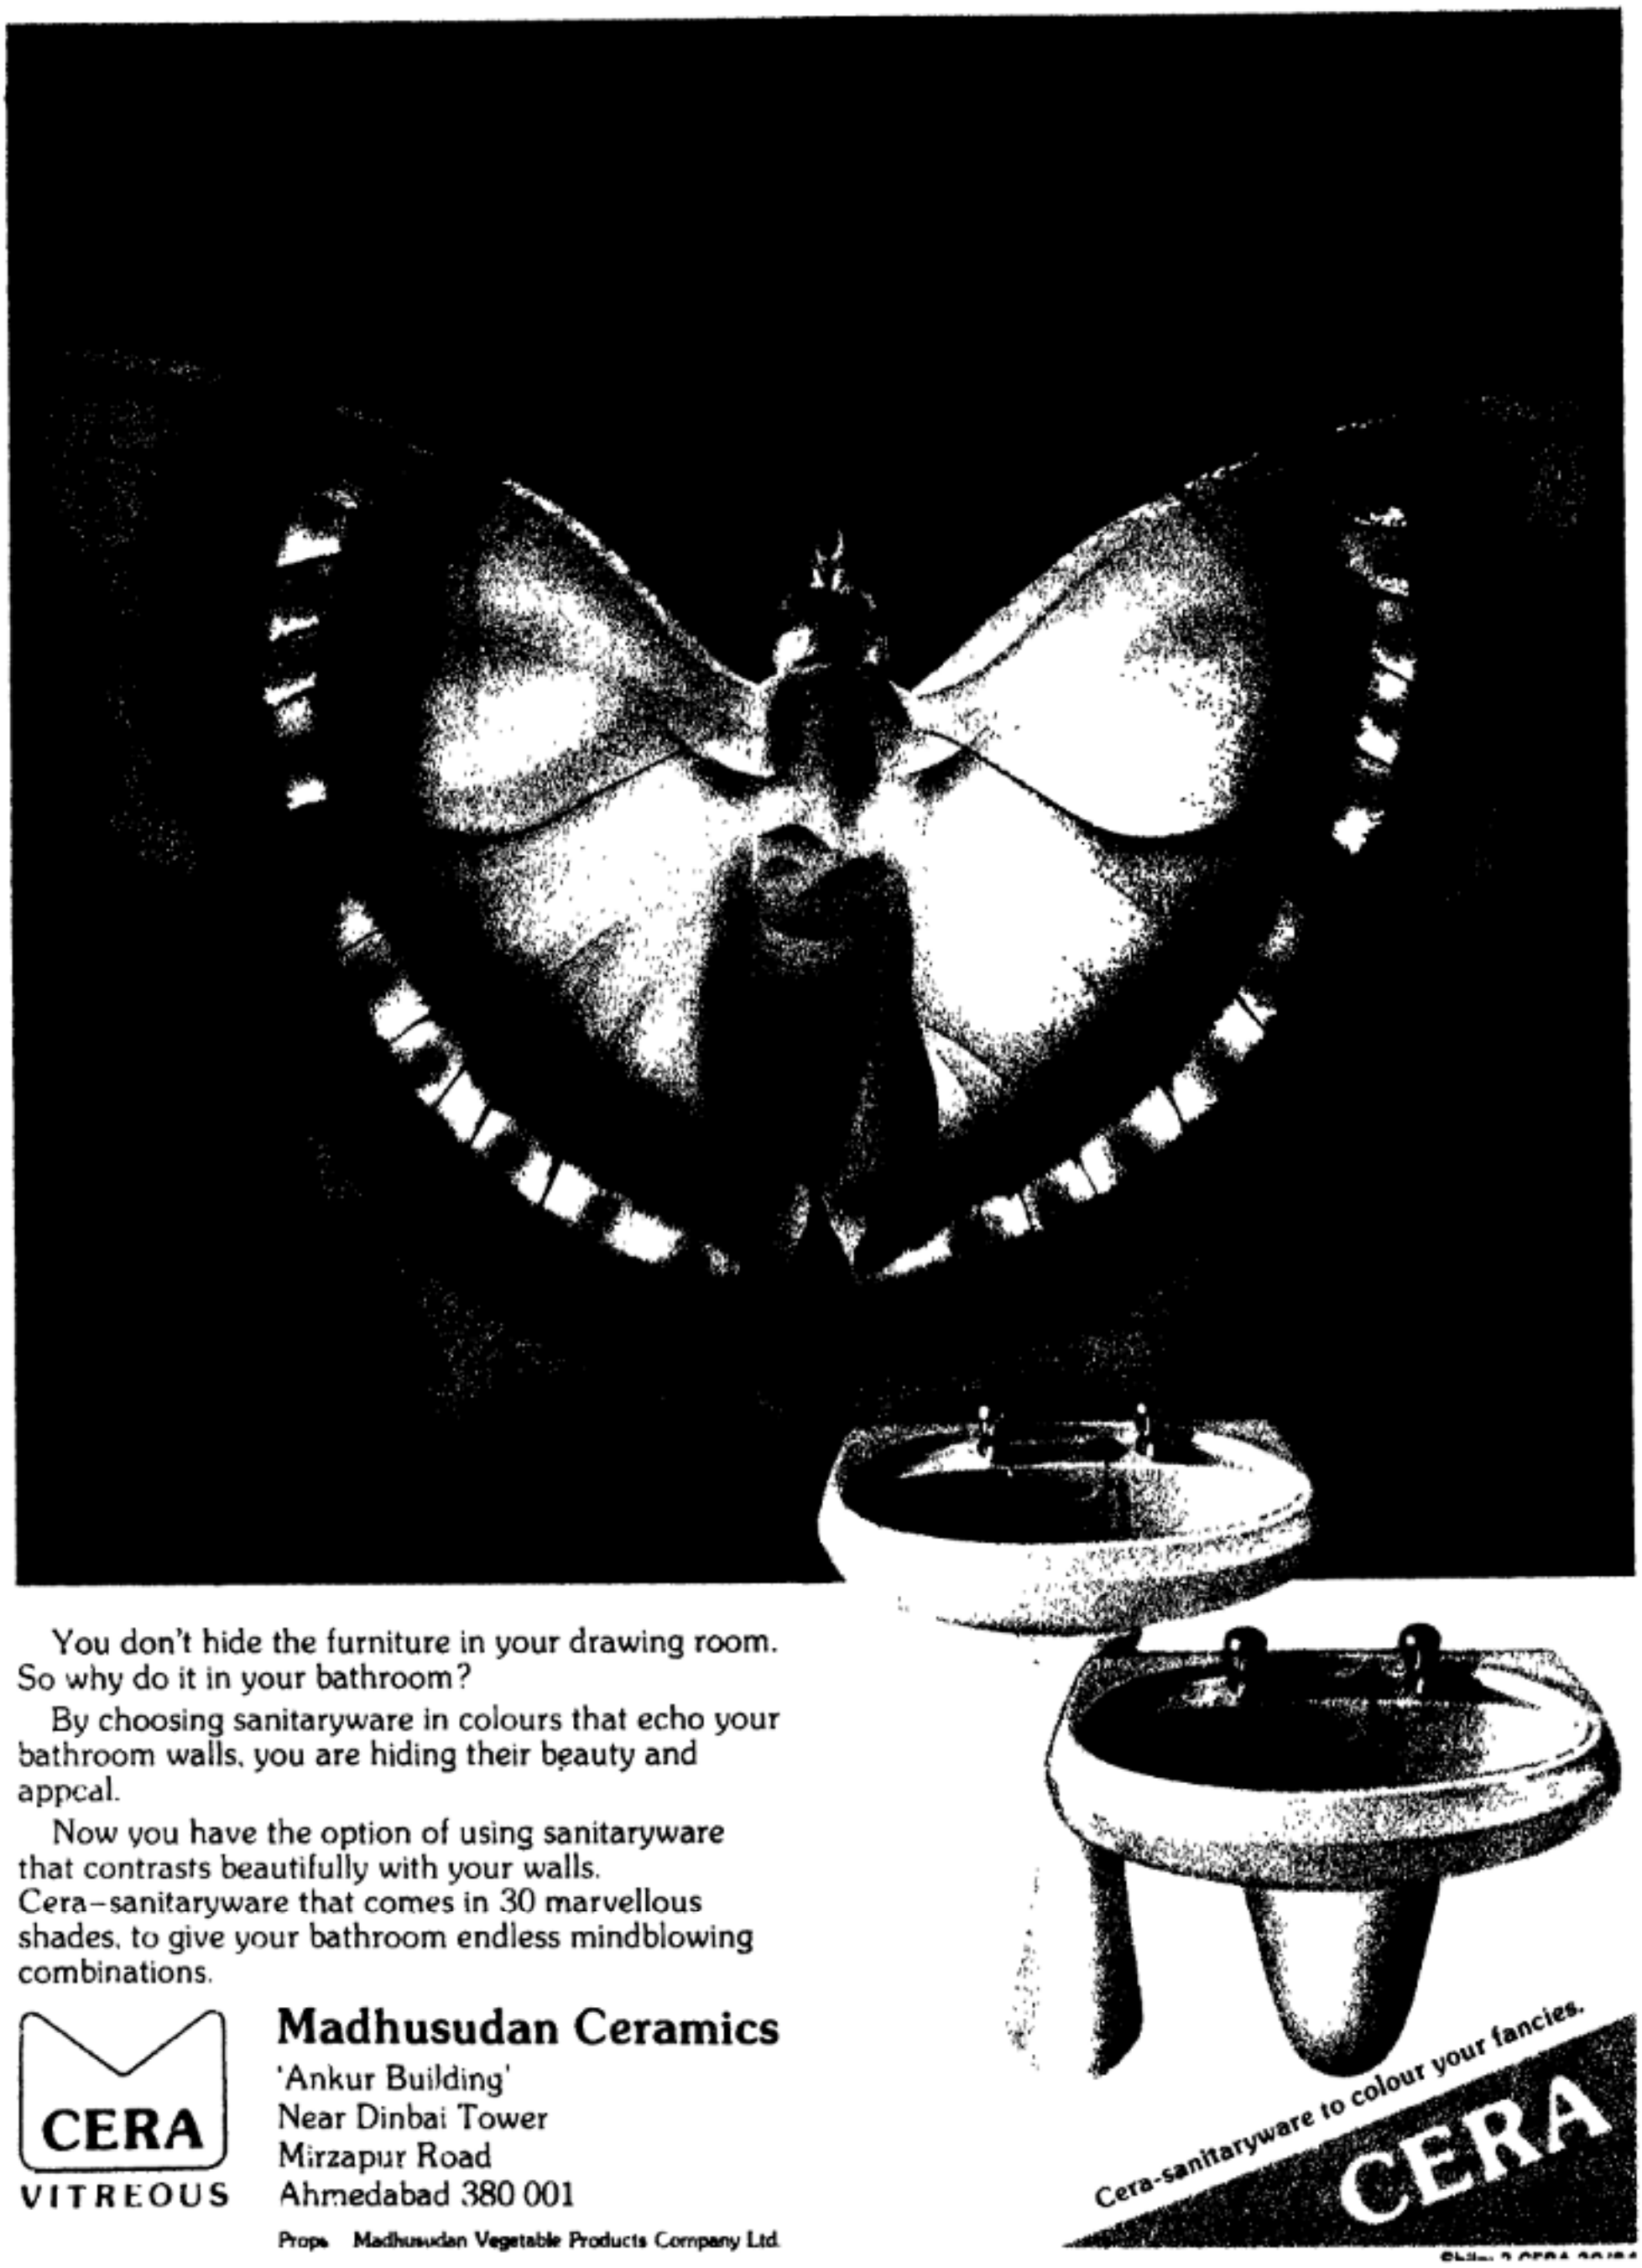
Inspired by the heritage of traditionally dedicated mastercraftsmen.

GWALIOR SUITING

APP-GB 85 63 ENG

Sunda, Weekly 10 March 1985. Regd. No. WB/CC 256/TN/MS(C)376 MH-By-South-680

17–23 MARCH 19[illegible] AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION RS 4.00



Rajendra Sethia: A Playboy's Plunder

SUNDAY

Of The Future

Why hide your colours
When you can ware them

You don't hide the furniture in your drawing room. So why do it in your bathroom?

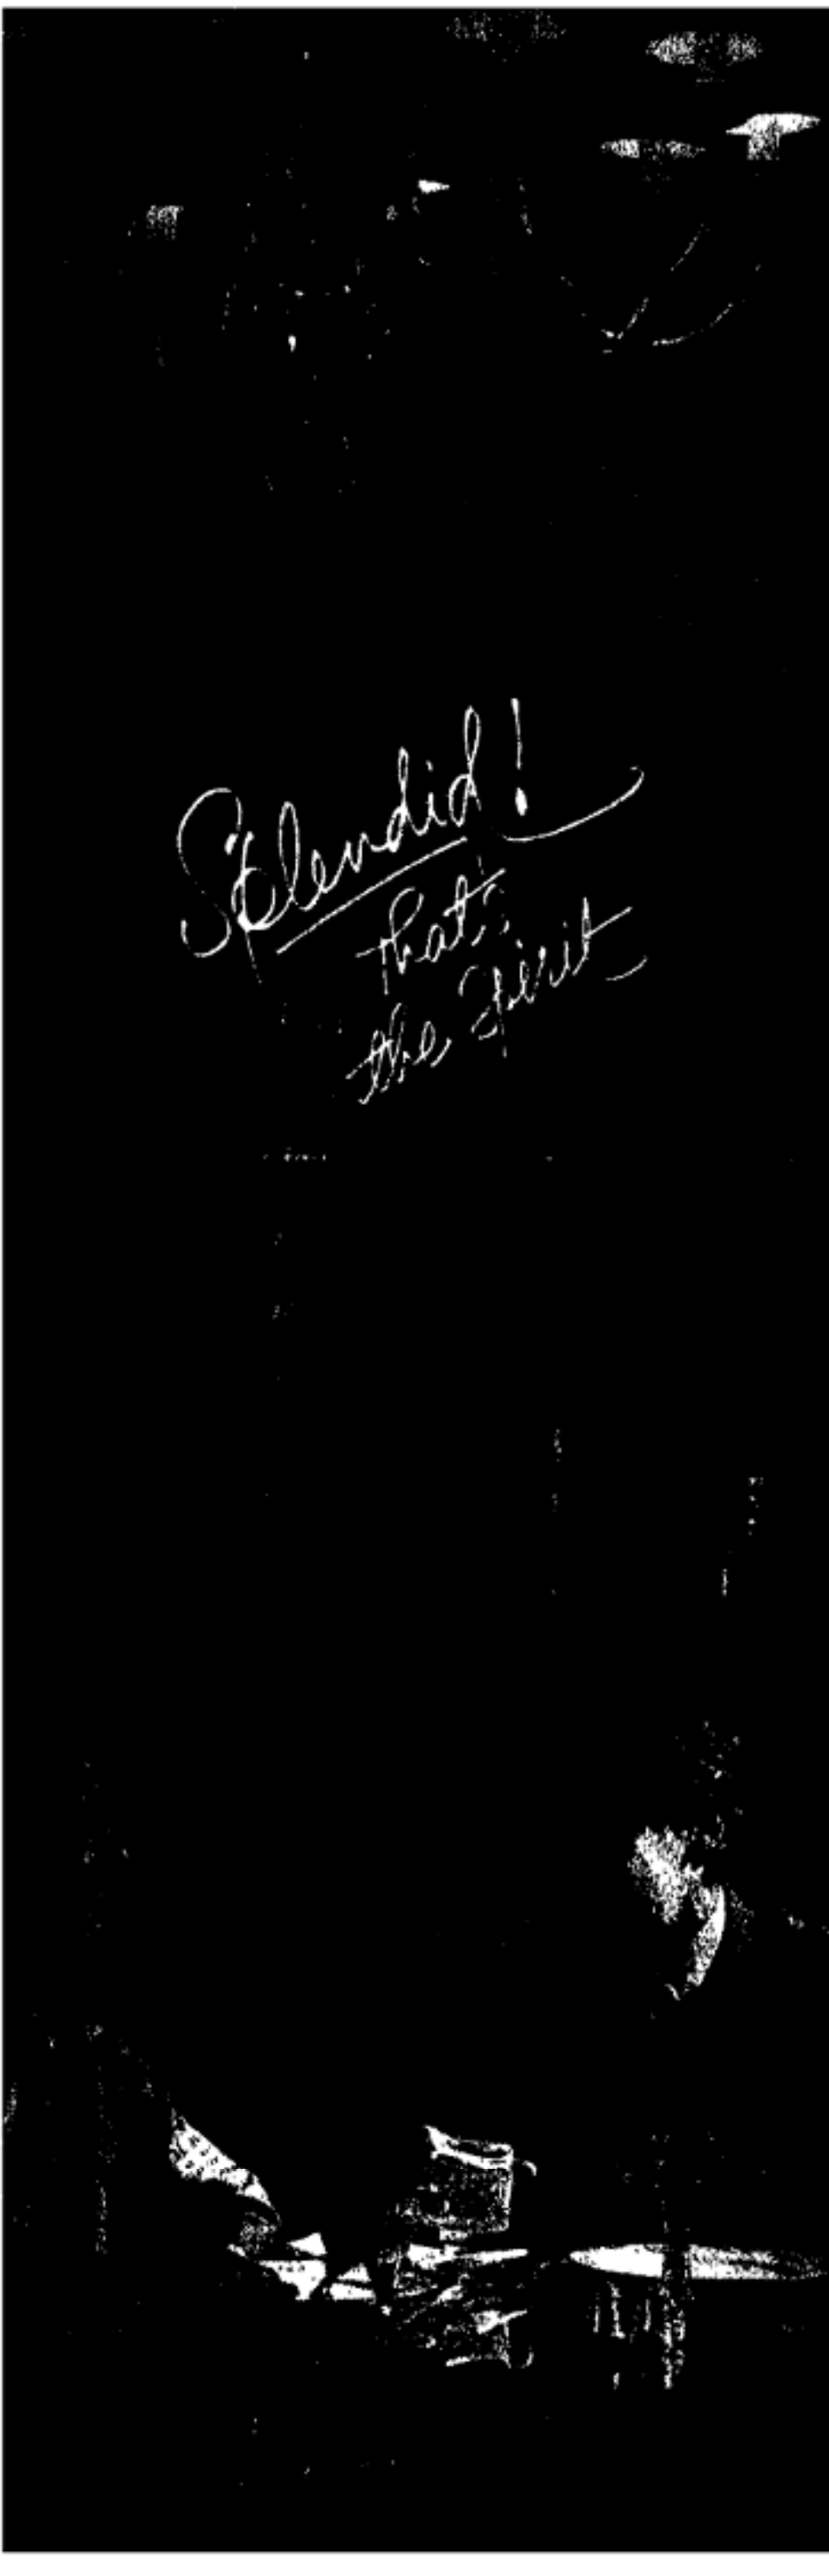
By choosing sanitaryware in colours that echo your bathroom walls, you are hiding their beauty and appeal.

Now you have the option of using sanitaryware that contrasts beautifully with your walls. Cera–sanitaryware that comes in 30 marvellous shades, to give your bathroom endless mindblowing combinations.

CERA
VITREOUS

Madhusudan Ceramics
'Ankur Building'
Near Dinbai Tower
Mirzapur Road
Ahmedabad 380 001

Props. Madhusudan Vegetable Products Company Ltd.



Dinesh Safaris are for men...

ask any woman.

This season Dinesh brings you a range of the finest in Safari Suitings. Lightweight, crisp summerwear for all ages. Fabrics with a unique mixture effect, blended and honed to a perfection never seen before. A subtle sheen, on colours ranging from rich cafe au lait, to the palest of fawn. Muted dove greys, steel blues, moss greens and eau-de-Nil. Colours and finishes so enchanting that even women cannot resist wearing them!

Only Dinesh designs the essential difference.

DELUXE

Splendid!
Feat.
The Spirit

RICH MATURE MELLOW
TO BLEND SMOOTHLY WITH YOUR STYLE

17—23 MARCH 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 □ ISSUE 19 □ RS 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

Star of the Future
Ramakrishna Hegde's massive victory in Karnataka has rocketed him to the frontlines of the next major electoral battle: the bid for power in 1990. Though there are many 'ifs' along the way, he may perhaps emerge as the only leader who can offer a credible alternative to the Congress(I). Chidanand Rajghatta reports how Ramakrishna Hegde is riding the crest of a wave. Plus: An interview with Mr Hegde.

How the States Voted
SUNDAY correspondents report from the states and union territory where Assembly elections were held and analyse the results.

Rigging: A Way of Life in Bihar
Booth-capturing, false voting and impersonation are common in any election in Bihar. An exclusive photo feature by Krishna Murari Kishan.

Page 14

Page 34

INVESTIGATION 34

Rajendra Sethia: A Playboy's Plunder
Indian-born London-based business tycoon Rajendra Sethia who has been declared bankrupt by the London High Court was recently arrested by CBI sleuths in Delhi for fraud. An investigation by Ritu Sarin, Ashis Ray and Sankarshan Thakur.

SUNDAY SPECIAL 42

Can Black Money be Really Wiped Out?
Black money has been in existence in this country for a long time. Ashok Lahiri argues the need to change taxation laws.

COMMENT
Dateline M.J. Akbar 7
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 9
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12
Red Tape 40

VARIETY
Science 64
Khaas Baat 73

PUNCHLINE/KUTTY

Cover Transparency:
Gopal Shetty

Editor M J Akbar

Associate Editor Tushar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Bindo K John Henry Jacob
Rajiv Bagchi Sanjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow.
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay
Olga Tellis
Bangalore
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati:
Seema Guha
Srinagar.
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex-Delhi

Stop bad breath. Fight tooth decay.

Give them the Colgate Ring of Confidence!

Regular brushing with Colgate gives your family clean, fresh breath, strong healthy teeth. That's the Colgate Ring of Confidence.

This is how Colgate's trusted formula works for you every time you brush:

Bacteria grow in food particles trapped between teeth, causing bad breath and tooth decay.

Colgate's unique active foam reaches deep to remove odour-causing food particles and decay-causing bacteria.

Regular brushing with Colgate gives you clean, fresh breath and strong, healthy teeth.

Make sure your family brushes with Colgate after every meal.
Stop bad breath, fight tooth decay.
Give them the Colgate Ring of Confidence.

GK&E.B94.55

You'll love its fresh minty taste!

DATELINE / M.J. Akbar

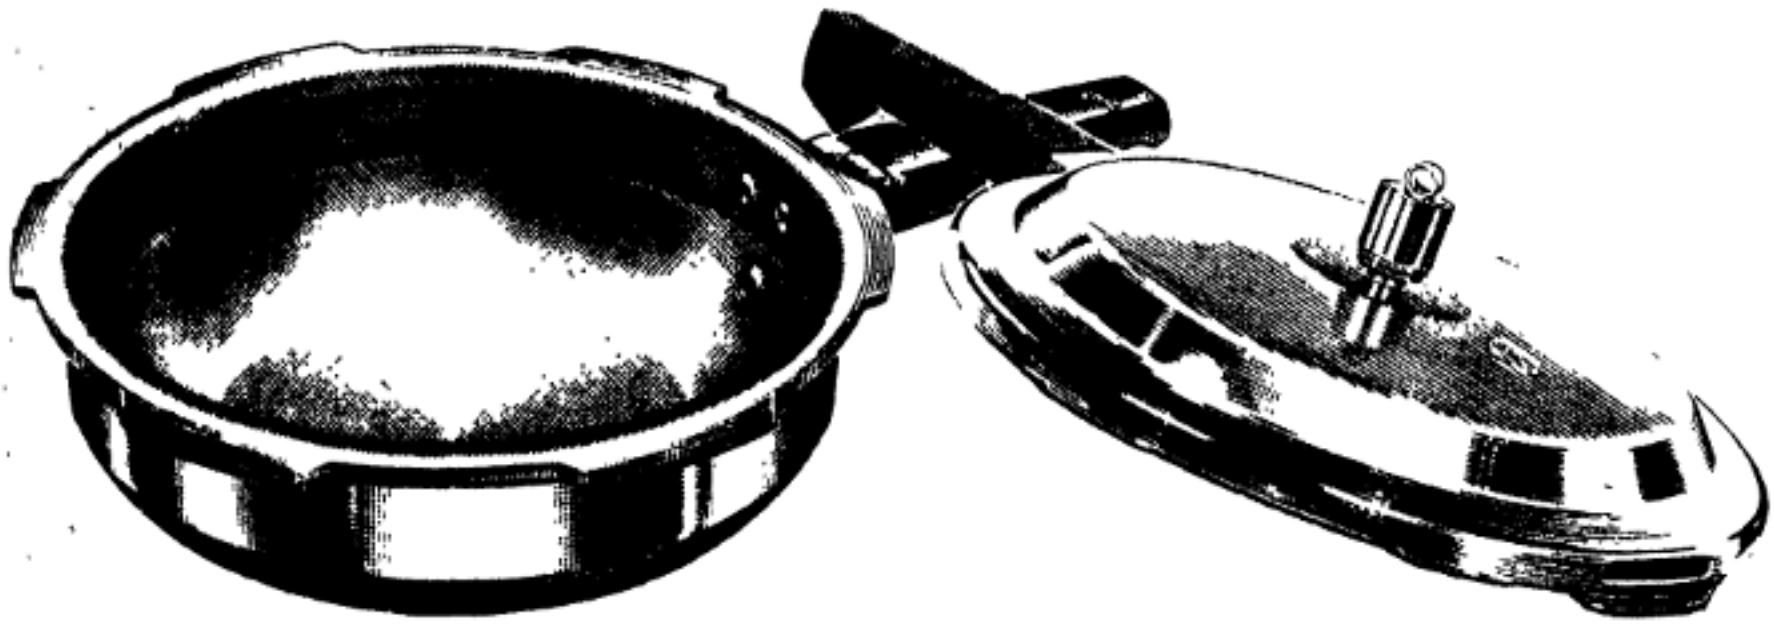
Calcutta: There is the air of a twinkling, restless god about him; a presence which is formidable without being intimidating. Maqbool Fida Husain carries his fame lightly. His conversation is interspersed with self-deprecating wit, and there is no better way to burst the bubbles of praise-genuine or praise-sycophantic than by the sharp spike of laughter. He likes praise of course (who doesn't?) but can do without too much of it, particularly if he feels it is touched by insincerity. However, there was sufficient cause for genuine praise when his exhibition on assassinations opened on the seventeenth floor of the Tata Centre. The images of Mahatma Gandhi (falling away from his stick, a slight but growing stain on his heart; or prostrate, the head away from the rest of the body but the total bound by the powerful current which only a truly great artist can infuse in a human shape) and Mrs Indira Gandhi (the body falling after being shot, in midair, the hand asking the question of the heavens: why?) were outstanding. But there was a wide and international choice of leaders who had died from the bullet or knife of mercenary or madman (and who is to say which of the two is more dangerous, which of the two a more representative product of the twentieth century?). Patrice Lumumba, symbol of African hope and freedom. Leon Trotsky, the power of whose intellect could only be silenced by a pickaxe. Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, eaten by a revolution he had fathered. Martin Luther King, marked out for daring to be the conscience of a nation. John Kennedy, hope shot down when taking wing. Lorca and Lennon, who sang too many songs of freedom. And the victims of massacres everywhere, from riots to the death which seeped across the night in Bhopal. It was an exhibition of the power of an artist's commitment as much as a display of line, colour, form and imagination.

Highlights of a portrait of Husain: Flowing graceful, fully grey hair and beard; bright eyes which smile alone since the mouth is lost in the mane; long arms, long fingers, tall body, bare feet. The irresistible question of course is about those bare feet. So much mythology has now been created around them, so many questioned. Is he barefoot all the time? Yes. Even when he goes abroad to a cold country? No. Then, he says with a smile, he makes up for the bare times by wearing extra large boots. Then why the insistence in India? Just a fad? The answer, according to Husain: He was very close to the poet Muktibodh, whose revolutionary poetry in Hindi inspired a generation. Muktibodh died after a long illness during which Husain came very near to him. It was a hot day in Delhi when Muktibodh's body was being taken for its cremation. As a mark of respect Husain decided to walk barefoot with the body. He discovered, he says, a great sense of freedom in being rid of shoes. And he also realised that if he could walk on that hot tarmac road in Delhi at the height of summer without shoes, then he could absorb the physical discomfort.

Shoes are an image Husain has used in his cinema very effectively. They also form a part of his childhood memories. He was a sickly infant, and his mother would be constantly unwell too, particularly after Husain was born. Both were often near death's door, but the mother was desperate that her son should survive. She would often hold him up and make him stand in his father's man-sized shoes and pray that he grew up and lived to fill an adult's shoes. One night when Husain was very ill, she prayed all night and then, in that classic rite of sacrifice she walked seven times around her ill son praying to God that he take her life and save her son's. The prayer was heard. The son recovered and the mother died.

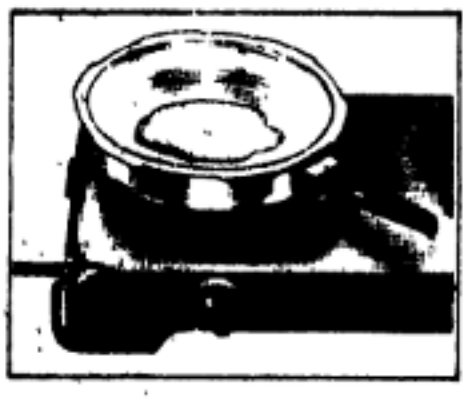
Maqbool Fida Husain grew up to fill an adult's shoes, and then he grew beyond them.

There is an air of a twinkling, restless god about him; a presence which is formidable without being intimidating. Maqbool Fida Husain carries his fame lightly. His conversation is interspersed with self-deprecating wit, and there is no better way to burst the bubbles of praise-genuine or praise-sycophantic than by the sharp spike of laughter...



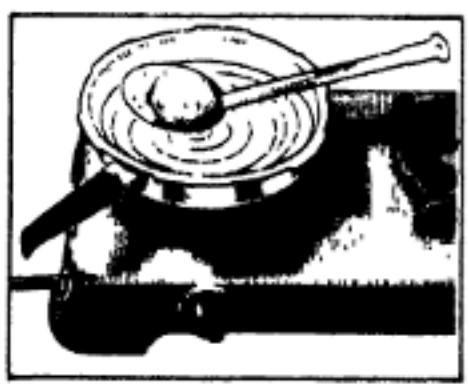
Alpke Mitra

M.F. Husain

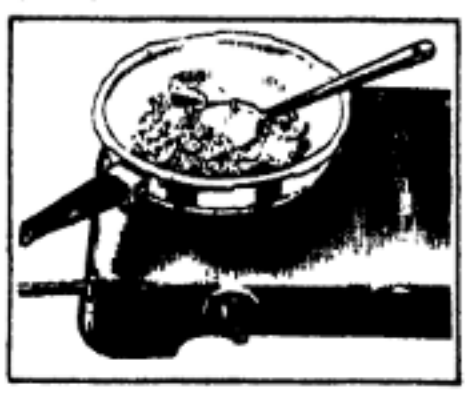


Prestige

PRESSURE PAN



It makes cooking a meal as satisfying as eating it!



FRY

DEEP FRY

SAUTE

PRESSURE COOK

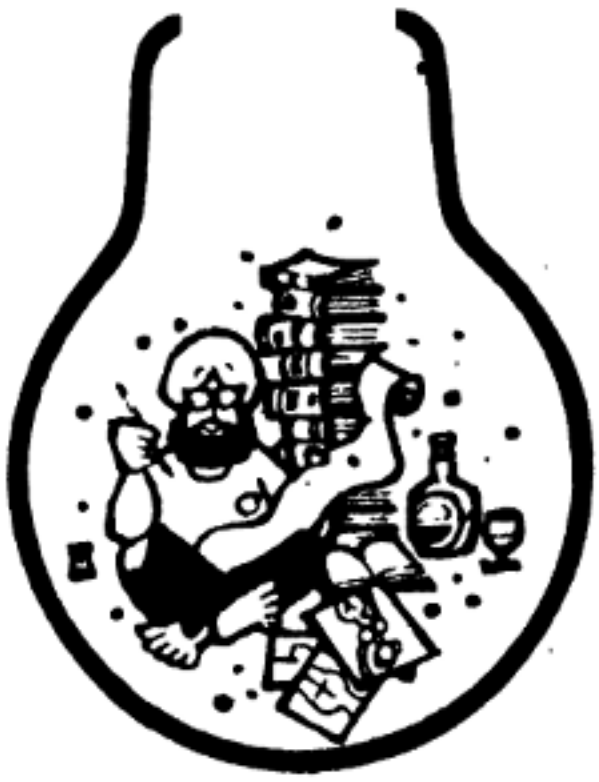
Cook biryani with flair. Or fry an egg with elan. Or just puff up a puri. And scurry up a curry. All in minutes. The Prestige pressure pan is so versatile. So handy and convenient. You can fry, deep fry, saute and pressure cook in it.

Only the Prestige pressure pan has the unique Gasket Release System to make it 100% safe.

Buy it without a lid at great saving if you already own a Prestige pressure cooker. Or buy it with its own lid. The pressure pan is for you.

Prestige PRESSURE PAN ©

A tik Product



MAA(D) PP 1d 84

The Language of Love

Suddenly one morning I noticed the dry branches of Kachnar (Bauhenia) trees flanking Subramaniam Bharati Marg flecked with ivory-white blossoms. Further down the road the massive Semal (Silk Cotton) was shedding its scarlet waxen flowers. And I knew the short winter had given way to a shorter spring and the long summer months will soon be on us.

Cock sparrows fluff out their wings and strut around their all too eager hens awaiting to be mounted. Green barbets call incessantly and the koel clears its throat to proclaim the advent of summer in full-throated cries. It is the same year after year. Birds' language of love has as limited a repertoire of scream, song and twitter as that of humans.

On February 14th was St. Valentine's Day so named after the 3rd century holy man, Valentinus, patron Saint of lovers. On this day lovers proclaim their passions usually in no more than three words: "I love you." The emotion is so strong that thereafter they collapse into inanities and words which have no meaning except to their sweethearts. All over the English-speaking world, daily papers devote as many pages printing love-messages as ours do on Sundays to matrimonial ads. Blandishments fall into a dull pattern; young men can think of little else besides comparing their girl friends to animals or edibles. Young girls show less interest in delicacies and prefer to compare their beloved males to bigger and furrier denizens of the forest. To wit, male to female in animal terms: my pussy-cat, Squirrel, Dilly Duck, Bunny, Chicky-wicky, Jenny Wren, Piglet, Fit Bitch. Female to male: my Grizzly Bear, Panda, Mountain Lion, Crocodile, Alligator, Hedgehog, Possum. Next to animals in popularity with males are edibles: my Cherry-pie, Honeybun, Lollipop. The third in line of preferences are nakedly suggestive: my Sexy Spiderlegs, Sexpot, Bare Muscle, my Bellybutton wants to say hello to yours today. It is odd that traditional love similes and metaphors are out. No roses, no lilies, nor jasmines. Nor nature's countless things of beauty like the moon, or the stars on a moonless night. There are quite a few Indian entries. One I spot every year is in Gujarati to Rashmee: "akhi donya ma too bahu pyari che." Another desi bhai offers the Taj Mahal to his goree chokree. A Sri Chandi lifts a love-song from a Hindi movie to his gold-complexioned Chaheti and signs himself Moochies and Coochies.

It is a pity that we do not have the equivalent of St. Valentine's Day. How our poets would have gone to town describing their loved ones! I forget the name of the poet who I would have quoted on Valentine's Day if I had a sweetheart.

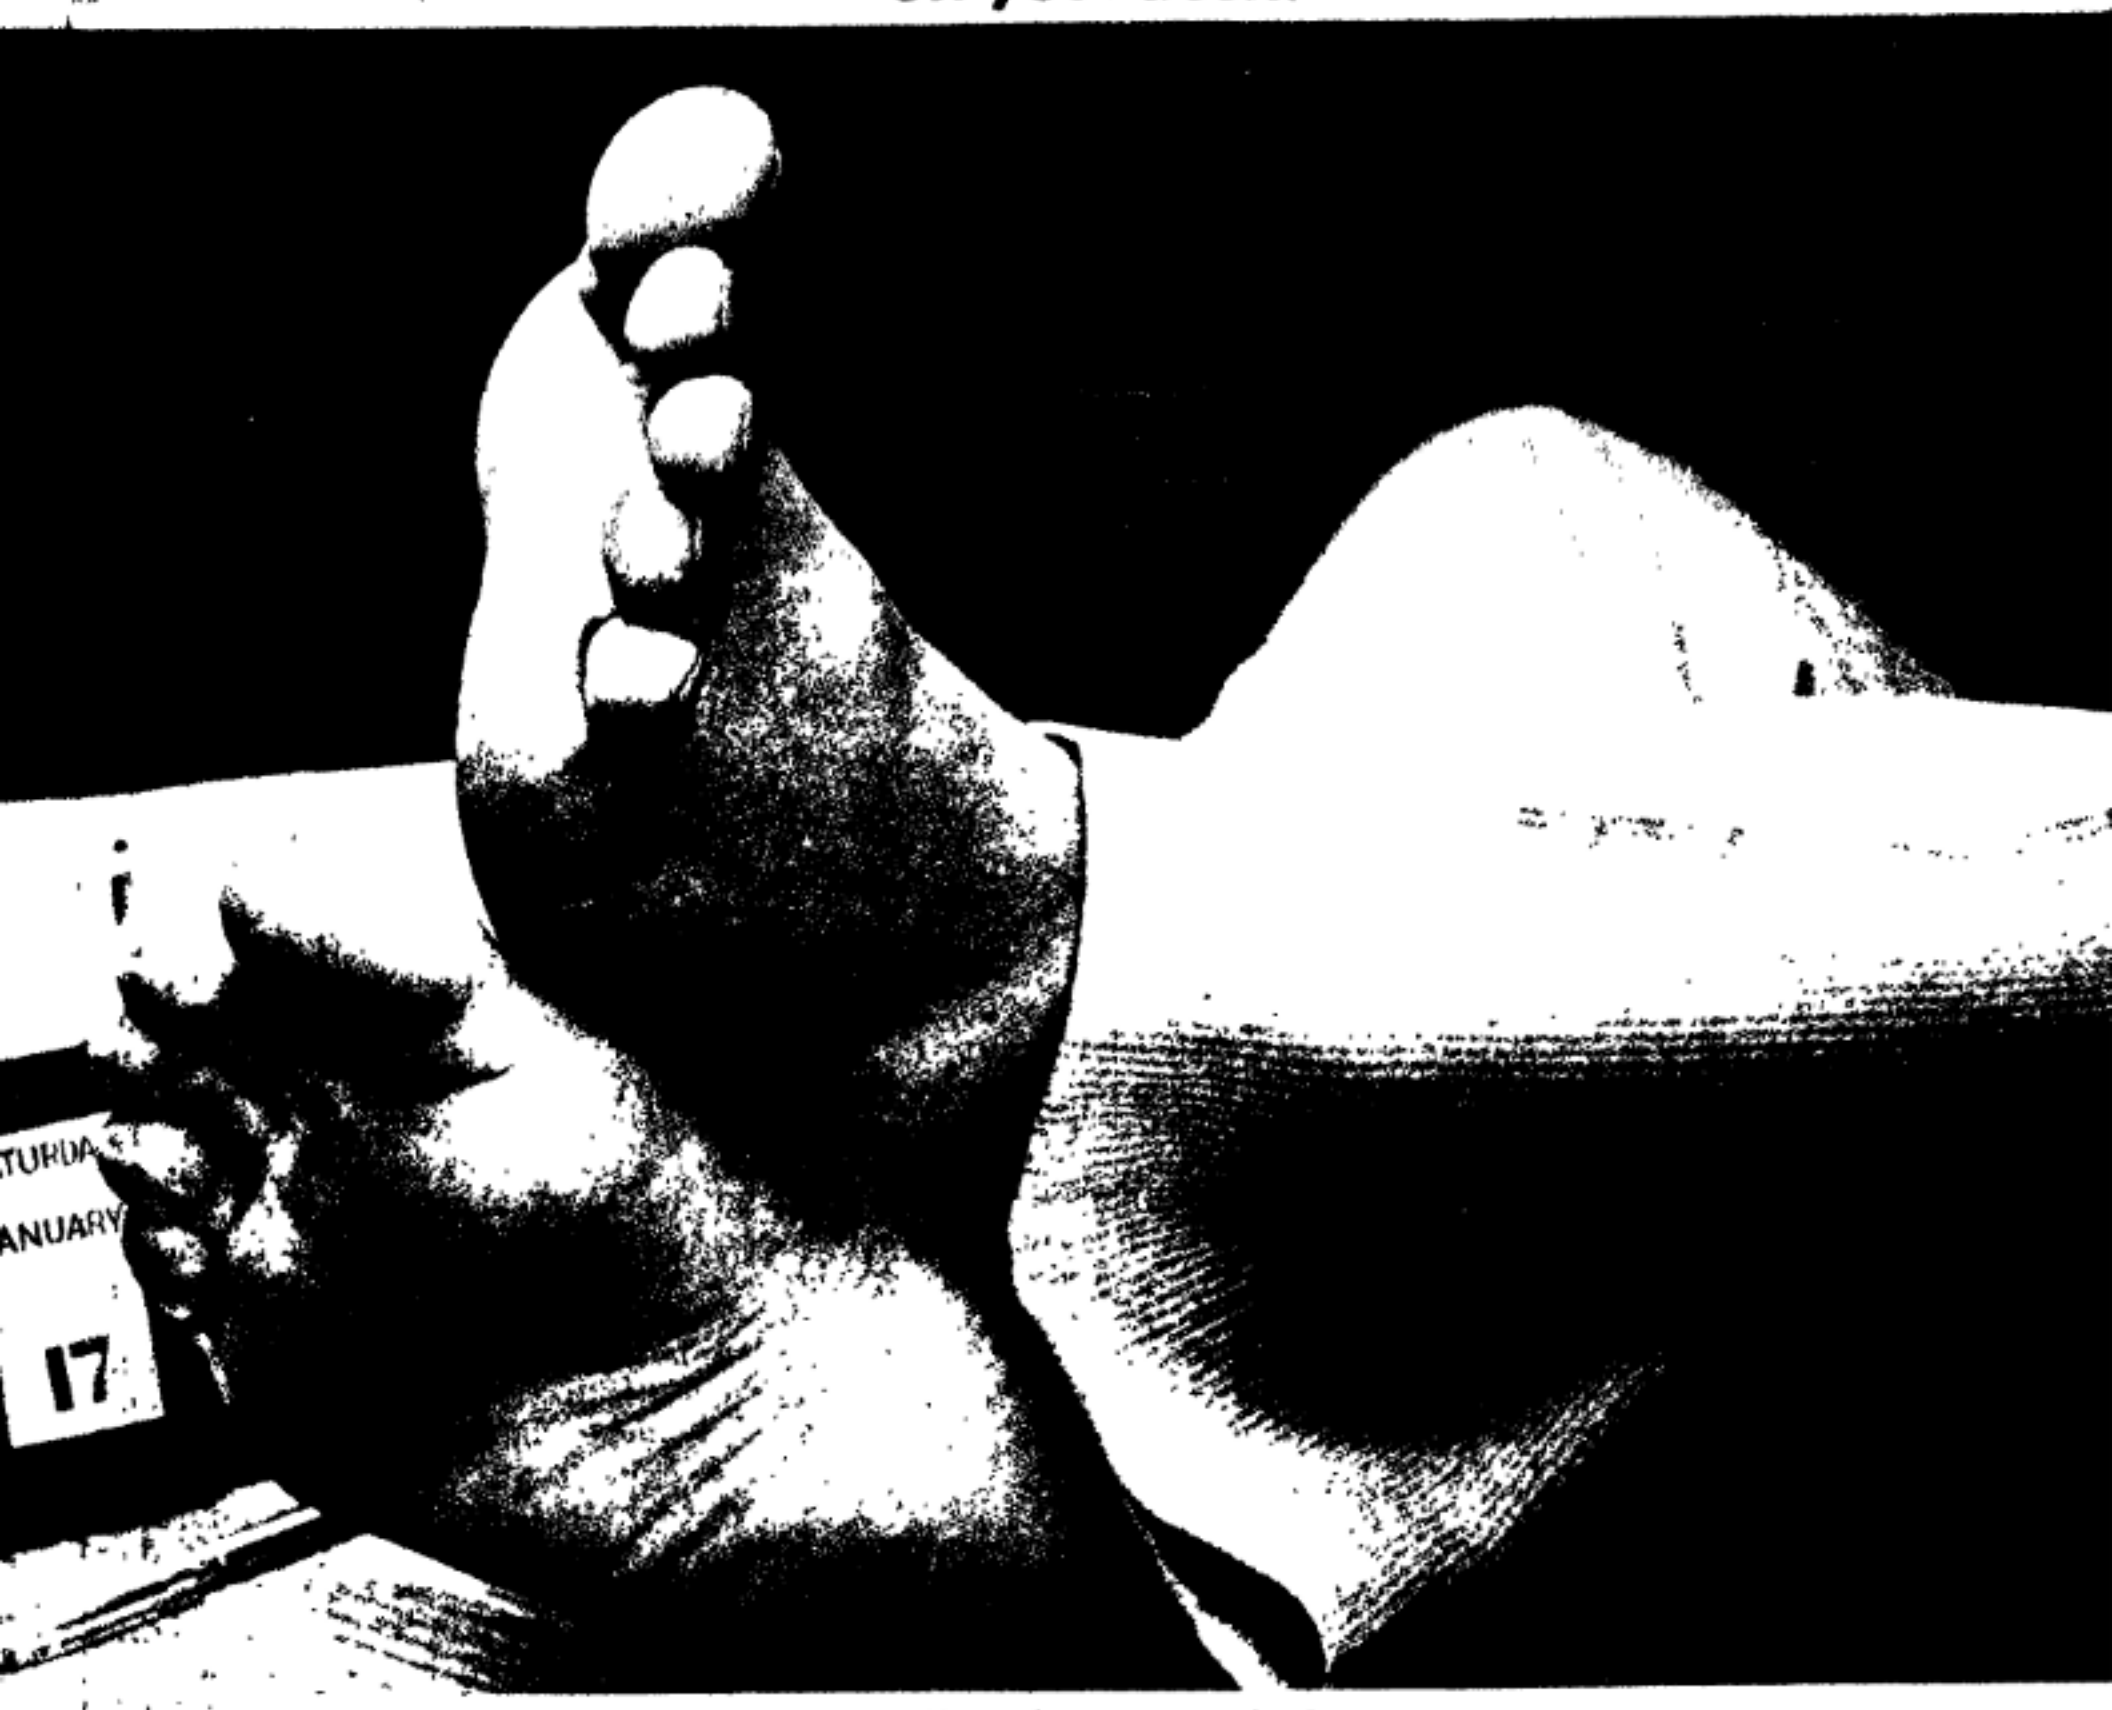
Dil ko terey tabassum kee yaad yoon aiyee
Keh jag magaa utthen jis tarah mandiron mein chiraagh.

(The memory of your smile is my heart's delight
As brighter twinkle temple lamps at night.)

Minority Complex

The problem of ventilating grievances in a country where the media is either wholly controlled by the government or, if minimally free is afraid to take an anti-government line, is present in many countries of the world. And where the aggrieved form a miniscule minority with no means of publicising their plight, their lamentations become truly like crying in the wilderness. Stark examples of injustices which remain unknown and unheard are the fate of Ahmediyas in Pakistan, Bahais in Iran, Jews in the Soviet Union, Muslims in the Philippines, Kurds, Armenians and Gypsies wherever they are.

There are several world organisations like the Human Rights Commission and Amnesty International to which they can and do appeal for help. Unfortunately this only brings more wrath upon the heads of people who do so. It is promptly assumed that an appeal to anyone outside the country is an act of betrayal of one's own country only a little short of treason. For many years Amnesty has adopted people in jails without trial as "Prisoners of Conscience" and exhorted everyone to write letters of protest to the authorities. I have no idea how effective such appeals to conscience can be with rulers who are not known to have any. However, the good work goes on. One such association of do-gooders is the Minority Rights Group (MRG) set up in Britain with branches in other countries including India. Amongst its sponsors was the late Jayaprakash Narayan. Others included the Yugaslav writer-politician Milovan Djilas (jailed many times in his country), Gunnar Myrdal, Sean McBride and Dr Joseph Needham. Amongst MRG's publications is an excellent compilation of articles on Minorities: A Question of Human Rights? by eminent men like Sadruddin Aga Khan, Shridath Ramphal and Sir Edmund Leach. Its latest publication is on The Sikhs written by Dr Christopher Shackle of the London School of Oriental Studies. In ten closely printed pages Dr Shackle has condensed the history of the Sikhs from their inception to "Operation Bluestar." He has taken no sides, criticised no one in particular except Bhindranwale and yet succeeded in producing a most informative and readable brochure.



I have often heard Indian Muslims and Sikhs complain against the unsympathetic attitude of the government media and the press towards them. They make desperate efforts to launch newspapers and journals to air their community's point of view, but none of them succeeds in achieving viable circulations and get very little advertising support. Instead of blowing up vast sums of money in this futile endeavour, they would do better if they get people like Christopher Shackle to write about their problems.

Punjab's Latest Achievement

"Why is one Punjabi equal to two Bengalis? asks O.P. Bajaj, a Punjabi living in Jabalpur. He answers his own question with irrefutable Punjabi logic. "Nag is a Bengali. Pal is another Bengali. Put Nag and Pal together and you get one Punjabi, Nagpal."

Ha! Ha!

One worldwide family is on its toes. So that you can sweep your worries off your desk!

That's overnight Skypak service for you!

What does it take to put up your feet and relax? Well, when you have a load on your chest it's not easy. That load could be a small parcel, or a document. Which has to physically reach a certain destination, across a distance, within a next to impossible time!

Then it takes TNT Skypak. The most reputed courier service in the world. With 200 offices around the globe. And the nearest one to you just a phone call away!

The moment you dial the local Skypak number and hear a friendly 'hello' a chain is set in motion. A chain that unites as many as 26000 men and women in 48 countries! All of them on their toes!

So, by the time you replace your receiver you can put your feet up, right on your table.

SKYPAK
when it's wanted yesterday!

203, Jolly Bhavan No.2, 7 New Marine Lines, Bombay 400 020 Phone 253703 294454 Telex 011 3339 SAI IN

• Ahmedabad. 443053 • Bangalore: 568862 • Baroda 52285 • Bombay: 294454
• Calcutta: 431660 • Cochin. 69012 • Delhi: 6414830 • Gandhidham: 3414
• Hyderabad: 38237 • Kandla. 7437 • Madras: 475091 • Mangalore: 26226
• Mysore. 30894 • Madurai: 8440 • Mamco. 8447 • Pune. 54525 • Rajkot. 5712

TNT SKYPAK
THE WORLDWIDE COURIERS

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Does Rajiv Gandhi Really Mean Business?

It may sound churlish but I do not find any reason to rejoice over Rajiv Gandhi's performance. True, he means well and at times appears to be departing from his mother's path of confrontation and chicanery; there is less tension in the country and there is hope among the people that he might undo many wrongs. The Anti-Defection Act, which Rajiv Gandhi has repeatedly cited as an example of a measure to clean up politics is no doubt welcome. But there has not been much else.

To many, the Anti-Defection Act has raised suspicions that it was meant more to thwart the ambitions of the PM's own partymen than those of unprincipled politicians in general. There is clear evidence that after the formation of the council of ministers at the centre, some of them felt angry at being left out. There was even a meeting of some Congress(I) MPs at the residence of an important ruling party politician. The PM's step nipped the mischief in the bud, and that, perhaps, could have been the main intent rather than pure altruism.

Another step which is being cited is Rajiv Gandhi's selection of candidates for the Lok Sabha polls and for the Assembly elections. True, Antulay and Gundu Rao were dropped but there are scores of others at the centre and state levels who, even if they are not as well known, are in no way less guilty of malpractice. Strange logic has worked in the selection; while a candidate was dropped because of his bad image, his son or wife was declared fit enough to be chosen.

Going through the list of elected Congress(I) members in the states, I find that Rajiv Gandhi has given his favourite leaders, whatever their personal reputation, a free hand, and they have been able to weed out all the dissidents. Perhaps the PM's policy is to rule the country through state satraps after ensuring that they face no challenge or dissent. Apart from perpetuating lesser men, this may further strengthen the practice of imposing individuals from above, and weaken the process of leaders growing up from the grassroots.

A lot has been said about curbing black money. The Congress(I) spent at least Rs 200 crores in the Lok Sabha elections and it could not have spent less in the Assembly polls. Where did this money come from? It could only have come from blackmarketeers. And the time to pay back the benefactors is yet to come.

A lot has been said about curbing black money. The Congress(I) spent at least Rs 200 crores in the Lok Sabha elections and it could not have spent less in the Assembly polls. Where did this money come from? It could only have come from blackmarketeers. And the time to pay back the benefactors is yet to come. It is no secret that the grant of licences for imports and exports worth more than a particular amount automatically means kickbacks. Sometimes I wonder whether the spy scandal which has rocked the country does not have something to do with this system. It could be that what is classed as commercial espionage really means only a method of telling competing foreign firms what the kickback to get a particular deal through should be. The PM himself has said in private that "we have overreacted to the whole thing."

Much has been made of the changes which have been made at the level of governors, secretaries and ambassadors in New Delhi. Some dead wood has been removed but some of the officials who have taken up the positions of those who have been sent out are no better. A change in the personnel is no guarantee of any real change in the administration. Such changes do not offer much hope of better work because efficiency in administration is the means to an end, not the end in itself. Where is the policy which the "dynamic" officers are supposed to enforce? I have vainly looked for economic steps to ameliorate the condition of the people; Rajiv Gandhi is yet to spell out the measures to benefit the 52 per cent of the population living below the poverty line.

Progress towards removal of poverty is the touchstone with which to evaluate the performance of an elected government. I do not think there is any proposal to lessen disparities. There is not even talk of an egalitarian society. My colleagues in the media, liberals in the academic field and professionals, who represent the elite and create public opinion, are on the PM's side because they are the true beneficiaries of the system. They are pro-status quo and feel at home in the class they belong to. They are only interested in their security and any leader who can give them such security is their saviour.

I believe that Rajiv Gandhi has the opportunity to do good to this country. It is not only the massive majority with which he won the polls that gives me this hope but his ability to stand apart from all the others. That he has sacrificed some of the sacred cows is a point in his favour. So is his desire for cleanliness in politics and administration. What may prove to be his undoing is the bureaucratic approach to the country's problems. The steps the Prime Minister has taken so far indicate that he is willing to bring about changes, but only up to a point. What India needs is drastic change, and unless he can still persuade himself to bring this about, there is nothing much that the country can look forward to.

OPINION

Revealing Rekha

Like the Queen Bee (24 February—2 March) Rekha reigns supreme on the Indian silver screen and it was natural that SUNDAY spared a cover for her. However, I was disappointed to go through Girija Rajendran's Who Will Replace the Angry Young Man? The author had explored all the talents to find a replacement for Amitabh Bachchan who has joined politics. A glaring ommission was Mithun Chakraborty and I am sure that this well-built lad from Bengal will emerge as a worthy successor to Amitabh. I request SUNDAY to devote a cover on him.
B. Y. Roy, Bhubaneswar

• My congratulations to Akshay Upadhyaya for revealing the private life of India's most talented actress, Rekha. The interview, "I Am a Rare Person," helped her fans to know a lot of hitherto undisclosed facts. However, I expected some more on the 'Shiva' she worshipped.
Subrata Mazoomdar, Barakar (WB)

• The cover feature on Rekha was a treat. She arrived on the Indian screen two decades back as a plump, unattractive novice but with time and age she has matured into one of the most promising actresses. No wonder directors like Hrishikesh Mukherjee and Jabbar Patel prefer her to the other glamour queens of the Hindi filmdom: Sri Devi or Jayapradha. It is time Satyajit Ray and Mrinal Sen focussed their cameras on Rekha.
C. V Aravind, Madras

• The cover story on Rekha was a refreshing departure from politics. The interview was illuminating.
M A. Ahad, Bhubaneswar

• Rekha has a rare blend of authentic beauty and histrionic talent and films like Khubsoorat, Umrao Jaan, Ghar and Muqaddar Ka Sikandar illustrates her acting prowess. She has the potential to eclipse the Shabanas and the Smitas of the so-called art films if she is given the chance.
K. Chidanand Kumar, Bangalore

• During the early part of her career, Rekha was a victim of infatuation. But after a couple of bitter experiences, she gradually matured into one of the finest actresses on the Indian screen.
Md. Anwar Alam Qumaispuri, Patna

• Rekha was not candid enough in her interview to SUNDAY. I am still in the dark about the man in her life. Does Amitabh Bachchan symbolise.

her concept of the 'complete man'?
Sangram Mishra, Cuttack

• I agree with Girija Rajendran that despite the talent available in Hindi filmdom, Amitabh Bachchan is irreplaceable. However, I would rate the chances of Raj Babbar and Raj Kiran better than those of the rest. But the author surprisingly ignored them.
B. Ganesh, Jamshedpur

• Rekha is no longer the queen bee. She has been clearly outclassed by the southern belles like Sri Devi and Jayapradha. No matter how high she is rated in the north, the film industry in the south has rejected her.
K. Kumar Sekhar, Eluru (AP)

• Is SUNDAY turning into a film magazine? Devoting so many precious pages on Rekha was a waste. In the course of the article Akshay Upadhyaya writes: "With him (Amitabh) she (Rekha) explored the compassionate side of life." The statement sounds ridiculous since Rekha tried her level best to break the happy family life of Amitabh. She may be a good actress but she is a person without any scruples.
T. Rahmat, Calcutta

• Last time it was Azharuddin and now it is Rekha. Is SUNDAY short of serious matter?
Prabhudutt Mishra, Cuttack

• There are scores of film magazines to publicise the services rendered by Rekha for two long decades. SUNDAY should concentrate on more serious problems confronting the nation.
N. Ellango, Tirunelvelli

Lonely Leftists

All the articles pertaining to The Decline of the Leftists (24 February—2 March) were thought-provoking. In West Bengal, the erosion of their power is due to their failure on practically all fronts. The labour and the peasantry have been alienated because of certain policies followed by the Left Front government. The urban elite is also disillusioned with the government's performance. The youth have been frustrated since the government failed to keep its promise to create new job opportunities. The same is the case wherever the communists rule in India. I wonder how E.M.S. Namboodiripad claimed that their "performance was not miserable" when the electorate rejected them in their strongholds like Kerala and West Bengal.
Nirjhar Das Gupta, Calcutta

Clean Image

M. J. Akbar had rightly indicated in his conversation with finance minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh ('This Generation has to Pay for its Future,' 10—16 February) that the finance minister has a quality rare among politicians: a clean image.
Param Hans Singh, Arrah

• The interview with the finance minister made absorbing reading. Very little comes out from most of our ambitious Five Year Plans. I hope V. P. Singh takes the initiative to see that the targets set are achieved.
Dilip Sharma, Lanka (Assam)

Hapless Children

I was moved by Nirmal Mitra's vivid portrayal of the pitiful condition of children who leave their homes due to poverty and work in the numerous eating houses throughout the country (Children of Despair, 24 February—2 March). On paper there are numerous laws to check child labour, but the government has never been serious enough to implement them.
Murari Lal Sen, Calcutta

• Honest efforts should be made to alleviate the sufferings of these hapless children. If the government, the philanthropic organisations and the citizens join hands to eradicate child labour, these unfortunate children will one day prove to be assets of the country.
Hema Sahadevan, Calcutta

Gavaskar is Proud of Azharuddin

Sunday paid a fitting tribute to Mohammed Azharuddin (When Dreams Come True, 17—23 February). The new star on India's cricket horizon is shining brightly and will continue to do so for a long time.
Deepak Acharya, Phulbani (Orissa)

• Many more records will be rewritten in the years to come and it is only a matter of time before Azharuddin surpasses Gavaskar's record of 30 Test centuries. Gavaskar seems visibly worried about this and he is trying his tricks to foil Azhar's honest efforts. But one cannot supress talent and Azhar will emerge victorious at the end.
V. N. Narayanaswamy, Madras

• The issue on cricket was timely and it made absorbing reading. There is no dearth of talent in the Indian team; what is lacking is team spirit. The present Indian side can be compared to the state of the opposition: many leaders but no desire to work together to achieve a goal. The latest sensation is Azharuddin but unless rivalry within the team is rooted out, his talent will go to waste.
M. H. Rama, Bhubaneswar

• SUNDAY rightly devoted a cover for Azharuddin. This 22-year-old cricketer from Hyderabad has started his career with a bang and and I hope he keeps up the standard he has set. The blow-up of Azhar on the cover as well as the action photographs inside were superb.
Hasina Bashiruddin, Hyderabad

• Mohammed Azharuddin is not only a hero at home, he is also a hero abroad. In the opening match against Pakistan in the Benson and Hedges World Cup series, Azhar scored a sizzling 93 not out. The vaccuum created by the exit of Gundappa Vishwanath has at last been filled.
G. Rama Mishra, Jharsuguda (Orissa)

• Azharuddin has emerged as a worthy successor to Sunil Gavaskar who is at the fag end of his career. He deserves all the adulations being showered on him.
A.N. Veeraraghavan, Bombay

• The interview with Azharuddin (It was Pray and Play) made interesting reading. Azhar's style reminds me of Gundappa Vishwanath at his prime Hareshkumar Pandya, Rajkot

• Srinjoy Chowdhury has unnecessarily raised the dispute whether Gavaskar is Jealous of Azharuddin. Sunil Gavaskar is a legend by himself and I see no reason why he should prevent Azhar from reaching the pinnacle I think Gavaskar is proud and a relieved man to have a batsman of Azhar's calibre on his side.
Sharad Mohan, Dhanbad

• S. Chowdhury had wrongly assumed that Gavaskar declared the second innings at Kanpur where Azhar was on his way to his fourth consecutive hundred since his debut, to deprive him of his century. The game was petering out into a tame draw and Gavaskar took the decision to infuse life into the game. In the course of the article, the author conveniently ignores the spectator point of view. All those present to watch the proceedings on that day welcomed Sunil Gavaskar's decision.
Subhas Dutta, Ranchi

Mohammed Azharuddin

• The vitriolic attack on Sunil Gavaskar was unwarranted. Srinjoy Chowdhury's reasoning that Gavaskar promoted Azhar to bring about his downfall sounded ridiculous. It is a well-known fact that the world's best batsmen bat higher up in the order and Azharuddin who had shown fine form and temperament was only expected to strengthen India's batting by weathering the initial attack of the opponent.
Rajiv Ghai, Hyderabad

Money is the Cause

The cover story, Bureaucrat, Diplomat, Industrialist, Spy (3—9 February) made absorbing reading The vivid narration at the beginning of the article of an industrialist bribing his way through the VIP entrance to pay his homage to Indira Gandhi read like a thriller but the author seemed to pin all the blame for this act on the industrialist alone. In my opinion the industrialist and the security guard should share the responsibilities of the offence. In India today corruption is a way of life and senior officers openly accept bribe. Patriotism is a forgotten word and one is willing to do anything for the sake of money
O. Varghese, Dammam (Saudi Arabia)

• Shubhabrata Bhattacharya rightly pointed out that the pay and allowances of government officials are such that corruption has been inbuilt in the system I don't think that it is possible to root out corruption without improving the economic condition of the common man.
Subhas Mohanty, Ranchi

• In Admirable Bureaucrats, Madhu Jain profiles a number of bureaucrats of yester years who had placed the interests of the country above everything else. Thereafter the bureaucracy has gradually deteriorated and today moneybags wield immense power in Delhi The new Prime Minister has taken the right step by cleansing the bureaucracy.
Shyamal Gupta, Burdwan

Inconvenient Facts

The inconvenient facts about St Stephen's Male Chauvinists (17-23 February) are that no undergarments were hung on the college tower; the incident was condemned by the college community as a whole, not by a group of "irate girls" only; in fact, the principal had convened a special assembly and unequivocally condemned the incident; the agitation has the support of not more than 15 students—out of a total strength of 960 students, of whom about 250 are girls; the protests outside St Stephen's organised by the SFI/PUDR attracted only six Stephenians; 'stud charts' naming the ten most attractive boys have also appeared; and finally, the picture showing "St Stephen's students protesting outside their college gate" is not of students from St Stephen's.
Aseem Prakash, Delhi

The Star of the Future

Ramakrishna Hegde's stunning mandate has rocketed him to the frontlines of the next major electoral battle—the bid for power, in 1990. The growing consensus among opposition leaders of different hues is that Hegde is perhaps the only leader who can offer a credible alternative to the Congress(I). Of course, there are big 'ifs' along the way, and the opposition has shown a marked tendency to slip up on the 'ifs.' But for the moment, reports Chidanand Rajghatta from Bangalore, it is Hegde who is atop the crest of a wave.

By 10 am on Wednesday 6 March, Ramakrishna Hegde knew he was winning the gambit of recommending dissolution of the Karnataka Assembly and seeking a fresh mandate. After only two hours of counting it was known that the Janata candidates were leading in most places. By noon, the local Doordarshan crew were on their way to Krishna, where the chief minister lounged, wreathed in victory smiles. The Hegde wave had arrived. Mr Hegde had said that the Assembly elections in Karnataka would be a referendum on the performance of his government. In the end it turned out to be a watershed. Once again, India's teeming electorate demonstrated its unerring capacity to reward and punish. What happened in Karnataka on 6 March is unparalleled in Indian electoral history.

Hardly nine weeks earlier, the people of Karnataka had been called upon to exercise their franchise for the Lok Sabha elections, and they had given the Congress(I) a big victory: 24 out of the 28 Lok Sabha seats from the state. It was a terrible moral defeat for Mr Hegde who had campaigned for the Janata Party on the basis of his government's performance. Yet, in spite of the fact that the Janata and its allies trailed behind the Congress(I) in 177 of the 224 Assembly segments in Karnataka in December, Mr Hegde went to the people in March to prove that their December vote had not been cast against his two-year-old government. The electorate vindicated his faith. On 5 March, the same electorate rejected the Congress(I) candidates in 158 Assembly constituencies. It was the most demonstrative of the Indian electorate's use of discretion.

It is now clear that the electorate knows quite precisely the difference between the Lok Sabha and the Vidhan Sabha elections. The vote in December was not against the Janata Party in Karnataka, but against the national opposition: not for the Congress(I) in Karnataka, but for Rajiv Gandhi's Congress(I) at the centre. Freed of the opposition albatross in the more localised Assembly election, Mr Hegde led the Janata Party to a memorable victory: 139 seats in a house of 224. It is the first time a party other than the Congress has secured an absolute majority in Karnataka.

Hegde campaigning from his Jayavahini

Ramakrishna Hegde won because he provided a credible alternative to the Congress(I) in the state. He was closer to the hearts and minds of the people of Karnataka than Rajiv Gandhi or his partymen for whom they had voted in December, responding to the appeal for "unity and integrity of the nation." Having done that, they now voted for "Karnataka shall be ruled from Karnataka, not from New Delhi," which was the Janata slogan. The biggest flaw in the Congress(I) campaign was that there was no single leader to match Mr Hegde's charisma or wit. No single Congress(I) leader was projected as a potential chief minister. In fact, no single leader had credibility and the electorate knew that even if they voted for

Hegde's Campaign Speeches

Ramakrishna Hegde is no Cicero. His oratorial skills have always been limited and his dull, monologous drawl has never set an audience on fire. But yet, last February, Hegde took on himself the entire burden of the Janata Party campaign. For three weeks, Chandra Shekhar, Morarji Desai, Madhu Dandavate and even his local colleagues were irrelevant, as Hegde raced across the state in his "Jayavahini" (on the lines of NTR's Chaitanya Ratham) asking the people to vote him back to power.

What did Hegde tell the people? What caused the electorate, who only two months ago voted solidly for the Congress(I) and Rajiv Gandhi, to swing back to the Janata Party?

There were three Hegde speeches during the campaign. One, for the small rural audience where he spoke mainly of the achievements of the Janata government and where he refrained from attacking Rajiv Gandhi. Two, a slightly longer speech for the semi-urban audience, where he touched upon subjects like overdraft and toppling and three, the full length speech for the urban audience (above 25,000 crowd) where he attacked Congress(I) policies and ideas (like one-party rule) and spoke of the Janata philosophy (like accent on value-based politics).

Two things stood out during Hegde's campaign. First, he made a number of two-minute "nutshell speeches" to roadside audiences of around 500 to 1,000 people from atop his Jayavahini. For the poor audience whose only encounter with a chief minister was a condescending wave (if the shaded glass of the car he was travelling in was rolled down), this must have been quite an experience. Second, a greater part of Ramakrishna Hegde's speech was directed at women. In fact, he invariably began his addresses with "My dear sisters, mothers and friends." There was nothing subtle about it: he did this quite blatantly, asking the women why they always voted for the Congress(I) though that party had done little for them in 35 years. He had adopted the same line in the December Lok Sabha elections and it failed to fetch results. This time it did. That possibly swung the electorate to vote for the Janata.

This is the standard Hegde speech culled from tapes of the speeches he made during the campaigning.

"My dear sisters, mothers and friends,

Two years ago you voted us to power. Today, we have returned the power to you. In December, you were called upon to exercise your vote in the Lok Sabha elections. You voted the Congress(I) and rejected the Janata Party. Your mandate confused us. Is it that you did not like the performance of my government? Or, did you not like the way we functioned? So, to get a clear answer from you, we have sought a fresh mandate, although we were not obliged to do so. The power you gave us, we have returned to you and you have to exercise your judgement.

Hegde: victorious

I understand what happened in December. The women in this audience voted overwhelmingly for the Congress(I) and Rajiv Gandhi. You probably thought, here is a poor child, a 40-year-old orphan, who deserves our love and affection. It was your motherly instincts at work and it is only natural. But you know we are having an election for the state Assembly. Even if you vote for Rajiv Gandhi, he is not going to come here as the chief minister. The chief minister will be from among the Moilys, Patils and Bangarappas—whose faces you have seen and rejected. Do you want them back? They are the same men who tried to bring down the government you elected in 1983 by bribing and inducing defections. One of their leaders was caught while bribing our legislator with two lakh of rupees. Do you want them back?

The Janata Party has in two years, introduced value-based politics. We abide by your will and decisions. You are our masters, not New Delhi. The Congress(I) leaders, you know very well, run to Delhi for every small matter. We don't do that. We go by your dictates. Ours is a people's government.

I will not say that in two years we have accomplished everything. But we have done a lot. Our biggest achievement has been to provide drinking water to each and every village in Karnataka. This is something the Congress did not do in 35 years, we have done in two years. The central government's planning commission itself has praised and rewarded us for this, but yet the Congress(I) does not want to give us credit.

For the women, the Janata Party has done so much. We give maternity allowance of Rs 100 a month for three months during and after pregnancy. We give widow pension of Rs 50 a month. Why did the Congress(I) not do this? Did not Indira Gandhi bear children? Or, did she not experience widowhood? Why did they not understand your plight?

Today, we have reserved 20 per cent of seats in municipal bodies and corporations for women. Why did not the Congress do all this even though you voted for them again and again? Today, the Congress(I) is saying that all that we have done is by the centre's grace. It is all under the 20-point programme, they say. If that is so, I ask you, why are these schemes not there in other states?

You must consider all this carefully. The question before you is: Do you want the present government or the past government? Do you want Karnataka to be ruled from Karnataka or from New Delhi? Think carefully. If you think that we are fit to rule, if you are happy with our performance in television, then give it your vote. Jai Hind. Jai Karnataka.

Ramakrishna Hegde filing his nomination papers for the Basavanagudi constituency in Bangalore the Congress(I), Rajiv Gandhi would not become the chief minister of Karnataka.

On the other hand, Rajiv Gandhi's promise to provide a clean government misfired. The denial of a ticket to Gundu Rao was just an eyewash in "operation cleanup." For inexplicable reasons (electoral pragmatism, perhaps) Veerappa Moily and K.H. Patil with reputations worse than Gundu Rao's were provided tickets. So were their "not-so-clean" nominees. Much later, commiserating over the debacle, a Congressman was to say: "If only Rajivji had sacked all other shady Congress(I) leaders along with Gundu Rao, we would have won every urban seat in Karnataka."

It was not merely the lack of local leadership or bad choice of candidates. The Congress(I) did not even have a campaign theme for the elections. Rajiv Gandhi's contention that a Congress(I) government would be beneficial to the state was rejected outright as the people settled for the existing pluralism: the Janata Party in the state and the Congress(I) in the centre. If anything, the people placed faith on Hegde's slogan that Karnataka should be ruled from Karnataka, not from New Delhi, an obvious reference to Congressmen's frequent trips to New Delhi for consultation and orders on every matter, as well as the increasing centralisation of power.

None of Rajiv Gandhi's allegations made any impact on the voters. What the voters of Karnataka elected was a party which according to the Prime Minister, aided and abetted terrorists in Punjab. What they voted for was a government, which according to the Prime Minister was guilty of financial mismanagement. It was a classic demonstration of the fact that no amount of propaganda can deceive the people. In the one-room tenement of a Janata Party worker, a small change was made on a popular poster to read: "The voter is always right."

The man singularly responsible for the Janata victory was without doubt 59-year-old Ramakrishna Hegde. It was a personal triumph for the man who had placed so much faith and trust on an electorate which had, only two months ago, spurned him. He proved once more that all the superlatives used by the media to describe his political acumen were not misplaced. It was a crowning moment in his political career. To begin with, however, not even Hegde had anticipated the bounty. He had publicly said that the Janata would get about 120 seats. Asked about this after the results had come in, Hegde told SUNDAY, "It is not a crime to be modest." But the modesty had more to do with caution than optimism. Three days before the polls, the Janata Party found it necessary to announce a "supplementary manifesto," to add to the first one. This one promised rice at Rs two a kg and clothes at subsidised rates, both schemes in effect in the Telugu Desam-led Andhra Pradesh. A close Hegde aide said a day before polling that he "personally expected the party to get 95 seats," while a party office-bearer confessed, "I won't be surprised if we end up with 60 seats." Hegde himself carried around with him a confidential report, frequently updated, in which the figure hovered between 100 and 125 seats.

The Hegde wave cut across all barriers. The CM had approached the Lok Sabha election with trepidation that the women would vote for Rajiv Gandhi in large numbers and he was proved right. This time, much to his surprise and obvious delight, women voted for him. All the soppy lines, all the blatant wooing of women's votes finally yielded results. Ramakrishna Hegde's secret

The Power of the Spoiler

Ramakrishna Rao Gundu Rao is a non-smoker. But on Wednesday, 6 March, a polite offer of a cigarette from a journalist was quickly accepted. "What brand?" Gundu Rao queried in his own peculiar brand of English. On being told it was a Marlboro, he quickly lit up and dragged deeply. "I need something strong like this today," the former chief minister of Karnataka quipped.

He was sitting in the living room of his house on Palace Road. With him were his supporters and a few journalists who had dropped into his house to see how the man who was disregarded by the Congress(I) high command was reacting to his party's defeat in the Assembly election. Every few minutes Gundu Rao's personal secretary brought in yet another result: yet another Janata triumph and a Congress(I) loss. Gundu Rao listened in silence with his head bowed. "It was a bad campaign," he remarked. At one stage the frustration was so great that he growled: "If I had got the ticket from Somwarpet (his home constituency), I would have won by 22,000 (votes)."

A little later, a friend remarked that the results of the Assembly election (as far as the Congress-I was concerned) were like the results the Reddy Congress (led by K.H. Patil) faced in 1978: a stunning defeat. Gundu Rao guffawed and there followed a lengthy tirade against K.H. Patil and Veerappa Moily, his arch rivals within the Congress(I).

As the results trickled in, it was becoming increasingly clear that the Congress(I) high command had miscalculated badly. The people were not fooled by the pretentious clean-up. Gundu Rao may have been dropped but tickets to Veerappa Moily and K.H. Patil meant that the party high command had been unable to see who the real leader was. During the December Lok Sabha poll, Gundu Rao had toured 26 of the 28 constituencies, drawn (and entertained) large crowds and "helped" the Congress(I) win 24 of the 28 seats. And yet, Moily and Patil had dared to tell the high command that Gundu Rao had not campaigned in the nine marginal Congress(I) candidates would have been more than what it was. They had even asked the high command to bar Gundu Rao from campaigning in the Lok Sabha election. Now they havelearnt their lesson.

Gundu Rao: out in the cold

Barely 24 hours after the results of the Assembly elections came in, signalling the rout of the Congress(I) in Karnataka, Gundu Rao dictated a brusque telegram to his secretary. It was addressed to Rajiv [illegible] and Patil had dreamt of coming back to power. They had tried every trick that was not in the book to bring down the Janata government. And, when the December Lok Sabha election [illegible] people [illegible] Now the [illegible] mer; for the people that the Janata Party would without fear for five years. And the Anti-Defection Act [illegible] dhi has so enthusiastically [illegible] in, has made sure that there will not be any more contretemps.

For once, the Congress(I) was graceful in defeat. Each of the party's leaders accepted defeat, offered to cooperate with Hegde and promised to function as a constructive opposition. Moily, in fact, went as far as saying that they would do their best to rectify their mistakes, while Patil resigned as the PCC president owning responsibility for the party's defeat. It was a great lesson which only the electorate could teach; something that can sober the most greedy, most power-hungry politician.

Chidanand Rajghatta, Bangalore

joy in this hour of triumph is that he has finally broken the monopoly of the Congress(I) on women's votes. There was sufficient evidence that Muslims—the other traditional Congress vote bank—had also voted for the Janata in large numbers. This was also due to the fact that the Muslim League ditched the Congress(I) and where they did not set up candidates, they asked their supporters to work for the Janata candidates.

It was not a debacle for the Congress(I) alone. The BJP, never a great force in Karnataka, also received a thrashing at the polls. The party which had 18 MLAs in the dissolved House, returned with just two. The Janata's break with the BJP is also believed to have encouraged Muslims to support the former. But the BJP rout proved some of the Janata hardliners' contention that the Janata Party was now "grown up enough" to contest elections alone. For two years, the BJP, which lent crucial support to the Hegde government, proved to be a thorn in the Janata flesh ("grumbling wife" being the charming sobriquet it earned). With an absolute majority now, the Janata Party can look forward to a trouble-free five years. For the Congress(I), it is going to be a long hard road. All the dreams of Patil and Moily of coming back to power are smashed and the party is demoralised. Even as the results came in, Congressmen were busy blaming each other for the debacle.

Chidanand Rajghatta, Bangalore

"The Janata Victory is a Morale Booster for the Opposition"

Ramakrishna Hegde told SUNDAY

Q: What is the impact of your victory in Karnataka on the national opposition parties?

A: I think it is a morale booster, a shot in the arm for the opposition. Now, in addition to West Bengal and Andhra Pradesh we have an opposition government here. It gives us scope to prove that we can run a government much better than the Congress(I).

Q: There is a feeling in some quarters that your victory here reinforces the suspicion that the Janata is fast becoming a regional party.

A: No, you cannot come to that conclusion just because we won in only one state. In fact, among all opposition parties the Janata is the only one that has won some seats—may be one, two, five, six or 140—across the country. This shows that the Janata Party has an all-India appeal and it is not confined to a state. You see, soon after the 1978 Assembly elections, the Congress(I) was wiped out in most states. It was in power only in one or two states. Did that make it a regional party?

Q: What about you? You have said that you prefer national level politics and you took up the chief ministership quite reluctantly. Does not this victory bind you to Karnataka?

A: Yes. But even then I hope I will be able to (long pause) get myself relieved of this responsibility even before the end of this term.

Q: Does that mean you are planning to relinquish your chief ministership soon?

A: It depends. What I said was only a possibility.

Q: It is now being said that this victory makes you prime ministerial material for the 1990 poll.

A: I am not one of those who suffer from such illusions. It is the people who give the opportunity and assignment. What ever they give, we have to accept.

Q: Do you still believe in the necessity of a combined opposition? Or do you think this victory in Karnataka signals a Janata resurgence?

A: At the moment, no party in the opposition is in a position to boast: "We can do it alone." But this election has more or less tested the popular base of the various opposition parties. The BJP in Rajasthan and Madhya Pradesh, the Janata in Karnataka, Orissa and Gujarat, the DMKP in UP and Bihar and the Congress(S) in Maharashtra. This should open the eyes of the opposition leaders and this should be the barometer for all future seat adjustments.

Q: No, the question is: Are you still going to chase the mirage of opposition unity?

A: No. I have said I won't and I see no reason now to change my mind. Trying for opposition unity is futile and we have wasted enough time and energy in chasing it. But for the future, this election can be taken as the indicator of the relative strengths of the opposition parties.

Rajiv Gandhi made a lot of mistakes during his campaign which we exploited very well...He lost a lot of credibility when he went on saying that the performance of my government was zero...The people thought Rajiv Gandhi was telling lies...

Ashok Vishe

Q: One constant criticism by the opposition was that the Congress(I) was an individualistic party, with only one supreme leader. Today we see the same thing being repeated in Karnataka.

A: Well, if it has happened here today, it is because of the political culture practised and propagated by the Congress for the last 15 years. What the Congress has done in this regard has influenced not only the other parties, but also the people.

Q: But you need not have allowed it. Your partymen released advertisements in newspapers with your photo and the captions said, "Vote Hegde."

A: No, actually I was against it, but they were insistent. They said the people would like to know who the leader of the Janata Party is.

Q: But you still did not have to toe the Congress(I) line which you have criticised so often.

A: Yes, that is true. I don't like any single person being projected as the sole leader. But in this case... (shrugs)

Q: Does this reinforce the belief that people vote more for personalities than parties?

A: I don't completely agree with that. You know, this personality business was there even during Panditji's time. Only then it was natural—Panditji earned our love and affection. Mrs Indira Gandhi believed in the personality cult: but she cultivated and perfected it. This has affected all other parties. I am certainly not for it.

Q: Coming to the Prime Minister, don't you think his election campaign was over-aggressive? And in sharp contrast the opposition took it lying down.

A: Not really. Rajiv Gandhi made a lot of mistakes during his campaign which we exploited very well. Here he lost a lot of credibility when he went on saying that the performance of my government was zero. He was misguided by the local Congress(I) leaders. The people thought Rajiv Gandhi was telling lies because they had seen my government perform. Similarly, he went on harping about the one-party rule. I demolished the argument with just one line: for 15 years Karnataka had a Congress government. What is the wonderful development that has taken place? In both these cases his credibility suffered and I did not have to find any other issues.

Q: Would you agree that there was some amount of sympathy for you that helped you win?

A: Not really. Only when people like Karunakaran came here and made statements like "the people are waiting to throw out this government" there was some sympathy. It had nothing to do with my resignation. It was a positive vote on our performance.

Q: How long do you think Rajiv Gandhi will last? Will he complete his five year term?

A: I don't think the question is very relevant.

Q: Why are you people so fond of this "relevance business?"

A: (Laughs).

Q: Well, don't you think this election has proved that the other opposition leaders are irrelevant?

A: Why? They did come here...

Q: But they hardly campaigned...

A: Why should we trouble them when we can manage things ourselves?

Q: How much did the campaigning by the filmstars Anant Nag and Shankar Nag help?

A: Oh, they did a wonderful job.

Q: It looks as though you are increasingly imitating the Congress(I)—the personality cult, filmstars, computers...

A: Well, some techniques which are modern have to be used (laughs). (There is) nothing wrong in that. Anant and Shankar came to us and said they would campaign. We did not go out of our way and call them. Every citizen is free to come and campaign for us.

Q: When are you going to advise the older opposition leaders to retire, now that your relevance and their irrelevance have been proved?

A: (Laughs) Why should I? I have my hands full here. I have to mind my own business.

Q: Are you going to discuss with them the fact that state level leadership is proving more effective in combating the Congress(I)? Is it not better that their aspirations are confined to their states first?

A: I quite agree. If we had only concentrated on the grassroots over the last seven years—after the Janata split—we would have done much better. Instead we wasted time at the national level trying to take a shortcut to power. I am referring only to the Janata Party. We simply took in people like Devi Lal and Karpoori Thakur who have made a name for themselves splitting parties.

Q: You hinted that you would like to relinquish your chief ministership and go back to national level politics. Who is going to take over here? Do you have a second rung leadership?

A: Why, I have senior colleagues. Not just one, many...

Q: That is the problem. You have too many...

A: Well, one of them will emerge as the most acceptable person.

Q: You now seem quite emphatic that you would like to re-enter national politics.

A: I don't know how to explain it without being misunderstood. You see, in the first place I did not want to come here. I should not stick here permanently. There should be a change after every three years, four years. People get tired of seeing the same face.

Interviewed by Chidanand Rajghatta

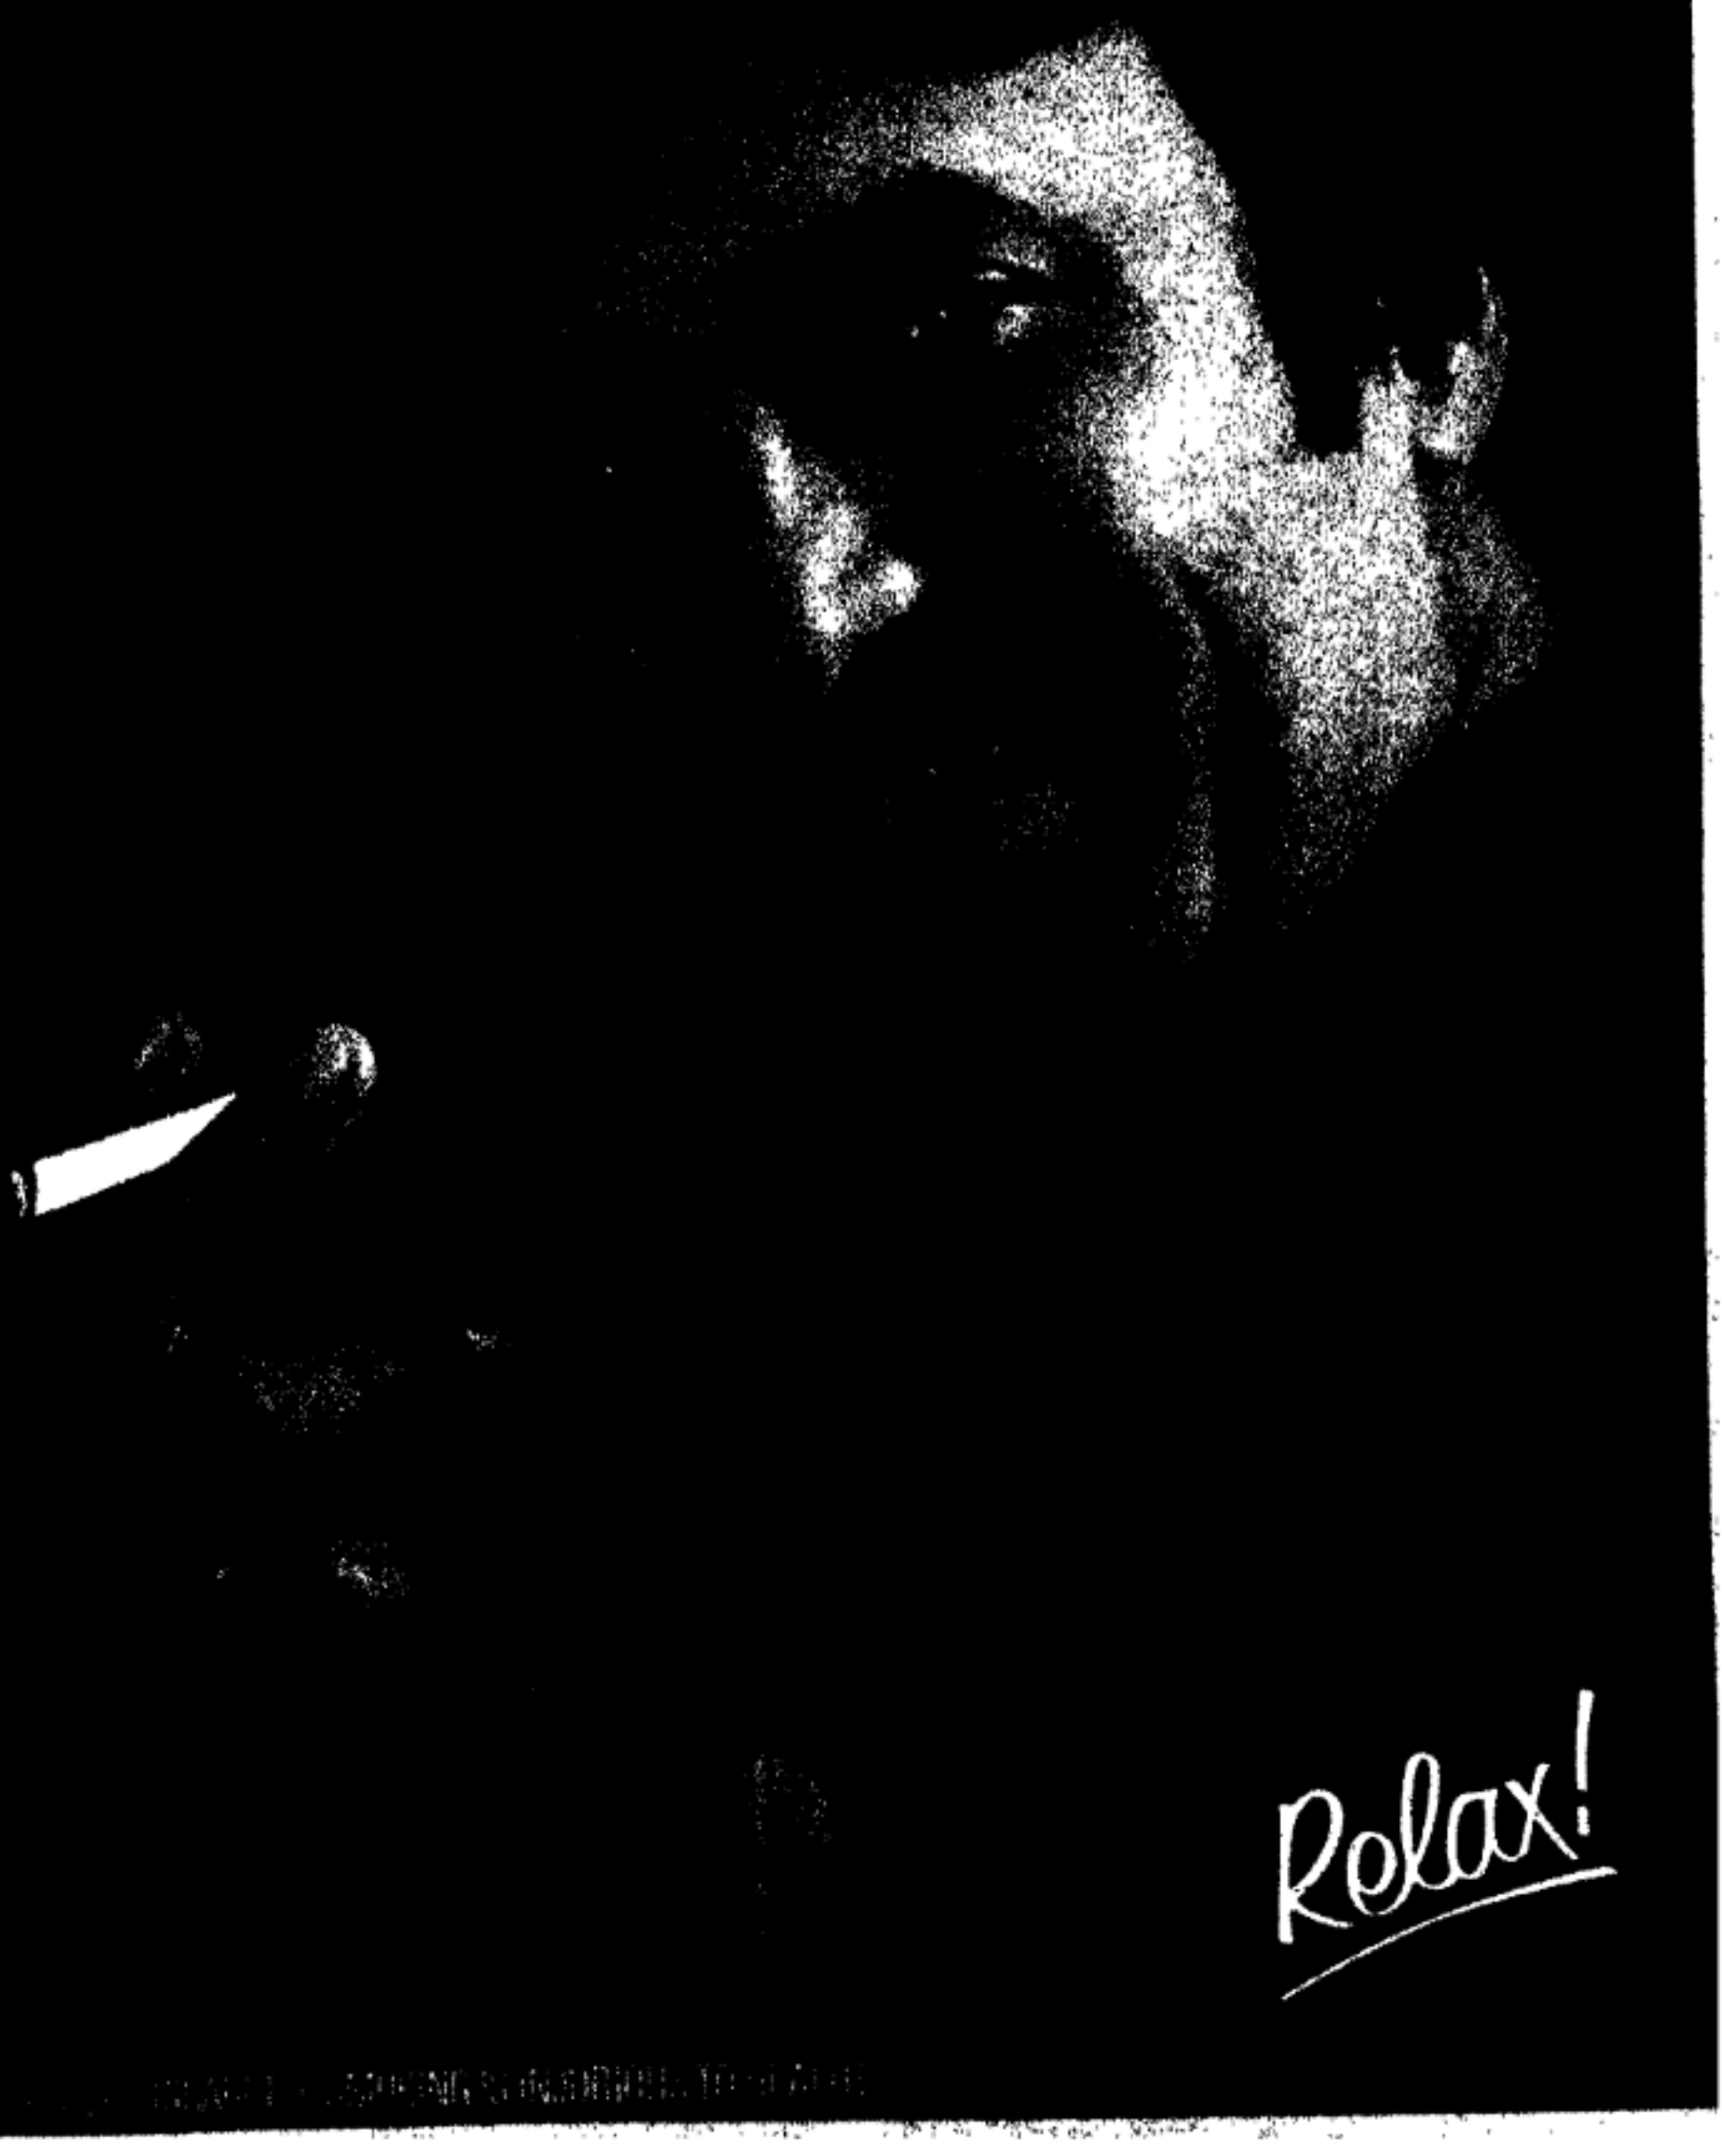
Dispassionate objectivity of approach and deliberate application of data are the two eyes of a decision-maker. Steadiness of advocacy and thoroughness to details are of the outfit of a leader. Personal prejudice should not stain nor self-interest warp the decision Straight-forwardness in dealing, strength of will, tenacity of purpose and capacity for action are the hall-mark of a manager on whom devolves the onus of decision-making. Clear-headed and confident but conscious of risks, he combines enterprise with caution. Resourceful and resilient, he accommodates in his decision the imponderable and the ineluctable. Like automobiles rolling out of the assembly line, decisions emerge from conference and contemplation, from discussion and deliberation.

MBA ENTRANCE

TO THE MBA ASPIRANT

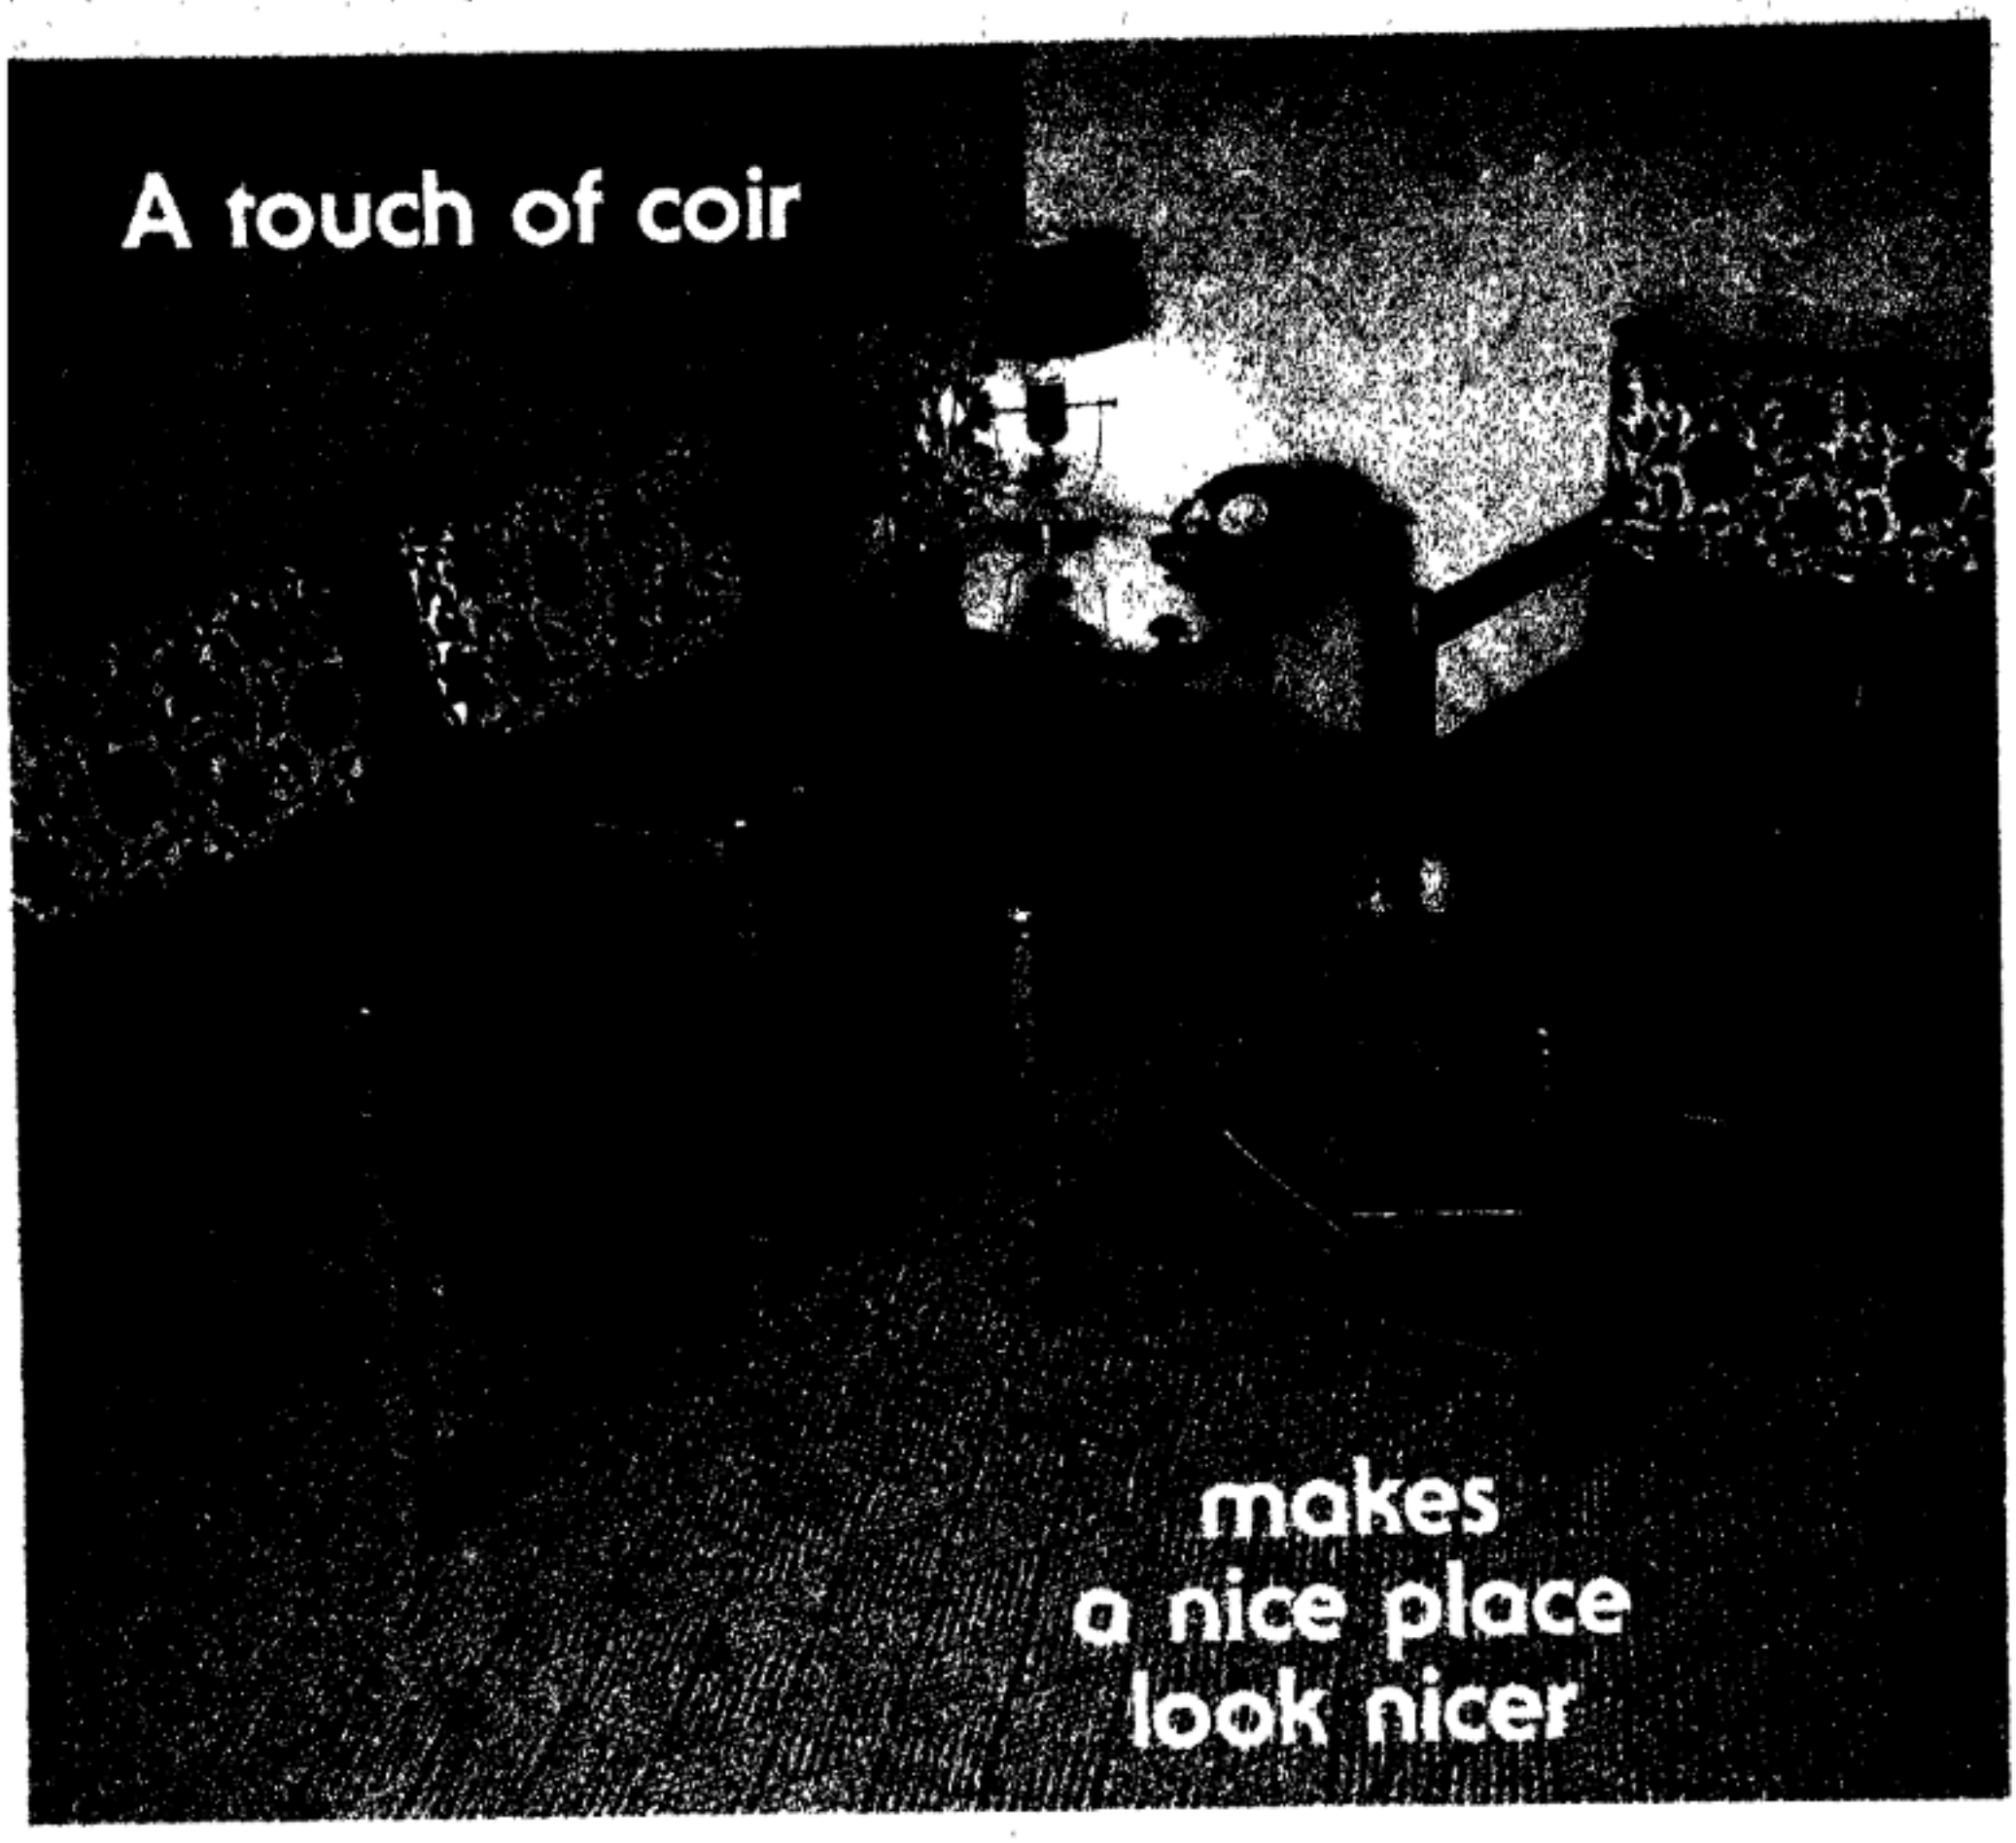
DECISION: CONJECTURE OR CONCLUSION ?

Would you like your portrait to fit this profile ?



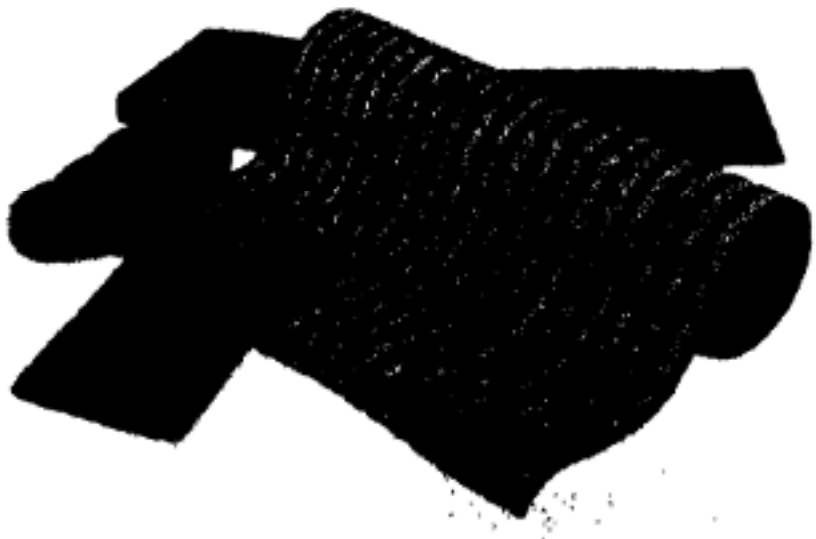
Here at Brilliants we help shape would-be MBAs. We sharpen your decision-making faculty Every question you answer is as much decision as test The programme is designed to make you more than equal to the formidable challenge posed by such entrance tests as those of IIM, IRM, XLRI, Bajaj, AIMA etc

BRILLIANT TUTORIALS



12,Masilamani Mudali St., T.Nagar,Madras-17 Ph 442099, 443308

EMINENCE THROUGH EXCELLENCE



"There is nothing like Gharminar."

Relax!

Coir decor – as beautiful as it is practical and inexpensive.
Keeps you cool in summer. Warm in winter.
Keeps noise away. No expensive maintenance, no vacuum or dry cleaning.
Dust proof, moth proof and rot proof.
Just lasts and lasts. It is also the least expensive of decor materials. Take a beautifully practical decision.
Take coir.

Coir Board
Cochin 682 016

Showrooms : Ahmedabad: 448226 . Bangalore: 51216 . Bhubaneswar 50944 Bombay 221575 . Calcutta: 445287 Chandigarh 25753 . Cochin: 34277 . Hyderabad: 36276 Indore: 7106 Jammu Tawi: 3222 . Jaipur: 65427 . Kanpur: 47326 Madras: 85787 . Madurai 25505 . New Delhi: 681544, 271388 . Patna: 25550

ASSEMBLY ELECTIONS

A Mature Electorate

Rajiv Gandhi's call for one-party rule is rebuffed

The Indian electorate has shown its maturity once again. Within ten weeks of the Lok Sabha results, in which the splintered opposition was given a drubbing by the electorate, the monopoly of the Congress(I) was curtailed. N. T. Rama Rao retained his hold over Andhra Pradesh. The Janata Party, led in Karnataka by the opposition's most astute leader, Ramakrishna Hegde, has been given a mandate bigger than what it received in 1983. In Sikkim Narbahadur Bhandari, who had suffered in the days when the ruling party at the centre had not pledged itself to "clean" politics and toppled his government through defections in May last year, has received an overwhelming mandate. In Maharashtra, the Congress (I) has barely retained power winning 148 of the 288 seats: the Progressive Democratic Front led by the Congress (Socialist) president, Sharad Pawar, having proved that by putting up common opposition candidates, the Congress (I) can be checked. Pawar could have done better had he not insisted on aligning with the Bharatiya Janata Party. The Congressmen in the Congress(S) resented the BJP tie-up and the BJP's showing in the rest of the country, as in Maharashtra, has not been impressive. Apart from these states, in Uttar Pradesh and Rajasthan, the showing of the ruling party has been less than spectacular. In Bihar and Gujarat the Congress(I) had done well. Only in Himachal Pradesh, under the leadership of Veerbhadra Singh, can the Congress (I) performance be described as remarkable: the party won 58 of the 65 seats. In the last elections, when Ram Lal led the Congress(I) in Himachal, to gain absolute majority some independents had to be wooed. This time, despite denying tickets to many ruling party stalwarts, V. B. Singh has been able to repeat the performance of the Congress in the days of the late Dr Y. S. Parmar, the founder of the Himachal state.

The Janata Party has emerged as the prominent opposition party on the national level. In the Lok Sabha polls too, the Janata, by being the only non-Communist national opposition party to receive double digit results (it won ten seats), became the main opposition party after the Telugu Desam and the CPI(M). This time, apart from comfortably retaining power in Karnataka, the party has won seats in all the states where elections were held, except Himachal and Sikkim. The Janata Party has won 239 seats all over the country this time, as compared to the 179 it had in the outgoing Assemblies. In Gujarat, the party has not done as well as it did earlier. By winning 14 seats, it has lost ground in seven seats in Gujarat. Apart from being the ruling party in Karnataka, the Janata Party has emerged as the main opposition in Orissa and Gujarat.

The role of the main opposition in the biggest state Assembly, Uttar Pradesh, has gone to the Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party (DMKP), which represents the former parties of Charan Singh (Lok Dal) and H. N. Bahuguna (Democratic Socialist Party), and which has won 86 of the 425 seats in UP. It has also emerged as the principal opposition in the second largest Assembly, Bihar, by winning 44 of the 324 seats. The leader of the Bihar unit of the DMKP, Karpoori Thakur, has won his own seat by an overwhelming margin. In Rajasthan, though the biggest opposition party is the BJP, by winning 27 seats, the DMKP too is a recognised opposition party in a House of 250 (ten per cent of the total seats entitle a party to be recognised as a "party" in a Legislature. A party securing less than that number is called a "group"). The DMKP has failed to retain its presence in the Orissa, Gujarat and Madhya Pradesh Assemblies, but has won a single seat in Himachal. (In Orissa, with Biju Patnaik having moved back to the Janata, the DMKP was wiped out. In Madhya Pradesh, on the eve of the election, the party's lone MLA and state president, Ramashankar Singh, defected to the Congress-I, thus becoming the last defector before the Anti-Defection Act was passed. The entire DMKP unit in MP joined the Congress -I on the eve of the polls.) The DMKP has emerged as a major party in the Hindi belt.

Sraps India

NTR addressing a meeting from his Chaitanya Ratham

While the DMKP has picked up 152 seats in four states, the BJP has suffered major reverses all over, to slip down from its tally of 197 in the dissolved Assemblies to the present 166. In Madhya Pradesh, with 58 seats, the BJP has won two less than it did earlier to emerge as the main opposition. In Rajasthan, the party has gained six seats and with its present strength of 38 seats will be the main opposition party. The DMKP's poorest showing has been in Himachal, where even the state party leader Shanta Kumar has been defeated. It has won seven as compared to 29 in the last House. In Bihar too, the BJP has lost ground, winning only 12 against 21 in the last Assembly. In Karnataka, where the BJP had played dirty tricks with the Janata government of R.K. Hegde, the people have given a rebuff to the BJP: only two of the 18 seats have been retained. (The Hegde government was formed with BJP support in 1983.) In Maharashtra, the BJP has won 13, one less than before. In Uttar Pradesh, the BJP has gained by five seats by winning 16 seats. In Gujarat too, the BJP has improved its position, winning two more seats, to gain 11. In Andhra Pradesh, with the support of NTR, the BJP has moved up from three to eight seats and in Orissa, where the party drew a blank last time, a token presence of one BJP member will be seen this time.

The Congress (Socialist), which is primarily a party of old Congress stalwarts of Maharashtra, Kerala and Assam, is the only national opposition party which has not fared well on a countrywide scale. With 44 seats, Sharad Pawar as the leader of PDF will be an effective opposition leader in Maharashtra. In Madhya Pradesh and Bihar, the party has won a seat each. In Bihar, after defections to the Congress(I) took place on a mass scale last year, the Congress(S) had been left with only a skeleton number, with former union minister Dharam Bir Sinha as the state unit president. The token victory will at least justify the existence of Sinha's party in the state.

Of the two Communist parties, the CPI(M) has gained ground in UP while losing badly in Bihar. It had no seats in the outgoing UP Assembly, now it has three. In Bihar, the party has one MLA, earlier it had six members in the Assembly. In Andhra Pradesh, it has more than doubled its presence: from five to 11. In Karnataka, it has two, one seat less than before. In Maharashtra, the status quo has been maintained with two seats and in Rajasthan the token presence of one has been retained. Altogether, the CPI(M) had 17 seats in these states before, now it has 20. In the case of the CPI, however, the results have not been heartening. From a total of 43 from seven of the states where polls were held, the party has 34 now. In Rajasthan, the party's token presence has been wiped out. It has improved its status in Karnataka marginally. In Bihar and Andhra, it has 11 seats each while in Maharashtra and Orissa the party has one member each and in UP it has won five seats.

Biju Patnaik (second from left) with Sharad Pawar (right) at a meeting

One party which had won many byelections in the last few years was Menaka Gandhi's Rashtriya Sanjay Manch (RSM). The party has been almost wiped out in these elections. The victory of Virendra Pratap Shahi in Gorakhpur district's Lakshmipur seat may put the RSM into the UP Assembly, but what cannot be ignored is that Shahi is a known mafia leader of his area and could have won the seat even as an independent. Menaka Gandhi's close lieutenant, Akbar Ahmed, who was a firebrand opposition personality in the UP Assembly after he left the Congress(I) when the RSM was formed, did not contest the elections this time. Menaka Gandhi has been totally eclipsed.

The major fallout of the elections has been that the poor showing of the ruling party, when compared to the Lok Sabha elections, has made the old guard in the Congress(I) optimistic. The induction of Harideo Joshi as the chief minister of Rajasthan is an indication of the revival of the old guard, which has moved on to the backbenches since the days of Sanjay Gandhi. The retention of the chief ministers in Orissa, MP, Gujarat, Maharashtra, Himachal, and UP shows that the party high command is not in a mood for major reshuffling in the states. The Karnataka debacle has emboldened the former chief minister and Congress(I) Working Committee member, R. Gundu Rao, to seek an emergent meeting of the CWC to discuss the results. There is talk about requisitioning a meeting of the AICC as well. The old guard, which had been slighted during the distribution of tickets in the Lok Sabha and Assembly polls, is now feeling emboldened. The Anti-Defection Act can hold together the legislators, but it will not affect the working of the organisational committees. These bodies, the PCCs and the AICC were not constituted by the present ruling elite. In the very first session of the eighth Lok Sabha, there was an occasion when 15 of the 18 speakers in a Parliamentary Party Meeting (on the Anti-Defection Bill) spoke critically of the official line. Inner-party democracy seems to be reviving in the Congress(I). The Assembly results have restored inner-party democracy in the Congress(I). Can there be a better proof of the maturity of the Indian electorate than the Sikkim, Andhra and Karnataka verdicts, which have shown the people's annoyance at the politics of defection and toppling? (In the Lok Sabha polls, in Jammu and Kashmir also the toppling game was rebuffed and Farooq Abdullah's party won.) Rajiv Gandhi's call for one-party rule in the centre and the states too has been rejected. The Indian electorate, apparently, cannot be taken for granted.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

ANDHRA PRADESH

A jubilant chief minister N. T Rama Rao termed his Telugu Desam Party's victorious return to power as "a people's victory" and it was indeed a resounding vote from the Telugu electorate to NTR against the defectors who had "stabbed him in the back" last year. The Telugu Desam Party won 202 seats in a House of 294 (elections for two constituencies were countermanded). The party had won the same number of seats in the 1983 Assembly elections when it first swept the polls to form the government in the state. The four opposition parties which had an electoral adjustment with the Telugu Desam improved their standing considerably.

For the Congress(I), the state Assembly elections proved even more disastrous than the 1983 elections, with its number falling to 49 seats in the Legislative Assembly from the 60 it had retained two years ago. Despite all indications to the contrary, the state party leadership persisted in pinning its hopes on the nine per cent increase in the votes during the Lok Sabha elections and the 75 Assembly segments where the party had got a higher margin of votes. There were pointers aplenty for the Congress(I) including the utter demoralisation among the party workers; 22 candidates refused to even file their nomination papers but the state leaders continued to advocate the point of view to the party high command that the Congress(I) had good chances of marginally increasing the number of seats it had in the dissolved Legislative Assembly. The party tried to project a fresh clean image by fielding new candidates for a majority of the seats it contested but failed to convince the electorate which rejected most of the new faces. For, it was the Congress stalwarts who won. The APCC(I) chief, Dr Y. S. Rajasekhar Reddy, retained his Pulivendla constituency with an impressive margin of over 30,000 votes but tendered his resignation from the APCC(I) yet another time, accepting the responsibility for his party's miserable showing at the polls.

The presence of the 222 candidates of the Democratic Telugu Desam Party (DTDP) led by Nadendla Bhaskara Rao had the effect of reminding the public of the dubious manner in which Mr Rama Rao's government had been ousted and Mr Bhaskara Rao installed as the chief minister with the help of the Congress(I). All the DTDP candidates with the sole exception of Bhaskara Rao lost their deposits, polling on an average less than 400 votes in each constituency. Mr Bhaskara Rao himself, while managing to retain his security deposit, lost to the sitting BJP MLA, Indrasena Reddy, by over 17,000 votes at Malakpet constituency in Hyderabad which he had chosen with great care. His hopes were based on the anticipated support of the minority community to be mobilised by the support of the Majlis-e-Ittehadul Musalmeen (MIM) and the large segment of state government employees. Of the 55 MLAs who had opted to support Bhaskara Rao in forming the ministry in August 1983, only one, V. Ram Bhupal Chowdhury, was elected at Kurnool constituency on the Congress(I) ticket; the rest lost at the polls.

The MIM, a poll ally of Bhaskara Rao's DTDP which had held five

Sriens India

N.T. Rama Rao

seats in the dissolved Legislative Assembly, lost one seat in Karwan constituency to the BJP candidate, who was supported by the Telugu Desam Party. Even the Rayalaseema Vimochana Samithi which had raised the highly emotional and sensitive issue of "justice for Rayalaseema region," could not make a dent in the unyielding support to the Telugu Desam Party. Dr Ramanna Reddy, the Samithi leader who had been elected from Proddatur constituency in 1983 on a Telugu Desam ticket, could not make any headway.

The non-Congress(I) vote was consolidated in favour of the Telugu Desam and its allies which increased its percentage of votes by 2.2 per cent. The consolidation resulted in the sharp reduction in the election of independent and rebel candidates. The CPI, CPI(M), the BJP and the Janata doubled the seats in the House having entered into a poll adjustment with the Telugu Desam. The BJP won eight of the ten seats it contested, the CPI won 11 seats out of 15, the CPI(M) 11 of the 12 constituencies it contested and the Janata Party raised its strength to two seats having fielded four candidates.

Shubha Singh, Hyderabad

ORISSA

The Congress(I) succeeded in repeating its 1980 performance of securing three-fourths majority in the 147 member Orissa Assembly, thanks to the half-hearted approach of the Janata Party to the elections Biju Patnaik depended more on a sympathy vote for his leadership than on any serious effort to strengthen the Janata machinery. After taking a lead in the campaigning over the Congress(I) at the initial stage, Biju Patnaik gave up the offensive and talked in terms of evoking sympathy, reminding the people of his past contributions to the state and his wish to devote "my last life to the service of the state." He did not move beyond his own Bhubaneswar constituency and a few other constituencies in Puri and Cuttack districts to campaign. Rather than his apparent overconfidence, he seemed to suffer from a sense of demoralisation born out of a few days of illness during the campaigning and a pitiable lack of resources compared to the unlimited money power of the ruling party. That Biju Patnaik had surrendered the battle before the polls was evident from his expression of surprise at the big margin of over 28,000 votes by which he won the Bhubaneswar seat.

The poll results have made Nandini Satpathy's political future still more uncertain since her Jagrat Orissa bagged only her own Dhenkanal seat and that of an independent backed by it as against the 85 seats the party contested. The CPI has been drubbed having won only one seat against its earlier strength of four. The CPI(M) and some other minor parties have again fared miserably. The BJP and the SUCI have won one seat each. The strength of the independents has fallen from ten to five but significantly includes two Congress(I) rebels. Despite the Congress(I)'s return to power with 117 seats and the maintenance of the status quo about the state's leadership under J.B. Patnaik, the CM's camp was haunted by uncertainty amidst reports that he would be changed in preference to some one more acceptable by the party high command.

Sarada P. Nanda, Bhubaneswar

UTTAR PRADESH

If for the ruling party the results of the Assembly polls mean the end of the sympathy wave, for the opposition they could also mean the opening of a new chapter. The combined strength of the opposition in the new 425-member UP Assembly (127 minus independents) is large enough to shatter the myth that there is no alternative to Congress rule even if the people want it. Ironically, after sweeping the Parliament polls, the Congress(I) lost its two-thirds majority in the previous Assembly where it had 309 out of 425 seats, getting merely 266 seats. All major opposition parties recovered from the disastrous slump in December 1984. The DMKP which had won only two parliamentary seats even managed to improve on its strength of 60 in the last Assembly to 86 now. The Janata got 19. the BJP 16 and the CPI six seats and all this with hardly any seat adjustments among them. Among the major Congress(I) reverses were the defeat of four ministers, one of them being K.P. Tiwari from Karchana (Allahabad) who had earlier been denied the party ticket for the parliamentary election to accommodate matinee idol Amitabh Bachchan. Mr Tiwari later blamed his defeat on his fellow-Congressman, Ashok Bajpai, son of UPCC(I) office-bearer, Rajendra Kumari Bajpai. He said that the SSP Allahabad, Uma Shankar Bajpai, had given free licence to his opponents to use stronghold tactics against him at the instance of Ashok Bajpai. From the pattern of victories and defeats, it is clear that the Congress(I)'s losses were not so much due to the ebb in the sympathy wave as its keenness to infuse new blood into its list of MLAs. Wherever a large number of sitting MLAs were denied tickets, the party lost on account of rebel activity. Even if the rebels had not openly contested against party candidates in many constituencies, they did work against the official nominees, notably the two Gorakhpur mafia dons Harishankar Tiwari (independent) and Veerendra Shahi (Rashtriya Sanjay Manch) who won.

Nirmal Mitra, Lucknow

MADHYA PRADESH

In the Madhya Pradesh Assembly elections, the Congress(I) got two-third majority after winning 250 seats, four more than what it did in 1980. But the victory has not been considered a remarkable feat on the part of the Congress(I). In comparison, the BJP has done fairly well after winning 58 seats, one less than it had in the last Assembly in 1980.

A new trend that has emerged in the recent Assembly elections is that the BJP and the Congress(I) have both made inroads in each others' stronghold. The Madhya Bharat region was once a bastion of the BJP and in 1980 the party won 34 seats from the region. But this time, however, it could win only 14 seats. The BJP's base in Indore, Ujjain, Mandsaur and Ratlam has been completely eroded. The BJP leader and leader of the opposition in the state Assembly, S.L. Patwa contested from two seats. Manasa and Bhojpur but he lost in Manasa. Three other prominent leaders of the BJP, Sheetala Sahai (East Lashker),

Arjun Singh

Satya Narain Jatia (Ujjain) and Vikram Verma (Dhar) also lost from the region. The only notable win for the BJP was the victory of the party's state president, Kailash Joshi who won from Bagli. The former chief minister of Madhya Pradesh, V.K. Saklecha, who left the BJP in November 1984, was defeated from Jawad (Mandsaur).

The Congress(I) received a setback in Indore where rebel candidate Suresh Seth defeated the Congress(I) nominee. Another rebel Congress(I) candidate, Kumar Mukhraj Singh won from Saraipalli. Mrs Saja Bhedia, wife of senior Congress(I) minister, J.L. Bhedia lost to an independent candidate supported by the labour leader of Chhatishgarh Shankar Guha Niyogi from Dandilohara in Durg district. The DMKP state unit president Ramashanker Singh, who joined the Congress(I) only in the last week of January, won from Ron constituency in Bhind district. The DMKP could not win a single seat, but the Janata Party did win five.

Jagmeet Uppal, Bhopal

HIMACHAL PRADESH

Bhajan Lal's formula that Himachal Pradesh should be merged with Punjab was opposed by the BJP to exploit the sentiments of the people of Himachal Pradesh for the elections. This was the main issue on which the BJP campaigned against the Congress(I). But when the campaign was in its peak, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi rejected the Bhajan Lal formula in an election meeting in Himachal Pradesh. The BJP's strategy soon started crumbling. The election results show the humiliating defeat for the BJP which was dreaming to form a government in the state.

The BJP was the main opponent of the Congress(I) and naturally it put in its efforts and energy for the Assembly elections. However, the BJP could win only seven seats: a comedown for the party which had 27 MLAs in the 68-member House. Barring three snow-bound constituencies—Lahul Spiti, Kinnar and Bhurmaour—where elections will take place on 25 May, out of 65 seats contested, the Congress(I) won 55 seats, 18 seats more than its strength in the last Assembly. The BJP won seven, the DMKP one and two seats were won by independent candidates.

BJP stalwarts like former chief minister and state unit president Shanta Kumar lost to the Congress(I) nominee from Sullah, his traditional seat since 1972. The BJP state unit vice-president Kishori Lal and former speaker Swaran Kumar also lost to the Congress(I) candidates. Janata Party leaders like Ranjit Singh and Shyama Sharma also lost.

Though the Congress(I) received a two-thirds majority, it suffered a setback in Jogindernagar constituency from where the former minister of state Gulab Singh was defeated by rebel candidate Ratan Lal.

Chief Minister Virbhadra Singh, popularly known as "Raja Sahab," won from his traditional seat Jubbal Kotkhai with a margin of more than 17,000 votes. Other prominent Congress(I) winners were HPCC(I) president Gian Chand Totu, transport minister Sat Mahajan, education minister Sant Ram, acting speaker Vijay Joshi, minister of state for health Vijayendra Singh and minister of state for law Rangila Ram Rao.

Jagmeet Uppal, Shimla

RAJASTHAN

The BJP, DMKP and Janata alliance has lost a golden chance to rule the state of Rajasthan. The opposition front in the state missed the opportunity of forming the government by a narrow margin. Unity and a little more effort on their part would have forced the Congress(I) to once again sit in the opposition as it did in 1977.

In sharp contrast to the Lok Sabha polls only two months ago, the Vidhan Sabha elections proved to be a nightmare for the ruling party in Rajasthan. It had captured all the 25 Lok Sabha seats with comfortable margins in 187 Assembly segments. Only in 13 segments could the opposition establish a lead over Congress(I) candidates. This time in the Assembly elections, the ruling party conceded defeat at the hands of the joint opposition in 85 Vidhan Sabha constituencies. In many others it escaped defeat by a slender margin. In all, it could capture only 113 seats. In two constituencies elections were countermanded due to the death of the candidates who were contesting. In the outgoing Vidhan Sabha, the Congress(I) had 150 seats and the opposition 50 seats.

The results of the Vidhan Sabha elections in the state have been baffling. Neither had the Congress(I) ever imagined such humiliation at the hands of the electorate only two months after a complete sweep by its candidates, nor had the opposition ever expecteu such a windfall. The former chief minister, Shiv Charan Mathur, had claimed he would capture at least 170 seats though his successor, Heera Lal Deopura, was not that optimistic. He had hoped to at least maintain the status quo by regaining 150 seats. The opposition, on the other hand, was completely demoralised.

Till 20 February 1985, the opposition seemed as if it was fighting an already lost battle. Man Singh's killing by the police in a fake encounter on 21 February in Deeg proved to be a shot in the arm for the opposition. As a result of the incident, the morale of the alliance suddenly shot up and the campaign, which had been hitherto defensive, turned offensive. But an analysis of the election results clearly shows that the Man Singh episode had little impact on the electorate.

The opposition leaders had declared before newsmen that in case they could get a majority in the Vidhan Sabha, Bhairon Singh Shekhawat would be their leader. Mr Shekhawat is the only opposition leader the ruling party is afraid of. He had been chief minister of the state for about three years during the Janata regime He has no charges of corruption against him. It is no secret that some overzealous opposition leaders do not like Mr Shekhawat as they know that his personality overshadows them. He thus proved to be a thorn in the eyes not only of the ruling party but some opposition leaders as well. Shekhawat took no chance and in a bid to not allow the ruling party to concentrate against him at one place, he contested from two constituencies: Amber in Jaipur district and Nimbahera in Chittorgarh district. He won from both the constituencies with big margins.

Milap Chand Dandia, Jaipur

GUJARAT

The Congress(I) chalked up a spectacular victory in the Gujarat Assembly elections, capturing an unprecedented 149 of the 182 seats in the House. However, the opposition cut a sorry figure: none of them could claim the status of a recognised opposition in the House, for which a party needs at least 17 seats. The Janata Party won 14 seats, the BJP romped home on 11 and the DMKP did not contest any seat on its symbol. The parties that drew a blank were the regional Doordarshi Party and the two Communist parties. Eight independents were also elected to the Assembly.

The victory was in a way an improvement on the performance of the Congress(I) in the December polls when it won 24 of the 26 Lok Sabha seats from Gujarat. At that time, the party was trailing in as many as 42 Assembly segments. Had the trend continued, the opposition should have bagged 42 seats at least Together, the anti-Congress forces won only 33 seats. The results showed that the ruling party still held its sway over the KHAM (Kshatriyas, Harijans, Adivasis and Muslims) vote banks, although the Congress(I) had not adhered to its 1980 strategy of selecting candidates mainly from these classes. All the reserved seats for the tribals and harijans went to the ruling party. Even the anti-reservation stir launched by students during the election campaign did not hold much water.

Madhavsinh Solanki

In 1980, the Congress(I) won 140 of the 182 seats in the Gujarat Assembly, setting an all-time record which has been shattered now The chief minister, Madhavsinh Solanki, attained the distinction of becoming the first man at the helm of the state since it came into being in 1960 to have completed an uninterrupted tenure. He capped it with his seventh consecutive victory in Bhadran constituency in Kaira district: the margin of victory over his Janata rival, Himatsinh Jadav, was more than 41,000 votes. Five of his cabinet colleagues also cruised to an easy victory. Also victorious were some of his closest allies in the fray, including Mahant Vijaydasji, president of the Gujarat Pradesh Congress(I) and Prof. Hasmukh Patel, general secretary of the party. The only major setback for the Congress(I) was in Morvi, where the BJP candidate, Amrut Aghara, trounced the vice-president of the GPCC(I), Jivraj Thoban, by a margin of 7,000 votes.

The ruling party swept the polls in south Gujarat, bagging all the 29 seats in the region. It lost 12 of the 52 seats in Saurashtra, one of the six seats in Kutch, 12 of the 52 seats in north Gujarat and eight of the 43 seats in central Gujarat. The speaker of the Gujarat Assembly and one of the few Congress(I) dissidents in the fray, Natwarlal Shah, also retained his Dhandhuka seat by a margin of more than 15,000 votes. But the deputy speaker and a Janata leader, Ramniklal Dhami, lost his Dhoraji seat to the Congress(I). Of the 23 Congress(I) rebels, including eight MLAs who were denied tickets by the party, only four managed to get elected. They were Karamsinh Makwana from Chotila, Ramsinh Solanki from Bayad, Laadhar Vaghela from Deesa and Shankerji Thakore from Kheralu. A number of prominent heads in the opposition have rolled. They include Makarand Desai, president of the BJP's Gujarat unit and a sitting MLA, Dalsukhbhai Godhani, leader of the Janata in the dissolved House, and Jaspal Singh, former police commissioner of Baroda, who contested as an independent, having been expelled from the BJP

Women played a key role in the elections: there were as many as 33 women candidates among the 1,137 contestants in the field. Ten of them, including nine belonging to the Congress(I), have won. They are: Kumudini Pancholi (Bhuj), Tameez Kureshi (Kalupur), Dr Gita Dakshini (Naroda), Kusum Khambhoja (Umreth), Shanta Makwana (Sojitra), Bharati Patel (Chikhli) and Savita Patel (Pardi). The lone opposition woman candidate to win was Champa Parmar of the Janata

A notable win by the opposition was that of former chief minister and now Janata leader, Chimanbhai Patel, from Unjha in north Gujarat. Pitted against two other candidates, Mr Patel romped home by a margin of 26,825 votes over his nearest Congress(I) rival, Mangaldas Patel. Mr Patel, who was returned to the House from Jamjodhpur in Saurashtra in 1980, shifted his constituency to Unjha this time, obviously in search of a safe seat

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

MAHARASHTRA

The re-election of Vasantdada Patil for a fourth term was possible only because of the Congress(I)'s slender majority of 162 seats in a house of 288. The results, for the first time, threw up the phenomenon of zero seat districts for the Congress(I). The party got none of the seven seats in Raigad, none of the 14 seats in Nasik and none of the three in Gadchiroli. While it has been wiped out of the three districts, the opposition, for the first time had seats in all districts, except one, Akola. In fact, not since the stormy days of the Samyukta Maharashtra movement has the opposition been returned in such large numbers in the Assembly. It may be recalled that when the state was formed in 1960 the then chief minister, Y.B. Chavan, had to induct members from the Peasants and Workers Party to get a majority because the Gujarat MLAs had gone to Gujarat

In the ruling party's traditional stronghold of western Maharashtra which is also the territory of Vasantdada Patil, the party was literally trounced: winning only 50 of the 111 seats. It is here that Rajiv Gandhi's policy of trying to break the stranglehold of cooperative capitalists or the sugar barons over the administration backfired on the Congress's electoral fortunes.

A confident Sharad Pawar and his lieutenants claim that it was a "Pawar wave" in rural Maharashtra together with the influence of the Shetkari Sanghatana, particularly in Nasik district, that gave the opposition PDF group its 103 seats. More significant is the fact that Sharad Pawar benefited from the Congress(I) discontent in direct proportion to the degree that the Congress lost. As he himself said, Rajiv Gandhi toured 18 districts and the Congress(I) lost in ten of them.

The chief minister allegedly got Premila Chavan's candidate. Vilas Patil, defeated in Karad South and also got several of the rebels who were close to him elected, like Dr Patangrao Kadam of Bilodi-Wangi, his close friend, Mr Balasaheb Throat, son of his friend Ramchandra Naikwadi of Walva and Sanjay Singh Gaekwad, nephew of Udaysing Gaekwad, his ardent follower in Shahuwadi. Party sources say that there was no charismatic state leader who could campaign for the ruling party candidates and counter the charges levelled by Sharad Pawar. The most common explanation for the party's poor showing in comparison with its counterpart in Gujarat, Rajasthan and Madhya Pradesh, is that the chief minister wanted a slender majority so that he could continue as chief minister. He saw to it that most of his men were elected (110) and for the rest he saw to it that those who could be a nuisance would be defeated. Earlier, he managed to see that potential rivals for the chief ministership (Hiray, Pratibha Patil and Niglankar Patil) were denied tickets. That speaker after speaker at the Congress Legislature Party mentioned the slender majority as a reason for dada's re-election reflects poorly on the confidence of a party that routed the opposition just two months ago in the Lok Sabha elections.

The Congress, which mopped up 51.55 per cent of votes in the Lok Sabha elections, saw its percentage plummet to 42 per cent while that of the opposition went up from 30 per cent to 37 per cent. The opposition, which secured a majority in only 66 Assembly segments in December, scored over the ruling party in 126 Assembly segments this time. The Shetkari Sanghatana, according to Congress(S) leader Anil Mehta, "was more effective this time as their activists were fielded on our tickets in one or two constituencies. This had a multiplier effect in Kalwan, Baglan, Nihpad and parts of Deolali in Nasik district."

Olga Tellis, Bombay

PONDICHERRY

Pondicherry was the exception to the rule as far as the voting pattern in the south went. While Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh drove out the Congress(I), Pondicherry welcomed the party after a lapse of 15 years. The AIADMK-Congress(I) alliance secured an absolute majority in the 30-member Assembly with the Congress(I) winning 15 of the 20 seats it contested and the AIADMK six of the ten it contested. The DMK has once again suffered a defeat by winning only five seats against the 22 it contested. Two seats were won by the Janata Party which contested the elections on its own and two seats went to independents: S. Ramaswamy, a former chief minister, and A. Soundararengan, an AIADMK rebel who defeated the official AIADMK candidate. The CPI which contested four seats and the CPI(M) which contested three seats have both been wiped out.

The combine was far ahead of the opposition parties at the time of the campaign. There was a bevy of crowd-attracting luminaries like Jayalalitha, Sivaji Ganesan and, of course, Rajiv Gandhi himself who brought in the votes for the AIADMK-Congress(I) alliance. The depleted opposition had only a tired Karunanidhi who spared no efforts to make a comeback in the union territory. The inevitable skirmishes between the DMK and the Janata and the final snapping of ties turned the voters against the opposition as topping the list of their priorities this time was a "stable government." What stood the Congress(I) in good stead were the impression that it would provide a strong, stable government, the good impression the PM has already made on the electorate and the choice of "right" candidates, respected persons with clean reputations. The affairs of the AIADMK were, however, mismanaged from the very start of the campaigning. The talks regarding the seat adjustments dragged on for days and at the end it was clear that the AIADMK had got a raw deal. The party bosses could certainly have bargained for a larger share of the seats. Compounding this, a number of wrong candidates were chosen, helping the DMK to defeat them in a few constituencies: the most notable example is, of course, the victory of the rebel AIADMK candidate A. Soundararengan.

Anita Pratap, Madras

SIKKIM

What the 1.55 lakh voters of the Himalayan state of Sikkim voted for is strident regionalism advocated by the Sikkim Sangram Parishad (SSP) rejecting the Congress(I)'s appeal to nationalism. In the process chief minister Nar Bahadur Bhandari romped home bagging 30 out of the 32 seats. He has formed an 11-member ministry with the promise of administration "with malice towards none," though the wound caused by the peremptory dismissal in May last year has made him a more wary man. He has kept his option of rejoining the Congress(I) open, a move welcomed by Delhi, though he would like the offer to come from the Congress(I). As he said in his post-victory press conference, he was in a position to consider whether the proposed terms would be beneficial for the people of Sikkim since the national parties often tried to suppress local aspirations.

Indeed Mr Bhandari's campaign plank was based on this "Congress(I) stigma." He projected himself as the protector of the identity of Sikkim and the Sikkimese people and a relentless crusader for their well-being. The electorate responded with so much zeal that the results were beyond his expectations. The Congress(I)'s efforts to counter this hills versus plains thrust by inducting party leaders from the North-eastern Coordination Committee made it even worse. The people had never seen these personalities and their speeches, mostly in Hindi, only reinforced their apprehension, prodded on unceasingly by Bhandari, that the whole charade bore ominous tidings. The only constituency where Bhandari's message was ignored was the capital town of Gangtok, the state's sole cosmopolitan centre where his wife, Dilkumari Bhandari, lost to the only plains candidate, Balchand Sarda. The responsibility of keeping the Congress(I) flag flying fell on a Bhutiya leader, Kaizang Gyatsho, who won the Kabi Tingda seat in north Sikkim. Among the notable Congress(I) leaders who were defeated were the two former chief ministers, Kazi Lhendup Dorji and Bhim Bahadur Gurung, and the newly inducted SPCC(I) president, Ram Chandra Poudyal, who resigned from this post after accepting moral responsibility for the party's debacle. The Janata Party had fielded 20 candidates, the CPI(M) two and the CPI one, most of whom lost their security deposits.

The Congress(I) leaders sought to explain the defeat by alleging that "in this illegal and unconstitutional election some 32,000 to 35,000 bogus voters and foreigners" had exercised their franchise and that they managed to include their names during intensive revision of electoral rolls. However, the party did not object to this earlier even though comparative analysis showed that in all the constituencies the strength of the electorate had gone up by about 1,000 votes. The North-eastern Coordination Committee is stated to have submitted a report to the high command seeking measures to get the election declared null and void by legal methods. Meanwhile, the SPCC(I) has settled down to the fate of starting from scratch. The Congress(I) is barely three months old in Sikkim, though it has always managed to rule the state through conversion of the winning regional parties as its unit.

Tapas Mukherjee, Gangtok

Narbahadur Bhandari

Bindeswari Dubey: new CM

BIHAR

The Congress(I) in Bihar has secured yet another mandate to continue in power for another term. However, the victory was nowhere as impressive as the one in December when the party had won 48 of the 54 Lok Sabha seats with a lead in 276 out of the 324 Assembly segments. In the Assembly elections, the Congress(I) barely managed to win 200 seats, conceding the rest to the opposition. But the opposition parties, individually, failed to gain much ground. In fact, the DMKP was the only party to have marginally improved its position compared to the 1980 Assembly elections (Chaudhury Charan Singh's party had then fought the elections as the Lok Dal). While the Janata Party managed to maintain its strength in the House, the CPI, CPI(M) and the BJP were the main losers.

The CPI's strength was reduced to 14 seats from the 23 seats it occupied in the previous House; the CPI(M)'s presence in the House will now be only symbolic with only one of the party's candidates, Ajit Sarkar, winning the elections; the BJP lost seven of the 21 seats it had held. The Janata Party won 12 seats: one more than its strength in the outgoing Assembly.

The Congress(I) would have fared much better in the elections had it not been for the fissures within the party. First, the supporters of the three people who vied for the chief ministership—Chandra Shekhar Singh, Bindeswari Dubey and Jagannath Mishra— harmed the interests of the party. As a member of the Congress(I) admitted, had the Anti-Defection Act not been there this government would have had a very fragile existence. Besides, a number of "rebel" candidates fought against the official Congress(I) candidates in the elections. Even though very few of them won the elections, they managed to cause an erosion of the Congress(I) votes which in turn helped the opposition parties. Congress leaders readily admit that left to itself the party may not have been able to form a government; it was Rajiv Gandhi's two trips to the state to campaign for his party that drew the votes. The "sympathy factor" seems to have worked again and women voted for the Congress(I) in large numbers. It remains to be seen whether the majority the Congress(I) has got is put to good use in administering the state and not frittered away by prolonging the tussle on the floor of the House.

Yuvaraj Ghimire, Patna

Rigging: A Way of Life in Bihar

In Bihar, polling time is also rigging time. It is not unusual to find children queueing up to cast false votes or armed musclemen arriving in jeeps to "capture" polling booths. Or, for that matter, Harijans cowering in fear, while the more powerful stamp the ballot papers on their behalf. Our photographer, K.M. Kishan, toured some constituencies to find out how the recent Assembly polls were conducted.

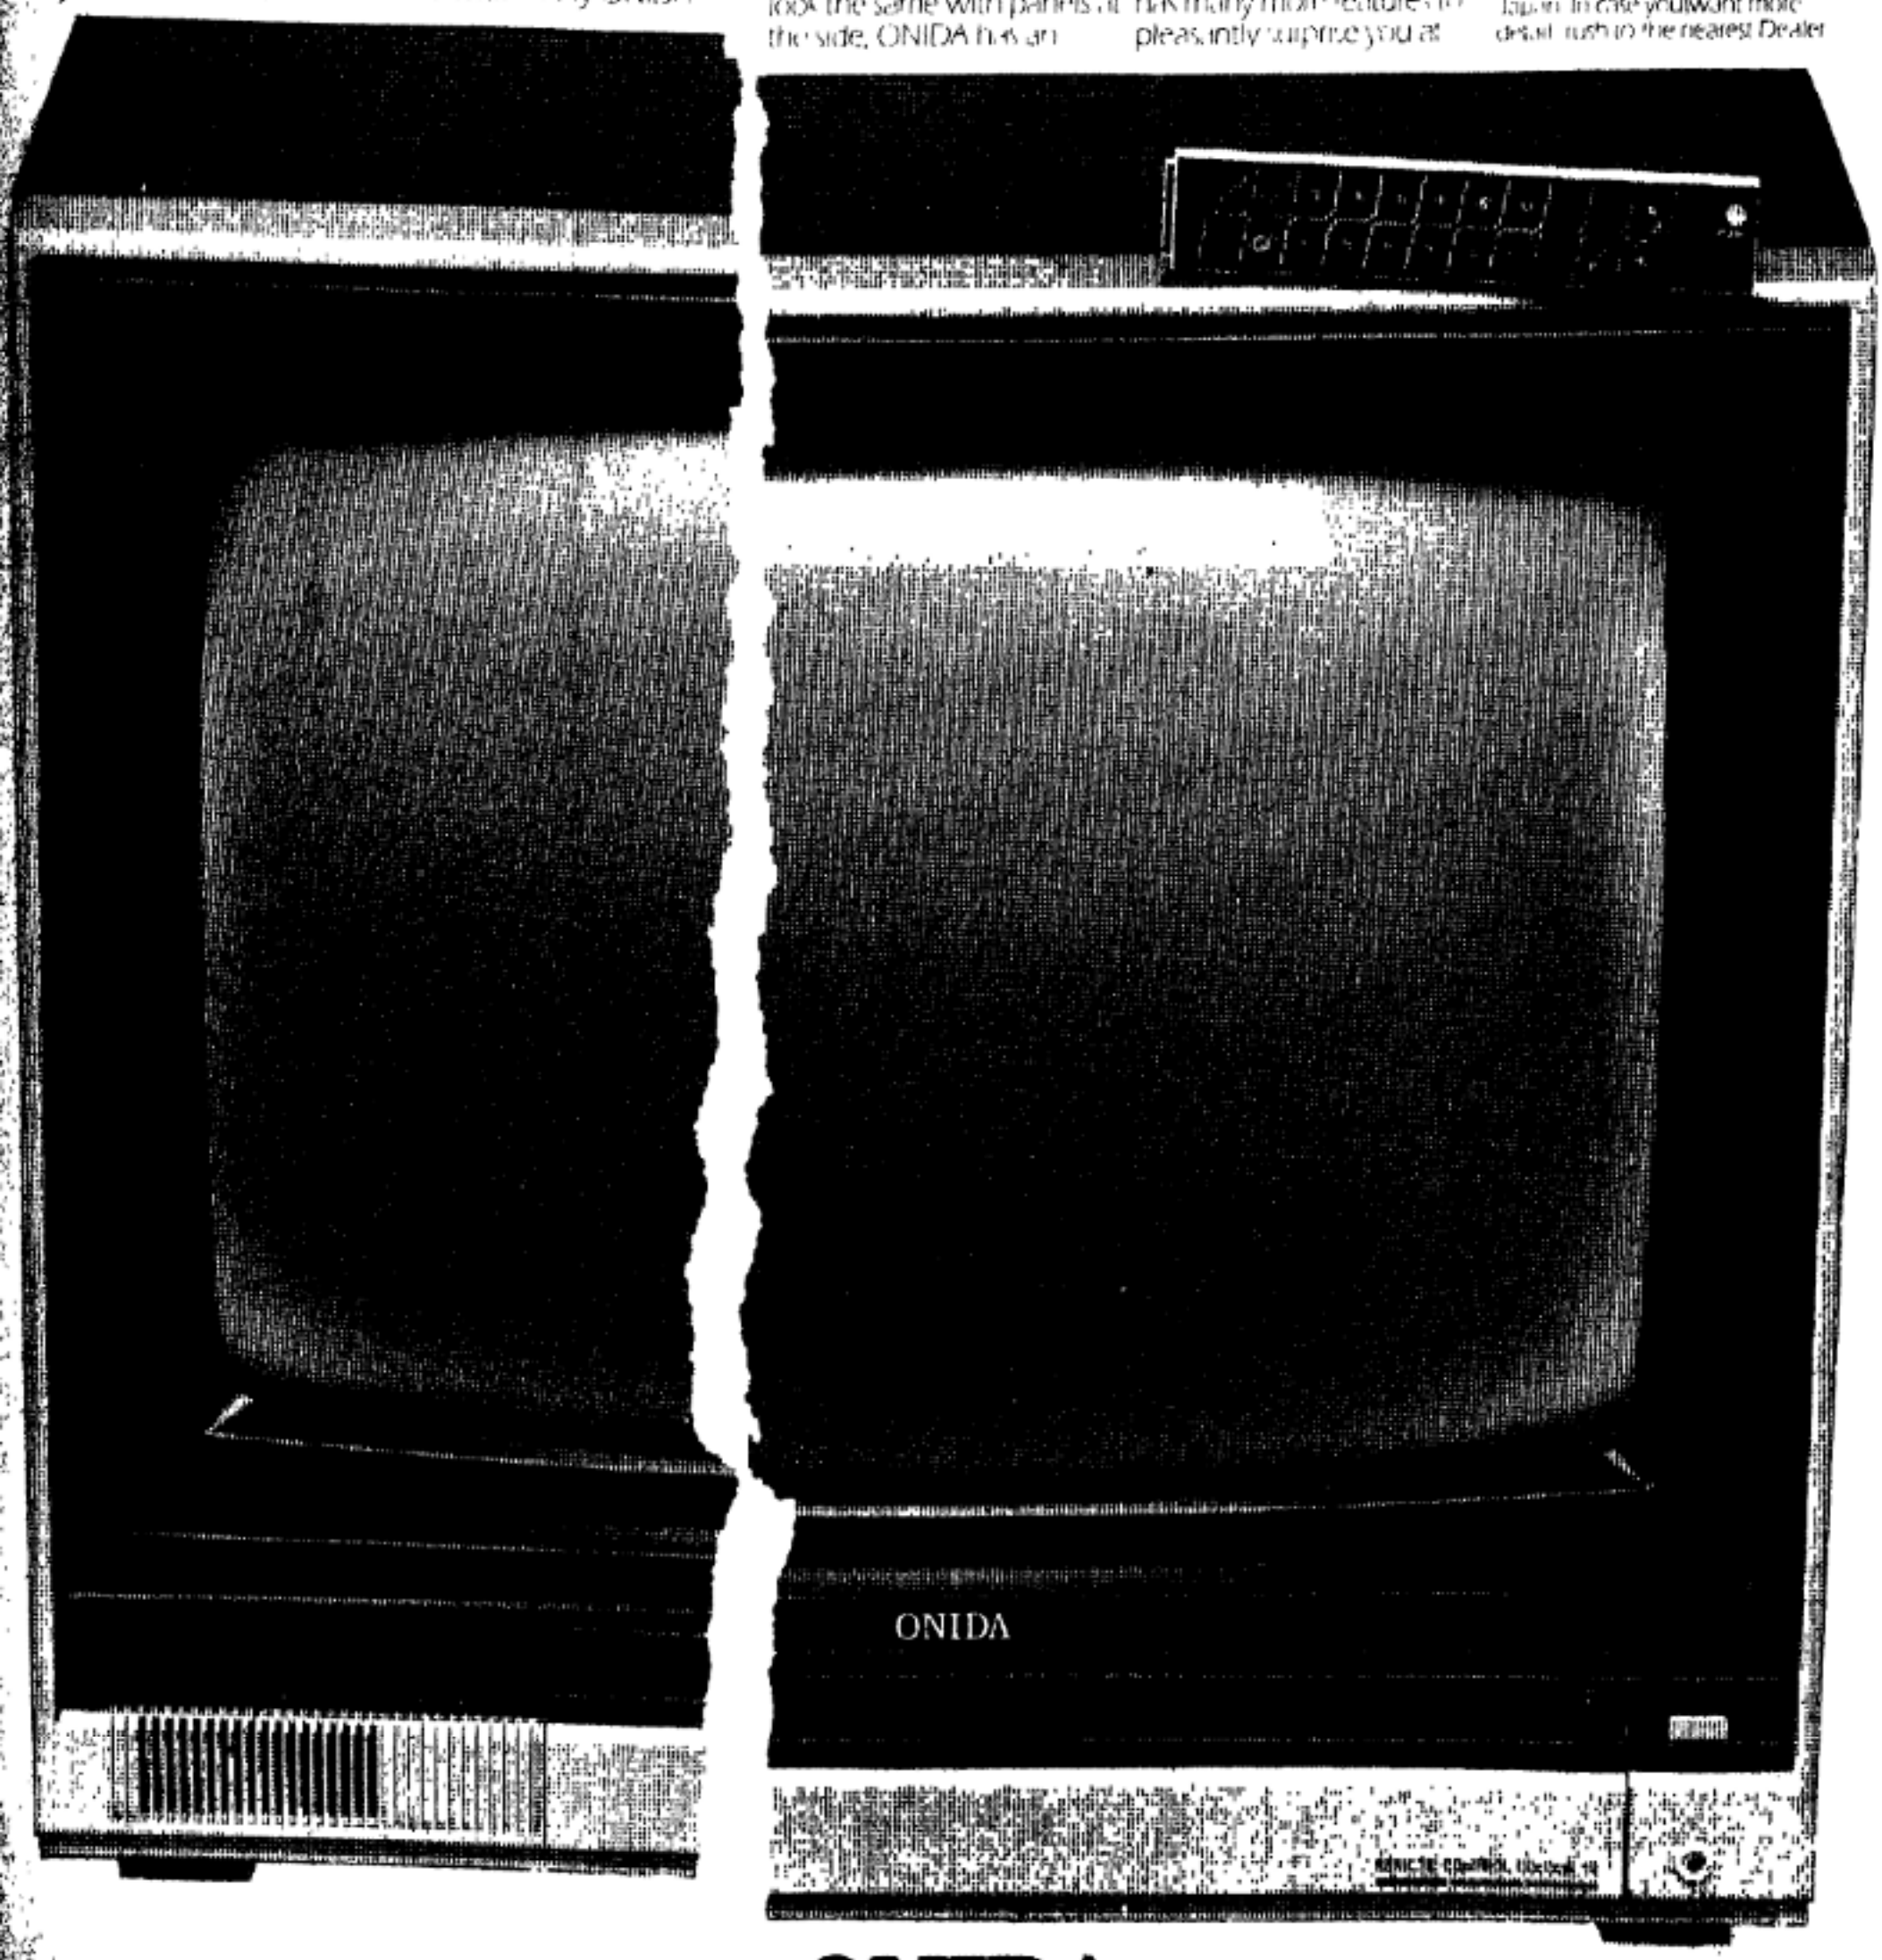
(Clockwise from bottom left) Voters, including children, displaying ballot papers outside a polling booth in Baktiyarpur; minor girls in saris waiting to cast their votes in Mokama; children voting in Baktiyarpur, Barh and Mokama Assembly constituencies,respectively; and children among eligible voters waiting to cast their votes in a Barh Assembly constituency booth

If you've already bought your colour TV, better don't read this ad!

Because this communication is exclusively for those who've been patient and discerning enough to have waited for the very best colour TV. For others, who've already bought the lesser brands, this ad could only lead to envy and frustration.

Because ONIDA holds the key to produce that pure white. Which no other colour TV can achieve! And any electronic engineer will tell you, this ensures the most natural reproduction of colour without any loss, distortion or variation.

Because only ONIDA has the touch-button, microprocessor controlled circuit for sleeker looks, easier operation, and most important, amazingly sharp pictures.



Because while all other colour TV sets continue to look the same with panels at the side, ONIDA has an obviously classy and futuristic design.

Because ONIDA has an Electronic Memory, for presetting channels and an on-screen display of channe and volume.

And because ONIDA has many more features to pleasantly surprise you at your nearest Dealer!

Now tell us, weren't we right about who should read this ad and who shouldn't?

ONIDA is the Authorized Service Centre of JVC, Japan. In case you want more detail, rush to the nearest Dealer.

20"colour TV with cord

ONIDA

less remote. It's been worth waiting!

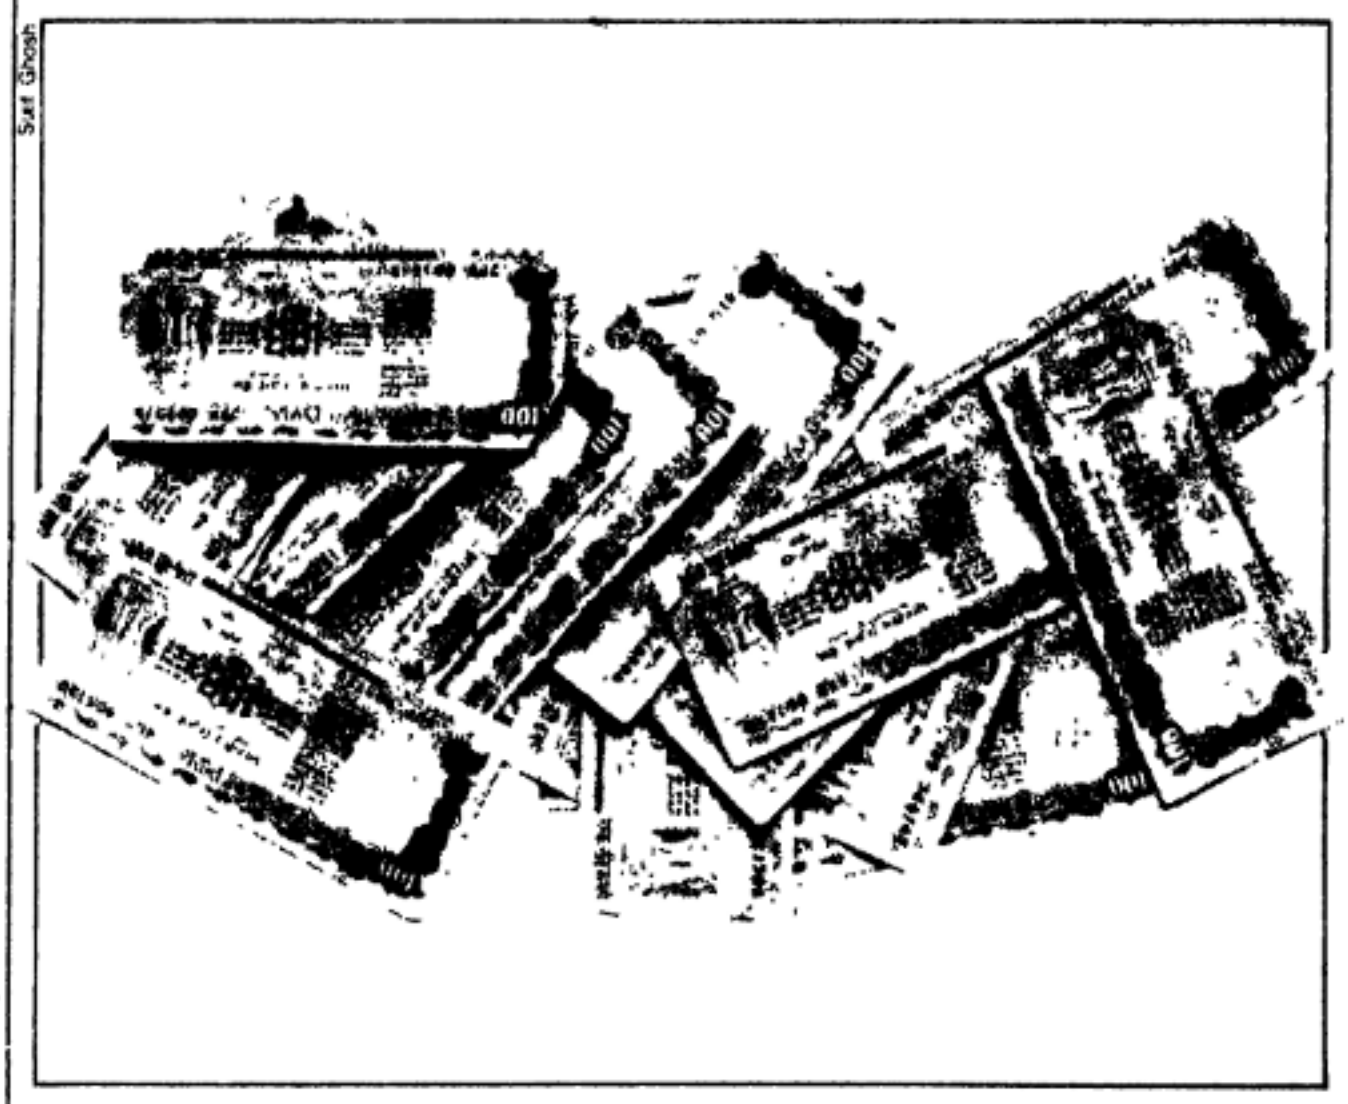
(Above) Children were among those who queued up to cast their votes at a booth in the Baktiyarpur Assembly constituency and (below) a ten-year-old boy prepares to cast his vote in the Barh Assembly constituency

Can Black Money Really be Wiped Out?

Ashok Lahiri of Delhi School of Economics examines the question

No Prime Minister of India has placed greater emphasis on cleanliness in administration, public life and economic activity than Mr Rajiv Gandhi. Ever since he assumed office, the media has carried reports of spies caught, the Anti-Defection Bill, bank chairmen dismissed and the proclamations by him and his party about the promise of clean set-upsin the states as well as the centre and of rigorous measures against black money. All this has led to the evolution of his nick name, "Mr Clean."

The question is: Can Mr Clean do it? Why the Indian voter swung the way he did in the eighth Lok Sabha elections still remains a debatable issue. However, even if the voter did not associate a cleaner set-up in the future with Mr Rajiv Gandhi's party while voting for it, there is no doubt about the fact that expectations have been raised about greater cleanliness in the near future. Will this expectation be fulfilled? The Prime Minister has even told the people: "You won't find me here next time if we fail to keep our promises."



There is no reason to doubt the earnestness of the Prime Minister and his supporting Members of Parliament. It is not difficult to catch spies, dismiss irresponsible bureaucrats at the top and prevent horse-trading in elected representatives of the people: problems of this sort can be solved by an earnest government and we expect that many of them will disappear. It is important to remember that the culprits in such cases are just a handful of people. However, the problem of black money involves a lot more people and is of a different magnitude altogether.

We have been aware of the existence of black money in this country for quite a long time; as early as 1936, the Ayers Committee recommended steps to stop the fraudulent evasion and legal avoidance of tax. However, it is only recently that we have started measuring how much of black money there is in the system, documenting the various ways in which it gets generated and analysing ways in which it can be controlled.

A question often raised is: How much of it is there? Black money by its very nature is something that is unreported and hidden. Consequently, estimating the size of the unaccounted economy is a hazardous task and it is difficult to come up with estimates which everyone would find acceptable. There have been more than half-a-dozen studies by economists in the past which have thrown up estimates varying between as low as roughly five per cent to as high as almost 50 per cent of the national income—one of the lowest so far being the one provided by the government-appointed Wanchoo Committee. The government has asked the National Institute of Public Finance and Policy to look into the problem of black money. The report is not yet available and we do expect to know a lot more about the parallel economy.

A necessary condition for generation of black money is the existence of taxation laws and controls. There are income taxes, excise duties, wealth tax, gift tax, import duties, etc: non-payment of such government levies lead to black income. Exchange control exists to preserve and use scarce foreign exchange for importing essentials such as petroleum and violation of such regulations by smuggling and invoice manipulations lead to black money. Price controls exist and have existed on commodities such as steel, cement and paper and violation of such controls and their sale in the black market compound the problem. The licensing system in the industrial sector leads to bribes, donations and speed money and generates black incomes. There cannot be any black money if there are no taxes, no controls, no regulatory interventions by the government.

The problem of black money exists almost in every organised society including even the Communist countries. For example, the problem of workers taking up activities in an unauthorised way has become quite acute in a country like Italy: the official labour force participation rate is going down whereas unofficial surveys suggest that it should be going up. The table is reproduced to give the reader an idea about the intensity of the problem. Though the problem of black money is a universal one, the degree or intensity of this problem differs from country to country. It depends on social and individual values, taxation and other laws, administrative efficiency and the political will to implement proclaimed government policies.

Sunil Ghosh

If there is conformity between individual and social perspectives, the problem of formulating laws and implementing them is minimal. The greater the divergence between the two, the more acute the problem of law enforcement. This truth has started to manifest itself in India in an increasingly apparent form in the sphere of economic laws. Aspirations have grown in a phenomenal way in post-independent India. Social norms regarding adequate compensations to bureaucrats, professionals and business managers, formulated by law-givers, such as the department of company affairs, pay commissions and such other authorities—which rule out coloured televisions, video cassette players, medical facilities at 'satisfactory' private nursing homes and accommodation in posh enclaves of metropolitan cities—are at loggerheads with the individual aspirations of a majority of the concerned persons. This is equally true for the entrepreneurial class as well: the returns considered to be just and satisfactory by the legal framework of society is far too low in the eyes of the entrepreneurs.

The divergence between the individual and social perspectives is perhaps partly due to the slow decay in the sense of involvement in national and social causes. That was perhaps inevitable given the height it achieved immediately prior to and after independence. Even in neighbouring People's Republic of China, the emphasis is more on individual incentives rather than commitment to the national cause. In India what strikes me most when I talk to a cross-section of bureaucrats, professionals, businessmen and managers is their emphasis and concern about the need for incentives and rationalisation. However, the proclaimed social perspective has not changed very much in the last three-and-a-half decades. We have, at the social level, kept on emphasising the role of commitment and socialistic values. How is it possible that the change in individual perspective has not been reflected in the social perspective? After all, the political elite, who are supposed to give leadership, has a close link with the bureaucrats, professionals, and business people and cannot think very differently from them. There are two reasons for this apparent anomaly. First, the Indian politician has believed it to be expedient not to change his proclaimed objective for catching votes and second, the system's reconciliation of the diverging trend between individual and social perspectives with the help of black money has been found to be quite a convenient solution for the politician himself as well as the bureaucrats, professionals and business people.

Survey of Extra-Mural Activities of Italian Civil Servants, 1980

	Per cent of total
Those with second job	54
Those often absent from duty because of few checks made	45
Those selling goods within ministries during working time	33
Those taking early or late holidays (and thus a larger holiday because of superior's absence at main holiday time)	30
Those available for small jobs outside in official working time	27
Those who hardly ever report for work because no checks made	19

(Reproduced from The Informal Economy by Adrian Smith in Lloyds Bank Review, July 1981.)

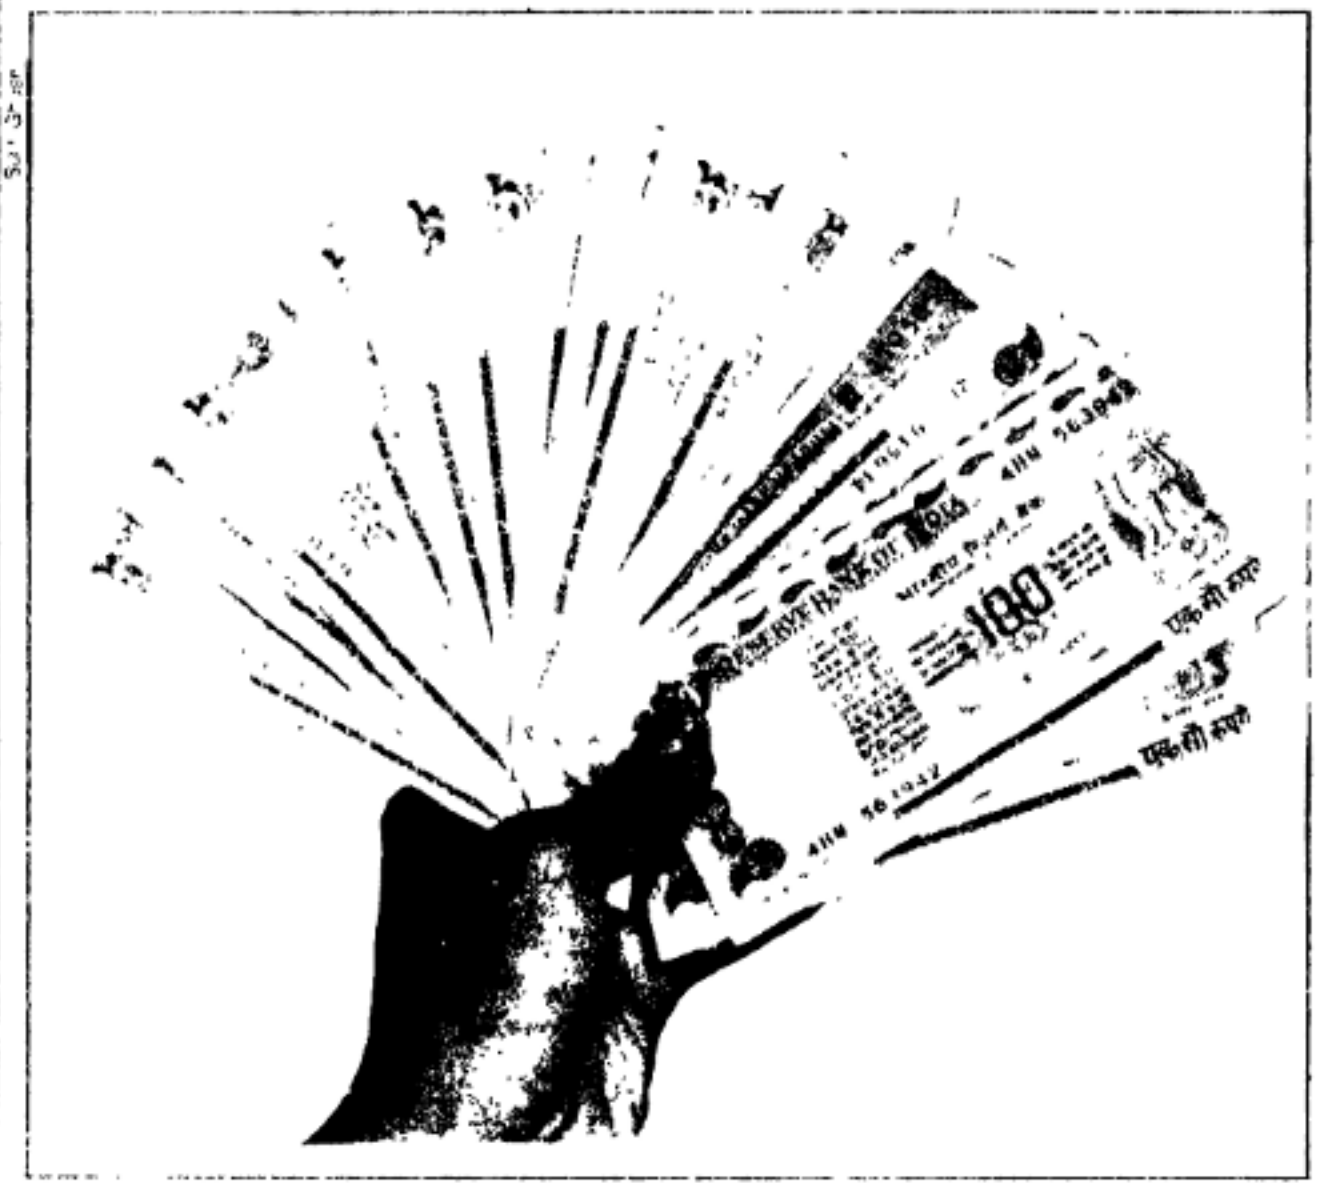
Black money by its very nature is something that is unreported and hidden. Consequently, estimating the size of the unaccounted money is a hazardous task and it is difficult to come up with estimates which everyone would find acceptable... A necessary condition for generation of black money is the existence of taxation laws and controls.

Though we do not know very much about what determines election outcomes in this country we do know a few things that perhaps do not have much of a bearing on the electoral fortunes of political parties. One of them is the manifesto brought out by a particular political party. This correspondent has started to doubt whether these manifestos are ever looked at after the election by the party when it is voted to power. Irrespective of that I continue to be a person who still takes the manifesto of a political party, brought out on the eve of the election, seriously. They do give you an inkling about the shape of things to come.



What struck this correspondent as the most spectacular thing in the Congress manifesto this time was the infrequent use of the term "'socialism." It was mentioned only twice: once in reminding us that Pandit Nehru, the builder of modern India, gave us the guiding principle of democracy, secularism, socialism and non-alignment and another time to claim, in the context of centre-state relations, that a strong centre is needed for directing the nation's endeavour for a social and economic order based on socialism. The manifesto, like those of the Janata Party and the Bharatiya Janata Party, does talk a lot more about removal of corruption and rationalisation of both direct and indirect taxes.

Have the political parties realised that the time has come to transform the proclaimed social perspective and bring it in line with individual perspective? Have they got the courage to admit that the public image that we would like to project and like everyone to have, cannot be sustained by the social institutions and administrative and legal machinery that we currently have? Are they bold enough to accept the fact that the very credibility of the system is getting eroded because of non-compliance by the people of the very many economic laws of the land? We do not know the answers to these questions.

We have to accept that there is a growing acceptance as well as encouragement of an attitude of indifference towards public obligation and responsibility. The black economy is becoming more visible and acceptable as increasing use is made of it. This is a dangerous trend. Let us set public goals and targets which are attainable. A great cleavage between proclaimed objectives and achievements undermines the credibility of the system. Let us examine our taxation laws, regulatory policies in the light of enforcability and the administrative and legal framework and whittle down our policies to bridge the gap between proclaimed targets and actual achievements.

This correspondent is aware of the dangers inherent in this recommendation How can we progress, if we set targets which are too easy to achieve? This danger is a real one and is faced by everyone of us in every walk of life. Good judgment is essential to ward this devil off. Nevertheless there is no point in setting targets which everyone believes will never be achieved and hence it is not achieved. The credibility of the government has got eroded to a considerable extent: let us try to restore it by setting targets which we are confident of achieving.

Let us have a look at the income-tax and laws and their working in this country. There are penal rates of 100-200 per cent applicable if concealment of income is proved by the income-tax authorities. There is provision for imprisonment also for being guilty of such a crime. How many cases are there where such penal rates have been applied or guilty people have been imprisoned? The Taxation Laws (Amendment) Act 1972, provides for acquisition of immovable property if the difference between the apparent price of a transaction and the fair market value is more than 15 per cent. How many cases are there of property which has actually been vested with the government? Does all this mean that there is no concealment of income or no transactions in real estate in terms of black money? We all know the answer to this question.

Economic theory tells us how tax evasion depends on the tax rate, exemption limit, the likelihood of detection, penal rates and other punishments applicable if tax evasion is detected. Elaborate models have been built taking all this as well as factors such as the adverse effect on one's reputation if proof of concealment is found. In framing our fiscal policy let us adjust these parameters to bring evasion down to a tolerable limit. Marginal adjustments will not suffice: given the administrative legal framework and the divergence between the individual and social perspectives we need major and drastic changes to bring the menace of black money down by any significant amount. This applies in an analogous way to the controls, regulatory measures and indirect taxes levied by the government. No discussion of fiscal policy can be carried out without reference to efficiency and incentives, revenue generation and distributive justice.

The black economy is regarded by some people as a natural reaction to events: a result of market forces. Nobel laureate Milton Friedman regards the black economy as an important safety net. Anyone with a profound faith in the efficacy of the invisible hand would do well to look at the black economy as an important corrective reaction to the subversion of market forces brought about by government intervention. This correspondent is not a great admirer of the invisible hand: he believes it has its strengths and it has its obvious limitations. An intervention can be very fruitful and productive at times. However, in the current social milieu many interventions and policies exist only in their proclamations and not in reality. A lot of resources is wasted away in rent-seeking activity. We voice our concern about brain-drain to developed countries of North America and Western Europe. It would be interesting to try to estimate the brain-drain to the profession of liaison officers and tax-consultants.

A policy which is not implemented and is ultimately circumvented by the system through speed money, corruption and bribery cannot be anything but inefficient. If taxes are brought down, will there be incentive to produce more? What will happen to tax revenues? In this context what has become extremely popular is the "Laffer curve." Professor Art Laffer of USA had pointed out several years ago that tax revenue would be zero if tax rate was 100 per cent and the same would be true if the rate is zero. Thus maximum revenue is achieved somewhere between zero and 100 per cent. One can study the relationship between the average tax rate and total tax revenue. However, economists unlike journalists are somewhat wary of the Laffer curve. According to them: "The Laffer curve is thought by some to have made its debut in a Washington restaurant and it should be taken in a similar after-dinner spirit." The question of what will happen to total output and tax-revenue depends on many considerations including the incentive effect—lower tax rate means greater returns for same amount of work—and the disincentive effect which is: lower amount of total taxes to pay thus lower amount of work is necessary. Which effect will dominate is not known apriori. Survey work by economists, in the UK and USA, has shown that a rise in the net wage via a cut in income-tax reduces hours of work at the bottom but leads to an increase higher up. A reduction in taxes in India is likely to bring about higher output because of the dominance of the incentive effect in so far as the tax payers are relatively better off, high income people.

The effect of a tax cut on tax revenue may also be salutary. This is because though the rate is lower, there will be better compliance, less evasion and perhaps a higher level of output. This undoubtedly would depend upon the exent of the tax cut. A judicious decrease in the tax rate may not necessarily lead to a decrease in the tax revenue of the government.

Many a suggestion on tax reform and decontrol flounders on the question of distributive justice. However, it is important to bear in mind the problem of evasion when analysing the merits and demerits of any reform measure. Theoretical analysis of the effect of a tax cut on income distribution clearly reveals that distributive justice in a society may actually improve because of a cut if compliance improves substantially. Let us not compare distributions which result from two different tax rates or control regimes on the assumption that all taxes are paid or all controls are observed, but the distributions which result after due adjustments have been made for evasions and non-compliance.

Is there anything in the political process in the country which has allowed the problem of black money to grow? A decentralised democratic process is perhaps the best check for such evils. What has perhaps vitiated the political process the most is the absence of inner party democracy. The political party bosses in our country wield a tremendous amount of power. They preselect most of our Members of Parliament and Assemblies. The non-compliance of laws and control measures and the consequent emergence of black money have benefited them in two ways: first, a profession which does not promise any ostensible source of good income has become a potential source of lucrative rewards and, second, the black money can be used to control the party machinery, rank and file and to some extent even the electorate. Though we do enjoy the right to form associations and political parties, it is not easy to safeguard the democratic process with all its checks and balances when the existing, entrenched parties with their vote banks are not in good health by forming new political parties. It is extremely important to restore inner party democracy within our major political parties. We are basically not dishonest or have an inherent preference for illegal transactions—let us grant to the rank and file of political

A decentralised democratic process is perhaps the best check on the evil of black money. What has perhaps vitiated the political process the most is the absence of inner party democracy. The political party bosses in our country wield a tremendous amount of power. The non-compliance of laws and control measures and the consequent emergence of black money have benefited them parties the right to elect their leaders and hence the preselected MPs and MLAs, just as we have granted our electorate the right to choose their ministers and parliamentarians. This in my opinion is the best safeguard for the non-recurrence of an evil such as black money in the future.

In the Congress election manifesto the term "socialism" was mentioned only twice: once in reminding us that Pandit Nehru, the builder of modern India, gave us the guiding principle of democracy, secularism, socialism and another time to claim, in the context of centre-state relations, that a strong centre is needed for directing the nation's endeavour for a social and economic order based on socialism.

What is the upshot of all this? This correspondent believes that we shall have to continue with our development planning and active government intervention for quite some time to come. As a result of growing divergence between individual and social perspectives, inadequate administrative and legal institutions, many public policy interventions in the fiscal, monetary and other fields are not getting implemented. This is eroding the credibility of the system and encouraging the growing apathy towards our responsibility to be honest law-abiding citizens. We cannot afford to let this process of erosion continue any more. Let us have laws, taxes and controls which we can effectively implement and do away with the others which we cannot.

Marginal adjustments here and there will not help very much. It has to be a drastic change from the existing set of policies to make everyone believe that we mean business. Announcement of concessional schemes such as Special Bearer Bonds or eradication measures such as demonetisation of currency notes of the denomination of Rs 1,000 has not achieved very much in the long run as it has not been accompanied by other measures which try to reduce the gap between individual and social perspectives to a level which can be handled by the existing legal-administrative machinery.

This correspondent has not talked about numbers such as the optimal tax rate or specific decontrol measures. He has only indicated the direction in which we should move. It is not very hard to do the necessary econometric exercises to obtain the relevant indicators. He believes that it is possible to whittle down taxes and controls—taxes which are not paid and controls that are not observed—without affecting government revenue, distributive justice and allocative efficiency adversely. Abolition of laws which are not complied with cannot harm anybody. On the other hand it will release resources which can be fruitfully utilised elsewhere.

The real problem with such proposals is that it will not be popular. Questions are bound to be raised about distributive justice and the lack of political will to implement the existing laws. Leaders often find it convenient to voice their determination about stricter implementation rather than telling people that certain laws cannot be implemented given the social attitude and the administrative and legal set-up. We shall have to wait and watch what the government proposes to do about the evil of black money.

Rajendra Sethia: A

It was a meteoric rise for Indian-born business tycoon Rajendra In a short span of a few years, Sethia placed his company in t empire crumbled and in February this year the High Court in pound sterling. Soon after a warrant of arrest was issued picked up by CBI sleuths on 1 March 1985 on charges of che he had borrowed astronomical sums of money. Why did th involved? Who were the top bank functionaries who were correspondents from Delhi and London piece

1 980: Rajendra Sethia is a shooting star in the business world of London. In the space of a couple of years the young managing director of Esal Commodities has placed his company's name in the top bracket of British export houses. His empire is spread over four continents. Esal and its subsidiaries are registered in England, the USA and Hong Kong; his commodity-trade has huge markets in Nigeria, Sudan, Zambia and other African countries. He himself lives in a plush two million sterling mansion in Hendon, North London, like a jet-setting baron. His future, they say, is very bright.

1985: The High Court in London declares Rajendra Sethia a bankrupt, in debt of 170 million pound sterling. Esal Commodities goes into liquidation. The flourishing empire suddenly crumbles, its owner becomes a fugitive from law. Rajendra Sethia's future takes a plunge.

18 February, 1985 was an important date for Rajendra Sethia. Things were going wrong for him almost in all respects. In London, the High Court declared him a bankrupt, a directive from the finance ministry in New Delhi axed S.L. Baluja and S.V. Sonalkar, chairmen of the Punjab National Bank and the Central Bank of India, respectively, with whom Sethia transacted a major part of his deals, and The Telegraph of Calcutta, SUNDAY's sister publication, published a report saying Sethia was hiding in the city. It was this report that eventually resulted in his sensational arrest by the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) on 1 March.

Since the beginning of the year, Sethia had made several trips to India and he is said to have met senior finance ministry officials in an effort to evolve a scheme for the payment of his dues. In late January he had spent time in the capital with legal and bank experts and later visited Calcutta and the holy town of Tirupati. Though his arrivals and departures in India were known to the CBI, the arrest took place only after the suspicions of the CBI were confirmed and after they were informed that the head offices of the three banks with whom Sethia had transactions had commenced internal enquiries against him

Sethia was arrested at 10.15 pm by the CBI outside the Maurya Sheraton Hotel, where he was occupying suite number 1589 with his mother. (By some strange coincidence, 1589 is numerologically the same as 1985 the year of Sethia's misfortunes. 1589 and 1985 are just different permutations of the same numerals.) He had booked into the hotel two days earlier and on 27 February had asked for an adjoining suite for two relatives, one of whom was his brother-in-law. The same day, the management of the hotel had been informed by the CBI that one of their guests would be picked up by them, and his movements should be regularly conveyed to them. CBI sleuths were posted outside the hotel gates and inside the foyer. The swoop on Sethia was set for the evening of 1 March.

On the fateful day, CBI detectives maintained a long vigil for Sethia. Till late in the evening Sethia was out of the hotel and the suspense continued. Sharp at 10.15 pm the target walked into the brightly lit hotel lobby unaware of the sleuths and was immediately arrested by the CBI. After examining the warrant of arrest in his name, Sethia quietly allowed himself to be escorted into a waiting Ambassador car and be taken to an undisclosed destination. A few minutes later the general manager of the hotel received a telephone call from the CBI informing him that the "job had been done." They also requested the hotel to convey to Sethia's mother in the suite that her son had been taken to a bungalow on Akbar Road for interrogation, which houses an intelligence outfit.

The following day, Rajendra Sethia was accused of being a "420." At 4.15 pm he was produced before the court of metropolitan magistrate K.C. Lohia and an FIR filed against him by the Central Investigation Unit II of the CBI. He was charged for offences under sections 120B (criminal conspiracy), 420 (cheating by impersonation), 467 (making false documents), 468 (forgery for the purpose of cheating) and section 471 (using of a forged document) of the Indian Penal Code. The FIR against

Rajendra Sethia

Sethia was filed by Yashwant Malhotra, SP, CIU II and A.K Malhotra, investigating officer in the case. The FIR read: "It has been reliably learnt that Shri Rajendra Sethia, an Indian national, now based at UK (London) is the managing director of the group of Esal Commodities, comprising various foreign firms. He, sometime during the year 1982-84 conspired with certain employees, namely Ashish Banerjee, now based at Calcutta and certain officials of the branches of Punjab National Bank, Union Bank of India, Central Bank of India and other institutions based at UK and some other countries to defraud those banks/institutions to the tune of millions of pounds sterling. In pursuance of the said criminal conspiracy, the aforesaid banks and certain institutions were dishonestly in-

Playboy's Plunder

Sethia.based in London,and his company,Esal Commodities. e top bracket of British export houses. But just as quickly, his ondon declared Sethia a bankrupt, in debt of 170 million y the British police but Sethia escaped to India only to be ing the London branches of three Indian banks from where banks lend Sethia the money? What were the irregularities and-in-glove with Sethia in his dubious dealings? SUNDAY ogether the intriguing story of Rajendra Sethia.

duced by Rajendra Sethia and his said associates to extend loans to the group of Esal Commodities to the extent aforesaid in respect of the alleged contracts with the Nigerian National Supply Corporation and other African bodies which did not have the sufficient foreign exchange reserve required prior to the grant of such loans. Such loans are reported to have been obtained on the strength of false representations regarding the value assets held by Rajendra Sethia to meet the amounts of the loans..."

Rajendra Sethia first began approaching Indian banks in London for loans towards the end of the Seventies when he had already branched off from his family business and launched his Esal Commodities Ltd.---quite a routine thing to do for the managing director of a company that was consistently multiplying its turnover and expanding its area of trade. But what happened in the subsequent years was to culminate in the exposure of one of the biggest banking scandals in recent times. Sethia's misadventures with banking finances led not only to his bankruptcy and arrest but also shook the Indian banking establishment. Between 1979 and 1983, the London branches of three Indian banks—the Punjab National Bank, the Central Bank of India and the Union Bank of India—lent as much as 170 million pounds sterling to Rajendra Sethia's Esal Commodities. The number of irregularities in these huge transactions is yet to be laid out in full. The twisting of Indian banking regulations, sidelining directives of the Bank of England which regulates the conduct of all banks in that country, misrepresentation of assets, illegal bills of lading—the Sethia affair has blown the lid off a stinking financial fraud.

Sethia's charm and powers of persuasion were not the only things that helped hatch the fraud and kept it floating for so long. Active collusion by bank officials both in England and in India supported the irregularities all through. What is more, the possibility of protection from top circles in the government of India cannot be ruled out. The Punjab National Bank, whose chairman S.L. Baluja has recently been sacked, was Rajendra Sethia's biggest lender, having given him approximately 100 million pounds. The scope for such a loan being clearly above the table never existed. For one thing, a loan of such magnitude is in contravention to the regulations laid down by the Bank of England itself. According to it, no bank should advance more than one per cent of its total capital and reserves. In the case of Punjab National Bank (as in the case of the other two banks), the loans amount to nearly four per cent of the total capital reserves.

Besides, Amarjit Singh, the London branch manager of the Punjab National Bank, who conducted most of the deals with Rajendra Sethia, has the distinction of having cleared at least a couple of Sethia's bills knowing full well that Esal Commodities' bonafides were not on sound ground. In one instance the Punjab National Bank discounted a bill from Esal to be paid in Nigeria, where Sethia had his major transactions. A telegram confirming the payment was also sent to London but the payment was never actually made. The telegram too was a fake. Even after this, Amarjit Singh went on discounting bills for Sethia.

Indeed, in a majority of the cases when bills were discounted for shipment of goods to Nigeria and other African countries, the goods were never actually sent. In a suit filed against Rajendra Sethia, the three Indian banks concerned and eight others on 31 January 1984, the solicitors of the Allied Arab Bank Ltd—the suitors—have complained: "Scarcely any cargo was loaded before 16 December 1983, the date of the bills of lading presented." Other bank officials were also involved: Vijay Kumar, a former assistant manager of the London branch of the Punjab National Bank and Jinendra Jain, a manager. Both were picked up by the fraud squad of the Scotland Yard on 19 December last year. The case of Vijay Kumar is intriguing. He is a man who, when in charge of the London branch of the Punjab National Bank in the absence of Amarjit Singh, gave the go-ahead to the last loan to Esal on 27 January 1984. Some months later, he resigned from the bank but just a couple of days before that, received two heavy drafts for US dollars 1,43,155 which he is supposed to have encashed himself in Switzerland. Only sometime later, he went on to join the firm of Mahendra Pujara as consultant. Pujara, a former waiter in one of London's Indian restaurants is, incidentally, also one of the major loanees of Indian banks in London.

The case of the Central Bank of India (although the extent of its loans to Sethia's Esal Commodities is much less) seems more interesting. Between 1980 and 1983 the Central Bank of India gave £ 34.5 million to the Esal group, most of which is said to have been cleared without proper securities and in violation of banking rules. The repayment of these dues was scheduled to have begun in June 1983. Till today the repayment has not begun. In February 1984 the Reserve Bank of India wrote a letter of complaint to the bank authorities as a result of which N.M. Valecha, the London manager of the bank was suspended. But instead of shelving the deals with Sethia and taking him to task, the Central Bank of India sought the cooperation of The Punjab National Bank and the Union Bank of India to raise Rs 15 crores to bail Sethia out of the financial mess he was in after the 1983 coup in Nigeria. It was a move that the Reserve Bank of India promptly aborted.

The Central Bank of India has been consistent in its irregular deals with Sethia. Year after year audit and inspection reports highlighted the irregular deals, and they were as often ignored till matters became too obvious to conceal. Touch and Ross and Company, the London auditors of the Central Bank had said in their 1980 report that about half the loans extended to Esal Commodities were irregular. "Of a total group loan of 2.8 million sterling only one million pounds appear to have legally enforceable security." This report, it is said, never reached the board of directors of the Central Bank of India. Again, in 1981-82, Touch and Ross made it clear that the loans being given to Esal were not in keeping with bank regulations. A year later the auditing firm put down its suspicions clearly on paper: "The total outstanding advances to the Esal group stood at pound sterling 34,543,756 and the total security was valued at 1,63,13,539 pounds." Immediately after this the Reserve Bank of India again wrote to the Central Bank saying that while the loans to Esal had leaped from 9.5 million pounds to 34.54 million pounds, the total securities offered by the company had declined from 16.31 million pounds to just 6.03 million pounds. Satisfacrory explanations to these queries were perhaps never given. How could they be given when top officials of the Central Bank of India were themselves giving out loans to Sethia without ascertaining the securities?

On 31 March 1982, the chairman of the Central Bank of India, S.V. Sonalkar, sanctioned a loan of approximately US dollars 15 million to Esal Commodities against guarantees of the Bank of Sudan. The repayment should have come in July 1983. It did not and the matter was not pursued further. Around the same time, B.R. Patankar, the deputy general manager of the London branch of the Central Bank of India sanctioned a loan of Rs eight crores to Rajendra Sethia. This was done just six weeks prior to his retirement on 31 May 1983 violating bank rules which clearly say that no officer can sanction loans less than six months before he is due to retire. What is more, the sanction limit of the London office is said to be Rs 7.5 lakhs. In case the amount of a loan exceeds that, prior permission of head office in Bombay has to be obtained. Yet this deal was made without it. Why did Sonalkar allow such irregularities to go unchecked?

All this, incidentally, was happening even after two investigating teams—one from the Reserve Bank of India and the other from the Central Bank of India—had visited London and filed their reports. Both teams found that there were irregularities in the Central Bank of India's London branch. In several cases of granting loans, top officials had depended on personal assessments and personal guarantees rather than on the proven assets of the loanees. The most glaring evidence of the Central Bank's collusion with Rajendra Sethia was, of course, the citation they accorded to the Esal group on 26 August 1982, which reads: "A private company dealing with us for about five years. Our experience of the dealings has always been satisfactory. The directors are respectable and satisfactory. The principal en-

The King of Fraud

Rajendra Sethia was a millionaire before he was thirty. Before he was 37, he became the world's youngest personal bankrupt—and the biggest. He beat the Hungarian-born London property tycoon, Willy Stern (who had gone bankrupt with debts of 104.4 million pound sterling in 1978). Sethia beat him by 68 million pounds and might soon replace Stern in the pages of the Guinness Book of World Records. Sethia likes to describe himself as a businessman. True. Only, he was too ambitious, too audacious. In the end he was simply duping and defrauding. If that is what "just another businessman" does, Sethia can definitely call himself one. He was born in a flourishing family of businessmen from Calcutta. His father Sohan Lal Sethia and uncle K.C. Sethia traded in jute in 1947. When Rajendra Sethia was 13 years old he went to the United Kingdom where the Sethias had already begun their business in 1940. The young Sethia was schooled in England after which he went to the London School of Economics for his graduation. All along he kept in touch with the family business.

Rajendra is the youngest of four brothers. The others are Umrao Singh Sethia, Ranjit Sethia and Nirmal Sethia. While the eldest still runs a business in Calcutta, the other three were looking after the family concern in London till the business split up in the late Seventies. Ranjit Sethia retained the family business, Nirmal Sethia opened an allied company called Sethia London Limited and Rajendra Sethia, always different from his other brothers, went his own way setting up Esal Commodities Limited which incidentally was named after the initials of his father Sohan Lal Sethia. ("S. L." became "Esal"). Esal was soon one of the many successful business enterprises in England, much ahead of the set-ups Rajendra Sethia's brothers were running. There is something about Rajendra Sethia: he is a man of irresistible charms and is only too ready to use them. People who have dealt with him speak of him as "a dynamic and aggressive man with a power of convincing people that few possess." Moreover, he was always prepared to lavish his riches on businessmen and officials alike. If they obliged him, he returned their favours. He hosted Indian bank officials in London, sent them on holidays to the United States, threw parties on the Boeing 707 that he bought for three-and-a-half million dollars and decorated at almost double the cost. Among the several luxuries that the aircraft possesses are a boardroom, several bedrooms, baths with golden taps, a sauna and a jacuzzi.

Sethia likes to live. He owns a two million pound mansion in Hendon, North London, which he calls the "White House" (he, in fact, had plans to buy more expensive accommodation despite being in such financial duress), and owns no less than 70 race-horses in stud farms all over the world. He is a passionate, compulsive gambler who frequents the West End casinos of London when he is not jetting across the world in his aircraft.

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

trepreneur, Mr Raj Sethia is a man of high integrity and substantial means. He commands respect and creditworthiness in the local market and abroad... In our opinion they may be considered good for all their normal business."

Soon after the Central Bank scandal had become well-known in banking circles, certain sections in the profession as well as in the government launched a campaign to have Sonalkar ousted after his three-year term expired in December 1983. However, Sonalkar continued to be the chairman, having first got a one-month extension and then a complete second term. His case was fully supported by none other than the then finance minister, Pranab Mukherjee. Today, when two chairmen have been unceremoniously removed, banking circles are beginning to question the role played by the top officials in the finance ministry and the Reserve Bank of India in the Sethia affair. "No doubt the two chairmen and some officials acted wrongly but what were the finance ministry and the Reserve Bank of India doing all this while?" asked one senior bank official in Delhi. He further pointed out that officers from both the finance ministry and the Reserve Bank of India were present in the board meetings of the concerned banks and they should have known what was happening. The Reserve Bank of India, on its part at least seems to have done something about the murky goings-on by conducting enquiries and seeking explanations from bank officials. But what was the finance ministry doing all this while? Why did Pranab Mukherjee, the then finance minister, not take any action in the matter. Why did not his ministry act upon the report that the Reserve Bank enquiry team had submitted after its visit to London in early 1983? Even as recently as 22 January 1985, the government seemed hesitant about disclosing the full facts of the Sethia case. In a reply to an unstarred question (number 187) raised in the Rajya Sabha by Suresh Kalmadi of the Congress(S) and two others, asking for details of the shady Sethia affair, the minister of state for finance, Janardhan Poojari, attempted to play down the name of Rajendra Sethia by saying that "no loans had been allowed in the personal name of Shri Rajendra Sethia." He, however, had to admit that the loans had been given to Esal Commodities but stressed again that "a major portion of the advances is covered by securities." The minister then went on to say that no further information could be disclosed on the matter. Why?

These are among the various questions which will remain unanswered till investigations into the case are complete. Only then will the ramifications and repurcussions of the Sethia scandal be known and the names of the various persons directly or indirectly involved in the irregularities of the Sethia case become public. At present, the investigations into the case have just begun and the CBI is confronted with solving one of the most important cases concerning an Indian living abroad. Not only this, investigations in the case have become more complicated with charges against Rajendra Sethia and his accomplices being filed in British courts.

Sethia (with beard) being led to the court

By sheer coincidence, the arrest of Rajendra Sethia in New Delhi took place at a time when Interpol was looking for Sethia for similar charges against him in London. Only a few hours before his eventual arrest, the Interpol headquarters had received an urgent telex message from London demanding his arrest. The telex message of the Interpol (number P/50/24731/Roy 3751/85) informed the Interpol in India that a warrant of arrest numbered 2644 had been issued at the Malbrough police station against an Indian by the name of Rajendra Sethia holding passport number U 553384 on 8 February 1984. Interpol also informed the New Delhi headquarters that Rajendra Sethia was occupying rooms 158 and 159 at the Maurya Sheraton Hotel in New Delhi and was likely to leave for the United States of America the same night. According to the message, which demanded that immediate action be taken on the case, Sethia was wanted for nine criminal charges registered in the UK, one of them with the Allied Arab Bank Limited. Though the Interpol authorities claim that the CBI arrested Sethia on receiving instructions from them, the CBI officials dealing with the case disclaim any connection between the charges against Sethia in India and those listed in the telex message of the Interpol. They explain that for CBI the only relevance of the case in India was the involvement of Indian bank officials in illegal transactions and the establishment of a prima facie case against Sethia which would be dealt with under Indian laws.

Once arrested and under police remand, a request was made by the British High Commission to deport Sethia to UK so that he could be tried there. As soon as the news of his detention was conveyed to Scotland Yard in London, they requested the Indian government for permission to extradite Sethia. On 5 March the British High Commissioner made a formal request for the same to the ministry of external affairs. Said a spokesman of the High Commission about the request made by them for deporting Sethia: "The British High Commissioner presented to the ministry of external affairs the request for the return to the UK of Mr Rajendra Sethia as a person who is accused of conspiracy to obtain pecuniary advantage for Esal Commodities Ltd by deception. A warrant had already been issued for his arrest in the UK and the text of that warrant together with the statement of facts has been conveyed to the Indian authorities." The spokesman said that the British High Commission had conveyed to the Indian government substantial proof of the nine charges faced by Sethia in the UK, which were satisfactory grounds for his extradition to that country. According to the spokesman, most of the nine charges against the accused amounted to "conspiracy to obtain pecuniary advantage by deception" and the offences will be charged under Section 16(1) of the Theft Act of 1968.

Chasing a Crooked Shadow

The Sethias of London, formerly of Calcutta, and of course Marwar, seemed to have developed a liaison with Scotland Yard, Britain's metropolitan police headquarters. Only last month two detectives of this department visited St. Lucia in the West Indies, to "interview" Narendra Sethia, an erstwhile British navy officer suspected of having stolen the logbook belonging to HMS Conqueror, the battleship that sank the Argentine vessel, General Belgrano, in rather controversial circumstances during the Falklands conflict. The bearded, young sailor denied the charge and the officers returned empty-handed. However, it appears that the fraud squad of the Yard have finally tracked down the long elusive, if not bigger fish, Narendra's first cousin Rajendra, who was arrested by the CBI in Delhi on 1 March following a request for this measure by the British authorities on 28 February.

For over a year now, a fraud charge has been hanging over Rajendra Sethia's head as a result of an accusation levelled against him by Allied Arab Bank in relation to a loan of 1.6 million US dollars obtained by his firm, Esal Commodities. Mr Sethia, in fact, reportedly escaped through a window when the fraud squad swooped down on his residence, and quit the country He has not returned to the United Kingdom since, and is known to have resumed his commodities trade in Spain, while continuing to look after his interests in the United States of America, where hotels are among his investments.

Meanwhile, two of Esal's directors were arrested (now released), and the company's operations out of the UK came to a standstill on grounds of bankruptcy and pending the successful passage of a rescue package of 45 million US dollars mooted by bankers-cum-creditors headed by the most heavily burdened Punjab National Bank (PNB). For the greater part of 1984, PNB fought a seemingly fruitful battle. Its proposals were carried with an overwhelming majority by the creditors, secured and unsecured, but the move failed to gain ratification in court. The few who opposed the granting of a new lease of life did so vehemently, and it was their voice that ultimately carried the day. The package was thus ruled unviable.

It is alleged by Esal executives that the most important point throughout the saga was PNB's refusal to secure Allied Arab Bank for the 1.6 million US dollar sum extracted from the latter, according to AAB, on false pretexts. But one also got the impression that an influential lobby was at work to destroy Rajendra Sethia. Technically the fraud charge was not a factor in deciding the outcome of the package, but at the same time it could well have weighed heavily on the mind of the judge concerned.

Mid-photo

Rajendra Sethia

Thus Esal went into liquidation and Mr Sethia started life anew with the knowledge that he had nothing to look forward to in Britain. In any case, he was a wanted man in this country—despite the fact that till date the investigators have been unable to formulate a formal charge against him in court, not to mention the release of his two directors. The United Kingdom does not have an extradition treaty with Spain, so it was understandable that no attempts were made to deport him from there. But Mr Sethia was frequently in the United States and his presence there could well have been taken advantage of. Indeed, if Scotland Yard was unaware of his trips to the USA, they could not have been taking his case too seriously.

But the Yard eventually caught up with him, and a presumably unsuspecting Rajendra Sethia was apprehended by the CBI. An extradition request has been sent to Delhi since, and it was also rumoured that detective inspector Brian Cooper, in-charge of the Sethia case, would soon be flying out to the Indian capital to facilitate the formalities. But a spokesman for Scotland Yard firmly denied that this was in the offing. Mr Sethia, unlike the majority of non-resident Indian businessmen in the UK, is an Indian citizen. He may have been based abroad for the greater part of his life, but that in no way dilutes his rights as an Indian national in the eyes of the Indian government.

Of course, even insiders in his old establishment in Britain admit that he may have been "technically guilty of forgery." But the fact that Scotland Yard has not made much headway in their pursuit to prosecute him cannot be ignored by the Indian authorities. Besides, none of the Indian banks have ever accused him of fraud, and indeed, have tried their level best to save him with the approval of the Reserve Bank of India, and probably also the union finance ministry. Thus, it has somewhat surprised Britain's business community that the Indian government, despite its goodwill for Britain and its commitment to Interpol, should have bent over backwards to please Whitehall. Is there a trade-off in this? And if so, is Sethia the scapegoat? But one circle is unabashedly pleased: Britain's sugar lobby, which once ruled this area of world trade, but which, due to the aggressive methods of Rajendra Sethia, had been reduced to picking the crumbs.

Rajendra Sethia's troubles began in the latter half of 1983, when Nigeria and Sudan, which had been supplied enormous quantities of sugar by Esal Commodities, pleaded inability to pay for the consignments because of the tight foreign exchange situation in the two countries. Mr Sethia's plight was further aggravated by the military coup in Nigeria, although it was later gathered that he had succeeded in coaxing both governments concerned to honour their debts, albeit not immediately. A large proportion of the business carried out with Sudan was, however, insured with Lloyds of London.

Ashis Ray, London

The request for the extradition of Sethia added a new dimension to the case. Since Sethia was a wanted person in another country, he could not be detained in India unless substantive charges against him could be filed here. In any event, in the six days following his arrest and preceding the renewal of the police remand, the CBI officials attempted to collect as much evidence against Sethia as possible so that they could try him in Indian courts. In the six days which the CBI investigating officers had to interrogate Sethia, they are believed to have collected ample evidence against him by which they can appeal to the courts to permit him to be tried in Indian courts under Indian laws. According to CBI sources, the officials dealing with the case had before them five trunkloads of documents concerning the various bank transactions entered into by Sethia and Esal Commodities. From their contacts in London and various bank officials in India, the CBI has now before it the monumental task of scrutinising and examining thousands of papers relevant to the case, before they can formulate their evidence against Sethia.

Sethia himself has been under constant watch and has faced hours of interrogation by Yashwant Malhotra and A. K. Malhotra at the office of the CBI situated at Lok Nayak Bhavan in south Delhi. Contrary to reports that Sethia has been subjected to third degree torture at a high-security interrogation room, CBI officials disclosed that the interrogation of the accused had been conducted through informal questioning and conversation at the CBI office itself. Sethia was occupying a room on the seventh floor of the Lok Nayak Bhavan office, near Khan Market, meant for interviewing those in police custody.

The plea that has been made by Sethia during the course of his interrogation is that he should be given an opportunity to pay back his creditors. He has pleaded that he was in fact in the country to meet various government officials in an attempt to pay back his loans. The same plea was made by the counsels of Sethia, Gurdial Singh and R. K. Khanna, in the court of the metropolitan magistrate on 8 March when Sethia appeared before the court for the second time. Moving an application for their client's bail, the lawyers explained that in February 1984, several meetings were held between Esal and the London branches of the three Indian banks to evolve a scheme for full payment to all creditors within a period of two years. A steering committee had also been formed, headed by high officials of the three banks, in an attempt to pay back the enormous sums of money owed by Sethia.

On the second day of hearing at the court, Sethia himself guided his lawyers at several points during the course of the argument. Nevertheless, his application for release on bail was rejected by the magistrate and he was further remanded to police custody for five days. When the second part of Sethia's remand is complete, the CBI will be under compulsion to issue a chargesheet of offences against him, or else release him on bail. Said one of the CBI officials investigating the case: "There is no question of him (Sethia) being released on bail. As his prosecutors, we will see to it that we have substantial charges against him in India, before we can allow him to be tried elsewhere." He also pointed out that since the charges filed against Sethia in the FIR are for cheating, forgery and using of false documents, in case of Sethia even paying back all his loans to the various institutions, he would still be liable to imprisonment for at least five years. Under Section 4 of the India Penal Code, any Indian who is charged with an offence committed outside the country can be tried in Indian courts.

The most incriminating piece of evidence recovered by the CBI team against Sethia is the fact that he was in possession of a false passport and air ticket issued on a false name, both of which were recovered within hours of his arrest. The passport was discovered by the CBI when they searched suite number 1589 of Maurya Sheraton which Sethia had been occupying. The passport (number W 900509) which had the photograph and signatures of Rajendra Sethia, alias "Raj Kumar Dugar" are now the most damaging evidence against Sethia. Seized along with the passport were letters of introduction given by Dugar for an air ticket and visiting cards in the same name. Once these documents were in the hands of the CBI, they were quick to locate an air ticket from the travel agency of the Maurya Hotel, Travel House Private Limited. The Swissair ticket was valid for a passage from either Calcutta Delhi-Bombay to Cairo-Geneva-New York and back. "Dugar" was, according to the ticket, scheduled to leave the country the next day, only a few hours before he was arrested. Had Sethia boarded the Swissair flight as "R. K. Dugar," he would probably have been out of the country for a long, long time as his visa was valid for the USA, Egypt, Switzerland and France. Had the CBI decided to swoop down a little later, Sethia could have flown. Now Sethia is facing trial in the Indian courts. The British want him extradited. The credibility of the Indian banking institutions is at its lowest ebb. Surprisingly, till 22 January 1985 ministers were trying to mislead the Parliament on the Sethia issue. Only a probe revealing the extent of the fraud can resurrect the image of Indian banks abroad.

Ritu Sarin and Sankarshan Thakur, Delhi

Protection From a Politician?

Did Pranab Mukherjee, former union finance minister, know about the irregular deals of the three Indian banks in London with expatriate Indian businessmen? Did he bless their murky transactions with Rajendra Sethia? While these questions are being asked in New Delhi by people including some top officials and bank union leaders, business and press circles in London already seem sure about Pranab Mukherjee's role in the entire affair. From comments in the British press it would seem that the "protection of Pranab Mukherjee to Sethia" was common knowledge there. Commenting on Sethia's flight to India after he was declared bankrupt by the London High Court, Robert Tyerman wrote in the Daily Telegraph of London: "Ever the optimist even today, Sethia has lately been to try his luck with the new Indian government of Rajiv Gandhi...but his chances do not look all that good. Rajiv Gandhi removed his previous finance minister Pranab Mukherjee after his sweeping election victory. It is far from clear now many friends at court Sethia now has." Another London newspaper echoed similar thoughts: "...Indian business circles are dubious about his chances (of making up with the Indian government) more so after the fall from power of Pranab Mukherjee. As finance minister Mr Mukherjee was in overall charge of the banks when the large loans were made." It said

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

A Period of Fear and Uncertainty

During the third week of January, when the air was thick with the news of arrests of a number of personal assistants in Delhi in the now-famous spy case, there was an inter-ministerial meeting called by the secretary of a ministry in his capacity as the chairman of the Indo-Polish Trade Coordination Committee. Though a big conference room with comfortable upholstered chairs was available, the secretary was unwilling to leave his own room and hold the meeting there. In his room, around an oval-shaped table, about 30 officers from various ministries sat for discussions The only reason for all this was soon clear. The telephones, including the Rashtrapati Bhawan exchange (RAX) phone, were in that room and the secretary was afraid of receiving a sudden call from "high up" to move over to some other department, or worse, go back to the state. In the ministry of commerce, industrial development, department of mines—you name it—the discussions frequently centred round who was about to leave, who had already handed over charge pending posting and so on. Even taking leave for a day or two became a risky affair, since the rumour mills started spinning out stories about the person on leave.

This was the beginning of a period of uncertainty and fear in the minds of the bureaucrats in Delhi. The situation persists even today. There is no one, neither the secretary to the Prime Minister, nor the cabinet secretary, nor the minister in charge of the department of personnel who can, either formally, or at least informally, say what it is all about. There has always been a procedure and a period of time in the year, for postings, transfers and replacements to and from Delhi, keeping in view the personal convenience of the officers concerned, the budget session of Parliament and so on. Nobody felt a creeping fear about that. But the secrecy, the sudden announcement, the slant of the news and the serving of the official order indicating posting—all these have truly ushered in the Orwellian era in the top echelons of administration in the capital of the country.

Soon after the personal assistant was taken into custody, M. C. Sarin, secretary, defence production, met the cabinet secretary and wished to proceed on leave preparatory to retirement, accepting moral responsibility like Dr Alexander. He was to retire on 31 May next. He was told not to get unduly worked up over the matter and carry on as usual. Yet, within a fortnight, he was sent for by the same cabinet secretary and told to proceed on leave at once. This received due publicity in the media. J. S. Baijal, additional secretary, economic affairs, was talking to a friend one evening before going home. Belonging to the 1954 IAS batch from Orissa he hoped to be secretary in a ministry soon. He came to Delhi in December 1981 on a normal tenure of five years. He got a call from the minister in charge of personnel. Hoping to hear the good news, he went to see the minister with a beaming face but returned soon after, looking crushed. Like Sarin, he was also told to take leave at once and then get back to the state. Again, there was instant publicity in the media. Everyone knows that the Orwellian eye is watching everyone in Delhi. Added to that, such decisions as in the case of Sarin and Baijal have really shaken the little confidence the top bureaucrats had in themselves, their colleagues and their subordinates. Today, there is an air of total mistrust amongst the officials and others in Delhi.

Everyone knows that the Orwellian eye is watching everyone in Delhi. Added to that, such decisions as in the case of M.C. Sarin and J.S. Baijal have really shaken the little confidence the top bureaucrats had in themselves, their colleagues and subordinates. Today, there is an air of total mistrust amongst the officials in Delhi.

In classical economic theory, it was Adam Smith who talked about a hidden hand, balancing the demand and supply position in a perfect market in free competition. But there is no mention of a hidden hand in the classical theories of political science even by Prof. Sabine, balancing the functions of the executive in administration of the government. By now it is quite clear that there is a sledge hammer approach in ordering the shifting of the top bureaucrats—and the accompanying wide publicity in the media—in Delhi. There is a hidden hand which is guiding the course of events in the government with near perfection by generating fear. It is unique that the same hidden hand is also determining the selection of top people according to its own analysis and judgment. How else do we explain finding out B. B. Bhora, retired five years ago as secretary, environment, to be appointed as the chairman of the advisory board on energy, in the vacancy caused by the resignation of K. C. Pant? Bhora is not an expert on energy, whatever might be his other excellent credentials. There are quite a few internationally famous Indian experts on energy who have served in various government committees with distinction. More curious was the way the incumbent for the post of chairman, Union Public Service Commission (UPSC) was found. It was known that Dr Sahare would leave his post on 16 February, as the UPSC charter does not permit any second term for the chairman. One sitting member of the UPSC approached a friend through a friend to talk to Mohammad Yunus, chairman, Trade Fair Authority of India (TFAI) to recommend him to the Prime Minister for the post. Mohammad Yunus could not say 'no' to that friend, although he did not know the UPSC member. Neither did he meet the prospective candidate for chairman. Meanwhile, another member of the UPSC started pulling strings, on the basis of his past (and unpleasant experience) at the state public service commission. At one point of time, one denounced the other in the bargain. B. G. Mathur, who retired as secretary, department of rehabilitation, in April 1984 but was still living in his official residence, tried his luck through common friends. In the mean time, U. C. Agarwal, secretary, personnel (recently transferred as OSD in the cabinet secretariat), who was to prepare the proposal well in time, listing out the probable incumbents, for seeking approval of the appointment committee of the cabinet, thought it appropriate to put his own name for

In classical economic theory, it was Adam Smith who talked about a hidden hand, balancing the demand and supply position in a perfect market. But there is no mention of a hidden hand in the classical theories of political science... balancing the functions of the executive in administration the post of the UPSC chairman. He is to retire in November and this post is for a period of six years. So, instead of making any proposals, Agarwal started doing the rounds recommending himself to the cabinet secretary, the minister in charge of personnel and so on. When P. K. Kaul's appointment as cabinet secretary was approved, Agarwal post-haste carried the official order personally to Kaul and gently reminded him of his own candidature. But admirable were the ways of the hidden hand, which picked up H. K. L. Capoor, who had retired as the chief secretary, Gujarat, more than a decade ago. He became the all-powerful establishment officer in Delhi, to become the chairman, UPSC. just in time.

When radio and TV announced in the evening news that a large number of secretaries had been moved around, none of the top bureaucrats in Delhi had any clue as to who was going where. The earlier practice of informing both the outgoing and the new incumbent of the change came through a telephone call from the cabinet secretary. Perhaps, because P. K. Kaul was new to his job, he could not follow tradition. A day after the announcement, all the newspapers carried the names of the secretaries along with the ministries mentioned against each. Four secretaries found themselves reverted to the states. The government orders came after two days. Obviously, detailed copies of the transfers and postings had been prepared first to be released to the press and for the information of the public. It was a reassuring message to the countrymen that in one sweep 32 top bureaucrats could be shuffled as in a pack of cards. The era of red tape was over

According to the Civil List of IAS officers as on 1 January 1984, of the four secretaries reverted to their respective states, S. P. Mukherjee, secretary, agriculture, came to Delhi in September 1973; C. R. Vaidyanathan came from Bihar on 15 December 1982 as secretary, health and family planning; R. K. Sastry came from Rajasthan on 9 November 1982 as secretary, department of official languages, after a stint as the director, Lal Bahadur Shastri Academy of Administration, Mussoorie, and K. N. Singh came from IA and AS on 29 October 1982 as secretary, department of revenue. Though Mr Mukherjee had stayed long, others did not even complete their stay for five years. Further, after becoming the secretary to the government of India, no one has reverted to the state, except during the rule of the Janata government, when Ajit Majumdar, then secretary, expenditure and Dr P. C. Alexander, then secretary, commerce, were sent back to Bihar and Karnataka, respectively. Both promptly resigned and went away to Washington and Geneva on foreign assignments. If the reversion to the states is on the ground of inefficiency in performance, then a serious question comes up. The appointments committee of the cabinet is chaired by the Prime Minister, with the home minister and the minister in charge of personnel being the other two members. Besides, there is a complete procedure of review of at least five years' performance as reflected in the service record of the officers concerned before any appointment is cleared from the rank of joint secretary and above, in the government of India. This is specially so in the case of the appointment of a secretary to a ministry. His entire background is gone through before such a selection is made. Does it then mean that these four secretaries who were suddenly reverted to their states were not properly selected by the appointments committee of the cabinet or someone probably felt that they had become inefficient with the passage of time after becoming secretaries to the government of India?

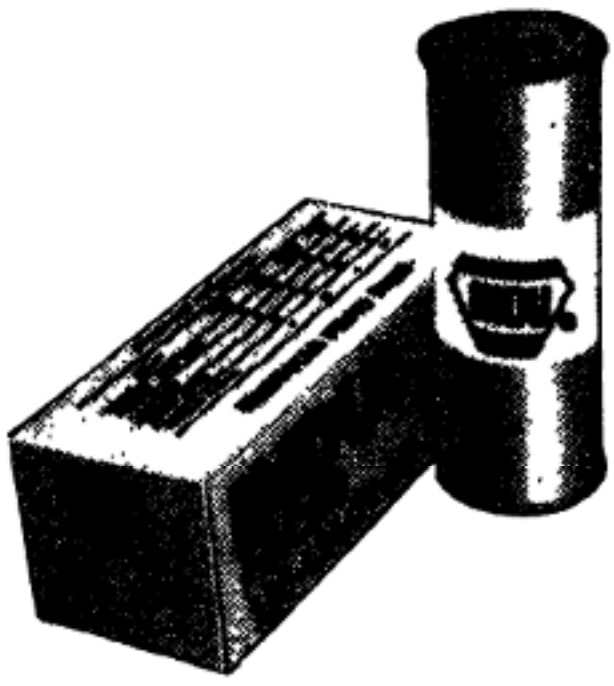
Within a fortnight of the appointment of P. K. Kaul as the cabinet secretary and changing 32 secretaries in one sweep, the entire system of

There was a time young officers from the states looked forward to a posting in Delhi with a view to gaining experience in a wider area of administration...Not so anymore. To take up a post in Delhi leaving behind the familiar environment in the state, has become next to a nightmare for an officer.

seniority in service, cadre management, rules of tenure of appointment in the government of India and so on have come to an end. As Kaul superseded 17 officers, the same situation has arisen in the case of selection of secretaries also. A few out of 32 secretaries do not belong to the IAS. Among the IAS officers, the last incumbent, T. U. Vijayasekharan belongs to the Orissa cadre from the 1955 batch and occupies 175th position in the Combined Civil List. He has been in Delhi since December 1979. It is now anybody's guess as to how many have been bypassed while

"And keep off ice creams, chocolates, cold drinks ..."

Random memories. Life is full of them. Memories of happiness, love, pride and fun. Fleeting moments that you just have to capture. They can happen any time. They may not happen again.



Take a picture.

In black and white.

Only black and wnite pictures don't fade for years and years.

Keep the pictures in the family album.

Later, you can share your memories. And relive the happy times.

Capture the moment

INDU

Indu Roll Film and Bromides

Sista's.HPF 290 84 B

making such a long list of promotions. Therefore, it does not seem necessary any longer to maintain with meticulous care a combined list of officers in order of seniority in service. A. S. Gill has already gone on leave while Mohinder Singh, suddenly shifted as OSD in the cabinet secretariat, must be finding it a little awkward to serve under Kaul, a few rungs junior in service, on the eve of his retirement in July. Another superseded officer, V. B. Eshwaran, till now member-secretary, advisory board on energy, has also quit, though he is to retire on 30 June next year.

The immediate fallout would be in the states, where quite a few new departments will be set up quickly to post such senior officers returning suddenly from Delhi. No wonder, a few state governments have already thought of such a situation perhaps because a few retired chief secretaries and the like, close to the political masters there, have been holding these posts for so long. There are already such distinguished posts as that of chairman of corporations like the oilseed growers' corporation, the fish seed growers' corporation, the milk producers' corporation, etc. These officers, who have been sent back to their states, are on the last legs of the careers and would not even raise a protest at whatever they are given on the eve of retirement.

There was a time young officers from the states looked forward to a posting in Delhi with a view to gaining experience in a wider area of administration. The beautiful city itself with excellent educational institutions was sufficient attraction for the family. It was also known as to how long the period of stay in Delhi would be, according to the nature of posting. Not so any more. To take up a post in Delhi leaving behind the familiar environment in the state, has become next to a nightmare for an officer. On arrival, even as a joint secretary, for at least a year, there is absolutely no possibility of getting a small transit apartment to stay with the family. So, after living in a three-bed-roomed house with a lawn, servant's quarters, garage, etc. in the state, the officer suddenly finds himself by force of circumstances to stay with the family of some relations, about 30 km away from office and travelling morning and evening by public bus. Those who are reluctant to stay with relations, take on rent a roof-top one-room accommodation as that is what he can afford with his modest pay. Neither in the normal course nor through any VIP recommendation is it possible to get the children admitted in any school. Throughout the year in every class in every school, it is full: at least this is the reply one gets on enquiry. The situation at the office too has become uncertain not only because of swift and sudden political directions but also suspicion amongst colleagues and subordinates as a result of inter-service rivalry.

An important question, therefore, arises as to how the tenure rules (of IAS officers) came into operation and what purpose they serve. Leaving aside the personal difficulties every officer faces, today if the central government does not like an officer he is just sent away to the state. What purpose does it serve except causing resentment among them ?

The total number of officers in the IAS now are a little over 3,000. The kind of situation experienced by the vagaries of tenure rules is faced by no more than 500 to 600 officers; others manage to stay in the state for the best part of their career. With the family life and the children's education practically shattered, these officers seem rootless. At least, under similar situations, the IFS officers, about one-third the number of IAS officers, are allowed to admit their children in a boarding school abroad with the government meeting the expenses. They have a sprawling transit hostel in Delhi where an officer can stay for many months till he gets regular accommodation.

An important question, therefore, arises as to how the tenure rules came into operation and what purpose do they serve. Leaving aside the personal difficulties every officer faces, while moving to and fro, today if the central government does not like an officer he is just sent away to the state. What purpose does it serve except causing resentment among them and eroding efficiency? For more than two decades, a full-fledged department of administrative reforms under the government of India has existed. It has done nothing to look into such real-life problems. From time to time it only examines on ways of cutting out paperwork by advising various ministries to standardise the size of the files, shorten the notings and take important decisions at lower levels of the government. At the same time, the assistants from the Central Secretariat Service, have continued throughout their career in Delhi only They remain undisturbed in their family lives, often forming an old boys' network in every ministry right up to the rank of joint secretaries. In the present situation, surcharged with suspicion and packing off a number of senior IAS officers, there is a subtle move to man all the secretariat posts up to the level of secretary, if possible, by the Central Secretariat Service alone. With the experience of working up the ladder from the ranks of assistants and PAs, this looks like the administrative structure the government will follow in the near future. At least, through the back door, administrative reform is going to take some shape after all, mercifully sparing the IAS officers to settle down at the state level.

There is a hidden hand which is guiding the course of events in the government with near perfection by generating fear. It is unique that the same hidden hand is also determining the selection of top people according to its own analysis and judgement.

A Special Correspondent

PUNJAB

Akali Leaders Released

Hope for negotiated settlement of Punjab problem

With the release on 11 March 1985 of the Akali Dal chief Harchand Singh Longowal and seven other Akali leaders held under detention for the last nine months under the National Security Act, the Punjab crisis enters a new phase, heralding perhaps a bitter struggle for the Akali leadership.

The fact that the government did not in its unilateral decision to release the Akali leaders—following two days of meetings of the cabinet sub committee headed by union minister, Mr S.B. Chavan—order the release of Gurcharan Singh Tohra, president of the Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC) and Mr Prakash Singh Badal, the "moderate" former chief minister of Punjab is of considerable significance. Either the government would not like to negotiate a settlement with these two leaders, particularly with Mr Badal, who was arrested for having burned Article 25 of the Constitution of India or the two Akali leaders themselves did not want to be released and they feel that the longer the stay in jail the more their reputations would be enhanced.

It will certainly be a difficult task for the released leaders who will have to steer a careful course between the angry masses in Punjab and the government. Many Sikhs do not want any settlement with the government unless all those arrested following the army action are released, the special courts withdrawn and an official inquiry into the riots after the assassination of Mrs Indira Gandhi initiated. Besides the Akali Dal chief, those released are Jagdev Singh Talwandi, Surjit Singh Barnala, a former union minister, Atma Singh, Randhir Singh Cheema, Ujjagar Singh Sekhawan, Dalip Singh Pandhi and Baldev Singh Brar. While the five high priests have welcomed the government's gesture, Major Singh Yuboke, former SGPC general secretary has reiterated that no solution was possible until the release of those arrested following the army action in the Golden Temple. The acting president of the SGPC, Prem Singh Lalpura, however, has refused to comment.

The home minister Mr S.B. Chavan in his hurriedly-called press conference on 11 March said that the decision had been taken without consulting any of the detained top Akali leaders. Mr Chavan expressed the hope that this "gesture" would help to create a better environment for a negotiated settlement of the Punjab problem. In his press conference he also announced the decision to introduce legislation in Parliament to enable the confiscation of property in India of non-resident persons of Indian origin who were indulging in terorrist and anti-national activities. The Prime Minister, Mr Rajiv Gandhi, who presided over the meeting on 11 March had in his campaign speeches consistently said that top priority would be given to solving the Punjab problem within a constitutional framework after the Assembly elections.

Harchand Singh Longowal

The government's decision comes two days before the budget session of Parliament. What could also have precipitated the government's decision is the reported ultimatum given to the government by the Akali Dal and the SGPC in its resolution passed at Anandpur Sahib on 8 March. Mr R.V. Subramanian, senior adviser to the Punjab government who was on a tour of Gurdaspur was summoned to New Delhi by the ministry of home affairs on 10 March.

The move to release the Akali leaders has been welcomed by the opposition leadership. The Janata Party president Mr Chandra Shekhar said that the release of the Akali leaders was a "correct step" and hoped that the dialogue on the Punjab problem would be "without preconditions." He also asked for the early release of women and children arrested after Operation Bluestar as well as those against whom there are no specific charges. Mr H.N. Bahuguna, the DMKP leader said, "I hope that this will be the starting point for a rapprochement. It should not be impossible to find a solution to all the problems."

The decision was also hailed by the Akali Dal (Master Tara Singh group) and other opposition leaders. But most leaders appeared by bewildered by the government's decision of not releasing Badal and Tohra. According to Mr Harkishen Singh Surjeet, the CPI(M) leader, there was no reason why Mr Badal and Mr Tohra should not have been released because they stood for the unity of the country. There should be a clear demarcation between extremists who sought "Khalistan" and those leaders who were for unity, he said.

The cabinet sub committee headed by the home minister is comprised of union defence minister, Mr P.V. Narasimha Rao and union minister for education, Mr K.C. Pant. Also present at the meeting were union home secretary Mr R.D. Pradhan, Punjab chief secretary, Mr S.S. Danoa and Mr Subramanian. The Prime Minister who consulted chief ministers of various states, both of the Congress(I) and the opposition on the Punjab issue, had asked the cabinet sub-committee to formulate proposals to solve the Punjab crisis before the budget session of Parliament. It is quite probable that the government had come to the conclusion that Akali leaders were not interested in a negotiated settlement nor were the moderates among the Sikh leadership able to make the Akali leaders change their mind. The government's gesture could also be a step to alienate terrorists from the Sikh masses.

Meanwhile the situation in Punjab continues to be tense with more and more Sikh youths wearing saffron turbans and the women, saffron duppatas, in protest against the government's handling of the Punjab situation. The Akali leadership has over the last few months become increasingly isolated from the Sikh youth.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

PUNJAB

More Fire-power for the Police

Policemen to be armed with sophisticated weapons

Morale-building, and an increase in fire-power and strength of the shattered police force in the state remains the most important task of the state government in post-Bhindranwale Punjab. The state administration has now decided to arm the state police with self-loading rifles, sten carbines, and high calibre revolvers and create commando units as strike forces for anti-terrorist activity. These strike force units will be located at each of the five dozen sub-divisional headquarters, under superintendents of police at the district headquarters and one each with every battalion of the Punjab Armed Police.

The directorate of the state police, headed by the director-general of police, K.S Dhillon now has six inspector generals and scores of DIGs. The new inspector generals of police under Dhillon are IG crime, H.S Randhawa, IG intelligence and security, M.C. Trikha, IG administration, D.S. Mangat, IG Punjab Armed Police and anti-terrorist activity, K.P.S. Sandhu. Two other IGs head the state home guards and computers and the wireless systems. A new post of DI counter-espionage has been created to keep a vigil on activities in Pakistan and the Indo-Pak border. The former DIG Jalandhar Range, Surjit Singh, who was involved in intelligence work both with the state police and Intelligence Bureau has joined as DIG counter-espionage in the intelligence and security wing at the state headquarters. Having been DIG Jalandhar Range, for over three years now, Surjit Singh is an expert on terrorists as the terrorist-infested areas in the Gurdaspur and Amritsar border belts fell under his immediate charge. Another young officer Sital Das who had also acquired a lot of experience in dealing with terrorists has been promoted and posted as police chief of Ferozepur district

Under the new measure, all the police stations would have telephones and a modernised wireless system. Police stations would also be equipped with motor cycles and other fast means of transportation. If the central government permits, which in all likelihood it is expected to do, the special task forces and commando units would also be equipped with self loading rifles and light machine guns to reduce reliance on para military forces like the Central Reserve Police and Border Security Force.

To make a particular officer answerable for the failure or success of their commando actions, they are being given special men so that the excuse of lack of forces or requisite materials do not come in the way of swift and result-oriented actions. These special units will be created from the Punjab Armed Police units and the fresh recruitments made recently would undergo intensive training in the use of weapons and commando tactics.

All these measures were initiated on the recommendations made by a committee of top central and state government experts which submitted its report soon after Operation Bluestar and the army action in Punjab. The committee was headed by I.V. Subramanian, a retired IAS officer. To see that the recommendations were correctly implemented, Mr Subramanian was then appointed as senior adviser to the government of Punjab under President's Rule in June last year. Mr Subramanian has been given a free hand to revamp the state administration, especially the law and order machinery.

Mr Subramanian has also recommended that the state police be screened at all levels and undesirable officers and other ranks be relieved of their jobs and offices. Accordingly, a top level committee headed by state chief secretary, S.S. Dhanoa was constituted to screen all officers of the state police cadres.

Rita Sharma, Chandigarh

SANTOSH KUMAR GHOSH

A Colossus Departs

At 10.45am on 26 February, Santosh Kumar Ghosh, litterateur and journalist, finally succumbed to the cancer that he had been battling for the past five months. The joint editor of Ananda Bazar Patrika, he had been associated with several newspapers and had written some of the most significant Bengali works of recent times. He was 64.

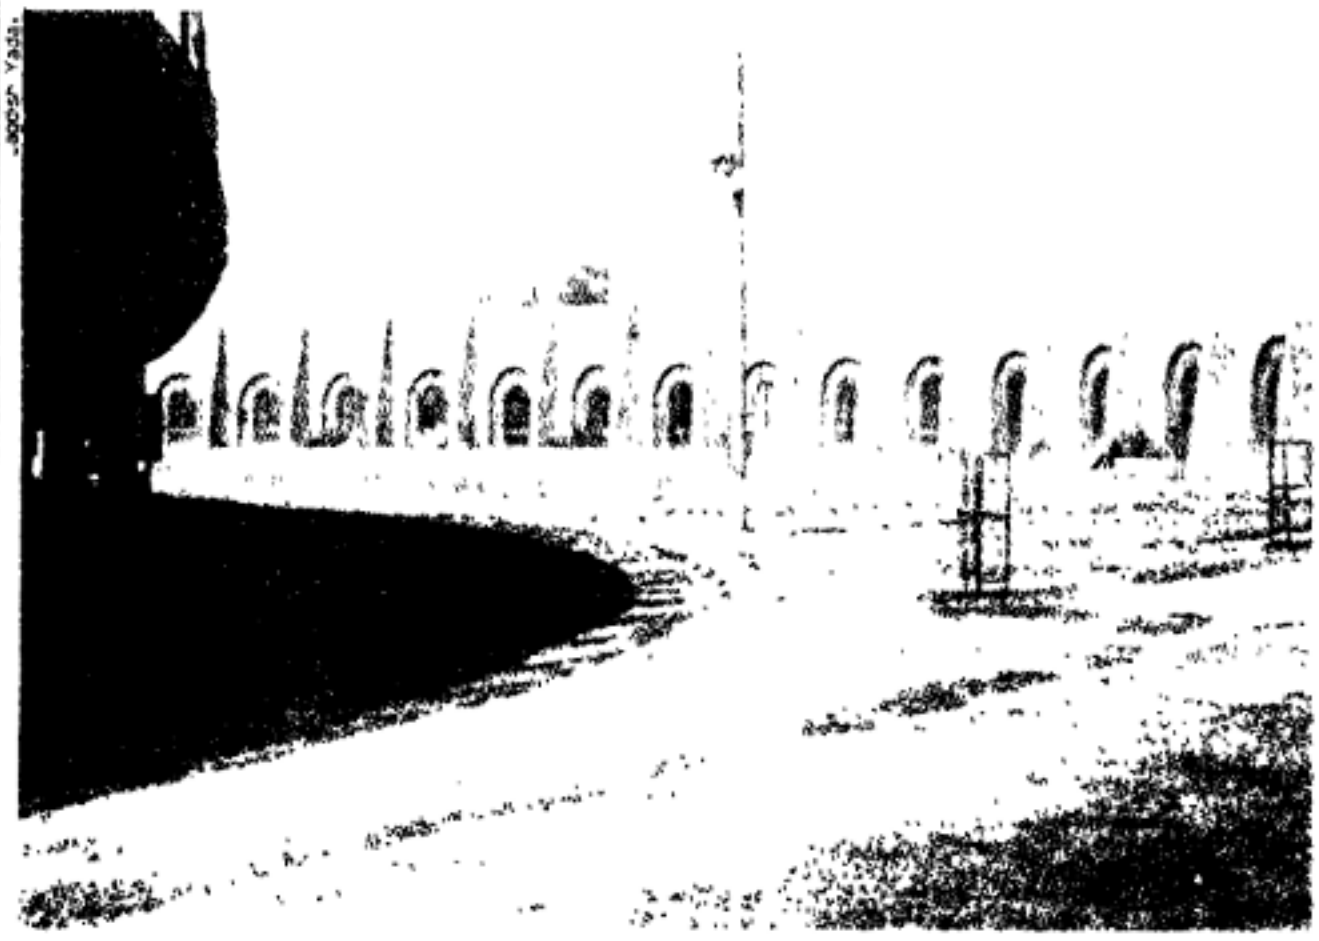
Santosh Kumar Ghosh.

Santosh Kumar Ghosh was born in Rajbari, now in Bangladesh, on 9 September 1920 and came to Calcutta to study at Ripon College, from where he graduated in 1940. Subsequently he joined Jugantar as sub-editor. Before joining Hindusthan Standard in 1951, he had worked with the Morning News, the Nation and The Statesman, and other smaller newspapers. He joined Ananda Bazar Patrika in 1958 as news editor and became associate editor of that paper as well as its sister publication the Hindustan Standard, in 1964

As associate editor, and later joint editor, he made a significant contribution towards giving Bengali journalism a new shape and form, and was instrumental in replacing the staid style of news reporting with a more colloquial idiom. His short and stocky appearance belied his nose for news and his pioneering prose, and he broke many stories on the basis of his tenacity and never-say-die spirit.

Apart from his achievements as a journalist, Santosh Ghosh was also among the literati of Bengal. His first short story was published in the Bengali magazine Bharatvarsa when he was only 16 years old. He came to be recognised as a writer of stature with his first novel, Nana Ranger Din, and his second novel, Kinu Goaler Goli, was published in the Puja number of Ananda Bazar Patrika when he was 19. His other significant works were Jal Dao, Sesh Namaskar Sri Charaneshu Make, for which he was awarded the Sahitya Akademi award in 1972. In all, he wrote more than 30 volumes of novels, short stories, plays and essays, some of which have been translated into Hindi as well as other Indian languages.

NEW DELHI



Sleuths Using Sports Stadium

The Velodrome is being used as an interrogation chamber

The Asiad velodrome, built on the west bank of the Yamuna for the cycle races, is now being used as an interrogation centre. In the past three months, the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) was entrusted with the task of interrogating an unprecedented number of people. A large number of arrests were made after the assassination of Mrs Indira Gandhi, followed by arrests in the spy scandal. With the interrogation chamber at the Red Fort unable to handle such a heavy load, the CBI finally selected the Yamuna velodrome.

The Anand Ram team, set up to investigate the conspiracy behind Mrs Gandhi's assassination chose the Yamuna velodrome. In the weeks following the assassination, dozens of suspects, including the prime accused in the case, Satwant Singh, Kehar Singh, Balbir Singh and their families were interrogated there. The velodrome, constructed for the Ninth Asian Games held in New Delhi in November 1982, was selected because of its ideal location and distance from the main city. Once the decision was taken by the team to conduct interrogations there, the authorities of the stadium were contacted and the keys to three rooms handed over to the CBI. Though most of the investigations in the assassination case are now over and the accused persons charged, it is believed that some others were brought to the stadium in the last days of February and the keys to the rooms are still with the investigators.

Officials in charge of the administration of the velodrome were hesitant to talk about the going-on there during the past few weeks. S.K. Chaturvedi, the supervisor of the velodrome simply stated that they had been asked to hand over the premises and that they are not allowed inside when questioning is in progress. Other junior officials talked about men and women being brought into the velodrome in cars late in the night and being whisked away stealthily. Nobody has seen the interrogation chambers or has been present when the CBI was occupying them.

The Yamuna velodrome in Delhi

They, however, complained that in the past two years, the velodrome had been misused by the Delhi Police. "Though the velodrome was constructed to encourage cycling, for many months we have not been able to hold any tournament here because the velodrome has been converted into a police station," said one official. The administrative officer explained that the velodrome had been taken over by police constables who had been using its dormitories (meant for housing players) as their residence. On 13 June 1983, the then Lt. Governor, Jagmohan had taken the decision to shift certain divisions of the police to the velodrome, for want of suitable accommodation.

The need to shift Delhi Armed Police constables into the velodrome arose in 1983, when a portion of the Kotwali police station in Chandni Chowk was handed over to the Sikh Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee and the displaced force had be transferred elsewhere. Divisions of the Delhi Armed Police, traffic police, crime branch and the missing persons squad, all of whom were earlier stationed at the Kotwali, were shifted to the velodrome. The decision was criticised by the stadium authorities who made several requests to the police headquarters for the early clearance of the velodrome. Since all the dormitories were occupied by constables, several tournaments had to be cancelled. Besides, they felt the constables were misusing the facilities available in the complex and living in insanitary conditions thereby damaging the building.

After repeated requests to the police commissioner, S.S. Jog, the velodrome authorities in February received the news that the velodrome would be vacated shortly and be made available for tournaments. The DAP personnel were to be shifted into a temporary police camp at the Nigambodh Ghat area and the members of the crime branch and missing persons squad to be transferred to the new Kotwali police station at Darya Ganj. Members of the traffic police, however, were still living at the velodrome since no stop gap arrangement could be made for them.

When the traffic team departs, the velodrome will once again be used for encouraging cycling. But before they can commence cycling tournaments and invite players to stay in the dormitories, the maintenance wing at the velodrome have a lot of work to complete. A visit to the once well-maintained stone and brick stadium shows how much damage has been done to it by the policemen. Window panes, electrical fittings and fans have been broken. Furniture in the dining hall has been smashed and the dormitories messed up. After two years of misuse, the Yamuna velodrome, among the finest in Asia and certainly the best in India, will be with the sports authorities again. They are now only hoping that the Anand Ram team and the CBI investigators will also vacate the premises quickly.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi.

MIZORAM

No Early Settlement

Talks between Laldenga and the government deadlocked

Prospects of an early settlement of the 18-year-old Mizo insurgency have once again receded with the failure of the talks between Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and the Mizo National Front leader Laldenga to resolve the deadlock over the "special powers" of the Governor. Only last December, a confident Laldenga had told SUNDAY that by January, all the four outstanding problems would be settled. However, on 15 February, when Rajiv Gandhi and Laldenga met for the first time since the latter's return from London, the two leaders were unable to make much headway on the question of the role of the Governor during the "interim arrangement" before fresh Assembly elections could be held.

What was expected to have been the final round of talks now appears to be the prelude to another cycle of negotiations. The matter has once again been referred to P.V. Narasimha Rao, the defence minister. Apparently, it was felt that since Narasimha Rao had been associated from the very beginning with the "third round" of talks as the then home minister, his involvement would provide an element of continuity in the dialogue. It is no secret that Laldenga has been quite concerned at the dislocation of the talks due to the assassination of Indira Gandhi. The dialogue had after all been based upon a personal understanding between Mrs Gandhi and the MNF leader.

The main hurdle continues to be the question of the Governor's powers with respect to law and order and the management of finances. The centre and the MNF have agreed that Mizoram will be granted statehood similar to that of Nagaland under Article 371 A of the Constitution. The problem, however, is that while this Article provides for certain safeguards for maintaining the culture of the Mizo people, it also stipulates that "the Governor of Nagaland shall have a special responsibility with respect to the law and order in the state of Nagaland...and in the discharge of his functions in relation thereto the Governor shall after consulting with the council of ministers exercise his individual judgment as to the action to be taken..."

Again Clause(C) provides that "in making his recommendation with respect to any demand for a grant, the Governor of Nagaland shall ensure that the money provided by the government of India out of the Consolidated Fund of India for any specific purpose or service is included in the demand for grants relating to that service or purpose and not in any other demand."

Laldenga has objected to these provisions as they would virtually place the administration irrespective of the existence of an elected Assembly under central direction. Sources close to the MNF leader say that such a provision is tantamount to saying that the centre does not trust the Mizo people. "The conditions in Nagaland are different. But once the underground Mizos lay down their arms, Mizoram will not be more disturbed than Uttar Pradesh," said a MNF leader.

Laldenga

Equally intractable have been the differences over the interim arrangement before Parliament is able to approve statehood for Mizoram and fresh elections are held. The MNF leader feels that it is likely to be a period of at least six months and it is vital that the administration be in the hands of those that the Mizo underground can trust. "How can they possibly come out and lay down their arms when the same administration, police and paramilitary forces against whom they have conducted raids are the very people who still have power over them? They want an assurance of safety and order," said a MNF leader. Such an assurance of safety and order can, according to MNF sources, be provided by dissolving the state Assembly, declaring President's rule and appointing a council of advisers to aid the Lt Governor. The head of the council would presumably be Laldenga himself. The formula was part of the proposals submitted to the government during the second round of talks in 1981-82. However, since then, Brig Sailo's ministry has been defeated and the new chief minister Lal Thanhwla has said to the press that he is prepared to resign in Laldenga's favour. The government has yet to submit its proposals on this matter.

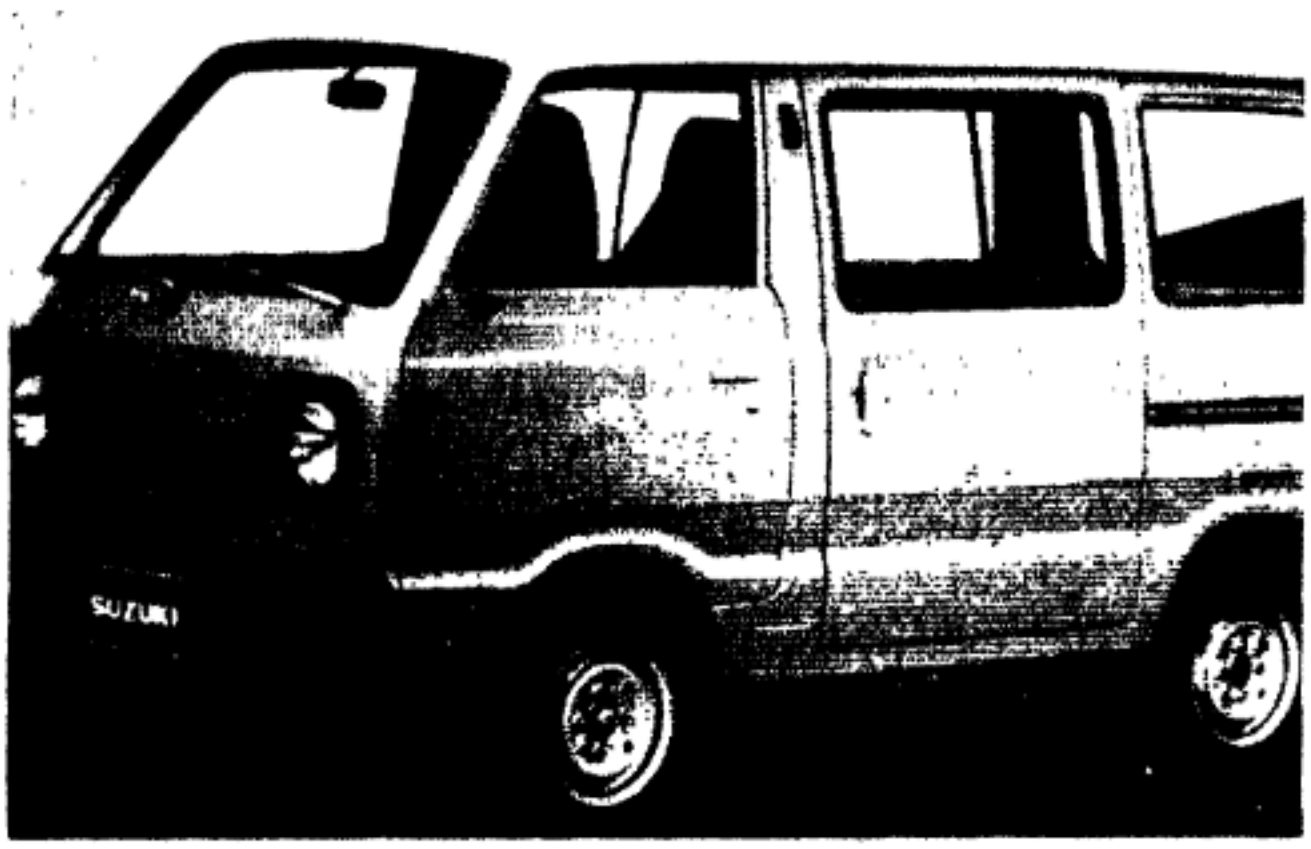
Differences also exist over the withdrawal of the Sixth Schedule applicable over certain areas of Mizoram. The MNF leadership believes that the continuing application of this schedule in Mizoram will foster divisiveness. The schedule provides for the administration of tribal areas in the union territory of Mizoram through the creation of autonomous district councils and regional councils. Laldenga in an interview to this correspondent last December had explained that the Sixth Schedule had been applied to Mizoram when it was part of Assam but now that it was going to be a separate state the schedule could no longer be applicable.

Laldenga discussed with the Prime Minister the position of the MNF on these outstanding problems. The PM gave a patient, even sympathetic hearing but the political will to break the deadlock seems to be absent. While Rajiv Gandhi turned his attention to the Assembly elections, Laldenga is waiting his turn. He has to comfort himself with the satisfaction of having obtained acceptance of statehood for Mizoram, a blanket amnesty for all the underground Mizos, inclusion of Mizoram as a national language in the Eighth schedule and special provisions for ownership and transfer of land and resources and other safeguards under Article 371 A.

Rita Manchanda, New Delhi

MARUTI UDYOG

Full of Drive



Production targets exceeded in first year of operation

In the first year of operations, Maruti Udyog has brought about a revolution on the Indian roads In spite of various controversies in which the company is involved, it cannot be denied that Maruti has ushered in a new era in the Indian automobile industry. The production achieved by Maruti since its plant became operative on 14 December 1983 is praiseworthy. In 15 months, Maruti has exceeded its production target by ten per cent By March this year 22,000 units had been manufactured instead of the projected figure of 20,000 units with 186 units rolling out every day By the time Maruti enters its second phase of production in March 1986, it would have produced 48,000 units.

behind its indigenisation schedule.

The joint managing director of Maruti Udyog, R C. Bhargava, explained that the problem of indigenous ancillary development faced by Maruti is something for which the ancillary industry in India is responsible Since the past 15 years, the ancillary industry has remained stagnant as the number of automobiles produced in the country remained static. From 1973 onwards, the combined sales of the Ambassador and Fiat was a poor 40,000 but after Maruti entered the market, the number of passenger cars sold shot up to 65,000, a 50 per cent increase.

The ancillary industry was clearly taken by surprise when Maruti hit the Indian roads and more so when

The Maruti van

The giant public sector company now employs 1,900 people and the production rate of the company is two cars per employee per year which compares favourably with previous production rates of the Indian automobile industry. However, the indigenisation of the Maruti vehicles is lagging behind schedule and this is causing concern to the company. The first 192 Maruti passenger cars were assembled from foreign components. By March 1985, the vehicles are expected to use only 26 per cent of indigenous components. By 1989, the vehicles will be 100 per cent indigenised. At present, according to company sources, Maruti is five per cent they exceeded their production targets in the first year of production. The various companies which had begun manufacturing ancillaries for Maruti were under severe test as Maruti demanded spare parts of international standards and was determined to control the quality of its components. Because of stringent quality control, several consignments given to Maruti by Indian vendors were rejected. So keen has Maruti been on quality control that some defective spare parts imported from Japan have been rejected.

"Now," says Bhargava, "the ancillary industry has begun to take Maruti seriously and several big business houses are manufacturing spares for us. They have accepted the fact that Maruti has come to the Indian market to stay for good." He hopes Maruti's modern assembly line will be soon supplied with modern components as well. The target before Maruti is to achieve a 100 per cent indigenisation by 1989-1990, three years before the licence agreement of Maruti with its Japanese collaborator Suzuki expires on 2 October, 1992.

Maruti Udyog has paid the price for the vehicles' popularity and demand. The vehicles are being sold at a premium between Rs 60,000 to Rs 1,00,000 in the open market. After complaints of largescale blackmarketeering in Maruti vehicles were received by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi and finance minister, V.P. Singh, the government ordered a probe into the sale and purchase of Maruti vehicles. According to Maruti officials, since no ban had been imposed by the government on resale, the company has no control over a vehicle changing hands.

Maruti Udyog is tabulating figures from its 16 distribution centres of how many cars and vans have been resold at a profit. According to one official, the figures reveal that not more than 15-20 per cent of the vehicles changed ownership. He also complained that not only were inflated reports of largescale blackmarketing being circulated, Maruti was in grave difficulty because of a Supreme Court order against the company. On account of the stay order granted by Justice V.D. Tulzapurkar and Justice A.P. Sen, they are unable to allot any vehicle under their discretionary quota of five per cent. The case will come up for hearing next month and only then will it be known whether the 165 cars allotted by Maruti in the quota have legal sanction or not.

In 1983, when bookings for the cars commenced, a total of 1,35,000 people had written to the company According to Bhargava, the name of each applicant was fed into a computer and each of them now has an allotment slip and an approximate date when his Maruti would be allotted to him. All bookings will be complete by 1987 when the company will commence fresh bookings. In the next few years, Maruti is expected to further accelerate its production capability and will contribute significantly to the projected demand of 1,00,000 passenger cars every year. Of this Maruti alone will produce 50,000 vehicles.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Surging Ahead

Car manufacturers introduce new models

Until last year, it did seem that the much heralded automobile revolution in India would be restricted to just the Maruti. The new Contessa from Hindustan Motors was not a big success and the Dolphin has not risen above its modest beginnings. The promises made by all other manufacturers too, had seemed to be restricted to just newspaper reports. However, the engineering fair organised by the Association of Indian Engineering Industries (AIEI) in Delhi in February and the entry of three competitors in the Indian motor market have finally cast aside such doubts.

The Standard Motors' "prestige project," in collaboration with Austin Rover, UK—the Standard 2000—undoubtedly stole the show at what turned out to be more of an automobile fair for the common man. The "executive sedan" as the exhibitors called their latest vehicle has some features totally new to the Indian drivers like electronically operated windows, power steering, central door locking system, twin SU carburettors, a collapsible column, front caliper disc brakes and rear self-adjusting drum brakes.

The Standard 2000 is not a people's car and is priced at an exorbitant Rs 1,75,000, the highest priced Indian passenger car. The firm has finalised its tie-up with Nissan but faces problems from the government which is yet to give the green signal. The company officials, however, would not elaborate on the "hitch" being posed by the authorities but if all goes well, the manufacturers will introduce the model in another three years.

Another participant in the automobile revolution is the Fiat 118. It has a 1180 cc engine, a body similar to the Premier Padmini and will be priced at Rs 100,000. Unlike the Standard 2000, which will have an air conditioner, stereo and other luxuries, the Premier automobile will be luxuriously fitted out if the customer demands it. The Fiat 118, originally slated for a Diwali release will hit Indian roads sometime this year.

Also on display were a number of two-wheelers to be introduced to the market this year. Among the main attractions were the Ind-Suzuki AX 100 and the Hero Honda CD 100. The Rajdoot Yamaha 350 introduced by Escorts last year also caught the eye. But in keeping with the economy drive against high fuel consumption, the company has no intentions of any production on a mass scale. Production in the first year will be only 2,000 after which it would gradually be raised up to a maximum of 10,000. Although initially, Standard Motors had plans of producing only 5,000 cars annually, with the recent "broad band" licensing system introduced by the government, the company has now begun thinking in terms of doubling the Standard 200 production as against their light commercial vehicle. For the moment, the company will continue to import the body panels from their overseas collaborators, mainly because importing dyes for the body at such a low level of production would impose prohibitive costs.

Interestingly, the Standard 2000 to be introduced in July 1985, will be manufactured from mostly indigenously produced components. The entire "power train" in the engine, the tyres, battery, and axle components would have already been indigenised.

The Standard 2000 has been specially adjusted for Indian roads and driving conditions. The engine torque, for instance, has been adjusted to allow moving into the fourth gear at lower speeds and downgraded to be compatible with the 87 octane fuel grade available here as against the 97 octane used by the Austin Rover 2000. The maximum speed, however, has been retained at 160 km/hour. Premier Automobiles presented at the fair, the new hybrid Fiat 118 which brings together the Fiat 124 body from Italy with the Nissan 118 engine from Japan. The Nissan Sunny B 11 was also exhibited at the fair. An interesting exhibit was the Bajaj M 80, the "step through" motorcycle, which, for the convenience of ladies, does not have a fuel tank in front of the seat.

Both Ashok Leyland and Escorts had their commercial vehicles on display while the Countryman, a new 21-seater van introduced by Standard Motors made its appearance here. According to the company's general manager (corporate planning) Mr R Ravindran, the company has chosen the name Countryman to prove to the innumerable firms going in for foreign collaborations for light commercial vehicles, that the country has the expertise to make the vehicles without foreign help.

The "motor rally" flagged off by the entry of the Maruti and Contessa has obviously begun. It is expected that the race will witness its fair share of dropouts. The extravaganza began with the liberalisation of automobile licensing together with the Maruti project. The field was made more attractive with the "broad band" licensing which allows the manufacturers to go into the production of "any four-wheeled vehicle" or "any two-wheeled vehicle" depending upon the market demand. The stakes are of course high with investment running into hundreds of crores. What now remains to be seen is the response by the people.

Tania Midha, New Delhi

The Standard 2000

TAMIL NADU

MGR's Man on the Beat

MGR reinstates police chief K. Mohandas

The relationship between CM M. G. Ramachandran and K Mohandas, the intelligence chief of Tamil Nadu, has been a fascinating aspect of MGR's chief ministership Today, Mohandas, is perhaps the second most powerful person in the state, after MGR himself. He is not only the director general of police in charge of crime and intelligence but he has a close relationship with MGR that enables him to wield such clout. MGR who distrusts almost everyone including cabinet colleagues and senior partymen has implicit faith in this police officer.

Mohandas's proximity to MGR is the source of his controversial image. The DMK press has attacked him more frequently than they have attacked MGR himself. Very often, the DMK-affiliated newspapers like Thiroli and Murasoli carry reports of his corruption and inefficiency. He has been accused of being MGR's hatchetman, of being MGR's front man in shady deals, of keeping MGR's slush funds, of making foreign trips at MGR's expense and even of using the police force to browbeat the opposition parties. But, nothing has ever been proved. Ironically, the criticism has brought him closer to MGR. MGR, highly sensitive to the DMK allegation that he was encouraging a "Kerala Nadu" in the state, even bypassed a senior Malayali IAS officer, Mr Pannikkar for the post of chief secretary but has stuck to Mohandas, also a Malayali.

K. Mohandas

Mohandas remains unpopular with the bureaucrats in the state who accuse him of having converted Tamil Nadu into a "police state." A senior bureaucrat has called him "a policeman who blindly believes the lathi to be the panacea for all problems." Members of the Tamil Nadu judiciary also distrust him ever since it leaked out that he kept all of them under police surveillance

He has also not found favour with senior AIADMK partymen who, despite their seniority, firstly lack the accessibility or an easy relationship with MGR. Secondly, Mohandas has put them all under surveillance and has been reporting to MGR about their activities, enabling the CM to maintain a stranglehold on the party. Even Jayalalitha, at the height of her relationship with MGR, could not despite several attempts, drive a wedge between MGR and Mohandas Jayalalitha had turned against Mohandas when she learnt that he kept her under surveillance and had demanded that he be put down. But MGR quickly overruled her.

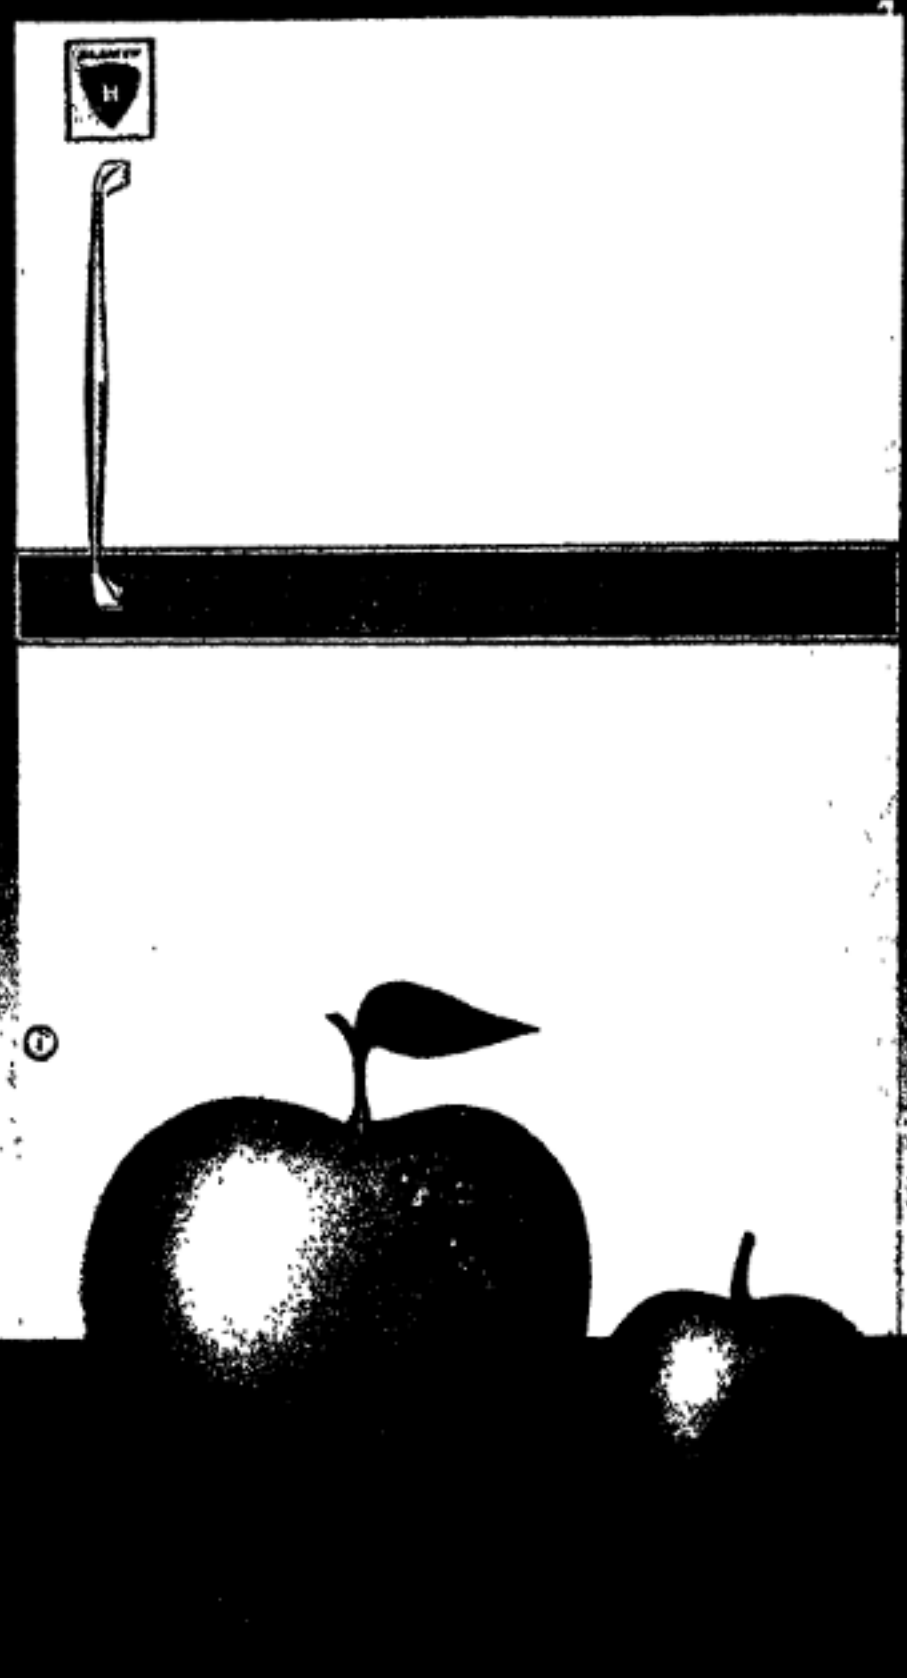
Mohandas's reaction to the allegations has been one of indifference He does not bother to react and has never denied anything or clarified or justified his actions Instead, he continues to maintain a low profile.

In January 1985, while MGR was convalescing in New York, Mohandas was suddenly transferred to a relatively unimportant post as commissioner and secretary in charge of administration (training). It had confirmed that the coterie (comprising mainly of Nedunchezhian and Veerappan) was taking decisions without MGR's knowledge. SUNDAY learns that the decision for the transfer was made by chief secretary K. Chockalingam and Nedunchezhian. They felt Mohandas was dangerous because he knew too much. Of course, the coterie acted in this manner only because they did not know the extent of MGR's recovery. Chockalingam and Nedunchezhian had returned from New York with the firm conviction that MGR had in effect become a 'nodding chief minister." But MGR literally bounced back to life. The day MGR returned, Mohandas met him and apprised him of all the developments. MGR was shocked. to learn of the transfer and after

HYDROFOIL BOATS

Swift and Safe

A new era in shipbuilding will begin in India with the manufacture of superfast hydrofoil boats with the help of Swiss technology. These superfoils will carry 90 passengers in a fully air-conditioned interior and will cost as little as Rs 2 lakh each. The boats are going to be built by a recently floated Tamil Nadu company--Venkatapathy Engineering Private Limited and the project being constructed on the Kadular coast on the Bay of Bengal is being promoted by the Supremer Company Switzerland. Total costs of the project will be Rs 2 crores.



"The boats are known for speedy, comfortable and safe transportation with a fuel efficiency of as much as half of the conventional boats. They will have a longer range (of 200 nautical miles) than ordinary boats," says R. Srinivasan, one of the top executives connected with the project. The Indian company proposes to build four types of passenger vessels of varying capacities ranging from 100 to 400 seater hovercrafts. The bigger hovercrafts will cost about eight lakhs each. The boats, which will have a cruising speed of 33 knots will be useful for off-shore work by the Oil and Natural Gas Commission or as patrol boats used by the Coast Guard.

"When the boat attains a specified speed, the hulls rise above the water, and the boat travels with just the foils in the water enabling travel at a very high speed, about three times that of a conventional boat. Because of the foils, the boats are very stable and the pitch and roll experienced by passenger is negligible making travel by sea a pleasant exercise," said Mr Srinivasan. Even in a turbulent sea, the boats keep their balance.

The company is also planning to charter the vessels at the rate of Rs five lakhs per month which includes the charges for the crew, insurance and maintainence. Civil construction for the project is scheduled to start soon and maintenance has already acquired the necessary finances. "With the rapidly developing demand for passenger travel by sea, we expect to do good business," said Mr Srinivasan.

T. Raman, Madras

Not all refrigerators are made like this

Japanese technology puts Allwyn in a class by itself

The Allwyn 2000 SL is in a class by itself. Unbeatable in performance. Unmatched in years of trouble free service. It's the only Indian refrigerator with the smooth silent efficiency and confident guarantee of Japanese technology behind it.

Allwyn comes in a wide range – six models to choose from. 85, 165 and 300 litres in single door – 165, 300 and 380 litres in the double door models. There's sure to be one just right for your family.

Take a look at what Allwyn offers you.

Hitachi at the heart!

The Allwyn compressor is made under licence from Hitachi – made for negligible compressor failure and smooth, silent efficiency.

Who needs a voltage stabiliser?

Allwyn tackles voltage fluctuations from 150 to 260 volts – so you don't need a stabiliser.

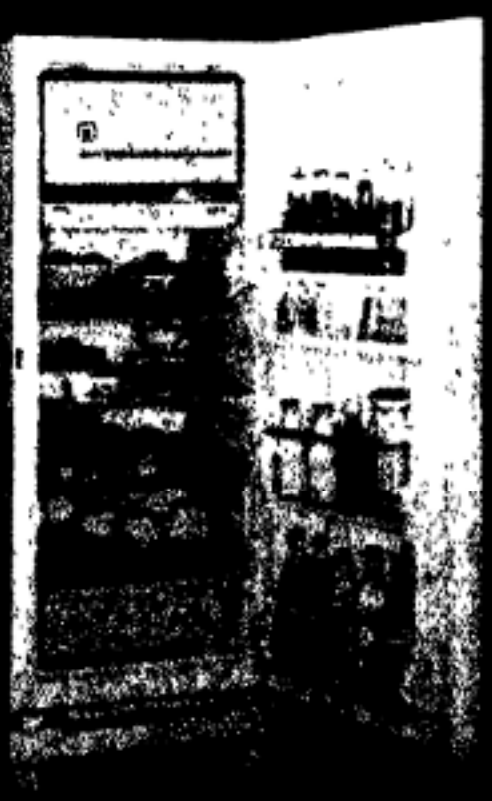
Ice in a trice!

Its unique Roll Bond freezer makes ice quicker even while it preserves food for days.

Sayonara huge big electricity bills.

The Allwyn consumes 10% less electricity because of superior Japanese technology.

Defrosting never was so easy ...



A self defrosting system for easy defrosting. High Impact Polystyrene ABS linings for sleek roomy interiors.

Service before you can say Allwyn!

Allwyn comes with the biggest service network. You may never need it but help is available at the other end of the telephone.

The ready-to-take-on-the-world refrigerators

Allwyn invests Rs. 3 crores in plant and equipment modernisation to ensure that its upgrade know how is part of the products you own.

IS 1476

ISI

2 YEAR GUARANTEE

HITACHI

MAA (S) ALN 2C 85

Hawkins the safest fastest way to tasty food

* Illustrated above is the 6.5 litre standard base model

Sensible cooking of tasty food

Pressure cooking saves time and fuel. It retains better nutritive values in certain foods, particularly proteins and vitamins Hawkins have 127 delicious recipes in their cookbook available in English and a choice of 12 Indian languages given with every cooker

Hawkins cooks fastest because of its more economical construction and the greater space for steam circulation Trials prove that Hawkins saves about Rs. 300 every year

Hawkins for your greatest safety

Hawkins is accident-proof Its lid fits inside the body· it can be opened only after the pressure falls Its safety valve is under the handle bar which deflects steam safely downwards.

Every Hawkins undergoes the strictest quality control and has a 5-year written guarantee. 144 Authorised Service Centres give free expert service and carry genuine spare parts.

The most durable product--in 38 models

As the Hawkins gasket is not rubbed sideways each time the lid is opened or closed, it lasts longer The metal safety valve has a longer life than ordinary rubber ones High-quality plating prevents rusting.

Choose from Hawkins' widest range of pressure cookers in the world– 38 models in sizes from 2 to 22 litres * Available with or without separators, standard or heavy base. In thermal-efficient aluminium or stay-bright stainless steel, or unique 'Satilon' which combines the advantages of both.

Free booklet to help you choose

To get the address of your nearest Hawkins dealer and a free colour booklet giving details of the 38 exciting, lovely Hawkins models, write to: Hawkins, Department 112; P.O. Box 6481, Bombay 400 016.

Hawkins®

The finest Pressure Cooker for your finest cooking

® Registered Trade Mark
© 1985 Copyright by Pressure Cookers & Appliances Ltd

being sworn in for the third term, immediately reinstated him.

Mohandas joined the IPS in 1956 and began his career as ASP of Tiruchy. He was then posted as the commandant of the Malabar Special Police in Assam. In 1970, he was drafted into the CBI at Delhi. In 1976, he was reverted to his home state, as DIG CID. In fact it is believed that he was involved in the toppling of the Karunanidhi government. When MGR assumed power for the first time in 1977, Mohandas was the DIG in charge of crime and intelligence. Whatever the allegations against Mohandas, it is clear that the Tamil Nadu crime branch which he heads is one of the best in the country. The rate of crimes solved is very high and Mohandas has proved that he is extremely good at investigation and intelligence-gathering. Whether it be in resolving the sensational Allen kidnap case of Sri Lanka, the Madras bomb blast, tracing stolen idols or retrieving Tamil bonded labourers from other states, the state's crime branch has carved a niche for itself.

MGR developed such confidence in him that he ensured that Mohandas continued to handle this department right through his chief ministership and got him promoted quickly. He was made the additional IG, then IG and then DGP. All the while he came nearer to MGR. When asked why he was MGR's favourite, Mohandas told SUNDAY "I think it's because I have always been objective in my assessment. Very often I know for a fact that the CM will disagree with what I have to say but that does not deter me from expressing frankly what I feel. Over the years the CM has developed confidence in me, particularly because all the others around him, out of fear and awe, say yes to whatever he says."

Anita Pratap, Madras

BRITAIN

Hauled Over the Coals

Miners' strike ends in failure

A miner being led away by the police

"The longest strike in history:" this is how Arthur Scargill, president of Britain's National Union of Mineworkers, described the coal strike which ended on 5 March almost a year after it started on 6 March, 1984. Mr. Scargill has obviously not heard of Bombay's textile strike, which also ran for almost a year. However, Britain's coal strike was certainly the longest in this country's industrial history which has been none too peaceful in recent years. It evoked memories of other previous memorable events such as the general strike of 1926 (which lasted for a week), the Tolpoodle Martyrsm, 1834, etc.

However, the latest miners' strike has left scars on the industrial and social ethos of Britain which will endure for a long time. People in Britain still talk of the general strike with horror and fear and the miners' strike will continue to evoke these sentiments for a long time to come for two reasons: the total involvement of the miners in it and their total defeat.

What is more, even though the strike has officially ended, there is plenty of trouble in store. For one thing, even if the special NUM delegate conference held on 3 March voted by a narrow majority to end the strike, the miners in Scotland and Kent have decided to continue their own strike in defiance of the NUM vote, and Mr. Scargill has publicly declared that although the strike has ended, the "guerilla" fight against the Tory government will continue. So Britain may be in for a long period of continued bickering and infighting between the NUM and the government on one hand, and the NUM and the Trade Union Congress and the Labour Party leadership on the other.

This may well benefit the Conservatives, who could win the general election of 1988 as handsomely as they won the general election of 1983, so tired was the public of the industrial strifes in 1974 (when the Heath government was defeated by a miners' strike) and in 1979 when James Callaghan lost to Margaret Thatcher. One thing is quite clear. Although Mr. Scargill and his NUM colleagues declared from the beginning that the strike was in defence of the miners' jobs against the declared intention of the National Coal Board to close "uneconomic" mines, as Mr. Scargill himself declared at the NUM annual conference in September 1984, the basic issue behind the miners' strike was "Who is to have ultimate control over our industry and our way of life—the Tories or we, the workers?"

The Tory government, of course, was fully aware of this and that is why, it adopted a firm and consistent policy of "no surrender" and mobilised its entire resources to meet the Scargill challenge. Its gamble paid off to the regret of Mr. Scargill and the miners. What has now been revealed is that the Conservative Party decided to learn from the miners' strike in 1974 after which the Heath government prepared an elaborate plan to beat a similar strike, if it were to happen again. It did, and the Thatcher government last year applied the measures recommended in that secret plan masterfully and effectively by building up huge buffer stocks of coal through imports from European countries. Ironically, the bulk of the coal imports came from a communist country, Poland.

Other measures included the conversion of power stations from coal to gas, changes in the law so as to empower the courts to seize funds (as was done to NUM funds) and to empower the department of health and social security to cut unemployment benefit to striking miners, as was done ruthlessly and systematically so that the miners suffered acute financial hardship

All these measures worked and in spite of the heroic struggle which they put up, the workers were beaten by sheer economic necessity. They had accumulated far too many heavy debts in rent and mortgages, grocery bills, domestic gas and electricity bills, etc But behind all this is the Thatcher government's real strength - its 130 plus majority in the House of Commons. With such a majority it could do and did almost anything it pleased including enactment of the most draconian and unpopular Trade Union Acts.

The miners' strike also failed because of another important reason—the refusal of the rest of the trade union movement to back the strike by sympathetic strikes. In fact, Scargill urged the Trade Union Congress to give a call for a general strike as in 1926 but other unions refused to oblige. He then appealed to the Transport and General Workers' Union to prevent coal dug by "scab" labour or coal imported from abroad to reach power stations and industrial undertakings, but this ban of the T.G.W.U proved ineffective because the government made arrangements for the use of trucks for coal haulage, the trucks being driven by non-union drivers and for coaches to carry "scab" workers, These coaches were also driven by non-union members. These measures, of course, resulted in violent clashes between striking miners' pickets and massive contingents of police deployed to ensure the free passage for the trucks and coaches. Indeed, these clashes became so nasty and violent that relations between "the nice British police" and the working class community may never be cordial again.

The violent behaviour of the striking miners had resulted in over 700 of them being dismissed and prosecuted in many cases for causing bodily harm and it is for the reinstatement of these sacked miners ("amnesty") that the miners in Kent and Scotland are still on strike. Where does the leadership of the Trade Union Movement and the leadership of the Labour Party stand now? The miners' strike was another manifestation of the running struggle between the extremists and the moderates, so that the extremist leaders of the miners (Arthur Scargill or his communist deputy Michael Macgahey) are blaming the leaders of the Labour Party, especially Neil Kinnock for failing to give total support to the miners.

The TUC and the Labour Party leaders made it clear right from the beginning that, while they supported the strike in principle (notwithstanding the strike itself as illegal because it had not been declared on the strength of a nation wide secret ballot among the miners, Scargill having refused to have one), they could not condone illegal acts (involving contempt of court) or downright acts of violence (which in fact resulted in the murder of one innocent taxi driver), nor would they ever support demands of "amnesty" for sacked miners proved guilty of violence.

This stand, taken by Norman Willis, general secretary of the TUC and by Neil Kinnock, has angered the extremist sections within the NUM and also within the Labour Party and there is already talk of challenging the leadership of Mr. Kinnock at the annual conference of the Labour Party in October. Thus, the failure of the miners' strike will continue to have its delayed effects on relations within the trade union movement and the Labour Party for the rest of the year.

What have been the physical effects of the miners' strike which lasted exactly a year? Their seriousness can be gauged from the following figures: criminal offences or cases involving criminal breach of peace 4,296: obstructing police—1,692. Obstructing highway—640, criminal damage—1,015, arson—15, assaults on police—315, actual bodily harm—424, grievous bodily harm—39, theft—349, murders—3, resisting arrest—19, bail breach—32, drunkenness—62, unlawful assembly—509, rioting—137, and handling stolen goods—1.

And what about the effects of the strike on the government in actual monetary terms? These have been estimated by stock brokers as follows (March 1984 to February 1985)—electricity industry—1,199 million pounds sterling, coal industry—1,091 million pounds, lost income-tax—290 million pounds, police costs—198 million pounds,British steel–198 million pounds, social security department, 49 million pounds, total 3,025 million pounds. These are unofficial estimates, and the government and the NUM have their own estimates which differ widely.

Whatever the costs may be, it is beyond doubt that British industry and British economy will take a long time to recover from these huge losses, not to mention the loss of foreign markets which is even more serious for a trading country like Britain. Is this the price of one man, who led the miners' strike which harassed Britain for one year? Whether it is or not,one can hardly dispute the verdict of The Times on the famous defeat of the miners "if victory has a thousand fathers, defeat is an Orphan."

Peter Pandsay, London

Arthur Scargill

NEPAL

A Policy of Drift

Political and economic changes urgently needed

Time is running out for the Lokendra Bahadur Chand government in Nepal. Its troubles include a faltering economy and a political situation which is drifting towards a crisis. What has however turned the mountain kingdom into a potential powder keg and placed PM Chand's position in danger is an increasingly restive populace dissatisfied with both the economic situation and political structure of the kingdom. Equally worrying have been the repressive measures taken by the police forces in dealing with the anti-government demonstrations.

Recently, a large number of people, including the pradhan panch (Mayor) of Kathmandu Municipality, Mr Kamal Chitrakar, a partyless Panchayat supporter, were taken into custody for organising a rally which did not pose any law and order problems. The riot police lathicharged the demonstators who were protesting against the regime's failure to fulfil its pledges to check "corruption in the administration." According to reports, police have been regularly lathicharging demonstrators after the Lokendra Bahadur Chand government came to power.

When Mr Chand took over as Prime Minister replacing Surya Bahadur Thapa, he had pledged to fight corruption and eradicate poverty in the kingdom which according to Mr Pashupati Shumsher, one of the leading members of the cabinet, had become "a way of life" in the kingdom. In fact, one of the Prime Minister's charges against his predecessor, also a Panchayat loyalist like him, was that he had "institutionalised corruption." Mr Chand had assured the people that things would never be the same again and promised a "clean government that worked." The Prime Minister's reputation of being "Mr Clean" is now a bad joke. Though his personal integrity is beyond doubt, many of his colleagues in the government are corrupt, nor has the government done much to arrest the drift in the country's affairs.

Not surprisingly, the government's performance or rather non-performance has been severely criticised. Even the most committed supporters of the controversial Panchayat model of government have cautioned the Prime Minister against taking things for granted. The normally reticent press has been strongly critical. The Motherland, an English daily, said in an editorial, "The Panchas (Panchayat members) have grossly misused their power and there is no mechanism which can control those who have been abusing the posts they hold...the Panchas need to be reminded that they have miserably failed to deliver the goods. "The performance of the Panchas has not been encouraging either. "They are all fighting not for bettering the lot of the people but for their own benefit," said The Motherland. The opposition parties, though legally banned under the Nepalese Constitution have been equally critical. But Prime Minister Chand's approach so far indicates that he would prefer to let matters run their own course.

Bhola Chatterjee

Krishna Prasad Bhattrai

Bhola Chatterjee

Ganesh Man Singh

According to knowlegeable sources, Mr Chand could face a mass upsurge if he continues to disregard the demands of the people for a meaningful economic and political reorientation of its policy. Some members of the outlawed Nepali Congress, the largest opposition party in the kingdom which had pioneered the 1950-51 armed revolution in an effort to introduce democracy in Nepal felt that he was there to serve the people and not the other way round.

Recently, a large number of Nepali Congress leaders including Ganesh Man Singh, Krishna Prasad Bhattrai and Girija Koirala were detained in different parts of the kingdom for holding party conventions, the first step towards a satyagraha movement in the coming months to restore "democratic rights." According to the Nepali Chronicle, the arrests were made because the government wanted to "see and measure the strength of the outlawed (Nepali) Congress and prepare a strategy to counter the so-called civil disobedience movement."

However, some sections of the Nepali Congress leadership would prefer a moderate line of approach despite the present intransigent attitude of the Chand government. They argue that the reforms introduced since the 1980 National Referendum show that a slow democratisation in Nepal is continuing, the credit for which should be given to the Palace.

The moderates suggest that instead of confrontational politics, the Nepali Congress should frame its political line in keeping with the late B.P. Koirala's policy of "national reconciliation." The King, according to the moderates, has an important role to play in the restructuring of the political system.

In the confused political atmosphere in the kingdom at present, the Nepali Congress will have a difficult task ahead. Without weakening its opposition to the Lokendra Bahadur government, the Nepali Congress will have to cooperate with the Palace in order in bring in an effective and more representive government in Nepal

Bhola Chatterjee, Calcutta

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The Discovery of India

Americans are looking forward to the Festival of India

The Festival of India 1985-86, the largest cultural programme to ever tour the United States, will be the first one to present "India by Indians" according to Festival coordinator Niranjan Desai Desai who is also minister of culture at the Indian embassy in Washington, said the theme of the Festival is "continuity and change." He pointed out that the idea is to bring India to the United States "as it is." He said there is no propaganda; the message is India itself."

Interviewed in Austin, Texas, where he was attending a conference entitled "India 2000: The Next 15 Years," Desai said the Festival will "hopefully begin a process of reappraisal of India. It may change perceptions about it." "First of all," Desai explained, "we want to take the mystery out of India." He said he no longer wants to convey the exclusive image of being exotic, or being only the country of the Taj Mahal or the land of snake charmers and fakirs. "India is beyond that—India is much more than that." Desai also said his countrymen are trying to fight the image that "India is tired, poor, overcrowded..

By bringing certain Indian talents and skills to America, Desai said, "we will try to show that whatever we do now is rooted in old traditional skills like arts and crafts." Whatever traditions we have had, have been passed down from generation to generation and we have adapted to new changes, new ways, and yet (are) retaining some of the old traditions and this we will demonstrate."

One of the events of the Festival that Americans may find especially intriguing is the recreation of a mela, on the mall in Washington this summer. This will be part of the Smithsonian Institution's Festival of Folklore Some of the dance performances being planned, particularly those incorporating some of the lesser known Indian folk forms, will interest the Americans.

The American executive director of the Indo-US subcommission on education and culture, Ted Tanen, who is intimately involved in planning the Festival said that Americans will be very interested in the Indian science and technology exhibition. "Science and Technology: The Indian Tradition" will open in Chicago, Illinois, at the Museum of Science and Industry in June; will then move on to the California Museum of Science and Industry in Los Angeles, California; the Portland, Oregon, Museum of Science and Industry, the Pacific Centre in Seattle, Washington, and the Science Museum of Richmond in Virginia. The contributions India has made in the fields of mathematics, metallurgy, astronomy and medicine will also be highlighted by these exhibitions.

The Festival will inevitably have an impact on Indo-US cultural relations and Desai claims, will help to create a "better understanding about what India does and why India does it." He said he hopes it will lead to more exchanges of art, culture, science and technology, encourage more Americans to visit India, increase trade with the United States and remove some of the ignorance about India. "If we understand each other better, then we will have better relations."

On the subject of Indo-US cultural ties, Tanen said, the Indo-US subcommission suggested sometime ago that a multi-faceted festival might be an idea for further exploration. The idea for the Festival grew after President Reagan hosted a state visit by Indira Gandhi in 1982, and the two leaders decided to emphasise cultural exchanges between their countries. The Festival is being modelled after a smaller version held in London two years ago.

About 30 political, economic, and cultural seminars on India will be held throughout the United States before the Festival is completed next year. The seminar's opening lecture on "Living in A Revolution," will be presented by noted Indian sociologist Dr M. N. Srinivas in Austin on 7 February. Other highlights will include "The Sculpture of India: 3000 B.C.—1300 A.D." to be held at the National Gallery of Art in Washington and the Art Institute of Chicago: "India" at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and "From Indian Earth: 4,000 years of Terracotta Art" at the Brooklyn Museum of New York. An exhibition, "Akbar's India: Mughal Art From the City of Victory," which will be opened at the Asia Society Gallery in New York

An antique medallion to be exhibited at the Festival of India in the United States of America

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is scheduled to visit the United States in June and will officially inaugurate the Festival.

Tanen said, "What we should be reaching for" is more exchange, more books and more programmes over the next 20 years. In particular, he is looking towards the exchange of dancers and music students in the future. There may also be future exchanges of computer technicians and hotel managers. He pointed out that "India has as much to teach us as we have to teach them."

Jacquelyn S. Porth, Austin (Texas)

Doctor After Our Hearts

There are 50,000 persons all over the world who owe their lives to one man: Dr Denton A. Cooley, the world famous heart-surgeon from the USA who has performed the largest number of heart operations in the world. Cooley was in India recently to participate in the four-day world conference on open heart surgery at Bombay. During his stay, he was conferred the prestigious Dhanvantari award for excellence in the field of medicine. Cooley became the second non-Indian after Dr Christiaan Barnard to receive the award which was constituted in 1971 and given to Dr Barnard in 1981.

The visit of Dr Cooley was useful as eminent Indian cardiologists discussed with him the advances made in the field of heart surgery. According to Dr Cooley, the greatest advance has already been made by scientists in his country when they devised the Jarvik-7: a machine which can sustain life without the human heart functioning. The only disappointment in the past was the failure of doctors to implant a baboon's heart in Baby Fae at the Loma Linda hospital in the United States.

Dr Denton Cooley

Cooley's visit also helped to rekindle the old connections the doctor has with this country He has performed a number of open heart surgery operations on eminent Indians, the last on Satyajit Ray, renowned Indian filmmaker. Dr Cooley also promised cardiologists in India that he would train more Indians in open-heart surgery At present, there are ten Indian cardiologists who are working under him and training to be "Cooleys in the making."

Painted Tribute

A more moving tribute there could not have been. Art Heritage, Delhi, held a retrospective of Ram Kumar's paintings: over 70 tableaux in memory of Richard Bartholomew, the art-critic secretary of the Lalit Kala Akademi whose crew-cut figure loomed benevolently over the world of art until his tragic death in January this year following a cerebral stroke. The exhibition spans the works of Ram Kumar (60) from 1953 with figurative studies in loneliness and deprivation. Some of them are intimations of Picasso while others have the heavy black outlines of Fernand Leger (under whom Ram Kumar trained in Paris) There are his very personal landscape abstractions of 1984.. Richard Bartholomew's writings on Ram Kumar are placed below several of the canvases, in themselves prose poems. Ram Kumar, almost squirrel-like in his timidity, could easily have stepped out of the earlier paintings with his huge, soulful eyes and sharp face. Haunting are Ram Kumar's visions of Varanasi—and no one has said it better than him. Ram Kumar is, in fact, as good a writer of Hindi short stories as he is a painter. "Wandering along the ghats," he writes, "in a vast sea of humanity, I saw faces like masks bearing marks of suffering and pain, similar to black windows jutting out from dilapidated walls of worn-out old houses, places, temples, watching dead bodies lying in a line waiting for their turn at Manikarnika ghat, I almost felt the disappearing boundary line between life and death.. " Or "Varanasi has no colours, at least for me: only charred black and subdued white hold be tween them all the meanings and meaninglessness of life, and death "

Ram Kumar

Mission of Love

"At the risk of sounding like a hysterical movie star gushing, I have to say...he is the best thing that has happened to me," gushed she.

"It just happened. I met a beautiful person and I was determined she was going to be mine," asserted he.

The delirious ending of a Mills and Boon saga? This is real life and poetic injustice: the couple who tied the nuptial knot on 2 February under the boughs of the giant peepul tree in the compound of Bombay's oldest temple, Laxminarayan, is no other than the Bombay socialite editor with the ascerbic, often unkind, pen, Shobha Kilachand, and shipping magnate, "decisive" Dilip De of the Ranadip Group of Companies. The target of Ms Kilachand's (editor of Stardust, Society and now Celebrity) poisonous darts were often people who mouthed such dialogues. The Kilachand-De saga itself is ready script for a romantic who-dun-it: there was suspense aplenty. The day of her wedding nuptials was the day for Ms Kilachand's divorce by mutual consent from Sudhir Kilachand, her previous husband and the father of her two children. Would the husband turn up in court? Suspense in the movies often pivots around whether the groom will make it to the court on time. Meanwhile, waiting impatiently for Ms Kilachand across many oceans was Frenchman Guy de Chevalier in the United States: the raison d' etre of the divorce.

Dilip De weds Shobha Kilachand: wooing with paintings

Perhaps the romantic, former French consul in Bombay had said it with roses. De however, wooed la Kilachand with a painting a month: Bikas Bhattacharya, Krishan Khanna, etc. She might have just run out of wall space and decided to move into De's bigger residence.

A Game of Chicanery

By Dr Ashok Mitra

Farooq Abdullah was removed from his position as chief minister of Jammu and Kashmir by the state Governor, Mr Jagmohan, at 5.30 pm on 2 July 1984. Till that particular hour, Farooq Abdullah was the constitutionally elected chief minister of the state; he was the state's home minister too. Throughout the previous night, that is, the night of 1-2 July, battalions of the Border Security Force (BSF) and the Central Reserve Police (CRP) were being freshly deployed in and around Srinagar. In addition, two battalions of the Madhya Pradesh Special Armed Force, specially trained in anti-dacoity operations, were flown from Bhopal to Srinagar before daybreak. Dr Farooq Abdullah, who was the chief minister and home minister of the state till the evening of 2 July, was however not kept informed about this induction of outside forces in the state; these movements of the police and paramilitary elements took place without his knowledge and without his approval.

This was in clear breach of constitutional procedures; what took place was unconstitutional and, therefore, illegal. I was a member of the team which the opposition parties sent to Srinagar on 5 July to express our solidarity with the people of Jammu and Kashmir against the outrage perpetrated on them by the union government in dismissing, through the Governor, the National Conference government of Dr Farooq Abdullah and installing instead a government of usurpers and defectors. The delegation met Mr Jagmohan, the Governor, in the afternoon of 6 July. I drew his attention towards this deployment of outside forces during 1-2 July without the approval and knowledge of the state chief minister, and enquired whether this action did not represent a grave departure from constitutional practices. The Governor's response was breathtaking in its candour. He did not deny that such movements of para-military and other forces had taken place without the knowledge and concurrence of the state chief minister; nonetheless, as Governor of a sensitive border state, he was in the know of things which he could not discuss or divulge. Such knowledge impelled him to take certain decisions which might not be in conformity with "constitutional niceties," but he could not bother about such "niceties."

This was an extraordinary statement on the part of a Governor who had been sworn in to maintain the dignity of the Constitution. But this was part of all that happened in Jammu and Kashmir during the several months preceding and following the atrocious dismissal of Farooq Abdullah's ministers. For whatever reason, perhaps because of the advice rendered by her immediate political entourage which included her offspring, or perhaps because of sheer pique at the drubbing she received at the hands of the National Conference in the June 1983 state Assembly election, Indira Gandhi had made up her mind to get rid of Farooq Abdullah. The ploys adopted, in close succession to one another and sometimes simultaneously, were crude as well as obvious. Immediately following the installation of the National Conference government, the Congress(I) raised a hue and cry over the state of law and order in Jammu and Kashmir. This was a ploy used in West Bengal for the past several years by Indira Gandhi to discredit the Left Front government in West Bengal. The cheekiness of the accusation apart—certainly compared to such eminently Congress(I)-ruled states as Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan and Haryana or, for that matter Delhi—none of the non-Congress(I) states could or can hold a candle when the issue of the prevalence of lawlessness is concerned. There is nothing surprising in the kind of pressure Farooq Abdullah was subjected to. Any political party, which tries to develop a base in any part of the country against the authoritarianism of the party Indira Gandhi built, would be at the receiving end of such pressure. B.K. Nehru, the incumbent Governor, decided to treat with contempt the plea of a breakdown of law and order. For the Congress*wallahs*, the next device was to raise the bogey of Pakistani infiltration and the supposed anti-national sentiments harboured by Farooq Abdullah. This was again a rerun of old, faded stories. In the kind of situation Kashmir is in, and given her history spanning over the past 37 years, it is inevitable that elements would exist who would nurture pro-Pakistani dreams. Bakshi Ghulam Mohammad, Mohammad Sadiq and Syed Mir Qaseem had been successively installed as Congress chief ministers following the deposition of Sheikh Abdullah; none of them could contain the spreading influence of the so-called pro-Plebiscite groups; they were there, and depending on the season, were either dormant or strident. Even after the re-installation of Sheikh Abdullah in 1975, these elements merely went underground and continued to function under various garbs. Everyone, including the rulers in Delhi, have been aware of this pervasive problem in Kashmir. This was, however, never an inter-party political issue: occasionally, after hours, even the Congress(I) had canvassed for the support of such pro-Pakistani elements, as, for instance, on the eve of the Assembly elections in 1983. There was a general assumption that once the state is allowed a reasonably stable spell of free and unhindered democratic experimentation, the pro-Pakistani groups would lose their relevance. Unfortunately, in the process of the odious game Indira Gandhi and her offspring decided to play following their electoral rebuff in 1983, these very elements have now received indirect encouragement; they have now become respectable, and their capability for mischief-creation has increased enormously. Give the dog a bad name, give the dog a Pakistani name, seems to be the crude, naive slogan the Congress Party chose exclusively to bank upon in Kashmir, and the slogan itself has threatened to emerge as the message.

My Dismissal By Farooq Abdullah, as told to Sati Sahni. Vikas Publishing House, 1985. Rs 50.

Sondeep Shankar

Dr Farooq Abdullah: ousted by political foes

Or, perhaps, all this is mere facade. Perhaps the root of the problem in Kashmir is more complex. India is their fiefdom and Kashmir is their home base: Indira Gandhi and her family had taken both statements as axioms. Any sign or more, which would disturb the foundation of this axiomatic notion, would have a disequilibrating effect on their minds. Indira Gandhi hated the guts of the opposition chief ministers and the opposition parties. Farooq Abdullah committed an unpardonable sin when, contrary to the role played by his departed father, he decided to join actively in the mainstream of national politics and started building bridges of understanding with the national opposition parties. His folly was to join the conclave of opposition parties and to follow it up by inviting the conclave to meet in Srinagar in October 1983. When Begum Abdullah in a final effort to repair the torn fabric of understanding between the Nehru-Gandhis and the Abdullahs, took Farooq for an audience with Madam Prime Minister in early 1984, Indira Gandhi remained altogether unmoved: her obsessive complaint to Begum Abdullah was that since Farooq had taken the wrong decision to team up with the opposition, he would receive no quarter fromher; nobody from Kashmir, howsoever eminent or supposedly indispensable, should be in a position to commit lese majeste and yet hope for the queen's pardon.

The rest of what followed falls into a pattern. If B.K. Nehru would not play the game, get rid of him; snub and harass Farooq on the flimsiest of pretext; make it clear to Farooq that he might be the state's chief minister, but he would not be allowed to receive the nation's Prime Minister even when she visited Kashmir on official mission; build up little incidents into big ones; allege that Farooq Abdullah is hand-in-glove with Bhindranwale, allege that the incident on the cricket ground, when the West Indies played in Srinagar, were the joint efforts of Farooq Abdullah's men and Pakistani conspirators.

This is a murky story, a dirty story, a story which puts to shame this nation's democratic pretensions. The role played by Jagmohan, the Governor, who was installed in place of B.K. Nehru, makes the story only murkier; his insinuation that, as Governor, he knew more things about the nefarious doings of Farooq Abdullah was beneath contempt the day it was made, and remains so till today: it belongs to the same genre as the kind of ridiculous stuff D.D. Thakur has purveyed in his "White Paper." Against this background, the present Prime Minister's tall claims built around the passage of the Constitutional Amendment Act prohibiting political defections not only sounds hollow, but also reeks of hypocrisy. Rajiv Gandhi and his cohorts induced legislators to defect in Kashmir barely nine months ago; political morality was ruthlessly pushed aside; the world was told that whatever the Congress Party does is right and nothing else is right. And the Kashmir business was sought to be re-enacted, act by act and blow by blow, the very next month in Andhra Pradesh.

In this slim volume, Farooq Abdullah analyses the entire story with objectivity and dispassion. Here is a man who has matured a great deal in these two years. He has chosen to throw his lot with Indian nationalism, with the movement to sustain democracy in this nation, currently under all-out attack by the remnants of what was once the great Congress Party. It is a challenge which he has assumed for himself and, by assuming the challenge, he has done the Indian national ethos proud. This book deserves to be read; it would help readers to separate the patriotic wheat from the pretending chaff.

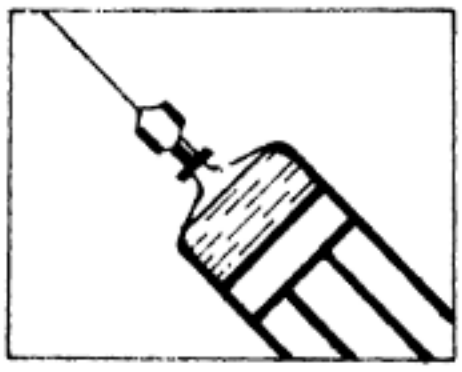
STUDENTS AND FREEDOM MOVEMENT

NEW DELHI: The Chief Executive Councillor, Jag Parvesh Chandra has announced that Delhi Administration has instituted prizes worth Rs 4.50 lakhs for the best three manuscripts for a book on "History of the Freedom Movement" (1857 to 1947) for students of secondary and senior secondary schools Details of the prizes are listed below

1ST PRIZE -
RS. 1,50,000 (One for English and one for Hindi)
2ND PRIZE -
Rs. 50,000 (One for English and one for Hindi)
3RD PRIZE -
Rs. 25,000 (One for English and one for Hindi)

The prizes have been declared State Awards by the Finance Ministry As such they have assumed greater prestige besides rendering the award money exempt from income tax.

The basic purpose of writing such a book is to keep the younger generation of our people fully informed about the freedom movement. Accounts of the heroic role of freedom fighters in the various mass movements will instil a sense of love of country among the young citizens. This will promote secular outlook and strengthen national integration, which is the very condition of our national survival.



Manuscripts will be accepted either in English or Hindi and may contain about 40,000 words Authors should send three copies of their manuscripts typed in double space under registered acknowledgement due cover by 31st December, 1985, to Secretary to the Chief Executive Councillor, Delhi Administration, Old Secretariat, Delhi-110054

A panel of eminent writers and reputed historians will screen the manuscripts.

Delhi Administration will hold the copyright of the first-prize-winning manuscripts and the right to translate, print, publish and sell the book in any Indian language besides English and Hindi and incorporate such changes as it deems fit. The second and third prize winners and other authors may get their manuscripts printed by any private publisher.

For further clarifications please write to the Chief Executive Councillor, Delhi Administration, Old Secretariat, Delhi-110054.

New Light on Blood Tests

Normally, patients who have to undergo blood tests are generally asked not to eat any food before the blood sample is extracted: food can affect blood readings, they are told. But Prof. Claus-Dieter Bloedner of Bamberg, Coburg and Lichtenfels labour medicine centres in West Germany states that most blood ratings, such as the enzyme count and the uric acid and cholesterin level, remain largely constant after meals. Tests of over 1,000 patients showed that only the triglyceride, or neutral fat, account for the substantial increase after food intake (and by up to 50 per cent after alcohol consumption). In combination with overweight, lack of exercise and stress, a high triglyceride count often leads to blood vessel complaints and thus needs treatment. The trouble with taking blood samples from patients with empty stomachs is that ratings which may be considered normal may later in the day increase to critical levels.

Checking Wear and Tear

Nowadays people with plastics and metal hip joints live normal lives; they carry out their regular chores and even play games without the aid of crutches and sticks. But before these could be invented, each day passed was one of agony; they were often in great pain and unable to walk. Artificial joints, however can wear off, after a few years, especially if the patient is young and energetic.

The hip-joint is a ball-and-socket arrangement. The head of the thigh bone is a knob and this rotates inside a cup on the pelvis. Normally, the ball is made from a titanium alloy and the cup from an especially hard form of polyethylene. Even these wear out too: fine particles of metal rub off and get embedded in the polyethylene, making the joint movement rough and increasing the rate of wear. An alternative has now been found. It was recently announced that a medical team in England had developed a very hard form of aluminium oxide. It can be polished very smooth Furthermore, the surface oxygen atoms attract hydrogen from fluids and form a molecular layer of water, thus producing a lubricant.

Research at the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority's research establishment at Harwell has shown that titanium alloy can be given a very hard surface which can greatly reduce wear. It is achieved by ion implantation, the ions being nitrogen. A special wear testing machine was devised to know the behaviour of titanium thus treated on polyethylene influenced by bovine serum, to simulate human body fluids. The wear was measured by using thin layer radioactivation of the titanium, and radioactivity in the wear debris indicated how much wear had taken place. The tests showed that the nitrided titanium alloy should last for around 30 years without pronounced wear.

Mothers, Beware of Alcohol

Mothers are advised to abstain from alcohol: there is every chance that their children will be born deformed if they do not do so. For instance, at least 2000 babies in West Germany are born deformed every year, on account of alcohol embryopathy, or alcohol damage in the womb. The statistics speak for themselves: two babies out of ten are born with defects; one in three has cardiac defects. Fifty per cent have abnormities in the outward appearance of the genitals, and one in ten has deformities in the urinary tract and bladder. Such children are noticeably small and underweight at birth. As they grow older their heads are seen to be much smaller than even their small bodies might lead one to expect.

There are several factors involved: the high blood count of acetaldehyde, the main toxic by-product of alcohol; the zinc folic acid count; and the b-group vitamin deficiency of pregnant alcoholics that causes anaemia. It is yet to be shown whether the embryo is affected if the father is a chronic alcoholic.

Where Are Columbus' Remains?

The whereabouts of the remains of Christopher Columbus, the explorer, remain a mystery. There are seven years to go before the 500th anniversary of Columbus' landing in the Americas, but it still is to be ascertained whether the remains are in Spain, Italy, Cuba or the Dominican Republic. Jonathon Ericson, a professor of social ecology at the university of California at Irvine, hopes to solve the conundrum this summer using atomic tracing of bones and teeth believed to be those of Columbus.

Columbus died in 1506 in Valladolid, Spain, and was buried there. The body was removed a few years later, either to Triana, Spain or to Seville. In 1541 or 1542, the remains were shipped to what is now the Dominican Republic, where Columbus landed on his first voyage. During excavations at the cathedral of Santo Domingo in 1795, human bones and ashes, presumed by some to be those of Columbus, were found next to the high altar. Early in the 19th century, Spanish authorities shipped the remains to Havana. Prof. Ericson believes someone else's bones were removed from Santo Domingo to Havana. In 1877, he said, a small lead casket was found in the cathedral of Santo Domingo, marked with the initials CCA, possibly for "Christopher Columbus, Admiral" in Spanish.

The test will use strontium isotope characterisation. Strontium enters food in small but lasting amounts. Its isotopes vary according to where the element was at the time it entered the food. Ericson will go to Genoa to learn the composition of strontium where Columbus was born and grew up. He will then test the remains in Santo Domingo. If the isotopes are the same, he said, the proof will have been established.

Illustrations: Prabir Sen

THIS INDIA

Illustration: Debashis Deb

NEW DELHI: Two employees of the Shipping Corporation of India (SCI), who opened a water tap to quench their thirst, found to their horror a creepy little water snake making its way to their glass. The four-inch snake, brownish in colour, apparently made its way, from the overhead tank through the water pipe to the SCI premises located on the first floor of the Chandralok building. Mr Vinod Krishna, a chartering executive, who discovered the snake by accident, said officials of the New Delhi Municipal Corporation were summoned to the spot. The snake is being preserved in a water bottle—Deccan Herald (U. Sudhundra, Bangalore)

VINUKONDA: The people of Railway Donakonda area are scared by the experiences of a recent incident, where a well dressed man, claiming himself to be a reporter of a Telugu daily, made away with some 'gifts' from a politician of the village. The impostor gained the confidence of the politician, by saying that he had come to make a survey of the political situation in the area The publicity-minded politician, in his over-enthusiasm, provided him with all the comforts he needed. He was given a tape recorder to amuse himself and clothes worth Rs 500 too. Later that night, the 'reporter' found his way out under the cover of darkness with the 'gifts'—Indian Express (C. Vijay Kumar, Hyderabad)

NAVAPUR (MAHARASHTRA): A tribal in the Satpura ranges of north Maharashtra often has to "kidnap" his bride and then pay a "fine," before they are declared married. The tribal kidnaps the girl of his choice and takes her to his house, where the bride's parents stage a mock fight before negotiating with the groom's parents regarding the amount he has to pay his father-in-law as a fine for breaking tribal laws. They are then declared married. Most of these zagada marriages take place during the Bhangora festival, equivalent to the Holi festival, when the tribals drink and dance before selecting their brides and kidnapping them—The Times (K. V. Nerlikar, Ambikanagar)

KUNDAPURA: Necessity is the mother of invention. Election campaigning has proved costly to many contestants. But elections do bring new ideas and novel methods of campaigning. Mr Mani Gopal, a fisherman, is contesting as a Janata Party candidate from the Byndoor constituency, which, surrounded by rivers, is easily accessible by boat. Not surprisingly, he chose to meet his voters in his "Matsya Vahini," the new name given to his boat. Mr Gopal has even fitted a loudspeaker to his boat and covers his constituency by sailing in his canoe—Deccan Herald (Girish G. Acharya, Bangalore)

BANGALORE: The largest ever ballot paper with names on both sides has been devised by the Election Commission to accommodate the 301 candidates from the Belgaum constituency. The chief electoral officer, T. P. Issar, who showed a sample ballot paper to reporters here, pointed out that this was the first time that a ballot paper was being printed with names on both sides. The size of the ballot paper is 24 by 30 inches with the obverse containing 160 names and the reverse having 141 names and symbols—Indian Express (P. Suryanarayana Murthy, Gudivada)

TIRUPATI: A candidate for the Tirupati seat in the Andhra Pradesh Assembly elections has been making full use of the two cinema theatres he owns here in his campaign which is specially directed at women voters. For the past week, he has been running free shows for women and children. With the news spreading like wildfire, large crowds throng the theatres every day and there is keen competition especially to get seats in the higher classes—The Times of India (Mahboob Ahmad, Aligarh)

TIRUPATI: Seven Telugu novels, written by seven different writers, were found in the Srivari hundi at Venkateswara temple, Tirumala hills on 25 February. The publishers seem to have offered the first copies of the novels to the Lord—Indian Express (K. Prabhakar Raju, Samalkot)

WITHOUT COMMENT

By the grace of God, I shall live on, and fight on. I'm better placed than the opposition. I shall prove that I'm the cleanest politician to take on 'Mr Clean'—A.R. Antulay in India Today

A bullock cart will run smoothly if a pair of bullocks are yoked to it. What'll happen if the bullock is yoked to a camel or a donkey?—Rajiv Gandhi, asking the people to vote for the Congress(I), in The Hindu

Rajiv Gandhi is a congenital liar—George Fernandes in The Sunday Observer

We did not call for the elections but Hegde like Sita wanted to walk on the fire so what could we do—Srikant Verma, after the Assembly results were announced

The voters of Karnataka were for a Rajiv Gandhi rather than a Chandra Shekhar in Delhi; but in their own state they knew exactly who to choose between Ramakrishna Hegde and Veerappa Moily—Editorial comment on Hegde's victory in The Telegraph

If I say I miss her (Mrs Gandhi) it will reflect badly on Rajiv Gandhi's leadership. If I say I don't miss her, it would mean there was nothing I had in common with Mrs Gandhi. Our relationship was too deep for me to spell out in a few sentences—P. V. Narasimha Rao in Society

All ad agencies are dominated by English-speaking people who know nothing about the rest of India—S.P. Singh, resident-editor of The Navbharat Times, in The Sunday Observer

I was always an '80s person. I was just ahead of my time—Tina Turner, winner of three Grammy awards, in Newsweek

Towering all Bumpers

FIRST TIME IN HISTORY

WIN OVER PRIZES RS. 2.1 CRORES

ANDHRA LAXMI

SUPER DELUXE UGADI BUMPER

GREATEST

1ST PRIZE

Rs. 1 CRORE

2ND PRIZE (10)

Rs. 10 LAKHS EACH

3RD PRIZE (100)

RS. 1 LAKH EACH

FIRST TIME IN BUMPERS OFFERING 64% PRIZES for-all

TICKET Rs. 200/-

ONE PRIZE GUARANTEED ON EVERY TICKET

DRAW 22.3.85

CHANDRA AGENCIES FOR PROSPERITY

Organisers

CHANDRA AGENCIES

HOTEL CONTINENTAL ANNEXE REGAL BUILDING. NEW DELHI PH · 311351 311208.

Issued by Convenor Raffle Committee D D Hospital, Hyderabad.

SHARAD 838 ALUB

BEGINNING 17 MARCH 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) The week ahead is extremely lucky for those in love and intending to get married Your financial prospects look bright. Professionals and businessmen will find the going smooth. Pleasant surprises are in store for students. However, the domestic front is likely to bother you: do not hesitate to shoulder responsibilities. Keep a vigilant eye on your health and diet.
Good dates: 17, 19 and 21
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: South-west

LEO (15 August—14 September) Be wary of your close friends and relatives: someone is working to deceive you At office, you are likely to be misunderstood by your colleagues. The domestic front will not remain peaceful Professionals and businessmen are likely to face opposition from their competitors Your health will add to your worries this week
Good dates: 17, 19 and 21
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 9
Favourable direction: South-east

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) This is a favourable period for students do not fritter away the opportunities that come your way. Businessmen will also find the time equally good this is the right phase to materialise expansion plans. Professionals will get the opportunity they were looking for However things are not all that bright on the home front: avoid unnecessary arguments.
Good dates: 17, 21 and 22
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: North

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) The stars shine brightly on the financial front and some of you are likely to gain money through an unexpected source. This is also a favourable week for courtship and matrimonial alliances A promotion cannot be ruled out for those in government service Businessmen should not hesitate to take risks. Those above 45 should be careful about their health and diet
Good dates: 18, 19 and 22
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 7
Favourable direction: North

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) A journey which you were looking forward to is in the offing You will be able to solve most of your domestic problems this week Businessmen are likely to bag lucrative contracts while a promotion cannot be ruled out for professionals There is good news for those unemployed a job is in the offing. This is also a favourable time for courtship and marriage negotiations.
Good dates: 19, 21 and 23
Lucky numbers: 4, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: South

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) This is not a good period for businessmen check all documents before finalising deals Professionals are likely to be criticised by their employers Your health will add to your worries this week However, this in an extremely good phase for lovers you can materialise marriage plans. A letter towards the end of the week will bring pleasant surprise.
Good dates: 18, 19 and 20
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: South

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) Businessmen and professionals should be wary of deception Social engagements will keep you busy throughout the week but do not neglect your work. You are likely to fall sick during this week consult a doctor at the slightest indication of illness. However, this is a favourable period to solve legal problems. This is also a good week for those in love
Good dates: 19, 20 and 23
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 5
Favourable direction: East

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) Success in all your ventures is a certainty for most of you Students will come out with flying colours in examinations Jobs are in the offing for those unemployed Lawyers and politicians will also find this phase favourable This is the opportune time for bachelors to get married A letter will bring good tidings. Your health will also improve markedly
Good dates: 19, 20 and 21
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 4
Favourable direction: North-east

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) Lovers are advised to avoid unnecessary tiffs misunderstandings may lead to estrangement Businessmen are advised not to undertake risky ventures. However, this is a favourable period for those employed a transfer to a place of your liking is in the offing Students will get opportunities to study abroad Your health will also improve during this phase
Good dates: 18, 21 and 22
Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 7
Favourable direction: North-west

CANCER (15 July—14 August) This is a week of mixed fortunes Businessmen and professionals will make steady progress Creative artists will find this period favourable. If you intend to get married, this is the opportune time to do so However, your financial prospects look bleak The domestic front will also bother you. Do not neglect your health.
Good dates: 18, 20 and 22
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: West

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) Financially, this is not a bright phase: do not take unnecessary risks and avoid extravagance You may suddenly fall sick incurring a lot of expenditure The week is also disheartening for lovers an affair may come to an end. Professionals should deal with their superiors diplomatically A letter will bring good news
Good dates: 18, 22 and 23
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: West

PISCES (15 March—14 April) Stellar influences make this a bleak period for all of you. Businessmen are advised to put off all major deals for some time. On the professional front you may face opposition from your colleagues: do not lose your temper and deal with them diplomatically Lovers are advised to postpone marriage plans Take care of your health and do not overstrain yourself
Good dates: 17, 18 and 19
Lucky numbers: 2, 5 and 9
Favourable direction: East

For those born on the 18th, 19th or 20th of any month:

Most of you are ambitious: your desire to excel in life on all fronts makes you adventurous by nature. You do not hesitate to take decisions at crucial moments You have a commanding personality and friends and relatives look upon you for advice. Most of you are also gifted with robust health. Women born during this period are extremely fair and they make good housewives.

Give us an idea for a great cause and win Rs. 1 lac in prizes.

India is potentially a colossus. The citizen have great faith in the future of the Country, but past experiences have left us quite disillusioned. Many have bright and original ideas to solve the problems but there seems no way to get these across.

The new government has suddenly infused great hopes, but there are yet no signs of great happenings. Unless quick decisions are taken and implemented, much will remain a pious hope only.

It is now the time for the conscientious, particularly the retired personnel, journalists, academicians and the experts to come forward and give a helping hand by sending us ideas/suggestions which can take the Country forward. We shall have these examined by a panel of experts and if found suitable, you would not only win a prize but have the satisfaction of its reaching the right quarters. A total amount of Rs one lac is offered in prizes with individual prizes of upto Rs. 5000/- depending upon the value of the idea/suggestion.

The ideas/suggestions may cover all major activities of the government like industry, commerce, agriculture, housing, rail and road transport, education, telephone, postal, tourism, banking, income-tax, sales-tax, law, labour, family planning, rural and urban unemployment, eradication of corruption, discipline and ethics, youth welfare, public sector undertakings, UPSC DDA, MCD, DTC Army, Navy Airforce, BSF, Police and others.

The ideas/suggestions will be selected mainly on the basis of their originality and innovativeness. These must be practical and capable of being implemented within a period of 3-6 months. These will be suitably edited, compiled and forwarded to the government.

The write-up may contain more than one idea/suggestion but must pertain to one subject only clearly specifying the problem and its precise solution. It should be as brief as possible and of not more than 400 words. Two copies, typed in double space along with your name and address are to be sent, so as to reach within 10 days of the issue of this advertisement, at the following address:-

Ideas for a Cause
P.O. Box 7110
New Delhi-110 002

jac

SPONSORS

TOURIST CAMP
Jawaharlal Nehru Marg
New Delhi-110 002

VARIETY

CHESS

The true merit of an extra pawn, however weak, isolated, distant or doubled, is the ability to lose it and maintain material equality

Nowhere will the principle be illustrated more eloquently than in the following game. White grabs a perfectly worthless pawn in the opening but uses its return as a springboard to activate his own pieces, finally proving the value of what once was his weakling by queening it

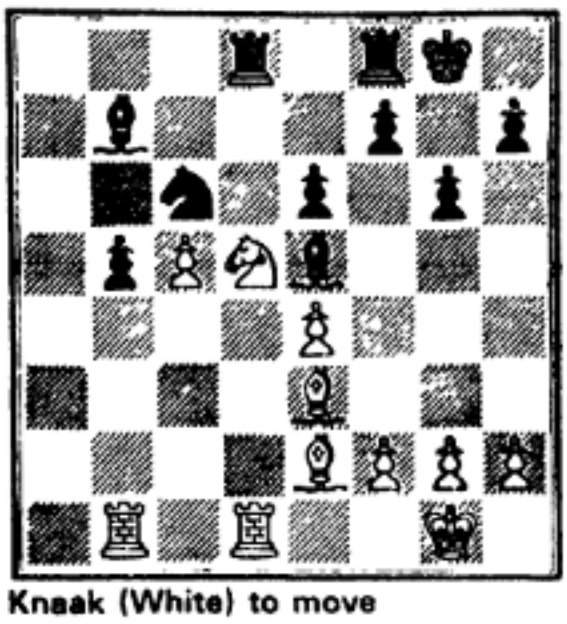
White: Knaak. Black Ftachnik Grunfeld Defence.

1 P–Q4 N–KB3 2 P–QB4 P–KN3
3 N–QB3 P–Q4 4 PxP NxP
5 P–K4 NxN 6 PxN B–N2
7 B–QB4 P–QB4 8 N–K2 O–O
9 O–O N–B3 10 B–K3 P–N3
11 PxP

Winning this pawn in the Grünfeld is generally an utter waste of time

11 . . . Q–B2 12 N–Q4 N–K4
13 N–N5 Q–N1 14 B–K2 P–QR3
15 N–R3 P–QN4 16 R–N1 B–N2
17 Q–B2 N–B3 18 KR–Q1 Q–K4

The time is now ripe for White's trump card



19 N–B4! QxBP 20 QxQ BxQ
21 N–N6

With material equality re-established, but White is now holding the initiative.

21 . . . QR–Q1 22 N–Q5 B–K4
23 P–QR4 P–K3 24 PxP PxP

DIAGRAM

Ftachnik (Black)

Knaak (White) to move

25 BxP!! PxN 26 PxP N–K2
27 P–Q6 N–Q4 28 B–N5

Forcing Black's hand, as 29 P–B3 30 B'–QB4 would be most unpleasant

28 . . . N–B6 29 BxR RxB
30 R–K1! NxR 31 RxB B–B1

The only defence to the threat of P-Q7 and R–K8, namely 32 P-Q7 BxP 33 R–Q5 R–N1! 34 BxB N–B6.

32 R–K3!

Renewing the threat of P-Q7 and blocking out the knight's escape

32 B–K3 33 R–Q3 R–N1

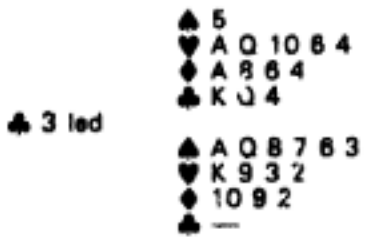
Or 33 B-B4 34 P-B6! BxR 35 P-B7 R-KB1 36 BxB

34 P–Q7 BxP 35 BxB N–B6
36 P–B3 R–N8+ 37 K–B2 R–B8
38 K–K3 K–B1 39 K–Q2 N–R7
40 P–B6 R–B5 41 R–N3 N–N5?

With 41 K-K2 Black may still fight on

42 RxN Resigns

Positional wipeout



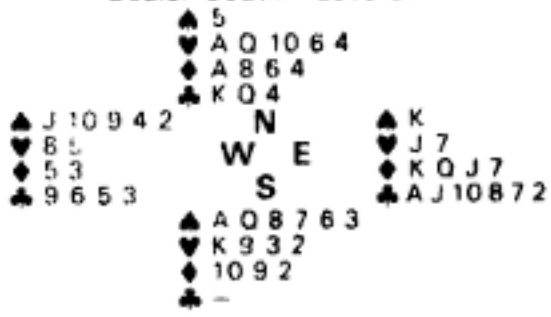
White Belyavsky Black Georgadze
Queen's Gambit Declined

1 P–Q4 P–Q4 2 P–QB4 P–K3
3 N–QB3 B–K2 4 N–B3 N–KB3
5 B–N5 O–O 6 P–K3 P–KR3
7 B–R4 P–QN3 8 B–K2 B–N2
9 BxN BxB 10 PxP PxP
11 O–O Q–K2 12 Q–N3 R–Q1
13 QR–Q1 P–B3 14 KR–K1 N–Q2
15 B–B1 N–B1 16 P–K4 PxP
17 NxP N–K3 18 B–B4 R–K1
19 N–K5 QR–Q1 20 P–B4 BxN
21 QPxB N–Q5 22 Q–N3 R–KB1
23 N–Q6 RxN 24 PxR QxP
25 P–B5 Q–B4 26 Q–B2 R–Q1
27 B–N3 B–R3 28 R–K4 B–K7
29 R(K4)xN Resigns.

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE

Australian bidding like the continent, is always upside down, with the result that South somehow became the declarer in Six Hearts on this deal from an international trial:



East had shown long clubs in the course of the bidding. Dummy's queen of clubs was covered by the ace. How would you set about the play?

The Australian magazine follows the estimable practice of presenting in advance the problems that arise in later pages

Looking at this one, it occurred to me that it might be a good idea to let the ace of clubs hold, discarding a diamond and retaining entries to the South hand Reading on, I found that Peter Gill, who won the trial in partnership with Ron Klinger, made this unusual play The full hand was —

Dealer South Love all

Having won the first trick with the ace of clubs, East returned the king of diamonds, won by dummy's ace When the king of spades appeared on the first round, the declarer ruffed a spade with the queen of hearts, then drew trumps with ace and king Another spade was ruffed, the diamond loser was thrown on the king of clubs, and with two trumps still left in hand the declarer was able to establish the spade winners

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

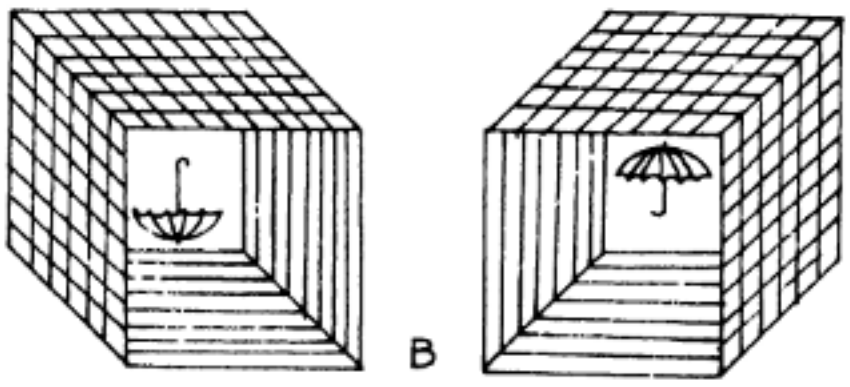
1. Which country was formed by the merger of the states of Serbia, Slovenia, Montenegro, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia?
2. How is Karol Wojtyla better known as?
3. Oxygen is the commonest element found in the earth's crust. Which is the second commonest element?
4. What is the wooden support over which strings are stretched in violins, cellos and guitars called?
5. Name the Indian physicist awarded the Nobel Prize in 1930 for his research on the scattering of light rays?
6. What is a Jewish priest called?
7. With which sport do you associate the names of Mario Andretti and Niki Lauda?
8. Kestrel, merlin, hobby and peregrine are birds of prey belonging to which species?
9. Who invented the typewriter?
10. What is phasmophobia the fear of?

ANSWERS

1. Yugoslavia.
2. Pope John Paul II.
3. Silicon
4. The bridge.
5. Dr C.V. Raman.
6. The rabbi
7. Motor-racing
8. The falcon
9. Pellegrine Tarri of Italy in 1808.
10. Ghosts.

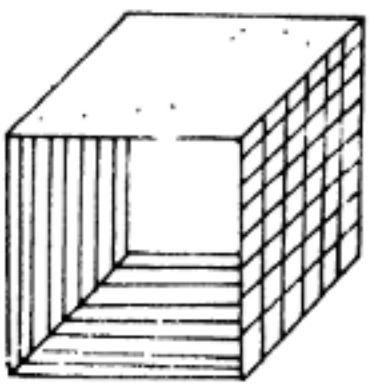
TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU



Word Play

			,		■			■		■				?	■
					■			■					■		■
		■				■						■					■	■	■
					■						■			■
B	H	A	A	D	Y	I	E	E	A	A	L	A	M	A	M	E	E	A	E
W	H	I	C	H		S	M	T	C	E	N	A	N	A	S	R	H	E	T
W	O	U	L	N		W	N		H	L	R	L	S	E		T	O	S	T
W	Y		T	S			O		L							W



The letters in each column below the grid go into the boxes directly above them. Your job is to find which letter goes into which box. Fill in one and two letters words first. As you use a letter, cross it off. When you have used up all the letters, you will have a famous quotation.

Shape Sleuth

The first two positions A) and B) of this open box show which way up. Can you find which way up it is in the position C)?

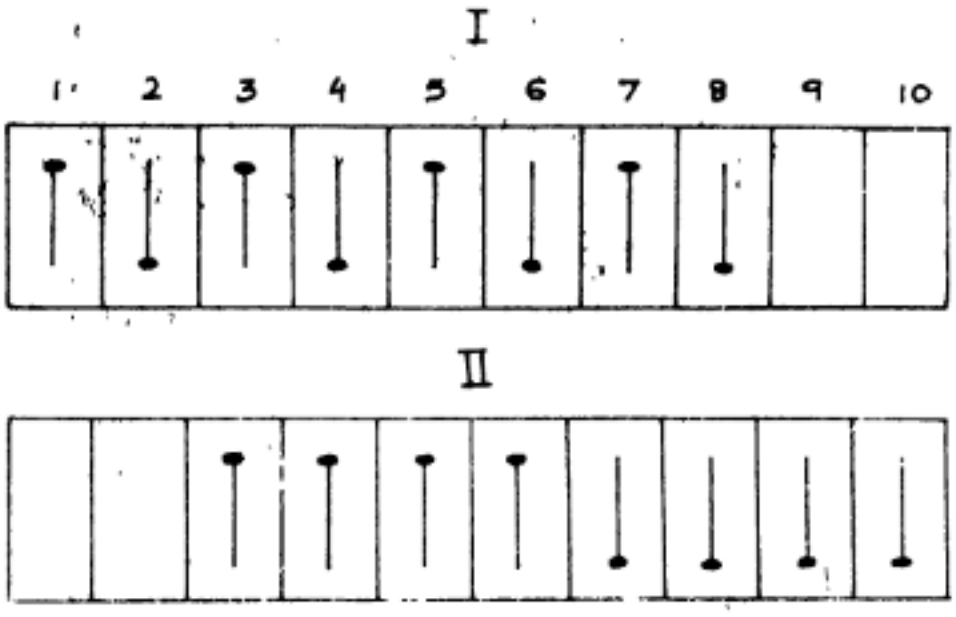
A B

C

Figure it Out

Using various combinations of four 9s only make up numbers from 1 to 20. For example, (9+9)÷(9+9) =1 or (9×9)÷(9×9) = 1. There are more than one combinations for many numbers. Use of brackets square root sign and decimals is allowed.

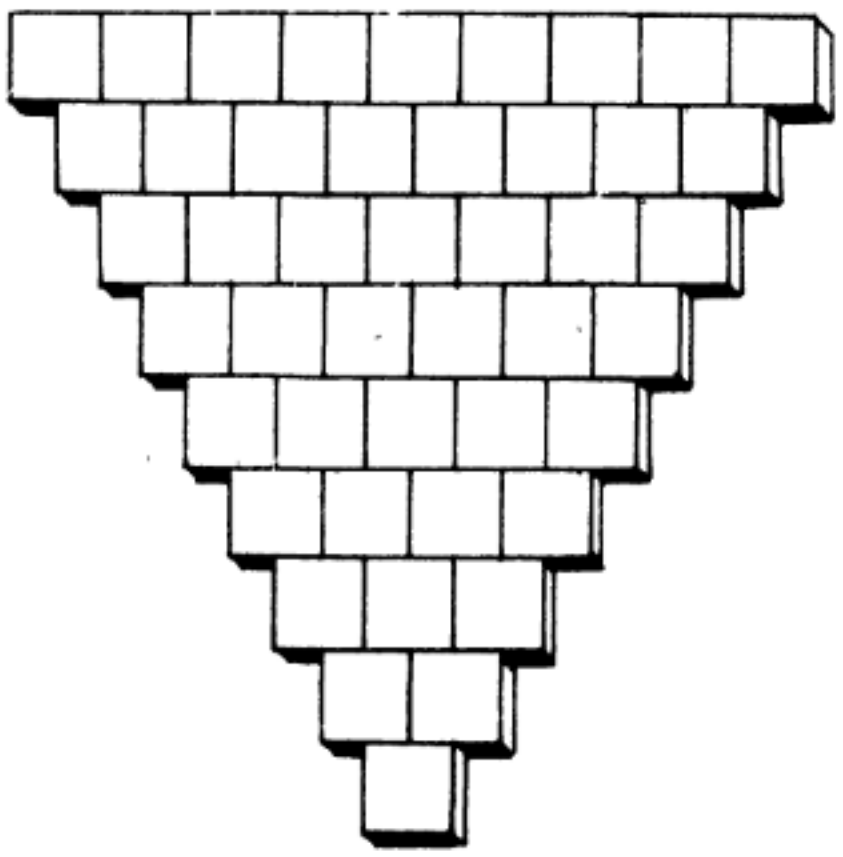
Wit Sharpener



Joseph, Ruma, Devina went out for tea, and sat around a cosy table in a nice, little restaurant. Each of them ordered two items each. This is what they were served:
Joseph: Channa and fruitcake
Rumma: Melon and mango.
Devina: Cola and bread rolls.
Mahesh: Ice cream and sandwiches.

As it happened, everything they had ordered arrived, but not in the correct order. Not one of them was given what they had asked for, neither did any one person get both the items ordered by the other person. After exchanging of plates, etc., they finally settled down to eat what they had asked for. This is how they were sitting:

The one opposite Mahesh had fruitcake. The one on Devina's left had Channas and on Ruma's right had Cola. Joseph was between breadrolls on his right and ice cream on his left, and mango opposite him.



How were they seated and what had each one ordered?

Quick Think

Eight matchsticks are placed with their heads alternately up and down, as shown in illustration I. Moving two consecutive sticks at a time, what is the least number of moves you require to bring them to position II.

Blockbuster

In this inverted pyramid, the 9-letter word at the top is an anagram of SLIT GRANT. Remove one letter at a time, and do not re-arrange the letters. The remaining eight letters form a word. Continue in this manner till you reach the lowest box.

Quizbizz

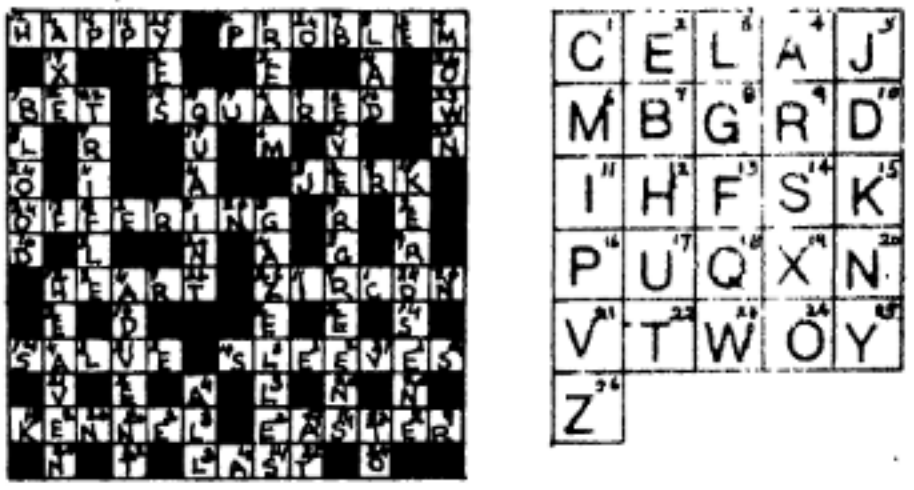
A truffle (pronounced troofle) is a: i) vegetable ii) herb iii) fungus.

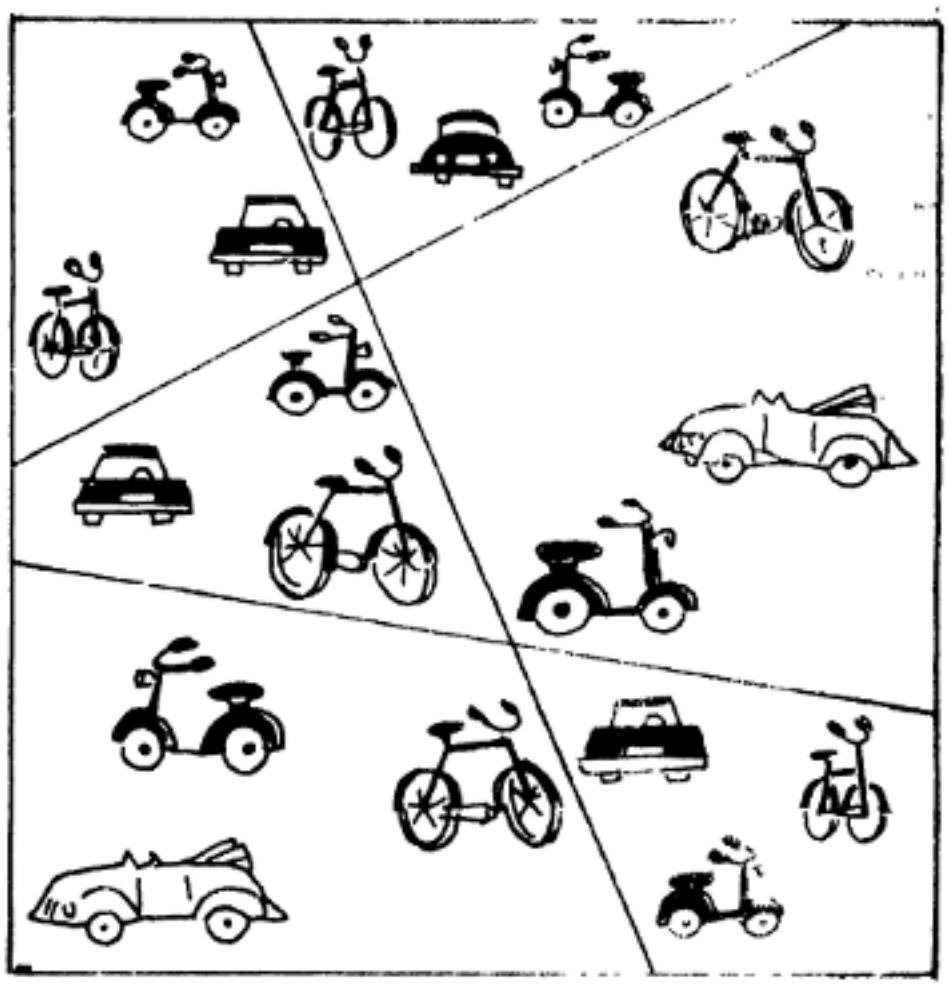
Missing Link

Can you complete this chain: 7783, 7777, 1111, 1106, 158, 154, —

Solutions to last week's Teasers:

Cryptocross:





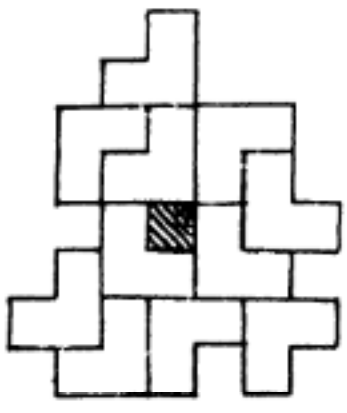


Figure it Out:

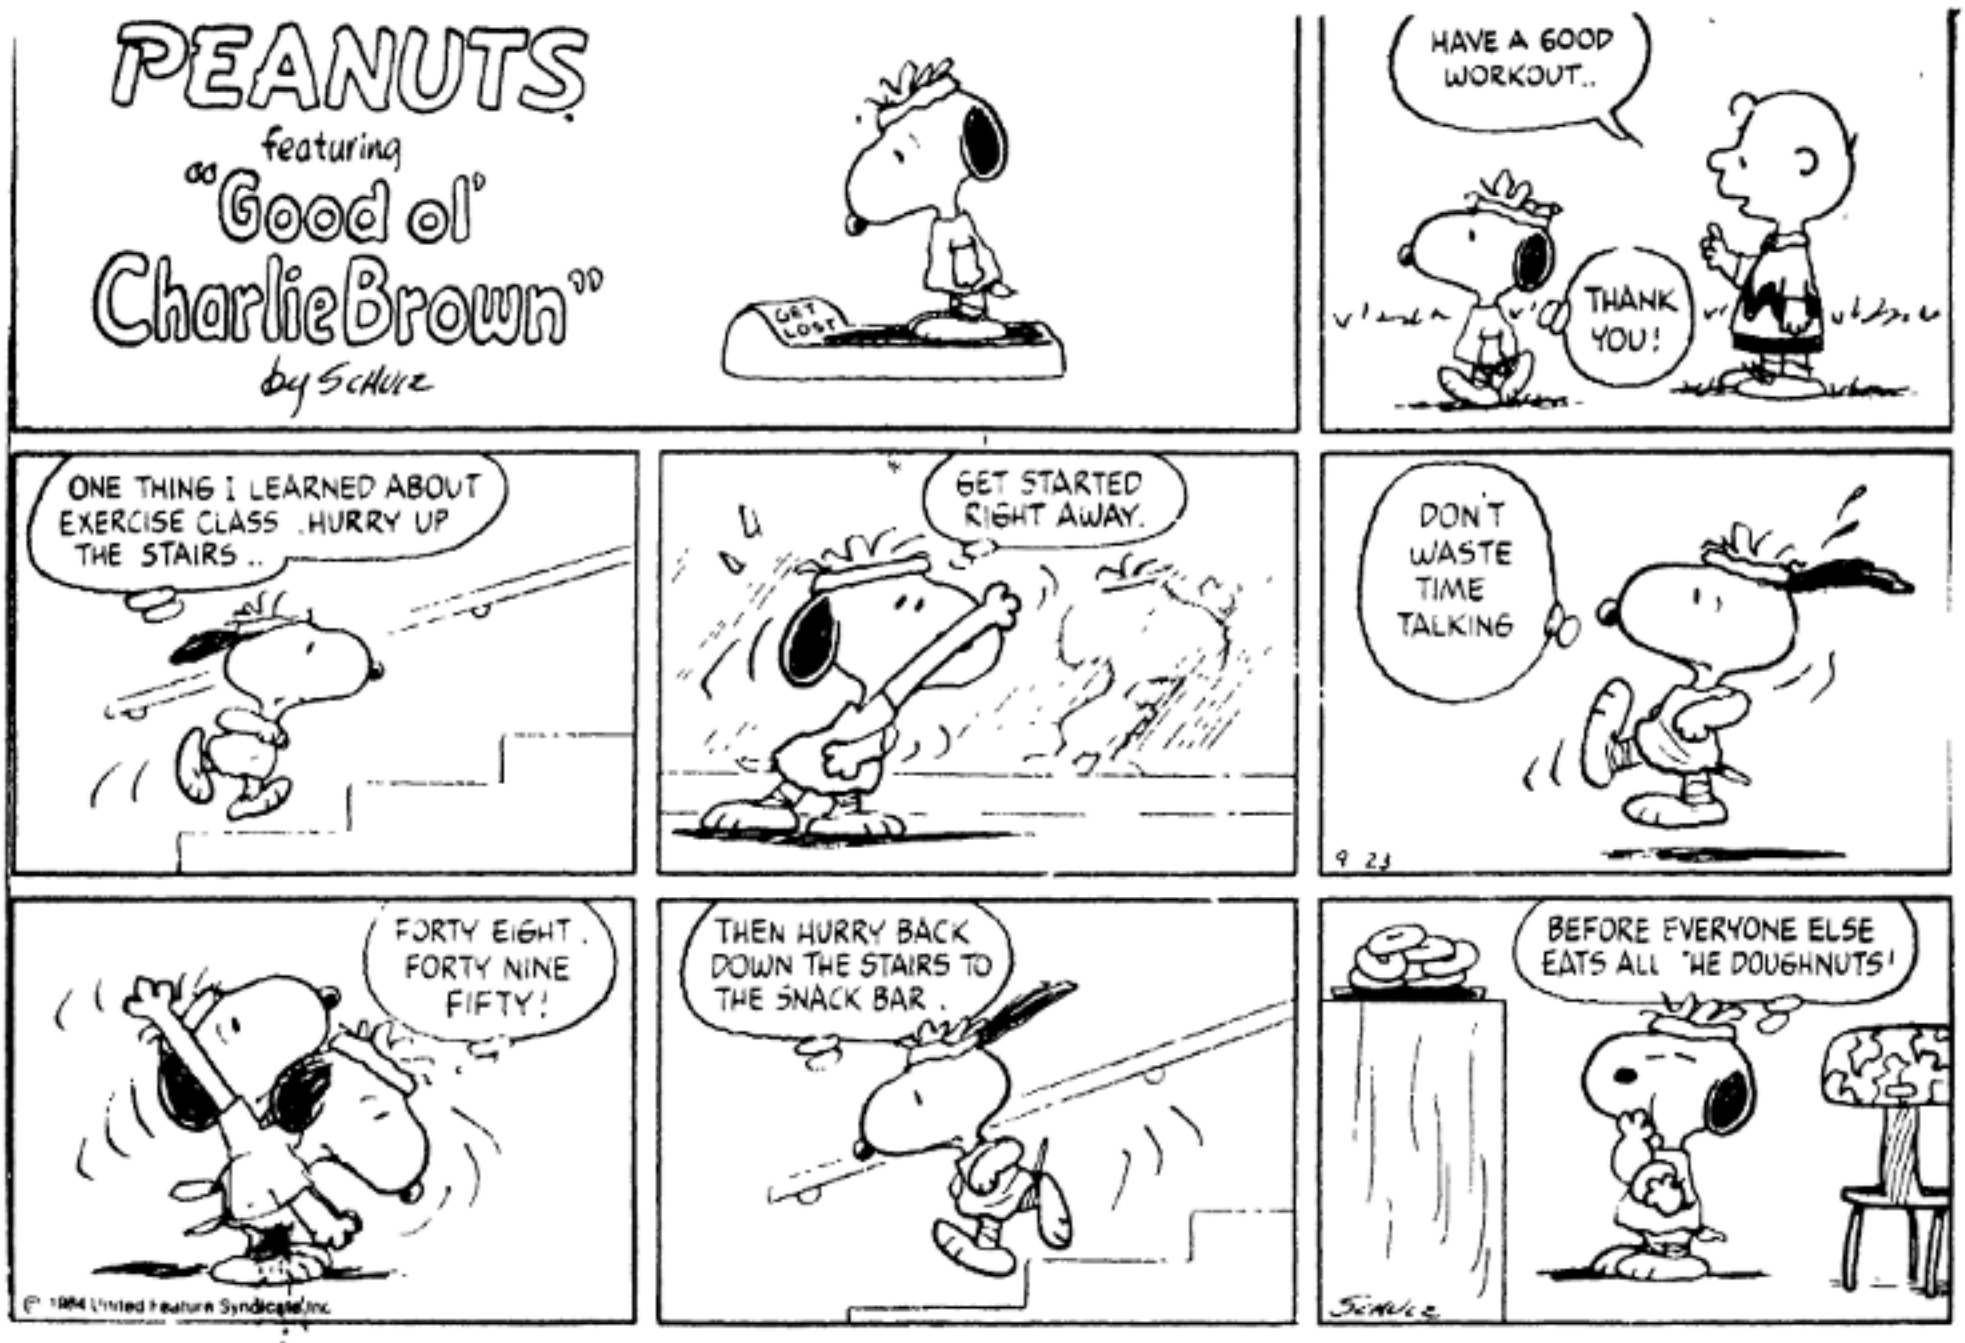
Shape Sleuth:



Blockbuster

Word Power: Boomerang, Anglican, Candelabra, Brassie, Siesta, Taboo
Blankagrams: Ran, Near, Snare, Reason, Treason

What's in a Word: a) Canton b) canopy c) canal d) cantata e) canasta f) canyon

Quick Think: If A is superimposed on B it will produce figure 1.

"I'm supposed to watch my cholesterol level–at 34 ?! Does this mean I have to change my whole lifestyle ?"

No, you don't.
With Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls.

Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls help to reduce high cholesterol levels. Because they contain pure garlic oil that has been recognised by Ayurveda, and modern medical science, to have great curative properties.

Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls also help in relieving gas and indigestion, easing joint pains, preventing recurring coughs and colds.

Just two Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls twice a day keep you in good health.

RANBAXY'S
GARLIC
PEARLS

All the cures that nature put in garlic—without the smell.

OBM/9260

VARIETY/KHAAS BAAT

What's wrong with Ranjeeta? Her career, which at one point of time seemed to be promising, has now almost come to an end. She has just two or three films on hand but these films have been in the making for years now. Realising that there is no other way out for her, Ranjeeta has given up hope and has started investing her money in a number of projects. And if the rumours in the tinsel city are correct, Ranjeeta is soon to become Mrs Akbar Khan.

It took Sarika two years to forget the semi-nude scene in Jalal Agha's Nirvaan. "Wherever I went people only talked of that scene. It did irreparable loss to my career," Sarika confided with a shudder thinking of those days. But Sarika is worried about the rumours that are being spread about her again. These concern two "hot bedroom scenes" she has done with Marc Zuber in a film called Qatl. "I don't know when this kind of talk will stop. I did both the scenes," said Sarika, offering a weak explanation, "because the story demanded them."

Umesh Vyas

Sarika (above) and Ranjeeta (below)

Durgaprasad

The Javed Akhtar-Shabana Azmi marriage which took place at 2.00 am in the morning not so long ago, has become a pet subject of gossip-mongers. Javed, incidentally, has not yet divorced his first wife. Shabana too has never spent more than two days with Javed at his home. This strange behaviour on her part has given rise to all kinds of speculation and many of the duo's well-wishers have already started saying that the marriage "will not last." Javed, however, is very reluctant to talk about his marriage. Says he: "It is a strictly personal matter and whatever happens to us or between the two of us is for us to worry about. We are mature adults and we know what we have done."

Shyam Benegal wanted to make another film with Jennifer Kapoor (she had acted in his Junoon), when she died so suddenly. Benegal, in fact, had been working on the script of the film when he learnt about the actress's death. Naturally, he started searching for a replacement. His efforts have been rewarded, for Leela Moraes (wife of Dom Moraes and a one-time Hindi film actress) has agreed to take the leading role. Leela was thrilled when she received the offer.

Another young girl trying to make it big in South Indian films is Rani Sudha nee Archana who has a diploma from the Adayar Film Institute, Madras. Her first Tamil film Ningal Ketta Vai was directed by Balu Mahendra. She has also acted in the Malayalam film, Malmukhalile Daivam, directed by P.S. Menon.

DELHI DIARY

Jagmohan's Ire

Sandeep Saran

Jagmohan

The Jammu and Kashmir Governor, Jagmohan, is annoyed with the government of Ghulam Mohammad Shah. Of late, the Governor has been expressing his annoyance in writing as well. He has asked for an explanation as to how the Gulshah (as G. M. Shah is known in the state) regime is considering the appointment of a person as a director of the Jammu and Kashmir Bank against whom four vigilance cases are pending. That is not all: the bureaucracy in the state too is up in arms. In the Lok Sabha elections, the chief minister and especially his deputy, D.D. Thakur, had pulled up many officers for "inefficiency" after the Farooq Abdullah faction of the National Conference swept all the three seats in the Kashmir valley. These officers are now openly defying the government. To top it all, the bad mark for the G. M. Shah regime has been that in the case against Swami Dhirendra Brahmachari in the Jammu court, the son of the deputy chief minister D. D. Thakur has been engaged as a defence lawyer. But is Jagmohan annoyed with G. M. Shah or is it an indication of the changing times? It is well-known that Rajiv Gandhi and Farooq Abdullah have been moving fast towards a patchup and the National Conference (Farooq) in the Lok Sabha did not join the opposition in the walk-out on the deputy speaker issue. Is the Farooq-Rajiv detente the reason for G. M. Shah's worries?

Important Kaul

Sandeep Saran

Shiela Kaul

Vikram Kaul may soon be an important name in the capital. Son of Indira Gandhi's maternal aunt, former union minister Shiela Kaul, Vikram Kaul is an Air India employee posted in London. He is being recalled to Delhi and in all likelihood he may join the political secretariat of Rajiv Gandhi. His brother, Gautam Kaul, is the additional police commissioner charged with the Prime Minister's security. This would make the Shiela Kaul family very important. After she was dropped from the council of ministers, Shiela Kaul has been put in charge of the Congress centenary celebrations, a job which will put her in the limelight within a few months. Vikram Kaul had been active in the initial days of the estrangement between Menaka Gandhi and her mother-in-law and had tried to bring about a patchup

Forgotten Party?

What happened to the party called the Rashtriya Sanjay Manch (RSM)? Neither the RSM nor its leader, Menaka Gandhi, have been seen around in the Assembly elections. The defeat at Amethi certainly was stunning. But should politicians be numbed so easily? This was the natural corollary of the lack of ideology in the RSM's policies.

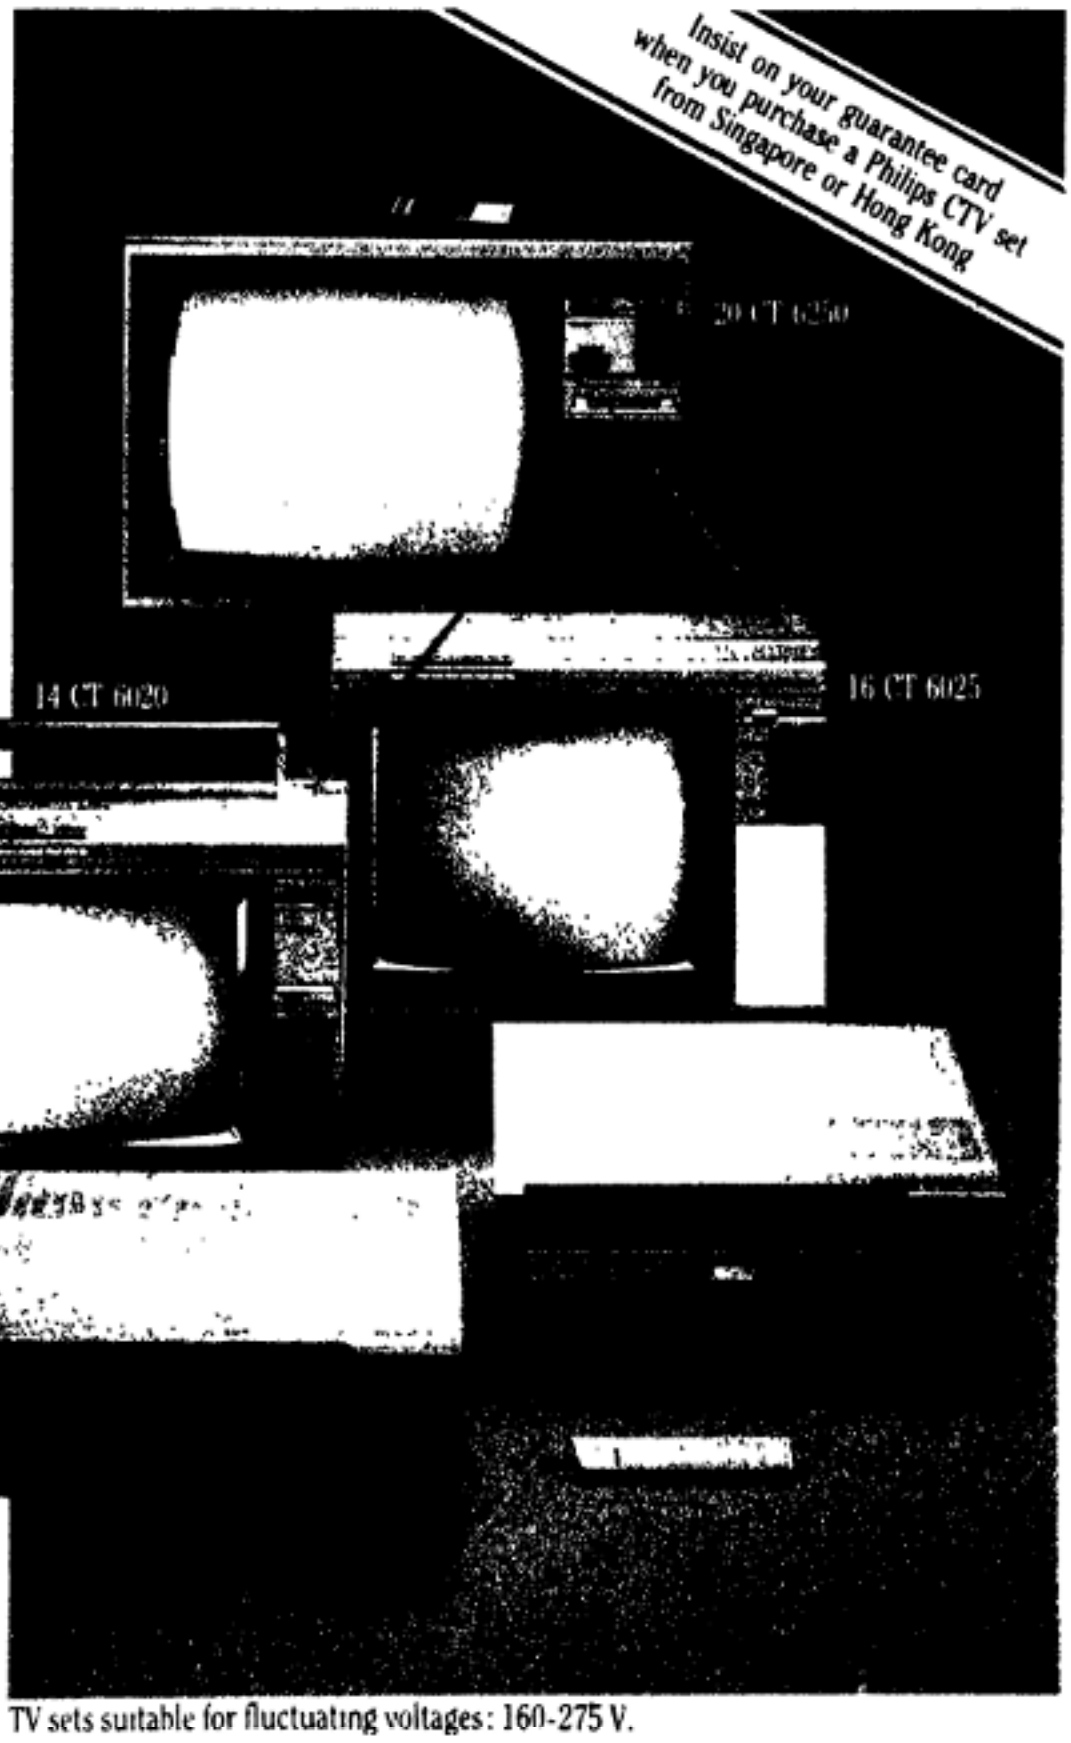
Bright Spark

The petroleum ministry is in a quandary. R. L. Kapoor, a divisional manager of the public sector Minerals and Metals Trading Corporation (MMTC), has written to the government that he is in a position to supply Saudi Arabian crude oil at a price which is eleven per cent lower than the one now being paid by the canalising agent, Indian Oil Corporation (IOC). The MMTC management is visibly embarrassed by this offer by one of its staff members; the IOC has been buying crude at the international price of 27 US dollars per barrel fixed by the OPEC (Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries). Though on the face of it Kapoor's offer looks attractive, behind it lies a long story of eccentric behaviour by a public sector manager, who has caused the government a lot of embarrassment. Sometime last year, in a staff meeting, Kapoor complained to MMTC chairman Raghavan that he was not being given the right opportunity to boost the company's turnover. He claimed that within three months he could secure orders worth a thousand million dollars for MMTC, which is now a general trading house. Raghavan agreed. Initially Kapoor wanted the exclusive use of a staff car and a staff office to be sanctioned to him. This was done. Months passed by but no deals materialised. As time ran out for the three-month deadline, with the blessings of a staff member of the former finance minister Pranab Mukherjee's office, Kapoor offered the MMTC import of crude from Libya four dollars per barrel cheaper than the OPEC prices. A note was sought from him, in which he spelt OPEC as "Opaque," thereby exposing his knowledge of the petroleum market. Apparently, a lot of hearsay had been guiding him. The Libyan deal looked too complicated and the danger of annoying the OPEC over a small quantity of import was also considered and the proposal jettisoned. Again he came forward with an offer from Malaysia in which too rough weather was faced. He has now come forward with the Saudi offer, which is also a backdoor deal. What has surprised the petroleum ministry is that the offer has been made officially from the MMTC, without the MMTC chairman being aware of it. Interestingly, the proposal is accompanied by a suggestion about what could be done with the "empty barrels." The crude prices are determined on the basis of barrels, which is a traditional usage. Crude no longer comes in barrels, but in huge tankers. Kapoor, apart from his references to "Opaque," has still to learn what a "barrel" in crude imports means.

D. K. Hiranandani

STOP PRESS: PHILIPS HAS PRODUCED ITS 100 MILLIONTH TV SET. IT'S ANOTHER GUARANTEE FOR PROBLEM-FREE VIEWING.

Philips have made a 100 million television sets, so naturally we know more about what our customers want and appreciate in a colour TV.



For example, every Philips is FULLY TROPICALISED against heat and humidity, so that you can enjoy problem-free viewing.

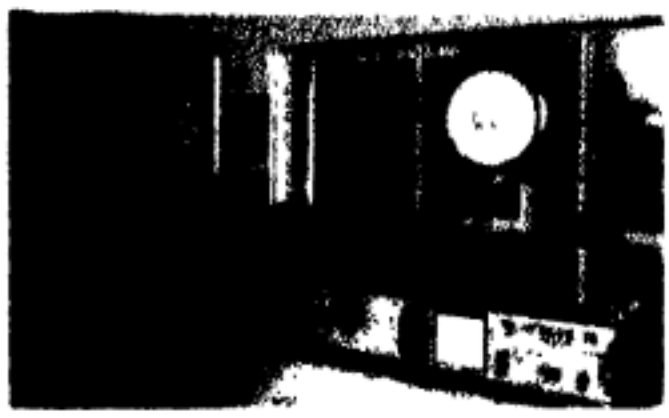
What's more, all Philips service centres in India* are fully equipped with sophisticated instruments, with overseas-trained technicians to care for your Philips if you happen to buy one from Singapore or Hong Kong. Plus a guarantee on after sales service that none of the other brands can match!

Philips VCRs come in two models: Their features include high-speed video search, up to 4 hours recording, auto play-back, time display and pre-programming for one event 7 days in advance.

For colour televisions, a range of models are available from 14", 16" or 20", with or without remote control. All the models have these common features: Philips famous natural colour from our equally famous Hi-Bri picture tube, Quickstart, and higher brightness level for more contrast, VCR adaptations on all channels, 4 watts sound output, Automatic Fine Tuning for sharp pictures, low power consumption.

Plus superior quality and service that comes from being the largest TV manufacturer in the world.

TV sets suitable for fluctuating voltages: 160-275 V.



* Philips service centres in India.
39/43 Nesbit Road, Mazgaon, Bombay 400 010 Tel 8725528
2 Heysham Road, Calcutta 700 020 Tel 473621.
3 Haddows Road, Madras 600 006 Tel 8123417
66 Janpath, New Delhi 110 001 Tel 321125.

PHILIPS

Released for information only by Philips Singapore Pte. Ltd., Lorong 1, Toa Payoh, Singapore 1231 and Philips Hong Kong Limited, 27th-29th Floor, Hopewell Centre, Hong Kong

PHILIPS

Regd No WB CC 256 TN MS(C)376 MH-By-South-680

Bajaj Autoingenuity

India isn't the West. Indians don't buy two-wheelers for fun. They are a necessity. Yet, the roads aren't perfect. Petrol isn't cheap. Service and spare parts aren't available at every corner.

That's why Bajaj Auto has developed its scooters to a level of ruggedness and reliability where they command a premium in the open market. People pay premiums only when they know they are getting value for their money.

That's how we designed and built the Bajaj M50 motorcycle too. To be the most powerful, rugged, lowest priced, genuine 50cc motorcycle in the country. Soon, you'll see the more powerful Bajaj M80 on the road.

That's why we designed the Bajaj Rear Engine Autoriksha. For cheaper, more comfortable public transportation.

That's Bajaj Auto ingenuity. Making vehicles which India needs. Making them very well. Making over 300,000 a year. By 1987-88 we should be making over 700,000: with Indian ingenuity.

bajaj auto ltd

Value for money, for years

BAJAJ 6 2416

24—30 MARCH 1985 □ AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION □ RS 4.00

Distant Neighbours: Tariq Ali and Kuldip Nayar report

SUNDAY

M.F. HUSAIN'S COSMIC DANCE

AFTER LORD SHIVA'S COSMIC DANCE

WORLD CUP CRICKET CHAMPIONS

PUNJAB: THE END GAME

WHEN IT'S YOUR FAVOURITE GIRL'S SPECIAL DAY...
DIGJAM

Yours for years

Apcolite Super Acrylic Emulsion from Asian Paints

Apcolite Super Acrylic Emulsion doesn't just give your walls a super smooth finish and an attractive sheen. It also ensures those beautiful looks stay that way for years. Here's why:

100% Pure Acrylic Emulsion
Apcolite Emulsion is a superior, 100% pure acrylic formulation. That's why it's tough enough to withstand the extremes of any weather — on both interior and exterior surfaces. Year after year.

Fungus Resistance
Yes. Apcolite Emulsion is specially formulated to prevent fungus growth. Even in the monsoon or the most humid climate. Just one more reason why they stay good looking. For years.

Longer lasting beauty
Apcolite shades don't fade. What's more, they're easily washable. So your walls keep that freshly painted look. For years.

Computer matched perfection
Muted pastels. Brighter, bolder hues. The rich radiance of the whitest white. Each shade computer matched to perfection. So that there are no colour variations from batch to batch. Ever.

Apcolite Super Acrylic Emulsion. The luxurious look that lasts. For years.

A spectrum of excellence asian paints

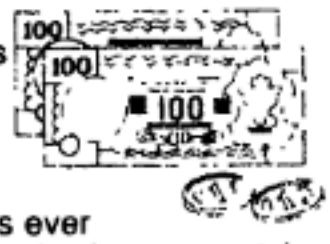
OBM/4657

HEARD THE LATEST?

Two-in-Ones and Cassette Recorders...
to international standards of design, quality and performance.
Right here in India from PHILIPS.
Backed by nation-wide service.



WE OFFER YOU THE BEST CHOICE!

PHILIPS

ALL THINGS CONSIDERED. WHEN IT'S PHILIPS, YOU'RE SURE.

No matter which model you buy.
If it's Philips, you're getting a lot more than anybody else can offer.

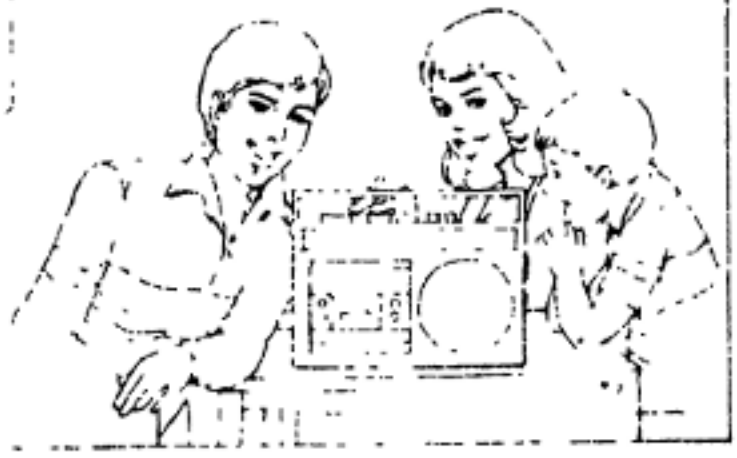
You get your money's worth.
Philips Two-in-Ones and Cassette Recorders cost a lot less than you think. Innovative techniques and economies of scale have brought down Philips prices considerably. Quality however is as high as ever So you get value nobody else can match

You've got class. You've got style.
Philips is constantly developing new products. Introducing new designs. Now for instance, you have a wide choice of everything from pocket radios to top-of-the-line Stereo Two-in-Ones. A lot of new models to pick from. Each one better looking than the next. Throughout, the styling is International Who else gives you so much class?

You'll like the sound of it.
As far as the quality of sound is considered. Philips reigns supreme. By design. Philips has over 50 years of experience in the field. We keep pace with the latest advances in the world of audio technology. For instance, our Stereo Two-in-Ones offer you features like chrome ferro compatibility, a complete range of input output sockets, soft touch cassette eject, long-life recording and playback heads, sensitive built-in microphones, L.E.D. indicators and an I.C.-based output stage. Even our mono sets have Auto-stop, Electronic Motor Control and high efficiency speaker systems No matter which set you choose, you're assured of greater clarity, richer, fuller sound. And you can hear the difference!



You can really depend upon it.
Every Philips product is built to last To give you years of listening pleasure Right from raw materials and components, to the very heart of the system -- the Tape Transport Mechanism – and packaging, quality assurance keeps to high international standards. There's no compromise. We've built a reputation on it. A reputation that any Philips owner will vouch for

You're never too far from Philips.
No matter which part of the country you're in, there's a Philips dealer within easy reach Any time you need service, or a replacement of spare parts, we're there to serve you The Philips dealer network is over 1200 strong, country-wide We make sure that after we make a great product, it stays that way For years Who in the world offers you such a great deal? Right here in India?

Philips – the trusted Indian household name for over fifty years

Full of nutrition, full of fun!

New

ice-cream flavour

Complan®

Mothers! Here's nutrition in a flavour that children will enjoy: lip-smacking ice-cream. When they don't eat well because of heat, give them the nourishment they need, with chilled ice-cream flavour COMPLAN. They'll love its delicious taste.

COMPLAN has 23 vital foods growing children need every day. Proteins are nutrients that directly contribute to growth. COMPLAN has the best proteins, milk proteins (20%). Besides, it has 22 other vital nutrients like carbohydrates, fats, vitamins and minerals that children need during their growing years.

Give your child COMPLAN twice a day, every day.

COMPLAN is also available in delicious Chocolate, Strawberry and Cardamom-Saffron flavours and Plain.

Complan®–the complete planned food

GK&E 884 GLC 23:6:12

24—30 MARCH 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 □ ISSUE 20 □ RS. 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 16

Distant Neighbours

Our neighbours, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Bangladesh, seem to be troubled with despair and violence. Kuldip Nayar, Tariq Ali and Chanchal Sarkar take an indepth look at what is happening in the three countries.

SPECIAL REPORT 30

Punjab: The End Game

Nine months after Operation Bluestar, Sant Harchand Singh Longowal and seven other Akali leaders were released from jail, spelling hope for a settlement of the Punjab problem. A report on yet another chapter in the troubled politics of the state.

CONVERSATION 48

Interview With David Lean

Kanta Talukdar talks to David Lean, director of A Passage to India.

Page 16

Page 30

Page 48

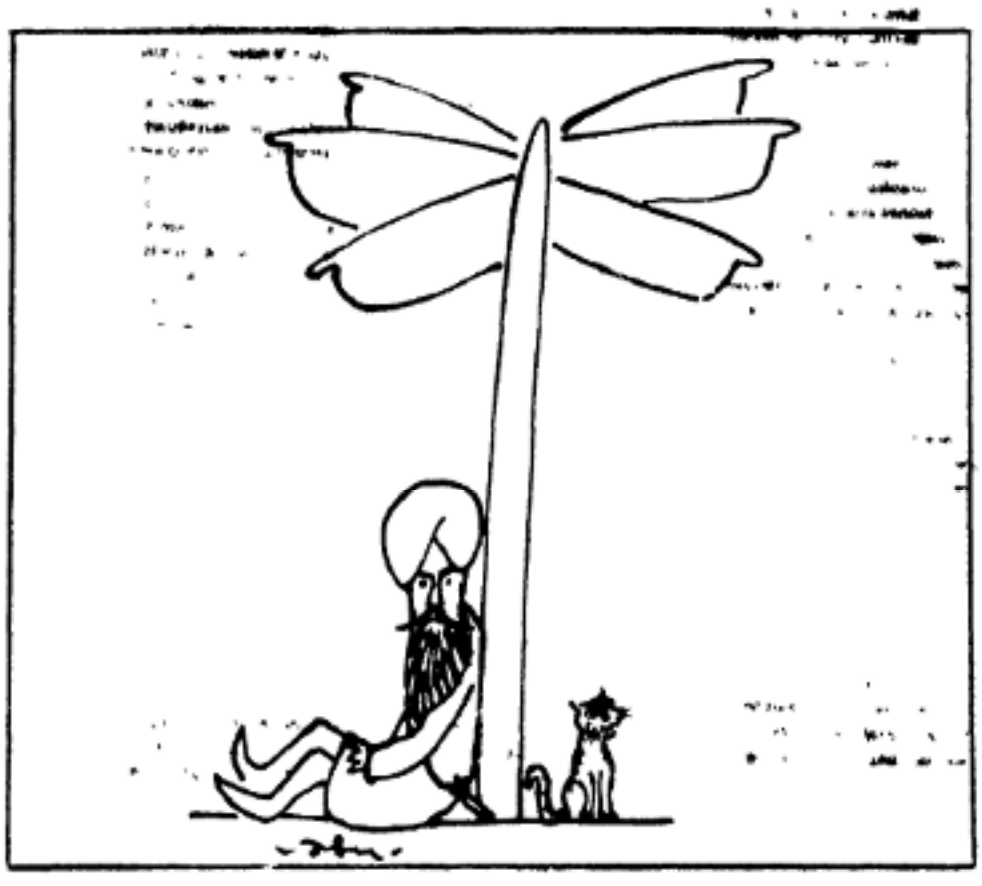
INVESTIGATION 44

The Company a Minister Keeps

Has Leelaventure Ltd, which is building Hotel Leela Penta near Bombay's Sahar airport, got 'special' treatment from the IAAI at the cost of crores of rupees to the government, because of its closeness to minister Khurshid Alam Khan? An investigation by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya.

COMMENT

Dateline M.J. Akbar 9
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 11
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 13



VARIETY

Book News 61
This India 64
Khaas Baat 65
Sundayweek 67
Chess/Bridge/Quiz 68
Science 69
Teasers 70

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Delhi Diary 74

PUNCHLINE/ABU

Cover Illustration:
M.F. Husain

Editor M J Akbar

Associate Editor Tooshar Ran Ji
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Binoo K John, Henry Jacob
Rajiv Bagchi, Srinjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi.
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay:
Olga Tellis
Bangalore:
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati:
Seema Guha
Srinagar:
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta-700 001
Air surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex Delhi

The heart has started beating again

Cardiac Equipment from BPL. For diagnosis, monitoring and resuscitation.

When a dysfunction in the heart occurs, the Defibrillator is used, as a last resort, to discharge a measured amount of electrical energy into the patient's heart to restore its natural rhythm. The monitor displays the ECG continuously and the recorder makes a copy of the wave forms.

The Defibrillator, now a byword in the medical profession, is just one example where BPL has used electronics for life saving applications. Electro-cardiographs and Patient Monitoring Systems complete the range.

There are other vital areas that BPL serves too. With Instrumentation (Industrial & Measurement), Computers, Communications, Components, Office Automation and Consumer Electronics.

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Fukuda, Japan; Siemens, West Germany and Nihon Kohden, Japan. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL: Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nationwide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has.

BPL-INDIA

In pursuit of perfection

Computers • Communication • Components

Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement) • Office Automation • Consumer Electronics

1113

DATELINE / M.J. Akbar

Calcutta: Once in a while, one does get the impression that the pen is mightier than the bureaucrat. Daud Haider was a familiar presence in our office. Being by stubborn inclination an unrepentant Philistine, I had very little idea about the kind of poetry he had written in Bengali. Though I knew he was a Bangladeshi poet, I did not find out why he was living in Calcutta. A free country like ours spoils the mind. We tend to take the right of a human being to breathe freely for granted, quite forgetting that there are large parts of the world—particularly the newly-independent world—where, on one pretext or the other, liberty is merely a reward for acquiescence. The law is not the law of justice, it is martial law, it is religious law, it is racist law and on and on and on. And on top of that comes the more insidious threat of power arbitrarily seized, arbitrarily exercised. It is an achievement (which the politically wise often scorn in their homage to foreign gods, and the cynics berate in their puny egoism) that India still lives under a Constitution and a rule of justice which is truly liberal and value-based.

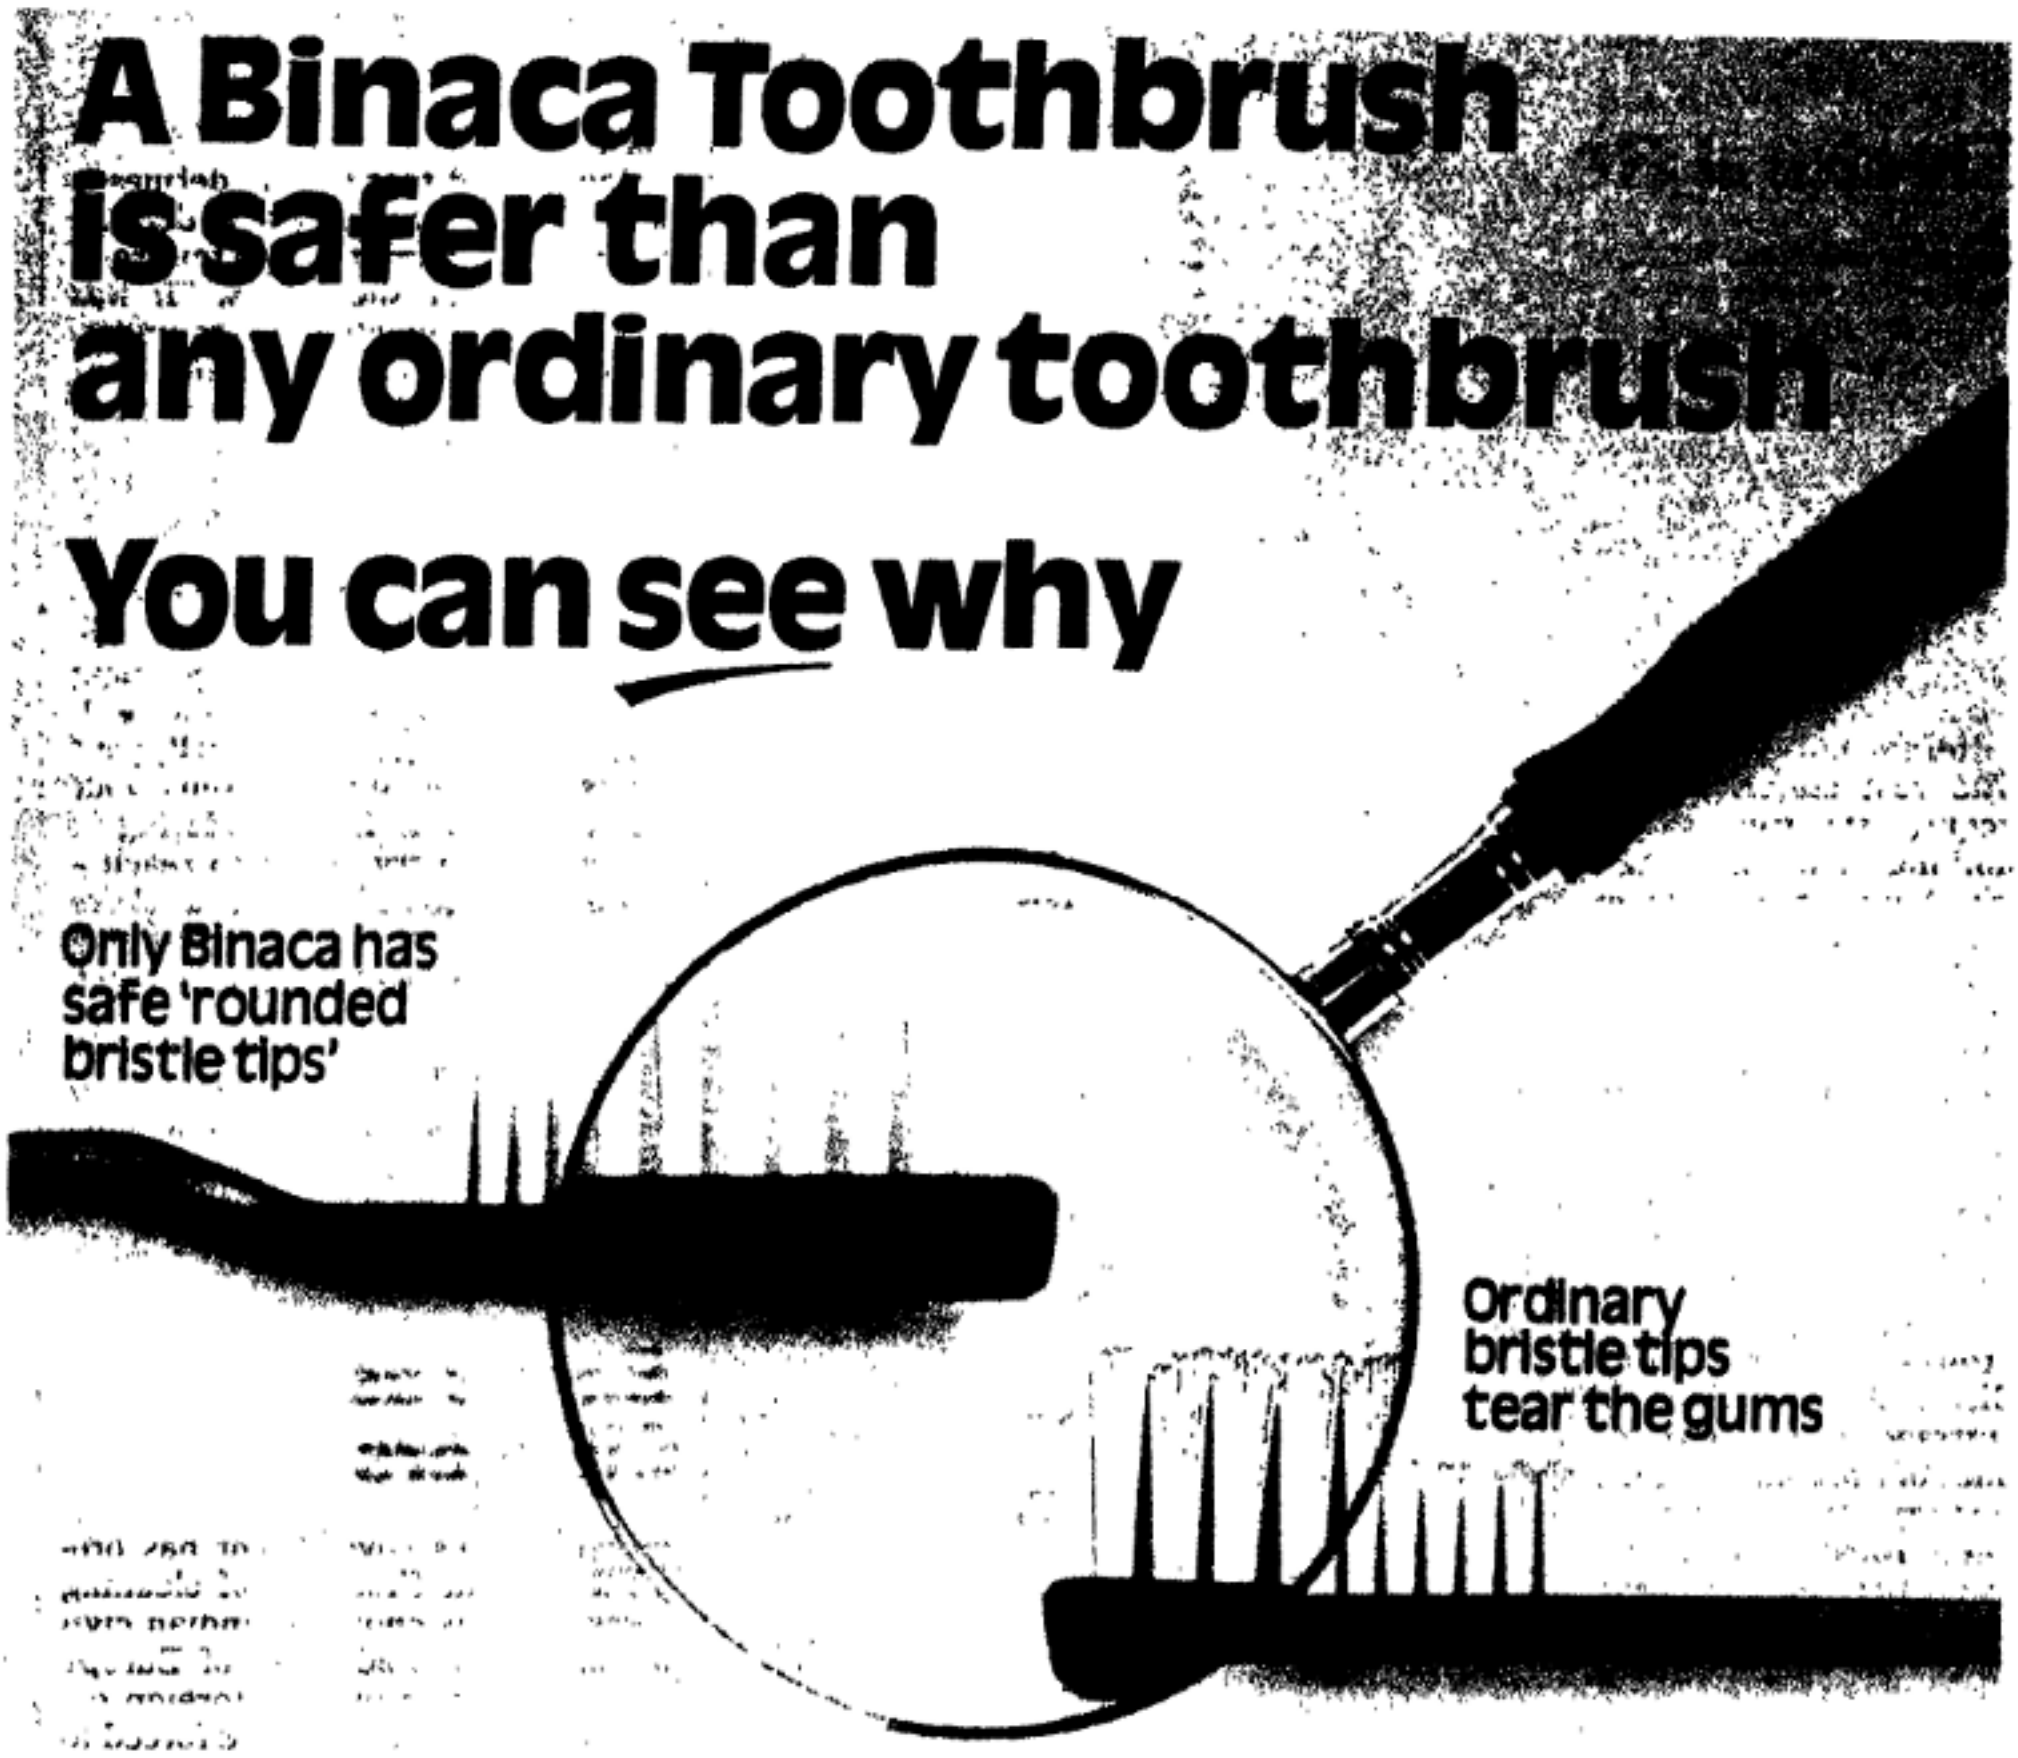
But sometimes the strain shows, particularly when those in government puff their chests and clatter like tin gods. Daud Haider had been living peacefully enough in the house of his mentor Annada Sankar Ray when some bureaucrats decided to throw him back to the wolves who had denied him a place in his own country. The poet had angered the Ulema in Bangladesh by questioning the relevance of all gods, and now they wanted to throw him back there. Why? No rational reason. Pique, perhaps. Or may be Haider had not been sycophantic enough to some glorified clerk.

He got his eviction notice, though we have thousands of such refugees (and may we have the courage to always keep them). But India proved itself again. A number of eminent Calcuttans (including Satyajit Ray and Mrinal Sen) wrote to Jyoti Basu pleading that Haider be allowed to stay on. I too had signed the appeal, and followed it up with a story in The Telegraph. Mr Basu wrote to Delhi. And Daud Haider remains in India.

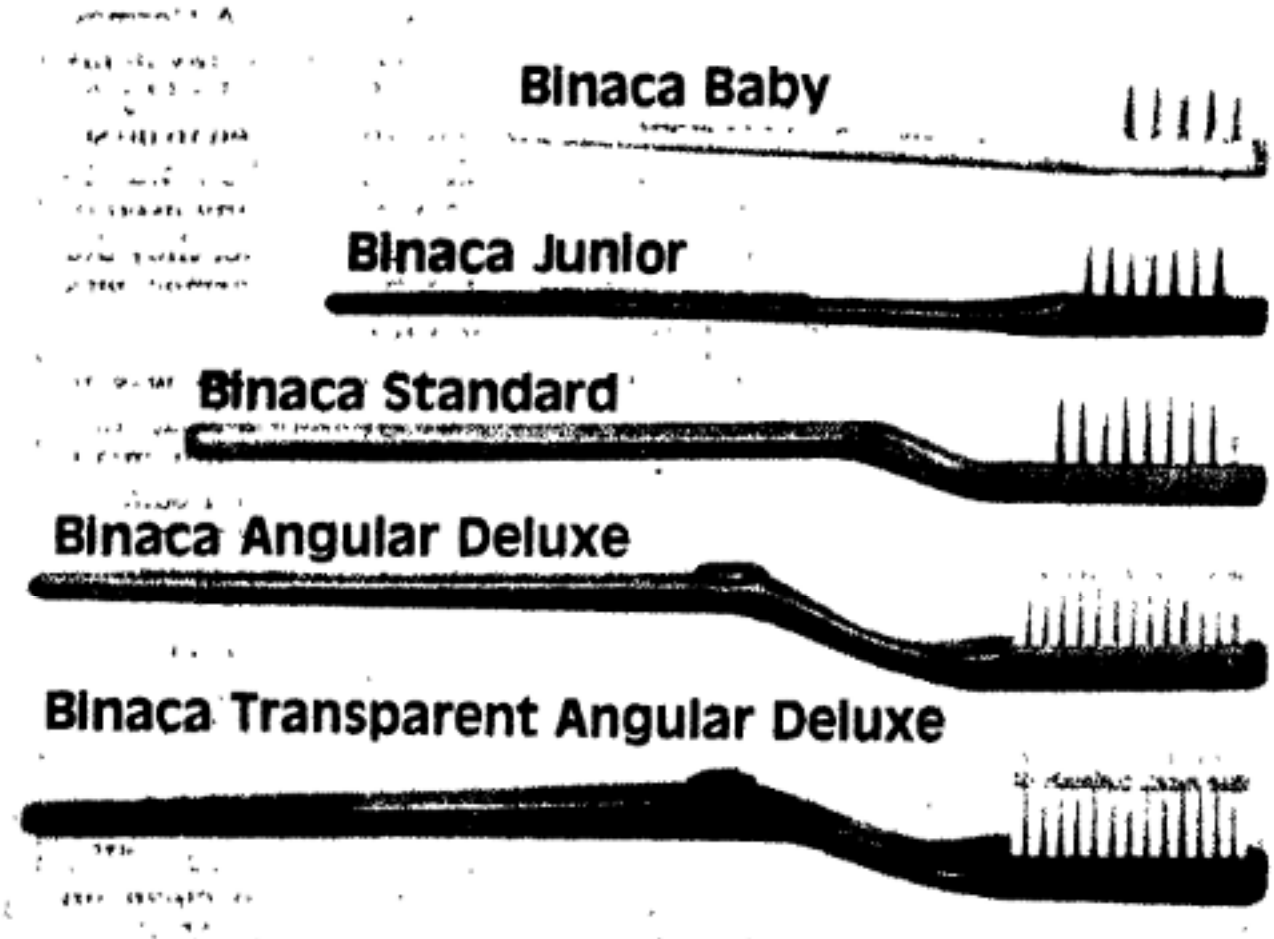
What a beautiful nation we have created. My pride doubled and tripled and multiplied endlessly when I heard the news.

My heart goes out to the concerned programme executive at Doordarshan. For no fault of his Konstantin U. Chernenko dies and the government of India, in a suitable gesture towards the special Delhi-Moscow relationship orders a mourning period. All India Radio immediately unearths its mine of devotional music and its executives relax, confident that nothing much can go wrong between one bhajan and another. But the box is something else altogether: here the show must go on, particularly since there is a lot of hard cash supporting at least some of the programmes. The task then, is to make the show appropriate to the mood. Now, unfortunately, none of these sponsored programmes were designed to make the viewer feel mournful (although one or two eminently succeed in doing so). How, then, does one square the circle, particularly with a programme like Chitrahaar, the half-hour of film songs which is aired every Wednesday evening and draws a bigger audience than all the talk shows put together? On Wednesday 13 March Doordarshan found its own solution to the problem

Indian television decided to show respect to the departed Mr Chernenko by making every song on that half-hour programme an expression of sorrow and tragedy (barring the last, which was an exercise in patriotic nobility). Unfortunately, hardly any of the numbers would have won the approval of the late leader of the leftist world. Take the first song: a tear-stained Smita Patil in front of a statue of the Virgin Mary, with a host of sad-looking orphans behind her, singing Mother Mary. Now if the idea was to pray to the Virgin Mary for the soul of the Italian President, this would have been just the thing. I wonder, though, if the late Mr Chernenko, a devoted, committed communist atheist of the old, hardboiled school, had ever contemplated encountering the Virgin Mary in the afterlife.



Song number two was from the romantic film Jahanaara: a soulful Bharat Bhooshan warbled (an excellent ghazal, by the way, sung by the inimitable Talat Mahmood) Phir wohi shaam, wohi gham, wohi tanhaai hai, with a heartbroken Mala Sinha peeping through her black dupatta. Sadness was appropriate enough, but one wonders how the Soviets who overthrew the Tsars would feel about being mourned by a Mughal prince (which is what Bharat Bhooshan is in the film). Nor could the palatial environment of the next song (Dilip Kumar; Dil Diya Dard Liya; Koi saagar dil ko behlata nahin) be considered of much revolutionary significance, unless someone was being satirical about dachas, which I am sure was not at all the case.



We finally did get something which had a vague connection with the Left, even if one generation removed. The hero of the next song (Teri duniya se bahut door, bahut door chala: very apt) was Parikshit Sahni, son of the great Balraj, one of the truly outstanding figures of the IPTA movement. Just at this point one did begin to wonder why, if such a programme had to be made, no one had thought of filling it with that excellent lot of songs from Hindi films made in the Fifties like Naya Daur glorifying labour and workers and the construction of a new society free from exploitation. Instead, we got the bitter-sweet Rajesh Khanna mourning his own impending death from cancer: Kahin door jab din dhal jaaye. And on our screens came the great Doctor Moshai, very thin but thoroughly impressive in the role that launched the most glamorous career in Hindi cinema—Amitabh Bachchan in Anand. The Doctor Moshai has now, of course, become an MP Babu. A second Congress(I) MP followed, Sunil Dutt, clad in white shirt and trousers, looking very purposeful as he dug into the task of creating the infrastructure of the economy of the new India in Ham Hindustaani. In fact the last song was the best. And, incidentally, both Congress MPs had been included in Chitrahaar's tribute to Konstantin Chernenko. But one really missed the third Congress(I) Member of Parliament, Vyjayanthimala singing Saathi haath batana, saathi re, ek akela thak jaayega milkar bojh uthana would have been a far more fitting way to say farewell to the leader of the most powerful Marxist nation in the world.

A free country like ours spoils the mind. We tend to take the right of a human being to breathe freely for granted, quite forgetting that there are large parts of the world—particularly the newly-independent world—where, on one pretext or the other, liberty is merely a reward of

A Binaca Toothbrush is safer than any ordinary toothbrush

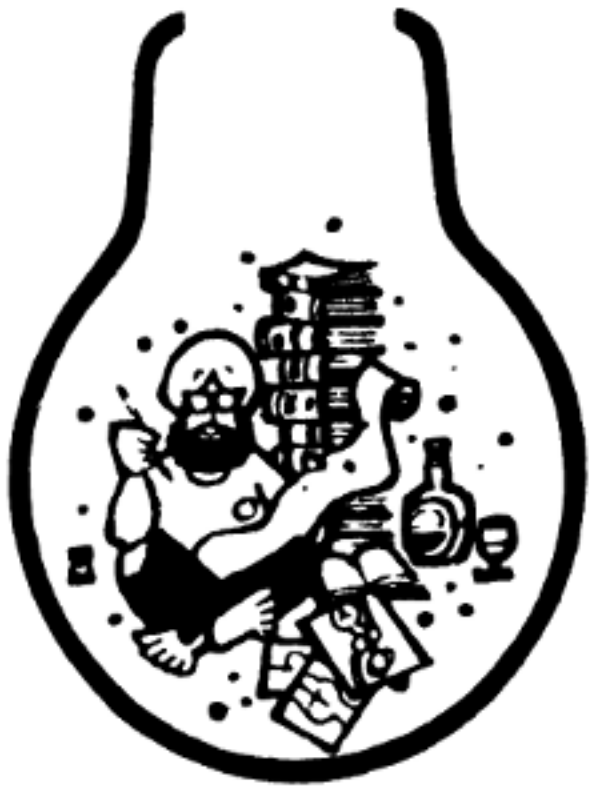
You can see why

A choice of so many colours, so many varieties!

Binaca®

India's largest selling toothbrush

ULKA-HCG-BT-7-84



Electoral Reform

State elections being over, let me ventilate my grouse against the unquestioned acceptance of the principle of one man one vote. I am not a megalomaniac but I feel I should count for more than the unlettered riff-raff who queue up in their hundreds outside polling booths and blindly put their thumb impressions against names of candidates whose qualifications they know nothing about; nor have they the vaguest notion what party manifestos are or what different political parties stand for. The vast majority of those people acquire the right to vote by doing nothing except growing up and coming of age. Treating them on par with the majority which understands what voting is about seems to me to be a travesty of justice. It is based on the notion that a person does not have to be a cobbler to know where the shoe pinches. They are believed to know their interests and who will best guard them. This is a canard. Most of them do not even know how or who will best look after their interests because they are little more than grown-up children. I subscribe to the Bismarckian belief that universal suffrage is like putting the governance of the country in the hands of its nursery. It makes people like me keep away from the electoral exercise. Bad governments came into being because people like me do not vote. Will Rogers in The Illiterate Digest echoed my sentiments: "With all the mechanical improvements they have in the way of adding machines, and counting machines, they can't seem to invent anything to take place of the old political mode of counting—two for me and one for you."

We are not the only country where the literate and the better qualified feel that being treated as equals of those who are not our peers amounts to discrimination against us. W.H. Auden put this in his usual irreverent way:

I'm a carefree floating voter
Basking daily in The Sun
Politics are bloody boring, grin, be jolly.
Social justice? Kiss my ass!
I've a mortgage and a Datsun
I'm no longer working class

Now that talk of electoral reforms is in the air, I hope our law-makers will consider the possibility of laying down minimum educational and property qualifications for candidates as well as for voters. I do not think it is outrageous to suggest a candidate must be a graduate paying income-tax or land revenue and the vote of a matriculate should count for two of those who are not. Otherwise the purification of politics will remain a pipe dream.

What is Love?

My latest acquisition to my very limited collection of friends is an attentive young lady journalist, a spinster. Long after my mythical birthday had passed she gave me a gift: a novella by Oriana Fallaci entitled Letter to a Child Never Born. I don't think my lady friend had read the book before presenting it to me. It is the true story of unmarried Oriana conceiving a bastard child which died in her womb. I had not read anything by Fallaci save her outrageous interviews with world celebrities including Indira Gandhi and Ayatollah Khomeini and had dismissed her as a brazen hussy. However, once I started her long letter to her unborn child I could not put it down till I finished it two hours later. It is sensitively and very beautifully written. Amongst the many observations she makes about life are her views on the phenomenon of love. Did she love the man who made her pregnant? "I still don't understand what it's all about," she admits. "My guess is that it's just a gigantic hoax, invented to keep people quiet and diverted. Everyone talks about love: the priests, the advertising posters, the literati, and the politicians, those of them who make love. And in speaking of love and offering it as a panacea for every tragedy, they wound and betray and kill both body and soul. I hate the word."

Having said that Oriana defines it better than I have heard it defined before. After admitting the failure of her love affair she writes: "It was worth something after all: to understand that nothing threatens your freedom as much as the mysterious rapture that a human being can feel towards another, a man towards a woman, or a woman towards a man. There are no straps or chains or bars that can hold you in a blinder slavery, a more desperate sense of helplessness. Beware of giving yourself to someone in the name of rapture: it only means forgetting yourself, your rights, your dignity and thus your freedom. Like a dog floundering in the water you try vainly to reach a shore that doesn't exist, a shore whose name is Loving and Being Loved, and you end in frustration, scorn, disillusionment."

If so, why do people fall in love? Fear of solitude? Of Boredom? Of Silence? A need to possess and be possessed? No, answers Oriana Fallaci, "It is a hunger that, once satisfied, leaves you with a kind of indigestion."

Babus as Cleaners

Mr Clean's government has provided its first crop of cleaning jokes. Here is one: Two Indian civil servants on a study tour of Europe ran out of their meagre foreign exchange allowance and were forced to find free accommodation. A German farmer agreed to let them stay in his barn for nothing if they did odd jobs for him. They readily agreed to do so. The first task given to them was to clean up the cow byre. Being used to cleaning up things at home, they did an excellent job. The farmer was very pleased with them.

The next job given them was to sort out apples lying in a heap into three lots; large, medium and small. After a few hours the farmer came to see how they were getting on with the work. He found them sitting crest-fallen without having sorted out a single apple. " What's the matter?" asked the farmer, "Can't you sort out big apples from the small?"

"You see, we are Indian civil servants," explained the babus. "We have been taught how to clean up things by our new Prime Minister, but he has not taught us how to make decisions."

Peerless helps people to be self-reliant

Today I am really very happy. At last, I could build a house, though small, of my own.

I never dreamt of building my own house. Because, I had never been a big guy, just a middle-class man having a moderate income. With that I had to manage everything — including daughter's marriage and proper education of my son.

Besides, I had no savings excepting a Peerless Certificate and that too of a very small amount.

This brought me in contact with Peerless. And it is Peerless who showed me the way to fulfil my long cherished dream.

Today, I am a Peerless Inspector. A member of a large family. And I am happy, for I have achieved what I aspired for. With the help of Peerless of course!

You too, can build your future with us — Peerless.

India's Largest Non-Banking Savings Company

Estd 1932

THE PEERLESS GENERAL FINANCE & INVESTMENT CO. LTD.

Registered Office. PEERLESS BHAVAN, 3, Esplanade East, Calcutta-700069

Investment in Govt. Custody Over Rs.500 Crores

PRAS/PGF-138/85

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Legislation Can Solve Assam Problem

It appears that the Election Commission has had to revise the instructions it issued for revision of the electoral rolls in Assam. The Bengali-speaking population in the state found fault with them. Further the union law minister Asoke Sen, who is responsible for answering questions regarding the Commission put up in Parliament, conveyed to the Commission the objections that had been raised; hence the new set of instructions.

The original instructions, issued on 3 January this year, had proposed the preparation of two lists. The first was to contain the names of persons who, in a recent house-to-house count, had qualified as voters as they "could be traced either directly or through their linkage to the entries (names) on the electoral rolls in 1971." The second list was to contain "all other entries which did not figure in the first list." The work of verification, however, was entrusted mainly to the police. Those covered by the second list had to produce a certificate "from the place where the question of citizenship has been decided finally by a competent authority" for their eligibility to be considered. An officer of the rank of superintendent of police was to verify "whether the person has been found to be non-citizen or citizen as per any decision of a competent tribunal or authority." This was in line with the home ministry's instructions dated 20 August 1975.

The students leaders, who have been in the forefront of the Assam agitation, were not unhappy with the instructions. They did not want 1971 as the cut-off year, they went along because the Assam police were in charge of verification and a certificate for ctizenship was necessary. Perhaps, another reason for their acceptance was that the Commission had ignored New Delhi's desire to signify 1979 as the cut-off year. Under pressure, the Election Commission issued a new set of instructions on 1 March, under which the Assam electoral officer was asked to ensure that "no eligible person is left out." The most important instruction was: "Existence of an entry in 1971 or pre-1971 roll of a person himself or of one to whom he can establish his linkage or parentage should be taken as prima facie proof of eligibility of an election and his name should find place in the draft roll. In case the name of such person does not find a place in the draft roll and he prefers a claim application. the burden of proving that he is not a citizen should devolve on the objector." This is, however, subject to the condition that no adverse order of a court or tribunal has been passed against him about his citizenship.

The Election Commission has gone on to say: "Existence of an entry in the post-1971 rolls, say up to 1971, can be treated as one of the supporting evidence of eligibility." However, it is for the claimant to satisfy the electoral registration officer with satisfactory evidence to prove his eligibility. The police, who are said to be "burdened with other work," need not be pressed for verification; the officers of the revenue and forest departments can do the job as well.

This may not, however, please the Assam student leaders. But then there is something else that New Delhi may not like and the state's Bengal-speaking population might protest when it comes to know of it. The Election Commission has added a rider which says: "In certain areas there may be instances where no one may be in a position to file an objection against a non-eligible person being found in draft electoral rolls...(The) Electoral Registration Officer should take suo moto necessary action under the law. If the officer is satisfied about the objection, then the entry should be deleted from the draft roll before its final publica tion after following the procedure pre scribed." For some time the deletion of "foreigners" from the electoral rolls has been the main demand. Lately, even the All-Assam Students' Union (AASU) and the All-Assam Gana Sangram Parishad (AAGSP) representatives have talked about the deletion of foreigners' names from the electoral rolls as the first step. The question boils down to the voting rights of foreigners.

India is not alone in facing the problem of "foreigners." America was tormented by a similar situation sometime back when immigrants from Latin America poured into the US. Washington found the solution through legislation.

A similar legislation in Assam may retrieve the situation because the problem centres around political power. The Assamese feel that outsiders would keep them out if they were to exercise their franchise. To some extent we have seen this happening in the last Assembly polls. The situation has been further aggravated because the government in the state does not represent the people; its very existence is a provocation. Whatever New Delhi may offer to resume negotiations with the AASU and the AAGSP representatives, it cannot have a ring of honesty as long as the people elected in a sham poll continue to occupy the Assembly seats.

The situation in Assam has been further aggravated because the government in the state does not represent the people; its very existence is a provocation.

Mockery of Democracy

SUNDAY did a commendable job by exposing the murky side of Indian politics (The Underworld of Indian Politics, 3—9 March). Muscle power is an inalienable part of politics in our country and more than anyone else the politicians themselves are responsible for such a state of affairs. It is an open secret that politicians patronise criminals to stay in power. However, I did not appreciate the interview with Haji Mastan ('Politics Mein Sab Chor Hain'). Who is he to advise us?
Manindra Nayak, Bhubaneswar

• Sankarshan Thakur and Olga Tellis's article read like a crime thriller. I was ashamed to learn that our destinies are being guided by such unscrupulous men like Haji Mastan and Vir Bahadur Singh.
Radha Kanta Roul, Bhubaneswar

• The cover story reminded me of the words of Dr Johnson: "Politics is the last refuge of a scoundrel." Haji Mastan made some interesting remarks during the course of the interview. He rightly said that elections cannot be fought without black money.
V.N. Narayanaswamy, Madras

• The cover story made a bold attempt to unveil the darker side of Indian politics. A law should ensure that people intending to contest an election should have a "clean background."
Tushar Chakraborty, Haldibari (WB)

• There was a time when politicians were admired and they inspired the lives of their followers. But that is a thing of the past and these days the very word 'politician' is a filthy abuse. Corruption has seeped into every aspect of our lives and honest living is a mere delusion. Our leaders are criminals in the true sense of the word.
Ajay Pant, Moradabad

• Any man wielding money and muscle power can enter Parliament or the state Assembly. MPs and MLAs do not devote time to social work any more: their only aim is to gather money to fight the next elections. Isn't this a mockery of democracy?
S.C. Malakar, Agra

• I was shocked to learn that criminals represent us in Parliament. I would welcome a more detailed list of 'underworld' characters in the various state Assemblies.
S. Venkatasubramanian, Calcutta

• Most of Haji Mastan's views are coloured by his communal feelings. He should know that it was Mahatma Gandhi who saved millions of Muslims in India during the post-partition riots.
Rajnish Verma, Jamshedpur

• I was amused at Haji Mastan's ignorance. Mahatma Gandhi sacrificed his life for the cause of the Muslims, yet Haji Mastan accused him of being a communal man. Bapuji was aware of the consequences of partitioning India and that is why he opposed the concept of a divided India.
Bibhudatta Mohanty, Cuttack

• SUNDAY gave undue publicity to Haji Mastan. No one is interested in a smuggler save the police and the customs authorities.
Dhananjay Patro, Bhubaneswar

• Anti-socials like Haji Mastan and Phoolan Devi do not deserve to be interviewed. Portraying them on the cover damages SUNDAY's image.
M.A. Kazmi, Bulandshar

Heaven and Hell

Khushwant Singh's article, Neither Heaven Nor Hell (Gossip, 24 February—2 March) was provocative enough. The author's malicious intentions are evident when he writes: "Where are the thousands of innocents who were massacred in the anti-Sikh riots in northern India or perished in the embrace of poison gas in Bhopal?" Mr Singh has been pointing an accusing finger at the Hindus ever since the riots following Mrs Gandhi's assassination and he never loses an opportunity to harp on this theme. Why doesn't Mr Singh write on lighter topics?
B.K. Sinha, Barauni

• In the course of the interesting article Mr Singh has commented at length on the idea of "purgatory" as a Christian belief. But the idea has nowhere been mentioned in the Bible. In fact, the notion is opposed to the teachings of Christ. In the concluding paragraph, the author has only echoed the sentiments in the Bible: a clear conscience makes life on earth a paradise and a guilty one makes it a hell.
H. Richard, Madras

• Heaven and hell exist on this planet. The mind creates its own heaven and hell on earth.
A. Wilson, Amritsar

• I was amused to go through Mr Singh's article. His understanding of the Hindu philosophy, it appears, is incomplete. The karma theory provides a convincing explanation for the apparent contradictions of this world. God has created this beautiful universe and each creation is unique. Man, the jewel among his creations, is gifted with the power to do whatever he likes and his actions determine whether he will be sent to heaven or hell.
R. Srinivasan, New Delhi

Punjab's Waters

Madhu Limaye has presented a distorted picture of the River Waters Dispute (30 December '84—5 January '85). Moreover, the definition of the "river basin," on which he builds his argument, is also not correct. The accepted definition of a "basin" as laid down by the Conference of International Law Association runs as follows: "A drainage basin is an area within the territories of two or more states where all streams of flowing surface water, both natural and artificial, drain a common watershed terminating in a common outlet either to sea or a lake or to some in-land place from where there is no apparent outlet to sea." The Indian Constitution uses the word "valley" (not basin) whose meaning is even narrower than that of a basin. Rajasthan and Haryana fall outside the river basins of the Sutlej, Ravi and Beas. As such there is no substance in Mr Limaye's arguments for the sharing of the river waters. Such articles will only harm the interests of Punjab.
K. S. Doad, Chandigarh

Naxalites are Dedicated

I do not agree with Kuldip Nayar that the Naxalite movement has withered away (Are Naxalites Dedicated? 3—9 March). As long as the gulf between the rich and the poor exists, the movement is bound to remain alive. The Naxalites struggled for a great cause, creation of an egalitarian society, and the blood of so many youths cannot go to waste.
Abir Padhy, Berhampore

• A journalist like Kuldip Nayar should refrain from second-hand reporting. For his report on the Naxalites he has relied on the police and the government. Both are biased. I would like to inform Mr Nayar that during the recent parliamentary elections many villagers of Srikakulam had boycotted the polls. I would like Kuldip Nayar to travel to the forests of the Godavari region and meet some of the Naxalite cadre and then come out with a more meaningful article.
S.M. Rao, Calcutta

I support Kuldip Nayar's view that the Naxalite movement lost popular support because of the violence unleashed by some of their cadre.
Kamal G, Trivandrum

• I disagree with Kuldip Nayar that The Collector's Authority Has Eroded (24 February—2 March). During the British rule the collectors were known as the deputy commissioners and they wielded immense power. The situation has not changed after independance. Today, at the district level, collectors are the real rulers and MLAs have very little say in the administration. They behave like autocrats
Taj Singh Lakhmna, Jamshedpur

• A district collector or the SP is posted and transferred at the whims of the politician. Moreover, young officers who are given the authority of a collector tries to behave like an autocrat.
C. Pradhan, Sambalpur

Stop Wasting Space

The enchanting cover blow-up of Rekha along with Akshay Upadhyaya's article, Queen Bee (24 February—2 March) made interesting reading. Even the free and frank interview, 'I Am a Rare Person,' deserves to be preserved.
Kamal. G., Mysore

• The cover story was packed with a lot of information regarding Rekha but the interview disappointed me: there are a lot of unanswered questions.
Subal Chandra Saha, Malda

• I was disappointed to see the glamour queen of the film world, Rehka, on the cover of SUNDAY. There are scores of film magazines to publicise the deeds of Rekha. Has SUNDAY run out of its usual investigative stories. Or do you think that Rekha merited seven precious pages?
Rashmee Roshan Lall, Meerut

• I was surprised to see the issue on films. At a time when important political developments are taking place and we are on the edge of a new era, SUNDAY's sudden interest in the tinsel world was unwarranted. However, I admired the glittering photograph of Rekha on the cover.
Muyyam Rajan, Singrauli (MP)

• The glamour world of Hindi films does not concern the common man. SUNDAY wasted precious pages.
S.S. Raju, Bombay

Rekha

• Rekha may be an actress extraordinary, but she did not merit a cover. I hope that SUNDAY will focus on more relevant affairs.
Deepak, Hyderabad

• SUNDAY occupies a pride of place in the publishing world. It should not tarnish its image by concentrating on frivolous issues like films.
Srinivas Patnaik, Khurda

Women's Problems

Rajiv Gandhi has taken a bold step in the right direction by initiating a number of schemes for the upliftment of women (Women in Rajiv's Politics, 10—16 February). Our Prime minister's efforts remind me of the words of Swami Vivekananda: "As it is not possible for a bird to fly on only one wing, so also a country cannot go ahead by leaving its women behind."
Santoo Palchoudhury, Siliguri

• Margaret Alva, Mohsina Kidwai, Kiran Bedi, Roda Mistry and Mamata Banerjee are all distinguished women leaders and they rightly stressed the role of women in nation building. Under Indira Gandhi women were not treated at par with man but I hope Rajiv Gandhi will take steps to improve the lot of women.
Geeta Dutta, Habra (WB)

• Margatham Chandrashekhar who heads the new women's ministry does not seem to have a clear perspective of the situation of women in India, and merely repeats wornout cliches. The new government should work to alter the Indian female psyche to make it more progressive.
Kamal G., Mysore

• None of the women MPs, except Roda Mistry, have dealt with topics other than dowry and women's education. But merely affording educational and job opportunities to women is not enough. they should be adequately protected.
C. Sunil, Kottayam

Persecuted Tamils

I was disturbed to go through Anita Pratap's moving article on Sri Lanka's Unwanted Tamils (3—9 March). The Jayewardene government has all along silently supported the atrocities perpetrated on the Tamils in Sri Lanka. The army has taken a lead role in Jayewardene's mission to wipe out Tamils from his country. I appeal to humanitarian organisations to intervene.
Sangram Mishra, Cuttack

• Anita Pratap is right when she says if the ethnic problem in Sri Lanka spills over to India, the world cannot expect us to sit and watch. If the solution is the creation of another Bangladesh, then we cannot help it. For, the evicted Tamils coming to India will create another Palestine within our country.
Subir Lahiri, Calcutta

COVER STORY

Distant Neighbours

After over three decades of independence, this sub-continent remains plagued with doubt, despair and violence: Sri Lanka, once the 'Paradise Island,' is now specked with blood as the ethnic turmoil continues; in Pakistan, the voice of thousands of its freedom-loving citizens remains muffled; in Bangladesh, major opposition leaders languish behind bars. Kuldip Nayar, who was recently in Sri Lanka, reports on the growing violence in the country, Tariq Ali, from London, says that the recent referendum ordered by General Zia-ul Haq was a sham and Chanchal Sarkar records his views on Bungladesh today.

SRI LANKA

An Island of Turmoil

By Kuldip Nayar

This year, long after their Independence Day (4 February) was over, Sri Lankans kept their national flag fluttering atop houses, shops and factories. When I was in Colombo a few days ago, I saw their national flag flying on almost every vehicle. It was meant to reassert independence, unity and territorial integrity.

The Sinhalese are in a panic over the "threat" to their country. Nearly two years ago, soon after the killing and looting of Tamils in Colombo, I found an atmosphere of fear in the midst of rumours that India might initiate punitive action. Now most Sinhalese have convinced themselves that New Delhi will "intervene." President J. R. Jayewardene himself believes that he is in the "midst of war" which, he says, has been waged by the Tamil terrorists "operating from India." No amount of argument with him—and I told him that India has nothing to gain by breaking up Sri Lanka—can sway him from his position that there is no use talking to anyone unless terrorism is first eliminated.

In fact, he reflects influential opinion when he says that he would like to talk with the terrorists instead of the Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF) which, Jayewardene believes, is itself afraid of terrorists. Like the rest of the Sinhalese, Jayewardene considers the TULF and the Tigers, a terrorist organisation demanding Eelam (independent country in north Sri Lanka, embracing Jaffna and the eastern area, including Trincomalle), as two sides of the same coin. And the Sri Lanka President is quite forthright: "I do not trust the TULF leaders." The recent statement of the TULF leader, A. Amirthalingam, that India must invade Sri Lanka has only queered the pitch and angered the Sinhalese still further.

Jayewardene makes a distinction between the TULF and the terrorists but wonders if it can deliver the goods. However, he gives one the impression of a person who is prepared to hold negotiations to settle the Tamil problem, provided it is prepared to denounce terrorism and own Sri Lanka's flag, language and national anthem. Surprisingly, he talks very little of the indiscriminate killing of Tamils at the hands of his army. Indeed, he has hardened since he, as a young politician, took part in an anti-Tamil march. He was then protesting against a situation in which most positions in government and business were with the Tamil minority. Today, as President, he is suppressing the Tamils who have been largely replaced by Sinhalese in positions of power and have sought desperate remedies, including a separate state, to assert their rights.

Tamils comprise 12.6 per cent of some 15 million people; they have been in Sri Lanka for as long as the Sinhalese, who constitute nearly 72 per cent of the population. Another five per cent are the Tamil labourers who were taken by the British from Tamil Nadu in the last century to work on coffee and tea plantations. Even though the Tamils are all over Sri Lanka, 48 per cent of them are concentrated in the north and east of the island, around Jaffna; so much so, they are called Jaffna Tamils.

To understand the current phase of estrangement, one must go back to 1948 when Sri Lanka was granted independence by the British. Both Sinhalese and Tamils were in the forefront of the nationalist struggle and the contribution of Tamil leaders was no less than that of the Sinhalese leaders. But as is inevitable after independence, the majority formed the government. So, the Sinhalese came to power. And one of their first acts was to pass a law which made almost one-third of the Tamil labourers stateless. Since then, a series of government measures have pushed the Tamils down in the affairs of Sri Lanka, especially in employment and business. The reaction of the Tamils earlier was just an agitation; today, however, it is one of revolt.

Those involved in the present troubles are Jaffna Tamils, who are highly educated and intelligent and who have been slowly edged out by the less-educated Sinhalese. No doubt, the happenings have economic undertones but they also have an imprint of chauvinism and intolerance on the part of the Sinhalese. Although Jayewardene made Tamil a national language in 1976, the 1956 Act says "Sinhalese" is the "only" official language. Tamils feel they have been degraded during his tenure of office. Only three per cent of the armed forces and five per cent of those in the police are Tamils. Driven to the wall, they have adopted the

Shyam Tekwani

Tamil refugees from Sri Lanka arriving in Rameswaram

Tamil refugees on their way to a relief camp demand of a separate state, or Eelam, which was once the slogan raised by the radical Tamil Tigers. What also divides the Tamils and Sinhalese are their religions. Tamils are mostly Hindus and Sinhalese Buddhists. They dress differently too. Also, the Tamils still speak the same tongue as the people in Tamil Nadu and elsewhere do.

Shyam Talwani

A tactful government would have tried to retrieve the estranged Tamils but instead it has resorted to violence. Tamils have been beaten up and tortured by the police and the military and detained without trial. Amnesty International has listed instances of cruelty and solitary confinement of Tamil detenus. The emergency has been extended again and again and the press remains suppressed under censorship. Since the resistance of Tamils has been increasing, the Sri Lanka government has been allowing the army to tackle the problem in the way it likes. The atrocities the armed forces are committing may put to shame what the American soldiers did in Vietnam. The killings of "terrorists and their sympathisers" are indiscriminate. To cover such killings, the government issued a regulation two years ago to authorise the disposal of bodies without a judicial inquest and post-mortem. This is where New Delhi came into the picture. It expressed India's unhappiness over the measure.

New Delhi has been impressing upon Colombo since then, to quicken the pace of granting citizenship rights to the 3.75 lakh Tamils, as was agreed between New Delhi and Colombo, first during Lal Bahadur Shastri's regime and then reiterated during Mrs Gandhi's. Some action has been visible. It appears that Sri Lanka is willing to take a "sympathetic and constructive approach" on other matters also and listen to India. But New Delhi feels that Colombo goes back on its word again and again.

I could not go to Jaffna during my recent visit; the government did not grant me permission and even President Jayewardene said, "No." I found there was no plane, train or bus going to Jaffna. The government proposes to evacuate the people living in the vicinity of Jaffna airport to make it safe. The entire Jaffna area has been handed over to the military. "There is no life in Jaffna," a top Sri Lanka government official told me, adding "It is the military all over. What will you see there?" At least one lakh fishermen are idle because the military has blocked their access to the sea. Even otherwise, life is hard since the limited movement of goods to the area has pushed up prices and shrunk avenues of employment. After talking to Jayewardene for about two hours, I got the impression that a solution to the Tamil problem is possible within Sri Lanka. The Tigers may not like it because they want nothing short of an independent country. Since New Delhi is committed to a united Sri Lanka, it can prepare the ground for negotiations. Jayewardene is willing to send his troops back to barracks in Jaffna and begin negotiations provided there is a joint surveillance to stop the inflow of "man and material" from India to Sri Lanka. India may not be training the terrorists or providing them with weapons but there is little doubt that the top leaders among the terrorists use Tamil Nadu and Kerala as a sanctuary; the joint surveillance will at least seal the borders.

Jayewardene is reluctant to a time limit for a settlement. When I asked him to agree to a three or six months' limit, he kept quiet. But I think some kind of timetable can be worked out. True, Jayewardene can go back on his commitments as he has done in the past under pressure from extremists and the Buddhist clergy. But India will not lose much by making yet another effort. Moreover, time is not on Sri Lanka's side.

If things are allowed to deteriorate, as is happening, a crisis like that of Biafra in Nigeria is in the making; still worse it may turn into a Cyprus, which Turkey invaded to save Cypriots of Turkish origin. Already a war-like atmosphere is prevalent in Sri Lanka and the government and the people blame New Delhi for the situation. Tamils in Sri Lanka are its citizens and India has no business to give them false hopes. True, the killings must stop in Jaffna, Mannar and other places. So, should New Delhi's connivance, if not interference. What it is doing may be good politics, but it is not good for the country.

"India is Bullying Me"

Sri Lanka President J.R. Jayewardene told Kuldip Nayar

Q: Let's start with the three things India and Sri Lanka have in common: unity, democracy and independence.*

A: Then we forget the past. We are faced with terrorists' threat, borne out only by the facts. They were terrorists; they have become insurgents. Terrorists, I don't think, are for overthrowing the governments; they are all over the world: as far as Iran. They are insurgents because their idea is to overthrow governments. Now I would say it is more. They are the enemy in a war—a war between a group of individuals and the state.

Statements made by their leaders in India, which have not been denied, mention that their objective is to overthrow the government of Sri Lanka and establish their own government; some say (it may be a government of) Socialists, some say Marxists, but not the sort of government that we have today.

Q: Throughout the island it is only Eelam's leaders, not the Tamil leaders, who are saying this...

A: No, I said terrorists—those who believe in violence. I'm worried about them, not others—at least not so far. Then from the weapons we have recovered—two or three raids we have made—in quantity, quality, type they are meant for a war, not for terrorist assassinations. I fear they are not for hit-and-run activities. I know nothing about weapons. I have got photographs. I showed them to a foreigner who has been in the war. He said these weapons were made in Germany, UK, Russia and India. All this is for a war... I tell you this is for a war. You haven't got a list. I have got one. Well, that too has been confirmed recently by written statements in newspapers in Sri Lanka and India.

Also statements were made by witnesses and captives who confessed they are planning an agitation. I call it terrorism, which means a major offensive, (it would mean a) combined offensive against the state in Jaffna and Sri Lanka. There are about five or six groups, a majority of whom have been hiding. They want to overthrow the armed services, the police and achieve their objective by governing a certain part of the island in the beginning. What do I do? You record this and go away. I am (always) hearing (about) this problem. Now you can go somewhere and give advice.

Q: In such a situation, do you go around saying, friends, look my country is going to be invaded. I want your help. Your predecessor, Mrs Bandaranaike, for instance, had asked India for help which she got. Have you asked for that?

A: (We have asked) all our friends, including India (for help).

Q: But you would agree with me that there is a difference between these terrorists, whom you refer to as the enemy of your country, and those who have been wanting or struggling for democratic rights. Then, the last time I came here a year and a half ago, I felt you were inching towards some kind of a settlement over the Tamils. Then you called the all-party meeting. Now you say, no, I am not going to have any talks with the TULF. Whom do you want to talk with? The others are only terrorists.

A: If they want I can talk with them.

Q: Who are 'they'?

A: I don't know. Then I want to have elections.

Q: Anybody who has to contest the election should take a vow before you that he believes in the integrity of the country. Now, would you find enough Tamil candidates who would be ready to do that and enough voters to support them?

A: We feel that. The terrorists don't feel that. Terrorism is ruling. Terrorism is supreme. Why didn't India help us?

Q: But you have reason to believe that India is helping the terrorists?

A: Then, why doesn't India help maintain my democracy?

Q: Why should she not?

A: Why? Answer it yourself. Why?

Q: I think it would be foolish for India not to want to help you. After all, what has she to gain by it?

A: I will come to that. Till the elections—the recent Lok Sabha elections—there was a problem in India because Tamil Nadu was the centre of the terrorists' activities and some politicians were making use of it. And those in office who were for Mrs Gandhi's government had to support the secessionists in Sri Lanka, though they were not for secession.

Q: Did you take that up with the Tamil Nadu authorities?

A: Not then.

Q: Why didn't you?

A: Because the elections were due. They wanted to win the elections. I kept quiet. This is not the right time to do that I thought. This is a separate issue to be taken up at the central level. Now that is over. And the Karunanidhi group has been wiped out. The people did not worry about Tamil Nadu, Sri Lanka and Eelam. What I did inform Mrs Gandhi and her colleagues about was that these terrorists are in India and living in training camps. They didn't deny that.

Some politicians, including Mr

Statements made by their (terrorist) leaders in India, which have not been denied, mention that their objective is to overthrow the government of Sri Lanka and establish their own government...

I really wanted to give up the armed services when I again became President, and only wanted trained police, military police throughout the island. Why spend all this money on arms? Why do you want arms; for what purpose? We even stopped recruiting people in the armed services. I am not a soldier; I am not for war...I am a friend of India.

Parthasarathy, met them to try to bring them together. Then there was Mrs Gandhi's cremation and some terrorists went to Delhi and met Parthasarathy. I read in Indian papers, (like) The Hindu, that some politicians (had) met them. They live in the plush room of the state guest house in Tamil Nadu That also I found.

I told Mrs Gandhi that we do not meet the terrorists, either from Punjab, Tripura or Assam. They (terrorists in Sri Lanka) go to Delhi and meet them. Then I did not take it (up) strongly because the all-party conference was there. So all I say now is this: let (us; forget terrorists' camps. If you want them to be turned away that is well and good. I was told to file extradition papers. We waited for the elections to be over. I did not want to do (it) before that. We shall do that now. But some people can be extradited without papers if it is in the interests of a foreign country; that is the rule under the constitution. Forget the contact with the TULF, forget the terrorists. Can't you help us to have an effective surveillance zone, a joint surveillance zone, without ammunition coming by sea? You have trained men coming by boats. We can control the terrorists' movement here. That is my appeal to India now.

Q: Have you made a formal proposal to this effect?

A: I have not put it to the (Indian) Prime Minister formally but I told the (Indian) high commissioner.

Q: You will agree with me, sir, that the Tamils are your citizens. They are not our liability, but yours. You know they have a grievance.

A: What kind of grievance?

Q. Their grievance is that they do not have enough say in the government.

A: Who said that?

Q: I am not saying that you should give them a separate country, state or the like. But they are the people—17 per cent of your population, or so—who want to have a say in your government. Of course, you did say a year and a half ago that you would set up a regional council or whatever it is.

A: Yes, regional autonomy.

Q: But unfortunately the talks broke down.

A: No, no, they did not break (down) We came to certain conclusions: have more delegation of power to district councils—annexure C—and in fact I proposed that. And at the all-party conference I said that the district councils will have the right to join the provinces and have provincial ministers. They will be responsible to provincial councils. We had agreed to do that.

But there were differences on two points: they wanted the two provinces to be joined. We said we could not do that because firstly, we have a hold in the eastern province—10 out of 12 seats. The Muslim organisation is totally theirs. And the other one was that the provincial ministers should not be in the second chamber, and they should be in the provincial Assembly.

I said I cannot do that, I cannot make a minister unless he is in Parliament. So I said I would create a second chamber consisting of delegates from each district; if I can make a minister, I can give him all powers. I already made a minister—a Tamil minister. I will make a minister in Jaffna who will be in complete charge of police. We were discussing irrigation, law and order. Then came the 21st December. I heard that some of the delegates wanted to postpone the meeting for their own purposes, and carry on an agitation against us. So I met all those who had come in. And I said we would finalise this. Already my draft is ready and I am placing it before the cabinet on the 19th.

And I had arranged to meet them—they went to India— when they were to come again in January. Two days, three days passed. Nothing came off. The next day Amirthalingam issued the statement without a word to me. It appeared on Sunday, saying that the proposals were totally unacceptable to them. And I looked like a fool.

Q: Still, shouldn't you have unilaterally implemented them?

A: I cannot implement them because the district councils in the northern province don't exist. Throughout the three districts from the eastern province they don't exist, because they commanded a majority and the members have lost their seats. Our plan was to resuscitate them by law as in the registration. Whether they will agree or not, I don't know. So that cannot be implemented unless it is agreed (upon).

Q: Now, that you are thinking in terms of holding elections without the district councils, do you realise that the people may boycott them and there may be violence? After all, you are taking a kind of risk. Unilaterally implementing annexure 'C' would probably be a lesser risk.

A: I will implement it. They have all the members, 95 per cent of them; I have only one or two.

Q: Could that be a starting point again?

A: Well, we have not thought of that. I will tell you why it failed.

Q. You were not to blame but they were?

A: I don't know. We have put it before the cabinet for discussion. But I was going through it. (I wish) the TULF went through it with me, as I put it before the people, because the TULF had promised to liaise with us. They had promised to accept the national flag, national language, except this. Then we will fight terrorism. I must also convince my people.

I am also an elected man. I am not here by virtue of (the) gun. So I was left stranded. I could leave it to the cabinet.

Q: Now that three months have gone by, is there no way of restarting this?

A: So my plan now is to have elections. I am having (them) in Trincomalle, in Padriu, in May or June, but not in Jaffna.

Q: But you don't want to start negotiations again?

A: There is nothing to talk about. They can still accept it. Now what do they want me to do? Commit suicide?

Q: The impression is that if there is no time frame to the negotiations then it goes on and on and nothing comes out of it.

A: Well, we will have elections. There are the district councils, they will be given more powers.

Q: So you will be implementing annexure 'C' as far as possible except where it is not required (and) transferring more power to the districts? But at this stage it still does not retrieve the Tamils. How do you retrieve them?

A: Tamils? After the terrorism, there is no question of retrieving them.

Q: But they are only a few. So how do you retrieve them?

A: I have no other way (except) the merger of the district development council within the province after accepting the council members and a referendum in the district that a poll (should) be held there.

Q: Before I came to meet you Mr Parthasarathy told me that you had gone back on everything you had agreed with him.

A: (interrupts) Where have I gone back?

Q: That's what I'm asking you.

A: What is he saying? I don't know. Where have I gone back? He has got to discuss it with me then.

Q: You proposed joint surveillance. But don't you agree that there is no other way to solve the problem except by talking to the TULF?

A: I don't think so. There is no use (in doing that) unless terrorism is wiped (out). They will never help; they threaten (us).

Q: You proposed joint surveillance.

A: Yes, that is all I am asking (for). India is talking of anybody giving me help, anybody providing me arms, anybody giving training.

Q: But you do have the Israelis, or SAS here, training people.

A: Yes, they cannot stop them. I have SAS people, I am going through them. Mrs Bandaranaike had no problems. It was after the July riots, a one and half year genocide Now that all countries in the world, except India, believe me, they want to help us but they want a state. The lobby against us is strong. The US has (a) powerful senate, the UK has (a) powerful Marxist lobby. Pakistan is sending arms. we are buying them. China also (is sending arms).

Q: But don't you agree that you do need India's cooperation?

A: Otherwise it would take us a long time. But we wish to do it. Of course, there will be no problem of terrorists if they cooperate with us. But they (India) cooperate with the terrorists. I am positive about this. Terrorists say so. They are bullying me to give in to the TULF's demand for autonomy.

Q: You suggested joint surveillance, and that you for your part will try to normalise the situation in Jaffna—send the army back to the barracks and the police too, and then you start talks.

A: No, I cannot talk. Today they fired (at) a helicopter. They fired (at) an aeroplane a few days ago.

Q: I was going to ask you for permission to visit Jaffna.

A: But I don't mind that. But there is nothing to see there Only the army and the police; no sign of any life. In fact I (would) never have thought of not talking with them. But they have reached a point of no return. It will take some time to recover. There is no point in my being President, if I do not support the people. I cannot talk to anybody, I cannot discuss; I have no placement. You cannot even sleep there unless the terrorists are supporting (you). I can win a seat, but cannot unless I have the support of chauvinists, which I do not want.

Q: About joint surveillance, would you talk to the TULF?

A: Well, I will talk to Amirthalingam. Let them give up Eelam.

Q: TULF, not Eelam.

A: People think that.

Q: Do you think that Eelam supporters would like to be dominated by the TULF leaders?

A: (The) main opposition to the proposal (arises) because they say one thing here (in Sri Lanka) and another in India. We cannot trust them. Then there are problems as they go into the terrorists' areas. If they go there they will shoot them; if they come here they will protect them.

Q: But you are also facing a problem, and you think there is no solution except using the military?

A: I would agree. But there is no other way out, unless terrorism is wiped out. Why cannot India help us? I will withdraw the army.

Q: But you say you cannot start negotiations. Don't you make any distinction between the TULF and Eelam?

A: The TULFis behind Eelam.

Q: But you should start talking to them. They are your people.

A: No, they are for separation. That is their policy. They have said so recently. All this happened after

What should we do? Either you have to hit or get out, because nobody helps. I can tell you all the way. If India says we are with you, you are all elected men, we trust you, we are going with you, the rest we can discuss. I come back and tell my people here that terrorism will stop tomorrow. What the insurgents are feeling, they cannot understand. And I hear people say, Ceylon is useless.

December.

Q: Why don't you come to India and talk to our PM?

A: I will talk to him when I go there next. But he must accept this fact. Otherwise there is no point in wasting my time. Terrorism is strong now. They regard Amirthalingam as (someone) supporting them.

Q: Agreed sir, but Tamils are your people, after all.

A: So are Sinhalese.

Q: Do they think the Tamils will revolt against you.?

A. (They do) not think; they fear that. Not only that; it will happen And I would not blame them.

Q: Since my last Sri Lanka visit 18 months ago, I find that the anti-Tamil feeling tends slightly towards an anti-Indian feeling. Am I wrong?

A: You are right.

Q: Is that because people here think that India is behind it all?

A: It is because for the last one and a half months here the TULF has been quiet. It may become anti-Sri Lankan Tamils and anti-Indian feelings. There is one problem that we should take care of. The 20,000 Tamils settled in that centre. The entire area around it needs to be vacated. I mean Jaffna.

Q: But don't you think that this territory is, for all practical purposes, in the hands of terrorists?

A: No, we cannot settle people there because it is an urban area. And (there is) no land to settle. There are 600,000 people there. And no ground to settle.

Q: But don't you think you are now drawing the line between Sinhalese and Tamils?

A: That has not been there. There are more Sinhalese than Tamils concentrating there. We cannot settle people there.

Q: Has your tourist trade suffered due to the strife?

A: That is right.

Q: Don't you think the strife is costing you dear?

A: What should we do? Either you have to hit or get out, because nobody helps. I can tell you all the way. If India says we are with you, you are all elected men, we trust you, we are going with you, the rest we can discuss. I come back and tell my people here that terrorism will stop tomorrow. What the insurgents are feeling, they cannot understand. They love the people. And I hear people say, Ceylon is useless, murderous—they are raping and all that.

Q: Sir, I have heard that a lot of atrocities are committed by the army. Would you consider appointing a commission to go into these?

A: Not now. Did the British appoint a commission during war? I was very firm at the beginning. And these things started about five, six years ago. They committed various acts that should not have been (committed). But there is a problem around there. They have burnt the library and all that. Yes, the army has to have discipline. And now they think that I was the one who did not allow them to do things (the) way they liked.

Q: Do you fear a military coup?

A: Well, you can never say that because they would not tell you, and the longer the emergency lasts, the greater the danger.

I know nothing about weapons. I have got photographs (of the terrorists' weapons). I showed them to a foreigner who has been in a war. He said these weapons were made in Germany, UK, Russia and India. All this is for a war...

Q: How long ago was the emergency imposed?

A: From 1983—two and a half years nearly. See, these terrorists have acquired modern weapons. You just have to press the button. A volley of bullets comes from the barrel of the gun. I spoke to a general who fought the Vietnam war. See Mrs Gandhi has gone. That fellow came and shot her dead. He pumped a whole volley of bullets into her. Why did he do that? Not to kill her. Some blood lust. So this happens in the world. They do it. I find them a new type of men. The Vietnam soldiers fought when they went to America. They (suffered from a) psychosis. They are not used to this. They are trained for ceremony, drill and parade. I really wanted to give up the armed services when I again became President, and only wanted trained police, military police throughout the island. Why spend all this money on arms? Why do you want arms; for what purpose? We even stopped recruiting people in the armed services. I am not a soldier; I am not for war.

Q: All right, but if something happens to you, who succeeds you?

A: I don't know...I am a friend of India. I am a lover of its people.

Q: But you got along well with India during the Janata regime. Why not now? What is the difficulty?

A: Then there were no terrorists. They started after the July riots. Ramachandran was born in Sri Lanka, (he is) a friend of Sri Lanka. He has come here.

Q: Sir, you say they started after the July riots. I studied that, and I think it is a motivated statement.

A: But they were against the government. But their planning was done very recently. The main planning was (done) after the July riots.

Q: Do you think it might happen again?

A: I think the people now understand that there is much more to watch.

Q: But your UNDP (United National Democratic Party) people are also making a row about it. Where do we go from here?

A: I said elections.

Q: But you said it is not possible in Jaffna, that it will be a long time before you can hold the elections there.

A: We are getting ready to fight them.

Q: Do you think the Soviet Union is somewhere behind it all, or is India the only villain?

A: No, I don't think the former is there; it is only India.

Q: Is that your hunch or conviction?

A: No hunch, but conviction.

Q: If you think there are training camps in India, why don't you send a parliamentary delegation. Let them see for themselves.

A: What is there to see? They are not public servants. Your papers say that they have seen the camps.

Q: Do you think now you are in the midst of war?

A: In the Jaffna area.

Q: Well that affects your government also.

A: They are bombing my planes, my helicopters.

PAKISTAN

Behind the General's Election

By Tariq Ali

Pakistan has recently experienced a General's election. It was masterminded by a General, orchestrated by the military high command (i.e. the Generals) and the desired results were achieved with the kind collaboration of the Pakistani civil service. The opposition parties had called for a boycott. Hence the main objectives of the Zia-ul Haq dictatorship were to ensure a reasonable turn-out. The largely tame candidates, of course, made sure that their supporters rolled up, but it was the civil servants in the countryside who dragged the people out to vote.

The real question, however, is not how many people voted, but why the Pentagon's favourite Asian dictator felt it necessary to have an election in the first place. There was no real pressure from the State Department in Washington. The Pentagon actually prefers a military regime in Pakistan as it is believed, with good reason, that virtually any civilian government would reach an accommodation with the Soviet Union and settle the Afghanistan question. Zia-ul Haq's desire to achieve some legitimacy for his rule, however fraudulent and tenuous, was motivated by the situation which has been building up inside the Pakistan army itself. Given that this institution is the only solid pillar of the dictatorship, any dissensions within its ranks could prove fatal. Even here, it should be said that Zia's electoral farce could backfire badly. Winning an election by locking up the opposition is, after all, hardly a new tactic for the Pentagon-backed dictators in the Third World. The fact that Zia made the attempt at all is an indication of his weakness. The surface signs may not show this, but the military regime in Pakistan is undergoing a severe crisis of confidence.

The single most important thing which took place in Pakistan in recent weeks was not this surreal election, but the secret trial of over one hundred military officers in Attock fort. This trial, which has not received any detailed coverage in the Western press, is an event of great importance for the dictatorship. The officers under trial have been charged with the most serious offence in the book, which is, "conspiring to overthrow the government by force." The fact that this was how Zia himself came to power is only one of the many ironies of this case.

During the second half of 1983, the people of Sind sparked off a movement against the dictatorship. It was brutally crushed by the army and hundreds of Sindhis, a minority nationality in Punjabi-dominated

Supporters of the outlawed Pakistan People's Party demonstrating in Sind

Pakistan, were killed, several hundreds subjected to torture and thousands placed in prison without trial. At one stage it appeared as though the revolt for democracy would spread to Punjab. A number of senior army officers wrote private letters to Zia at the time and suggested politely that the time had perhaps arrived for a transfer of power to the politicians. The letters were sent on to the directorate of inter-services intelligence in Islamabad in September 1983. The dissident officers had begun to meet informally during the Sind movement. What they were planning was not a coup d'etat, but an organised and concerted refusal to obey orders if they were instructed to shoot demonstrators in the event of the movement spreading to Punjab. The coterie of senior officers who run Pakistan decided that it was crucial to weed out every democratically-inclined dissident in the armed forces as soon as possible.

MRD supporters demonstrating in Karachi

Inter-services intelligence (ISI) was given the go-ahead to plan a "conspiracy" to tap the dissident officers. The planning stage had begun. The entire operation was masterminded by the director general of the ISI, Lt. General Akhtar Abdul Rehman Khan. It was Akhtar Khan who had, as commander of a crack infantry division, pledged his loyalty to Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, the country's last elected leader, one year before the Zia coup of July 1977. It was also the same Akhtar who had led his commandos to storm the Prime Minister's house on 5 July 1977. Akhtar was assisted throughout by Brigadier Imtiaz, known within military intelligence as the "blue-eyed jackal."

The aims of the ISI were as follows: To "prove" that the Pakistan People's Party (PPP) of the executed Prime Minister Bhutto, were involved in planning, sabotage and arson; to implicate India in the plot and present the PPP as instruments of New Delhi; to divert attention from Indo Soviet allegations of the Junta's arming and training of Sikh militants from neighbouring India (there were several training camps in Pakistan which had been established for this purpose); to purge the army of malcontents and democrats; to lay the basis for a Supreme Court ruling to declare PPP politics and "Bhuttoism" alien to Pakistan and ban them permanently; and to identify the dissident officers and physically eliminate them, while claiming that a coup attempt had been forestalled.

The plan was to plant agents within the ranks of the dissidents, organise them into a loose "study group" and then plant Indian ammunition on them and arrest or kill them. The ISI decided to use a well-known Pakistani smuggler-millionaire, Seth Abid, to arrange for a cache of Indian arms and explosives. Abid, a close personal friend of Zia, agreed to become the conduit and he was accordingly introduced to dissident officers as a man with influence who could be useful in the future.

Within five months after the plan was first conceived, the blue-eyed jackal had prepared a list of 1,000 army officers from whom the dissidents could be selected. The list was culled from intelligence files and all the officers named were stated to be hostile to Zia and the continuation of martial law and the large-scale corruption (especially in relation to heroin smuggling) that had tainted the army. A hundred names were picked from the larger list. The jackal was instructed to tell agent provocateurs to "harness and identify" the dissidents and give them an organisation.

The last act was meant for Lahore, the largest city close to the Indian border. General Akhtar Khan himself visited a number of possible sites for staging the "coup attempt." The operation was code-named "The Hangman's Second Rope" (the reference was to Bhutto, who had been dealt with by the "first rope").In Lahore, only Colonel Yamin was taken into complete confidence in early December 1983. The operation was scheduled for the night of 23 December 1983, but intelligence telephone-tappers heard two dissident officers expressing their doubts about coming to Lahore. These men told each other that something odd appeared to be taking place. Akhtar panicked. The officers were sent away on official business and the operation postponed to 3 or 4 January 1984. On 1 January 1984, the troops involved in the plan were told that they were needed to crush a "bloodthirsty gang of anti-Pakistan conspirators." Large-scale arrests were planned in cantonments and naval and air force bases throughout the country at the same time.

The last-minute change in schedule had an odd effect. The venue of the dissidents' meeting was changed from the affluent Lahore suburb of Gulberg to Nawan Kot. Seth Abid's men brought their consignment of arms and explosives to the new venue in great haste. Abid is a veteran trafficker in drugs and is said to be the Mr Big of the smuggling of hashish and heroin to Europe and America from Pakistan. His men accidentally picked up 12 boxes containing a quarter of a ton of pure Pakistani hashish and planted these with similar boxes which contained arms and ammunition. The whole operation was botched by Abid's clumsiness. Thus, there were boxes containing safety fuses, but no explosives, there were twelve sub-machine guns of 7.62 mm calibre, but the ammunition for these was of 9 mm calibre. This became obvious as the boxes were opened in the presence of police and magistrates.

Further problems arose. Only six dissidents had been informed of the change of venue for their supposed "social evening." Only three turned up. The others were more concerned with their personal commitments. The Sind uprising had been crushed. Punjab was quiet and many officers felt that, for the time being, the storm was over. Three officers, Squadron Leader Tahir Maqsood, Major Nisar Hussain Bokhari and Major Sadiq Abdullah, were guided to the new venue by an ISI agent, Major Shahid, a man who had been cashiered from the army for corruption, but had been re-employed by the intelligence wing because of his close affinities to the Jamaat-i-Islami (a fundamentalist Muslim sect). At 7.00 pm, Major Shahid brought the three dissidents to the trap. He directed them through the gate and disappeared into a side lane. The three officers were confused and decided to stay at the gate and wait for him. Without warning they were greeted by a rain of bullets. Colonel Yamin's ten-man squad had opened fire. The dissidents fell to the ground and Major Bokhari was seriously wounded. Three passers-by were also felled by the gunfire and died instantly.

Krishna Public Library

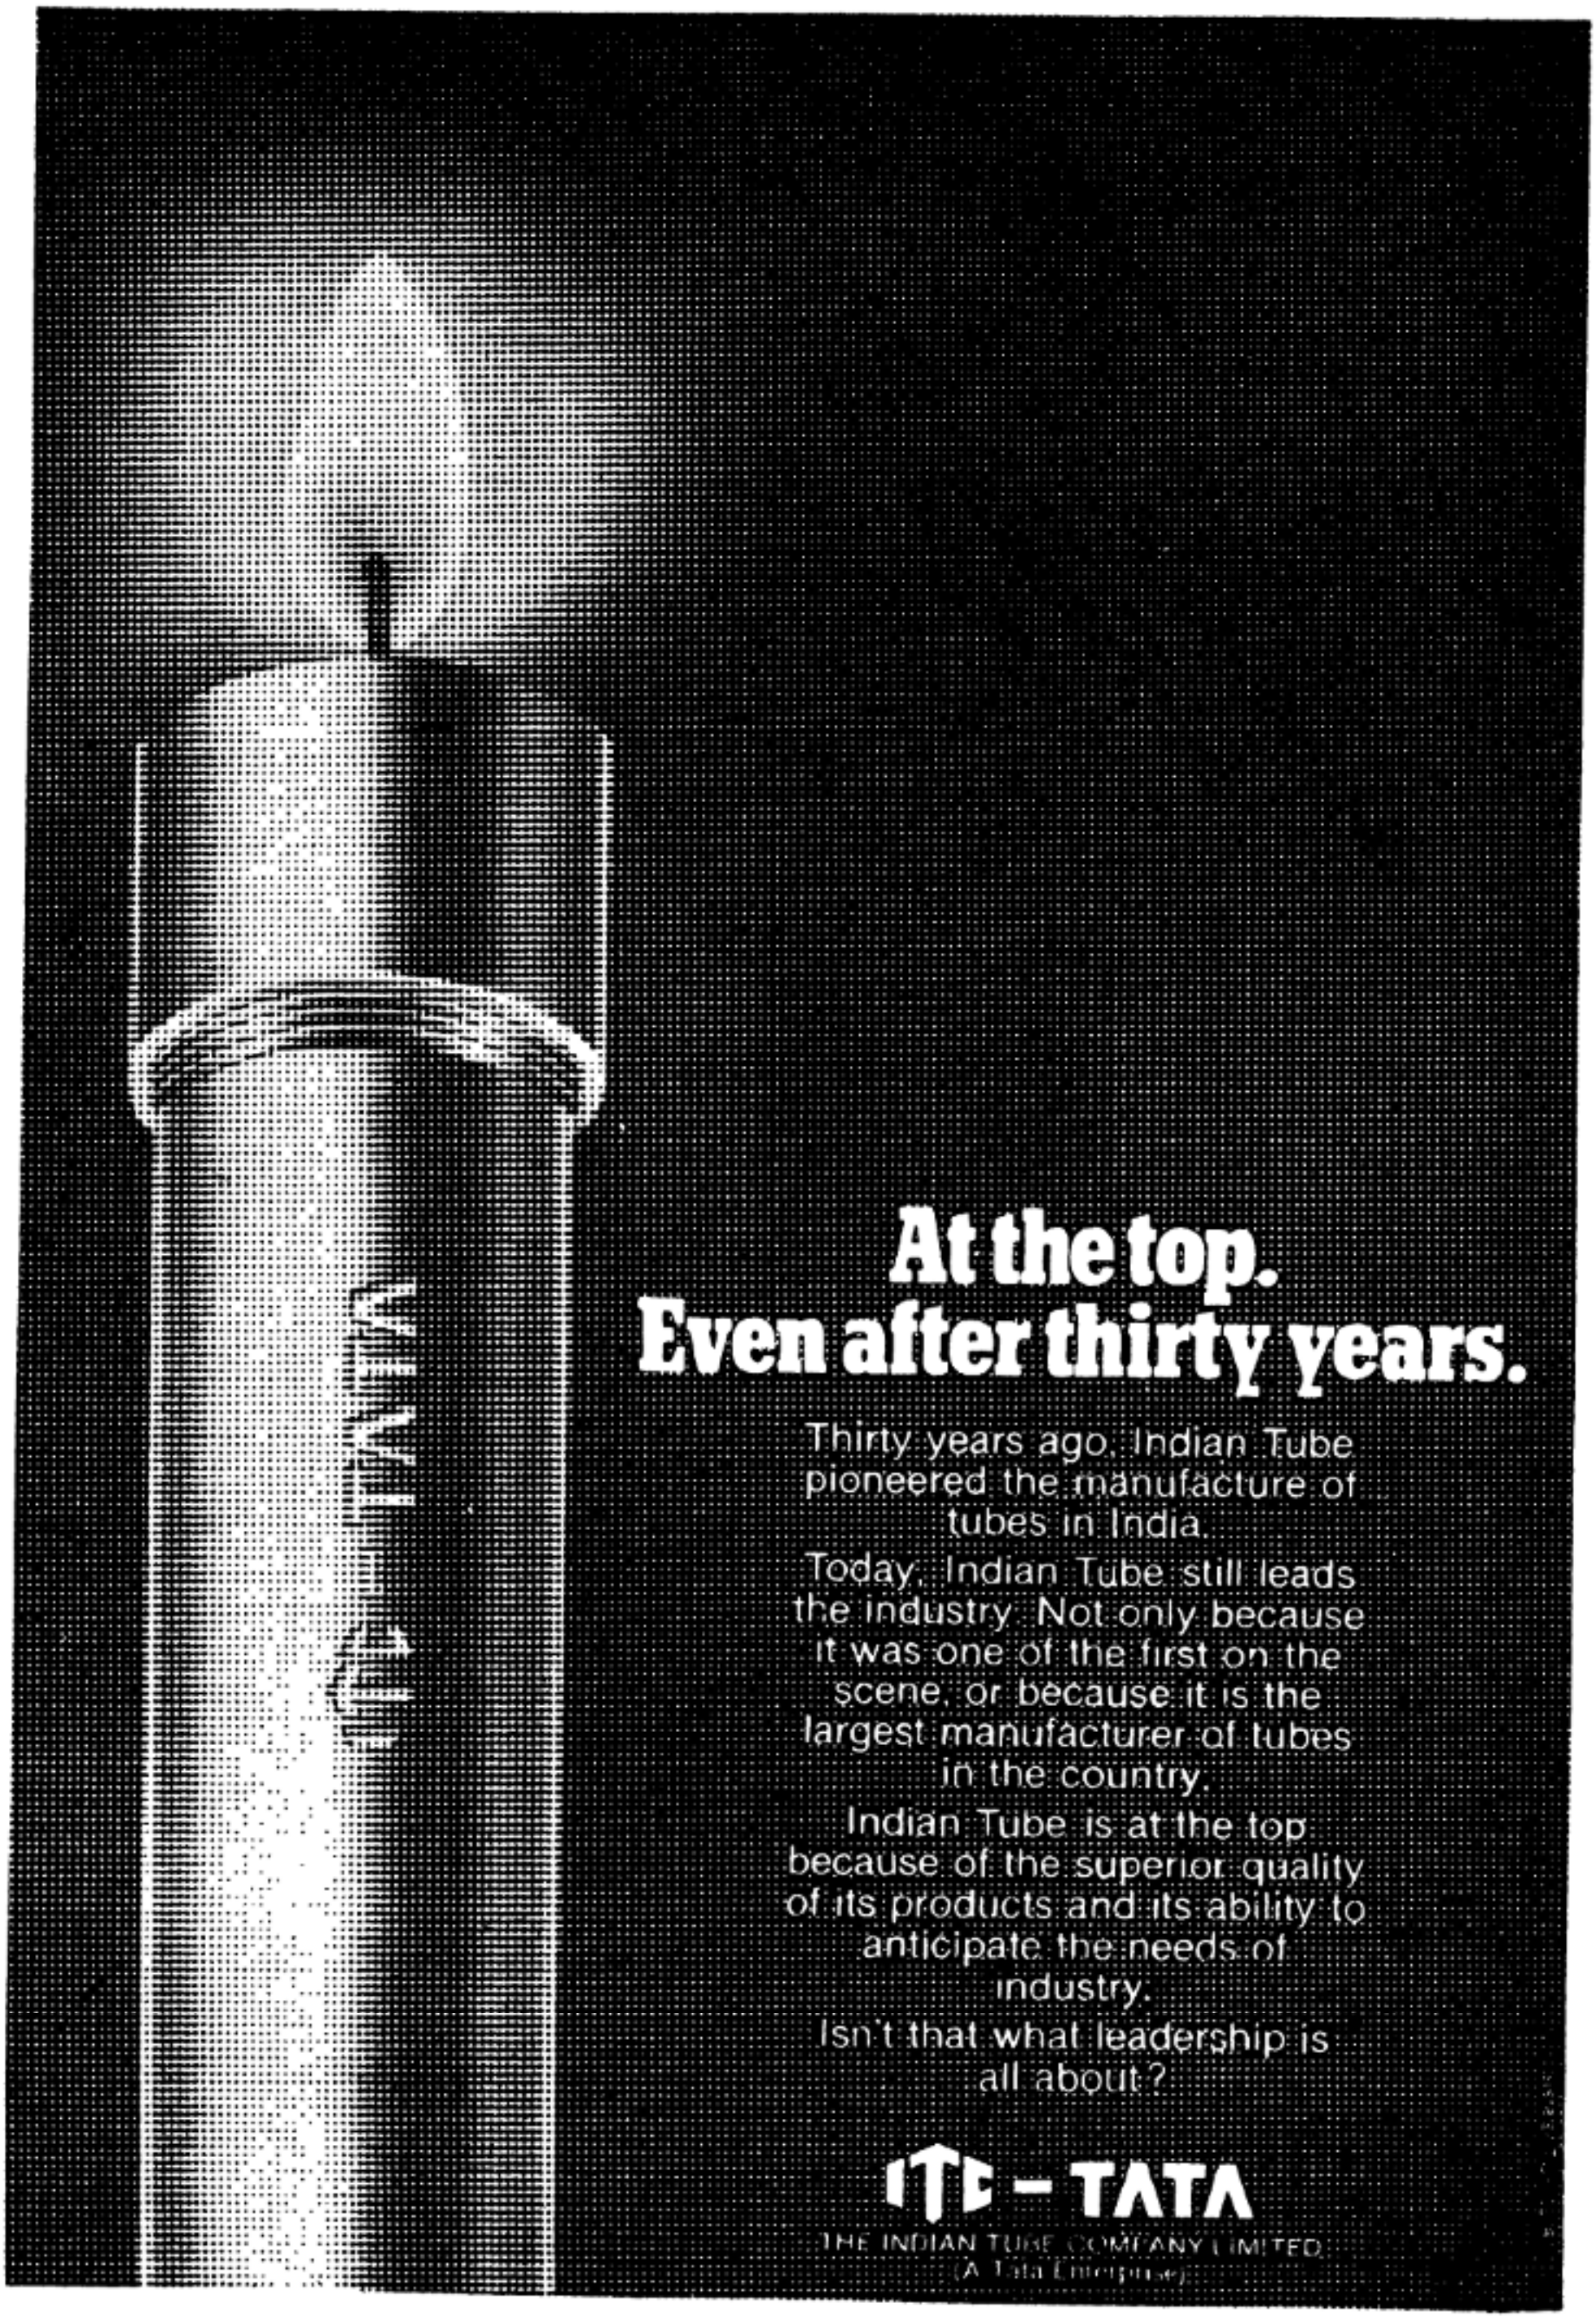
The event was then proclaimed to be a conspiracy which had been nipped in the bud and arrests were made elsewhere. Over 70 armed forces officers were arrested and 100 civilians, including women and children, were initially detained. A lawyer, Raza Kazim, who knew some of the officers,was also arrested. The imprisoned officers were kept in total isolation in tiny underground cells (four feet by six feet) and fettered and handcuffed. They were blindfolded at regular intervals. They were strapped to ice-blocks (a traditional sub-continental torture), given electric shocks, whipped, denied food, sunlight, fresh air and bathing facilities. A number suffered serious collapses after torture. Virtually all of them suffered a loss of eyesight and developed numerous diseases. Their medical reports were destroyed at the special intelligence bureau on the orders of Major Tariq Afzal and Major Masud.

As a result of the tortures, the intelligence agencies obtained their "confessions." They were recorded on video. Then a tame magistrate, Karam Elahi Beg, a creature of the military, was brought in to hear the "confessions." He was flanked by two Majors from the ISI staff, Najeeb and Javed. When some of the accused refused to make the ISI-dictated confessions they were threatened by the magistrate and the young Majors. The main purpose of the torture was to prove "Indian involvement" and counter Indian charges of training camps for Sikhs in Pakistan. Suddenly, however, the pressure to implicate India was dropped. What had happened? The major reason is that the high command feared a violent Indian reaction and were warned by a friendly foreign power not to play the "Indian card." A minor reason may have been that some army messengers had disappeared with crucial evidence proving that the trial was a fake from the beginning to end. The evidence contained "confessions" written in the offices of the ISI and destined for interrogators at Attock fort.

He supervised the torture and the interrogation as well as threatening officers with capital punishment. Badar concentrated initially on attempting to torture the following officers to become approvers: Squadron Leader Tahir Maqsood, Lt Col. Shirazi, Major Abdul Qayyum, Major Mustafa Kamal, Major Khalid Mahmood, Major Zafar Iqbal and Captain Muhammed Sibtain. The officers refused and withstood the torture. Tahir Maqsood later broke down when his wife and younger brother (also detained at Attock) were humiliated and subjected to a vileness that proved unbearable to Maqsood. Later, a mentally tortured Maqsood retracted and, together with his wife and brother, was whisked off to the ISI headquarters in Islamabad for more "coaxing." This time he succumbed.



Gen Zia

The entire affair created dissension within the higher ranks of the army. Accordingly, some of the accused were forced to mention names of senior officers and others prepared by the intelligence agencies. Generals Iqbal Khan and Sawar Khan were retired. Two senior corps commanders, Generals Majid and Jamal, as well as a number of Major Generals and Brigadiers were sacked. Zia's own military secretary, Brigadier Khawar Zeb Butt, and the deputy military secretary, Colonel Zaheer Abbasi, were subjected to interrogation and transferred. Altogether 550 Majors and Captains were released from service in January-March 1984. The effect of all this on the army's morale cannot be underestimated. The news that has been smuggled out of Attock fort is also widely known within the army and it has not enhanced Zia's status.

Zia's young favourite, Lt Colonel Badar, was in charge of Attock fort.

Within the ruling army clique, senior Generals argued for a field general court martial (FGCM) but the ISI, fearful that a FGCM might reveal too much, insisted on a military court which they could control far more directly. The trial at Attock is currently taking place behind closed doors. What has not emerged fully is which card the army chiefs have decided to play. With the General's election out of the way, Zia has started hanging people again. The framed officers are accused of high treason. Their lives are in danger. It would be ironic, though not surprising, if the so-called defenders of democracy in Washington and London allowed any of these officers (whose only crime was to demand a return to democracy) to be executed.

At the top.
Even after thirty years.
Thirty years ago, Indian Tube pioneered the manufacture of tubes in India.
Today, Indian Tube still leads the industry. Not only because it was one of the first on the scene, or because it is the largest manufacturer of tubes in the country.
Indian Tube is at the top because of the superior quality of its products and its ability to anticipate the needs of industry.
Isn't that what leadership is all about?
ITC - TATA
THE INDIAN TUBE COMPANY LIMITED
(A Tata Enterprise)

The London Plot

It could be Benazir's best way to fight Zia

The posh flat in the newly redeveloped Barbican area of east London is a far cry from Pakistan. Not merely is it a continent and a half away from the military state, but cosy, unfettered and out of harm's way as far as the heinous designs of President Zia-ul Haq are concerned. And it is from here that Ms Benazir Bhutto, daughter of the executed Prime Minister Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, and acting president of the Pakistan People's Party (PPP), marshalls her resistance against the martial law regime.

Ms Bhutto, 31, an Oxford graduate and a former president of this university's students union, is prettier than pictures make her out to be, with a bright and perceptive appearance to boot. Indeed, with her aptitude for tasteful attire and befitting facials, she could just be the person whom one would prefer to invite to a party as the leader of one of the Third World's most important political groupings.

Perhaps, as the child of Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, and given the Indian subcontinent's preoccupation with dynasties, Ms Bhutto possessed an interest and inclination for public life. But she has been thrust into the limelight rather prematurely. In fact, she is yet to shrug off the style of public speaking typical in intercollegiate debates, as she revealed when addressing a press conference recently; and yet, she has to contend with a most ruthless opponent in General Zia.

Her present weakness, and indeed uneasiness, stems from the reality of her escape from oppression in Pakistan, and an apparent reluctance to return to the scene of battle. On her release from house arrest in January 1984, she flew to the United Kingdom for medical treatment—she had developed an ear problem—and though fully recovered, is unwilling to go back because she is "bound to be interned" once again. She claims she wanted to return when she heard rumours that political parties would be allowed to field candidates in the recently-held elections (which they were not), but changed her mind when she came to know the truth, and also, because, according to her, the Karachi airport and her house in the same city had been cordoned off by the army in anticipation of her arrival. Since the time of the coup that overthrew her father, Ms Bhutto has endured great humiliation and hardship in the hands of the military rulers. But her associates confide that she might have become a little wary of suffering, and would, perhaps, like to run her campaign from London, though she is still to seek political asylum

The invitation to the international media was part of this exercise. She appealed to them to help her cause, while emphasising that the partyless polls were "a farce" and "selections not elections," that the movement for the restoration of democracy (MRD), of which the PPP is a constituent, will "successfully boycott the polls." She even challenged Zia, saying that his nominees would lose their security deposits against every single PPP candidate "in a free and fair general election."

While the PPP is probably the only party with a respectable base—47 of the newly-elected members of the National Assembly (the total seats being 207) are said to have won purely on "shaheed Bhutto's" name—the results of last week's elections have come as a rude shock to Ms Bhutto, and reduced much of her earlier assertions to just rhetoric. The largest grouping in the new house is believed to be the Muslim League, with 60 seats, whose only link with Mohammed Ali Jinnah is its nomenclature. It has no record of dissent against military rule and no discernable ideology, which, if anything, goes in the General's favour. The defeat of six of Zia's ministers negates the charge of widespread rigging. And the turnout, too, of 52 per cent, compares well with the 57 per cent of votes cast in 1970.

But though disconsolate, Ms Bhutto is still determined to attain her goal, that of ousting General Zia. And it is true when she says that the outcome of the hustings has not granted General Zia any legitimacy, for the sovereignty of the new Assembly, not to mention the President's own unelected status, remains in doubt. When asked whether she would consider guerilla tactics as a means of removing Zia, her reply, skilful, if not sincere, was, "We are a political party and would like to pursue political means." These methods now seem to have failed, so, sooner than later, the only alternative could be the revolutionary path. This is how General Charles de Gaulle did it, while in exile in London. And if Ms Bhutto is capable, this would appear to be her only choice.

Benazir Bhutto (waving) with friends

Ashis Ray, London

GUEST COLUMN/CHANCHAL SARKAR

Foiling a Conspiracy

As I left Dhaka on my last visit, I thought how lucky the people of Darjeeling were. They'll watch the next instalments of the two family serials running on Bangladesh TV and I won't, I said to myself. They are captivating, the serials, and prove the truth of the quintessential Bengali principle that culture and language are immensely stronger than political boundaries and diplomatic demarches. Today it is Darjeeling and across the other frontier areas. Tomorrow everyday technology will make sure that there will be no holding back the signals anywhere. Those crossgrained grey eminences who burrow in the offices of the National Security Intelligence and Armed Forces Intelligence in Dhaka, and their counterparts in New Delhi and Calcutta had better cotton on to that fact soon.

Neither Rabindranath Tagore nor Kazi Nazrul Islam sang about any particular district but of Bengal as a whole. So why not push aside the iron curtain that separates the culture and language of the two Bengals?

It is absolutely certain that powerful soft-pedallers in both countries work in a determined fashion to keep the two countries from getting any closer. Else why should the elementary issues of linking them by direct telephone and a direct air service be gathering icicles while there is so much caterwauling about South Asian Regional Cooperation (SARC)? Every time there's a meeting of the bilateral joint committee there is an optimistic press handout. Then it is back to square one. Whenever I have talked to the officials of either country, they invariably blame the other side. In truth the fault lies with both and it is due to suspicion and a blinkered, negative view of the sub-continent's future.

Take theatre, for example, which is enthusiastically loved by the people in both Bengals. There used to be a number of scholarships for Bangladeshis at Delhi's National School of Drama and these scholarship-holders were a powerful influence on many aspects of Bangladeshi drama. They have been stopped now. Any troupe coming from Calcutta to Bangladesh or going there has to pass through the eye of the needle, that is the scrutiny of several ministries and departments of the government of Bangladesh.

Bangladeshi actors performing in Calcutta: breaking cultural barriers

The Indians in their turn are prize-blunderers. When Dhaka's well-known Nagarik theatre group came to India in 1984 on an invitation from the Indian Council for Cultural Relations (ICCR), they sent in their professional requirements months ago. For their famous play Nuruldiner Sarajiban (The life entire of Nurulḍin) they needed three hillocks on the stage to represent three different centres of action of the play. At the ministry of culture they were told by the secretary that this had not been arranged because there was no allocation in the budget for it! The ministry also wanted the troupe to go to Jaipur, not on the original programme. Nagarik agreed but said that two of their cast had not yet arrived. A suggestion was then made: Couldn't someone in the ministry who had taken part in Bengali amateur theatricals take on the roles? It was like telling Zubin Mehta that, since the first violinist of the New York Philharmonic was held up, couldn't an additional secretary's daughter, who was taking violin lessons, stand in? In Calcutta, the ICCR could not find anything but a second-grade theatre hall for Nagarik's performance whereas any Calcutta group would have been happy to surrender their bookings to the guests.

The record in books is no better. Together, the two Bengals provide one of the greatest potential book markets in the world. I asked in Dhaka's New Market bookshops for the works of Kazi Nazrul Islam and was told that the Bangladesh edition was out of print and that copies would now have to be scrounged from Calcutta: a difficult job. I had taken over a list of books to buy from the Bangla Academy and found almost all of them to be out of print. Paper is very expensive in Bangladesh (despite a limited amount put out for cultural use) and so is good printing. Book prices are prohibitive. Result: Dhaka University published just seven books last year. People in Bangladesh know more about authors and books of the West. In fact, they know more than the people of West Bengal do. But the traffic in books is very, very thin.

Sitting under the spreading banyan tree in the grounds of the Bangla Academy and listening to the songs of Kazi Nazrul Islam one evening and of D.L. Roy, Atul Prasad and Rajani Kanta Sen the next, it occurred to me that there is only one way to beat this grey conspiracy of small, tunnel-visioned people: by-pass it. Individual travel is now fairly easy specially if there is a sponsor and so more and more writers, singers, sportsmen, doctors, scientists, accountants, economists, chess players, technologists, mechanics, voluntary organisation people and women's organisation workers should invite each other over. Neither Rabindranath Tagore nor Kazi Nazrul Islam sang about any particular district but of Bengal as a whole. So why not push aside the iron curtain that separates the culture and language of the two Bengals?

Taking the Madhu Sarak from Jessore I drove up to Sagardari and it was heart-rending to see the decrepit state of Michael Madhusudan's ancestral house and the poor quality of the two old busts of the poet that stand in front of it. The river Kapotakshi, slender now, still runs by Sagardari and Michael's poem on the river is inscribed on a marble slab near where once was the ghat. Lalan Fakir and Hosen Raja's homes could not be faring any better, I am sure. To their eternal credit the Bangladeshis have not changed the names of places or institutions in their country—it would have been stupid if they had because they are part of our composite heritage although they have not done much about preservation. Even old Dhaka is decaying fast. West Bengalis have an equally bad record about preserving the homes of Sarat Chandra Chatterjee or Jibananda Das or anyone else. (Did not Haraprasad Shastri once say that "Bengalis are a people who've forgotten about themselves?") Enthusiastic people could try to join forces with their counterparts and savour their past in both parts of Bengal. There must be a rediscovery of roots. There must also be generosity in the recognition of roots—Calcutta has not even a street named after that most Bengali of its chief ministers, A.K. Fazlul Huq.

Gift-mail or send by hand a lot of Bengali books across the border—send magazines, clippings and records and cassettes—that will help beat the conspiracy. "Xeroxcracy" is a powerful weapon. There are other ways too. The only channel between the two Bengals that has always been open is radio (and now TV). If books and magazines cannot cross, what is there to prevent All India Radio, Calcutta, from fashioning the latest novels of West Bengal into seven or eight readings (or into plays) as the BBC's World Service does all the time? Spike Milligan's latest novel Pucknoon and Kingsley Amis's I Like It Here, for instance, were adapted recently. Then why not the latest of Samaresh Basu and Shankar? Until the administrations take off their blinkers—and that won't happen for a long, long time—only person-to-person efforts can foil the conspiracy, take the wrinkles out of our relationship, and let the language and culture of the two Bengals mingle.

Until the administrations (of India and Bangladesh) take off their blinkers—and that won't happen for a long, long time—only person-to-person effort can foil the conspiracy, take the wrinkles out of our relationship, and let the language and culture of the two Bengals mingle.

RADEUS BBL 1-85

Remember your thirst love?

Remember how your heart sang? How your joy took wing? Remember your thirst Limca with her? You can still taste that zingi lime'n' lemoni flavour each time you have a Limca. The excitement is heady. Just like the thirst time!

Limca. Each time is the thirst time!

is veri veri lime 'n' lemoni

Limca

SERVE CHILLED

ARTIFICIALLY FLAVOURED. CONTAINS NO FRUIT JUICE OR FRUIT PULP

SPECIAL REPORT

Punjab: The End Game

The release of the Akali leaders from jail and the appointment of Arjun Singh as the Governor of Punjab have raised hopes of a settlement of the Punjab crisis

By any reckoning, Mr Arjun Singh's sudden entry into Punjab has to be seen in the perspective of this troubled and strife-torn border state bedevilled by extremism and terrorism by Khalistani protagonists and their supporters and sympathisers. Mr Arjun Singh is far more important for Punjab than he perhaps ever was for Madhya Pradesh. His appointment took the nation by surprise, especially because it came within 24 hours of his being sworn in as chief minister of MP for another term

The suddenness of the decision by the Prime Minister prompted many theories to be floated in political circles. Had he been shunted off because he was becoming too powerful as a chief minister? Had his wings been clipped because of his growing popularity? Had he to leave MP because most of the MLAs were his nominees? Even as these questions were asked, there were other queries too. Why had Rajiv Gandhi taken the decision so suddenly? Why had he chosen Mr Arjun Singh for this job? Why not any other chief minister? Did Rajiv Gandhi think that the Rajputs in his party would gang up against him if Mr Chandrashekhar Singh of Bihar was denied another term in office? There were a host of questions. In this surcharged atmosphere came the report that Mr Sitaram Kesri had tendered the advice to the Prime Minister that Arjun Singh's wings should be clipped right now as he was getting too big for his boots.

Mr Arjun Singh's new assignment as Governor of Punjab is a crucial test for this suave, sophisticated and soft-spoken gentleman politician. By his performance, to a great extent, will be judged the calibre of the new government headed by Rajiv Gandhi. And success in this tough and challenging assignment will most certainly have a positive impact on the mood of the Indian nation. If Mr Arjun Singh succeeds as a politician where his predecessor bureaucrats have not made a mark, he stands a very good chance of being inducted into the council of ministers as India's home minister. In that event, Mr S. B. Chavan may be sent to Maharashtra as chief minister.

Arjun Singh

Left with just a few options to resolve the Punjab imbroglio, Rajiv Gandhi must make his moves on the political chessboard with caution and care. In releasing Sant Longowal and seven other Akali leaders in appointing Mr Arjun Singh as the Governor of Punjab, and in clarifying that only certain portions of the Anandpur Sahib resolution need to be rejected, Rajiv Gandhi can be said to have made some very vital moves in what we may call as the "end game."

Harchand Singh Longowal

The release of the Akali leaders is, by any stretch of imagination, an extremely bold and wise move. One wonders whether his late mother would have ever shed her reluctance to make such a move. Their release, after nine months of detention, will give them the opportunity to renew their contacts, and get a feel of the mood of the people in general, an aspect that may help them determine their future course of action.

At the time the Madhya Pradesh Congress(I) legislature party unanimously elected Mr Arjun Singh as its leader and chief minister of the state, there was a question mark over who would be his counterpart in Bihar. The tussle there was between the chief minister, Mr Chandrashekhar Singh, a Rajput, and Mr Bindeshwar Dubey, Bihar PCC(I) president, a Brahmin. The Rajputs would gang up if Mr Singh was not made the chief minister of Bihar, Mr Gandhi was told. Some name-dropping was indulged in. The names included those of Mr Vishwanath Pratap Singh, Mr Sanjay Singh, Madhavrao Scindia and even Mr Arun Singh, a close aide of the PM. It was made out that the Rajput clan should be dealt a blow at this juncture. This could best be done by getting rid of Arjun Singh and choosing Mr Dubey as the chief minister of Bihar. Thus, one of the most prominent Rajputs in the Congress(I) was to be given a treatment that would put the others in their place and weaken their possible resolve to plot against the PM.

But if the move was made prior to Arjun Singh being elected CLP(I) leader, the opposition would utilise it to say that a leader who could not become a chief minister was sent packing as Governor. So the process of his being unanimously elected was gone through. And then, when the chief minister, about to begin his second five-year term, came to consult the Prime Minister on whom to include in the council of ministers, he was told to drop everything and proceed as the Governor of Punjab.

In a related development, the moment it became known that Mr Arjun Singh was being posted as the Governor of Punjab, a beaming Mr Vidya Charan Shukla made no effort to conceal his joy to a select band of newsmen. He invited them to his house where he distributed "kaju barfi" and issued a statement, the first in recent years, welcoming the choice of Mr Motilal Vora as the new chief minister of Madhya Pradesh. Mr Chandulal Chandrakar is as depressed over Vora's choice as Shukla is happy. It remains to be seen how Mr Gandhi deals with Mr Shukla on this score. What is certain is that Shukla's effort to steal the limelight by pretending that he was behind the move to rid his home state of Arjun Singh has been frowned upon by the PM. Shukla has spoken after a long time. Yet, he may find he has spoken too soon.

But to return to the main issue, the question arises as to why Kesri should fear Arjun Singh's second term in office. The reason is simple. In 1980, when he first became the chief minister, he was dependent on New Delhi. But this time, Arjun Singh had selected his party nominees in a manner that most of those loyal to him personally were included and emerged victorious in the recent Assembly poll. This meant that Mr Arjun Singh could emerge as the most powerful chief minister in the country. In Kesri's assessment, this was a disturbing fact and could be profitably used to ensure that the political game in Bihar was played the way he wanted it. Hence the story of the Congress Rajputs joining hands to put up a common front against Rajiv Gandhi. It was a convenient story, a plausible story. Most important, it sold, enabling Kesri to kill more than two birds with one stone. One bird was an individual and the other a state. It also might have helped him move closer to the PM.

Mr Arjun Singh undoubtedly put up a brave front while answering a variety of questions, very probing in nature, from newsmen who met him in Madhya Pradesh Bhavan. But those who met him alone found him pensive and nervous, unsure about what lay ahead of him. He was at a loss to understand why he had been picked up so swiftly for this gubernatorial assignment.

The drama about the surprise posting had its impact. Many other chief ministers saw uncertainty around them. They all realised that what had happened to Arjun Singh could happen to any one of them. However powerful they may be, these chief ministers knew that their destiny lay in the hands of one individual: Rajiv Gandhi. Arjun Singh had been lucky to have so many nice things said about him at the time of his removal from Madhya Pradesh. The others may be far less fortunate. Somebody like Vasantdada Patil may not even get a governorship after dislodgement.

The Prime Minister's decision evoked several other questions. Was this an impulsive action? Was this the new style of functioning? Would it not create an air of uncertainty for all other chief ministers, put them on tenterhooks and force them to be beholden to Rajiv Gandhi for every day they remained in office? Was it not an insult to the verdict of the CLP(I) of MP? Was not a discarded chief minister being sent as Governor? He enjoyed the solid backing of his CLP(I), it was stated. He himself said it was not an insult to the CLP(I) but an honour to him. He was proud that the PM had placed faith in him and he pledged to do his utmost to resolve the Punjab tangle.

A Special Correspondent, New Delhi

The Government's Litmus Test

Things are apace again in Punjab. The release of eight top Akali leaders including the president Harchand Singh Longowal, Jagdev Singh Talwandi and Surjit Singh Barnala was quickly followed up by a series of announcements concerning the state in Parliament and outside: The decision of the cabinet sub-committee on Punjab to visit the state, a reaffirmation of the commitment to restore popular rule and a discernible move towards the withdrawal of the army. The Prime Minister himself softened his stand on the issue when he told the Rajya Sabha on 14 March that the government had at no time demanded that the Akali Dal give up the entire Anandpur Sahib resolution as a precondition to the resumption of talks for solving the tangle in Punjab.

The Akali Dal, however, does have preconditions and is still treading the hard line. Harchand Singh Longowal has been, since his release, making it clear that the road for talks will not be opened until the army is pulled out of Punjab and an enquiry ordered into the riots following the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. There are other conditions being placed by the Akalis which the government might find unpalatable. The release of all members of the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF) and the withdrawal of all cases against Sikhs who deserted the army in the wake of Operation Bluestar. Everyone from Longowal down to the Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC) acting President Prem Singh Lalpura and the Akali Dal convener, Surjan Singh Thekedar, is making these demands.

Perhaps, a more important indication of things to come is the call that Longowal has given to the Sikh community. Stressing that the prime task of his party was to restore the self-respect of Sikhs in the country, he has appealed to all members of the Sikh community to come together in this hour of "deep crisis" and fight the government's policy of "aggression and repression."

If the attitude of the Akali leadership is any indication, things do not seem to be looking up in Punjab. The recent past looms large over the state and the Akalis are not uttering a word about the future. All that Harchand Singh Longowal has done so far is to cry hoarse over what he calls the government's attempt to crush the Sikh community. His long list of complaints begins with Operation Bluestar, meanders through the detention of Akali leaders and the riots and comes finally to his allegation that the Sikh community has been shabbily treated by a government that has itself become communal. Longowal went as far as to say that Rajiv Gandhi's mandate was one that was got by inciting the sentiments of the majority community against the Sikhs all over the country. He has been unequivocal in his criticism. Commenting on the army operation inside the Golden Temple, he said that the government had surpassed "even the Mughals in committing atrocities against the Sikhs."

Keeping the sword out of the scabbard, feel Punjab watchers, has almost become a necessity for the Akali leadership. Even the moderates will have to do it for sometime if not for anything else, to maintain their credibility in the Sikh community. The government's decision to let off a section of the detained leadership is quite obviously a litmus test to gauge the mood in Punjab. Whether it will bring forth the right colours is something only time will tell.

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

INVESTIGATION

The Company a Minister Keeps

Hotel Leela-Penta which is being set up near Bombay's new Sahar international airport, will not only be unique because it is located on prime government land but also due to the official patronage it has enjoyed so far. Shubhabrata Bhattacharya investigates into the "special treatment" the hotel has enjoyed, courtesy Mr Khurshed Alam Khan, the former minister for tourism and civil aviation and presently the minister of state for external affairs.

Bombay's new Sahar international airport is soon going to have a hotel in its vicinity. The Leela Penta Hotel, which is being set up by Hotel Leela-venture Ltd, a firm promoted by a defunct textile unit, Leela (Scottish) Lace Ltd, will not only be unique due to its location on prime government land but also because of the official patronage it has enjoyed thus far. The foundation stone ceremony (bhoomi-pooja) on 16 October 1983 was "graced" by the Maharashtra chief minister, Vasantdada Patil and the then union tourism and civil aviation minister Khurshed Alam Khan (who is now the minister of state for external affairs). The entire family of Khurshed Alam Khan, his son, his daughter and his son-in-law, attended the ceremony. This was not the only VIP connection which Hotel Leelaventure Ltd could boast of. The present board of directors of the company has tennis star Vijay Amritraj as a member. Two former secretaries to the government of India are on the board. Dr B Venkatramaan (who was secretary, tourism and civil aviation at the time when the hotel's lease with the International Airports Authority of India was being negotiated) and P J Fernandes, a distinguished retired civil servant whose daughter is married to Khurshed Alam Khan's son. The presence of both these gentlemen on the board would not have evoked interest but for the fact that in the government's ethics, when a person has any nexus with the decision-making for a private project, sitting on the board of the beneficiary company is unheard of.

Apart from Vasantdada Patil and Khurshed Alam Khan, another VIP who is friendly with the patriarch of the Leela Lace family, C P Krishnan Nair, is the Kerala chief minister, K Karunakaran. While Mr Patil and Mr Khan went out of their way to "grace" the bhoomi-pooja of Leela-Penta Hotel three days before the lease was actually signed with IAAI, the Bombay and Trivandrum grapevine has stories about how Mr Karunakaran tried to bail out Mr Nair after he had been served an Urban Land Ceiling notice in November 1983 (Remember Mr Karunakaran's secret trips to Bombay in the last phase of 1983? The Kerala chief minister has thus far been unable to explain his visits to Bombay.)

Leela Penta Hotel is coming up on prime government land (see box) which has been given to it for a song. The lease and licence agreements with the IAAI have many strange characteristics. According to Dr Rashmi Mayur, the well known environmentalist and chief of Greater Bombay Citizen's Vigilance Committee, "Very seldom has a project violated so many statutes and laws as Leela Penta Hotel." Dr Mayur told SUNDAY that the laws violated by the hotel were: The Companies Act 1956, The Transfer of Property Act 1882, The Easements Act, The Indian Stamp Act, The Income Tax Act 1962, The Wealth Tax Act 1957, The Gift Tax Act 1958, The Urban Land Ceiling Act, The Foreign Exchange Regulations Act 1973, The International Airports Authority Act 1972, The Bombay Municipal Corporation Act 1888, Development Control Rules for Greater Bombay, Building Regulations of the Bombay Municipal Corporation, Development Plans for Greater Bombay, Geological Survey of India, height restriction on building within two kilometres' radius around international airports in India. "One really wonders how such violations could have taken place without the connivance of lawmakers and several implementing agencies. The whole project is ultimate in mafiaism at its best," Dr Mayur asserted.

Khurshed Alam Khan

The Krishnan Nair family's prime business before the hotel project came up was Leela (Scottish) Lace Ltd. a textile company floated in 1964, which has not been reporting much production in the past few years. Initially C.P. Krishnan Nair's wife Leelaamma was his business associate (hence the name "Leela" in the companies). Now his son, Dinesh Nair, is the mananging director of Leela Lace and another son, Vivek Nair, is managing director of the hotel. Initially, the Nairs planned the hotel on their own land but as political patronage came in, the hotel shifted out of the family's land to government land.

The Nairs initially planned to set up the hotel on their own land which now has been left untouched, thanks to the IAAI bonanza. In March 1982, the family, in order to attract non-resident funds, issued a project report, prepared by one Dr J.K. Krishnaswamy, who styled himself as an "independent economic and tourism consultant." Page 64 of the report refers to the location of the project. It runs as follows:

Land Characteristics

The existing plot of land has an area of approximately 10,000 sq yds (90,000 sq ft) on the periphery of which is located a 28-room mansion measuring about 1983 sq yds (12,000 sq ft) After cordoning off this mansion there is available 8017 sq yds (72,154 sq ft) for the hotel project.

It is the intention of the hotel company to construct a 284-room hotel building in one stretch.

However, the company's application to the state government in Bombay for an increase in plot ratio or floor space index (FSI) has not yet been approved and is still under its scrutiny. The increase in FSI is required to build a 284-room property on the available land. Due to the procedural delay usually consistent with such variances, it has been decided to go ahead with the construction of 180 rooms in the first phase of the project.

The company has moved the central government's department of tourism to strongly recommend to the state government the need for an immediate sanction of the higher FSI requested. Also the company had petitioned the International Airport's Authority (IAAI) of the central government to consider giving to the company on long lease some portion of the land contiguous to the proposed Irregular Dealings?

The licence agreement, under which Leela-Penta hotel has been given 20,000 sq. meters of government land is an interesting document with some unique characteristics. The land has been given to Leela (Scottish) Lace Ltd., a textile manufacturing company which has not much of production to show over the past few years, for a period of five years (beginning from 2 August 1982) for "beautification and recreation purposes." The plot is adjacent to the land leased for construction of the hotel and shall form part of the hotel premises. Though the licence was given to Leela (Scottish) Lace Ltd., the utilisation is being done by Hotel Leelaverture Ltd., which is a different company. Normally licensed land is not transferable, but in this case this is only a small irregularity compared to other breaches of licence norms. Clause three of the agreement states that the licence fee (fixed at Rs two lakhs initially) could be revised every three years: thereby clearly suggesting that the licence is likely to be renewed indefinitely (which makes it as good as a lease).

When the prospectus of Hotel Leelaventure Ltd., shows that the company has "acquired" 29,000 sq. meters of IAAI land, it is presumed that the licence has been deemed to be a perpetual agreement. Under normal circumstances, buildings are not permitted on licensed premises. But clauses six, eight and nine of the licence agreement clearly permit construction of buildings and structures on this land. (The buildings are apparently meant for "beautification and recreation purposes," so that the approach road to Sahar airport does not look shabby!)

The Nair family apparently has been given the licence to make profits on this land. The agreement is with Leela (Scottish) Lace Ltd., which is letting Hotel Leelaventure Ltd., use the land. On the books, Leela (Scottish) Lace can earn money from the hotel company on this account. The "beautification and recreation" motives of the Nairs can help them to easily siphon money from the hotel to the textile company. The curious feature is that normally a licence agreement's benefits cannot be transferred. While Leela (Scottish) Lace Ltd., is blatantly violating this stipulation and while Hotel Leelaventure Ltd's prospectus issued in February 1985 provides proof of such transfer, the IAAI has apparently turned a blind eye to these irregularities.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya

Mukesh (Daily)

The site of the construction of Leela-Penta Hotel

The Government's Losses

In the last two years the government has lost Rs two crores, at a conservative estimate, due to the whims of minister Khurshed Alam Khan. And a recurring loss of around a crore of rupees each year has been projected for years to come, till the lease-cum-licence arrangement on prime land in Bombay, entered into with Hotel Leelaventure Ltd. expires on 11 July 2012. The international airports authority of India (IAAI) has allowed Hotel Leelaventure Ltd. to use 38,000 sq metres of IAAI land near the Sahar International airport. 20,000 sq m have been given on licence to Leela (Scotish) Lace Ltd, which has promoted Leelaventure, at an annual licence fee of Rs two lakhs. Two lease agreements have been signed with Hotel Leelaventure Ltd., each for 9,000 sq m of land, at an annual fee of Rs 2.5 lakhs each. Thus, for Rs 6.5 lakhs annually, till 11 July 2012, Leelaventure has been given charge of 38,000 sq m of government land.

The land near Sahar airport is lucrative. The most conservative estimate puts the price of land now at Rs 2,000 per sq metre. Had the IAAI sold the land to Leelaventure, then Rs 7.6 crores could have accrued to the government immediately at 14 per cent rate of returns; had IAAI merely invested the sale proceeds, then annually Rs 1,06,40,000 would have come in as interest. Thus, by entering into the land deal with Leelaventure, the IAAI is notionally losing Rs 99,90,000 or almost a crore of rupees per year.

The lease-cum-licence deal was entered into in 1983. So, for 1983-84 and 1984-85, Rs two crores have been lost. The deal also stipulates that four per cent of the total annual turnover of the hotel and two per cent of the turnover of the flight kitchen shall go to the IAAI as royalty. The hotel is slated for "soft opening" (partial opening while construction continues) in June 1985. For a crore of rupees to accrue to the IAAI on account of these percentages, annual turnover of around Rs 25 crores will have to be envisaged. Unless the hotel generates such turnover, howsoever profitable it be for the private owners, the government certainly is a loser.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya

hotel site. This petition has been received favourably by the IAAI and when this petition is granted, the company would have enough FSI to build 284 rooms even if its application to the state government is not approved by then.

On page 71 the report goes on to say: The company formed to promote the project is Hotel Leelaventure Private Ltd. This company was formed and incorporated on 20th March 1981 after a merger was made with Leela Scottish Lace Private Ltd. The new company has taken over the assets of Leela Scottish Lace Pvt Ltd. including land measuring 10,000 sq yds situated on Andheri-Kurla Road, 900 yds from the new Sahar international airport.

Page 37 of the report says: In fact the subject hotel is the only hotel which has had final plans drawn up with the architect and necessary approvals received from the government which is being opened in the vicinity of the Sahar international airport."

It is therefore clear that the hotel was to be built on land belonging to the company and only some land contiguous to the hotel was requested from IAAI on lease The promoting company, Leela (Scottish) Lace Pvt Ltd which was a seemingly flourishing company engaged in large exports of fabric was mysteriously willing to hand over all its assets, including the land for the construction of the hotel and the plans for the hotel based on this land had already been sanctioned. This was in March 1982. By August 1982, the IAAI by a licence agreement, had handed over 20,000 sq metres of its land to Leela (Scottish) Lace for a paltry consideration of only Rs two lakhs per year.

Not content with the above land on lease-license it appears that Mr Nair even applied to the Bombay Municipal Corporation in the first instance, to build the hotel in the name of IAAI. And the IAAI readily lent its name to such a gross misrepresentation. In reply to the IAAI's application dated 8.9.83 for permission the Municipal Corporation, by its letter Ref No. GE/1194/WS/AK dated 2nd January 1984 rejected the application on the ground that the land in question did not belong to the IAAI. The land referred to bear CTS No 1405, 1404 and 1407. The above survey numbers are those of land belonging to Leela Lace.

On 1 November 1983, by letter bearing No IDV-1080/1149/(181)D. XVII Mrs K.A. P[illegible]dnekar, under secretary in Maharashtra's housing and special assistance department, informed Leela Lace that the company had not obtained Urban Land Ceiling permission for transfer of land to them from one Mr Gandhy and commenced construction of the hotel without taking permission as required under the above Act. By this letter, the above official threatened to launch proceedings against Leela Lace.

It appears that both the above violations were hushed up and, as Mr Vivek Nair would like to put it, the hotel was given "top priority." It is also clear that a company viz Leela (Scottish) Lace, which had already been amalgamated with Hotel Leelaventure continues to function as an independent company. In fact, on 1 April 1984, Mr C.P. Krishnan Nair was crowned as a "chairman for life" and his son Dinesh Nair appointed managing director for 10 years. Under the Company's Act any company seeking to amalgamate with another company has to take the prior permission of its shareholders, creditors and the High Court. Once it is amalgamated it ceases to function as its identity and all its assets are merged with the amalgamated company. As this has both legal and taxation repercussions it would be interesting to know by what sleight of hand Mr Nair has de-amalgamated his company. The reasons are, of course, clear. Being flush with government land he saw no purpose in amalgamating and selling the land and other assets to the hotel company.

How Leela Lace came to own its land is yet another story. In 1980, Leela Lace filed a suit (No 1523 of 1980) against Mr Nair's wife, Mrs Leelaamma. The brief facts leading

A photostat copy of a letter by Vasantdada Patil recommending the Galadharis

[illegible]

13th October, 1981

Dear Yashwantrao Dada Patilji,

I write this to say that Gilad[illegible]brothers, I believe, have again shown interests in building super five Star Hotels at Bombay along with other necessary facilities for conventions etc. I understand that they have met you some time back in this connection and as there is still need for such a hotel in Bombay I would suggest that their request may kindly be considered on priority basis so that Bombay may have the hotel of the type mentioned above. I am further given to understand that they have recently constructed a hotel at Colombo, Sri Lanka, which has been acclaimed as one of the best in this part of the world. I am sure if given facilities in Bombay they would certainly like to construct a hotel still better in our country.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

(Khurshed Alam Khan)

Shri Yashwantrao Bhaurao Patil,
Chief Minister,
Government of Maharashtra,
Bombay

to the suit are: On 1 July 1976 Leela Lace lent a sum of Rs 3,45,000 to Leelaamma at nine per cent interest per annum. She made some small repayments from time to time probably to obligingly ensure that Leela Lace would not be barred, by the law of limitation from claiming repayment. In September 1980, when the suit was filed the amount swelled to Rs 5,55,000. When she borrowed the money in 1976, Leelaamma also obligingly created a lease of the land in favour of the company. When she pleaded 'helplessness' in repaying the above amount she did not want to make life difficult for her husband's company. So, she handed over all the title deeds of the land to the company. In the suit filed by the company, they asked that the land should be sold by the court as repayment of their above debt. Having cleverly created a prior lease in its favour the company had ensured that there would be no other buyers. Leelaamma gave away over 6367 sq. metres of prime land for a total sum of Rs seven lakhs. It must be remembered that 10,000 sq yds of this very same land was valued at Rs 2.75 crores by the Nairs in their project report for the purpose of selling it to the hotel company and for collection of money from non-residents and others. Why was all this resorted to when Mr C.P. Krishnan Nair and his wife, then as well as now, continue to reside together?

In 1976, the Urban Land Ceiling Act came into being. It required prior permission of the government before any transfer of land could take the place. Every transfer of land also involved payment of stamp duty upto 15 per cent of the market value of the land. To avoid both people started filing collusive suits and thereafter arriving at a compromise to get an order from the court. Though this device certainly enabled

"We Are Not Breaking Any Rules"

C.P. Krishnan Nair told SUNDAY

Q. How did you make this jump from fashions to the hotel business?

A: Our Leela Lace factory set up in 1962 has been just a few kms from Sahar and so is our bungalow. The land on which the factory was built (9,000 sq metres) belonged to the Belgian consulate and we bought it over. In 1979-80 when Sahar airport came up literally in our backyard, I used to see the endless queues of taxis and the problems that the tourists had and it struck me that we could put up a hotel and a flight kitchen. The only five-star hotel in the area was the Centaur. We had to convert our land which was for light industrial purposes to completely residential to put up the hotel. All sorts of hurdles for this change of land use were put during Mr Antulay's regime and we finally got it in 1982 during Mr Vasantdada Patil's regime.

Q: It is said that you got preferential treatment by getting the land cheaply—for something like Rs four-and-a-half lakhs annually when it costs Rs six crores.

A: Our land was contiguous to the airport authority land and it had been in dispute since 1962. Leela Lace, promoters of Hotel Leelaventure Ltd., agreed to settle the dispute by taking the land on lease. Hotel Leelaventure did not get anything more than what people like the Oberois and Ambassador Hotels got. Oberois got 22,000 sq. metres of land on lease for 30 years, the Ambassador Hotel and flight kitchen got 4,000 sq. metres on a long lease and 1,500 sq. metres more in 1982. They had encroached on this land but this encroachment was regularised and subsequently given on lease. They got an additional 1,200 sq. metres in occupation. Hotel Leelaventure got 18,000 sq. metres on lease for 30 years and 11,000 sq. metres of marshy land on licence for five years for beautification. It is this latter land which is the envy of everybody but we are levelling the land etc. at our own cost for a garden. The land is certainly not worth Rs six crores. Just recently a plot of land next to ours, some 18,000 sq. metres was sold for Rs 35 lakhs. So you see your figures are not correct.

Q: The lease you have says it is for 28 years, 7 months and 19 days. Why such a curious time frame?

A: The lease is for 30 years. You see the lease was given to Leela Lace for 30 years in July 1982 when it was originally putting up the hotel. Then, since Hotel Leelaventure was formed, this licence was transferred to the hotel company so the lease came into effect on 22.11.83 and will be in force as the document says (shows the document) till 11.7.2012.

IAAI, in addition to the lease rent amounting to Rs 7.25 lakhs per annum will also get two per cent of the gross turnover of the hotel and flight kitchen, which works out to about Rs 14 lakhs in the first year, Rs 16 lakhs in the second year and about Rs 20 lakhs in the third year. As the turnover increases, compensation for IAAI also will increase. Just for your information, the airport authorities have given land at Delhi airport to the following: Oberoi Hotels flight kitchen, Taj Hotels and flight kitchen and Mohan Hotels and flight kitchen. They have each got about 20,000 sq. metres.

Q: Did the induction of persons like Mr P. J. Fernandes, who is close to Mr Khurshed Alam Khan and Dr Venkatraman help you get the facilities like land use change immediately? It is said that you have been allowed to build more floors, and consume more FSI thereby, because of your connections.

A: We got this long before Mr Fernandes was inducted. Praxy (Fernandes) has been a good and dear friend of mine for several years. When he was additional textile commissioner, I was a member of the handloom board and then I also worked with him on the executive committee of the Apparel Export Promotion Council. When Praxy was chairman of the State Trading Corporation, I was then promoting Bleeding Madras fabrics and he asked me to channelise my imports through STC which I did. So when Praxy returned to India last year after his assignment abroad, I invited him to join our board. He is a clean and upright man. Why should we be denied the privilege of putting up a hotel and why should only some people have the monopoly for this? We had a good case. Besides all those earning foreign exchange are given extra FSI. We are not in the airport belt, so we are not breaking any rules. It is also a lie that we swallowed the approach road to the Yellow Fever Hospital.

Interviewed by Olga Tellis

Bhoomi-puja Before Signing of Lease

How much of IAAI land has the Hotel Leela-Penta acquired? According to the prospectus issued by Hotel Leelaventure Ltd. in February 1985 (when a public issue was floated), "The company has acquired land admeasuring 29,000 sqm from IAAI on lease/licence for the purpose of setting up a hotel/ flight kitchen." The bhoomi puja (foundation-stone ceremony) for the hotel was performed on 16 October 1983, three days before the actual lease agreement was signed. The chief minister of Maharashtra, Vasantdada Patil and union minister of state for tourism and civil aviation, Khurshid Alam Khan "graced the occasion" (as per the invitation card issued by Leelaventure). On 19 October, the lease agreement was signed and given retrospective effect from 23 September 1983. This lease was for a period of 28 years nine months and 19 days, slated to terminate on 11 July 2012. The area leased by this agreement was: "Plot of land (marked in sketch attached) containing 9,000 sq m in the district of Bombay, Andheri (East), Andheri-Kurla Road, village Marol, bearing survey No. 141 (part) and cts No. 1405 north of Yellow Fever Hospital, south of Andheri-Kurla Road, east of property belonging to Leela (Scottish) Lace Private Ltd. and West of new approach road to terminal II."

Another lease agreement was signed, also for 9,000 sq m of land, on 22 November 1983. This time, the period was for 28 years seven months and 19 days, terminating, like the previous agreement, on 11 July 2012. Here, though the lease amount remained unchanged at Rs 2.5 lakhs per year, the area covered varied. Other details remaining same, the description became "survey No. 135 (part) and 141 (part) and cts No. 1405 and 1407 and 1411/12 north of Yellow Fever Hospital...."

Thus, in two lease agreements, different plots of land (with some commonality), totalling 18,000 sq m was given. In addition, by a licence agreement, for an annual fee of Rs two lakhs 20,000 sq m land was given to Leela (Scottish) Lace Pvt Ltd. by IAAI on 2 August 1982. This land has gone to the hotel project. Hence, 38,000 sq m and not 29,000 sq m (as given in the prospectus) has been given by IAAI to Hotel Leela-Penta.

The lease period is interesting. Under provisions of the International Airports Authority of India Act, 1971, (section 15) the IAAI is allowed to enter into lease and contracts for upto 30 years. Beyond this period, government approval is required. As the then civil aviation secretary, M.M.Kohli, did not agree with the land loot, he was conveniently bypassed by the minister's office by taking advantage of the 30-year stipulation of the IAAI Act. Normally leases are for 99 years in such land deals. With Hotel Leela-Penta coming up on a lavish scale, is it possible to imagine that on 11 July 2012 the IAAI shall reenter its land? The short-circuit route adopted by the friends of Leelaventure shows how government rules can be made pliable to ministerial whims.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya

avoidance of stamp duty it cannot circumvent the obligation under Section 20 of the Urban Land Ceiling Act to obtain prior permission of the Urban Land Ceiling authorities whenever there is any vacant land involved. And in this case there are over 8,000 sq yds of vacant land out of a total area of 10,000 sq yds

The most pertinent issue that arises is the attitude of the IAAI. The entire land of the IAAI probably running into several thousand acres was acquired around 1950 from private owners for the purpose of 'expansion and development of Bombay airport.' Compensation paid to the owners was so little that many of them did not care to claim it. What is now being sought to be done to those plots? In 1984, the Indian Express had published a report which portrayed a startling picture of two builders of Bombay who had started the construction of 17 multistoreyed buildings on IAAI land at Vakola near Bombay airport. The newspaper reported that despite its attention being repeatedly drawn to this matter, the IAAI did nothing about it. Mr Nair may not be the only lucky recipient of the IAAI's benevolence. It is reported that three other five star hotels have been sanctioned by the IAAI on land taken away from hapless owners for a 'public purpose.'

The "ultimate in mafiaism" charge of Dr Rashmi Mayur may not be able to stop the Leela-Penta Hotel now. It has the attractive collaboration of the international "Penta" chain, promoted by British Airways, Swissair and Lufthansa. The construction is going on rapidly and a five-star hotel not being a shanty, the government's demolition squads cannot reach Leela-Penta. (Interestingly, while demolition of unauthorised structures, especially on government land are dealt with severely, the IAAI is oblivious of the violations by Leela Penta. During the recent Maharashtra Assembly polls, the Congress(I) candidate from South Bombay's Colaba seat, Marzban Patrawala, got a few public lavatories constructed for "jhuggi" dwellers near Cuffe Parade. The Bombay Municipality immediately demolished the "unauthorised structure," which was meant for public good Apparently the norms are different where five-star hotels are concerned.

The Leela Penta episode is not the only one in Khurshed Alam Khan's regime where "mafiaism" was promoted. He wrote a letter to the chief minister of Maharashtra in October 1984 (see xerox copy) in which he espoused the cause of the Galadhari brothers. (The Galadharis of Dubai had been declared proclaimed offenders in India due to gold smuggling some years back.) SUNDAY had sought Khurshed Alam Khan's replies to all the specific issues raised by us in this report as well as on the letter which he wrote favouring the Galadharis. While refusing to answer questions on Leela Penta (because the IAAI, apparently without the minister's knowledge, had allotted the land) the minister wrote to SUNDAY that he did "recall that a usual letter of recommendation was given as in normal course" regarding the Galadharis. In that letter, while recommending the case of a party which had been banned from India due to smuggling activities, Mr Khan had "suggested" to the Maharashtra chief minister that the Galadhari request should be considered on "priority basis." One wonders how many such "usual letters" were written by Khurshed Alam Khan "in normal course" during his days as minister for tourism and civil aviation.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, Bombay

DCM SHRIRAM

Catch your true reflection in these live, vibrant fashions.

Rich textures, subtle shades. In a wide range to complement your every mood. Woven on sophisticated, fully automated machines, stamped with the excellence of intensive R&D and indeed recommended by top fashion designers. An exclusive collection brought to you through India's most enlightened and largest chain of showrooms and retailers.

Suiting. Shirting.
Dress Materials.
Sarees.

DCM SHRIRAM RIVER MILLS

DCM SILK MILLS

Two of India's most sophisticated textile mills.

Available at more than 500 exclusive DCM Retail Stores and other leading textile stores.

Our ma from Nati Insura ce..

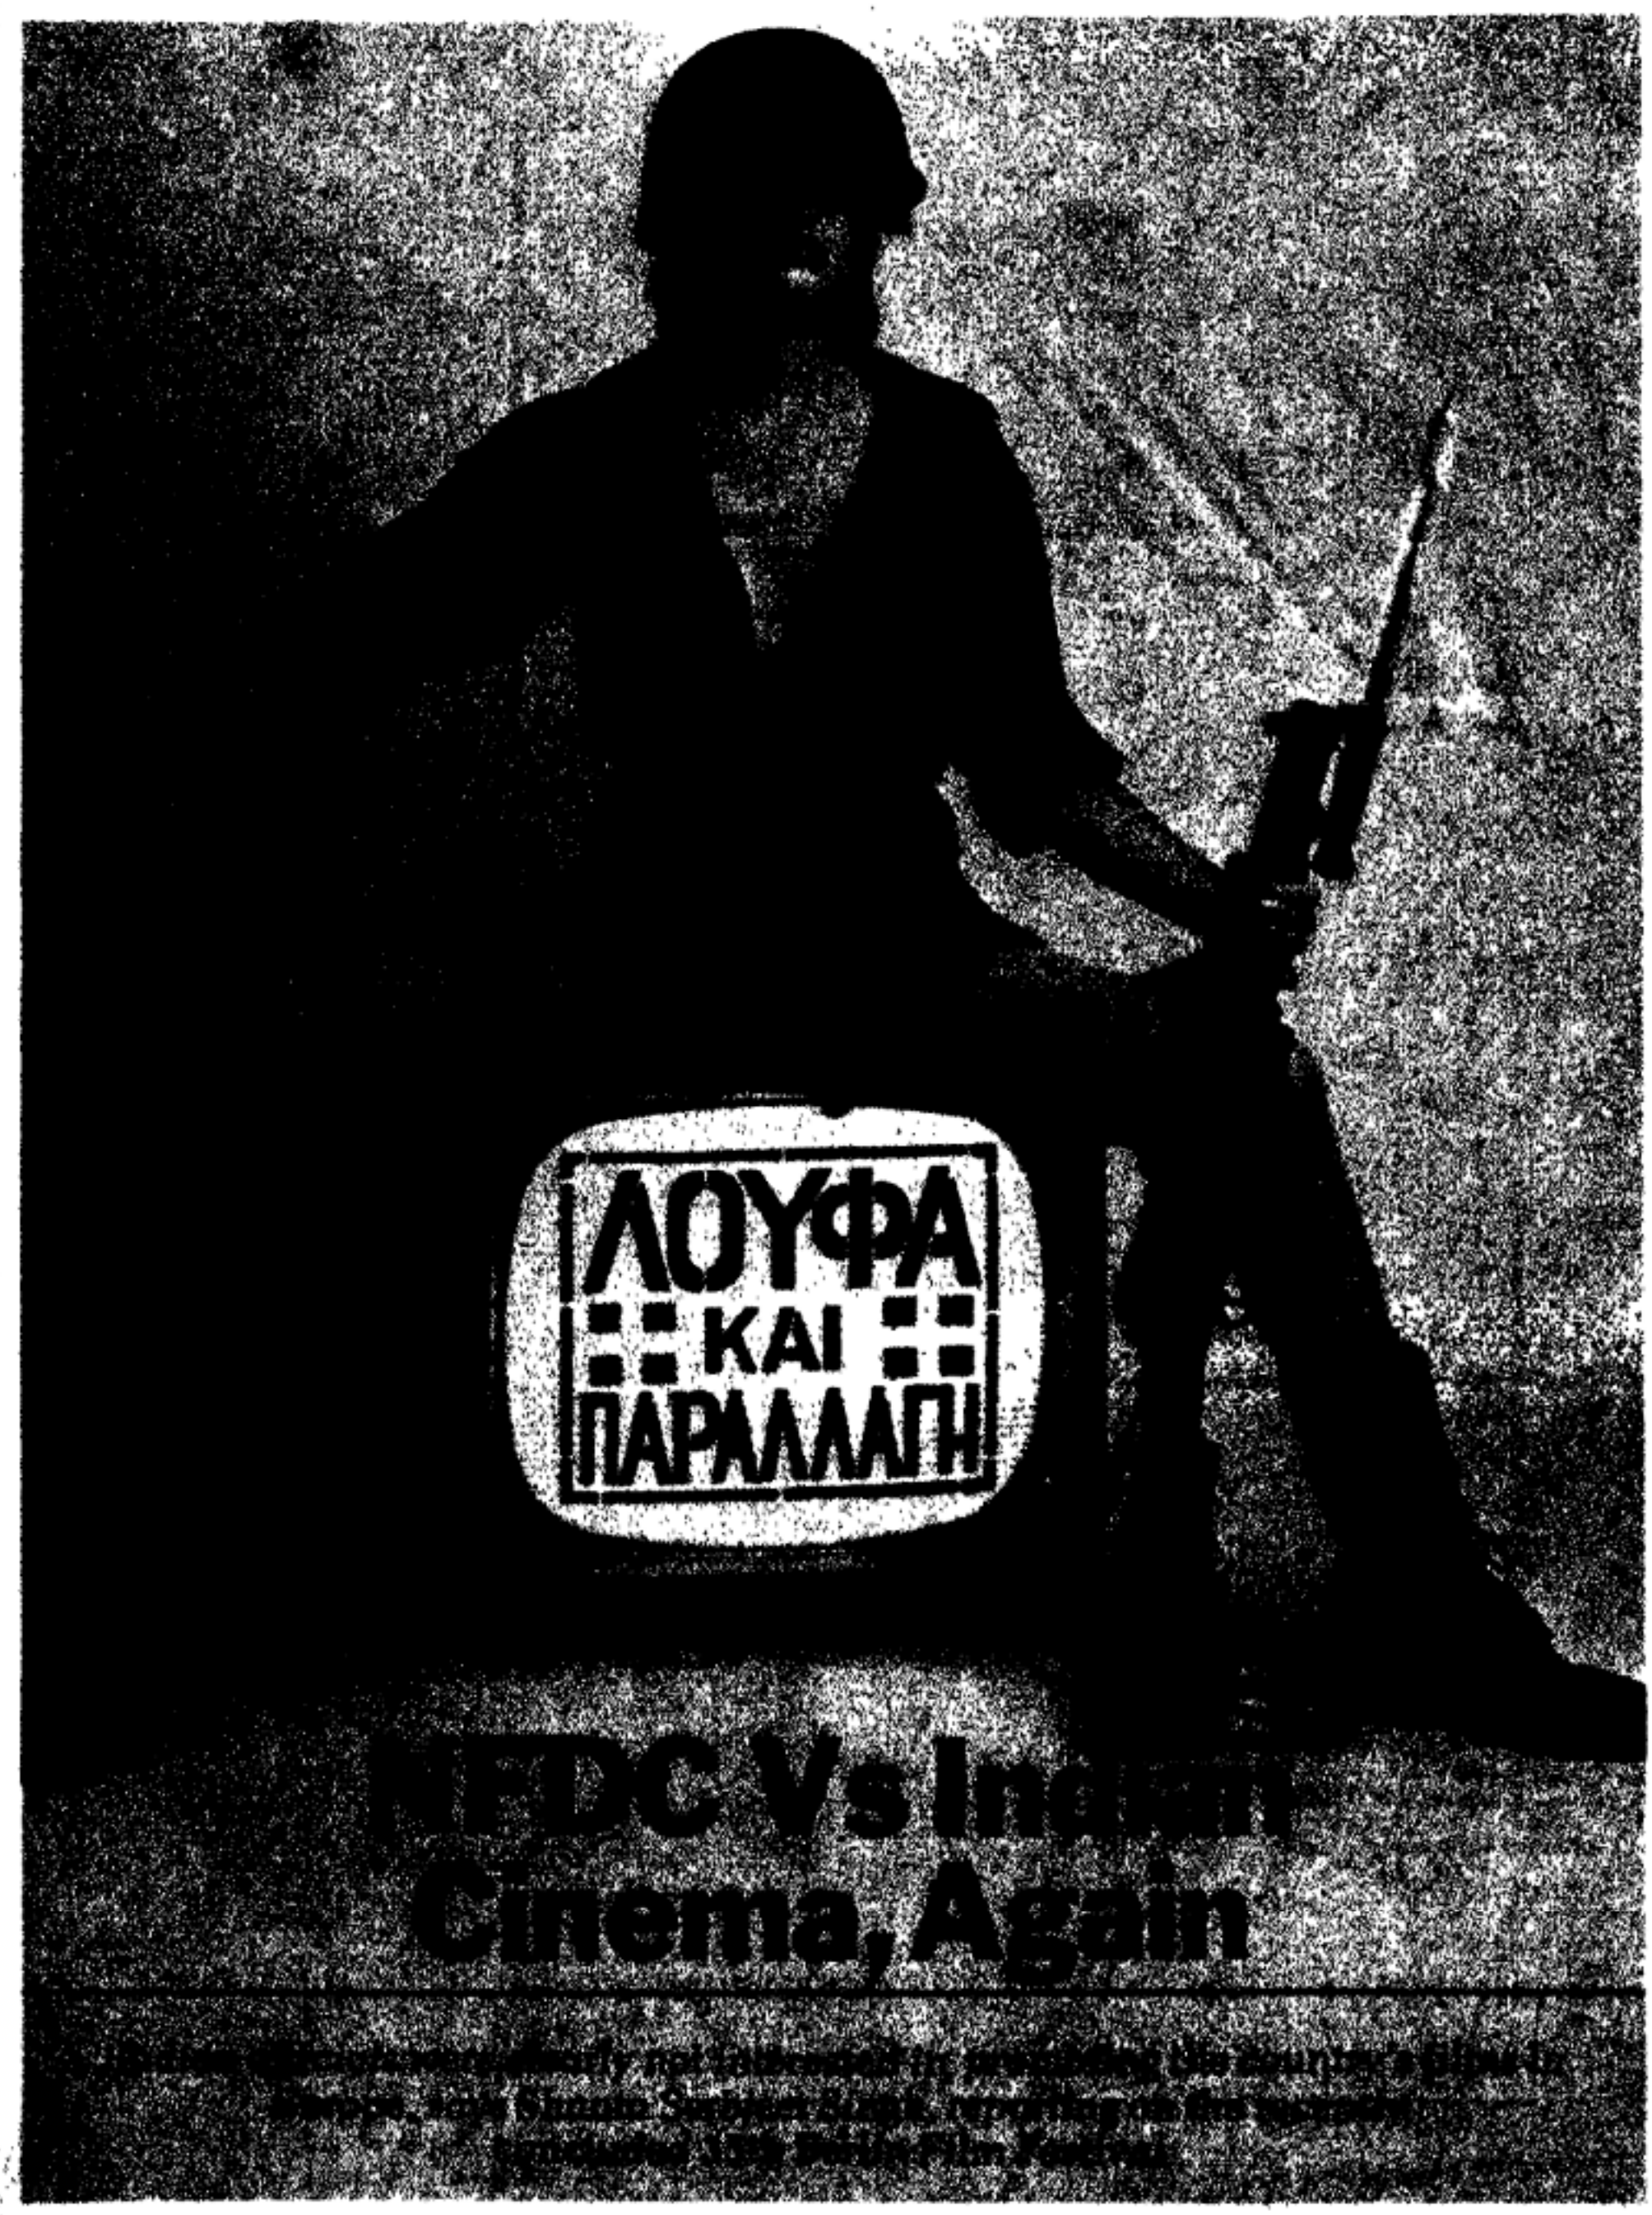
at home in dockyards, covering the risks in shipping.

Warehousing, loading and unloading of tonnes and tonnes of precious cargo. Waterfront pilferage. High sea tornadoes and other perils.

Shipping can be prone to a lot of hazards. Unless you're covered by insurance from every possible angle. The kind of coverage one has come to expect from National Insurance. While National is, essentially, an insurance company, it has field personnel who know shipping hazards like the back of their own hands.

Now, this makes a world of difference when you're looking for insurance that provides comprehensive cover in high-investment, high-risk projects. National does it.

National Insurance. Well connected with India's core industries. Not just shipping, mining and steel, but oil, jute, tea, chemicals – the lot.



National Insurance Company Limited

(A Subsidiary of General Insurance Corporation of India)

Professionals at work for the Nation

CLARION C NIC-3

IFDC Vs Imagi Cinema, Again

Utsarpara
Falkrishna Public Library

Jean Renoir once said that visitors to international film festivals were like pilgrims at holy places, looking for miracles. He was talking chiefly about Cannes and Venice and Berlin, not Moscow or Karlovy Vary where film events are organised much like the Olympic games, each country having the same right to compete, regardless of whether they are good or not.

If one talks to the organisers of the Big Trio, even in the midst of different opinions, there is a contrary but eventually converging agreement on one point: there are just not that many top quality international film productions these days. Without sounding too dismissive, one can forget about the cliche that there are too many film festivals in the world and not enough good films to go around. As Moritz de Hadeln, director of the Berlinale says: "There's an abuse of the term film festival, when film weeks or 'friendly little gatherings' are spoken of in the same breath as the 'A' fests." He adds, "On the other hand, film festivals today are a very important way of promoting cinemas in general. Due to the increase, and not the decline, in the number of film productions worldwide, and provided the film festival has a strong enough backbone financially to move around the world, we'll be able to continue with the product of the new and older producers."

He may well have added, "provided there is a will to have a film festival in the first place." How many people in India, let alone the world of cinema internationally, know that the New Delhi Festival, like Cannes and Berlin, has an 'A' rating? And this non-starter of a festival cannot even complain of lacking a "financial backbone." The chance of filling the vacuum left by the demise of both the Teheran and the Manila International Film Festivals has been sadly lost for ever and the new Tokyo Film Festival being planned for an unveiling this year looks like it is all set to capture the Asian scene.

The initiative, being taken by the Far East generally to dominate the film scene, was pinpointed at this year's Berlinale by the aggressive promotion mounted by the South Koreans. This correspondent happened to be in the press room for still photographs when two German journalists walked in and asked for a photograph each of Holi and Paar.

Photograph Courtesy Sebastian Ghosh

A still from the French film, Le Meilleur De La Vie

◀ A still from the Greek film, Loafing and Camouflage

The former, while withdrawn from the competition section, did get a showing in the special screenings section while Paar was shown in the market. This correspondent heard the girl at the stills counter tell the Germans that she had only been given four stills and they had long since been given away. The journalists had hardly walked out of the room when in walked the chairman of the Korean Film Export Corporation. He wanted to know if the stills that he had supplied of their films had been exhausted and if the girl at the counter required more. He personally checked up the number of photographs left over and said he would soon be back with more. Unlike India, which for the fourth year running has no film in the main competition section, Japan and Korea have a film each in the competition. In addition to Sadao Nakajima's extravagantly shot exotica on a Japanese mountain tribe, paralleled by the Koreans' equally spectacular film Blazing Sun, the Japanese have brought the five-hour documentary on the famous Tokyo Trials, made by Kobayashi. They have matched the screenings with the expected onslaught of posters, publicity and parties and it is clear that the Koreans, in particular, will go back with a very rich interest created in Europe in their cinema.

What of the Indian presence at Berlin? It is the same depressing story told a million times over. Okay, so there was no film in the competition. But there had been enough of a film peg for an enterprising bureaucracy to hang its promotion drive on, provided, as mentioned earlier, there was a will to do so. There was Tarang in the prestigious Forum for Young Cinema, there was Tasveer Apni Apni by Mrinal Sen and Holi by Ketan Mehta in the special screenings section as well as Anand Patwardhan's long (82-minute) "short" on Bombay, Hamara Shehar. There was Bhombal Sardar in the Children's Filmfest, an important adjunct of the main festival and there was an assorted set of cassettes of Paar and Party to name a few which Pam Cullen of the NFDC had brought out from London. The cumulative effect? Zero. And if one must be fussy one could add a minus to that zero, like the temperature itself in Berlin during the film festival, varying between minus nine and ten degrees Celsius There has been the usual contingent of officials from the NFDC head office in Bombay and the directorate. It is indeed so very democratic to send new people from these offices each time. Also it is such a waste of public funds. These worthies require so much time to find their bearings in these alien climes and locales, not to speak of the special flavour and language that festival regulars employ as their main shortcuts to communication that they can do nothing in their one-visit-in-a-lifetime allotted span! More than anything else, it is the totally apathetic attitude of the Indians to their cinema, a mirror, of course, of the entire Indian bureaucracy, led by those at the topmost levels in the ministry of information and broadcasting itself. It mirrors the total absence of the deeper concepts of a film culture as against a quantitative counting of heads. That a country which talks of producing nearly 1,000 full-length and short productions annually should dare to come to a major festival like the Berlinale with a handful of one-sheeters on one or two films, no stills or posters or any other kind of publicity material on films actually entered in the festival, is a shocking indictment, not of an individual here or there but of an entire country's death-wish regarding one of its most important cultural resources. There is something strangely obscene in telling a foreigner in these parts that you actually produce 1,000-odd feature films annually when countries like Greece and New Zealand with less than ten films a year to their credit are more visible. The Greek Film Centre annually brings to Berlin special give-away paper bags which every journalist carries and as for publicity material, the smaller countries of the world are always better represented on the hundreds of tables and stalls in the Cine Centre than India. As far as journalists are concerned, they are literally flooded with material from every nook and cranny of the world film scene. At the time of filing this report, there are two days left for the festival to end and there is not one line on Indian cinema in this correspondent's press box other than the official documentation provided at the outset. On the other hand, one is supposed to be grateful that the NFDC worthy from Bombay has finally seen the merit of having an NFDC stall at all.

A scene from the French film, Le Meilleur De La Vie

What of the Berlin Festival, now in the sixth year of de Hadeln's reign? It continues to be a miracle of an organisation. Its core staff, the people who run the whole show the year around, number just seven. Hired hands are brought in from November onwards and even the press section starts functioning under free-lancer Benzrath from autumn only. All the other people who man the hundreds of counters and sections, from cloakroom services to the expert simultaneous translations in four languages, come in only a month or so before the festival begins. De Hadeln has two full-time secretaries and his two main deputies, Werner Gondolf and Winfried Weiss, between them, take care of the enormous and entire gamut of selections for the different programmes, screenings for the selection committees, keeping a tab worldwide on what is the latest on the film scene and how to get it for Berlin and of course the nitty-gritty of actual handling of prints and publicity material once the programmes have been decided. The Berlinale documentation is error-free. And helping it all is the festival's four-year-old computer system, now increased to 12 terminals using 37 programmes. Lists in hundreds of different categories of names, for instance, are all kept by the computer and the gains in efficiency have to be seen to be believed.

Now for the films for which one braves the blizzards and the film-fest fatigues that come sooner, rather than later, despite the ideal viewing conditions: theatres which are all within a stone's throw of one another and to which you can go to at all hours of the night without any fear of mugging or similar street nuisances elsewhere.

The competition section attracted enough big names to justify its standing as the main section of a competitive festival. The latest Godard film, Je Vous Salue Marie (Hail Mary) is already a big name-dropper in film-fest circles, primarily due to the ire it has attracted of the Catholic church! Godard flew down to Berlin for the screening at the Zoo Palast, the main festival theatre (the theatre as well as a number of other buildings in its neighbourhood are called 'zoo' because of the famous Berlin Tiergarten, the zoo and the aquarium in it right behind the festival's Cine Centre and screening theatres). Understandably, Godard called the agitations mounted by militant Catholics against his film—primarily due to the explicit references to Biblical parallels and a central figure of a girl who is pregnant but virginal—as a "benediction" on the film by the church. At a largely attended press conference, Godard spoke about his 30 years in cinema and the search for the image from which everything else flowed, including religion. Also in the competition was the latest Marguerite Duras film, Les Enfants, a droll, witty commentary on the futility of formal education. The British entry, Wetherby, the first film by the famous playwright David Hare (Map of the World, etc.) stars Vanessa Redgrave and is a valiant champion of the new British cinema. Talking about his film, already a serious contender for critical notice, Hare who was also present in Berlin confirmed his penchant for undermining Britain from within. "I don't see any other film around to which it relates ...The nuance of sexuality and violence—that mix is something the English don't do... Wetherby is about English repression and how bad we are at expressing our feelings, the disastrous consequences of bottling up our feelings and that part-emotional landscape that is England."

The Soviet entry, Descendant of the Snow Leopard is a distinguished work by Tolomush Okeyev, one of the leading exponents of Kirghiz cinema. A beautifully conceived folk epic of a Kirghiz hunter, the film is an empassioned study of the conflict between the old and the new, set very sincerely and spectacularly against the mountain background of the Kirghizian republic of the Soviet Union.

The Hungarian entry, Flowers of Reverie by Laszlo Lugossy is a reflective work on the nature of individual dissent and that strongly old-fashioned word, heroism. Lugossy, who won the Berlinale's Silver Bear in 1976 with his Identification chose to focus his new film on the story of a man guided by ideas because "in our age I can't find heroes living by and for ideas. Nowadays we cannot meet these characters and hence I revive them from the past in order to become their contemporary at least for four-and-a-half-hours."

The Americans, too, are in full strength. Robert Benton, winner of the Academy Award for his film, Kramer Vs Kramer, author of that other, tempestuous chunk of small-town Americana, Bonny and Clyde was there with Places in the Heart, a lovingly recreated homage to his hometown, somewhere in the depths of Texas, through a family drama that leans heavily on his own family history—a great grandmother (played by Sally Fields) whose husband, the town's sheriff, was killed leaving her with two small children to raise and a constant struggle with the bank to prevent foreclosure of her land. The film, nominated for seven Oscars this year, has its real strength in the autumnal light and the reflective naturalism created so memorably by cinematographer Nestor Almendros.

My own favourite for at least some top awards is the other American entry, Mrs Soffel by Australian woman director, Gillian Armstrong. Some years ago, when Ms Armstrong,

Photograph Courtesy Swapan Ghosh

A still from the German film, Flugel Und Fessein

then only 27, made her debut at Cannes with her first feature film, My Brilliant Career, she won instant recognition and went on to win awards, critical acclaim and box-office success internationally. Later, the Melbourne-born former art student made a lightweight but fun movie on rock musicals before the inevitable lure to Hollywood to make Mrs Soffel for MGM with a suitably starry cast, headed by Diane Keaton as the real-life 1901 Kate Soffel, wife of a Pittsburgh prison warder who becomes passionately involved with one of the young inmates of Murderers' Row placed in her ministerial care. The character is played by Mel Gibson, Australia's answer to Brando and Travolta rolled into one. He and his bandit brother, aided by Kate, make a bid for escape, an attempt that ends in tragedy for the trio. The film is distinguished by an arresting design that captures, in every detail, the bleak, grey mood of the period. The Soffel household, next to the prison, the original jail which provides a flamboyant but still used locale, seems like an extension of the prison itself, so real is the atmosphere of clerical rigidity and austere puritanism that provides the answer to Kate Soffel's bid for escape in the company of two convicted murderers. Clearly Gillian Armstrong's attention to detail stems as much from her work in the field of documentaries as from a certain feminine sensibility.

Beside the competition films, there are nearly 600 films in the various sections. They include typical Berlinale products of research and reconstruction. One such is a reconstructed version of the famous 1929 film commissioned by Gloria Swanson, Queen Kelly but left incomplete due to differences with the director, German-born Erich von Stroheim. Another is a restored rarity, a tinted copy of the 1919 world-famous classic, Cabinet of Dr Caligari. A pioneering effort has been the mammoth retrospective on films that have used special effects down the ages—literally. They go back to films made by George Melies (1896-1912) shown with piano accompaniment to experimental films like Dziga Vertov's The Man With a Camera (Soviet Union, 1926-29) and the French film, End of the World (1929-30) by Abel Gance. In between come all the Sindbad and the Sailor films, the King Kong series, Exorcist, Wizard of Oz, Star Wars and 20,000 Leagues Under the Sea genre. I was lucky to catch David Lean's Blythe Spirit made in the Forties with Rex Harrison and Margaret Rutherford. One can see, quite distinctly, the maestro's love-hate relationship with women and the special effects are charmingly used to bring back and dismiss wives and mistresses. The Special Effects Retro had tried to get at least one Indian film for this section. After many attempts to track down Sita Svayamvara through the aegis of the NFDC, all in vain, the organisers told me they had to let the idea go up in—what else—holy smoke!

"It's a Frightening Job to Be a Director"

David Lean tells Kanta Talukdar

David Lean is among the few British directors to have spectacular success in a world dominated by Americans. He has made films which have become household names today. They include Lawrence of Arabia, Dr Zhivago, Oliver Twist, Bridge over the River Kwai and Ryan's Daughter. His films have won 26 Oscars. In a daring comeback, after a self-imposed exile of 14 years, he has directed E.M. Forster's classic, A Passage to India *which tells the story of two Englishwomen on a trip to India in the 1920s. Their visit is to prove catastrophic. They meet a young Indian doctor, Aziz, who invites them—Adela and Mrs Moore—which goes all wrong. Aziz ends up being tried, accused of attempted rape.

The film has received rave reviews in North America and Europe. Time magazine has called it "superb" and made it the subject of the year-ending cover story. A special honour indeed. Forster's book is staging a spectacular revival in the United States: it has already sold over a million copies. The film itself is tipped to win quite a few of the 11 Oscars—it has been nominated for—on 25 March which, incidentally, is Sir David's 76th birthday. The director, who is notoriously shy of publicity, agreed to talk to Kanta Talukdar in his plush London hotel suite about the film and his experiences. Excerpts.

Q: Gossip has it that when Lord Brabourne (the producer) rang you up, to ask if you would direct A Passage to India, the first thing you said as you picked up the phone was, 'What happened in the caves?' Was it a welcome invitation to make a comeback after 14 years of silence?

A: John Brabourne, whom I had only met once, rang up and had left a message. So I said to David Puttnam, who is a friend of mine and who was sitting where you are now, 'I wonder what he could want?' David said, well I can only say one thing, he has just bought the rights to A Passage to India and so, when Brabourne did ring up and say 'I want to talk to you about something.' I said, 'Oh, what happened in the caves?' and that really surprised him. He came and sat here, where you are now and said, 'Will you do it?' I said, 'Yes.' And he said, 'Do you mean it?' And I said, 'Yes.'

To hell with the comeback. I only do films if I really want to do them and you know I had seen Passage on stage here 25 years ago. I remember I tried to get the rights but Forster wouldn't sell them. I asked through a friend of mine, Baroness Buttberg, who worked in London Films. I asked if she knew Forster and she said 'Of course I do.' She went up to King's College, Cambridge, but Forster simply wouldn't sell the rights because he didn't trust movie people and didn't want anyone to come down on either side of the English or the Indians and he said he wanted a balance.

David Lean

But, in fact, I don't think that the book is a balance really. I think he comes down hard on the side of the Indians. The English are a lot of idiots. So I gave up. Then Forster died and obviously Lord Brabourne got the rights from the executors or whatever you call them at King's. Well, I think Forster was unfair in that he depicted the English as a lot of idiots. Now, whether you agree with colonialism or not now, which you probably don't—nobody does now—it has gone out of fashion, I think the English were not idiots. I think the men at any rate did a damn good job, you know the railways, the post offices, the administration, all sorts of things, the telegraphs. I think they did a good job, they weren't fools and I think Forster was wrong to make them out to be fools and I was damned if I was going to do that and so I shifted a lot of the dialogue onto the women because I think the women can be abominable. You can still find them—Forster's women there right now. I think Forster's characters—the English characters are caricatures and I didn't want to make them caricatures—not because I am sticking up for the English. For example, Turton, in the film, is not a very likeable character but he is not a fool. That is more or less true.

Q: You have won fulsome praise for the screenplay for the film: the first you have taken full credit for. What is the importance of a good script?

A: It is a frightening job to be a director in a way. You have hundreds of people around you, lot of highly-paid technicians, the money people practically looking at their watches all the time. Are you going to combine schedule, etc, etc, there are tremendous pressures and my script, then, is something I can lean back on.

Q: You have discovered or helped almost unknown stars to great fame—Peter O'Toole, Omar Sharif and Alec Guinness—but your hero in Passage, *Victor Banerjee, has not been nominated for the Oscar. Are you disappointed? How would you explain it?

A: Yes, I expected him to be nominated for an Oscar. Well, it is a curious thing: Oscars. I remember Peter O'Toole. Katherine Hepburn's a great friend of mine. She said to me at the time, 'David, you better steel yourself to it, he is not going to win an Oscar,' and I said 'Why?' And she said, 'They'll give it to young women.

I won it for Morning Glory.' I think she was in her early 20s or teens. 'They'll give it to girls but with men they say let's wait a bit. They've got to win their spurs. And if he is good in the next picture, he'll get it.' And she is quite right I think Victor suffered from that. It's 'Well, we haven't seen him before. It's a good part. We'll wait till next time.' I' admire Victor as an actor, I think he is a first-rate movie actor and I really wish him the best of luck. I wish I could have a film in which there is a part for him again. I hope there is, one day.

Q: A lot has been said about the tense atmosphere and the disagreement between you and Victor Banerjee. What was it about?*

A: When you work in the film like Victor, it is the first big film outside India he has ever done and he thought—and I am sort of half-guessing at this—but he thought I was making an anti-Indian film and I wanted him to play the early part of the film with an Indian accent

He doesn't do this. I said to them all, all of you are talking like Oxford undergraduates and it is just not true that all Indians in India talk like that. Victor's accent is not a sing-song, and you see some of the lines were written for it, such as "and is it the entire of your family now" (recites in a sing-song). Now, if you say the same thing with a clipped accent, you think what he is saying, what is the point of this. It goes (the Indian accent) so beautifully with the lines. Now, the whole point of Victor's part is, as he starts the film—I said to the casting people when they said what kind of person do you want, I said, 'Count ten after I tell you: Charlie Chaplin, Indian.' They said, 'What do you mean?' And I said, 'Well, he is buffetted by fortune and always bounces up, as Charlie did. You laugh with him, you laugh at him and you cry with him.' And he is a bit of a goat, a bit of a buffoon, at the beginning. He thinks that the English are just wonderful. And when they get thrown off the bicycle and the other chap says, 'that's Turton,' he says "Tu-r-r-ton, Tu-r-r-ton" as if he is the king. I thought the accent would help him because as the film goes on he gradually goes through the fire and in the end he says, "I am an Indian at last." It is a great change and if you don't start from down there you can't go up there. I was trying to help him and I think he is a fool to keep on moaning about it.

Q: You saw a number of Indian films in your search for Aziz. What do you think of Indian actors?

A: Well, you see I just love the part of Aziz. I think Aziz is one of the best parts of the film and I think Victor did frightfully well with it and as I say I am awfully disappointed that he hasn't been nominated for an Academy Award. But he got the Board of Review Award and I believe made a very nice speech in New York for it.

I think Indian actors have one big difficulty in coming to work for Western films. If you go to the Indian cinema, and I have seen quite a few Indian films, to the West they are all over-acted. I am not talking about Satyajit Ray, but there is a tradition of over-acting. It is rather like the old days here on stage—people threw their arms around and rolled their eyes, and I think I helped Victor, as it were, to be simple. Keep still. If you watch the big stars they don't move much. They don't roll their eyes. they don't wave their hands about, they look at the person they are playing with, and above all they think. Victor caught on very quickly, after the first few weeks, and in the end I think his performances are absolutely terrific.

Q: One of your hallmarks is filming in exotic locations—Dr Zhivago in Spain and Finland,, Bridge on the River Kwai in Ceylon, Lawrence of Arabia in the deserts. How do you make sure you capture the spirit of the place authentically?

A: I travel around, I do my homework as you do when you write an article. You can't do anything unless you have done your homework. And I like strange places. I enjoy doing it, and nearly always drive. For example, I have been to India five-six times for longish stretches, and I have driven around extensively. I used to have an Indian wife. My wife (the present one, Sandra Hotz) grew up in India, where her parents used to run hotels, and speaks Hindi.

Q: Were there any problems associated with making the film in India?

A: There weren't any problems in making the film in India. There was terrific suspicion at first—what are you going to say about India, is it anti-Indian? No it isn't. If it is anything, it is anti-English.

We had to bring in quite a lot of equipment: lights, you have no silent generators, and we had to fly them in, believe it or not. Our lives were much easier by a wonderful customs lady who understood. We kept having to get in things or send out things associated with the film. I am sure her confidence wasn't abused even a bit. So different from the treatment we got at the other Indian customs. I like India but not its customs. They need to use a bit more discretion.

I love the gardens in India. They are so sweet. This time, driving up from Bangalore to Kashmir, the mangoes were in flower. Wonderful, I just love it. I was taking photographs and an Indian asked me through my wife why I was taking pictures of something so common. When I told him there were no mango trees in England, he simply wouldn't believe us. We had a wonderful time. Awfully sorry to leave.

Lean Expectations

Andrew Robinson, film critic of Sight and Sound, reviews A Passage to India

I first read that David Lean had got the rights to film A Passage to India in an interview in The Times in 1981. Despite his insensitive remarks there, including "no one has really captured India on the screen with the possible exception of Renoir's The River," I was curious, willing to believe that a part of the maker of Brief Encounter, coupled with his years spent in India, might rub off on a film of Forster's finest novel.

Everything I heard from those involved or read subsequently diminished my expectations; it became clear, mainly from Lean's own pronouncements, that not only did he feel unable to risk showing the spirit of this elusive novel on film, he was also temperamentally incapable of responding to it. During shooting in India, he told an interviewer that "in movies you don't have loose ends." Why, oh why, did he choose this novel then? As Peter Burra wrote in an essay that now forms the foreword to the Penguin edition of Passage, it is "one of the most aesthetically compact books ever written, whose thought, like music's, cannot be fixed, nor its meaning defined." Lean has efficiently stripped the novel of its affection for its central relationship, its irony and its subtle mystery, distorted its delicate visual beauty towards the tawdry-spectacular, and fixed its meaning very firmly in the realm of the banal; his ear for its music can be gauged from the abysmally unsuitable Palm Court sound of Maurice Jarre's score. The depressing truth is that Forster's original and Lean's pale echo, with its surface depth, resemble each other no more than The Far Pavilions (which was also funded by Home Box Office) resembled The Jewel in the Crown.

Does all this matter very much? Or should one simply dismiss the film as a late arrival in a long line of films peddling Hollywoodish eastern exoticism? I think it does matter, for at least two simple reasons. Firstly, so much ballyhoo (including, no doubt, Oscars to come) is being generated by so many supposedly responsible critics, though by no means all, that film criticism is in serious danger of becoming a bad farce to be ignored. Secondly, the building up of an authentic picture of one of the world's oldest civilisations has been retarded, just when real progress was being made. This would not matter if many other channels of awakening interest in India existed, but they do not; several million people will believe Lean's nonsense. We may be sure they will not read the novel.

In the USA, where the film was released in New York to packed houses in December, Time went so far over the top that it disappeared into cloud critic land: "..sober, witty, yet eminently approachable... Above all, it is true to our sense of the world as it echoes in the common consciousness of our times." What leaves one gasping, though, is the common implication that Forster would have liked the film. The New York Times review, published in The Times, thought that "Forster might be equally pleased with most of David Lean's respectful, handsome screen version." Respectful, note, when Lean has changed the entire last third of the novel into something completely irrelevant to Forster's conception, just for starters. And the South Bank Show weighs in with a long, effusive tribute. Alec Guinness, at least, has doubts on this point. "I don't know whether Forster will be rejoicing or revolving in his grave." Another prominent member of the cast told me: "Forster would have gone up in smoke!"

There cannot be the least shadow of a doubt that Forster would have loathed the movie. His whole life, with its close association with India of over 50 years, was a rebellion against Lean's "them and us" attitude to the meeting of East and West. Passage stands out from fiction about the raj as the only novel written by an Englishman with personal experience of that time, including those by Paul Scott, to show some real understanding of the totality of Indian culture—which is why it continues to seem contemporary. As G.K. Das says, in E.M. Forster's India: "The novel's outlook is on the future. It presents India not as a sad concluding spectacle in British imperial history, but as a subject of vital and permanent interest."

A number of efforts were made to persuade Forster to part with film rights, both to Passage and other novels, he refused them all. At one point he was offered $ 25,000 for Room with a View. He wrote to a friend: "Nothing would have survived of the original except my name, and if I had tried to control the production I should have broken my heart at Hollywood, besides spending my life there." Ironically, a few lines later, he shows his interest in films by commenting that people are showing "huge excitement over Great Expectations."

There cannot be the least shadow of a doubt that Forster would have loathed the movie. His whole life ... was a rebellion against Lean's "them and us" attitude to the meeting of East and West.

In 1967, Santha Rama Rau, who adapted Passage for the stage in 1960 with Forster's complete blessing, wrote to him asking for permission to write a script for Hollywood, with the support of Satyajit Ray. "Always, before, when you didn't wish to consider the idea of such a film, I understood and agreed with your refusal to 'sell' a work of art to 'barbarians'..." and she also pointed out that a film could treat the last section of the novel properly, which had been impossible on the stage. Forster replied: "I didn't and I don't want Passage filmed. I am so sorry."

Rama Rau was in fact the original scriptwriter of Lean's film. Under the terms of the Forster estate she had to give her permission for an adaptation. It is known that she is very dissatisfied with the film, whose script is, of course, by Lean himself, but she is unable to speak publicly due to a clause in her contract with the producers.

Satyajit Ray's own interest in Passage, one of the great missed opportunities in cinema, culminated in meeting Forster in Cambridge in 1967, when he was 88. Ray knew of Forster's legendary refusals, but a friend thought there was a chance. They met in his rooms, had lunch and took a walk around Cambridge. Forster's old friend tried to help Ray by impressing Forster with Ray's distinction as a director in case he hadn't seen any of his films, which it seems he hadn't. But it was useless, despite Forster's affection for Indians. He kept shaking his head, Ray recalls with wry amusement. "That was the drone—no!—in words, gestures, looks, everything. He was adamant. And I felt there was no point asking him why." He was also very frail, having had one heart attack already.

When the trustees eventually wrote to Ray in about 1980, ten years after Forster's death, he had lost interest. He was "a little bothered about the logistics"—foreign actors, big budgets and coproduction money and so on—having recently survived the experience of Shatranj Ke Khilari (The Chess Players). He was also bothered by the ethics. "That was the main consideration really. The moment I found out he was not interested I said I'd better not pursue this any more. I felt it would be wrong. I remembered how the old man had reacted."

Ray hasn't seen Lean's film yet, though he suggested Victor Banerjee to the producers to play Dr Aziz at their request. He has read the reviews though and comments mildly: "It is obviously an advantage there not to know India very well. I hadn't thought of Passage as a spectacular film at all. I thought of it as an intimate film. The relationships are so delicate that to give it a big background would just be distracting."

The odd thing about this expensive fiasco is that there are occasional glimpses of a film that might have been. When Mrs Moore is seen alone, dying by moonlight aboard the P and O liner going home—an event not spelt out at all in the novel—the real Mrs Moore emerges with disquieting mystery. Why does Lean with the next shot, choose to smash the atmosphere by showing her body ceremoniously tipped over the side into the Indian Ocean the following morning? Unfortunately for us, and for Forster, Lean is obsessed with tying up those loose ends.

OSCAR AWARDS

Pick of the Films

A look at the films in the running for the awards

It was once fashionable to display contempt for the Academy Awards. Ben Hecht, winner of the first screenwriting award, boasted that he used his Oscar statuette as a doorstop. George C. Scott gave his trophy away. Woody Allen didn't even bother to show up for the ceremonies one year, and Marlon Brando once sent an American Indian in his stead. But now that the Academy Awards are back in vogue, the world is awaiting the black-tie gala on 25 March this year at the Los Angeles Music Center, with undisguised anticipation.

At the top of the list, of course, are A Passage to India and Amadeus. These two spectacular films have got 11 nominations each, and they will be competing closely for the best picture award. Indeed, the three other nominees, The Killing Fields, Places in the Heart, and A Soldier's Story pale in comparison though they certainly outdo the regular Hollywood fare.

The Killing Fields tells the true story of a prize-winning New York Times correspondent Sydney Schanberg and his friend and assistant Dith Pran who can't get out of Cambodia when the Khmer Rouge start butchering millions of people. A good story and a sincere effort, the film still suffers from a disjointedness between the contrived sequences of Sydney's efforts back in the United States to locate Dith and the truly gripping chronicle of Dith's survival in Cambodia and his eventual escape.

Places in the Heart is another sincere story, based on the reminiscences of director Robert Benton (who also directed Kramer vs Kramer). It deals with the conflict between Christian beliefs and human limitations. The central thread follows the plight and heriocs of a young widowed woman, who through grit and determination manages to get her cotton crop to the gin before the authorities repossess her farm. But the film has too many cliches to merit the top prize. Similarly, A Soldier's Story falls short. The film is adapted from the play about a black army captain who is sent to a base in the racist southern state of Louisiana in 1944 to investigate the murder of a black sergeant.

A Passage to India and Amadeus, then, are the two contenders for best picture. Critics have invariably marvelled at David Lean's inimitable grace in juxtaposing the large-scale landscape and the intensely intimate. But critics have disliked his stereotyped characters, the occasional slapstick interludes, and the final half-hour of the film, which seems to flounder. Some critics have complained about the contrived climax in Amadeus, but others feel it is a film that improves on the original play by Peter Shaffer, a film that is Czech director Milos Forman's best.

The choice is clearer for the best actor award, which should certainly go to F Murray Abraham. Well-known in theatre, but a newcomer to films, Mr Abraham plays Salieri in Amadeus, the second-rate composer and Viennese court Kapellmeister who, in his senile old age, imagines he has poisoned Mozart. Tom Hulce, who plays the arrogant, vulgar, spoiled young Mozart, was also nominated for the award, but his performance has been criticised for being too shrill, too unmodulated and Sam Waterson, nominated for his portrayal of Sydney Schanberg in The Killing Fields, has been criticised for being stiff and expressionless. By contrast, Abraham is full of expression. With the smallest movement of his facial muscles he has betrayed utter joy at hearing in his mind strains of Mozart's music.

American director Milos Forman

The best supporting actor award has a number of top contenders. Adolph Caesar in A Soldier's Story gives a solid performance as the barking drillmaster of a sergeant who is murdered by his own men. The role is an emotional and a difficult one, bearing on the theme that in a racist society, self-hatred is an inevitable part of the black experience. Haing S. Ngor, a physician, not an actor, is altogether natural in his part as Dith Pran in The Killing Fields, perhaps because Ngor himself lived through the excesses of the Khmer Rouge. John Malkovich, nominated for his role as the blind man, Mr Will, in Places in the Heart, has won near-unanimous praise from critics.

In the best actress category, Judy Davis as Miss Quested in A Passage to India, faces stiff competition from Vanessa Redgrave. (Of the other nominees, Sally Fields, critics say, can't handle more than one emotion at a time in Places in the Heart, and Sissy Spacek, a good actress, is not at her best in The River.) In The Bostonians, Ms Redgrave plays the repressed lesbian Olive Chancellor who grooms the flirtatious Verena to be a spokesperson for the suffragettes. Most critics have called Ms Redgrave the only reason to see what is otherwise an insignificant film. Jessica Lange, who made her debut 8 years ago in King Kong, has won respect for her part in Country as the strong woman who holds her family and farm together despite marital and financial troubles.

But more than one critic has called Judy Davis' "perfect" or "near perfect" as Adela Quested, leading to speculation that she could claim the trophy for the best actress. As one critic wrote, "an attractive woman, she is actress enough to convey an unattractive woman who becomes attractive through our experience of her."

A Passage to India is also expected to pick up the best supporting actress award for Peggy Ashcroft's portrayal of Mrs. Moore. No other nominee in the category has won the kind of acclaim Ms Ashcroft has won. One critic wrote, "The highest tribute I can pay: her death in the film is not acting, it is a loss."

Sharon Butler, Washington D.C.

Gavaskar and some of his teammates with the Benson and Hedges World Championship trophy

Invincible Indians

Team spirit and motivation led to the success

In December 1984, while enthusiasts revelled at India's thumping victory over England in the first Test at Bombay, a dark and ominous cloud had formed over Indian cricket. A few weeks later, the cloud burst during the second Test in Delhi. And by the fourth Test in Madras, after a brief respite during the third Test in Calcutta, it had turned into a thunderstorm. This rather inclement atmosphere swept away whatever chance the Indians had of defeating the Englishmen. And indeed, the home side succumbed to one of the weakest teams ever to leave London, losing not merely the Test matches two-one, but going down in inglorious fashion—four-one—in the one-day internationals. But akin to the Norwesters that afflict us this time of the year, after the havoc, there is bliss. The same, it would appear, applied to Indian cricket, and with a magnificent display of professionalism and skill Sunil Gavaskar and his team lifted the Benson and Hedges World Championship of Cricket trophy.

When the tournament commenced, other than Sri Lanka, the longest odds were being offered on India—a 200-1 bet with the United Kingdom bookmakers. Only the most patriotic would have taken it, or those attracted by the price. For any knowledgeable follower of the game, it was money down the drain. There was still the hangover of the Kapil Dev affair and other internecine problems when the 14-member Indian squad took off from Bombay. There was also a big question mark around the team's bowling and fielding. Against England, Kapil Dev seemed to be on the decline, Chetan Sharma and Manoj Prabhakar were disappointing while Sivaramakrishnan, as the Englishmen grew in confidence, became less effective. And the outcricket, which was poor to start with, became worse.

The national selectors, however, took the important step of recalling Roger Binny and Madan Lal, and they kept their faith in Siva, thus dismissing the theory that a wrist spinner is a luxury in limited overs cricket. But all these decisions were reached not with any great degree of conviction. There was no option of arriving at a compromise between youth and experience. Binny and Madan Lal, who were overlooked for all the Tests against England, had done nothing spectacular during their spell in the wilderness. Indeed, why else would Sharma and Prabhakar be also included in the party if Chandu Borde and company had such exceptional faith in them?

"We really worked hard from the moment we landed in Australia," Gavaskar told this correspondent soon after his team's triumph in the final. He emphasised that the Indians had laid particular stress on fielding and the rest sort of followed suit. But how could a side so badly humiliated only a few weeks earlier be suddenly galvanised into world beaters? There is no answer, no authentic explanation for this.

Admittedly, India did not play to their full potential versus England at home and selection mistakes were also to blame, not to mention the lifeless pitches which did not suit India's modest attack. And of course, team spirit was a factor. But even if one accepts that the situation was different in every respect Down Under, there is no logical explanation for the Indians bowling out their opponents, except the Pakistanis in the final (who were only a wicket away from suffering the same fate), and winning with such comfort.

The fact, however, is that Kapil Dev demonstrated a welcome return to form, Binny and Madan Lal were among the wickets exactly the way they were in the World Cup in 1983, Ravi Shastri was extremely economical and Siva was the sorcerer he was destined to be. Even Sharma, in the final, who had bowled so unimpressively at home, striving for pace at the cost of line, length and lateral movement, put in a decent performance. The wickets at Melbourne and Sydney were, of course, of ideal bounce, and also turned to India's benefit.

All the captains: (front row from left to right) Allan Border and Geoff Howarth; (second row) Clive Lloyd, Sunil Gavaskar and Dilip Mendis; (third row) Javed Miandad and David Gower

Besides, the Indians were led brilliantly in what must go down as Gavaskar's finest hour as captain. The inspiration he had shown in his initial days as Bombay and West Zone captain, but was rarely seen when he captained India, gushed forth at every step. And added to his one-and-a-half decades of experience at the highest level of the game, it turned out to be a devastating combination. He never missed a trick, improvised wonderfully as in his use of Siva—can you imagine a leg spinner bowling the last over of an overlimit innings!

Moreover, he, at the age of 35, set an excellent example to his fieldsmen. He ran like a hare, fielded on the run and threw accurately. It was Gavaskar re-born, rejuvenated and a source of inspiration for his side. In fact, the fielders undertook their task so aggressively, they added a whole new dimension to aggressive cricket. The fielders, especially wicket-keeper Sadanand Viswanath (who should restrain his appealing), Krishnamachari Srikkanth, Azharuddin, Kapil Dev, Binny, Madan Lal, Siva and Sharma fielded brilliantly. But of course, talent always counts. And in this respect, Shastri, Srikkanth and Kapil Dev somewhat outshone the others. No doubt, Dilip Vengsarkar, always classically correct, Binny and Madan Lal, with their medium paced stuff, Viswanath and Siva also stood out. But India's heroes were Shastri, Srikkanth and Kapil Dev.

Apart from his bowling, Kapil Dev's demolition of the redoubtable Richard Hadlee in the semi-final at a crucial moment was one of the memorable moments of the tourney. The flying start that Srikkanth provided with three half-centuries in five outings was also remarkable. But more than these, it was probably the sheer reliability of Shastri that released all the tension from an Indian standpoint, so much so that some of the later order Indian batsmen changed to their evening clothes and enjoyed the proceedings,quite certain that they would not be called in to wield the willow.

Jubilant Indian players atop the car which Ravi Shastri won

It might be argued by some that Shastri, at times, was a bit slow in getting his runs. This is not really correct, for this Bombay all-rounder was never called upon to rush matters, such was the commanding position maintained in all matches. It was an extraordinary performance and reminded one of the kind of superiority displayed by the West Indians in the past, more dominant than the showing in the last World Cup and a unique lesson in one-day cricket. In cricketing terms, India's exhibition is beyond analysis. But it is also an eye-opener on how much can be attained by motivation, the miracle that India can conjure if they have the will to do so. And let no one suggest that the other participants were tired or out of form. They feel like nine pins, and were only as good as they were allowed to be.

One can only hope that in future this Indian incisiveness will be more durable, though one suspects that the same cricketers will struggle to regain their form in Test matches, unless the selectors can unearth at least two truly more penetrative bowlers to back up Kapil Dev and Siva. But the batting can stand up to the stiffest Test on paper; it is today the best batting line-up in the world. Let us lift our goblets, therefore, to a recurring resurrection of Indian cricket.

Ashis Ray

JAYANTA GROUP OF INDUSTRIES
NOW BRING YOU INTERNATIONAL TECHNOLOGY..
WORLD-CLASS PRODUCTS

Orient Globe
jayanta
BULB & TUBE

JAYANTA GROUP OF INDUSTRIES
Main Office : 32, Ezra Street, Room No 22 & 23 Calcutta-700 001

Progressive JG-4 85

THE BUDGET

Taking Things Into Account

Finance Minister V.P. Singh takes a bold step

The big document came, as it always does, in a small leather casing, but with a different, perhaps more sober, custodian—Vishwanath Pratap Singh—who preferred a black briefcase to the cherry-red that his predecessor, Pranab Mukherjee, always carried his budget papers in. As he walked to the Lok Sabha accompanied by the parliamentary affairs minister, looking trim in his cream sherwani and spectacles, one could almost hear "tread softly" in the air. Sharp at five o'clock Vishwanath Pratap Singh began his maiden union budget speech and by the time he had ended almost 108 minutes later, he had already been accorded several generous rounds of bench-patting. Some of it for the various points he had made about the budget, and some for the quips he punctuated his speech with. At one point for example, while talking of the tax levy on pan masala, he referred to it as an "organic chemical" which was a "preparation containing betel-nuts and any one or more of other ingredients such as lime, catechu, cardamom, copra and menthol put up for sale in unit containers." While members were just straining their brain on what such a blend could be, the finance minister quipped in: "honourable members will recognise this coalition as pan masala." The house was rolling in laughter once again when the finance minister brought up another matter of "interest," this time a raise on the basic excise of soda water. Immediately after finishing the part on aerated waters in the text, Vishwanath Pratap Singh looked away from it and said, a twinkle visible in his eyes, "I do not know how many members would be affected by that." Even the galleries were falling over this time.

Not that they were full though. Apart from the press gallery where there was not an inch to spare and people were sitting on the steps and aisles, all others were sparsely peopled. In the diplomatic gallery sat Harry Barnes, the United States ambassador, all alone, all attention to the finance minister and among others in the VIP gallery was seen Priyanka Gandhi, who had been escorted by Makhanlal Fotedar. But of course the attention was on the man sitting sombre, right in front of the Rajya Sabha gallery—former finance minister Pranab Mukherjee, who was later to talk tall of the budget. There were those who were conspicuous by their absence too. Opposition stalwarts Charan Singh and Jagjivan Ram, ruling party stars Amitabh Bachchan and Vyjayanthimala Bali.

The budget speech, which began with a quote from the books of Mrs Indira Gandhi, would have become a rather drab affair, had not the finance minister himself broken up his monologue with witticisms here and there. The opposition benches it seemed had little to say all through it; that usual barrage of criticism, some studied, some premeditated came only later. The most common complaint was that by leaving a large deficit of Rs 3,349 crores uncovered the finance minister had made room for massive increase in prices for the poor while leaving the door open for the rich to amass wealth. The mandatory sugar-coated-pill-criticism was dropped again and there were others who tried to point out "structural flaws" and "administrative drawbacks" of the budget. But on first sounding on 16 March, there was quite a euphoria. The raising of the income-tax exemption limit from Rs 15,000 to Rs 18,000, the abolition of the compulsory deposit scheme and of estate duty, raises in the exemption limit of wealth tax from one and a half lakh rupees to two and a half lakhs, the removal of license fees from radios, televisions and videos, a string of excise and customs concessions on computers and other electronic goods, all added to it. But then there were the balancers, for the middle income group at least. Housewives could not have been too happy: they have to pay more for kerosene or cooking and have to spend an extra sum on other commodities as a result of the increase in prices of petrol and railway freight. Give with one hand, take away with another?

Well, anyway, the first crunch of the budget came on the night of 16 March itself—on the streets of Delhi. Learning of the hike in petrol prices effective midnight, most gas-stations promptly shut-shop and waited to get better returns, leaving hundred stranded in all kinds of places.

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

Vishwanath Pratap Singh

SARKARIA COMMISSION

A Snail's Pace

Very little progress has been made

Of the plethora of commissions idling in New Delhi's administrative jungle, the Sarkaria Commission set up by the late Mrs Indira Gandhi on 9 June 1983 for a fresh look at centre-state relations, is perhaps the most important in the present political context. Be it the ferment in Punjab and Assam or the problems in the North-East, the financial problems of West Bengal and the southern states or the crisis in Jammu and Kashmir, it is the Sarkaria Commission the people are looking to for solutions. Every time centre-state relations have deteriorated in the last couple of years, the government has come up with the same convenient answer "The Sarkaria Commission is looking into it." Even as late as 14 March 1985, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi told the Rajya Sabha that the Akali demands were being looked into by Justice Sarkaria. It is, but with no sense of urgency. While the centre-state strains become more insistent every day, the commission deliberates.

Already on a one-year extension term, the commission will have to get another one in June this year and perhaps another, if it is to complete the task assigned to it. During the two years that it has been functioning, the commission has not even been able to complete the preliminaries. Officials working for the commission agree that the work has been "a bit slow" but fail to give reasons for the slow progress.

Justice Sarkaria

The commission has to date recorded opinions in only five states—Kerala, Madhya Pradesh, Himachal Pradesh, West Bengal and Tripura—and received replies to its exhaustive questionnaire sent out in mid-1984, from only eight. These states, apart from the ones already mentioned, are Nagaland, Karnataka and Assam. This is a mere note of views, their examination will come later.

One of the major reasons for this delay has also been the preoccupation of the governments in the states with other matters. At one time, for example, the chief ministers of three major southern states—Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka and Tamil Nadu—were ill and had gone abroad for treatment. The state leaders were also busy with the Lok Sabha and the Assembly polls. The states did not have time, they told the commission to stay put in Delhi. Now that the elections are over and all the three chief ministers in the south are in better shape, letters are going out to all of them for setting up a meeting. If the commission had its way, these meetings would have been held in the first week of April Once all the states have been visited, the main task of assembling and arranging opinions and formulating recommendations to the government of India will begin

It appears that the commission made little progress in research. In these two and a half years it has been able to interview only 250 eminent people on the question of centre-state relations. Besides, more than 100 researchers assigned to the commission have been able to pinpoint only 25 high profile issues on the entire question of centre-state relations. Officials themselves say that half the work is yet to be done. And although they have been working on the issue for so long, they do not seem to know which way the commission is going "Nothing concrete has emerged as yet. We have got a cross-section of views but we are yet to analyse them," said one official

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

RAJASTHAN

An End to "Non-rule"

The election of Harideo Joshi has been welcomed

The election of Harideo Joshi as leader of the Congress(I) Legislative Party and his taking over as chief minister of Rajasthan for the second time has been welcomed in the state. In fact, his coming to power is considered by the people and the Congress(I) rank and file as an end to the five years of Congress(I) "non-rule".

In 1980, people dislodged the Janata Party government in Rajasthan and voted for the Congress(I) which promised a government which works. But the hopes of the people were soon shattered. First, Jagannath Pahadia was made chief minister by the Congress(I) high command though he did not enjoy a majority in the legislative party. To ensure his unanimous election, the CLP(I) meeting was held at New Delhi instead of at the state capital. But, he proved inefficient and the government machinery in the state came to a standstill.

Shiv Charan Mathur was then chosen to succeed him though he did not have more than half-a-dozen supporters in the 150 strong CLP(I). Mr Mathur had been a minister in state governments, but it was soon clear that he lacked the qualities of a leader required for a successful chief minister He was soon surrounded by sycophants and incurred the displeasure of the senior party leaders and MLAs. His casteist approach to the bureaucracy also had a highly demoralising effect on the services.

In fact,11 of the22 state ministers were refused party tickets in the Vidhan Sabha elections. Three others were defeated in the elections and all the relatives of the ousted ministers too, who managed to get nominations as Congress(I) candidates, were also rejected by the people. Each time the dissidents intensified their campaign against him, certain national problems diverted the central leadership's attention providing Mr Mathur a fresh lease of life. Almost every day, there were rumours that the chief minister was resigning leading to more chaos.

Harideo Joshi is the choice of the high command but he also enjoys the support of his legislative party. He has been brought at the helm of affairs in order to hold the party together and provide an effective government. Mr Joshi's ability on both counts has been tested. After the death of Raja Man Singh, he is the seniormost legislator of the state He has been MLA since 1952 and his political sagacity and administrative acumen is well known His election as leader of the ruling party has already had a salutary effect on the government machinery.

Mr Joshi has so far projected himself as a chief minister who works. He inducted seven ministers in his cabinet the very next day after his own swearing-in Both Pahadia and Mathur had taken a long time in finalising lists of their cabinet Unlike his predecessors who took many days to distribute portfolios, Mr Joshi announced the portfolios of ministers immediately after the oath-taking ceremony at the Raj Bhawan The ministers, following the example set by their chief minister, went straight to the secretariat to attend to office work after being sworn in. Mr Joshi has decided not to use the limousine at the chief minister's disposal and opted for an ordinary Ambassador car. "You know I had been using a Fiat car when I was the chief minister last time Why should we spend anything only for pomp and show?" Mr Joshi told SUNDAY. With the formation of the Joshi cabinet, all those who were humiliated by Shiv Charan Mathur have been rehabilitated.

Milap Chand Dandia, Jaipur

"I Have No Intention of Protecting the Guilty"

Rajasthan CM Harideo Joshi told SUNDAY

Harideo Joshi has become the Rajasthan CM at a time when the Seventh Plan of the state is yet to be finalised and the state's finances are in a poor shape. The morale of the services is very low. The ruling party's strength has gone down while the opposition, after the elections, has gained strength.

Q. During the Lok Sabha elections last December, the Congress(I) candidates had convincing leads in 183 out of 200 Assembly segments of the state. But the trend was reversed within two months and the party lost 70 more segments and could capture only 113 seats. This was 37 seats less than the party's strength in the last Vidhan Sabha. How do you explain this phenomenon?

A: No one can deny the fact that our party has won fewer seats this time but at the same time it has been given an absolute majority. People want our party to continue to rule.

Q: Does the debacle not mean that the people have expressed their displeasure about the performance of the past government at the state level?

A: You can't call it a debacle. The policies are formulated by the centre. Guidelines and a major part of the financial outlay also come from there. Once the Planning Commission approves the plan, the responsibility for its implementation rests on the state government. The people have thus overwhelmingly approved Rajiv Gandhi's policies and plans without any reservations. But on the implementation side, their approval has been limited and to some extent our candidates have lost.

Q: The people's faith in the government's ability to deliver the goods has been considerably eroded The honest and able administrators find themselves out of place and the elected representatives feel humiliated.

A: My first job would be to restore the faith of all walks of society in the government. This is possible only when the bureaucrats implement government policies faithfully and fearlessly and the elected representatives, not only MPs and MLAs but even the sarpanches are given due respect and a proper role to play and are allowed to make a constructive contribution to the development of their respective areas. Rajasthan has been adjudged as the number one state in the implementation of the 20-point programme. But the fact is that statistics have no relevance to reality. Even Rajiv Gandhi had once expressed such feelings in a public meeting at Jaipur. And I quite agree with Rajivji. There is a vast difference between claims and the real impact of these programmes. We will activise the government machinery to ensure that it delivers goods in real terms.

Harideo Joshi

Q. You have got a government which is in a very poor state of health financially. The Seventh Plan is to be formulated but because of the lack of funds, how will you be able to take up the required number of welfare schemes?

A. You are right. The finances of the state are in a precarious position But I want to be realistic. A balance between plans and resources has to be drawn and we will strive for the same.

Q: The law and order machinery of the state appears to have gone out of the government's control. Use of excess power on the slightest or little provocation, murders in police stations, rape by uniformed men and harassment of innocent people, even of MLAs and ex-ministers appears to have become the government's policy The policy of protecting every deed and misdeed of the police has emboldened wrong elements in the police set-up, the culmination of which was the killing of Man Singh.

A: The very first act which I did after assuming charge was to call the director general of police, the home secretary and the chief secretary to discuss the law and order situation. I have made it clear to them that the new government wants all the pending judicial enquiries completed without further delay and that minimum possible force should be used for maintaining law and order. I have no intention of protecting anyone found guilty.

Interviewed by Milap Chand Dandia

MADHYA PRADESH

"I Believe in Work, Not Talk"

Madhya Pradesh CM Motilal Vora told SUNDAY

With his "clean" image and a successful stint as the Madhya Pradesh PCC(I) chief behind him, 56-year-old Motilal Vora was the obvious choice as the chief minister of Madhya Pradesh after the resignation of Arjun Singh. Vora had worked as a journalist before beginning his political career as a Socialist over 25 years ago. He joined the Congress(R) in 1971, in protest against the Socialist Party's decision to join the "Grand Alliance" which included the Jana Sangh in the 1971 polls. Vora has successfully contested the Legislative Assembly elections from Durg in MP in 1972, 1978 and 1985 and was vice-chairman of the MP State Road Transport Corporation and minister of higher education before becoming the state PCC(I) chief.

Motilal Vora

Q: You have been an MLA since 1972 and have worked with three chief ministers: P. C. Sethi, Shyama Charan Shukla and Arjun Singh. Do you think you will make a successful chief minister?

A: With the cooperation of my partymen, the people and everyone concerned in running the administration, I hope to be a successful chief minister.

Q: A chief minister can be successful only through good administration for which the cooperation of officials is needed. At present, there seems to be a lack of trust between the political leadership and the executive.

A: I don't agree with you. In my capacity as minister for higher education, and earlier, when I was vice-chairman of the MPSRTC (Madhya Pradesh State Road Transport Corporation), I had the cooperation of the bureaucracy. My approach is that we should review their (the bureaucrats) work from time to time to see that they work correctly, but we should trust them. There was never any atmosphere of mistrust, nor shall be there any such thing now or in the future.

Q: What are your plans for streamlining the administration?

A: I believe in work, not talk. I shall not be able to discuss at present all my plans but time-bound programmes for development projects are a must. Given proper budgetary allocations, every programme must be complete according to schedule and I am not going to tolerate any excuses. No person erring in this respect will be spared. We shall make proper budget allocations for developmental programmes and we shall accept only concrete results. Our biggest problem is the shortage of drinking water and we are going to launch our plans on a war footing.

Q: Heaps of files are lying with the ministers who don't even attend the Secretariat.

A: A large number of files are pending with ministers because of the elections and I have asked them not only to dispose of the pending files, but also dispose of expeditiously files concerning their portfolios in future. It will be essential for the ministers to sit in the secretariat regularly and attend to their files and other administrative matters. The programmes for the socio-economic upliftment of the weaker sections of society launched by Arjun Singh will be continued.

Q: Arjun Singh as chief minister was subject to constant attacks from his rivals like P. C. Sethi, V. C. Shukla, Madhav Rao Scindia and Kamal Nath. Do you expect similar problems?

A: I don't agree with you. During the chief-ministership of Arjun Singh, there was no groupism or opposition. Differences of opinion on issues do not mean opposition. As a minister in Arjun Singh's government and later as PCC(I) chief I got full support from Sethi, Shukla, Scindia and Kamal Nath and I am sure I will get full cooperation from them now.

Interviewed by M. V. Kher, Raipur

ANDHRA PRADESH

Death in Hyderabad

Six die in communal riots

History repeated itself in Hyderabad when communal riots broke out in the old city on 8 March claiming six lives and leaving 20 others seriously injured. "Since 1978, communal riots have become seasonal in Hyderabad," says a senior police officer cynically. In the past few years, riots have broken out despite heavy police patrols, whenever Muslim and Hindu religious festivals have fallen close to each other. But the most disturbing feature of the communal problem in Hyderabad is communal violence during the elections. Two years ago, communal violence erupted in Chandrayangutta on 5 January during the Assembly elections. On 5 March 1985, trouble began again at Chandrayangutta during polling. In both cases the sparks which ignited the communal flame were purely political.

Voting began peacefully on 5 March. Police arrangements were thorough in this "sensitive" constituency and the day of vote-counting passed off peacefully as did 7 March—Holi. But the city authorities were caught unawares when communal passions flared up on 7 March. The city police force and the reinforcements brought in from other parts of the country had been on constant vigil since 4 March but by 8 March, the difficult period was thought to be over.

According to the directives of the Election Commisssion, election results should not be declared in any constituency where over 90 per cent of the votes have been polled without informing the Election Commission. In Chandrayangutta,in the old city area of Hyderabad,93 per cent of the votes were cast according to the figures supplied by the polling officials. In seven polling stations over 100 per cent voting had taken place. In 133 of the 173 polling stations, voting was over 90 per cent. Election results thus were withheld pending confirmation by the Election Commission. Tension mounted on 8

March after a rumour spread through the constituency that a repoll had been ordered in the entire constituency.

Fights broke out after workers of one group claimed that their candidate had been declared elected while supporters of the other party asserted that a repoll had been ordered. The police rushed to the scene (Kaveli Kaman near Sultan Shahi) to bring the situation under control. The crowd dispersed but regrouped and brickbatting and looting continued. A young boy was stabbed near the market place that day and this began a series of retaliatory attacks which led to the death of five persons by the evening. Curfew was once again imposed but trouble began to spread . As Kadar Ali, a vegetable vendor whose wooden cart was destroyed in the violence said, "It is only us poor innocent people who suffer. These political people fight and we suffer.

In 1983, the contest in Chandrayangutta between the BJP and the Majlis-e-Ittehadul (MIM) had initially led to clashes between supporters of both parties when the candidates and their supporters (Mr Narendra of the BJP and Mr Amanullah Khan of the MIM) met during the campaign tour. Curfew was not imposed immediately till polling ended and when normalcy was restored ten days later the death toll had gone up to 11.

Polarisation of the electorate in the old city is almost complete. This is mainly because of the mutual distrust between the two major communities, which is aggravated during election time by party rivalry which divides the people along communal lines. Chandrayangutta does not have a clear majority of any one community and has been consistently returning the MIM candidate but with a margin of less than 3,000 votes. It has therefore always been the scene of hectic electioneering with volatile speeches by the BJP and the MIM leaders.

This time, the BJP did not field an official party candidate, since Mr Ale Narendra had moved to Himayatnagar constituency, in a byelection. But the BJP supported a former party member R.G.Krishna contesting as an independent against the sitting MIM MLA Amanullah Khan. Mr Khan is no less volatile and was involved in an unseemly incident with the Congress(I) candidate Habib Mustafa and assaulted him just before the election. But neither the Congress(I) nor the Telugu Desam has made any inroads in the area.

Shobha Singh, Hyderabad

BIHAR

Victory for Jagannath Mishra

Chandra Shekhar Singh steps down from office

On 12 March, the reign of CM Chandra Shekhar Singh ended and Bindeswari Dubey, the 61-year-old trade union leader became the 19th chief minister of Bihar. Ironically, Mr Singh ended his reign exactly the way he had begun it. Two years ago, on 14 August 1983, the state's outgoing chief minister Jagannath Mishra, complying with the Congress(I) high command's wishes, had reluctantly proposed Mr Singh's name. This time, Chandra Shekhar Singh, hopeful till the end of retaining his position had to announce his resignation and the decision to make Dubey the new chief minister.

Mr Singh's dismissal was actually a victory for his arch-rival Dr Jagannnath Mishra who had been lobbying in Delhi for the dismissal of Chandra Shekhar Singh. For Mishra, who enjoys the support of a majority of the party MLAs, it had become a prestige issue and he had even declared that the CM be selected by direct elections.

The issue however hung in the balance, with both the Singh and the Mishra-Dubey lobbies confident of getting the nod. But even after the interviews of the MLAs by the AICC(I) observer, union minister Bansi Lal and the AICC(I) joint secretary V.N. Patil, the issue hung in the balance. According to sources, a majority of the legislators left the decision to the Congress(I) high command while most of the others preferred Mr Dubey. That evening a confident Mishra basing his claims on his support in the state CLP(I) assured his supporters that Dubey would be the next chief minister. Meanwhile C.S. Singh, gaining in confidence from the support by the AICC(I) treasurer Sitaram Kesri who switched his support from the Mishra-Dubey camp, remained equally confident.

K.M. Kasim

Bindeswari Dubey (left) with Mishra

In fact, till one pm on 12 March, Mr Singh's supporters remained jubilant, maintaining that Mr Singh would be reinstated. They even stated that Mr Bansi Lal had met Mr Singh and congratulated him. Actually, Mr Lal had met the CM only to ask him to propose Mr Dubey's name. According to sources, Dubey had the support of about 100 MLAs and 50 others supported Singh while the others preferred someone of the high command's choice.

Visibly upset by the decision, Chandra Shekhar Singh promised full cooperation to Dubey in order to strengthen the party, implement Rajiv Gandhi's directives and development work in the state before leaving for Delhi by a special plane. In return Dubey promised a clean and efficient administration. He also suggested that he would have an open mind regarding the formation of the ministry, indicating that some of Singh's men could find a place in his cabinet.

Though Dubey was projected as the new CM even before the Assembly elections (he was denied a Lok Sabha ticket and made PCC(I) chief) his chances, till Mishra stepped in to lend his weight, were rather slim. And according to a senior Congress(I) leader, Mr Bansi Lal was persuaded by the "old guards" to settle for Mr Dubey. But despite the election of Dubey, the balance of power in the state remains, with the Dubey-Mishra faction considerably weakened by the exit of Mr Sitaram Kesri to the Singh faction. What political observers will be watching with keen interest is the future of the Dubey-Mishra alliance.

For Dubey, the path ahead is likely to have many pitfalls. A major problem that Dubey will have to face will be his attitude towards the Congress(I) rebels—all of whom are supporters of Dr Mishra—who have won the elections. Though Dubey has announced their expulsion, many of them are already pressing for re-entry. For Mishra, the fall of the Singh government and the installation of Dubey has been a major victory. As one of his supporters claimed, "Dr Mishra has not only survived in politics, but has proved that the high command was wrong in replacing him."

Yubaraj Ghimire, Patna

KERALA

UDF Weathers a Storm

CM Karunakaran continues to remain in power

The United Democratic Front (UDF) ministry in Kerala which has been clinging to power for the last two years weathered another series of storms in the last few weeks. After a good performance in the Lok Sabha elections, the UDF lost all three seats in the 28 'February byelections to the CPI(M)-led Left Democratic Front of which one seat was held by the UDF. Then three MLAs of the UDF's coalition partner National Democratic Party (NDP) wanted their ministerial nominee to be removed after 18 people were killed and many more seriously burnt when kerosene supplied mostly by the Hindustan Petroleum Corporation exploded in kitchens in parts of central Kerala. The UDF nominee for the speaker's post, V. M. Sudheeran (Congress-I), just managed to win by a whisker after two votes of the eight seat majority UDF were, as observers believe, purposely invalidated by disgruntled MLAs.

As though he had not had enough, chief minister Karunakaran was at the receiving end of some serious allegations by Gundu Rao the ex-chief minister of Karnataka. After the stunning defeat at the hands of the Janata Party, Gundu Rao angry at not being given a ticket, lashed out at Karunakaran who along with A. K. Antony was in charge of conducting the party campaign in Karnataka saying that he had purposely scuttled the campaign. Karunakaran's aim, he said, is to become the Congress(I)'s only strongman in the South. Gundu Rao went to the extent of advertising this allegation in Karnataka newspapers with pictures of Indira and Rajiv Gandhi. Another charge against Karunakaran was that he distributed only Rs 10,000 to each candidate from the party funds.

But as Rao alleged, Karunakaran still remains the party's strongman in the South which would not have been the case if a strong Congress(I) ministry had come to power in Karnataka. What made Gundu Rao even more angry was the way Karunakaran made him plead for a ticket. Rao even went to the extent of pleading before the 26-year-old Kerala MLA and president of the National Students Union of India, Ramesh Chennithalla, who is close to Karunakaran. Ironically, it was Gundu Rao who had gone out of his way to encourage Chennithalla when he was the CM. Rao had even presented the student leader with a Premier Padmini car which he still uses. Ramesh Chennithalla is now reportedly a favourite of the Prime Minister. According to a source who was in the plane with Chennithalla and Karunakaran, an aide of Rao almost fell at Chennithalla's feet as they were walking from the plane at the Delhi airport.

The unity of the two groups of the Kerala Congress is not a happy omen for Karunakaran who has very shrewdly been following the policy of divide and rule. A united Kerala Congress with 14 MLAs is a major pressure group within the UDF and sparks have already started flying with the economist and chairman of the economic cell of the KPCC(I) Dr K. P. Gopalakrishnan accusing the Kerala Congress finance minister K. M. Mani of mishandling his portfolio and landing Kerala in a financial trouble. Dr Gopalakrishnan told SUNDAY that the finance minister had exempted up to 1,000 coconut trees, 700 rubber trees from taxation resulting in a huge loss of revenue. The Kerala Congress is backed by rich farmers and planters of central Kerala for whom this tax exemption is a gift.

Mani retorted by issuing a booklet defending his role but as Gopalakrishnan said, "What I am amazed is that he has managed to hoodwink two chief ministers Karunakaran and Nayanar." The Kerala Congress was a partner of the CPI(M)-led Left Democratic Front under E. K. Nayanar before it switched sides. Mani cherishes ambitions of becoming chief minister which he can fulfil if the Kerala Congress decides to change camps again and join the LDF. The process has already been initiated with the student wing of the party. The Kerala Students Congress, aligning with the Students Federation of India (SFI) in the Gandhiji University Union (central Kerala) elections and defeating the Congress student wing, the Kerala Students' Union, which lost all the three prestigious university union elections in the state to the SFI and its allies. But E.M.S Namboodiripad has announced that the LDF is not a shelter camp for parties being "smoked out" from the UDF. However, other Left Front leaders like Baby John of the RSP are seriously continuing their efforts to woo the Kerala Congress.

Meanwhile, housewives in Kerala are putting aside their kerosene stoves as reports of stoves bursting are coming in from different parts of the state. The government has asked the Hindusthan Petroleum Corporation to withdraw stocks for the month of February if they want to continue distribution. The government will also insist on guarantee certificates for each load. According to Hindusthan Petroleum and Bharat Petroleum, the kerosene got mixed with naphta while it was being transferred from tankers to the refinery in Cochin. About 50 people have been seriously burnt by the explosions.

Binoo K. John, Trivandrum

K. M. Mani

Karunakaran

LAW

Crime King to be Freed

Charles Sobhraj will soon complete his seven year term

Charles Gurumukh Sobhraj, one of the 20th century's most notorious criminals is soon to be released from Karwar jail, in Karnataka. All nine criminal charges faced by him have been tried in Indian courts and after undergoing rigorous imprisonment in India for seven years, Sobhraj will now be a free man. He, however, is wanted in several cases abroad. There is a warrant against him from the government of Thailand and he is on the wanted list of criminals in Greece and Nepal.

According to Interpol sources, the warrant of arrest against Sobhraj has been renewed recently, so that once released from the Karwar jail, he will not be allowed to leave the country. The Karnataka government has been instructed to transfer Sobhraj to Delhi's Tihar Central jail, after which charges against him in foreign countries would be examined. An extradition court would be set up to study the applications for his extradition and if charges against Sobhraj are found substantial, he would be deported on the basis of Section 5 of the Extradition Act of 1962 (he is a French national, who had an Indian father and Vietnamese mother. He was born in Saigon).

At the time of his arrest in New Delhi on 5 July 1976, Sobhraj faced as many as 100 charges around the world. He was wanted on charges of murder, drugging, looting and forgery in Paris. Beirut, Kathmandu, Hong Kong and Saigon besides facing a series of charges in New Delhi, Madras, Bombay, and Varanasi. He had cleverly managed to hoodwink the police in all these cities and had a narrow escape from the police in Bombay when he had been hospitalised for an appendix operation in 1974. Two years later, he was recognised in Delhi as the same Sobhraj where he, posing as a tourist guide, was apprehended while drugging French tourists at the Vikram hotel. His accomplice and wife, Marie Andree Leclerc, was also arrested with him. Since his sensational arrest in 1981, he was shifted from Tihar jail to Varanasi jail. The following year he was imprisoned at Allahabad and later in February 1984 transferred to Karwar jail.

The last of the criminal charges faced by Sobhraj in India was initiated by a French national, Tete Bruno, who alleged that on 9 January 1976, Sobhraj had administered to him and two other French tourists stupefying drugs and when they became unconscious robbed them of their belongings worth Rs. 40,000. When the complaint was lodged by Tete Bruno on 11 January 1976, Sobhraj faced several criminal charges in other cities. In the capital itself, there were three cases against him. The first was recorded at the Chanakyapuri police station in 1971 (FIR No 412). He was charged in case No 561/76 at the Connaught Place police station and a third case was registered at the Daryaganj police station charging him with the murder of a foreign national, Luke Solomon. (Sobhraj was later acquitted in the case and charged with culpable homicide not amounting to murder). Sobhraj was also charged with the murder of A. A. Jackob in Varanasi in January 1976. In this case too, Sobhraj was acquitted of murder charges because of an eye-witness account given before the court.

Charles Sobhraj

Sobhraj has written to several of his friends in India and abroad about his future plans after he leaves jail. He is said to have been approached by a host of writers and journalists to write about his eventful life. A famous Hollywood producer is also in touch with a proposal to film his life, police sources say. Sobhraj who has already been the subject of two biographical sketches Serpentine and the Life and Crimes of Charles Sobhraj has recently completed a manuscript in prison which he has sent to Pan Publishers, London and has entered into an agreement with a British writer to co-author his autobiography covering the period of his captivity.

In one letter written by Sobhraj from Karwar jail to R.K. Ohri, his lawyer in New Delhi, he has said, "My trial here is over. (What) only remains now (is) my statement under Section 313, argument and judgment. So by the end of this month I'll be meeting you." In the same letter he has also written to his lawyer about the Bhopal gas tragedy, "I am interested in that Union Carbide case in Bhopal and am thinking of investing some money in it, for I am sure it's a gold mine stuff. My idea is to come into an agreement with one or two lawyers and tie up a contract with two or three (of) Bhopal's victims, and then hand over their cases to my lawyers in the USA..." Apparently hoodwinking innocent people has become a habit, which Sobhraj cannot easily give up.

It is evident that seven years of imprisonment has not dampened the penchant Sobhraj had for making something out of nothing. In fact, he has been an enigmatic and charismatic prisoner behind bars. At the Tihar jail, he used to receive VIP treatment. His cell in jail was lined by hundreds of books and even now in Karwar, Sobhraj is surrounded by books and piles of correspondence he receives from all over the world. He was also in the news about the "marriage ceremony" that was performed between him and an American writer, Shereen Walker on 15 November 1981 in Varanasi jail. Shereen Walker was asked to leave the country on 14 February, 1982. His first wife, Canadian born Marie Andree, who was also wanted along with Sobhraj on criminal charges in India was allowed to leave the country for treatment by a Supreme Court order of 1983. Marie Andree, after a year of hospitalisation in Canada died of cancer in September 1984.

"I consider myself a businessman, not a criminal, and I know I never killed good people," Sobhraj had said to Richard Neville and Julie Clarke, the American authors of Life and Crimes who had conducted a series of interviews with Sobhraj in Tihar jail. In the same book, Sobhraj has also declared that if he is ever made to face a trial in Thailand, he will "deny everything." According to his lawyers, Sobhraj will seek residence in India after his release. The extradition court proceedings, mean while are being finalised.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

ANTARCTIC EXPEDITION

A Change of Site ?

Scientists feel that the research station is incorrectly located

Four years after embarking on an ambitious programme for the exploration of Antarctica, the department of ocean development is now wondering whether the selection of the site for India's research station Dakshin Gangotri was correct. A new site will be selected by the time the fifth expedition sets sail for Antarctica by the end of the year. Since December 1981, when the first batch of 23 Indians went to Antarctica, four successful expeditions have been concluded, the last of which will be returning to India by the end of March. The search for a new site has begun after scientists and geologists on the four expeditions expressed dissatisfaction over the site, situated 22 kilometres away from the Antarctic ocean, where a permanent manned station has been setup. Easy accessibility from the sea, which would facilitate the comfortable movement of men and cargo, apparently led to the selection of this site. However, there is sufficient proof now that Dakshin Gangotri which is part of the continental ice shelf is not a suitable site for exploring for mineral and oil reserves.

Most stations of other countries are dotted along the interior of the continent, along areas called the Ross Sea and the Weddel Sea. There are very few manned stations near the Dakshin Gangotri, the two largest being the Russian station Novolazarevsksya and the South African station Sanae, are also in areas not considered rich in mineral and oil reserves. The Russian station set up more than 20 years ago, is one of the 28 such stations of the USSR and is in fact not even manned by the Russians throughout the year.

A senior official of the department of ocean development told SUNDAY: "If India has to make a serious stake for Antarctic wealth, it will have to move inside. As long as we are at the Dakshin Gangotri, we will not benefit at all." He also pointed out that the life of the station is not likely to be more than five to seven years, since the ice shelf is in constant movement and there is the danger of the station caving in.

Since India embarked on its ambitious programme of scientific exploration of Antarctica, the investment in the programme has been increasing. While the first two expeditions cost Rs 1.90 crores and Rs 1.95 crores respectively, the two subsequent expeditions have cost much more. The third expedition, which was the first to leave behind a wintering party in the continent, cost Rs 5.85 crores and the last expedition, which has left 13 members behind has already spent Rs 6.03 crores.

Future Indian investments in Antarctica are likely to go up. There are various proposals awaiting the sanction of the government which, if approved would improve Indian prospects in the continent. One of the factors which has been restricting Indian interests in Antarctica is the fact that inspite of deciding to have one Antarctic expedition every year and putting up a permanent manned station, India has not purchased a ship to transport Indians to the continent. Instead, ships have only been chartered at tremendous cost. At present the Finnish ice breaker Finnpolaris, which is being used by the Indians is costing the government 12,500 dollars every day. It is now believed that the government has approached several ship builders in Europe to present proposals for the construction of a research vessel for India.

A decision is also likely to be taken shortly to purchase an aircraft which would establish a permanent air link between India and Antarctica. Negotiations have begun with the USA for the purchase of a C 130 Hercules for this purpose. Once such an aircraft is purchased, a permanent air strip will be erected on the ice shelf and an air link established, most probably through Argentina.

Another major investment is the purchase of the Sagar Sampada an ice-strengthened fishing vessel from Denmark. The vessel which has cost Rs 18 crores repayable on a soft loan, will soon commence operations in the Antarctic waters in the summer months and catch krill, a high protein marine organism found in the Antarctic waters.

The race for Antarctica is hotting up. It has been established that there is tremendous potential and wealth hidden below the ice pack. According to the US geological survey conducted recently, there are 15 million barrels of oil and three trillion cubic feet of gas below the ice shelf. There is also ample evidence of large quantities of iron, coal, nickel, zinc, gold and uranium. As a member of the consultative committee of Antarctica, India can share the rich reserves of the continent.

Ritu Sarin. New Delhi.

Members of a previous expedition to Antarctica

SMUGGLING

The Gulf Connection

Bombay Customs smash a racket

Rajukuttan Asari, a poor labourer from Trivandrum, returned to India from Dubai in December 1984. At Bombay's Sahar airport, he declared that he was coming back after working for three years abroad and was thus covered by the provisions of "Transfer of Residence" (TR) rules, which permitted him to import all his used household articles. Five crates were coming by sea, which were declared by Asari as his "unaccompanied baggage." A landing certificate was duly issued. When these crates were not claimed for over a month, Asari was traced by the Marine and Preventive Wing of Bombay Customs at Trivandrum and taken to the Unclaimed Baggage Centre (UBC) of Bombay's Indira docks. When the crates were opened, it was found that Asari had imported goods worth Rs 4.41 lakhs. The brand-new items seized by the Customs included three Hitachi refrigerators, three National (Japanese) airconditioners, a cooking range, a seven-system videocassette recorder (National NV 780), a model which had been marketed only in October 1984, Japanese Noritaki and Nagoya crockery sets, 15 carpets, microovens, vacuum cleaners, hundreds of Kitkat and Tobler chocolates and scores of two brands of perfume: Masculine and You and Me.

Asari had become a courier for contraband at Dubai. He had paid Rs 15,000 to a job racketeer three years ago, to get employment in the Gulf. He had been unemployed for a major part of his stay at Dubai. Starvation and penury in an alien land made Asari a desperate person. He had no money to eat, leave aside buy a ticket back to India. Then, some friends took him to a "Robin Hood" who visited Dubai from Bombay often. The "Robin Hood" gave Asari an air ticket to Bombay. In return, he was asked to obtain a landing certificate at Sahar airport. He was given an address, where he was to report and arrangements for his stay at Bombay were also assured by this "Robin Hood." Not only that, Asari was told that once "his luggage" was cleared from the Indira docks, he would be given a train ticket to Trivandrum plus Rs 10,000, which he could carry back home as his "earnings at Dubai." For a person in Asari's plight, it was an attractive proposition. At Bombay, he went to the assigned address. He was put up in a dormitory in the Nishanpada area, near Dongri. Solkar Manzil, the guest house where Asari had been put up by his smuggler-patrons, had come under Customs surveillance from mid-December. Asari was told that the "trail was hot" and asked to stay at Solkar Manzil till arrangements could be made to clear his baggage. The Customs rules require the presence of the passenger at the Indira docks when the clearance is done. So, till his "baggage" was cleared, the promised Rs 10,000 was not forthcoming. Asari ran away to Trivandrum in early January. He did not wait for the money. His passport and landing certificate were recovered by the Customs on 8 January, when they raided Solkar Manzil. He was traced in a slum in Trivandrum and Asari willingly confessed. On the basis of his statement, the "Robin Hood," Moinuddin Sharfuddin Parker, was arrested. When the crates were opened at the Indira docks, Asari looked at the luxury goods with surprise. No, they did not belong to him, he told the Customs. Suddenly he spotted a battered suitcase: "This is mine," he said. The suitcase was opened. There were some used clothes and a new frock for a little girl. "I had bought this for my daughter," Asari said, tears streaming down his cheeks. The Customs officers let him take his suitcase along with him to Trivandrum.

A refrigerator stuffed with contraband, found in the crates

The abbreviation 'MP', in Customs parlance refers to the Marine and Preventive wing. The team of "Customs MP," comprising P.K. Kapoor, S.K. Pali and G.N. Deshpande had been amazed by the quick clearances certain consignments had got at the Unclaimed Baggage Centre (UBC) at Indira docks. On 18 December 1984, they found one consignment being presented for clearance at 11 am and by 1.30 pm, a truck carrying the goods was unloading at Mohammed Ali Road in the Dongri area of the city. Normally, each crate should require 30 minutes for clearance. The five crates belonging to one Mohandas Kanarakutti had been cleared in record time. The truck was followed up to Dongri and after the unloading was almost over, the place was raided. Kanarakutti was not found, but Abbas Dandekar, a local resident, came forward with the Customs clearance papers and Kanarakutti's passport and told the officers that the goods were not contraband. The passport showed Kanarakutti as a resident of a slum in Chembur, near the Mahul Refinery. The slum was visited by Customs officers and the address was located, but no one there had heard of any Kanarakutti.

Kapoor, Pali and Deshpande, however, decided to take over the clearance activities at the Indira docks UBC. From the next day, the conniving Customs staff were replaced by "Customs MP" personnel. A bonanza of recoveries followed. Within two days, the average number of passengers cleared daily at the UBC nosedived from 50 to 20 per day. An alarm was sounded in the underworld. "UBC mein lafda hai (there is trouble at the UBC)" was the general alert. Rajukuttan Asari of Trivandrum had landed in Bombay during these days. Hence, his luggage remained unclaimed for weeks.

The modus operandi of the smugglers who have been misusing the "transfer of residence" rules is simple. They scout for poor Indian labourers cheated by job racketeers wanting to return home from the Gulf. Even for people returning to India in the normal course, the lure of money, ranging from Rs 10,000 to Rs 50,000 (depending on the consignment) is attractive. An air ticket is provided, accommodation in Bombay is ensured in dormitories owned by the smugglers. All that the passenger had to do is obtain a landing certificate under TR rules and present himself at the UBC when the goods are cleared. The "customs cleared" imported goods sold on Bombay's footpaths usually came from the TR racket.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, Bombay

UNITED KINGDOM

A Blow for Democracy

The Conservative government reduces municipal autonomy

The age-old aphorism—"An Englishman's home is his castle"—is often accompanied at least in the minds of the people of England, by a firm belief that local government (that is, municipal autonomy)is the foundation of British parliamentary democracy. Or so it appeared until the return of the Conservative government of Mrs Margaret Thatcher to power in June 1983, because since then it has concentrated on reducing the powers of the boroughs and counties and even decided to end the very existence of seven "metropolitan counties."

With the steamroiler majority in the House of Commons which the Thatcher administration enjoys, it is carrying out its policy of clipping the wings of the borough councils and councils and axing the metropolitan authorities, so that by the time the next general election is held in 1988, these seven metropolitan authorities will have ceased to exist and the borough councils will be more or less tools in the hands of the central government in Whitehall.

There is little doubt that the Tory government has come to adopt a hard line because of the running fight during the last five or six years between the central government and the borough councils (and the county councils) where they are led by the Labour Party, as in many cases especially in northern and north-eastern England. But what brought matters to a head was the arrival on the political firmament of Ken Livingstone, the young left winger, who was elected to the post of the leader of the Labour Group of the Greater London Council (the former London County Council) in May 1981.

Within a month of his election, Livingstone began to openly defy Whitehall. As the first measure of his defiance, he announced the reduction of the fares of the bus and underground services of London transport (then under the control of the GLC) by half and increased the rates (municipal tax) levied by the GLC proportionately to compensate for the loss of revenue of London transport. This was strongly objected to by the Tory boroughs especially by the borough of Bromley (Kent) which challenged in the High Court the rise in the GLC rates. When it lost the case in the High Court, Bromley took it to the House of Lords, the final court of appeal and won it, so that the GLC had perforce to reduce the fares to their original level and then reduce them to modest levels as agreed with the central minister of transport, much to the chagrin of Mr Livingstone and his associates.

Meanwhile, Livingstone started challenging the authority of the central government or asserting his financial independence on another front by giving large or handsome grants and subsidies to all sorts of fringe organisations, much to the annoyance of the Tories at local levels and especially at Westminster. According to the Tories, it was intolerable and undesirable to have in their midst councils which are politically opposed to the ideology and practices of the Conservative Party.

But not only Tory politicians but also ordinary or lower middle income groups felt that the increases in rates levied by the Labour-controlled boroughs or counties had increased the burden on the ordinary people and it was about time that this age-old power of the municipal authorities was curbed. Indeed, this principle of "rate-capping," like the principle of the abolition of the GLC had found an important place on the manifesto on which the Conservative Party won the general election of 1983.

Margaret Thatcher

Therefore, after the election Mrs Thatcher's ministers undertook to introduce legislation imposing "rate capping," that is financial legal limits on the increases in rates which borough councils or county councils can make. This Act was passed by Parliament just before Christmas and in February, the secretary of state for the environment laid down actual limits of rate rises for each individual borough or county council.

Throughout January and February, most Labour-controlled borough councils or county councils made loud noises proclaiming their determination to defy the government's rate-capping diktat—9 March was observed as a "day of action" to protest against rate capping and the government's assaults on local democracy and in keeping with the pledges taken on that day, some "ultraleft" councils (such as Islington, Hackney and Harinvey in London) have announced their intention to refuse to fix any rate at all so as to bring their local administrations to a standstill.

However, the Rate Capping Act gives the secretary of state for the environment wide powers. Using these, he can "surcharge" (that is, impose fines personally on councillors) or declare them bankrupt and thus debar them from holding public office or send municipal commissioners from Whitehall to administer the finances of the borough councils. In the face of these threats, several Labour councils have already given in and even the GLC, led by Ken Livingstone, had to abandon the fight and on 10 March it fixed a rate slightly below the limit set by the government ("rate capping ceiling") of five per cent over last year.

Meanwhile, it is important to remember that for generations the Conservatives whether in the urban boroughs or the "shire counties" (agricultural counties) have proclaimed themselves to be firm defenders of local democracy. Therefore, during the last two years many of them have watched with growing apprehension the battles in the House of Commons and the House of Lords over the Thatcher government's legislation. During the debates on the Bills to abolish the GLC and to impose "rate capping," Tory stalwarts like Edward Heath and Enoch Powell made passionate speeches opposing those Bills, so that the Thatcher government could secure their adoption only with small majorities.

This unease over the threat to local democracy in the minds of the Conservatives especially in the land owning belts still continues. At the back of their minds is the fear that a future Labour government can take a leaf from the Thatcher book and enact legislation curtailing or clipping drastically the landed classes' age old powers or privileges and thus their hard won local democracy might eventually wither away.

Peter Pendsay, London

Indian Sahibs in England

A Raj nostalgia in reverse is now taking place. For all the passages to India, there are a few passages to England as well. One such is the gorgeously illustrated Indian in Britain: The Indian contribution to the British Way of Life by Kusoom Vadgama and published by Robert Royce Ltd., London (distributed by UBS Publishers Distributors Ltd). This coffee-table book—though it is so by the very nature of its subject—is a pictorial record of Indians in England during the years of the Raj: 1952 to 1947. The photographs aptly illustrated by excerpts, largely from commentaries which appeared in The Times, especially its court and social pages, the Illustrated London News and the Graphic Chronicle detail the activities of the Indians in Britain during this epoch and their impact on British life, high and low. "The establishment of the day, the politics of the time, the society of the period, the sports of the season were all enriched by the Indian connection," writes the Indian expatriate writer.

Ms Vadgama states quite unequivocally that her intent in depicting how bright and essential the jewel in Britain's crown was an answer, in part, to the "one-side view of imperial history...The tide of anti-immigration and racial feelings must be checked by a considered reappraisal of the services rendered to Britain by noble, if unremembered, men and women of India."

Although, there are more about kings in the book, the section on Queen Victoria, Kaiser-i-Hind, is fascinating in its portrayal of her world with its many Indian servants. The great white mother across the seas, who never managed to visit the jewel in her vast empire, depended to a fairly large extent on her servants for knowledge of their homeland and often for advice on matters of policy. One of the most compelling photographs shows the Empress seated at her desk covered with an Indian table cloth studying Hindustani in the Garden Cottage, Balmoral in 1895. Beside her stands Munshi Abdul Karim, her teacher.

Prominent in the galaxy of the stars are, of course, the Maharajas. Gaekwar of Baroda, the maharaja of Cooch Behar, Gwalior, Bikaner. There are the cricketing noblemen too: Maharaja Ranjitsinhji and the Nawab of Pataudi. The first Indian Members of Parliament, Mahatma Gandhi and Pandit Nehru are also there. Appropriately enough, there are two forewords to the book one by the Prince of Wales and the other by Indira Gandhi.

Cooking Up Tales

Coffee-table India is still in vogue, it would seem, by the number of glossy books being churned out. Seasons of Splendour: Tales, Myths, and Legends From India, a large, glossy and beautifully illustrated book written by Madhur Jaffrey and illustrated by Michael Foreman is a collection of children's stories. These are not the usual dry fairy tales. The book is in a way the childhood revisited of Madhur Jaffrey, the talented actress who became even more famous with her cookery books and television programmes in England on Indian cuisine. The stories are not retold in the didactic manner of many of the mythological tales excerpted in countless unattractive publications. The author retells them in a simple and colourful language, as they were told to her in her childhood by her mother. Recorded in the best of tradition, they retain the flavour of this tradition which is rapidly disappearing. Each story is accompanied by personal recollections from Ms Jaffrey's childhood. Published by Pavillion, this book (£7.95) will be distributed by Dass Media.

An Old Man and His Thoughts

Although A.J.P. Taylor's An Old Man's Diary is as spritely as a spring chicken and as fresh, the controversial historian's jottings begun in November 1984 are touched with a little melancholy, brought, no doubt, by the onset of the debilitating Parkinson's Disease. Example: "All my life I have used an open, or as it is called, a cut-throat razor. My hand trembles slightly. So far I have managed to steady the razor against my cheek. What am I to do if the degeneration continues? I have no idea how to use a safety razor. Let alone how to clean it. I have no faith in an electric razor. Perhaps, I should grow a beard. But I am told that growing a beard changes one's personality and I am quite content with my personality as it is..."

The diary, certainly no rantings of an old man, is a collection of items full of this irrepressible historian's idiosyncratic views on topics ranging from the Falklands War, Malcolm Muggeridge, Michael Foot, Margaret Thatcher, television, nuclear disarmament and even the art of making breakfast.

One of the more well-known pieces is from his lecture in 1981, War in our time, which has some chilling thoughts. "When the holocaust comes and destroys nearly all, have no fear. Shelters to withstand nuclear weapons were already in existence for the members of cabinet, for the chiefs of staff, for the senior civil servants, and for the outstanding scientists who have directed the mass slaughter. When the nuclear storm has passed, these superior persons will emerge from their shelters and will be able to contemplate, I hope with satisfaction, the destruction which they have brought on their fellow men."

"Oops... I forgot..."

"I think I've got it right— this time!"

"Oh no!"

"Did I? Didn't I?"

"Wait a moment..."

"I'm positive. I'm almost sure.
I think...maybe..."

The camera that works even when your memory fails!

To a lot of people, the most difficult part about photography is trying to remember not to forget!

If that's your problem, the Hot Shot 35 Auto is your camera

And what a camera this is!

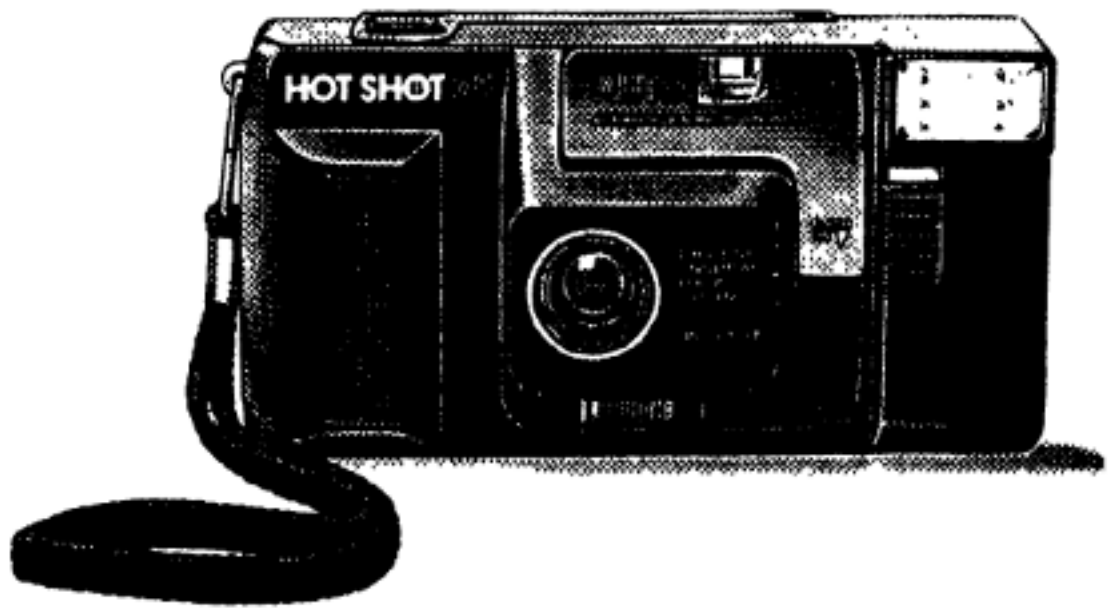
If you forget to remove the lens cap, the camera tells you so (In fact, you just can't click if the lens is covered!)

If you're never sure whether you've loaded the film correctly, here's a load off your mind An indicator tells you everything is fine

If you can never remember to switch on the flash, a red light reminds you to

If you keep forgetting to wind the camera after each frame, forget the problem The camera does it — automatically

If you never seem to be able to focus correctly, relax The camera's got the exclusive Universal Focus System



If you're never sure how to rewind the film, take it easy Just press a button — the camera does it Automatically

If you've been wishing that there was a camera that could do almost everything for you, there's a name you'll never forget

The Hot Shot 35 Auto

Believe us, the pictures are unforgettable too!

The Hot Shot 35 Auto and the other cameras in the Hot Shot range are available with your nearest dealer.

HOT SHOT 35 AUTO

Just aim. And shoot!

Photophone Limited
7, Saki Vihar Road, Bombay-400 072.

Sista's-48/85

VARIETY

THIS INDIA

Illustration: Debashis Deb

HOWRAH: Mr Abdul Bari, West Bengal's minister of state for primary education, said here on 26 February that he had detected a "ghost" primary school at Lakshmandas Lane in central Howrah, during his surprise inspection of primary schools in Howrah. According to Mr Bari, the school was supposed to have four teachers. But when he went to the school he could not find any student or teacher there—The Statesman (P. V. Seshadri, Calcutta)

WARANGAL: Even the Lord, the originator of all laws, seems to be not above them once they are laid down. Maybe, he should be taken to a police station and kept in 'protective custody' following mortals' quibbings and quarrels over His 'ownership.' On the night of 14 February, the Shivalingam in a small ruined temple on the Ramappa tank bund here was shifted by a 'group of persons.' The watchman and others at the place reported the matter to the police. The custodians of the law set out to find out the Lord's 'fate.' The local unit of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad, it is said, quietly removed the Sivalingam, in all good faith, to reinstall it at another temple. It had, of course, taken oral permission from the endowments department officials. However, as there was no written permission, the police took away the Shivalingam to the station where the Lord spent the night of 15 February—The Hindu (P. M. Irfan Ahmed, Madras)

HYDERABAD: The "shadow" man Mr M. K. Raghu of Bangalore, proved to be one of the instant hits at the World Humour Conference which concluded here on 12 February. Playing with the shadows of his hands and even his head, Mr Raghu sent the audience into peels of laughter when he created images of popular figures like Mahatma Gandhi, Winston Churchill with his famous pipe and Chhatrapati Shivaji, priests and even animals within seconds—The Times (C. P. Rao, Hubli)

KEONJHAR: Marriage still has its charms for him, "after tying the knot 88 times," claims 61-year old Udayanath Dakhinaray of Orali village in Orissa. At present, he has five wives living with him, 59 of them have deserted him and 24 others have died. The six-footer is looking forward to 'having more brides'—Indian Express (Rishi Ranjan, Bombay)

BANDA: Even a snake bite did not deter a voter from casting his vote. When a middle-aged voter went to cast his vote at a polling station in village Baghalwari under Man Vidhan Sabha constituency on 2 March, a snake came out of a ballot box and bit him. Undeterred by this the voter exercised his franchise. Later, medical aid was given to him—The Times of India (B.B.L. Sharma, New Delhi)

BANGALORE: Four mothers were presented an award of Rs 500 and conferred the title "Veera Thai" for begetting ten or more children at the hands of Jagadguru Sri Jayendra Saraswati Swamigal of Kanchi Kamakoti Peetam at the Kumarakottam temple in Kanchipuram near Madurantakam. Six other mothers were given an award of Rs 100. The award was instituted by the Hindu Munnani—Sunday Herald (T.V. Krishnan, Bangalore)

BAREILLY: A piquant situation developed in Cantonment Assembly constituency here, when the rebel Congress(I) candidate, Mr Asfaq Ahmed, paraded his symbol, a lion, with a view to attracting large crowds. The lion, which was carried in a cage, disrupted one of the meetings addressed by the Congress(I) MP, Mrs Abida Ahmed. The meeting could be held only after the district authorities intervened and removed the animal from the scene—Indian Express (V. Barathi, Madras)

BARODA: A couple here decided to withdraw their petition for divorce after seeing the Hindi film, Pyar Jhukta Nahin. The divorce proceedings had been going on for a long time, but the judge felt that both husband and wife still seemed to care for each other. He suggested they see the film before he delivered the final verdict. The couple saw the film and subsequently decided to withdraw the case—The Telegraph (Jiten Das, Goalpara, Assam)

WITHOUT COMMENT

I am against mixing religion with politics. They do not make a good cocktail—Ramakrishna Hegde in Debonair

Rajiv Gandhi is an idealist, it shows. It is time idealism came back to politics...that is why people like me are needed—Jayalalitha in Savvy

No person can convert his state into an island and behave like a modern-day Robinson Crusoe—Srikant Verma, blaming Andhra CM, NTR, for the outbreak of riots in the state, in The Times of India

His (Srikant Verma's) mouth is as big as Raj Narain's—Advocate P. N. Lekhi, former vice-president of the Delhi unit of the BJP, in The Sunday Observer

I need not learn discipline from Mr Karunakaran (Kerala CM). I know what is discipline and what is not—R. Gundu Rao, reacting sharply to Karunakaran's remark that he was not a disciplined Congressman, in Indian Express

I have never done gimmicks. Gimmick is done by people in films—in film music rather—Ravi Shankar, when told that his experiments with Western music and musicians were seen as "gimmicks," in Weekend Review

Films are like cigarettes and alcohol. You either give them up totally or you don't—Rati Agnihotri, who is quitting films, in Filmfare

I could not have asked for a better gift in my last year as captain of India—Sunil Gavaskar, when India won the Benson and Hedges World Championship of Cricket

Padmini Kapila, the woman who starred in a number of flops and then went into hybernation has made a phoenix-like comeback. Just when producers shied away from her, she played one of her aces: she 'hooked' director Prakash Mehra. The 'affair' worked wonders for Padmini and within months she bought a flat close to Mehra's bungalow and started moving around in an imported car. She even launched a film and Meetha Zehar has become an instant hit after it was released recently. All's well that ends well.

Once upon a time there was an actress called Asha Sachdev. Initially she showed promise but somewhere along the slippery sets of Hindi films she slipped and fell. In desperation she excepted whatever roles came her way and she even exposed herself more than what the directors wanted her to reveal. But with age such roles too have become scarce. Now she spends most of her time writing Urdu poetry, perhaps, to give vent to her frustrations.

Shatrughan Sinha has learnt lessons from bitter experiences. He tried to pose as an intellectual and make such highbrow stuff as Kalka but the film did not do well. According to the rumour mill in Bombay, he has given up his ambitions of trying to be another Satyajit Ray and is now concentrating on the usual masala films.

The much talked-about affair between Mithun Chakraborty and Sri Devi has finally ended. At least this is what Mithun has been saying. Rakesh Roshan's Jaag Utha Insaan had brought the two together and gossip magazines took over. Soon Mithun's marriage was on the rocks but better sense finally prevailed and he withdrew in time.

Mithun Chakraborty: end of an affair?

Nagesh, the undisputed hero among comedians in the south, seems to have taken Shakespeare's saying that a fool must be wise enough to play his part a bit too seriously. For, these days he never loses an opportunity to lecture on life. Even while relaxing on the sets between shots, Nagesh is always willing to oblige the more discerning.

Anuradha: less clothes, more roles

A fierce competition is underway between the southern belles, Anuradha and Jyothilakshmi: that of shedding clothes. Both are determined to outclass the other in bagging roles and the directors are clearly setting a challenge for the censor board. At the moment Anuradha has left Jyothilakshmi way behind but the latter is known for her sudden spurt just before the finish line.

Kishore Kumar does not give up so easily. His recent forays in filmmaking have flopped miserably but he has not given up hope. Why not? He makes the kind of money few Indians make. He charges a fabulous price for every song he sings. "What will he do with so much filthy lucre? It is good that he spends some of his money on his filmmaking madness. In doing that he helps so many men, women and children to make a living. A few lakhs lost is nothing lost for a man like Kishore Kumar," a friend of his says. Kishore is well-known as an eccentric and he has signed up another difficult man, Rajesh Khanna to play a leading role in the film he is planning to make.

How far can you stretch a rupee?

Just think. For less than a rupee a day, you can buy your family security and peace of mind. With New India's Domestic Insurance Package scheme.

1. Personal accident cover
2. Hospitalisation policy
3. Fire & Theft insurance
4. Electrical appliances breakdown
5. T.V set damage
6. Pedal cycle insurance
7. Baggage loss cover
8. Personal liabilities

Today, a rupee will perhaps buy you half an ice-cream Half a soft drink Maybe three or four cigarettes.

But not much more

Yet, for the same amount you can secure your home and family against a range of mishaps that could leave you financially shattered

For less than a rupee a day, our Domestic Insurance Package scheme safeguards your family in 8 vital areas

Depending on the type of cover you find most suitable this package scheme gives you all the security you need

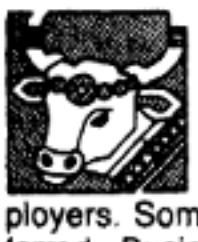
For less than it takes you to buy your child an ice-cream, everyday, you'll be buying your family so much more

Call or write to your nearest New India office We'll be glad to give you complete details

NEW INDIA ASSURANCE

A subsidiary of the General Insurance Corpn. of India

So much security. For so little.



Contour Ads-NIA-960f/83

BEGINNING 24 MARCH 1985 by AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) The stars shine brightly on the financial front and most of you will be able to repay your debts. This is an excellent week for professionals and businessmen. If you are in love and intend to get married, this is the opportune time to do so. The domestic front, however, will bother you. Avoid disputes with your friends and relatives. Watch your health closely

Good dates: 25, 27 and 29
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 4
Favourable direction: South-west

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) Misfortunes are in store for all of you Professionals are likely to come in for severe criticism from their employers. Some of you may even be transferred. Businessmen should be wary of deception. At home you may be misunderstood by someone close to you. Lovers are advised to postpone marriage or adventurous plans.

Good dates: 24, 26 and 28
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: North

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) This is a week of mixed fortunes. Those in service will find the period extremely favourable. Businessmen, however, are advised not to take up risky ventures. At home things will remain peaceful. Your financial prospects are also bright. Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans. A letter will bring good tidings Keep a close watch on your health and diet

Good dates: 27, 29 and 30
Lucky numbers: 5, 6 and 8
Favourable direction: East

CANCER (15 July—14 August) This week you may suddenly fall sick consult a doctor at the slightest indication of illness. Social engagements will keep you busy throughout the week but do not overstrain yourself The financial front looks inspiring but avoid extravagance. Businesmen and politicians should make the most out of this favourable period. Lovers will make steady progress.

Good dates: 24, 25 and 28
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: North-west

LEO (15 August—14 September) Friends and relatives will be of immense help to you this week. A journey which you were looking forward to is in the offing A promotion cannot be ruled out for those employed in the private sector. Women are likely to receive expensive gifts of jewellery and clothing. This is also a good phase for marriage negotiations. But do not neglect your health.

Good dates: 26, 27 and 28
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: South-east

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) Professionals will be called upon to shoulder more responsibilities: do not hesitate to accept challenging assignments. This is also a good phase for creative artists and students Sportsmen will come out with flying colours in competitions The period is also good for love and matrimonial negotiations Your health will improve markedly.

Good dates: 28, 29 and 30
Lucky numbers: 4, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: West

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) The stars shine brightly on all your efforts this week, so make hay while the sun shines. Students will get opportunities to study abroad. Businessmen should not hesitate to implement expansion plans. A promotion or a posting to a better place cannot be ruled out for those in service. This is the opportune time to get married.

Good dates: 25, 27 and 28
Lucky numbers: 5, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: South

SCORPIO (15 November-14 December) This is not a favourable phase for lovers: a misunderstanding may lead to estrangement The domestic front will add to your worries avoid arguments and deal with those at home diplomatically You may have to borrow money to tide over this lean season. This is, however, a good period for professionals A letter will relieve you of a lot of tension

Good dates: 26, 28 and 29
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: North

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) There is good news for those of you who are unemployed a job is in the offing This week you will come in contact with an influential person. The home front will remain inspiring. For bachelors this is the ideal time to get married or start marriage negotiations. Those above 45 should be careful about their health.

Good dates: 24, 26 and 27
Lucky numbers: 3, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North-east

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) Do not get frustrated at the slow pace of progress on all fronts. Professionals and businessmen are advised to exercise caution in all their dealings New opportunities are in the offing for students and creative artists. If you have legal problems concerning property, this is the right time to pursue them. This is also a favourable period for marriage.

Good dates: 24, 27 and 29
Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: South

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) On the domestic front you will have to shoulder additional responsibilities. On the economic front some of you will gain money or property through inheritance. Professionals will make steady headway. Businessmen should utilise opportunities that come their way. Lovers can go ahead with marriage plans. Keep a sharp eye on your health and diet

Good dates: 24, 26 and 27
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: North

PISCES (15 March—14 April) A week of hectic social activity lies ahead of you A new friendship which will blossom this week will be of immense help to you later However, the period is not good for those in service someone is working to harm you. Businessmen should check all documents carefully before signing them Those above the age of 50 should be careful about their health.

Good dates: 25, 28 and 30
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 9
Favourable direction: North-west

For those born on the 25th, 26th or 27th of any month:

Most of you are artistically inclined and you will do well if you take up the creative arts as your profession. You are gregarious by nature and you love to be surrounded by friends and relatives. Some of you have an inborn adventurous spirit and you do not hesitate to take risks. Women born during this period are usually very hard-working and they love to shoulder responsibilities.

VARIETY

CHESS

A learned philosopher of the game once observed that there are two types of chessplayer, problem solvers and problem setters. The latter voluntarily dig themselves into a hole so that they can then try to dig their way out again, whereas the former prefer to leave the mental archaeology to the opposition.

Czech grandmaster Vlastimil Hort is a model problem setter, always willing to create difficulties for himself if in doing so he can also create difficulties for his opponent. The following is a typical example in which the position only starts to crystallise when Black has already gone astray

White: V. Hort. Black: B. Zuger. King's Indian Defence. Biel 1984.

1 P–Q4	N–KB3	2 P–QB4	P–KN3
3 N–QB3	B–N2	4 P–K4	P–Q3
5 KN–K2

Typical of Hort, leaving well-trodden paths at an early stage to give his opponent every opportunity of losing his way.

Zuger (Black)

Hort (White) to move

5 . . .	P–QR3	6 N–N3	P–B3
7 P–B4	P–QN4	8 P–K5	KN–Q2
9 B–K3	N–N3	10 P–QB5	PxBP
11 PxP	N–Q4	12 Q–Q2

At first glance a surprising decision not to exchange knights, but after 12 NxN PxN followed by . . . N–B3 Black stands well.

12 . . .	B–K3	13 B–Q3	R–R2
14 NxN	BxN	15 B–K4	R–Q2
16 Q–QB2	P–QR4	17 P–KR4!

Revealing tactical skill to achieve positional ends. If 17 . . . P–KR4 18 BxP! PxB 19 QxP+ K–B1 20 P–K6.

17 . . .	P–B4!	18 BxB	RxB
19 P–R5	P–K3	20 N–K2	N–R3
21 P–R3	R–Q6?

Succumbing to the pressure of having to maintain a delicate equilibrium. Correct was 21 . . K–B2

22 K–B2	PxP	23 QR–Q1	RxR
24 RxR	Q–R5+	25 K–N1	N–B2
26 N–Q4	N–Q4	DIAGRAM
27 NxKP!

Knocking the props out of Black's position. If 27 . . NxB 28 NxB+ K–B1 29 NxBP!

27 . . .	Q–N5	28 RxN!	PxR
29 P–B6	P–KR5	30 P–B7	K–Q2
31 N–Q8!	RxN	32 P–K6+	Resigns.

After 32 . . K–B1 33 PxR=Q+ KxQ 34 Q–B6 mate is inevitable.

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE

A writer in the French magazine raises a point about the following hand that is worth considering. When you are missing the queen of the trump suit, or perhaps a combination such as ace and jack, can you draw an inference from the fact that the opening lead is in a side suit? There is, I suppose, a slight inference that if he chooses another suit his hand may include an 'awkward' holding in trumps. The theory was advanced (unsuccessfully) in connection with the following deal:

Dealer South Game all

♠ K J 9 3
♥ 10 8 7
♦ Q 8 6 3
♣ A 6

	N
♠ 4 2	W E	♠ Q 6 5
♥ J 9 5 2		♥ Q 6 4
♦ 10 7 4	S	♦ A J 5
♣ Q J 9 3		♣ 10 8 4 2
	♠ A 10 8 7
	♥ A K 3
	♦ K 9 2
	♣ K 7 5

South opened 1NT and North produced the old Stayman, as players do. So they finished in Four Spades. With 10 points distributed over three suits it is more sensible just to raise to 3NT. 'The 4-4 major will probably be worth an extra trick', people say. Maybe, but to make ten tricks in notrumps instead of eight in a suit, you need two extra tricks

West led ♣Q against Four Spades. Putting his theory into practice, South won in hand, then led ace and another spade, finessing against the opening leader. East won and did well to switch to hearts. Now the defence made a heart trick before South could do anything with the diamonds.

More Deadly than the Male, by Rixi Markus, and Aunt Agatha Plays Tournament Bridge, by Freddie North, each Faber £8·95 or £3·95, are both excellent Christmas purchases. I will describe them both later.

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. Soldiers of which country are called greycoats?
2. Of the seven wonders of the ancient world, only one still exists Which one?
3. With which sport do you associate the name of Meherwan Daruwala?
4. What do Voltaire, Adolph Hitler, Jawaharlal Nehru, Marco Polo and O Henry have in common?
5. The title Caesar was given to the heir presumptive to the Roman throne. What was the Roman emperor called?
6. In parliamentary language, what is a Call of the House?
7. How is ancient Cambria better known as?
8. What is Davy Jones' locker?
9. What are field pieces?
10. Klaus Altmann was the assumed name of which recently apprehended Nazi criminal?
11. What do the following have in common: cirrus, cumulus, stratus and cumulonimbus?
12. Where is O'Hare airport?
13. What is P C.P. better known as?
14. Where does the International Court of Justice of the United Nations meet?
15. The word calico is derived from the name of a place Which place?

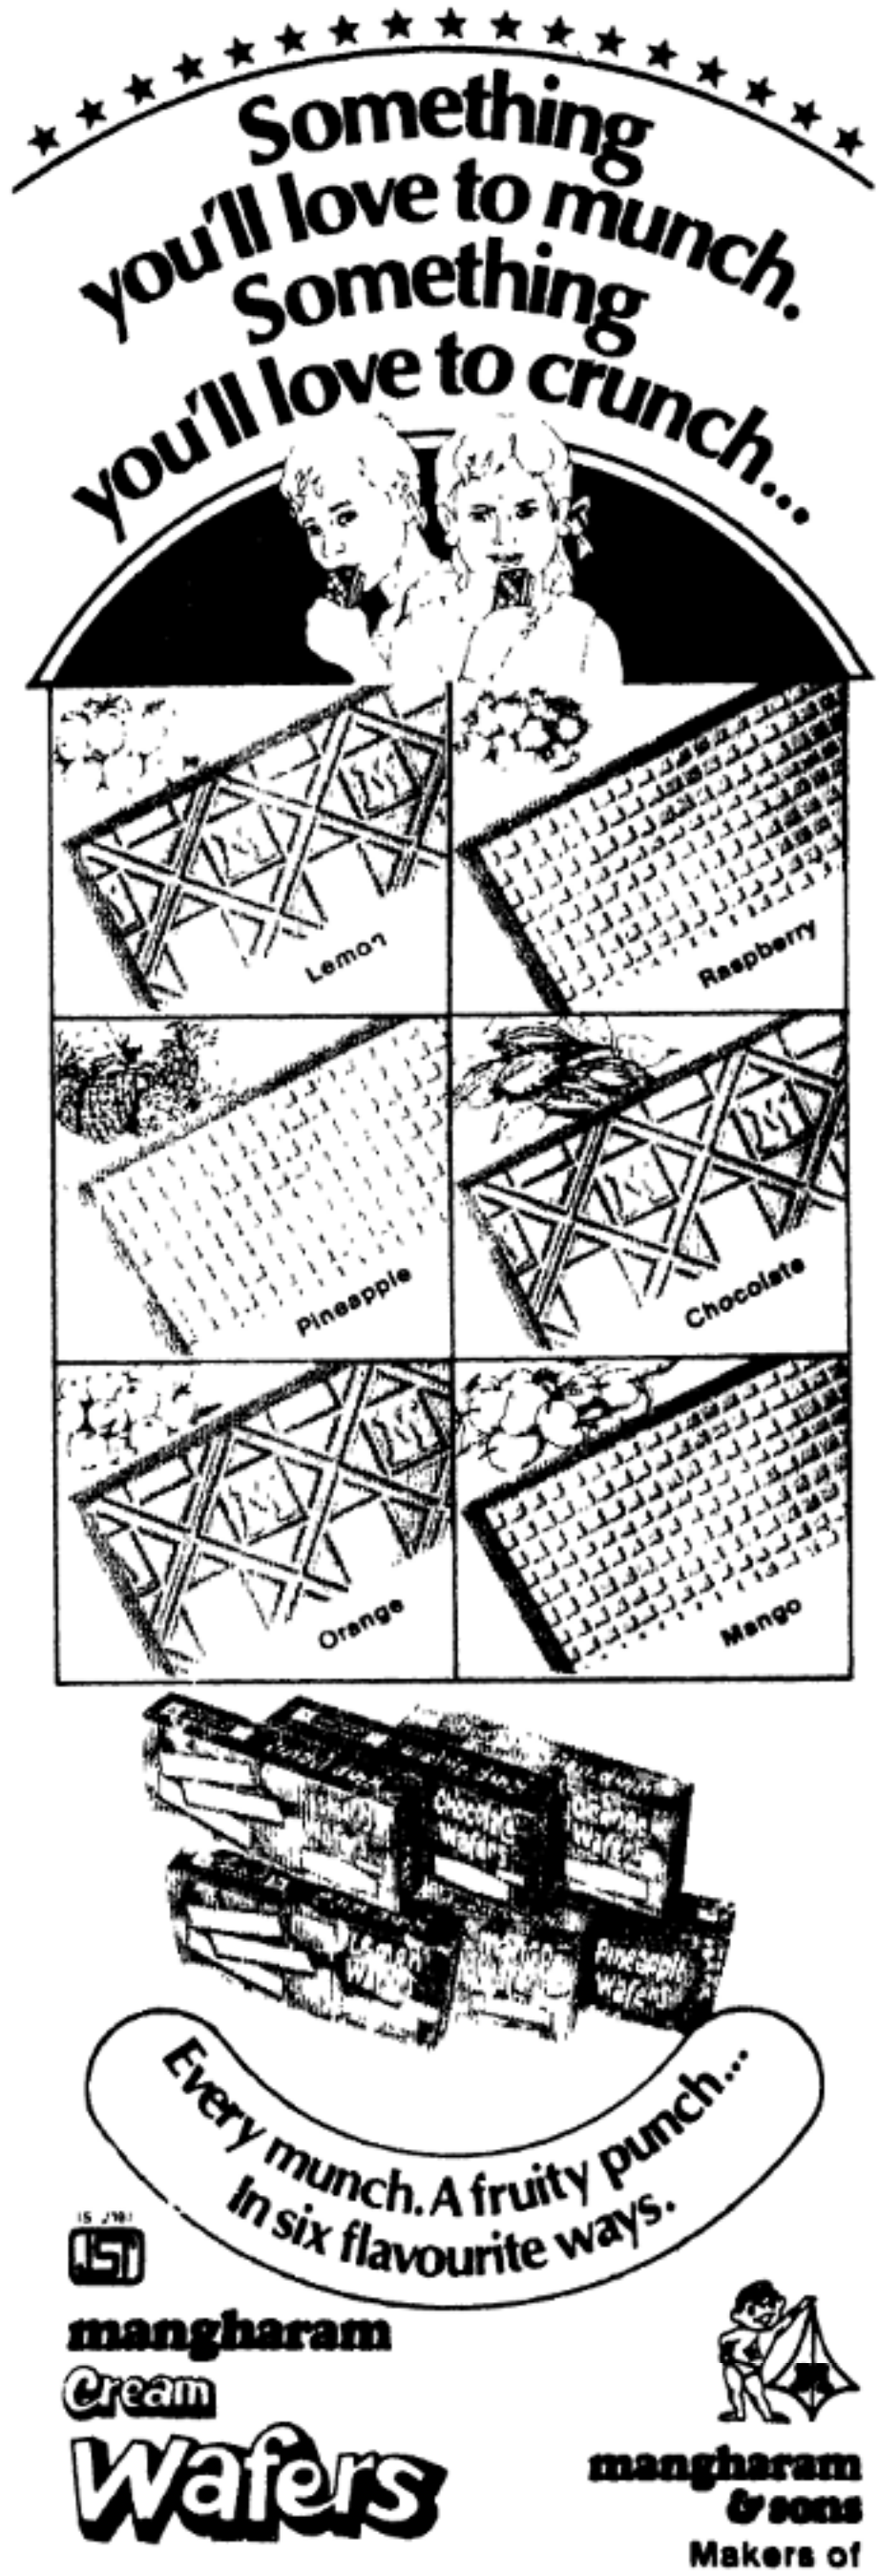
ANSWERS

1. Russia.
2. The pyramids of Giza.
3. Squash.
4. All of them have written well-known books while they were in jail.
5. Augustus.
6. An imperative summons sent to every member of Parliament to attend.
7. Wales, in England.
8. The ocean bed.
9. Cannon.
10. Klaus Barbie.
11. They are all forms of clouds
12. Chicago in the USA. It is the busiest airport in the world.
13. Angel dust, a highly powerful drug.
14. The Hague in Holland.
15. Calicut.

A Harmful Habit

For those of you addicted to pan masala, think twice before taking it again. According to a Bombay-based weekly, excessive use of this dry betelnut mixture leads to dental and digestive ailments. The patient suffers from a disease called submucous fibrosis, which, according to Dr A.P. Bhatt, professor and head of the department of oral pathology and microbiology at Nair Hospital, Bombay, is "an insidious chronic disease affecting the mucosa of any part of the oral cavity and occasionally extending into the pharynx and oesophagus, sometimes preceded by blisters." The symptoms are: restricted ability to open the mouth, a burning sensation, intolerance to normal spicy food, a change in the colour of the mucous membrane from pink to marble white and the tongue is affected—the taste buds (papillae) lose their function and become smooth, and the forward movement of the tongue gets restricted.

Lending Library on the Paris Metro

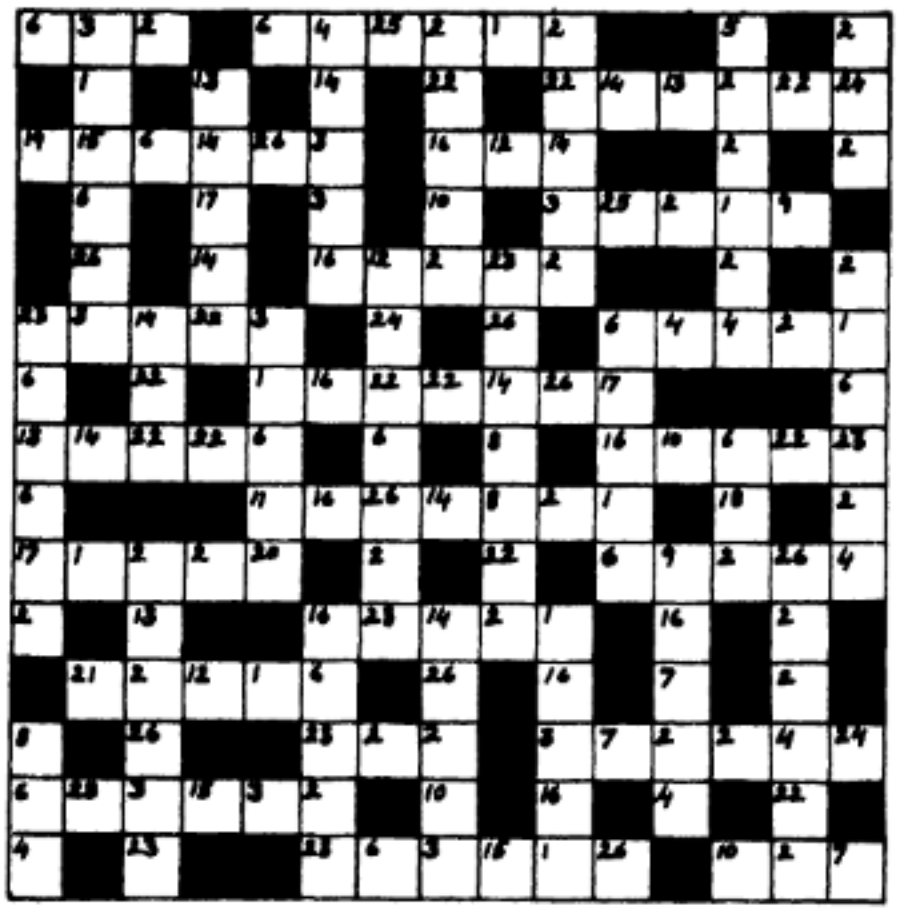


The Paris Metro has come out with a lending library, Metro Lire, which has been operating successfully for quite some time. The experiment, which has tried to open up the metro to the outside world, is the aim of the Regie Autonome des Transports Parisiens (RATP). The experiment tried in one of the stations is positive. It is to be extended to some ten others. And that is not all: the transport company is also interested in video. Some 20 receivers for video texts have already been set up in experimental stations. They present travellers with immediate information on the whole of the Paris transport network (train, metro and bus). Moreover, one train has been fitted with TV sets.

The Sweetest Substance

One of the popular, and mistaken, beliefs doing the rounds in medical circles is that when you are taking an antibiotic, you should not drink alcohol at the same time. Only one antibiotic—metronidazole, marketed as Flagyl—will make you ill if it is mixed with alcohol. You will come to no harm if you drink a little while taking any other sort.

Doctors who suggest you should abstain from this err in their judgment. If you are ill, it would be wise to cut down on drinks: alcohol will slow you down, perhaps, reduce the absorption of the antibiotic and delay your recovery. If, however, you are prescribed antibiotics from the tetracycline group do not take them with milk. The calcium in the milk will combine with the antibiotic, make the drug inactive, and stop it from being assimilated properly. The most common side-effects involve the stomach. You could contract nausea and diarrhoea.

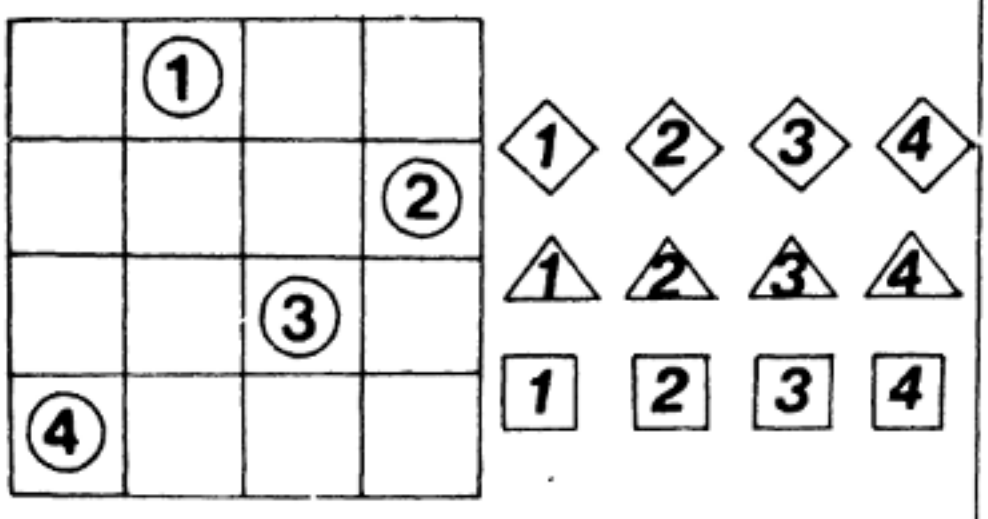


Illustrations Prabir Sen

TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

Cryptocross



1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13
R	E		D

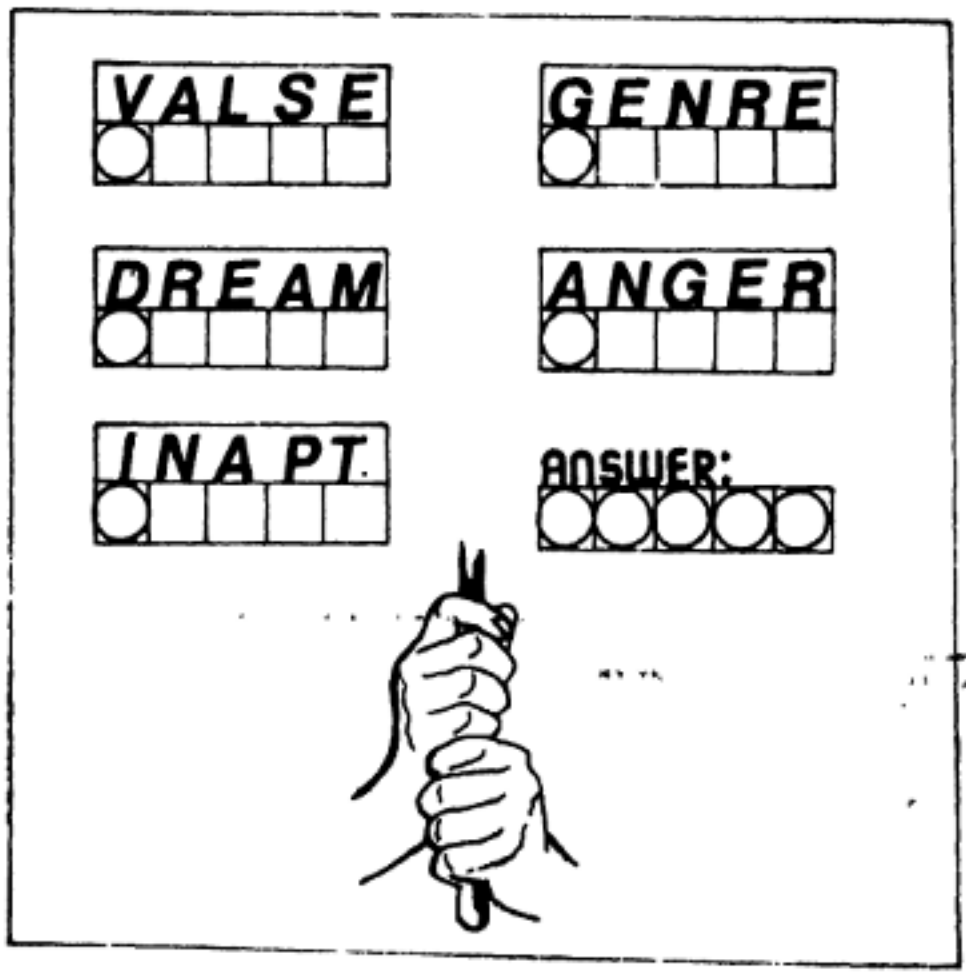
14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26

Each number in the main grid represents a letter. The same number always stands for the same letter. To help you make a start three letters have been given. Can you now substitute the rest to complete the grid?

Think Tank

Fit the numbered symbols given into the blank squares so that no two similar numbers and no two similar figures appear in any row, either vertical, horizontal or diagonal.

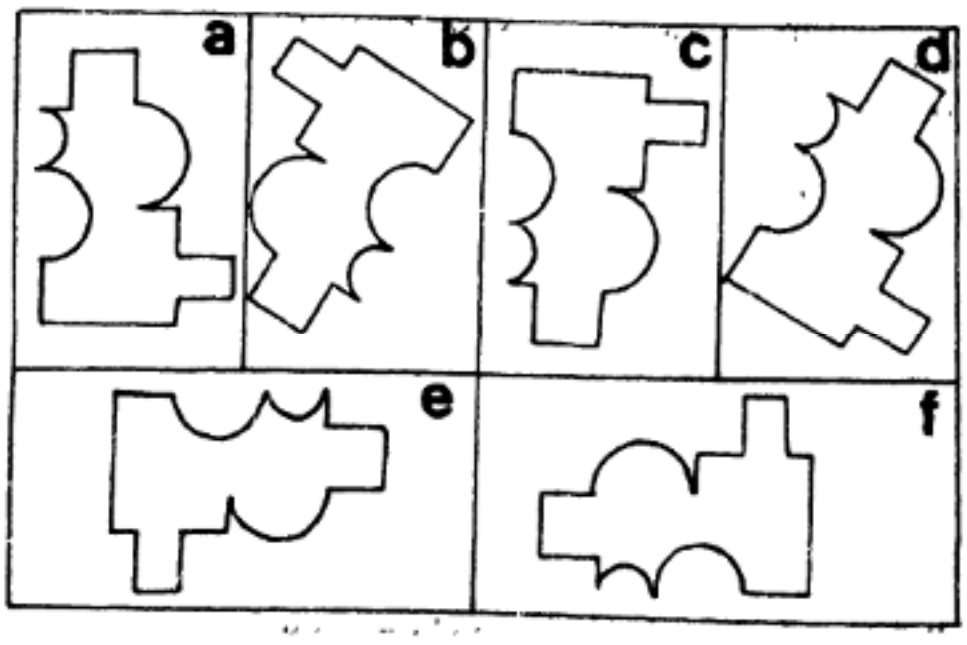
Quick Think



My grandparents married only once and my mother is an only child. My father has one more brother than he has sisters and his brothers and sisters are unmarried. My Aunt Gita has twice as many brothers as she has sisters. Without using algebra, can you tell me how many uncles and aunts I have?

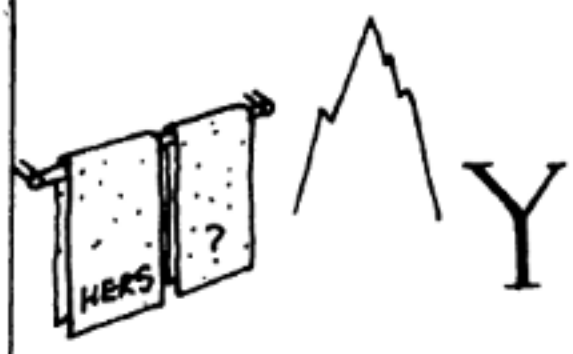
Witsharpener

Eight teenagers divided 32 apples among themselves as follows: Anu got one, Bina took two, Kaveri three and Damayanti four Nandu Sharma took as many as his sister, Piyare Lal twice as many as his sister, Gajendra Kumar three times as many as his, and Dev Rajwade four times as many as his.

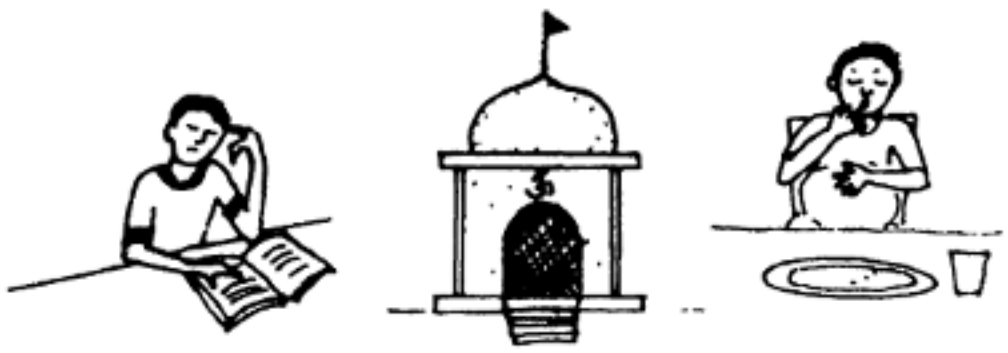


What were the full names of the girls and how many apples did each get?

Scrambles



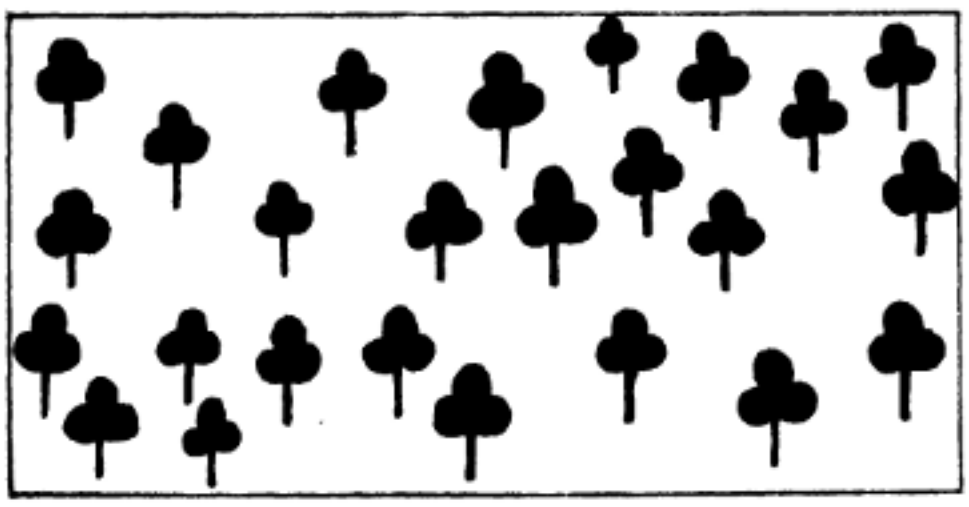
Rearrange these words to form new words. The circled letters arranged correctly will give you an idea of what the picture is about.

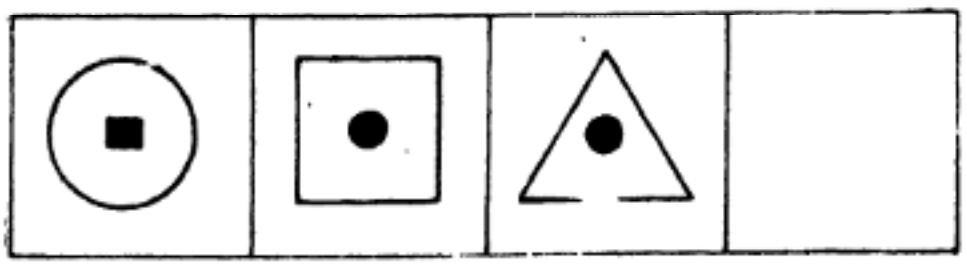


Shape Sleuth

Can you say which the odd one out is?

Wit Sharpener





What word does each picture stand for? The first one, you may have guessed, is HISTORY. Find the others.

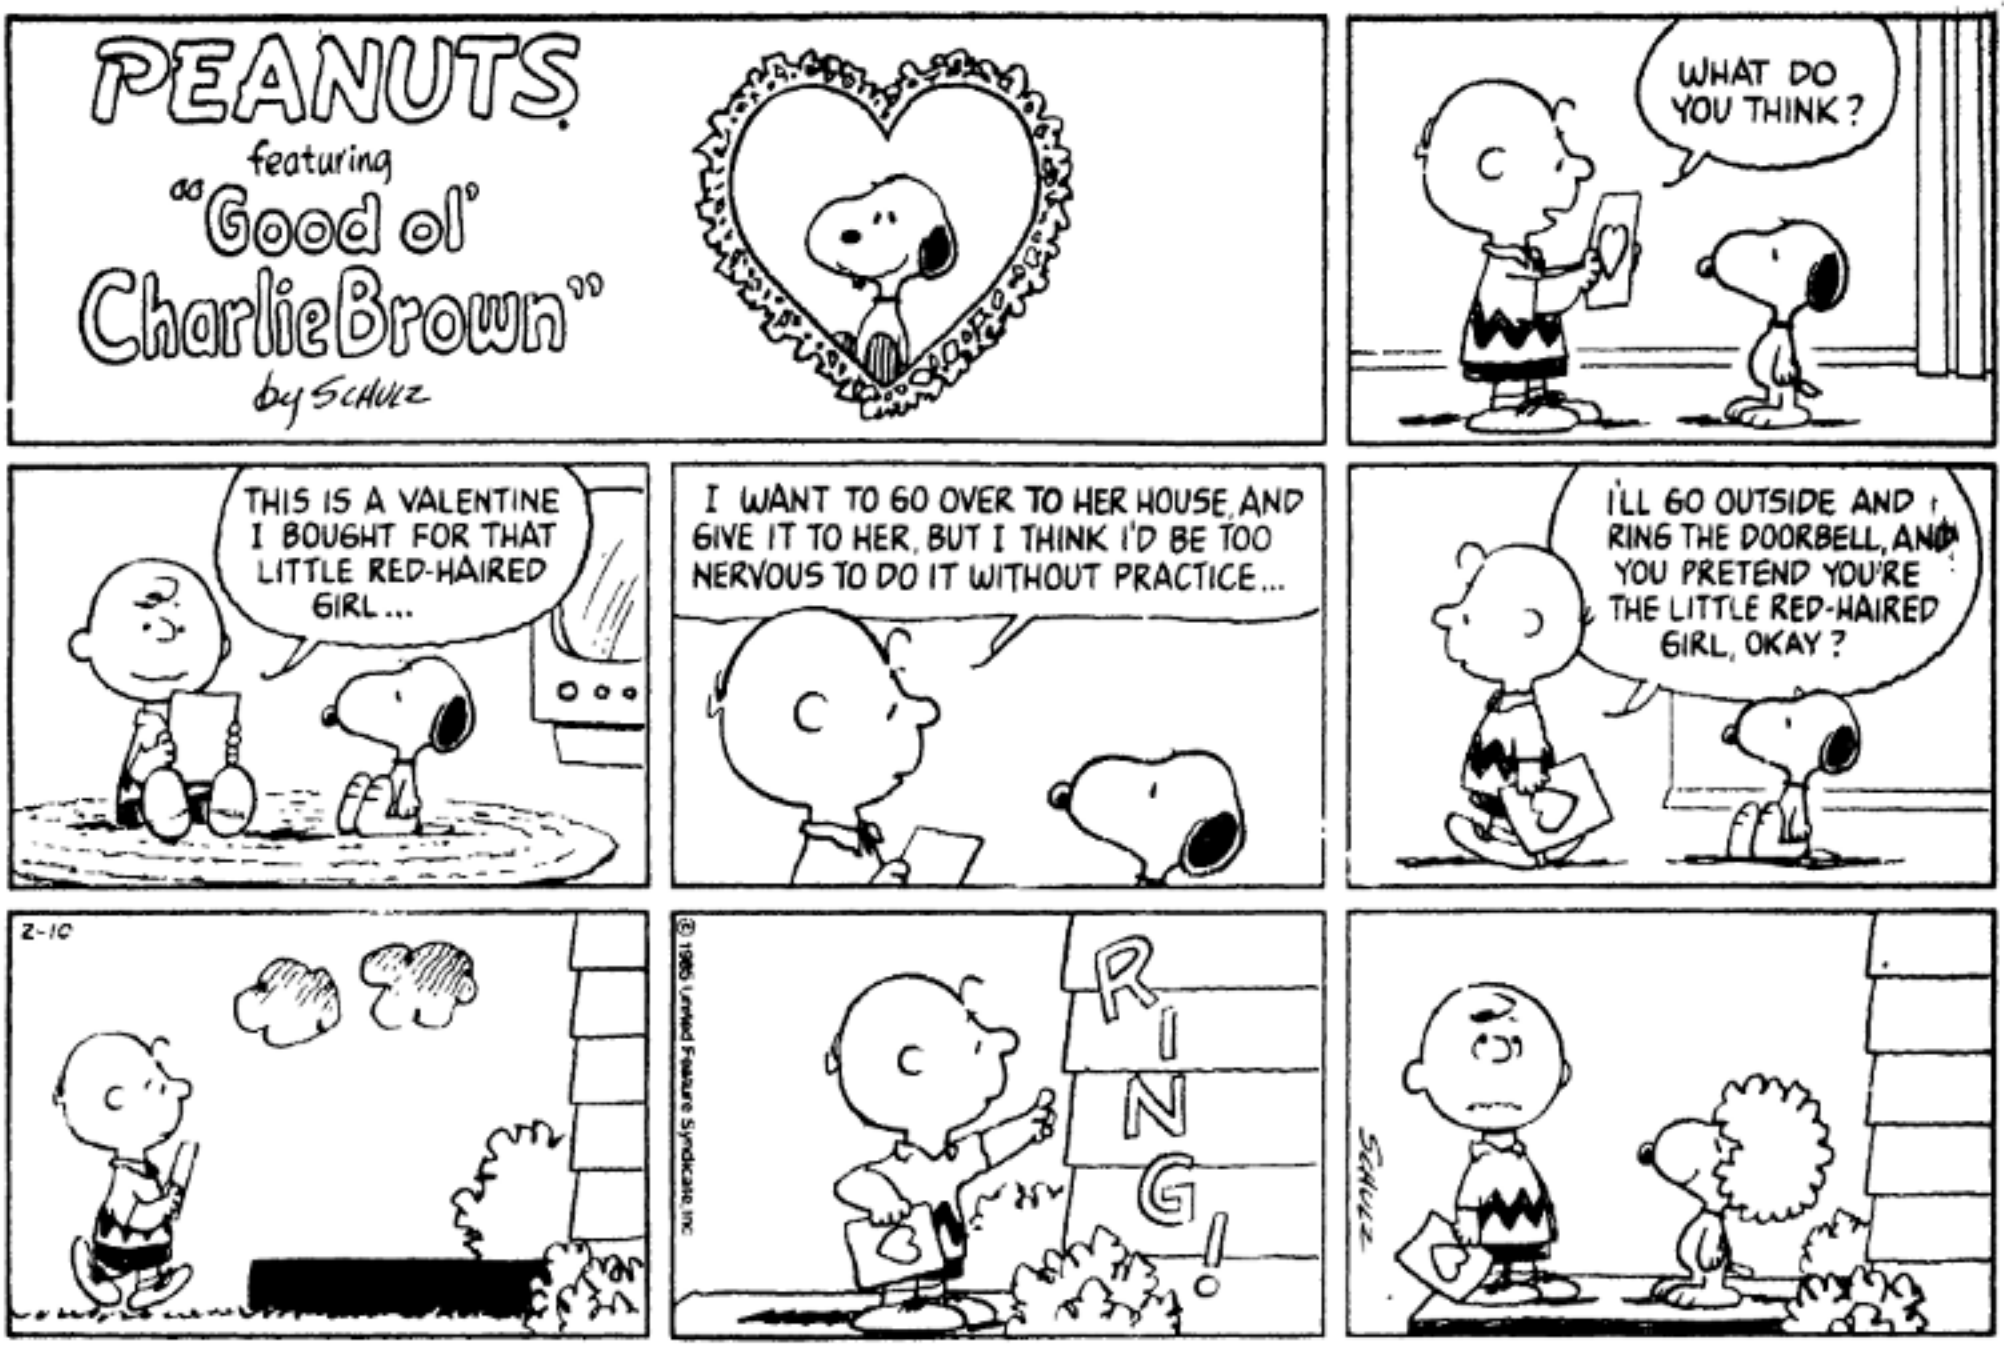
Figure it Out

Draw three straight lines so that this rectangular orchard is divided into five parts, each part containing five mango trees?

Mindbender

If A is to B as C is to D, what diagram could you draw in column D?

Solutions to last week's Teasers:



Quizbizz: 3) edible fungus
Missing Link: 22 (Subtract 6 divide by 7, subtract 5 divide by 7, subtract 4 divide by 7.

Witsharpener: Joseph: Cola and melon; Ruma: Icecream and fruitcake; Devina: Cheese sandwiches and mango; Mahesh: Channas and bread rolls.
Quick Think: Move 2 and 3 to positions 9 and 10, then 5 and 6 to 2 and 3; then 8 and 9 to 5 and 6 and finally 1 and 2 to 8 and 9

Figure it out: One of the many possibilities of combinations is:

$(9+9)-(9+9)=2$
$(9+\sqrt{9})-(9-\sqrt{9})=2$
$(9+9+9)-9=3$
$(\sqrt{9}\times\sqrt{9})-9+\sqrt{9}=4$
$9-\sqrt{9}-9-9=5$
$(9\times\sqrt{9})-9+\sqrt{9}=6$
$9-9+\sqrt{9}+\sqrt{9}=7$
$99-9-\sqrt{9}=8$
$\sqrt{9}\times\sqrt{9}-9+9=9$
$\sqrt{9}\times\sqrt{9}+9-9=10$
$99-(\sqrt{9}\times\sqrt{9})=11$
$9-\sqrt{9}-\sqrt{9}+9=12$
$9+\sqrt{9}+9-9=13$
$99-9+\sqrt{9}=14$
$(\sqrt{9}+\sqrt{9})\times\sqrt{9}-\sqrt{9}=15$
$9\div9+\sqrt{9}+\sqrt{9}=16$
$9+9-9-9=17$
$(9+9)\times9/9=18$
$9+9+9\div9=19$
$99\div9+9=20$

Word Play: What's in a name? That which we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet.

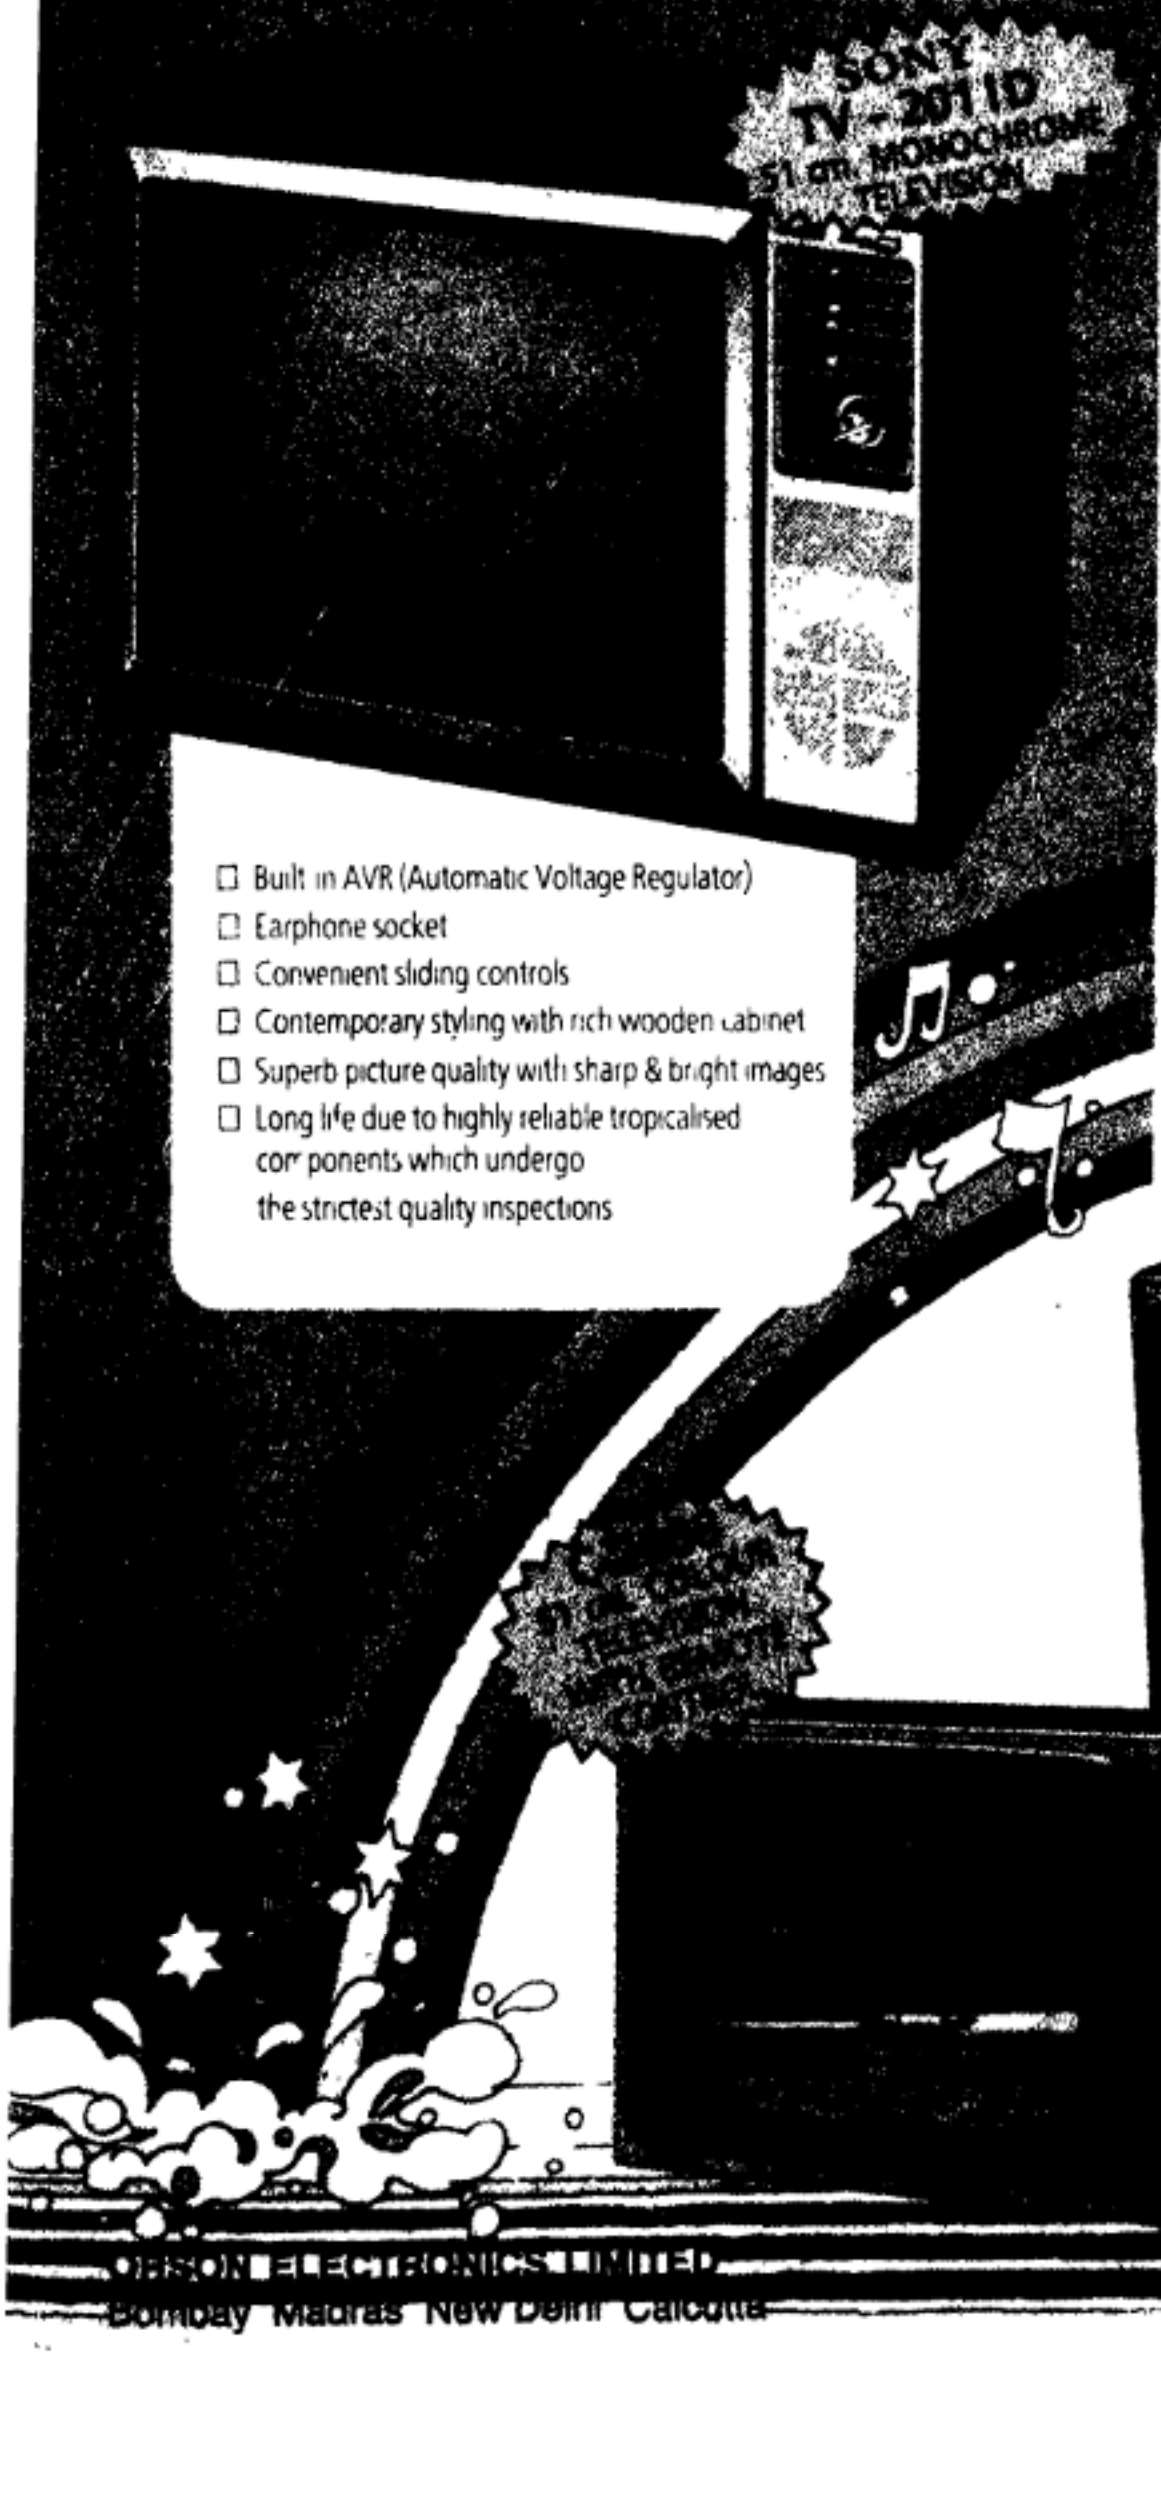
Not so young but
so strong & healthy
what is his secret?

I enjoy life more and get more work done- thanks to OKASA

Now a new powerful formula. No other tonic has it Rare herbal extracts with 18 biochemicals, vitamins & minerals. World-famous OKASA. Proven medically effective – in its special way – every day

At all leading chemists

OKASA



For a free booklet on OKASA write to

OKASA CO. PVT. LTD. Post Box No. 396, Bombay 400 001

Introducing Televisions from ORSON

BLACK AND WHITE TELEVISION

- ☐ Built in AVR (Automatic Voltage Regulator)
- ☐ Earphone socket
- ☐ Convenient sliding controls
- ☐ Contemporary styling with rich wooden cabinet
- ☐ Superb picture quality with sharp & bright images
- ☐ Long life due to highly reliable tropicalised components which undergo the strictest quality inspections

COLOUR TELEVISION

A spectacular success story
Today in India, Sony Black & White Television and Stereo Music Systems are manufactured at Orson's factory in Bombay opening new vistas in home entertainment. And Sony have chosen Orson on the basis of technical competence and service strength — both truly of international standards.

Three colour televisions
Now Orson proudly offer three state of the art colour televisions of superior quality and contemporary styling. Televisions manufactured at one of India's most modern factories, equipped with sophisticated soldering machines and instrumented assembly lines, all housed in an airconditioned dust-free environment. And rigorous tests ensure uniform quality — all this, backed by effective after-sales-service, whenever you need it.

"Linytron" circuit with space-age high performance chassis
Equipped with improved IC chips and low-noise FET, the "Linytron" High Performance chassis offers higher sensitivity, fidelity and ultra-stability when voltage fluctuates. The result is brighter and sharper colour picture quality anytime, while fewer components mean extended reliability.

Other features

- Auto search tuning system
- Quick start picture and sound.
- Built-in AFT (Automatic Fine Tuning). ADC (Automatic Degaussing Circuit) and AGC (Automatic Gain Control) for stable reception
- Stylish cabinet designs with elegant woodgrain finish.

Ask your nearest Orson dealer to give you a demonstration of Orson Colour Television — models ranging from standard colour models to sophisticated remote control master-pieces. All this and Orson after-sales-service at your beck and call.

ORSON ELECTRONICS LIMITED
Bombay Madras New Delhi Calcutta

DELHI DIARY

A Record Budget

V.P. Singh

The budget this year will create a record of sorts. Never before has the union budget been presented on a Saturday. On 16 March which is a Saturday, the stock exchanges will for the first time work on a weekend, to take stock of the budget of Vishwanath Pratap Singh. What the budget has in store is difficult to say, but by the very choice of the day, the new government's budget set a precedent.

Hotels or Dens?

Two names which have been controversial in the past few years have been those of the Galadharis of Dubai and the Hindujas of Iran. While many prosecutions were launched against the Galadharis, the Hindujas were involved in the famous Geneva payoffs engineered to please the sister of the former Shah of Iran (which were made by the government through senior officers of the intelligence outfit, RAW). Both these families have been merrily operating in India. Now both the Galadharis and the Hindujas are seeking a foothold in the hotel business. While the Galadharis want to set up their own hotel in Bombay, one member of the Hinduja clan is likely to be included in the board of directors of a prestigious chain of hotels.

Copyright or Royalty?

The much reported last speech of Indira Gandhi, delivered at Bhubaneswar a day before she was killed, could have gone unrecorded but for the tape maintained by the All India Radio. Her "last drop of blood" speech had been the main plank of the Congress(I) Lok Sabha campaign. How was this speech traced? At 11 am on 31 October, the PTI (Press Trust of India) correspondent who had accompanied Mrs Gandhi on her Orissa trip put out the quotation. Doordarshan immediately looked around for the recording, but found that the soundtrack of the video cassette was so poor that nothing could be made out. Was the quotation genuine? The PTI reiterated that its report was true. Ultimately, the AIR tape was discovered and the sound dubbed on to the Doordarshan tape. Should the PTI now ask the ruling party for copyright fees or royalty?

Wedded to Moneybags?

Is Murli Deora, the president of Bombay Regional Committee of the Congress(I) spending black-money? A Congress(I) worker from Colaba, which is a part of Murli Deora's South Bombay Lok Sabha constituency, has made an allegation to this effect in a letter to the editor published by the Navbharat Times on 27 February. The full text of the letter (translated from Hindi), reads thus:

"When during the election campaign it was alleged by the opposition that the successful Congress(I) candidate from South Bombay was a man of the capitalists, we did not believe it. But when we went to attend his niece's wedding last week our eyes were opened. Around 5,500 people had been invited for the feast and when we heard from none less than Murli Deora himself that Rs 15 lakhs had been spent on the wedding, we almost had a paralytic stroke due to shock and surprise. It is painful that the Congressmen have forgotten Mahatma Gandhi. A social worker should set an example in simple living. But our leaders seem to be setting new trends. Is expenditure of Rs 15 lakhs on a wedding permitted by law? In the wedding reception we noticed income-tax officers too. But apparently they had turned a blind eye (to such extravagance). Such an expenditure is impossible without black money. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi should curb such people, otherwise in the next elections party workers like us would not be able to show our faces to the people. After such extravagant weddings, we would not be able to convince the electorate that we are wedded to removing poverty."

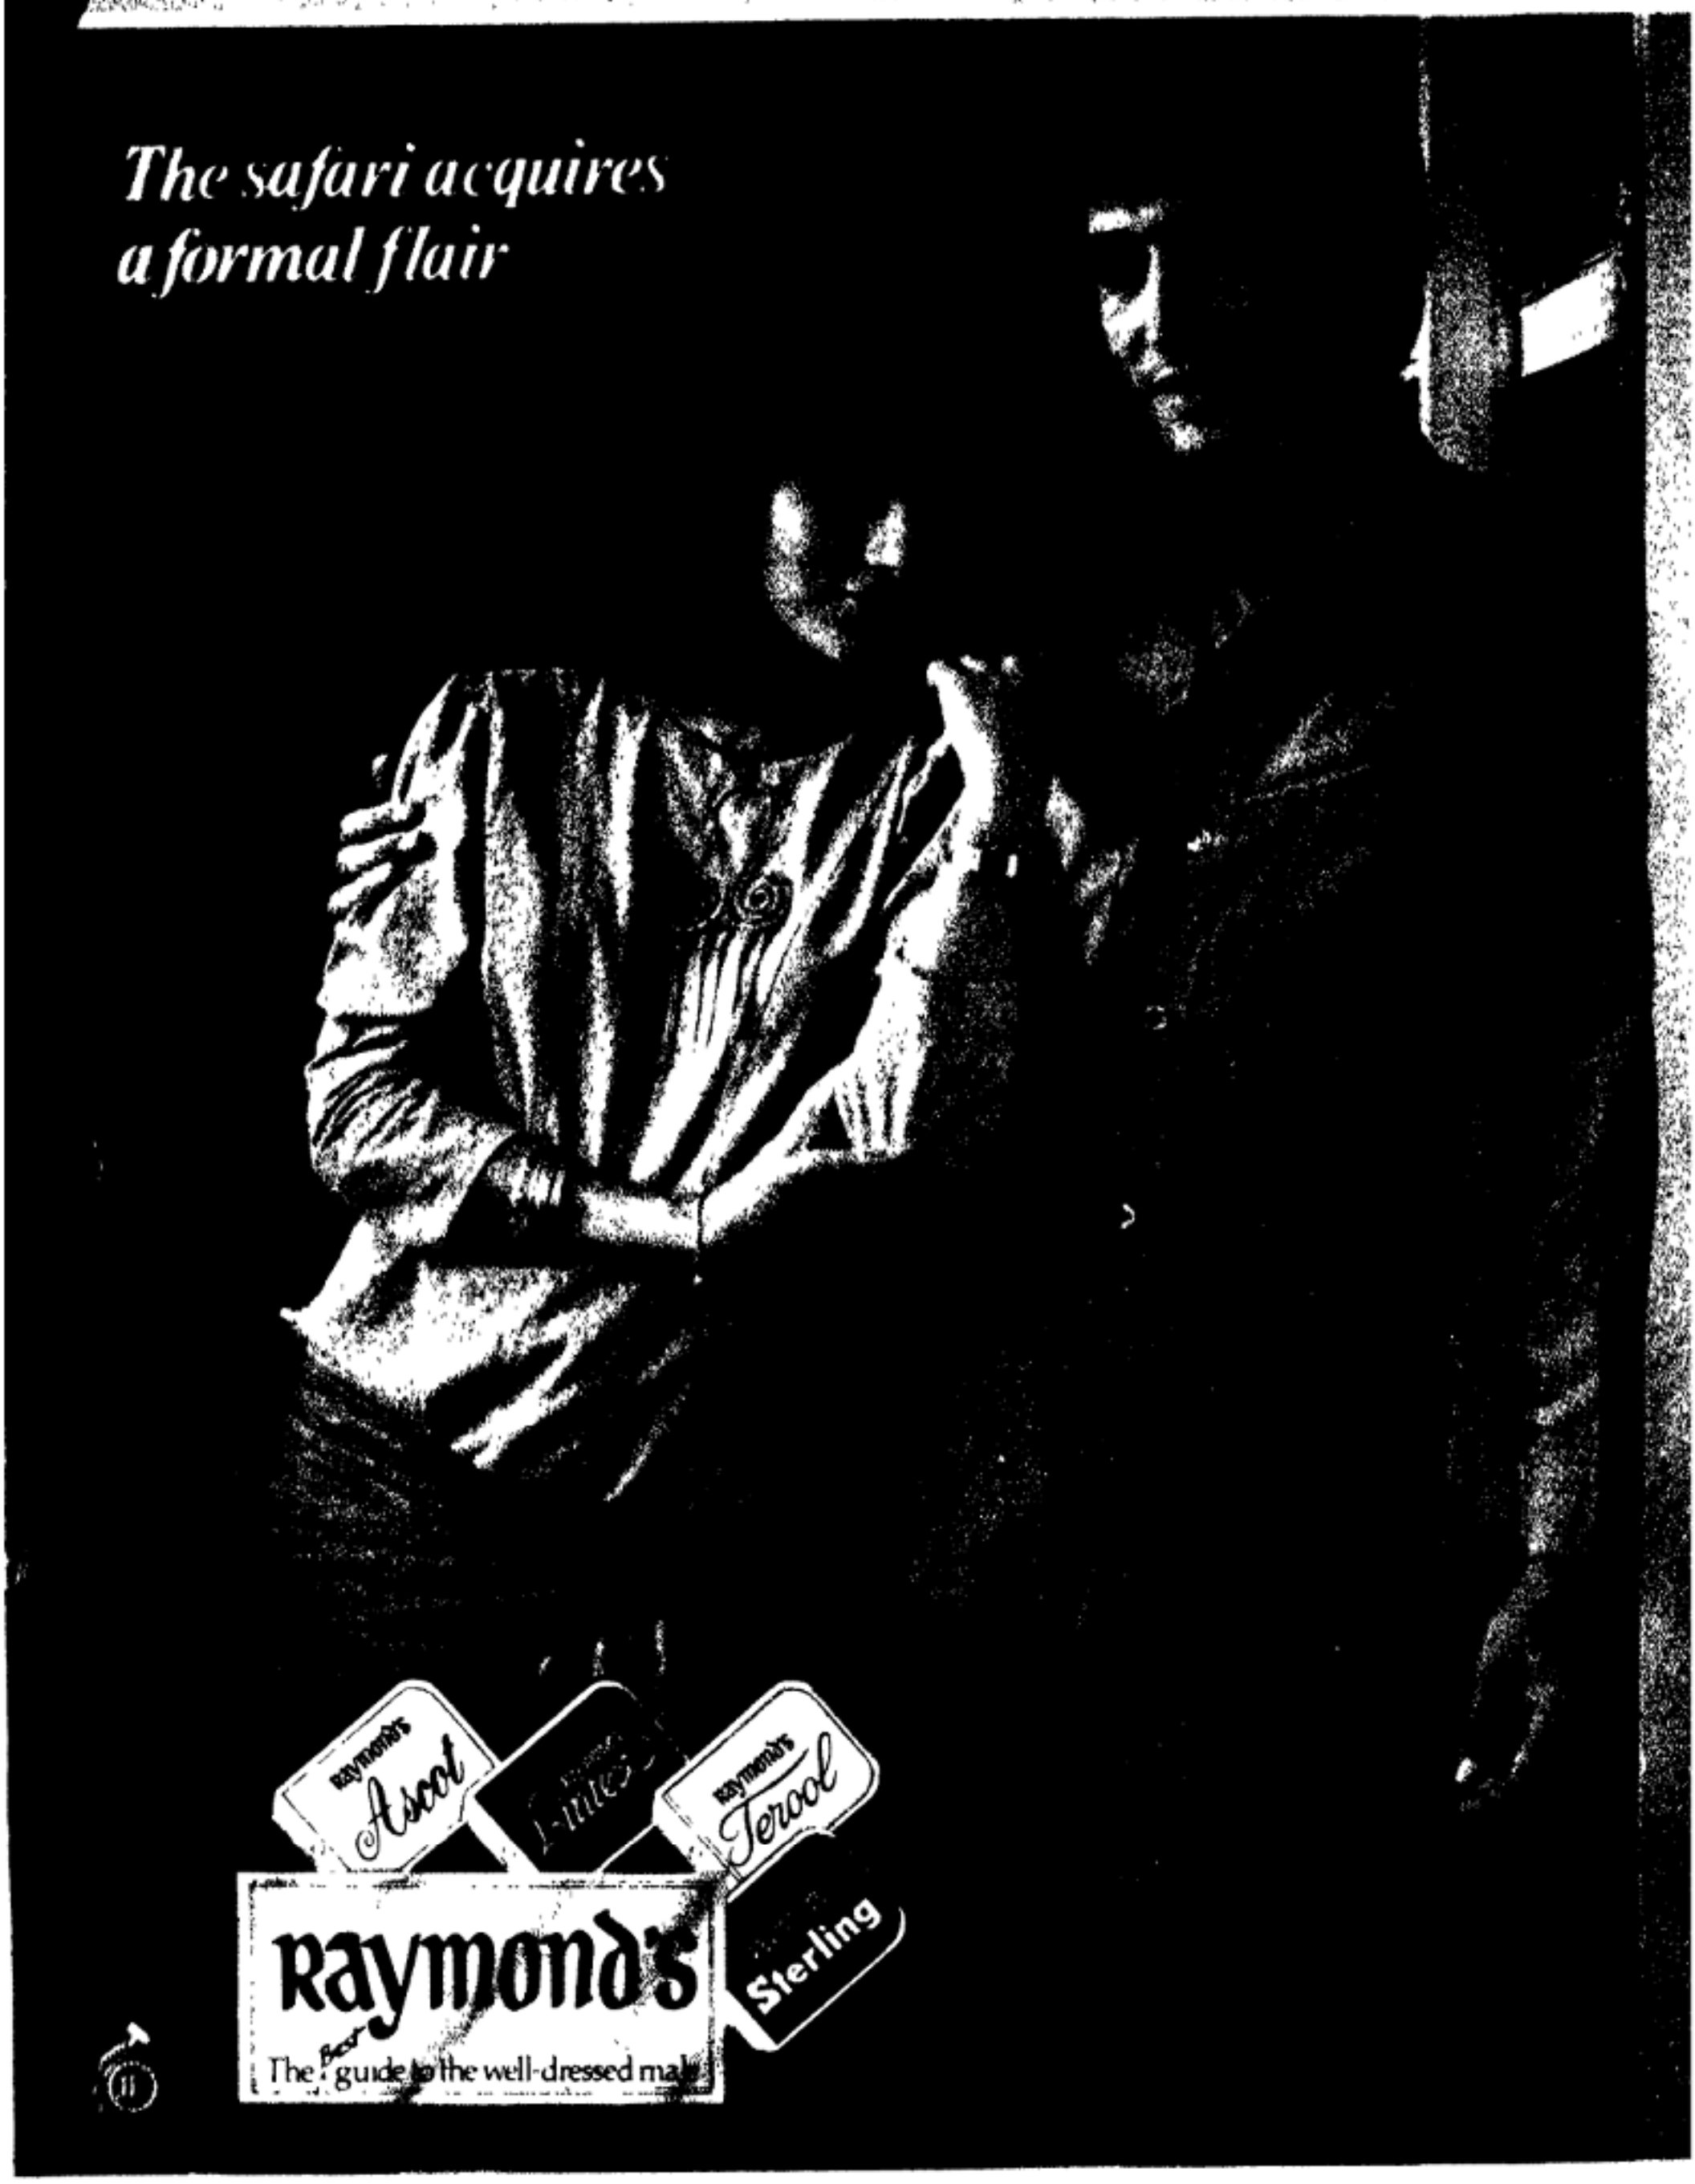
Sd/- Ramnarayan Upadhyaya, Colaba.

Murli Deora

This letter appeared in a publication of the leading Times of India group, which is widely circulated. Murli Deora had not reacted to this till the first week of March. When such grave allegations are made, should our politicians not make any clarifications? In the absence of a comment from Murli Deora, are we to believe that the statements made in the letter to the editor are true?

O.E. Nizamuddin

We've got the whole world at our feet.



NORTH STAR

It's a great feeling!

Available at select Bata & BSC stores

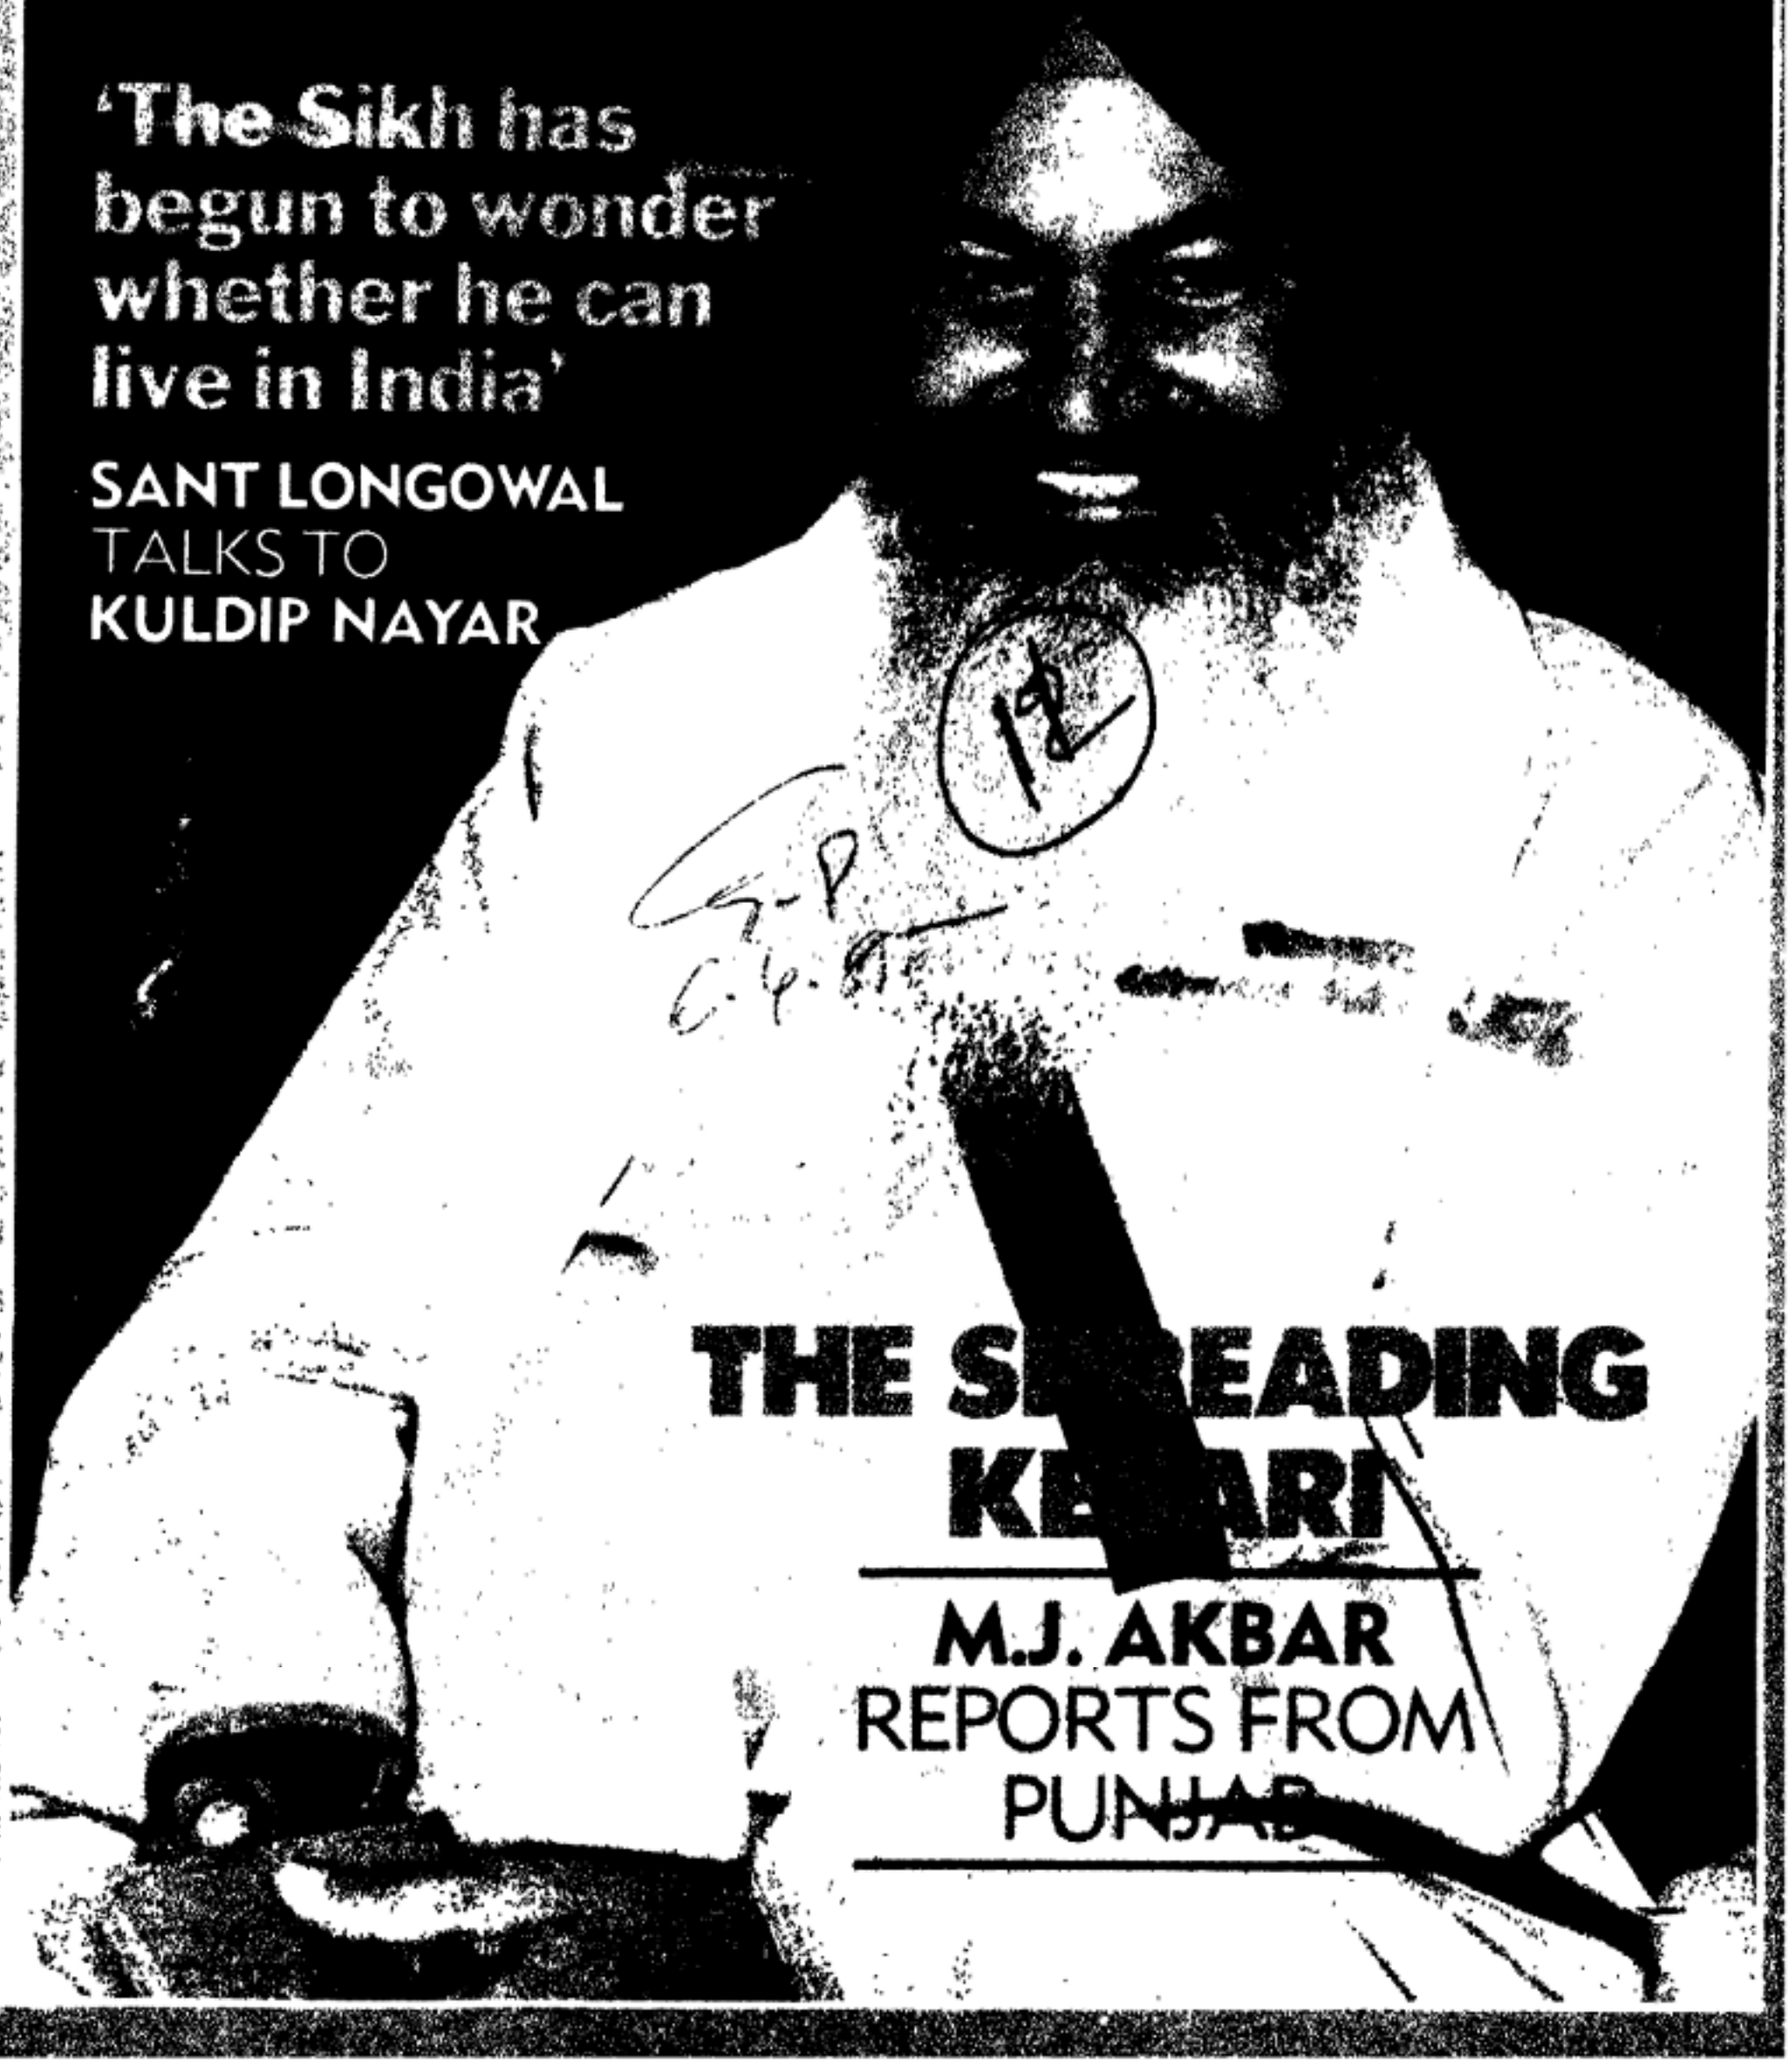
kly 24 March 1985 Regd. No WB CC 256 TN MS(C)376 MH-By-South-680.

The safari acquires a formal flair



HUSAIN: Both MAQBOOL and FIDA

SUNDAY

'The Sikh has begun to wonder whether he can live in India'

SANT LONGOWAL
TALKS TO
KULDIP NAYAR

THE S[illegible]READING K[illegible]ARI

M.J. AKBAR REPORTS FROM
PUNJAB

Let's not call a spade a shovel.
Safari is not what dreams are made of.
It's the down to earth luggage for travel.

You have enough on your mind The new project Endless reports and formalities.
And the pressures of travelling at short notice This is the high tension world of Safari.

Compose yourself. Details like clothes and personal effects are best left to the luggage that sails through the hurly-burly of airports and hotel lobbies.

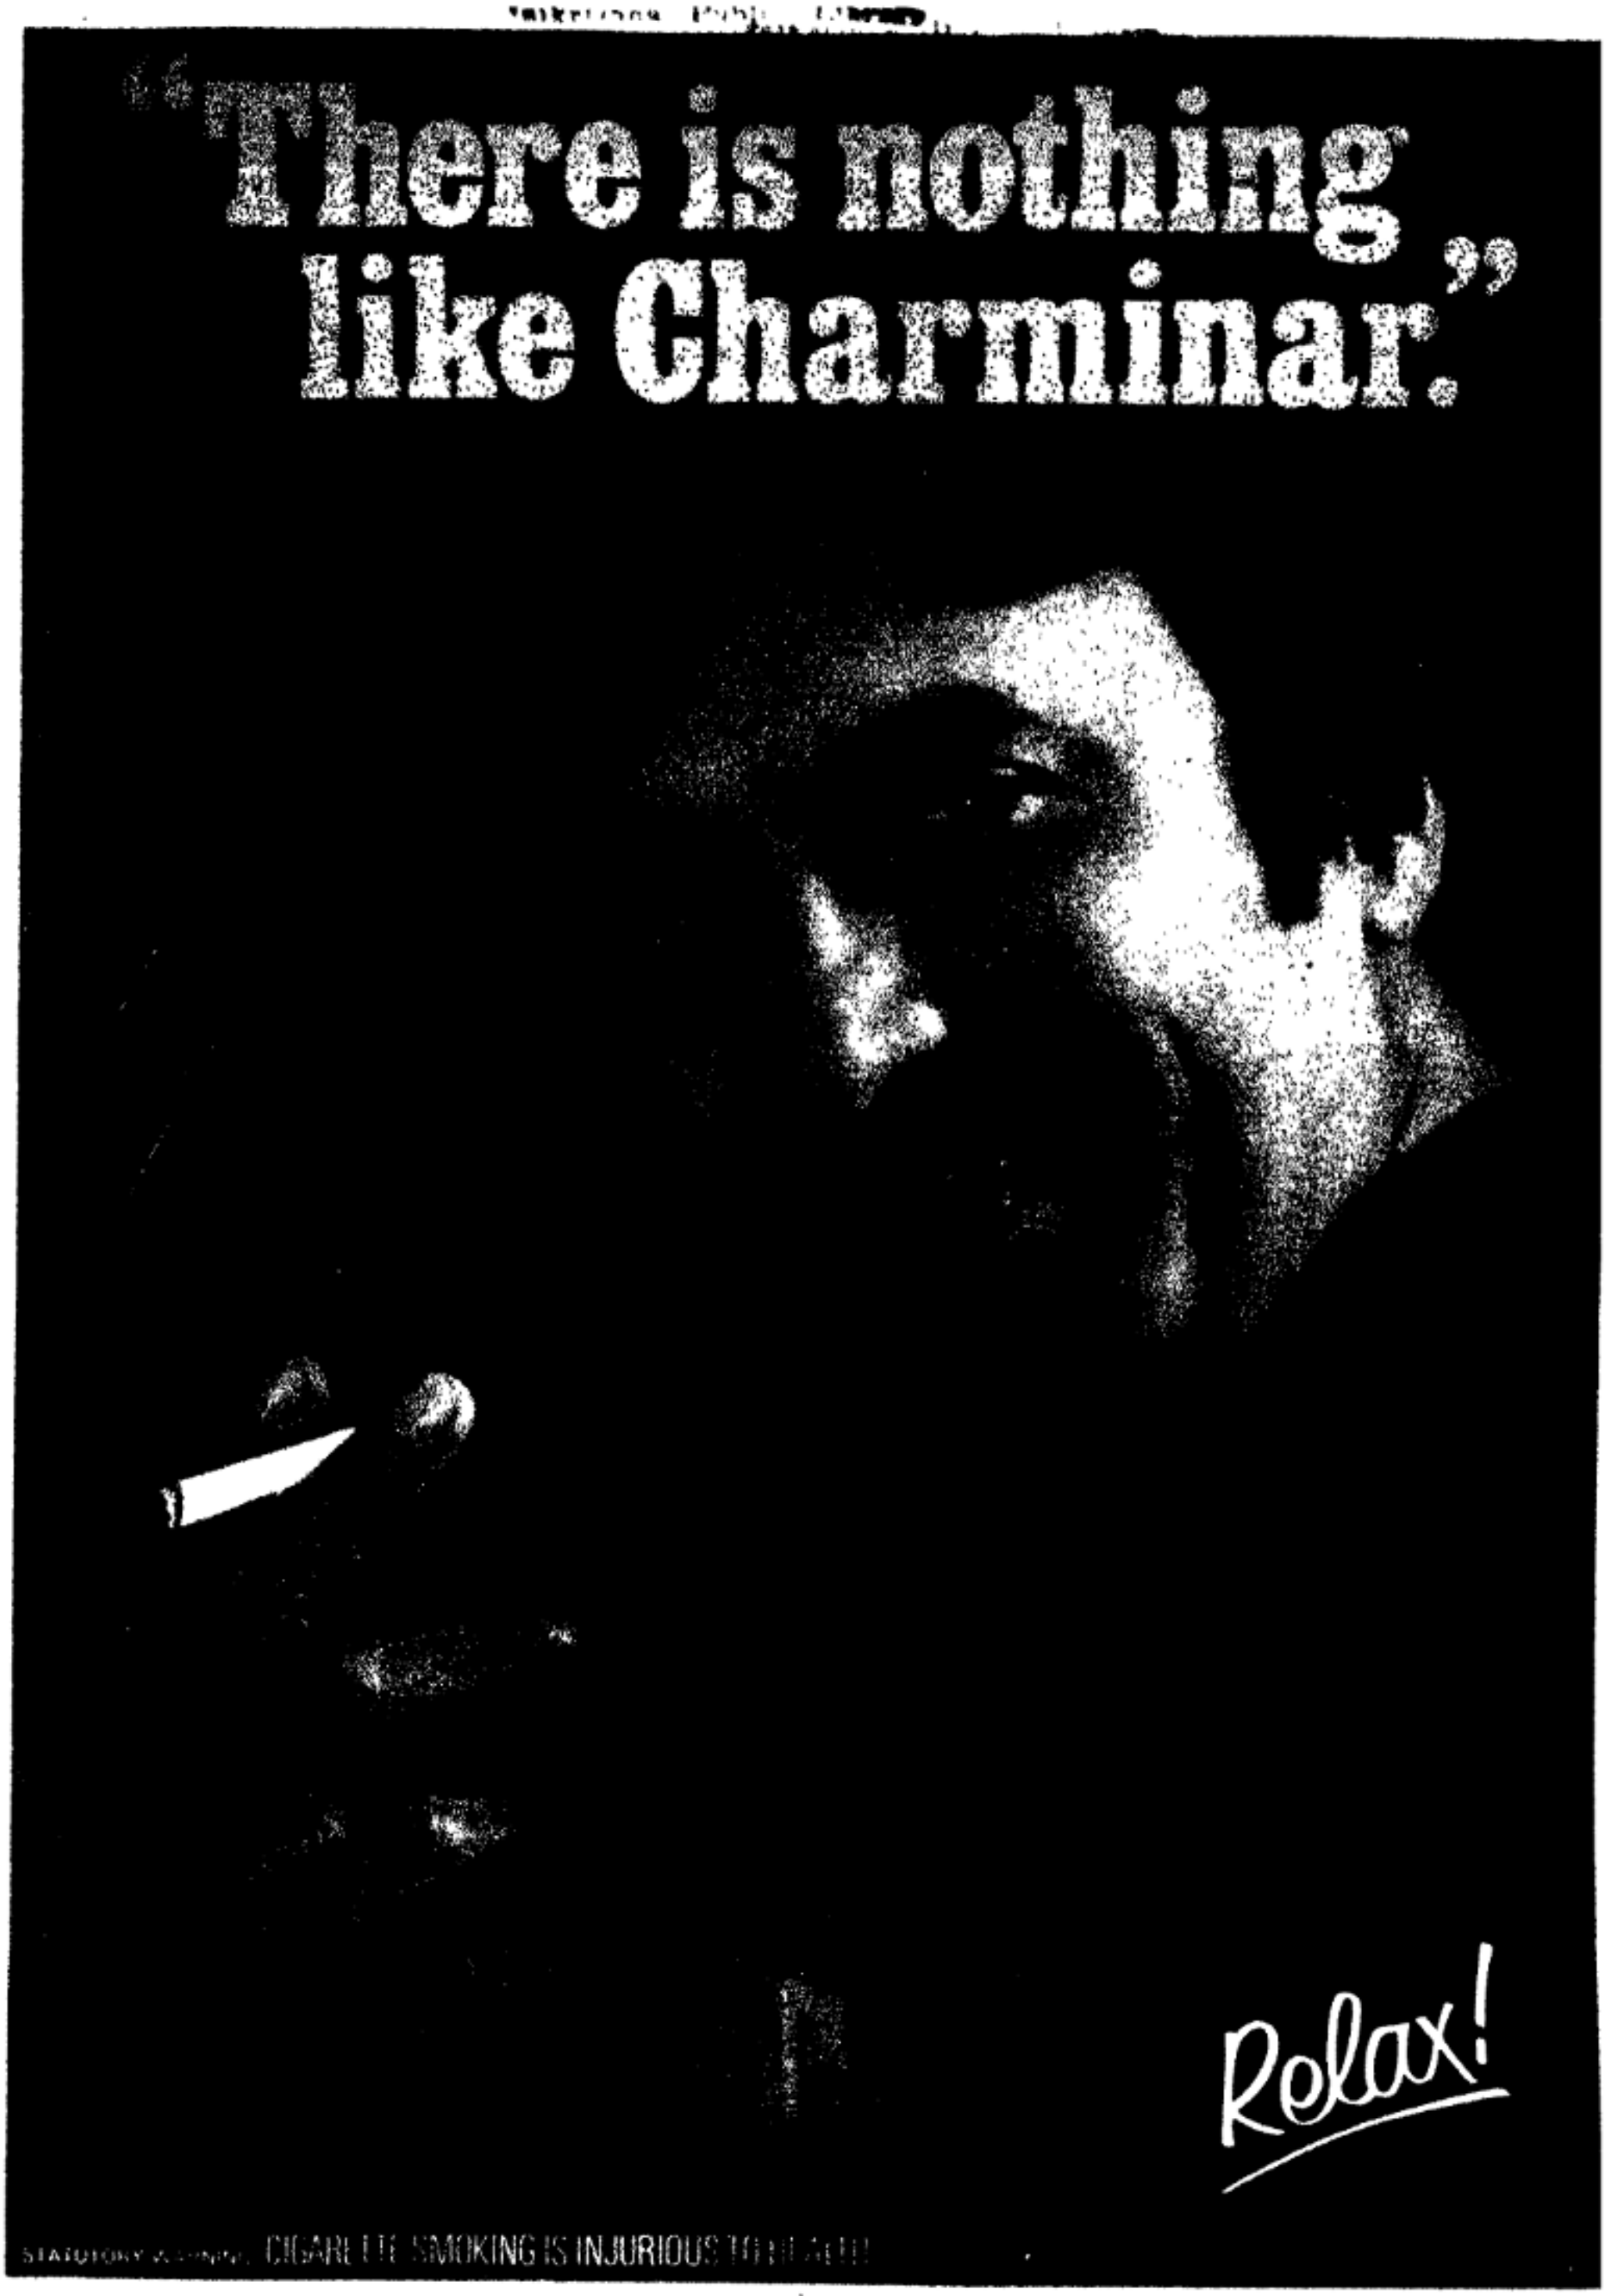
Safari The no-nonsense luggage built to perform common chores uncommonly well.
It's tough and handsome. Comes in classy, subdued colours
Agile in crowded corners on its recessed wheels.



Safari It survives

safari

The luggage that knows its business.

ULKA-SL-200 84

"There is nothing like Charminar."

Relax!

STATUTORY WARNING: CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

Yours for years
Apcolite Super Acrylic Emulsion from Asian Paints

Apcolite Super Acrylic Emulsion doesn't just give your walls a super smooth finish and an attractive sheen. It also ensures those beautiful looks stay that way for years. Here's why

100% Pure Acrylic Emulsion
Apcolite Emulsion is a superior, 100% pure acrylic formulation. That's why it's tough enough to withstand the extremes of any weather — on both interior and exterior surfaces. Year after year.

Fungus Resistance
Yes. Apcolite Emulsion is specially formulated to prevent fungus growth. Even in the monsoon or the most humid climate. Just one more reason why they stay good looking. For years.

Longer lasting beauty
Apcolite shades don't fade. What's more, they're easily washable. So your walls keep that freshly painted look. For years.

Computer matched perfection
Muted pastels. Brighter, bolder hues. The rich radiance of the whitest white. Each shade computer matched to perfection. So that there are no colour variations from batch to batch. Ever.

Apcolite Super Acrylic Emulsion. The luxurious look that lasts. For years.

A spectrum of excellence asian paints

OBM/4858

31 MARCH—6 APRIL 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 ISSUE 21 RS 4.00

AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

The Spreading Kesari

The colour of anger is becoming increasingly visible on the Punjab landscape. There is a bumper crop on the fields and a consequent smile of joy now, but the mood could turn ugly if the Akali morcha after Baisakhi gathers momentum. A report by M.J. Akbar.

'The Sikh has Begun to Wonder Whether He Can Live in India'

Akali Dal president Sant Harchand Singh Longowal told Kuldip Nayar in an interview which is bound to cause major ripples.

SUNDAY SPECIAL 48

Husain: Maqbool and Fida

Assassination is the theme of the artist's latest exhibition. A look at the work of an extraordinary man. Plus a profile of and an interview with the painter.

Page 14

Page 48

SPECIAL REPORT 33

Lost: In India
Found: In the USA

The mystery surrounding the sudden disappearance of the Soviet diplomat, Igor Gueja, from New Delhi cleared with the disclosure that he has defected to the USA. A report by SUNDAY correspondents

INVESTIGATION 46

The Varadarajan Tapes

A tape-recorded conversation between Varadarajan Mudaliar, the don of Bombay's underworld, and senior officers of the city police reveals the police-criminal nexus. A report by Lekha Dhar

COMMENT

Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 7
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 9
Opinion 10
Dateline M J. Akbar 13

PUNCHLINE/R.K. LAXMAN

Courtesy Times of India

Luckily we bought these jewellery and all that before he decided to become clean.

Cover Photograph:
Sondeep Shankar

Editor M J. Akbar

Associate Editor Tooshar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Bindo K John Henry Jacob
Rajiv Bagchi, Srinjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi.
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi:
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow:
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay.
Olga Tellis
Bangalore
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras.
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati
Seema Guha
Srinagar:
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for North Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex-Delhi

Provider and Protector

Sizeable returns and complete family protection. Only LIC gives you both.

There are lots of savings and investment schemes open to you. Most of them promise high interest, attractive dividends, big 'bonuses' . . . tempting financial returns.

Everything but family protection.

LIC is the only investment that provides good returns and full life cover. With LIC, you can fulfil your responsibility as provider and protector — the easy way.

What's more, your LIC policy gets you generous relief from Wealth, Income and Gift Tax. It serves as collateral against loans. And it helps you insure against the liabilities of Estate Duty.

The returns fetched on your LIC policy will provide timely funds for coping with costs of children's education, career provision, marriage and other foreseeable expenses.

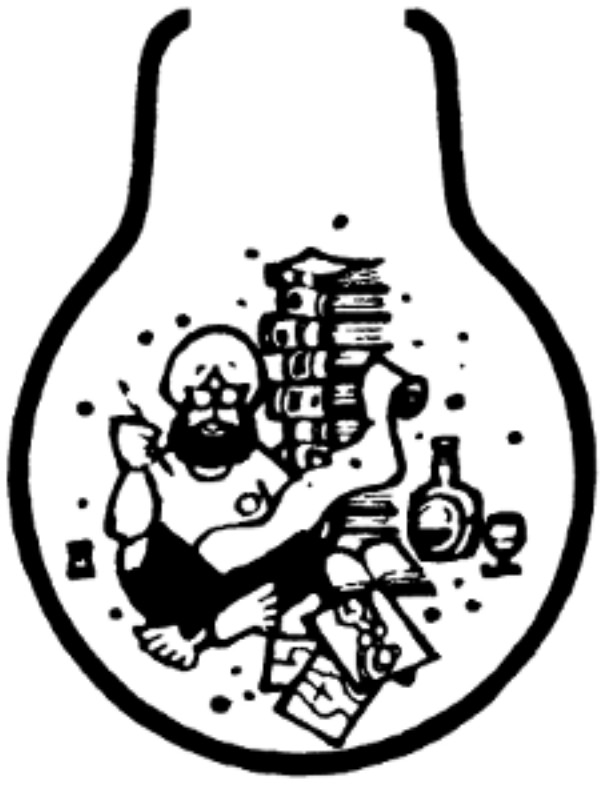
You'll be building up an estate fully protected from your creditors . . . while your LIC policy protects your family from the hazards of losing a breadwinner.

You are the breadwinner and provider. And through your LIC policy, protector too!

With so much to offer, is it any surprise that LIC is the choice of millions?

Make LIC your choice, too. Contact an LIC Agent or the nearest Branch office. He will show you a policy that suits your requirements perfectly. Make an investment in security that your family will appredate more and more as the years roll by.

Insure and be secure



Life Insurance Corporation of India

deCunha/LIC/161/85

Clean But Confused

Rajiv Gandhi's image as "Mr Clean" has been assiduously built up by the media. It has stuck because there is a strong element of truth in it. As politicians go he is cleaner than the cleanest political whistle. His transparent honesty carries conviction. He has also a very good presence. He is courteous and a thorough gentleman. However, a few ugly warts have begun to show on his handsome face. The darkest is his habit of making statements which, on advice, he is later forced to deny. He does it in the traditionally accepted politicians' formula: "I have been misquoted."

I have not compiled a list of his faux pas but mean to do so in the future. Some that I recall have already gone on record and will be difficult to erase from the pages of history. Did he or did he not describe Bhindranwale while he was alive as a purely religious leader and after his death denied having said so? Did he or did he not say that over 700 jawans had been killed in "Operation Bluestar" whereas the government's White Paper gave the figure of army casualties as 92? Did he not commit himself to M.J. Akbar that he would make an announcement about setting up some kind of judicial enquiry into the violence in Punjab and the post-assassination pogrom of Sikhs in northern India? In the Rajya Sabha when I tried to pin him down to this commitment and flourished a copy of SUNDAY carrying the interview, he simply replied, "I have not read the printed version of the interview but that was not exactly what I said." When I reminded him that he had promised to make the announcement before the 10th of March 1985, he replied, "Anyhow today is the 14th." An answer like that would have raised guffaws of laughter in a meeting of rustics in any panchayat. In the Rajya Sabha members of the Congress(I) applauded it, presumably as a witty retort. And now we have his statement to the Congress Parliamentary Party to the effect that the army would soon be withdrawn from Punjab, elections held and an elected government installed. The statement was repeated to the press by the very ebullient secretary of the party in the Rajya Sabha, J.K. Jain, and within a few minutes vehemently contradicted by Srikant Verma, general secretary of the party. At first it appeared that J.K. Jain had boobed. Then it appeared that Srikant Verma who, in his enthusiasm to put down a possible rival had told the press what he had got from the royal horse's mouth. It is quite clear now that J.K. Jain had faithfully reported what Rajiv Gandhi had said but since it amounted to a commitment Srikant Verma was asked to contradict it. If he is not more cautious with his words, Mr Clean may soon earn for himself a second sobriquet: "Mr Confused."

The Chaudhry Obsession

It starts being a complex and then turns into an obsession. As a complex it manifests itself in the form of a compulsive desire to be a Mr Somebody in every situation: member of every committee; if already a member, then its treasurer, secretary, vice-president or president. To be the centre of attention at every party, the bridegroom at every wedding, the corpse at every funeral. If the desire is not firmly curbed when it raises its head, it soon turns into an obsession. You can see it in epidemic form in India. Every villager wants to become a sarpanch, every social worker a politician, every politician an MLA or MP, and every MP a cabinet minister of the Prime Minister. There is no other explanation of the phenomenon of thousands of aspirants at every election, over 300 in one constituency.

The Chaudhry Complex manifests itself fairly early in life and assumes menacing proportions by campusage. You must have known boys who were forever wanting to be elected to something or the other: member of the canteen committee, carom club executive, university union—or whatever. Thereafter the same kind of fellows want to be somebodys in their beopar mandals, FICCI's Rotary Clubs, Lions Clubs—or whatever. They append catalogues or what they succeeded in becoming on their visiting cards and letter-heads of their stationery. I knew a buffoon whose writing pads had his entire bio-data printed in the margin. He was the greatest clown in college because he wanted to be captain of every team. Later he became a minister, Governor and an ambassador. Then there are fellows who append honorary doctorates conferred on them as if they were men of medicine or learning. The same applies to government honours. There are regulations to the effect that they must not be used as honorifics. They are. See the number of chaps who describe themselves as Padma Sri or Padma Bhushan so and so.

The most ludicrous examples of the Chaudhry obsession can be seen at club elections: the more elite the institution, the more blatant the exercise in one upmanship. In the recent elections of the Delhi Gymkhana Club, members were bombarded with letters soliciting votes. Without exception all of them extolled the status of the aspirant: IFS, IAS, IPS, Squadron Leader, and more insidious than these in a club half of whose membership comprise of businessmen, chartered accountants, lawyers with taxation problems, were arm-twisting appendages like Indian Revenue Service or Commissioner of Income-tax. Believe it or not, these descriptions were even printed on the ballot paper.

What do these jokers get by becoming Chaudhrys? Not money (though some wouldn't mind making a little on the side) but patronage and for a time being jee huzoored by the staff. Little things affect little minds as small pants fit small behinds.

Humour From Pakistan

General Zia driving round Islamabad came across long queues of Pakistanis outside several embassies wanting visas and entry permits to go abroad. He got out of his car and joined a line to find out why so many people were wanting to leave the country. No sooner did people see their President with them they left the queue to return to their homes. President Zia asked them why they were doing so. They replied: "If you are leaving Pakistan there is no need for us to do so."

BANGALAKSHMI
LOTTERY

FIRST PRIZE

5 LAKHS

Draw on 2nd FRIDAY of each month

Ticket Rs. 2/- only

Next Draw
12.4.85

More than 72,000 prizes

2nd Prize (5) Each Rs. 50,000/- (One in each series)

3rd Prize (60) Each Rs. 10,000/-

4th Prize (30) Each Rs. 1000/-

5th Prize (300) Each Rs. 500/-

7th Prize (3000) Each Rs. 20/-

6th Prize (3000) Each Rs. 50/-

8th Prize (30,000) Each Rs. 10/-

Agents/Sellers Bonus

	1st	2nd	3rd	4th	5th	6th	7th	8th
Agents	20,000/-	2,000/-	500/-	100/-	50/-	5/-	2/-	x
Sellers	10,000/-	1,000/-	200/-	50/-	20/-	5/-	5/-	5/-

Attractive Commissions for Agents and Sellers

For details : DIRECTOR, STATE LOTTERIES 69 Ganesh Chandra Avenue, Calcutta-700013

Our Authorised Stockist : (1) Agrani Enterprises, 4/1 Bhabanath Sen Street, Calcutta-4 ; (2) A. Karmakar, 10 Armenian Street, Calcutta-1 ; (3) Dhar Agency, 27 Mahatma Gandhi Road, Calcutta-9 ; (4) P.K. Paul, 13/3 Dr. Debendra Mukherjee Row, Calcutta—9; (5) Ma Tara Distributors, Bidhan Market, Siliguri; (6) Nirala Agency, 129 Dr B. B. Banerjee Road, Schoolpara, P.O. Raniganj, Dt. Burdwan, (7) S. Kundu, 128 Kerani Bazar, Bankura.

IPB/85

WEST BENGAL STATE LOTTERY

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

The Tragedy of Pakistan's Ahmedias

I have received a letter from an Ahmedia in Pakistan saying that though he is a devoted Muslim he has been declared a non-Muslim in a country which claims to be Islamic. What has hurt him most is the government's directive that the Kalima be erased from the mosques of the Ahmedias. Apparently, the witch hunt of the Ahmedias has increased. The Bhutto government in 1974 had amended the Constitution to declare all Ahmedias non-Muslims, but the amendment was never implemented. Then General Zia-ul Haq, through a presidential ordinance on 26 April 1984, prohibited the Ahmedias from calling themselves Muslims or their places of worship "mosques"; their priests were also forbidden from calling the faithful for prayers through the Azan.

Embittered Ahmedias resorted to wearing Kalima badges and the authorities began arresting those who did. Dawn, an English daily, reported in its 2 February issue that more than 100 Ahmedias had been arrested in various districts of Punjab. Again, on 23 February, the same newspaper reported that 36 Ahmedias were arrested for displaying the Kalima badges.

The military regime of Pakistan has a poor record of respecting human rights. It is, therefore, not surprising to find the Ahmedias being maltreated. How does the Kalima—La Ila lil Allah, Mohammad Rasool Allah which means, "There is no God except Allah and Mohammad is His Prophet"—become in any way objectionable if it appears in the places of worship of the Ahmedias? It is strange that anyone should be punished for accepting the finality of Prophet Mohammed and that too in a country claiming to be Islamic.

How can a law stop a person from calling himself a Muslim? It is a question of faith and no constitutional amendment or presidential ordinance can affect it. The Pakistan government may call the Ahmedias non-Muslims, but if it is firm in following the tenets of Islam, no one can take away this right from them.

How does the Kalima—La Ila Ill Allah, Mohammad Rasool Allah become in any way objectionable, if it appears in the places of worship of the Ahmedias?

The Ahmedias have a long record of distinguished service to Pakistan. To name some of them: Zafarullah Khan, once Pakistan's foreign minister, did a good job at the UN when he advocated the case of Pakistan regarding Kashmir. Nobel Laureate Professor Abdus Salam is an Ahmedia; he has settled in Italy because Pakistan, his motherland, does not treat him as an equal citizen.

I am happy to see that a distinguished Pakistani journalist, Mazhar Ali Khan,Tariq Ali's father, has taken up the case of the Ahmedias' and has demanded an end to their persecution on the grounds of religion. In a column in his magazine, Viewpoint, he wrote "Mahatma Gandhi's prayer meetings included a recitation from the Quran, and during the Khilafat period mosque meetings were often addressed by Hindu and Sikh leaders. Why then must the Ahmedias be singled out, stigmatised and discriminated against to this extent?"

The Ahmedias are also called Qadians; most of them were once living in Qadian near Gurdaspur. All but a few migrated to Pakistan in 1947. Numbering around four million, they live mostly in Pakistan's Punjab. The other day a few Ahmedias from Delhi met me to say that they enjoyed religious freedom in a secular country like India, but could not do so in the "Islamic country" Pakistan. I have no doubt that things will change one day because the universality of Islam and its high tradition of tolerance will assert themselves. I personally think Pakistan's discrimination against the minorities (a non-Muslim is prohibited from occupying the post of head of state or head of government) will be forgotten one day

In a way, the Ahmedias are like the Nirankaris, who emphasise Guru Nanak's concept of God being Nirankari (formless). They have compiled two scriptures for their sect. Avtar Bani and Yug Purush. Orthodox Sikhs strongly resent certain passages in these texts which, they feel, denigrates the Sikh Gurus and the Granth Sahib. Both the Ahmedias and the Nirankaris deserve to be treated with respect and tolerance. The Nirankaris in India have tried to come to terms with the Sikhs as the Ahmedias have vainly done in Pakistan. It appears that both communities are in for a long, arduous journey. This happens when the majority in a particular community jettisons justice and fairplay in the name of "purity of religion," even when the essence of that religion is tolerance and it is only intolerance that endangers its "purity."

Man's religion has taken endless forms. His names for gods and goddesses are many and his rituals vary from the horrible to the sublime. But whatever his beliefs, he has very often shown a capacity for tolerance. How can governments or those who claim to be true followers of God take away religion from man?

Mature Politician

The bold and detailed interview with the Prime Minister made absorbing reading (The Assassination was Done Not to Kill Mrs Gandhi, it was Done for the Reaction, 10—16 March). M.J. Akbar made our young PM aware of the problems facing the country through his questions and Rajiv Gandhi seemed determined to tackle the issues. From his replies Rajiv Gandhi seemed to be different from the general run of politicians in our country.
Bibek Sen, New Delhi

• It was nice to learn that Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has decided to implement new methods of administering the nation. Rajiv Gandhi was all praise for Pandit Nehru and Indira Gandhi but he was aware of their shortcomings too. The PM's efforts to infuse morality in politics is laudable but I was not satisfied with his replies on curbing black money and corruption. Black money and corruption cannot be controlled unless mandatory checks are imposed on election expenditures.
Mahesh Prasad Roy, Vaishali (Bihar)

• Nothing much was known about the plans of Rajiv Gandhi till SUNDAY published the detailed interview with the PM. The earlier interview with finance minister V.P. Singh was also superb. I request Mr Akbar to interview the other ministers and opposition leaders as well.
Nandita Mishra, Berhampur (Orissa)

• Rajiv Gandhi's candid answers did justice to M.J. Akbar's provoking questions.
K.P. Andavan, Gobichettipalayam

• One sentence in the entire interview still rings in my ears: "Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has found the confidence of a man who knows what he wants to do."
Tufan Ghosh, Calcutta

• The Prime Minister appeared to be sincere in most of his replies but I failed to understand why the interviewer was silent on such vital issues as Sri Lanka and Pakistan.
Subir Lahiri, Calcutta

• I did not appreciate the interview since though the Punjab tangle was discussed at length the interviewer neglected the Assam problem. A ministry is functioning in Assam without the support of the people. Hiteshwar Saikia is ruling the state with the help of the police. Other blatant omissions include the insurgency problem in the north-east and the Bhopal gas tragedy

S.C. Malakar, Agra

• I was amused by our PM's logic that the Delhi police failed to control the riots that broke out following the assassination of Mrs Gandhi since they were ashamed at the deed of two of their colleagues. I also felt that Rajiv Gandhi had indirectly blamed the Sikhs for the riots: the PM said that where the Sikhs openly rejoiced at the assassination, it was difficult to control the riots. May I remind the PM that it was a section of the Sikhs who rejoiced and not the Sikh community as a whole.
K.L. Khanna, Calcutta

• There was nothing new that Rajiv Gandhi had to say. Like all other politicians he too made a lot of promises which will soon be forgotten. The people should not expect much from him.
Ashish Choudhury, Darbhanga

• The dialogue with Rajiv Gandhi was interesting though not exhaustive. Since a record number of pages were devoted to the interview I expected M.J. Akbar to dwell on international issues also. Sri Lanka, Pakistan and Bangladesh strangely did not figure in the discussion. However, most of the domestic problems were touched upon and Rajiv Gandhi's determination to solve them seemed honest. But it would be impossible for a man to wage a battle against so many social evils singlehandedly and so he quite rightly asked the people of the country to give him a hand.
M.H. Rama, Bhubaneswar

• Rajiv Gandhi was not candid enough regarding the government's stand on the controversial Anandpur Sahib Resolution. However, I was relieved to know that Rajiv Gandhi did not approve of the way in which N.T. Rama Rao was dislodged from the chief ministership of the Andhra Pradesh last year.
R. Suresh, Hyderabad

• Rajiv Gandhi seemed to be quite different from his mother who was hostile to the Indian press. Moreover, I failed to understand why M.J. Akbar did not question the PM on India's foreign policy.
Smita Narang, New Delhi

• The interview was a treat for all the readers. The young PM was frank and forthright in his replies to M.J. Akbar's tricky questions. The cover story was exhaustive but vital international issues were left out.
K. Chidanand Kumar, Bangalore

• After going through the entire interview I am still in the dark as to why Rajiv Gandhi dropped Pranab Mukherjee and A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury from his cabinet. His answer that Pranab Mukherjee was not a tough man was not convincing. But I agree with the PM that communism has no place in our country and that by 1987 Jyoti Basu will be out of power.
A.N. Veeraraghavan, Bombay

• Those who had doubts about Rajiv Gandhi's political acumen should go through his interview to M.J. Akbar. Our Prime Minister is a person with a rare mettle and a clean image. The boldness with which he faced the interviewer reminded me of his mother when she faced the press.
Lopamudra Ghosh, Sindri (Bihar)

Assam, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Pakistan, the West, the Soviets, the economy, the quality of the cabinet, the faith in the bureaucracy...there is no end to the questions a Prime Minister of India could be and should be asked. Untortunately, the two hours of that Bombay-Delhi flight passed too quickly, long before the list of questions in my notebook was exhausted. My apologies, but I am sure you will understand—M.J. Akbar

Wretched Life

Nirmal Mitra's article, Children of Despair (24 February—2 March), has successfully revealed the appalling conditions in which children have to work. Apart from those employed in hotels and restaurants, where they are at least assured of two meals a day, there are scores who work in automobile garages and attendants in small shops where the treatment is more brutal.
M.A. Ahad, Bhubaneswar

• Children from poor families live a wretched life in our country. No laws can stop child labour unless those who employ them are made socially conscious of this social evil.
B. Mohanty, Cuttack

Impressive Views

Vishal Mangalwadi's views on Punjab reproduced by Khushwant Singh in Gossip Sweet and Sour (New Light on Punjab, 10—16 March) may be unpalatable to the government and the majority community but his observations are objective. The government and the PM should utilise his observations to solve the Punjab problem.
Kamal G, Mysore

• I was impressed with Vishal Mangalwadi's assessment of the Punjab problem. In fact, the decision to send the army inside the Golden Temple should have been taken immediately after the murder of DIG Atwal.
B.R. Nanda, Lucknow

By Talent Alone

I do not agree with M.J. Akbar that the anti-reservation movement is a battle against untouchables and backwards (Dateline, 10—16 March). The movement, on the other hand, is a fight for a genuine cause. There are many backwards who have taken full advantage of the reservation policy and have risen in life; their children can no longer be called backwards but they still take advantage of the government's policy when it comes to the question of education and jobs. There are others, for example, the adivasis of Koraput, Kalahandi and Phulabani in Orissa, who continue to live a wretched life of poverty and ignorance. So where is the utility of the reservation policy? Is it meant to serve only the developed section of the backward classes? Thus, the time has come to modify, if not scrap the policy. Moreover, I feel that talent alone should determine whether a person is fit to become a doctor, scientist or an engineer.
Prasant Patro, Jeypore (Orissa)

Save Our Culture

Kuldip Nayar in his article, Indian Antiques Go West (Exclusive, 17—23 February) had focussed attention on a very important issue: draining of our country's antiques. The present laws are not sufficient to check smuggling of antiques. I was shocked to learn that Indian antiques find their way to the museums of the West. Should we then infer that western governments are encouraging such acts?
D.N. Mohanty, Kaladahi (Orissa)

• Ever since the days of Sultan Mahmud and Nadir Shah Indian art and culture have been victims of foreign powers. Our country had been drained of antiques that represented our culture. The process still continues and if the government does not check this we will soon lose whatever we have. India should campaign for an international law since most of the antiques find their way to government museums. I hope Mr Nayar's article serves as an eye-opener.
Kartikeswar Behera, Keonjhar

Unholy Nexus

The investigative cover story, The Underworld of Indian Politics (3—9 March) was a courageous expose of the murky side of Indian politics. In a country where votes can be bought for a pittance, it is no wonder that people with shady characters capture political power. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has announced his intention to cleanse the government and infuse morality in politics but his efforts will remain a pipe dream unless laws are enacted to prevent people with police records from entering the Parliament and state Assemblies.
Param Hans Singh, Arrah

• It was distressing to learn that some of our representatives in Parliament and Assemblies have criminal records. The criminal-politician nexus is a universal phenomenon and many a government would collapse without the help of the underworld. Rajiv Gandhi talked about cleaning the government and yet some of his nominees for the recent Assembly elections had police cases against them.
M.A. Ahad, Bhubaneswar

• I doubt whether SUNDAY's courageous effort will be rewarded. For, muscle-power and money are an integral part of Indian politics.
N. Ellango, Tirunelvelli

• SUNDAY did a commendable job by exposing the criminal-politician nexus. It is the duty of every conscientious citizen to build up public opinion against such an unholy alliance. The main responsibility, however, lies with the press but the way the vernacular press is projecting the image of people like Haji Mastan is regrettable.
Abida Samiuddin, Aligarh

• Everyone knows that Haji Mastan is a smuggler How dare he compare himself with Mahatma Gandhi and Jayaprakash Narayan?
Rajneesh Bharti, Sitamarhi

We Protest

I was surprised to learn that the government is deporting Daud Haider, the brilliant poet from Bangladesh who was staying in India to escape religious persecution (A Poet's Fight for Freedom, 3—9 March). What reason can there be to deny Daud Haider political asylum? I appeal to the Indian government to review its decision in the light of the democratic principles for which we stand?
Mihir Bose, Calcutta

• Srinjoy Chowdhury had rightly pointed out that Daud Haider's presence in our country will only enrich the culture of India. As such the government's order asking Mr Haider to quit India has perplexed many like me. I would welcome a detailed explanation from the government. Meanwhile, I raise my feeble voice in protest through these columns.
Sanjib Chowdhuri, Calcutta.

Correction

The caption of the photostat document on page 34 accompanying the article, The Company a Minister Keeps (24—30 March) should read: "A photostat copy of a letter to Vasantdada Patil recommending the Galadharis," and not as published. The error is regretted—Editor.

Power transmission lines that talk

Power Line Carrier Communications from BPL. For better management of electrical power

Simply put, it means an effective voice and data communication system that uses existing power lines in the Electricity Board network.

In operation for over 12 years in Electricity Board networks all over the country, Power Line Carrier Communication units help monitor and control critical factors in electrical power management

Communication electronics from BPL also means Telemetry, Supervisory and Control Systems, Telephone and Switching Equipment.

There are other vital areas that BPL serves too. With Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement), Computers, Components, Office Automation and Consumer Electronics

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Siemens, West Germany, RFL, U.S.A. and Trench Electric, Canada. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL. Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nationwide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has

BPL-INDIA

In pursuit of perfection

Computers • Communication • Components
Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement) • Office Automation • Consumer Electronics

115

DATELINE / M.J.Akbar

Dhaka: Some nations are born democratic, some achieve democracy and one or two occasionally have democracy thrust upon them. The last has been the case with our neighbours to the east and the west, where attempts are being made to arrange a marriage between martial law and elections in order to legitimise a child already born. (Nothing personal in that: the phrase is merely a reflection of the writer's inability to accept the moral validity of a coup.) Martial law administrators are themselves conscious of the fragility of their foundations, which is presumably why they keep promising the return of elected rulers. One wishes they would sometimes mean it. The only kind of democracy they seem to find acceptable is the one which lets them retain the chair on which they have become comfortable. The argument for martial law is always prog ress, discipline and the good of the people. But what happens when the people themselves declare that they actually prefer the bad old days? Man has this funny habit of not wanting to live by bread alone.

General Hussain Mohammad Ershad has been trying (with some sincerity, insist his supporters—and they include men like Enayetullah Khan who has made left radicalism into a useful profession; he is being appointed Bangladesh's next ambassador to Beijing) to come to terms with the diverse elements in the country's power structure for some time now. The task is admittedly not easy; there are 78 political parties alone, most of doubtful merit and none short of lung power. Even the most important political parties, like the Awami League and the BNP (led by General Ziaur Rahman's wife Begum Khaleda) are not confident enough to go it alone; they are part of alliances whose minimum membership seems to be fifteen—and this does not take into account the number of factions that exist within the parties. In fact, Bangladesh seems to prove every cliche you ever heard about Bengali politics.

Then there are the ideological battalions; small fundamentalist organisations protecting "Islamic Bangladesh" from "Hindu India." General Ershad has to worry about them too. One religious leader, Hafe·ji Huzoor (who collected a fair vote in the last elections) has announced a jehad against the general, and vowed that he will spend his last few years (he is in his nineties) fighting the army. For a country as beset with problems as Bangladesh, a lot of people want to rule in Dhaka.

All the contenders for General Ershad's job decided to boycott the 21 March referendum. But the general thought he could pull it off; he likes the image of a democrat and a poet (an English translation of his poetry has just been published and is full of love and patriotism) and gets irritated if anyone uses 'dictator' in front of him. Perhaps General Ershad was deluded by the crowds that came to his meetings on his constant hops across the country. On 21 March the people boycotted the referendum. The streets of Dhaka were deserted. And there was not much more than a trickle in the rural areas. The figure of 71 per cent vote produced by the government was treated with cynicism. (Incidentally, India has rarely produced such a high vote in its passionate elections.) If the purpose of the exercise was to confirm the credibility of General Ershad then it failed—both at home and abroad. But the real point is that it does not much matter. General Ershad will remain in charge precisely as long as the army is happy with him. Power in Bangladesh nas now become the prerogative of the hundred thousand odd men who flourish in uniform.

It is, of course, a good sign that our neighbours seem to be edging towards democracy, however halfheartedly. I wonder how this is influenced by the sight of India keeping her commitment to elections despite all the enormous problems. However, if the game of democracy is to be played, the least one can do is stick by the basic rules. Dhaka did not go to the Islamabad extent and ban most of those who could have won from participating (see how dangerous polls are? General Zia's ministers still lost), but there was still enough to cause doubt on the structure of the polls. For instance, no voter was marked with ink after he or she had cast a vote; if anything the officials seemed to be in a mood to welcome "genuine false voting" to save them the trouble of producing the expected turnout. Nor did any ballot paper have to be stamped; you just placed the unmarked paper in the box of your choice. In any case, if you want to do all this then you should try and prevent the foreign press from witnessing all this. Perhaps the most humorous experience of Ganabhot '85 (Referendum '85) was watching a queue of voters lined up for our benefit dispersing (without having reached the ballot boxes) as soon as our backs were turned and we were presumed to have gone. The oldest delusion in the world remains self-delusion.

Squaring a commitment to Marx with a commitment to an olive green (as distinct from red) army should, in the normal circumstance, be difficult. But the affable Enayetullah Khan has done it before on the rationale of a common front against "expansionist India" and accepting the ambassadorship to China did not clearly pose any ideological dilemmas. Enayet's can be called a ruling class family of the modern third world kind: a combination of heritage, education and ability. He is both editor/owner of the left/radical Holiday and president of the Dhaka Club: and everyone agrees that he does both jobs extremely competently. He was in fact tipped for a place in the cabinet, but he is said to have refused this. Enayet and Beijing will be good for each other.

Voters, most of whom are children, queue up to cast their votes in Bangladesh

COVER STORY

THE SPREADING KESARI

The colour of anger is becoming increasingly visible on the Punjab landscape. There is a bumper crop on the fields and a consequent smile of joy now, but the mood could turn ugly if the Akali morcha after Baisakhi gathers momentum. The time has come for both Delhi and Punjab to stop scratching the wounds and start that long process of healing. M.J. AKBAR reports.

Securitymen check the meeting ground at Hussainiwala with mine detectors prior to Rajiv Gandhi's visit

In less than two weeks time, on Baisakhi, 13 April, one of the most critical phases in the history of the Punjab will formally begin. The passion and fear, the pride and prejudice, faith and challenge which have for so long created such turbulence so often are being stoked once again. The canvas is smaller. Once it swept from the Suleiman ranges in the west to the Jamuna in the east; now it stretches only from the Beas to Ambala and the ancient battlefield of Kurukshetra. But the danger is no less intense for that. Even this reduced Punjab retains the power to send dangerous tremors across the subcontinent. The worst will not come, because powerful nation states like ours have acquired the resilience and institutional capability to preserve their integrity. But there will be a bitter wind, and there is not much time left in which to change the direction of the coming storm.

One might be forgiven, after visiting Punjab now, for dismissing such talk as the product of an overheated imagination. There is an apparent mood of peace, even joy, in the villages and towns. The land is once again pregnant with a bumper crop; the fields glow with health. Where there were two combines in a district ten years ago, there are more than a hundred now. On the streets of Sangrur, in the early evening, the dhol master comes out and children dance the bhangra. There is, literally, milk and the modern equivalent of honey (whisky) flowing through the state and this is its happiest moment of the year. The drums of Baisakhi are out, announcing the maturity of another crop. In a matter of days the crop will be cut, stored and sold, and who could be happier at the thought than the farmer whose enterprise has lifted Punjab away from the quagmire of third world poverty into at least second world comfort?

In the final analysis, there are few effective arguments against prosperity. The Punjabifarmer is in a position of unique good fortune today. There is the abundant water from the rivers born in the Himalayas, and there is heavily subsidised fertiliser from the massive factories of Gujarat and Maharashtra. There is a ready buyer at a remunerative price for the produce in the government of India which bears the responsibility for feeding a large nation. There are consumer goods from a growing economy to lend a value to money: video recorders and television sets and refrigerators and cars and trucks from a hundred different points spread across the map of India. Which sane person would want to

A former Congress(I) MLA being given a security check at Hussainiwala, before the PM's visit

Jaspal Bawa/Tribune Photo Unit

SGPC acting president Prem Singh Lalpura (extreme right) pacifies the crowd at Anandpur Sahib on 7 March during Holla Mohalla; among others on the dais is former Punjab finance minister Balwant Singh exchange such success for an uncertain dream called Khalistan?

And a dream which could so easily turn into a nightmare. Conceive: a hostile Himachal, Jammu and Kashmir, Haryana and Rajasthan at constant loggerheads with Khalistan over water. No fertilisers from an angry India, and no buyer from Delhi, and no ports from which to export the wheat and rice. Trade at the mercy of Pakistan. The collapse of the cities and services with the erosion of the qualified Hindu population. The devastation from a constant war. The terrible retribution against Sikhs living in the rest of India. Decimation, plunder, revenge—and perhaps the inevitable attendants of war, famine and pestilence. A carnage which would set back Punjab for generations, even if it might halt the progress of India for a few years.

The farmer, with his tremendous sense of the real, knows this. He feels the threat to his prosperity in his bones; only a man who has created his own wealth can know how quickly it can be lost. You speak to him today in Punjab, and in his heart he wishes that the tension and fear of the last three years would go away, that the dispute with Delhi would be settled, that the Akali morcha would end, that the confrontation with Hindus which seemed quite unthinkable so recently would disappear, that both the communities would return to the solidarity exemplified in that gesture of common worship, the homage at the Harimandir. And yet there is a difference. For the first time since independence that wish is spiked with the seed of doubt. For in 1984, that Sikh farmer who had gained nothing but profit by his association with India acquired his first real grievance. That paper tiger called the Akali morcha got its first claw in the anger against Operation Bluestar, and the second in the anti-Sikh riots following the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale dead became a force that Bhindranwale alive so desperately wanted to be.

And now, amidst the green of the fields and the purple of the Akali turban, a new colour is becoming symbolic of Punjab: kesari. Everywhere in the state, young Sikhs are beginning to put on saffron turbans to announce that they are ready for the ultimate sacrifice—death in the name of religion. (It is ironic but only too appropriate that the colour of both Sikh secessionism and its counterpart, Hindu fascism, should be the same in Punjab.)

The message was most forcefully delivered at—where else?—the holy city of Anandpur where the three-day Holla Mohalla between 6 and 8 March this year was less a celebration and more a challenge to Delhi. A congregation much larger than normal and almost completely young had gathered: the men wore kesari turbans and the women dupattas of the same colour. They hid nothing, particularly not their secessionism. Moderate Akali leaders like Sardar Balwant Singh were booed (he walked off, rather than submit to extremist pressure); the young at Anandpur were looking for new leaders more in tune with their passions. And they found one too: Bimal Khalsa.

Bimal Khalsa is the wife of Sardar Beant Singh, assassin of Mrs Indira Gandhi.

An ektara provides the musical spine around which the song is built. The words are simple and unambiguous: the Sikh will not be cowed down, the Sikh will take revenge; don't you weep, Bimal Khalsa, your husband shall be avenged; thank you, Beant and Satwant and Kehar Singh,for protecting the honour of the community. The songs had been taped inside the jails of Punjab, copied on cassettes and circulated clandestinely. Obviously this was not possible without the collusion of some jail officials. Nor were the men who had lent their voices worried about disclosing their identities. One cassette begins with an introduction in Punjabi: "Sikhan dein mahaan kurbaniyan aur prerana lai ke, Sardar Satwant Singh aur to Sardar Beant Singh do Sikh naujawana di bahaduri, te Indira Gandhi dee maut: pesh karden hai Sardar Ajay Singh Dhillon Singoleriwale aur Sardar Jasbir Singh Joshila Talwandisahabwale...(Sardar Ajay Singh Dhillon Singoleriwale and Sardar Jasbir Singh Joshila narrate the sacrifices and problems of the Sikhs, the heroism of Sardar Beant Singh and Sardar Satwant Singh and the death of Mrs Indira Gandhi...)" The cassette becomes only more inflammatory as it goes on. "Sun lai, Bimal Khalsa, main bhi ohi kuch kar ke uttha, main ohi kuch kar ke dikhoyna... Sir deke lai loon badla (Listen, Bimal Khalsa, I too will do something, I will emulate your husband... I will give my life to take revenge...)"

Sikh nal jisne hai bair karda
Badla lewaange gin gin, paapiyo

Such sentiment is limited to the extreme fringe, but it is powerful enough to intimidate and frighten those who would prefer a less volatile course. The danger of pressure from the extreme lies not in the extent of popular support it might generate but in the power of the scream; the strength of a war cry raised by a committed few often not only drowns out the argument of reason but can so easily be mistaken for the voice of the whole community.

In every gurudwara of Punjab the battle has begun for the possession of the Sikh mind. The young are there, asking their parents and their elders if there is a future possible in the patterns of the last 30 years. The parents of the arrested youth add to the chorus of despair, narrating story after story of the "innocence" of their children and the "cruelty" of oppressive Delhi. But the key lies in the worker and the farmer who earns from his participation in the national economy: which way will he swing? Where will the Sikh women, who would suffer under a fundamentalist Sikh state in terms of rights and inheritance, turn? The urban Sikh, who has been by and large anti-Akali, and the mazhabi Sikh, who has so much reason to mistrust the Jat Sikh: have they also been affected?

And what will the Akali Dal do, particularly now that its leaders are being allowed to dribble out of jail? Veer towards the voice of revenge in an effort to be more extremist than thou? The man to watch was Sant Harchand Singh Longowal, president of the Shiromani Akali Dal and "dictator" (an approved term in the Akali political lexicon) of the morcha, the man who had kept his lines open to all sides of Sikh sentiment before Operation Bluestar. True the Sant had not supported Bhindranwale; in fact, the two were not on talking terms. But he had not stood up against the secessionists to the extent expected And if the Sant was not a Gurcharan Singh Tohra, he was no Prakash Singh Badal either. Would the Sant continue to prevaricate, to say one thing to the young and another to the rest of India? Or would he provide the leadership to mobilise Sikh opinion behind him, and find the solution to the Punjab problem which had so long evaded everybody? As for Delhi: Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had squeezed what was possible out of Punjab in two elections. Any more rhetoric of confrontation would be the surest passport to political suicide. The time had come to talk peace. And it was his turn to make the first move in the chess game which had to be adjourned under such calamitous circumstances It was still a continuation of the old game, but both sides had lost their principal players Delhi made its play: the Anandpur Sahib resolution was no longer beyond the pale; selected Akali leaders were set free including hardliners like Talwandi; and a knight was sent to Chandigarh to confront the bishops.

One of the first things that Sant Longowal did upon his release was to start a tour of his pind. A jatha from his area had been caught in the crossfire of the army action at the Golden Temple and there were casualties. He began a round of visits to every home which had suffered, and gave a speech at every gurudwara After the grief came the message: the Congress was the bitter enemy of the Sikhs, and there could be no peace with it. The war was with

Akali Dal president Sant Longowal at Delhi airport after his release from, detention

Delhi, as it had been so often through Sikh history; this war would also demand its price, and the Sikh would willingly offer that price. There was no condemnation of Beant Singh and Satwant Singh, and not much regret for the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. But there was anger at the anti-Sikh riots, and the warning that not a word would be exchanged with Delhi unless a judicial enquiry was ordered. But the Sikhs should not consider Hindus their enemy; the Congress was the villain, not the Hindus.

Nor did the tone change during our interview; if anything the anger intensified as the questions attempted to probe his real feelings. We sat in a small room on the periphery of the gurudwara still under construction, just a few miles from Longowal, the place which gives the Sant his surname. The "dictator" was not willing to condemn extremist behaviour on any count. If he could not support a particular action, he would try and justify it—but there was no question of apology, regret or embarrassment. Check:

- What was so wrong about wearing kesari turbans or dupattas? Why did no one object when N.T. Rama Rao's MPs wore saffron to Parliament? If NTR wore saffron it was fine, if a Sikh wore saffron it became a crime!
- Why should he condemn the hijackers? Why should the Akalis not arrange to provide a defence for those being tried in Lahore? If the Congress of Mrs Gandhi, Sanjay and Rajiv Gandhi could give Assembly tickets to those who had hijacked an Indian Airlines Boeing during Janata rule, why could not the Akalis defend the Sikhs who were protesting what they thought to be injustice?
- How could anyone object to arms in gurudwaras, when all through history Sikhs had been allowed to carry arms? The Sikhs worshipped weapons, and they would now worship the most modern guns since these were the weapons of today.
- Why should everyone insist that the Sikhs condemn the assassination of Mrs Indira Gandhi; after all the Akal Takht had been attacked too, and Sikhs killed in communal riots.

There are sensible answers to each one of Sant Longowal's posers. When N.T. Rama Rao wears saffron, he is only displaying a religious sentiment, not announcing that he is ready to sacrifice his life in a war against another Indian community. There is therefore a substantial difference in the two messages sought to be conveyed. What Mrs Gandhi and Sanjay Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi did when they gave tickets to those who had committed a crime was wrong, and remains wrong. But there is a qualitative difference in the crime of secession and any other crime. By supporting the hijackers the Akali Dal is publicly affording sympathy and protection to those who are set to destroy the unity of a nation, not unseat a government. And while Sant Longowal has every right to protest and mourn the attack on the Akal Takht, surely he must also condemn the assassination of an elected Prime Minister of India? Or is he surreptitiously advocating the use of arms to settle political problems? Is his justification of sophisticated modern weapons in gurudwaras as part of the same intent? For two hundred years after Guru Nanak the Sikhs did not carry weapons; it was only the tenth Guru who enjoined them to do so to fight Mughal oppression. Have the Sikhs been oppressed since 1947? And how does one react to the decision of the Shiromani Gurudwara Prabhandak Committee on 25 March (where Sant Longowal was of course present) that training in the use of arms would be given in the gurudwaras? Can the Sikhs blame the rest of the country if suspicions rise and in turn acquire a malevolent dimension? Not only this, the process of the canonisation of Sant Bhindranwale is being stepped up. Another resolution passed at the SGPC appealed to all the Sikhs to spread the purification movement: "Let at least one member of each Sikh family be baptised by 1999, (a year which will mark 300 years of the birth of Khalsa). This will also fulfil the dream of Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale."

Not so long ago the dreams of Sant Bhindranwale were not part of either the SGPC or the Akali future.

'No Sikh leader can afford to talk the language of moderation now.' If I heard that statement once, I heard it a hundred times. The voice too must be touched with kesari; and its shrill tones must be tolerated until the anger has eased. Words are extremely malleable weapons: they are gelignite; they can be used for mining and undermining; they can be stored in the chambers of memory and detonated at precisely the moment required. They mean what you want them to mean. To find the answers to Punjab, one has to look beyond words and into hearts. If the Akali leadership today is using the words in its current arsenal to heal by pampering, then one can appreciate the need for the present rhetoric. If not...

Words have proved dangerously deceptive before. In 1940 the Muslim League at Lahore passed a resolution describing the Muslims as a nation, and demanding their right to protect their lives and culture from the greed and oppression of the majority. There was no mention of either Pakistan or secession, and among those who proposed the resolution were men like Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan who were opposed to the idea of partition and the creation of a new country called Pakistan. In fact, within a year or so when Sir Sikandar realised the extent of the conspiracy he resigned from the working committee of the Muslim League, and in debate after debate in the Punjab Legislative Assembly ridiculed the idea of a new country. But after Lahore 1940 Mohammad Ali Jinnah knew that he had his Pakistan. In the beginning was the word, and the word had been passed suitably disguised. Any political movement will include, within its fold, a whole spectrum of interests and pressures. The equivalents of Sir Sikandar and Jinnah sit on the Akali platform too, fighting for the control of the majority of the party.

And, in the Congress(I) and the government, the spread is similar;

Arjun Singh with President Zail Singh after being appointed Punjab Governor CNS

there are the bullies who want to teach the Sikhs a "lesson they will never forget": part of the lesson has already been administered, and presumably the education is not complete. Others see the need for consideration and dialogue, submission without surrender, acceptance of demand without the show of panic which could set off detonations elsewhere—and, worse, inspire the Sikh extremists to believe that the centre had finally become too weak to hold the nation. And then there are those who are simply confused.

While the Akalis can blow hot and cold, the government must now make a choice. One assumes that it has learnt that state-inspired aggression is bad policy at any time, and an impossible alternative in a democracy. After that, it has only two options left. The first is to grant Punjab (Punjab, not just the Sikhs; Chandigarh should go to Punjab, not just the Sikhs; the river waters should go to Punjab, not just the Sikhs) its demands through an agreement with the Akalis. The other is to do so bypassing the Akalis. The concessions have to include an enquiry into the post-assassination riots, the surrender of Chandigarh to Punjab and an increase in the water allotment to the farmer (which is the best way of wooing him). If the Akalis raise the ante any higher, they should not be ignored and their morcha treated as nothing more than a law and order problem. In fact, the logic of such action could be continued a stage further and the nation should consider legislation to stop religious politicians from entering our secular legislatures—we have seen enough damage being caused to India from the Sanghs and the Leagues. But Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi will have to display more clear-mindedness to push through such reform than he has shown so far on Punjab The decisions from Delhi are coming out piecemeal, and losing much of their impact, even though through this process far more might end up being granted than even demanded.

The other part is that the time for ambiguity is also over: the Akalis, and their dictator Sant Longowal, have to clarify not only where they stand but where they are heading. The time has come for the language of moderation to be heard. If their gestures continue to provoke, the consequences could be terrible. Surely they themselves know as much, which tempts one to suspect that the provocation is often deliberate in order to drag the Sikh community further away from the national mainstream. From Baisakhi 1985 the Akali morcha will be officially relaunched, and already the gunfire which has fallen silent is being heard again—the murder of the secretary of the BJP in Chandigarh, K. L. Manchanda being the worst example.

Once the spiral starts building it could again acquire a terrifying momentum. The last time, the Akalis said that Punjab would be in danger if their demands were not met. This time, they are saying that the Panth is in danger, that the fate of the religion hangs in the balance. The last time, the transfer of Chandigarh might have been enough; now a gesture also has to be made to convince the Sikhs that their religion, like every minority religion on this subcontinent, will be safe under the protection of the Constitution and its elected guardians. And all this has to be done now: every moment of delay is time unforgiveably lost. The last time the purple of the Akali turban was the colour of the agitation; this time kesari can be found in every town and village. We have learnt the cost of the purple battle. We must avoid the havoc of the kesari war.

What Should Now Be Done in Punjab?

Lt. Gen. Jagjit Singh Aurora (Retired) answers

Much has happened in Punjab since Operation Bluestar in June last year. Yet a solution to the Punjab tangle remains as elusive as ever and a question that is being asked is: What should now be done in Punjab? Before I attempt to answer this question, it is necessary to look into the causes and the effects of what has come to be known as the "Punjab crisis."

The first point we must keep in mind is that the demands of the Akali Dal and the government's reluctance to come to a decision on them was primarily a political problem between the Akali party and the government of India. But—and there can be no doubt about it—the demands were presented by the Akalis in such a manner that even the political demands, which concern all Punjabis, were made to appear as though they were the demands of the Akalis; hence, a part of the religious demands. Though this was set right later on, it did create a certain amount of strain and misunderstanding between the Hindus and the Sikhs. But after Operation Bluestar, the Punjab problem became one essentially between the Sikh community and the government of India. This was because the storming of the Temple hurt the feelings of all Sikhs, irrespective of their caste, creed or political beliefs.

I do not know if Mrs Gandhi realised this when she ordered Operation Bluestar or whether inspite of realising this she decided that she was so correct in this matter that she could afford to alienate the whole Sikh community. In any case, matters did not end with Operation Bluestar. After it was over she stated through the media that she was applying the healing touch but, in fact, the propaganda carried out by the official media was such that it alienated the Sikhs further. This in turn had its fallout: differences grew between the Hindus and the Sikhs in Punjab. In fact, one could even call it the great divide. To make matters worse, there was a lot of repression in Punjab: the presence of a large number of security forces in the state, as well as the new Disturbed Areas Act, special courts the change brought about in the Evidence Act only added to it. I'm sorry to say this, but today there are possibly more extremists and terrorist-minded young Sikhs than there were at the time of Operation Bluestar.

The presence of the army in the state has further widened the gulf between the Hindus and the Sikhs:

while the Hindus do not want the army to leave Punjab because of insecurity, the Sikhs feel that they are under repression and there is a lot of resentment on this score. Then there was the very unfortunate assassination of Mrs Gandhi and the holocaust that followed outside Punjab. This certainly contributed in the deterioration of relations between the two communities. Now, not only do the Sikhs feel alienated from the mainstream of the nation but there is also a lack of confidence vis-a-vis the government. What the Sikhs are asking today is: In case there is another incident like the one which took place in November, will they get proper protection from the government? One, after all, does not know the turns the situation can take. Today nobody is in a position to control the terrorists—neither the Akalis nor the parents of those who have become terrorists—and anything can happen. But can we blame the whole community for the crimes of a few? Again, there is the feeling, whether rightly or wrongly, that a number of young people have gone to Pakistan for training (in arms). But I have heard that a large number of young people, as well as those who are not so young, have gone to Pakistan as refugees. And why? Simply because they felt that they could be picked up at any moment by the police and interrogated. After that there is no certainty regarding their fate: whether they would be released or whether they would be bumped off. In fact, there is this total lack of confidence among the Sikhs of Punjab.

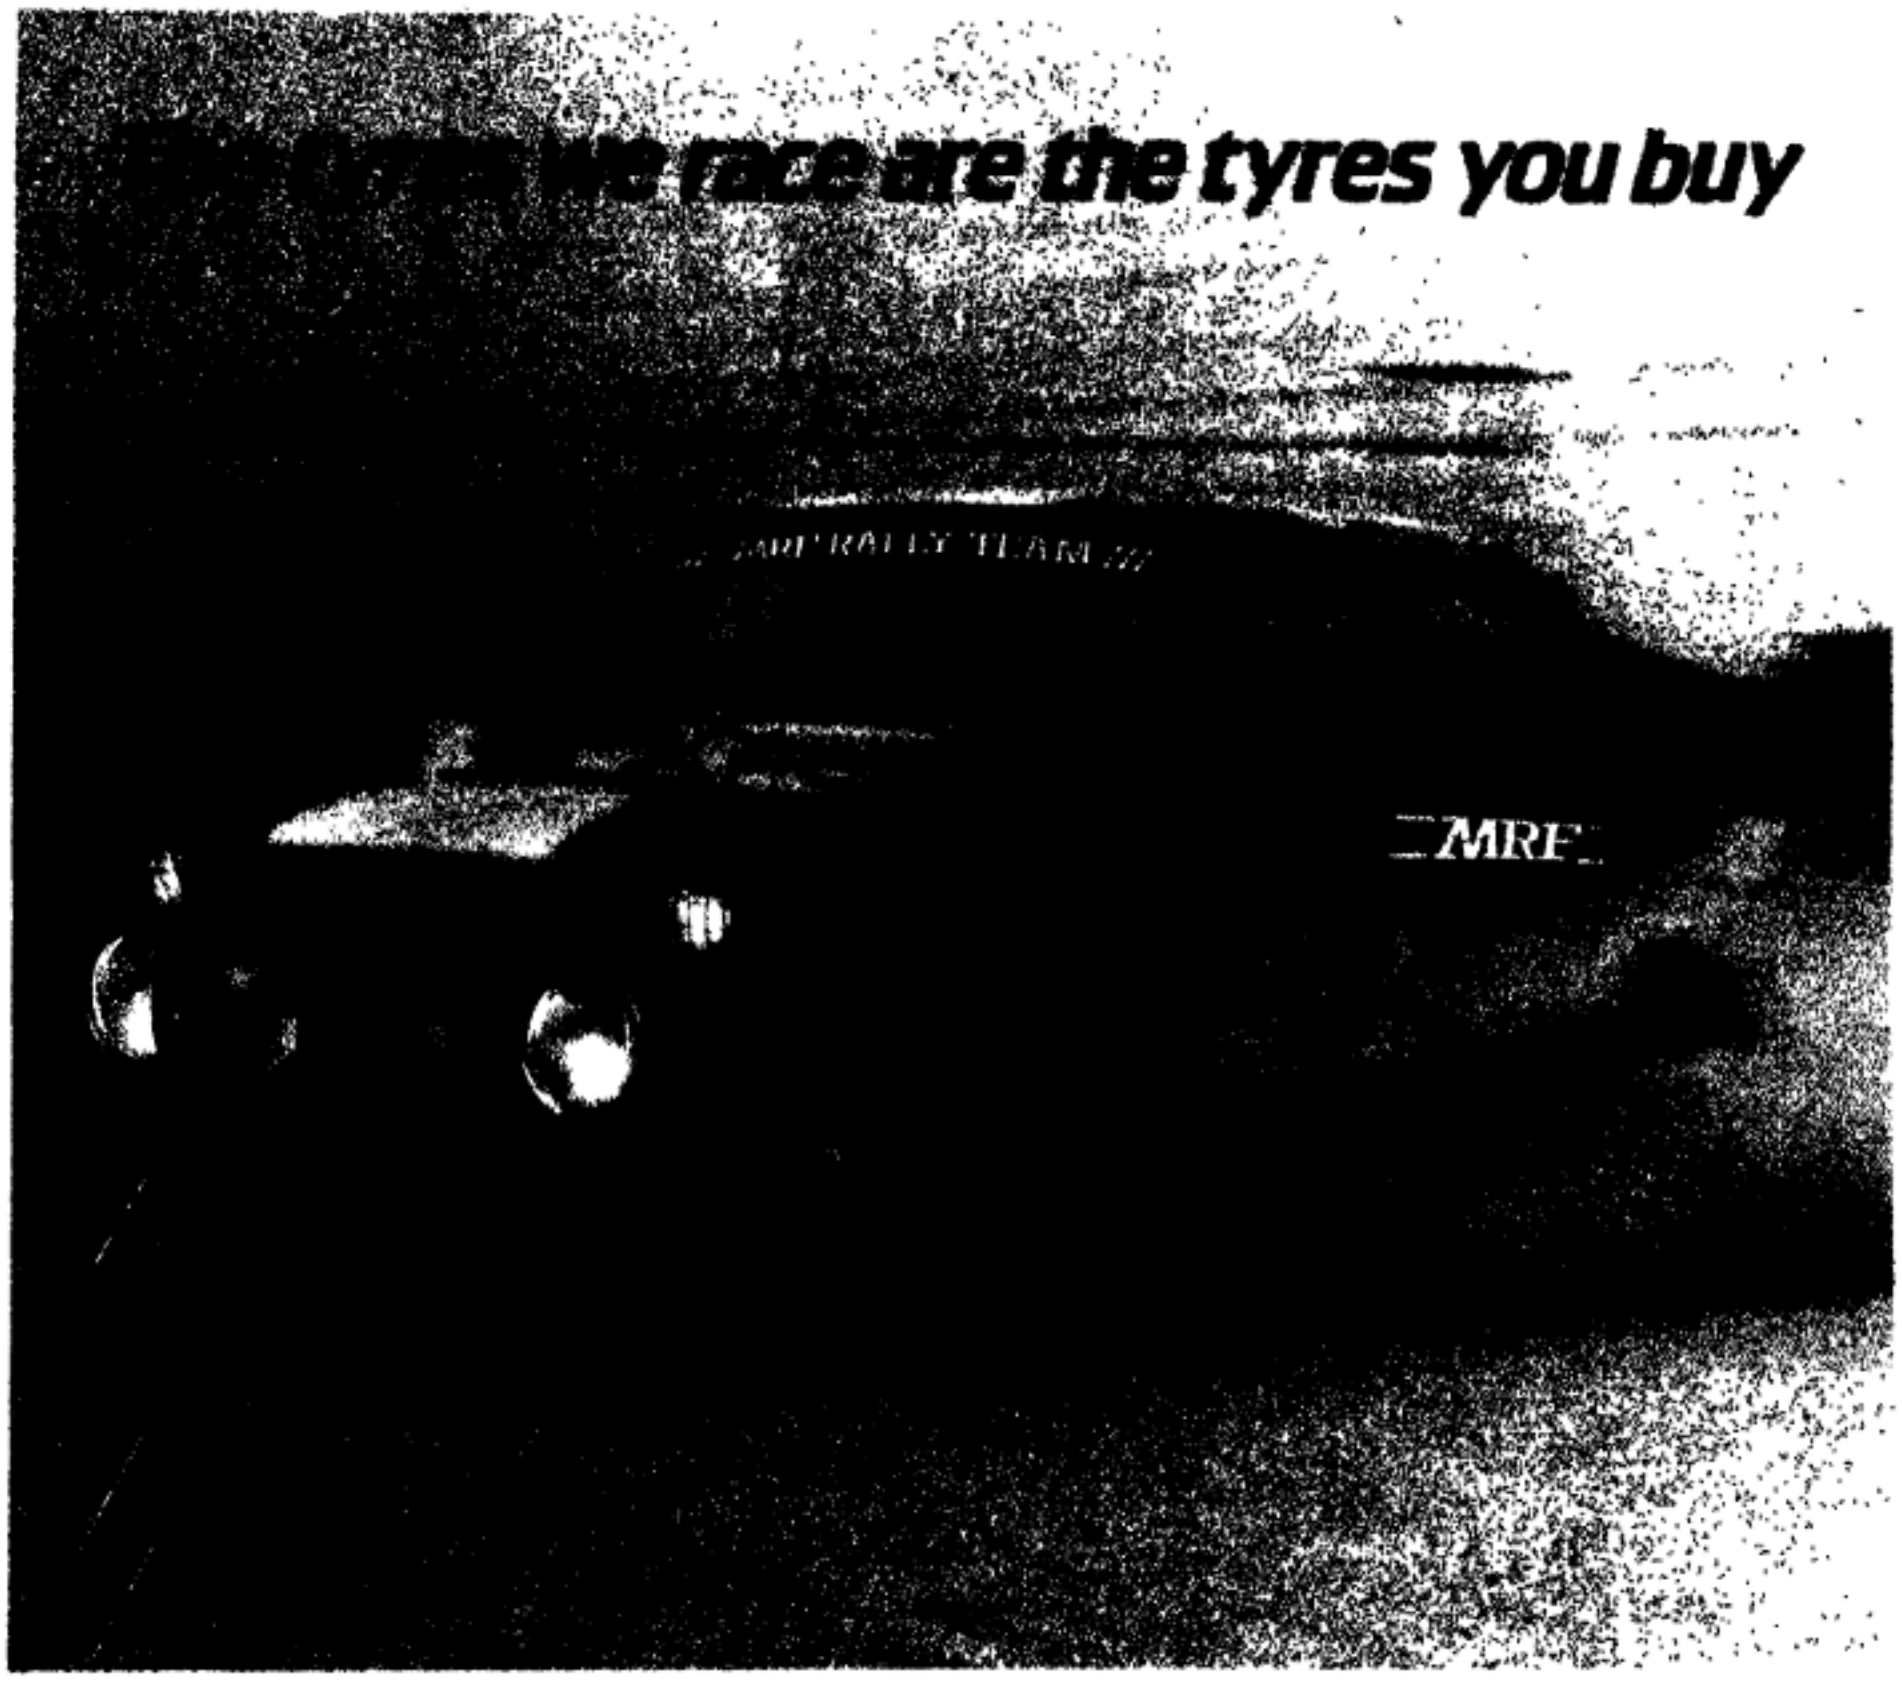
Therefore, as far as the Punjab problem is concerned—though I think it is more of a Sikh problem—before any fruitful negotiation can start, it is essential to create a proper atmosphere of confidence. This atmosphere can only be brought about if something concrete is done: whether it be an enquiry into the riots or drive home to the administration that the Sikhs be given the same sort of justice that other Indians have been receiving. There is this feeling that if a Sikh has a problem, chances are that he will not get a fair deal.

So, to bring the situation back to normal in Punjab, the Disturbed Areas Act has to be withdrawn and those young people who have been arrested and against whom no charges have been framed or against whom there is nothing major, should be released. Why are they being kept in custody for so long?

As for the demands of the Punjabis, all political parties in Punjab agree that Chandigarh should go to Punjab, that the dispute over the division of the river waters should be referred back to the Supreme Court where it was before Mrs Gandhi gave the award just before the elections in Haryana, for political purposes. What should be done next is to set up a boundary commission to decide on a boundary between Haryana and Punjab on a linguistic basis. These were the demands earlier and they still remain I do not really see how either the Akali party or any other party of the Sikhs can accept anything less, as the entire Sikh community in Punjab is unanimous about these demands.

Another problem which continues to plague negotiations between the government and the Akalis is the oft-repeated Anandpur Sahib resolution, about which there has been a great deal of talk without the people really understanding what it is all about. To my mind the operative clause of the resolution is the one that relates to centre-state relations That is the first resolution on the Anandpur Sahib resolution document. The authentic document was the one that was passed in 1978 in Ludhiana. That resolution only talks about centre-state relations: it says that we should have a proper federal structure, the states should have greater authority over their own affairs and goes on to say that in order to strengthen India, it is necessary for the structure to be redesigned. Nowhere does it talk of secession nor is there even a hidden clause relating to it. I think this matter can be referred to the Sarkaria commission. Or, if they so desire, it can be referred to some other commission.

What the Sikhs are asking today is: In case there is another incident like the one which took place in November, will they get proper protection from the government?



But if negotiations are to be meaningful, both the Akali Dal and the government should avoid taking public stands on the demands and issues concerning Punjab. Often leaders do this to try and justify to the public that they are right and the other side is wrong. No meaningful negotiation can take place if your attitude is such. Therefore, I feel, both sides should go to the negotiating table without taking any stand in public and with only one objective: to solve the Punjab crisis as it is vital for the security of the country; it is vital that the Sikhs who feel alienated, be brought back to the mainstream. So we have to put our heads together and find a workable solution, without making it into a prestige issue.

Besides, I would like to add, not as a Sikh but as an Indian, that the present government should deal with the problem more generously. It should give time to the Akali leadership, especially the moderate leadership, to regain its confidence. For instance, after nine months Longowal was recently released from jail. At the time when he was put in jail his stock was not very high within his own community because he had handed himself over to the security forces and it was put out in the press that he had surrendered. For Longowal, this meant a loss of face. So now after his release, in order to be accepted as the leader of the Sikhs, he cannot afford to take a soft line. And this is something which should be understood by the government. Longowal is a moderate leader and a reasonable person and he should be allowed to reestablish himself in the community. But if everytime he opens his mouth the media pounces on him, criticising him for making harsh statements, then it will simply vitiate the atmosphere, instead of giving him a chance to establish himself.

But I do think that by releasing some of the Akali leaders, and not all of them, the government has clipped the wings of Longowal and Barnala, because on their own they cannot take on the entire responsibility of negotiating a settlement of the Punjab problem. Besides, if under pressure they say something and the other leaders do not like it, it can threaten the unity of the Akali Dal, which, in any case, is being kept together with a great deal of effort. Again, while Tohra and Badal have not been released Talwandi has been, even though he is the most extreme among them and is someone who has taken great delight in criticising and disagreeing with Longowal, making it difficult for him to win the confidence of the whole community.

In the final analysis, I think the government should place its confidence in Longowal and his party, give him a chance to establish himself and then sit at the negotiating table with only one end in mind: to solve the Punjab tangle for the future of the country and the future of the Sikh community, which in spite of being a minority, is still viral to the country.

...the race are the tyres you buy

It's true! The very same tyres that you use on city-roads, are repeatedly tested by MRF on race and rally tracks around the country

There's a simple reason why. On a race-track a tyre is subjected to severe torture and strain. In just six hours on the track, a tyre goes through more than half its life. Something that would take more than a year on a city road.

Which means we get our test results that much faster. And you get an improved product that much quicker.

It's a testing technique developed by our collaborators B F Goodrich of the USA, people who build tyres for the NASA Space Shuttle Programme

And since MRF tests city-tyres on the race-track, you can be sure that when we win, you too are winning. With tyres that are setting new standards for grip, handling, mileage, durability and sheer staying power.

At the end of the race, it's over to the MRF technicians... Testing for heat build-up in a tyre with an electronic pyrometer.

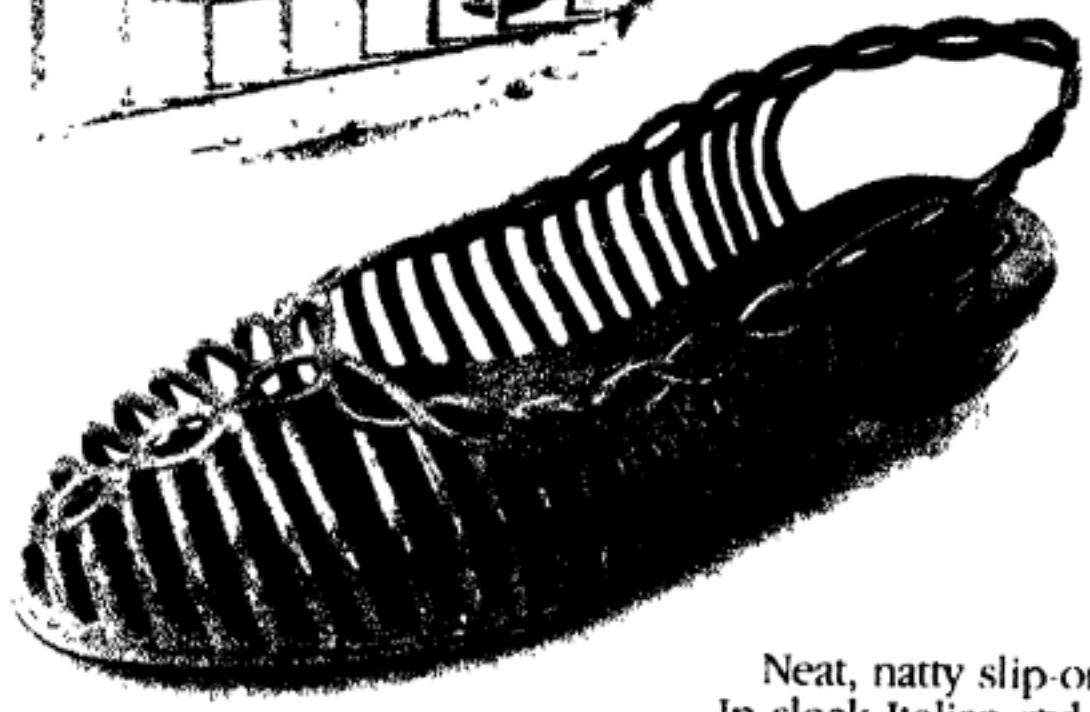
The race-track is our laboratory.

MRF TYRES

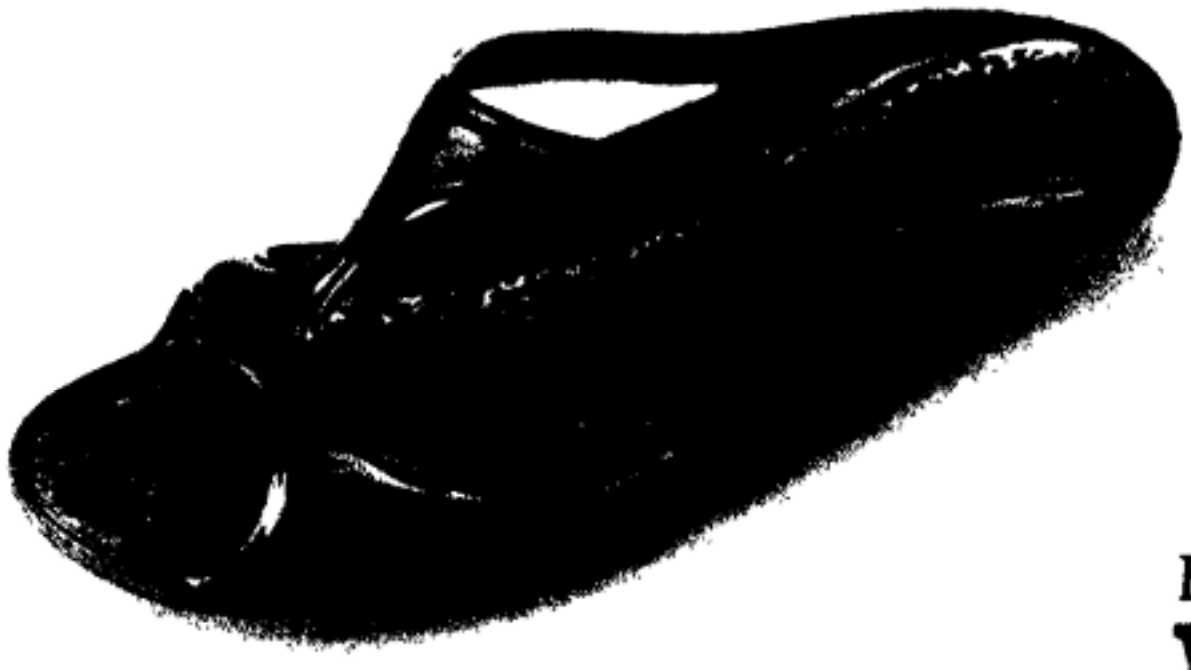
Tyres with Muscle

MRF Tyres are made in technical collaboration with B F Goodrich Company of U.S.A.

LINTAS(M)-MRF-NCT-16a



Uttarpara



Introducing

VERLON

Workaday Wear.

Neat, natty slip-ons.
In sleek Italian styles.
Bright, gay colours.
So comfortable, so soft, so durable.
Walk in them,
work in them.
Lounge in them,
loaf in them.
They're new.
They're exciting.
They're from Bata.

Feet style from Italy

VERLON

Available at select Bata/BSC stores

ACIL/Bata/V-2/85

'An Incomplete Step'

"There is hope but no optimism," says Istri Akali Dal President, Mrs Rajinder Kaur "Something might come out. We can't predict the future course of events. But today I am not very optimistic that Punjab will be normal in the near future." Hasn't the situation changed with the release of the Akali chief Sant Harchand Singh Longowal and the seven other prominent Akali leaders? Pat comes the reply from the firebrand daughter of the legendary Akali leader and the former party president, Master Tara Singh: "It is a tactical move of the government. I very much doubt the sincerity of Rajiv about the Punjab problem Moreover, the release of the Akali leaders is not of much significance. Other issues are more important—like the repression on the Sikh youth must stop, then the judicial enquiry into the Delhi riots, then the release of thousands of innocent Sikh youth now languishing in jails for months." Elaborating on the "tactics" of the government in releasing Longowal and Talwandi, the Istri Akali Dal chief and former Akali Lok Sabha member explained, "The government wants that the two of them (Longowal and Talwandi) keep on fighting. And obviously the government is very successful in its move." Of course, she sounds convincing in her argument

Jathedar Jagdev Singh Talwandi, president of the rival Akali Dal began his attack against Sant Longowal immediately after his release from the Ambala central jail. Talking to the press after his party's 20 March meeting in Amritsar, Talwandi unequivocally held Longowal responsible for the death of the militant Sikh priest, Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale. Again, though Longowal strongly denied this, Talwandi did not mince words in accusing both Tohra and Longowal of having surrendered to the army in the Golden Temple on 6 June last year. Talwandi, the former president of the undivided Akali Dal, even went to the extent of openly announcing that Longowal struck some deal with the government before his release. Observers feel that even if the charges levelled by Talwandi against Longowal may not be true, the latter's image is getting tarnished in the Sikh community.

How do the five Sikh high priests whose role in Sikh politics had become rather prominent after Operation Bluestar feel about the changed situation in Punjab following the release of Sant Longowal and other senior Akali leaders? Are they hopeful that finally peace will be restored in Punjab? These questions are uppermost not only in the minds of the Sikhs but perhaps all Indians today Especially since the Sikh high priests were at the helm of affairs not only as the supreme authority of the Sikh community but the Akali Dal as well for the last nine months Comments Giani Sahib Singh, "It is a good but incomplete step by the government" The head priest of the Golden Temple was talking to SUNDAY at his residence expressing his views about the release of Sant Longowal and other Akali leaders Speaking in a tongue now typical of Longowal, the Sikh clergyman repeated a long list of demands including lifting the ban on the All India Sikh Student Federation (AISSF), withdrawal of army, abolition of special courts, release of all detained Sikhs including army deserters and of course a judicial probe into the November riots—all of which were to be accepted without delay Giani Sahib Singh said, "If all the demands are accepted then things can improve considerably." He stressed that "the government should have a lenient view about the Sikh armymen who deserted after Operation Bluestar. They are not traitors or anti-nationals. They only acted under strong religious sentiments after learning about the destruction of the Harimander Sahab The government should free them and also reinstate them." The Golden Temple head priest was "not ready" to give his reaction about the appointment of the former Madhya Pradesh chief minister, Mr Arjun Singh, as the new Punjab Governor He quipped, "It is a political matter and we have no role in politics."

Giani Sahib Singh

Another Sikh high priest, Giani Pritam Singh, head priest of the Akal Takht, evidently lacking clear understanding of the complex Punjab problem and Akali politics suggested, "We all (the five high priests) have the same opinion. So if you have already talked to Jathedar Kirpal Singh and Giani Sahib Singh, then you are at liberty to endorse their views on my behalf too. But I will like to add one thing. It is the duty of every Sikh to pray to Wahe Guru for the restoration of amity and goodwill in Punjab."

If the high priests do not want to be vocal in discussing the political situation in Punjab, Sikh intellectuals say the fault does not lie with them First, they should confine themselves to the religious matters of the Sikhs and secondly, the Sikh intellectuals feel that the high priests do not possess the necessary political acumen. Said Dilbir Singh, a Sikh intellectual and member of the chief Khalsa Diwan, "Let the clergy not meddle with politics. We have already suffered in the rise of fundamentalism advocated by Bhindranwale. We do not want another Khomeini of Sikhs." Dilbir Singh, who maintains a fine rapport both with the Akalis as well as the government (he is a personal friend of President Giani Zail Singh) is of the view that the government's gesture of releasing Sant Longowal, was an appropriate one. He says, "The Sikhs who had been feeling leaderless for quite some time have a feeling now that they have a leader. Longowal is the acknowledged leader of the Sikhs today."

On the other hand, the president of the Punjab unit of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), Dr Baldev Prakash, is not at all hopeful that normalcy will ever be restored in Punjab He asks, "Who will accept their demands which go on increasing every day? The goal of the Akalis is Khalistan and hence they will never be satisfied even if you give Chandigarh to Punjab and accept the other economic demands. With Talwandi having now started openly demanding status of a Sikh state, we are certainly heading for bad days in Punjab." Sums up Shyam Sunder Bhatia, an RSS activist and the younger brother of Raghunandan Lal Bhatia, president of Punjab PCC(I), "Rajiv Gandhi should give a unilateral decision on Punjab whether that is acceptable to the Akalis or not."

Sanjeev Gaur, Amritsar

'The Sikh has begun to wonder whether he can live in India'

Sant Harchand Singh Longowal told Kuldip Nayar

The place was a gurudwara near Sangrur, the pind of Sant Harchand Singh Longowal, president of the Shiromani Akali Dal and "dictator" of the party's morcha. The Sant had just been released from Udaipur jail after nine months: he had been arrested during Operation Bluestar by the army. Great events had shaken the nation in these months: this was the first opportunity the Sant had of reacting to them. The very first programme on his schedule after his release was a series of meetings at gurudwaras interspersed with visits to the homes of those killed in the Akali agitation and Operation Bluestar. The Sant met* Kuldip Nayar *after one such gurudwara meeting—and spoke out frankly in an interview which is bound to cause major ripples.

Q: It is said that in May, a few days before Operation Bluestar, Gurcharan Singh Tohra, the SGPC chief, had agreed to a formula to integrate Chandigarh with Punjab in lieu of Abohar with Haryana and refer Fazilka to a territorial commission. How far is this true?

A: This is not true.

Q: Was such a formula ever placed before you ?

A: No. I don't know anything about it.

Q. Was there any formula which would suggest that the government wanted to come to an agreement before Operation Bluestar ?

A: Really speaking, whenever the government wanted to have negotiations, we always welcomed it. But after every meeting we became more convinced that the government only wanted to serve its own ends and would sacrifice the interests of the people. It was then that we resolved that it was no use talking to them. Later the opposition parties forced us to resume the dialogue. My party was not really for it, but I forced it to respond. Nothing came out of those meetings. Then there were four other meetings which were secret. They too were of no use. We finally came to the conclusion that the government wanted only to shame us, embarrass us.

Q: Was there any new proposal at these meetings?

A: No, it was the same old story. (Surjit Singh Barnala, who had participated in these meetings and was present during the interview, interjected: "There was nothing new except that Chandigarh be divided".) It meant humiliating us after inviting us to the talks. Then there was a meeting on 14 February. The opposition forced us to attend the meeting. I agreed because we did not want the people to get the impression that the government wanted to settle the problem but the Akalis did not. The meeting started on 14 February; the government, the opposition and we participated in it.

While this meeting was taking place, Bhajan Lal, with his force, was dragging Sikhs from vehicles and killing them—at Karnal and Panipat and other places, they burnt the gurudwaras. The Akali Dal representatives said to themselves that this was a government which humiliated the Sikhs. They left everything and came back.

Q: Do you at times feel that the opposition let you down?

A: As far as we are concerned we have always supported the opposition; for example, while challenging the Emergency. Whatever has happened to us is only the (Congress) government's revenge for our support to the opposition. We took a stand and fought bravely. We threw out an authoritarian government and established democratic rule. Mrs Gandhi wanted to take revenge on the Sikhs and make them lower their heads (for the Akali role during the Emergency).

Q: Why do you think Mrs Gandhi turned against the Sikhs, with whom she had the best of relations at one time?

A: A ruler like her loves her interests more than those of the people. Mrs Gandhi was in love with her own interests: I, my sons and my grandsons should rule, this sort of attitude.

Q: There have been reports that some people met you in jail (after Operation Bluestar) to pursue the talks for a settlement. Are these correct?

A: Newspapers reported that Mrs Gandhi met me, that Rajiv Gandhi met me. This is not true. No one met me.

Q: Not even Mr Subramaniam, adviser to the Punjab Governor?

A: Yes, Subramaniam met me. He asked me how the Punjab issue could be settled

Q: Do you remember the date?

A: No, after staying alone in jail, one's memory becomes faulty I asked him whether he had come to find a solution or to further humiliate me. I told him that there should first be a judicial inquiry to punish those who killed the Sikhs in Delhi, Kanpur and the rest of India and the victims should be rehabiliated. I said, release all the Sikhs, whether they are Akali workers or others, students or soldiers who started going towards Amritsar to express their anger against Operation Bluestar, also treat those (the Sikhs) who hijacked the planes on a par with those (other hijackers) who have been rewarded with seats in Parliament and Assemblies. Also abolish special courts, withdraw the army from Punjab. Only after that come and ask me.

Q: Did anybody else meet you on behalf of the government?

A: Buta Singh came once He entered my room when I was reading the scriptures. He went on saying something. I told him: Sardarji, go to the Akal Takht. The panth comes first (Buta Singh has been excommunicated by the five high priests and has been asked to explain his conduct before the Akal Takht).

Q: How were you treated in jail?

A: For the first three months, they did not allow us any contact whatsoever with the outside world. Then after Ram Jethmalani pleaded at the Supreme Court, I started getting The Tribune but it was always 10 days old

Q: Were you given a radio?

A: No, not even for a day during the nine months of detention. My people brought radio and TV sets. But the government did not allow them in.

Q: Then when did you hear about Mrs Gandhi's assassination?

A: I was never told. I overheard two policemen talking and felt that it was about something grave that had happened in the country. When I asked them what had happened, they said they did not know anything. Subsequently, the jail superintendent told me, and that too in a very low tone as if he did not want anyone to know that he had told me. He was the one who said that Mrs Gandhi had been murdered.

Q: What was your feeling when you heard about it?

A: It was the same feeling as a person in jail should have.

Q: What do you think is its political impact. To be more specific, has this assassination stalled the settlement?

A: The problem has got very tangled. The Sikh has begun to wonder after the assassination—and even before it—whether he can live in India and what his future will be.

Q: You must have at least felt for a personality like Mrs Gandhi who had been eliminated by murder.

A: In India, everyday there is a murder of an honest man. Looking at all of this, one feels that such things should not happen. I do not want it to happen I do not want to single out any person. Taking into consideration the happenings in India, particularly murders, the Sikhs and all other people feel that such things are not in the interest of the country.

Q: Didn't you say in one of your speeches that Operation Bluestar was tantamount to the murder of the Akal Takht, no less significant than Mrs Gandhi's assassination?

A: What I said was that those who say that Mrs Gandhi's assassination was like the felling of a big tree should realise that the destruction of the Akal Takht, which all Sikhs hold sacred and worship, was like the felling of a big tree for the Sikhs and if, after hearing about it, they started this journey towards Amritsar, it was only natural.

Q: If the Akali Party does not condemn the killing of Mrs Gandhi in the strongest terms, don't you think that it will encourage some

Sant Longowal at Delhi airport on his way to Amritsar after his release

Every Sikh asks himself whether he has any place in this country. He nourishes anger, he wonders what status he enjoys and how he can regain respect.

Newspapers reported that Mrs Gandhi met, that Rajiv Gandhi met me (in jail). This is not true. No one met me.

Sikhs to think that the politics of murder is justifiable and further, some might attempt to kill more people?

A: The effect of cruelty (jabar) or revenge is not good. Those who indulge in cruelty face similar consequences.

Q: That means there should be no spirit of revenge.

A: There is no spirit of revenge in the Sikh religion.

Q: In that case you should have no hesitation in condemning Mrs Gandhi's assassination.

A: Why are we being forced to condemn (Mrs Gandhi's assassination) when none so far has condemned those who destroyed the Akal Takht and Harimandir Sahib, killed the innocent, burnt children alive, raped women and destroyed hearths and homes. Why is there this emphasis on our condemning Mrs Gandhi's murder?

Sant Longowal (right) with his followers

Q. Could you tell me what happened to you on 5 June or during Operation Bluestar? But before you do that, let me check with you something which has been said repeatedly. The day before Operation Bluestar, did Bhindranwale's men come to you and say that you must announce the birth of Khalistan and did you say 'no' to that?

A: The truth is that two persons I did not know, went to Sant Bhindranwale and asked him to announce the birth of Khalistan through the transmitter they said he possessed. He said he would not announce that, adding that his policy was the same as that of the Akali Dal. He said: 'If you want this to be done go to the Akali Dal chief. He is the only one who can do it. If he does it, I shall also do so.' Later those persons came to us and asked us to announce the birth of Khalistan. They told us they had been to Sant Bhindranwale. We asked them what they had told the Sant. They said that if Sant Longowal were to announce it, he would support it.

Buta Singh once came (to meet me in jail). He entered my room when I was reading the scriptures. He went on saying something. I told him: 'Sardarji, go to the Akal Takht. The panth comes first.'

Q: How true is the story of Comrade Surjit (the CPI-M politburo member) that Bhindranwale had asked you to announce on the transmitter, the establishment of Khalistan?

A: Harkishen Singh Surjit was making two attacks with the same sword. On the one hand he would call him (Bhindranwale) a traitor and on the other hand he would praise him. I can say with authority that Bhindranwale had no links with Pakistan, nor with the CIA. My argument is that if he had connections with the CIA or Pakistan—and this was meant to make him fight against the Indian government—he (Surjit Singh) would not have separated me from Bhindranwale; he would have kept us together. The real thing is that the RAW was working there, the government of India had planted some people: they were neither Bhindranwale's men nor ours.

Q. Can you give the sequence of events?

A. On 1 June we complained to the Governor about the firing at the Golden Temple. He said he had no hand in it and that whatever happened, it was at the centre's instance. We told him that he was responsible for Punjab after which he did make efforts—he contacted the local deputy commissioner, superintendent of police, inspector general and deputy inspector general of police and informed us that the firing had been stopped. We told him that the firing was continuing; he said it was from inside. I told him it was my responsibility if it were so and that no firing was taking place from inside, all the firing was from outside. After several hours he was able to have the firing stopped. On 2 June the Sikhs found Harimandir Sahib pockmarked by bullets; it had been hit by 36 bullets fired from three sides and this infuriated every Sikh. On the evening of 2 June Mrs Gandhi made the statement over All India Radio; on 3 June the entire Punjab was sealed off. Till then no one, neither the Punjab government nor the military, had told us that they wanted to arrest anyone; they did not say that if they were not allowed to make arrests, they would fire. The government did not say it wanted to arrest Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale. It never said that. On 4 June at four or five in the morning the first bomb fell on the Akal Takht, a big bomb. After that there was continuous firing with machine-guns, sten-guns. The firing was so heavy for three hours that nobody could hear anything. All the people stayed where they were. Many of them had come from outside as that was the day of Guru Purab of Guru Arjun Sahib. The firing continued on the 4th all day long. There was firing on 4 and 5 June at night; there was heavy firing. In the evening I went to Samundri Hall; there were about 500 people, the satyagrahis who had come for the morcha. After getting them together, I went to Tohra's room. He told me that he was then about to come to my room. There were seven or eight other Sikhs. The sun set at that time. Tohra sahib said his prayers. Then there was such heavy firing that no one could move out. On the fifth there was no water, no food, the tank had been destroyed, no one could go out to fetch anything because there was continuous firing. I think that by 5 June night, by 10 pm, the army had occupied the entire area, tanks were stationed on the middle road, they were continuously firing on the Samundari Hall, Guru Nanak Niwas, Guru Ram Das Sarai, then they went to the Parikrama and by about 3 pm occupied Guru Ram Das Sarai.

Q: When did they arrest you?

A: The same day on the 6th morning. Later they arrested all the volunteers in Samundari Hall. After doing that they came near our room and threw the first bomb. They said: 'You are under arrest and, therefore, offer yourself for arrest.'

Q: Did anyone of Bhindranwale's men tell you at that time not to offer yourself for arrest, otherwise they would kill you?

A: This is not true, no one told us anything like that. In fact, Harminder Singh Sandhu, Mehta and Manjit Singh—Sant Bhindranwale's men—were sitting with our men till the evening. If they had wanted to harm us they could have done it at any time. Really speaking, this was the rumour spread by the RAW; the government wanted to kill us and attribute the killings to them. This propaganda has been done by the government. Tohra Sahib, I and others told the army that we were prepared for the arrest or to face their bullets, and to do whatever they wanted to do.

Then they took us to the "executive's" room—in the process two of our Sikh colleagues were hit by bullets—and posted guards armed with machine-guns. This created an ugly situation. The volunteers, including the women of the jatha, stood between us and the armymen, thinking that we were facing a firing squad. It almost came to a fight. We intervened and told them to allow us to offer ourselves for arrest. We said: 'If they want to kill, let it be; everyone has to die After killing us, they will kill you. Now you should not do anything.' They were pacified. After 15 minutes, the leaders of the troops said that the buses had come and all the Sikh jathas would be taken out. Tohra Sahib, I and seven or eight others were confined to the room. We were not allowed to go out, nor was anybody allowed to meet us. At that time at least 600 people were there. After half an hour, the troops gave a "fauji sign" that they would throw a bomb. One military man among us told us to lie down because they would be opening fire. He himself lay down but others watched the fight. They opened fire and began to throw bombs. Some people were killed by bullets and some by bombs. Some were arrested and shot while under arrest. And subsequently, it was given out that the boys of the Sikh Students Federation had thrown the bombs from outside but those boys were sitting with us. We did not know the details because we were away from the place of the incident and there was a lot of noise. Then at 11 pm there was a big noise; some people came running to us. We also shouted and told a colonel, who reached the spot that he should be ashamed of himself; if they wanted to kill us, we were all ready; but was the army meant to kill the public, the people of their own country? We said, "You are committing a crime by killing the people after arresting them." This had its effect; the firing stopped Down below in the basement, many bhaiyas stay, 2,000 to 3,000 of them; they eat at the langar (free kitchen) and spend the night there. Because of the emergency they stayed there. They too were shot. They were not Akalis, Sikhs or extremists; they were either beggars, labourers or rickshaw pullers. We asked the troops why they were killed; they said that they had to complete their quota. In the evening at five, we were taken to a bungalow at the troops' headquarters and guards were posted there. We were warned not to stir out because their instructions were to kill anyone who came out. We stayed in the room. This was on 6 June; we

When have the Sikhs done anything against the country? Since they have never done it, the question (of pacifying them) does not arise. I can only say that the Sikhs are angry...

Sant Longowal in Amritsar were kept there also the next day, the seventh. On 8 June, we were told that we would be taken to jail. We asked them where; they said they could not say. They took Tohra Sahib to Jodhpur and I was taken to Udaipur.

Q: Was it in a special plane?

A: Yes, it was.

Q: During those three days, from the 3rd till you left, did you meet Bhindranwale?

A: None of us met Bhindranwale; there was continuous firing all around. If anyone stirred out, he was killed there and then.

Q: During the interview you mentioned that no one told you that the authorities wanted to arrest anyone. Suppose the government had asked you to help it in arresting Bhindranwale, would you have done it?*

A: We would have thought what should be done in our interest. Perhaps we would have offered ourselves for martyrdom, while remaining peaceful.

Q: Suppose the government had asked for Bhindranwale's arrest?

A ruler like Mrs Gandhi loves her interests more than those of the people. Mrs Gandhi was in love with her own interests: I, my sons and my grandsons should rule; this sort of attitude.

Why are we being forced to condemn Mrs Gandhi's assassination when none so far has condemned those who destroyed the Akal Takht and the Harimandi r Sahib, killed the innocent, burnt children alive, raped women and destroyed hearths and homes? Why is there this emphasis on our condemning Mrs Gandhi's murder?

A. This was for Sant Bhindranwale to decide.

Q: Was there any contact between you and Bhindranwale in the weeks before the action?

A: Our relationship was such that we spoke very little.

Q It is said that you two were not on speaking terms. Is that true?

A· For six months, there was no conversation between us Sant Bhindranwale did not speak to me for six months. I do not know why. Someone told him something and he took a vow not to speak to me, though he would follow the programme of the Akali Dal. This is common among us village folk, we take a vow not to speak to someone.

I sent people to inquire what our quarrel was about; we were both fighting for the rights of the Sikhs, the rights of Punjab and, hence, there could be no differences between us. He said he was helpless because he had taken a vow not to speak to me.

Q: Why did he take the vow?

A: Someone had poisoned his ears.

Q: Has it not surprised you that there were so many weapons in the Akal Takht and those there could keep on firing for such a long time?

A: Our belief is that so many arms could not have come into the place; there were three barriers, one at the gate, one at Jalianwala Bagh and one before that; there were also other checks. Every person was searched, whether man or woman, so also all suitcases, luggage and all vehicles—this continued for one year. Why could not the government catch even one pilgrim with weapons? If the government could not catch anyone, how can we say that the weapons were found within the premises of the Temple? In reality, to malign us and to create hatred towards our religion, it was the government which brought in army weapons in trucks and dumped them in the gurudwara.

Q: But the fact remains that there was heavy firing from the Akal Takht and many soldiers were killed.

CNS

Indira Gandhi's body being taken out of the hospital

A: I can vouch for those who died in front of me. They did not have any weapons; they would have offered themselves for arrest peacefully.

Q: I am talking of the Akal Takht side where you were not present.

A: Even on that side those who were killed were innocent; they had come on pilgrimage and were stuck.

Q: True, some were pilgrims but there were others, and had they not fortified the Takht and did they not fight from bunkers?

A: If the government had not removed dead bodies after the shooting we could have said that these dead bodies were from the Akal Takht.

Q: At least 400 soldiers were killed.

A. When there is so much firing, who knows whose bullets killed whom?

Q: Do you think that arms should be kept in gurudwaras?

A: Yes, there should be arms in gurudwaras; we worship them. We do it at the Akal Takht, Kesargarh Sahib, and even in gurudwaras in England this is done.

Q: I am not talking about the kirpan or the sword; I am talking of weapons like sten-guns.

A: In the old days there were swords; now times have changed; the weapons have been improved. There is nothing wrong in possessing arms; only misusing them is bad.

Q: But once arms are allowed to be kept in gurduwaras, don't you think that they should be allowed to be kept in temples and mosques as well?

A: We received independence in 1947. Why was there no ban on weapons being kept in gurudwaras till 1982-83? This drama has been staged by the government. The people even then had weapons, they had to worship them, the Sikhs used to worship them; they carried five weapons at a time. revolvers, guns etc.; some even carried one and a quarter maunds of iron.

Q: Surely these are irrelevant when you know the type of arms recovered from the Golden Temple and the quantity.

A: Sant Bhindranwale and his escorts used to travel in buses; and they would carry licensed arms. With the same weapons he went to Delhi where he held prayers; many people came to pay their respects. At one Bhog ceremony probably Giani Zail Singh also did, though I do not know it for sure and Buta Singh came secretly. The Sant took the same weapons and other things to several parts of India. Why were they not called 'illegal' then, and why are they called 'illegal' now?

Q. And what would happen if the government were to pass a law banning weapons from all religious places, whether the gurudwara, mosque or temple?

A: It is a question for the nation (to decide). The Sikh does not tolerate any restriction on weapons. True, the licence holder will go with a licence; if he violates the rule, he will be arrested. In fact, the government should give arms to everyone in Punjab, especially those living near the border, so that they are strong and if need be, they could defend themselves against Pakistan.

A woman relates her woes to Sant Longowal in Amritsar

Q: What in your view is the most important question before the Sikhs today?

A: How to regain self-respect.

Q: What are the government's decisions which can help the Sikhs regain their self-respect?

A: Atonement should be made for what has been done against the Sikhs, for killing them the government should show repentance by punishing those guilty of that; the special courts should be abolished, the anti-terrorist act should be withdrawn; all the young men detained should be released—including hijackers and deserters. Thereafter, the Sikhs will decide how they can protect their honour. He will then list the steps to be taken and point out to the government what is left to be rectified.

Q: One is holding an inquiry, the other is releasing the youth under detention—what about those against whom there are charges of violence?

A: You know how the government concocts cases; they do this the same way as the British used to.

Q: You are comparing these cases with those of Bhola Pandey and other similar cases. But these hijackers are secessionists.

A: They expressed their protest to get justice.

Q: Is hijacking justifiable and a part of the Akali agitation to press its demands?

A: In one's own house if you are not happy about something you are justified in protesting peacefully.

Q: Will you send lawyers to Pakistan to defend the hijackers there?

A: I have been inside jail for nine months and after my release I have been touring villages. This question will be considered at the Akali Dal's meeting in Amritsar. It is customary in this world that if a family member commits a mistake, the entire family says that the child is 'innocent'. To prove a child's innocence, the family does all it can. And when the child is proved innocent, he has to be released.

Q: In that case, you think that there should be no action taken against deserters?

A: No, there should be no case against them. They only expressed their protest and if they wanted they could have revolted and done a lot of damage. But all that they did was to start for Harimandir Sahib. The army administers an oath on the basis of religion or the Guru that he would be loyal to the country. If he takes the oath on the basis of religion, how can he then tolerate any violation of his religion?

Q: How can you then maintain discipline in the army?

A: This is the responsibility of the government. It should maintain the country's discipline, give protection to the minorities and not create such feelings. The responsibility is that of the government.

Q: Suppose there is a judicial inquiry and all Sikhs are released, will that create the proper climate for bringing about peace in Punjab?

A: That climate can be noticed; there can be efforts to create that climate.

Q: And when that climate is created?

A: Then the problem of Punjab can be pondered over.

Q: How do you feel now that you have been released from jail?

A: We have felt after coming out that this country for which we have made so many sacrifices, is like the German government which ousted the Jews. It is maligning us in a similar way to turn us out of the country. This is our worry.

Q: Have you come to feel that the Sikhs

This country for which we have made so many sacrifices is like the German government which ousted the Jews. It is maligning us in a similar way to turn us out of the country.

Sant Longowal inside the Golden Temple complex after he was released from jail cannot live in this country as equal citizens?

A. Every Sikh asks himself whether he has any place in this country. He nourishes anger; he wonders what status he enjoys and how he can regain respect. When he is rebuffed, that will be a dangerous time for the country. All will suffer; the country may be destroyed

Q: The main point in dispute is not the Anandpur Sahib resolution, it is whether a community is a nation.

A: The national flag has three colours and still it is one flag. The Sikhs are a separate nation, so are the Muslims and the Hindus The three nations have one flag for the country. I am a Punjabi, but when I go outside I am a Bharati (an Indian).

Q: If the Sikhs are a separate nation, then does it mean that they should have a separate country?

A: We do not want a separate country; we don't want to separate ourselves from the country The government has one throne, we have five thrones, the Gurus created five thrones. We do not want separatism. But if the government were to force us, then we would think and say, 'Let's settle the price.'

The Sikhs have no quarrel with the Hindus or Muslims or Christians; our fight is against the person who sits on the throne of Delhi, who is trying to finish us.

Q: Persons like Jagjit Singh Chauhan are stoking the fires of communalism. They have launched a propaganda against India. What do you think of them?

A: If you were to look into the record of the last seven years, you would find who was behind him, who encouraged him. Please inquire into this. History will show who made him raise the slogan and who made him do all this. I do not want to say anything but study the record of the Congress for the past seven years.

Q: Do you propose to take some steps which will remove the suspicions of the Hindus?

A: We are already doing it. In India thousands of Sikhs were looted and killed; was there any retaliation in Punjab? The Congress wants to finish the Sikhs; so they (Sikhs) wage a war against the Congress. The Sikhs have no quarrel with the Hindus or Muslims or Christians; our fight is against the person who sits on the throne of Delhi, who is trying to finish us.

Q: Your quarrel was against Mrs Gandhi, not Rajiv Gandhi. I am sure Mrs Gandhi would not have released you because such steps were contrary to her scheme of things.

A: Mrs Gandhi acted from behind the curtains; he (Rajiv Gandhi) publicly killed thousands of Sikhs soon after sitting on the throne. It was done at his instance. He has gone farther than his mother in killing and terrorising Sikhs. Therefore, every Sikh has been forced to be against him.

Q: Don't you think that he stopped the riots quickly because they could have continued for another two weeks? Rajiv Gandhi's explanation is that he acted soon after he brought Mrs Gandhi's body home.

A: According to our source, this thing was to take place at that time. It was not Mrs Gandhi's assassination (which resulted in the riots). This thing was to take place two days later. Therefore, the same types of weapons, firearms and gunpowder were distributed all over the country. Otherwise, how do you explain that the rioting was similar all over? This was pre-planned and it was bound to happen.

Q: You mean to say that Mrs Gandhi had formulated the plan.

A: Her actions showed that. She defamed them (the Sikhs) as extremists and secessionists and said they would disintegrate the country, while the fact is that they have not been able to prove anything against them.

Q: Does the Akali party see any qualitative difference between Mrs Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi and does it consider the release of leaders as a gesture towards bringing about a solution in Punjab?

A: Mrs Gandhi accepted the Anandpur Sahib Resolution while he (Rajiv) says that he will not talk about it and he has maligned us throughout the country in the name of the Anandpur Sahib Resolution. There is a lot of difference. When we told her that the resolution did not envisage separatism, she told the Hindu leaders at Jalandhar that the Akalis had said that there was nothing in the resolution to suggest separatism. What has been said in the Anandpur Sahib Resolution is their promise. He cited the resolution on radio, TV and in newspapers to give a bad name to the Sikhs. There is a lot of difference between him and Mrs Gandhi.

Q: Suppose the government were to order an inquiry into the riots, release Sikhs in jails, give Chandigarh to Punjab and set up commissions to consider other issues, then how would you react?

A: Then we shall consider whether the nation (Sikhs) is satisfied.

Q: But these are your demands and if the government were to ultimately announce the acceptance, then what is the hitch?

A: (Barnala interjects: If that happens, then the matter is finished. We are not fighting for the sake of fighting.) Let them accept the Anandpur Sahib Resolution. In fact they have created these recent obstacles. If they were to remove them, there would be no problem.

Q: At one time you told me that the Anandpur Sahib Resolution was primarily meant to define centre-state relations and you wanted it to be referred to a commission. Since then the Sarkaria Commission has been appointed. So is it your stand that the resolution be referred to the Sarkaria Commission?

A: Our doubts have now become a conviction. Now we are convinced that the government really does not want us, the Sikhs, to stay in the country.

Q: That means that there won't be any solution till the government is changed.

A: Until the government changes its mind, there will be no solution.

Q: Let me be clear. Do you mean to say that your demand on the Anandpur Sahib Resolution is not met even if it is referred to the Sarkaria Commission?

A: The Sarkaria Commission is not relevant.

Q: Does it mean that what you said in the past is no longer relevant?

A: These things held good when they had not caught the Sikhs by the hair and thrown them down and when they had not demolished the Akal Takht. They have now greatly disturbed the Sikhs. Between the Sikhs and the government there is a heap of bodies. What has happened is like a picture before us: it will be there as long as the country is there.

Q: Would you be prepared to have an inquiry into what happened in Punjab, from the time of Jagat Narain's murder?

A: This is now an old story. We continued to demand it for many years. There were questions in Parliament. Mrs Gandhi made several statements. That meant that she was guilty, not us. We demanded that she should hold an inquiry through her own agency. She did not do it. She said that it was not necessary. In other words she did not want her guilt to be known to the public.

Q: Does it mean that you are against an inquiry into the happenings in Punjab?

A: Now we have gone quite far from the Punjab inquiry. The government has gone further from that inquiry. That time is long.

Sant Longowal converses with a follower

(Barnala intervened to say that it would now be an exercise in futility).

Q If there were fresh elections in Punjab, would the Akali Dal participate in it?

A: The Akali Dal will see how they want to hold the elections.

Q· Is there the possibility of a boycott?

A: Because of the anger that the Akali Dal and the Sikhs have, one cannot yet say what will be the outcome.

Q· Does that mean that the Akali Dal is becoming as extremist as Bhindranwale?

A: The Akali Dal has never taken any step which divides the people. The Dal has always kept the people's unity and India's unity before it. We have struggled while keeping these things in view. The Sikhs are now so full of anger against the government that one does not know what will be the outcome.

Q: But you cannot equate the country with the government.

A· Governments own the country.

Q: But governments can be thrown out. The country is yours.

A· If the feeling is that it is our country and we have our rights, then this can happen.

Q: Is not that feeling there?

A: No, this is not the feeling today, not after all that has happened to the Sikhs. It must be a very sad experience for them; and you too must be wondering what is in their minds.

Q: What do you think you should do to pacify the Sikhs?

A: When have the Sikhs done anything against the country? Since they have never done it, the other question does not arise. I can only say that the Sikhs are angry and I do not know what shape it will take. The government goes on alienating the Sikhs.

Q: The government at least did one good thing to release you.

A: (Smiles).

The national flag has three colours and still it is one flag. The Sikhs are a separate nation, so are the Muslims and the Hindus. The three nations have one flag for the country. I am a Punjabi, but when I go outside I am a Bharati (an Indian).

Punjab: The PM's Maiden Visit

Rajiv Gandhi had not chosen 23 March exclusively for Punjab. First, he flew to Ahmedabad the riot torn city of Gujarat. In the afternoon, the Prime Minister reached Hussainiwala on the Indo-Pak border in the Ferozepur district of Punjab. The Prime Minister spent the evening addressing the convocation of the Lucknow university. Obviously, it was a tight schedule.

But the Prime Minister's first visit to the troubled state of Punjab was a great disappointment for the people. Said a senior moderate Akali leader who did not wish to be named, "Rajiv Gandhi disillusioned Punjab on his first visit. Everyone had great expectations that he would make an important announcement. But he said nothing." To be frank, even Akalis were frustrated by the manner in which Rajiv Gandhi virtually skipped the political issue involved in the Punjab tangle in his Hussainiwala speech. Even the ruling party leaders in Punjab had been very optimistic about the Prime Minister taking a big step in the direction of restoring normalcy in Punjab during his first visit to the state. Commented a senior state Congress(I) leader who would not like to be identified for obvious reasons, "It appears that Rajiv Gandhi is in no great hurry to solve the Punjab tangle. He wants to take his own time. We all were hoping that he might announce an unilateral decision because a delay in resolving the Punjab problem can be more dangerous."

Hussainiwala is the placewhere 54 years ago three Indian martyrs—Bhagat Singh, Rajguru and Sukhdev—were cremated on the banks of the river Ravi after their bodies were brought by the British from the Lahore jail where they were hanged in the early hours of the morning of 23 March. Every year on this date, a Shahidi Mela is organised in the memory of Bhagat Singh and his other revolutionary colleagues. Thus the Prime Minister chose a good occasion to visit Punjab. Earlier it was the new Punjab Governor Arjun Singh who was to lay the foundation stone of the memorial at the Samadhis of Bhagat Singh, Rajguru and Sukhdev. But the programme changed two days before the function was to take place when Arjun Singh visited the capital. The Prime Minister and not the Punjab Governor would lay the foundation stone at Hussainiwala.

It was the exceptionally tight security arrangements at the venue which dampened the spirit of the people who had assembled at the Shahidi Mela. Said an elderly man, "The number of people present at Rajiv Gandhi's meeting this year was far less than the crowd in the previous years. Not that Rajiv Gandhi is not popular but the fact is that the simple village folks of Punjab are not used to being frisked and made to face a metal detector. Hence, they did not come in large numbers this time."

Rajiv Gandhi: brief speech

The venue of the public meeting at Hussainiwala looked more like a camp of the security forces. Top official sources disclosed that nearly 10,000 policemen were deployed at Hussainiwala at the venue of the meeting.

The Prime Minister was nearly two hours behind schedule when he arrived at Hussainiwala in a helicopter. Clad in a spotless white kurta, Mr Gandhi was also wearing a bullet-proof jacket. Immediately after alighting from the helicopter, the PM entered an Ambassador car and drove to the samadhis of the three Indian martyrs. A Sikh was driving the Prime Minister's car. Rajiv Gandhi in his usual style sat with the driver on the front seat and kept waving at the cheering crowds.

Other central leaders barring only Arun Singh were trying to keep pace with the PM. Arun Singh could be seen walking ahead after he got down from the car. The PM made a very brief speech. He spoke in Hindi for 14 minutes. He began with a tribute to Bhagat Singh. Said he, "Bhagat Singh raised the voice on India's freedom but he was not alone from Punjab." There were 50 journalists who were covering the PM's first Punjab visit. The PM came close to discussing the Punjab tangle. He said, "Today there are problems in Punjab. There are difficulties. We want to remove them. The problems are both economic and political but I will not dwell on the political problems of Punjab here." That was the end of the PM's speech. Bemoaned an Associated Press (AP) correspondent who had come from Delhi to cover the PM's visit, "The moment he said he would not discuss the political problems, I realised there was no story for me. Imagine I had come all the way from Delhi in the hope that he would make some announcement."

The latter part of Rajiv Gandhi's speech consisted of those routine type of "promises" which his mother also always used to make. An integrated railway coach factory in Punjab, work on the Thein dam would be expedited and a zonal cultural centre to be set up in Punjab for the entire northern India. In order to woo the Punjab farmers, the Prime Minister announced, "We are also thinking of giving you bonus on wheat." Of course, the Prime Minister's remark received loud applause from the crowd. But then the people present at the public meeting had assembled to hear Rajiv Gandhi speak on the Anandpur Sahib resolution, the Akali demands including the return of Chandigarh to Punjab and of course, a judicial probe into the Delhi riots. He did not repeat not even touch the subjects.

After 35 minutes, Rajiv Gandhi left Hussainiwala. Remarked Balbir Singh, a farmer from Nanakpura, a nearby Ferozepur village, who had come to attend Rajiv Gandhi's meeting "To be frank I had come to see the mela. I did not understand what he said. His speech was beyond my understanding."

Sanjeev Gaur, Amritsar

Lost: In Delhi Found: In the USA

Russian diplomat Igor Gueja's defection to the USA is announced more than a week after he disappeared from Delhi

Such events normally end up in defection—specially when someone from the Soviet bloc is concerned. While the Delhi police was still busy refuting all defection theories and the Soviets making out a case of abduction, Igor Gueja, third secretary in the formation office of the USSR in New Delhi was happily in the United States, ending formalities to begin a new life. He had not been abducted: he was the one that got away. One of the pleas taken by the police to discount the defection angle was that an announcement to that effect would not have taken such a long time in coming. But Igor Gueja's case, it seems, was slightly special.

The announcement of his surfacing in the United States and requesting for political asylum, when it was made by the ministry of external affairs, was immediately drowned in a downpour of "no comments" from all sides. The external affairs ministry had said that the Soviet ambassador in India V.N. Rykov had met the foreign secretary, Romesh Bhandari, on 23 March and told him that the Soviets had reason to believe that Gueja was already in the United States and had been granted political asylum there. The United States embassy in New Delhi however kept mum on the entire affair, saying nothing more than "no comment." The Soviet side confounded matters by giving contradictory statements on the defection. When contacted by SUNDAY on 24 March, the day the defection was announced, Sergei (he refused to give his full name) at the Soviet department of information said that ambassador Rykov had not met the Indian foreign secretary on the matter. Later, in a telephonic conversation, Soviet ambassador Rykov himself declined to comment on the matter saying, "We are not supposed to tell anything about our meeting with the Indian external affairs ministry to the press." Neither was he prepared to say anything about Gueja's reported defection. The external affairs ministry, nonetheless, categorically confirmed that the Soviet ambassador had met Romesh Bhandari and told him of Gueja's defection.

Igor Gueja

Indeed, there are indications that the Soviets came to know of Gueja's flight to the United States much before the announcement was made in New Delhi. Perhaps the strongest pointer towards that was the departure of Gueja's wife and 10-year-old daughter to Moscow on 23 March. They left by the evening Aeroflot flight along with the body of the slain Soviet diplomat V. Khutichenko. On being asked why she left the country, Sergei at the information department said with a shrug, "What would she have done here? We have an employment programme in Moscow, she can find herself a job there."

The announcement of the defection of Igor Gueja to the United States came exactly one week after the diplomat had been declared missing. The missing report was filed by the first secretary of the Soviet embassy, G. Golkoskyyi late in the evening of 17 March. The report was filed at the Tughlaq Road police station 12 hours after Gueja was last seen at the Lodi Gardens where he had gone for his morning stroll, as was his daily routine. It described Gueja as a slightly built man with wheatish complexion, wearing white shorts and a shirt at the time of his disappearance.

The police immediately launched a massive hunt for the missing diplomat. The large posse of policemen which was present at the India International Centre that evening to ensure the security of the Prime Minister who was to attend a function

The Importance of Igor Gueja

What does Igor Gueja's loss mean to the Soviet Union? Apparently a lot, if diplomatic circles in New Delhi are to be believed. He was not simply a third secretary in the information department of the USSR: he was much more. Western diplomatic sources say Igor Gueja was one of the men coordinating the work of all East Bloc establishments in India and a man worth a lot of information. The Soviets too, it seems, had of late realised the importance (or risks?) of keeping Gueja in Delhi and were planning to send him back to Moscow soon.

There are several indications to the effect that Igor Gueja was much more than he actually made himself out to be. Even after being in the country for about five years his name was not on the diplomatic list. What is more, despite his "low-down" status in USSR's diplomatic hierarchy in India, he was allowed an exceptional freedom of movement. Normally, the staff at the USSR mission requires prior permission to go out of the official premises: most of the time they go out in groups. But Igor Gueja, it seems, had been moving around quite freely and alone. Apparently he had the high security clearance which is given only to a select few.

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

there, was diverted to the sprawling Lodi Gardens. The same evening the cabinet committee on political affairs discussed the incident and declared it to be a "possible case of defection." Officials of the Soviet embassy were tightlipped about any possibility of defection and insisted that the police comb the entire city to discover whether there had been any foulplay concerning Gueja. As a consequence, all exit points of the city were blocked and messages flashed to all police stations and a group of Afghan nationals who were holding a demonstration outside the India International Centre were interrogated. As many as a hundred constables were put on the job of tracing the diplomat

The police, however, drew a complete blank in the case and till the day Gueja's defection was announced, had made no headway in the matter They had, in fact, already discredited the possibility of defection since Gueja had not surfaced in any country even seven days after he had disappeared. Said a senior police official a day before the announcement that Gueja had been granted political asylum in the United States, "We have reached a deadend in the case. We have no clue about the diplomat's disappearance." The clearest indication that the police had ruled out the possibility of defection was that they had filed a case of abduction as late as 22 March, five days after the missing report had been filed.

The circumstances of the disappearance of Gueja and the sequence of events that led to the diplomat's defection are intriguing. First the circumstances under which he disappeared left several questions unanswered. How was Gueja in the habit of going for daily jogs alone when Soviet embassy officials have strict instructions not to move out of the office alone? Gueja obviously had security clearance from the embassy. How is it that the name of Gueja did not figure in the diplomatic list of the embassy even though he had been posted in India since 1979? Why did the Soviet officials report the diplomat's disappearance hours after they had discovered it themselves and why had they hampered the progress of the investigation by entering the car driven by Gueja to the Lodi Gardens and removing all personal belongings and papers of Gueja which were lying in the vehicle at that time?

Soviet embassy officials divulged very little information about Gueja and the nature of his assignment in the country to either the Delhi police or the external affairs ministry which would have helped them decide whether Gueja's case could be one of a possible defection. Since Gueja enjoyed diplomatic status the police were not permitted to search his residence at 25 Barakhamba road. The wife of the diplomat, Natasha, was questioned by a policewoman but the questioning did not provide the police with any leads.

Very little is known either about

The Day of the Shoot-out

Is there a connection between the detection of Soviet diplomat, Igor Gueja and the assassination of Soviet official V. Khitzichenko? Khitzichenko was shot dead in broad daylight only five days after he was declared missing and at a time when a massive hunt for him was in progress in the capital. The official, a second engineer in the council of economic affairs at the Soviet embassy would seem like an unlikely target for such an assassination. He had come to India only last year and was working as senior engineer in a Hindustan Aeronautics Limited (HAL) project (in the MIG division). He had a friendly disposition, was fond of sports and interacted freely with Indian officials in the embassy. Khitzichenko lived in the residences of the economic division of the embassy with his wife, Nina Alesevna, and his 14-year old son Minutes before he was murdered, Khitzichenko, accompanied by his wife, had visited the Yashwant Place shopping centre, situated close to the embassy. The couple went to the shopping centre often and were well-known to several shop owners. On the day of the crime the couple visited a chemists shop in the market to purchase medicines for Khitzichenko and also ordered a leather coat at an adjoining shop. According to onlookers at the shopping centre, the couple left the shopping centre in their waiting Volga driven by their driver K. C. George. There was another embassy car in front and a Yezdi motorcycle followed the car as they drove towards the embassy.

There are three eye-witnesses to the crime, including a young girl, all of whom have wished to remain unidentified. By all accounts, Khitzichenko was gunned down with a 7.65 mm Jenko German machine-gun by the pillion rider on the Yezdi motorcycle. The description of the unidentified assailants could either fit Indian or Afghan nationals. The police are now checking lists of all Yezdi motorcycles in the capital and showing the eye-witnesses photographs of Afghan nationals settled in the capital who have had a notorious past. The police have not ruled out the possibility of the crime being committed by Sikh terrorists and have announced a red-alert in the capital to trace the assailants.

The Soviets and officials of their embassy are obviously rattled by the daring assassination of one of their men. Instructions have been issued to all embassy officials to minimise their movements and keep the embassy informed about their whereabouts. The Yashwant Place shopping complex, called a "Russian market," usually thronged with shoppers from the embassy, bears a deserted look. Security around the embassy was immediately tightened and members of the press rudely asked to contact the Delhi police about details of the assassination.

Minutes after the shoot-out, Soviet officials from the embassy took charge of affairs. They have not permitted the Delhi police to either question the deceased official's wife Nina or driver George. The post-mortem could not be conducted on the evening of the crime because of the absence of a Soviet doctor. The post-mortem was conducted the following morning by a panel of doctors of the Maulana Azad Medical College in the presence of a Soviet medical expert. Hours later, a special Aeroflot flight took off from the capital for Moscow with the body of the assassinated official. The Delhi police and the crime branch now have to establish the connection between the sensational murder and the mysterious disappearance of two Soviet embassy officials from the capital in quick succession.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

The Defection Which Embarrassed India

On 6 March 1967, a Russian woman walked into the American embassy in New Delhi and told the Marine guard that she was Stalin's daughter and wanted to go to the USA. The guard took her to an American official who looked at her passport and rushed to the American ambassador. The matter was referred to Washington. Shortly afterwards, the Russian woman was put on a plane to Switzerland, where the world's press was waiting for Svetlana Alliluyeva, Josef Stalin's favourite child.

The defection was sensational: Stalin's daughter was a big 'catch' for the Americans. There was an uproar in the Parliament in New Delhi but for the Indians, there could not have been anything more embarrassing. For the two months prior to Svetlana's defection she was the guest of Dinesh Singh who was minister of state in the ministry of external affairs. Moreover, Indo-Soviet relations were fairly good at the time and it was highly inconvenient for India to have the defection take place on Indian soil. In fact, shortly afterwards, the Indian government informed all missions that India would not allow defections or the granting of asylum.

Svetlana had come to New Delhi in January with the ashes of Brajesh Singh, her companion for the four years prior to his death. Brajesh Singh, whom she had met at an institute at a holiday resort in the Soviet Union was an uncle of Dinesh Singh. Svetlana was soon whisked off to Kalakankar in Uttar Pradesh (Brajesh Singh was the brother of the former ruler of Kalakankar) where she remained, practically incognito for two months: it was election time and she seemed fascinated by the entire electoral process.

Svetlana, who is said to be a rather emotional and impulsive woman, had wanted to remain in India but was told by the Dinesh Singh family that she ought to return home as she could always come back to India. Obviously, Stalin's daughter had security clearance for she was in possession of her own passport and moved about freely.

When Svetlana returned to Delhi from Kalakankar she shifted to the Soviet ambassador's residence. She was supposed to return to Moscow the following evening. In fact, she went shopping with the daughter of Mr T.N. Kaul, former envoy to Moscow, on the eve of her departure. It was during her second sojourn in New Delhi that she suddenly decided to defect to the United States. Until then she apparently kept talking about wanting to stay in India since she loved this country and indeed her keenness to stay on in India must have been fairly evident. Ram Manohar Lohia raised the issue in the Lok Sabha and wanted to know why Svetlana was not given asylum in this country: he had met her during her brief visit to Allahabad when she was returning from Kalakankar.

After Svetlana's defection, the Soviet ambassador to India was shortly transferred from New Delhi. The uproar in Parliament soon died down, but ever since then India has been ambivalent in its attitude towards people seeking asylum. It is reliably learnt that every year nearly half-a-dozen people from the East Bloc countries use India as an exit point when they want to defect.

There have been relatively few cases of diplomats from the East Bloc asking for asylum in India or defecting from here—but there have been mysterious disappearances. In the early Fifties the ambassador from Czechoslovakia defected from New Delhi; in the mid-Sixties there was a spectacular defection: over a dozen engineers and their families (they were working in a public sector undertaking in Ranchi) disappeared from a hotel in New Delhi and surfaced in Canada shortly thereafter, in 1962, a Russian sailor, Vladislav Tarasov, merely changed ships, and thereby countries, at the port in Calcutta: he went from a Soviet ship to an American ship. There have been a few cases in the Seventies in New Delhi. In the early Seventies a Russian working in the information office of the USSR walked out of Plaza cinema hall where he was seeing a night-show with a group of friends. He said he had a headache, but was never seen again. During the Emergency a daily from New Delhi carried a story about the defection of a second secretary in the USSR embassy who ran into the American embassy.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

Igor Gueja the man or the contacts he maintained in India. According to his colleagues at the information centre, he was quite an introvert. He, nevertheless, mixed easily with Indian officials at the information centre and often visited their homes. Gueja also spoke fluent English. According to official reports he was working in the information department and was involved with the publication of Soviet Land, a fortnightly published from the information centre. Gueja lived with his wife Natasha, ten-year-old daughter, Olga, and his elderly parents. He was to have been posted back to Moscow in a few weeks' time. When asked about the expected date of the diplomat's departure from the country, officials at the information centre said no official announcement about his transfer had been made and that Gueja could have received an extension in India if he had desired. Soviet embassy officials were unwilling to confirm the fact that Gueja had turned defector and had safely reached the USA. This in spite of the fact that it was the Soviet ambassador, V. N Rykov, who had personally informed the foreign secretary, Romesh Bhandari, that Gueja was either in the US embassy in Delhi or had reached a point outside the country. It was after this disclosure by the Soviet ambassador that the Indian government approached the American embassy and received a confirmation of the fact that Igor Gueja had been granted political asylum there.

It is not yet clear how Gueja obtained his passage from New Delhi to the United States and in which part of the United States he is now living. According to indications, Gueja had contacted the American embassy immediately after he left the Lodi Gardens and was taken away after a few hours. Since the police began their hunt for Gueja only late in the evening of 18 March, there was sufficient time for the diplomat to leave the city unchecked. Records at the Palam airport had no details of his departure, which lends credence to the possibility that Gueja could have travelled on a false name. According to police sources, Gueja could have flown to the United States from Kathmandu after going there from either Varanasi or Patna. Flights for Patna and Varanasi left Delhi after Gueja's disappearance that morning.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

ANALYSIS

A Lot of Boldness But a Bit of a Gamble

Ashok Lahiri of the Delhi School of Economics examines the central budget

Usually during budget time the questions that worry the public are of the nature of: 'Will the price of soap go up or not?' However, this time the concern and interest were far deeper than at other times. Rajiv Gandhi has been generating a lot of speculation about the future course of policies and action that his government would initiate ever since he came to power. His economic, social and political perceptions are different from those of our erstwhile Prime Ministers including Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Mrs Indira Gandhi. 'What new direction would the new government give to the country's economic policies?' is a question to which an answer was sought and it was meant to be provided by the budget.

V.P. Singh (right) arrives in Parliament to present the budget

Apart from other important reasons, a good deal of significance is attached to the budget as compared to the frequent pious pronouncements coming out of the officialdom at other times, this is one occasion when the government has to put its money where its mouth is. The government is a major actor in the economic scene of the nation—the central, state and union territories' governments together spend roughly 36 paise out of every rupee that is spent in this country—and the budget, presented before the Parliament, contains how the government spends and finances its money. There are limits to how much government policies and budgetary allocations can be changed over a year or two—there are on-going projects which have to be completed, there are wages and salaries of government employees which cannot be reduced, there is an administrative and legal machinery which cannot be changed overnight. However, given these constraints, the question that was being raised before the budget was: 'How different will it be?'

Direct Taxation

The budget for 1985-86 is indeed quite different from the earlier ones. The most drastic change has come in the area of direct taxation. Direct taxes comprise personal income tax, wealth tax, estate duties and corporate tax on business firms. The rates of all these taxes have been reduced across the board. It is of interest to note that it was Mrs Gandhi who had increased the marginal rate of personal income taxation on the highest slab from 82.5 per cent to 93.5 per cent in 1970. The exemption limit has been going up and the rates applicable to different categories of income groups have been gradually coming down over time—however, in one clean fell swoop the maximum rate has been brought down from roughly 62 per cent to 50 per cent. Wealth tax, applying to the property of an individual, has been decreased. Estate duty, which used to apply to the property of a person after his death, has been abolished. Corporate taxes, which apply to the profits of companies, have been reduced by 5 per cent.

Direct taxes have two objectives : resource mobilisation and distributive justice. The government needs funds to finance its activities and taxes constitute one of its major sources of revenues. However, personal income tax, estate duty or wealth tax have never been a major source of income for the government. In the last year, for example, the total receipts from these three heads was a paltry sum of Rs 1932 crores compared to a total gross tax revenue of Rs 23702 crores. There are reasons to believe that widespread tax evasion is taking place in the country leading to accumulation of black money and the emergence of a parallel economy. Direct taxes, because of evasion, could not have been playing much of an egalitarian distributive role. A drastic reduction in the tax rates was necessary in view of the widening gulf between individual and social perspectives and the efficiency level of the administrative-legal machinery. Whether the tax payers would consider honesty to be a 'practical principle' in view of the reduced tax rates is the most important question for the next few years. The new government has displayed a lot of courage in admitting the deficiency of its tax administration and in its acceptance of social reality—it is indeed a bold departure from the heady days of populist radicalism.

Economic Climate

The budget is the major instrument through which the government tries to direct economic activity of the nation. The direction has to change from time to time depending on the economic climate and performance. Every year before the presentation of the budget, the ministry of finance circulates the Economic Survey summarising the economic situation, major developments and the problems and prospects.

The Economic Survey presented this year notes the satisfactory average growth rate of 5.2 per cent achieved by the economy during the Sixth Plan Period, the high level of foodgrains output of more than 150 million tonnes and adequate performance by the infrastructural sectors of energy and transport.

However, the government has also voiced its concern about three disturbing features. Firstly, manufacturing activity has behaved rather sluggishly. It is indeed very disconcerting to note that the manufacture of consumer non-durables marginally declined between March and September 1984. Secondly, the price situation has been one of a very fragile equilibrium—demand-supply imbalances in essential commodities such as pulses and edible oils have threatened price stability time and again with speculative action. Thirdly, the government has voiced its concern about the future of the country's balance of payments. Repayments for the SDR 3.9 billion borrowed from the IMF begin this year. Imports of petroleum could be curtailed in the past due to the spectacular rise in the domestic production of crude petroleum—production almost trebled from 10.5 million tonnes in 1984-85. This rate of growth in domestic production is unlikely to be sustained in the future and the balance of payments outlook is not very bright.

Whether the tax payers would consider honesty to be a 'practical principle' in view of the reduced tax rates is the most important question for the next few years. The new government has displayed a lot of courage in admitting the deficiency of its tax administration...

Government Policy Response

How has the new government responded to these developments? The government feels that reduction of costs and improvement in the competitiveness of our industry hold the key to success. It has brought in a series of deregulations such as delicencing, upward revision of asset limit for companies to come under the purview of the Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practices (MRTP) Act, raising of the ceiling of investment in plant and machinery for the small scale sector. The rate of customs duty has been brought down on project imports, specified machinery used by leather and footwear industry, gem and jewellery industry, raw wool, automobile and computer components. All these measures, the government expects will reduce costs, increase competitiveness and efficiency of Indian industry. This is also expected to improve our export performance.

Why Indian industry has been performing sluggishly is a million dollar question. Inefficiency resulting from inappropriate choice of scale and technology, protection from internal and international competition, infrastructural constraints specially with respect to power, definitely has contributed a lot to the unsatisfactory performance. However, the demand problem has also played a major role in inhibiting industrial growth in India. Insufficient demand for the output of industry has been known to constrain growth in developed countries. However, in developing countries for a long time it was believed that given limited capacity of industry, demand could never fall short of maximum output that industry is capable of producing. There has been some revision of opinion of economists on this score but the government neither in its Economic Survey nor in its budget has given full recognition to this problem. We shall have more about this aspect later.

In the last thirty four years of planning in India, the government has mobilised resources and channelled them into various sectors according to its plan priorities. Between 1950-51 and 1984-85, the total expenditure of the central government has gone up by more than 80 times. In the last five years, on the average total expenditure of the government has gone up at the rate of 18 per cent per annum. The budget this time is the first one for the Seventh Plan and interestingly enough the government is planning for a less than 10 per cent rise in its total disbursements. Given the resource constraints faced by the government in the financing of its Seventh Plan—which is reported to be of the order of Rs 40,000 crores—this budget, which does not try to meet the plan outlays stipulated in the Seventh Plan cannot but entail the following two implications: the government is going to revise its Seventh Plan and it is going to bring about a major change in its previous economic strategy of reaching the commanding heights of the economy. It is not quite clear whether Yojana Bhavan feels that the optimum height has already been reached or that it has run out of ideas as to how to mobilise additional resources to go higher up.

Growth of tax revenue has been tardy and barely kept pace with the growth of national income and non-developmental expenditure. This creates a problem of financing development expenditure on an increasing scale over time. Expenditure on account of fertilizer and food subsidy, defence and general administration take away a large chunk of the government's revenue. It is not easy to curtail such expenditure just as it is not easy to augment tax revenues from better tax administration Not that there are a lot of ideas floating around about how to get over the resource constraint—however, the government also seems to have thrown its hands up in despair and harped on mobilisation of additional resources through improved working of public sector undertakings and increased contributions from them

The budgeted capital disbursements that is expenditure on acquisition of assets like land, buildings and machinery--in the current year is marginally lower than the actual expenditure incurred last year However, in terms of allocation the emphasis seems to have undergone a change The area of water and power development has been accorded top priority and the allocation has been doubled. This has been achieved mainly at the cost of a reduction in the allocation to telecommunications, industry and minerals Irrigation is perhaps the most crucial requirement of Indian agriculture and this emphasis of the current budget is well conceived

Prices

What has attracted a lot of attention in this budget is the 'uncovered deficit' of Rs 3349 crores The budgeted deficit—which is the gap between estimated expenditure and receipts--is substantially higher than in the previous years. Isn't this budgeted figure too high? Will not the actual deficit be a couple of times higher than the budgeted figure? And when this deficit is indeed covered by additional supply of money will this not lead to inflation? These are questions that worry a lot of people

The association between budgeted deficit and either money supply or prices is a rather complicated one. Firstly, the actual deficit can be different from the budgeted deficit due to unforeseen changes in receipts or expenditures. Secondly, money supply depends on a whole host of factors rather than the deficit in general and on the foreign exchange reserves in particular Nevertheless there is undoubtedly a reason for concern—money supply can indeed grow at a very high rate in the current year unless our imports surpass exports in a drastic way leading to a fall in foreign exchange reserves or severe contractionary measures are initiated in the field of monetary policy. A high growth of money supply can lead to inflation if the rate of growth of output is not large enough.

The international price of petroleum has not gone up in recent times in terms of US dollars. However, the rupee has been depreciating vis-a-vis the dollar. Consequently, the government has raised the domestic price of petroleum by as much as 14½ per cent. In the railway budget, the freight rates and fares have been revised upward The higher transportation cost in the economy as a result of these two measures is bound to get reflected in a rise in the level of product prices.

How prices will behave in the economy over the next twelve months depends on the future performance of agriculture and foreign trade and the monetary policy stance of the Reserve Bank of India It will be very gratifying if the inflation rate in the current year does not go well above the rates that have prevailed in the recent past and assume a two digit figure.

The budget is a bold experiment...It contains clear admission of the government about its inability to implement the tax rules that it had inherited from the past. It admits that the government has run out of ideas regarding resource mobilisation. It announces in no uncertain terms that it is unwilling to continue with the old industrial policy framework.

A Bold Experiment

The current budget is a bold experiment If there is one thing that it does not lack it is courage. It contains clear admission of the government about its inability to implement the tax rules that it had inherited from the past. It admits that the government has run out of ideas about resource mobilisation. It announces in no uncertain terms that it is unwilling to continue with the old industrial policy framework. According to the finance minister: "We must now aim at reducing costs and prices and improve the competitiveness of our industry. This process calls for structural changes in the economy and will entail some costs which we should be prepared to pay."

Indian industry has been carefully nurtured by the government in the post-independence period. The government has created the infrastructural facilities, laid out the foundations for core and basic industries, protected it from foreign as well as internal competition, and created an investment climate by a vigorous and sustained programme of public investment. If it slowly withdraws now, will the private sector successfully fend for itself and drive the economy along a satisfactory growth path?

The answer to the above question is not known a priori. The demand problem will arise unless private investment displays a lot of buoyant dynamism. It has been our past experience that public investment sets the pace for private investment in the economy. The base of entrepreneurship has grown and the structure of industry has diversified enormously in the last three decades. Nevertheless the growth performance of the private sector has not been glorious enough to repose our complete faith in its leadership.

Investment depends on capital market conditions like the rate of interest, availability of credit, input price and the future market conditions. Since investment fructifies in the future, our assessment of the future is crucial in determining how much we shall invest. Perhaps since the future is soo vague and uncertain, probabilistic calculations of the future profitability of investment outlays are not very meaningful and investment ultimately depends on innate characteristics of the entrepreneurs--on things like creative urge, dynamic optimism—characteristics which have been summed up by the delightful phrase 'animal spirits' by the economist's economist John Maynard Keynes. From this budget it seems that the present government has placed a heavy reliance on the 'animal spirits' of the Indian private entrepreneur.

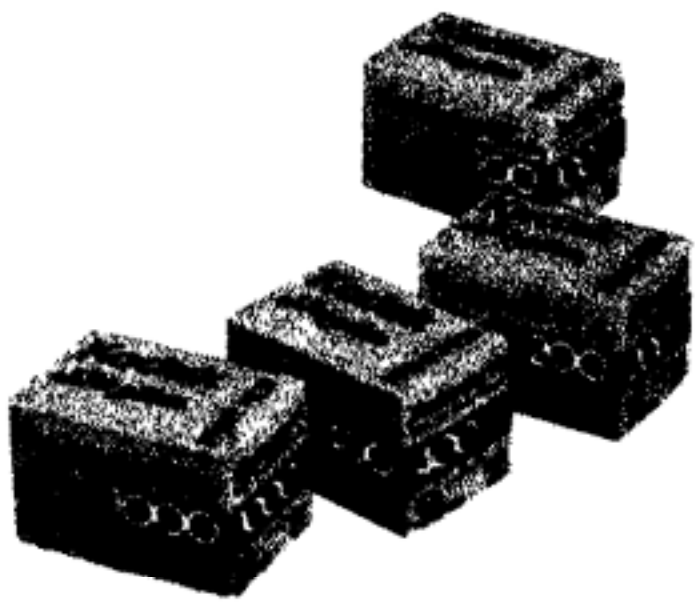
As far as the public sector goes, the thrust of government policy is towards improvement in efficiency and increases in surpluses. Not much structural change has taken place in the running of public sector undertakings so far—however, the computers are coming and we have to wait for some more time to see what the government has up its sleeve!

The four most advanced Kodak films the world has ever seen.

The Kodacolor VR Films.

The family of 35 mm Kodacolor VR* films embodies dramatic advances in speed, grain and sharpness.

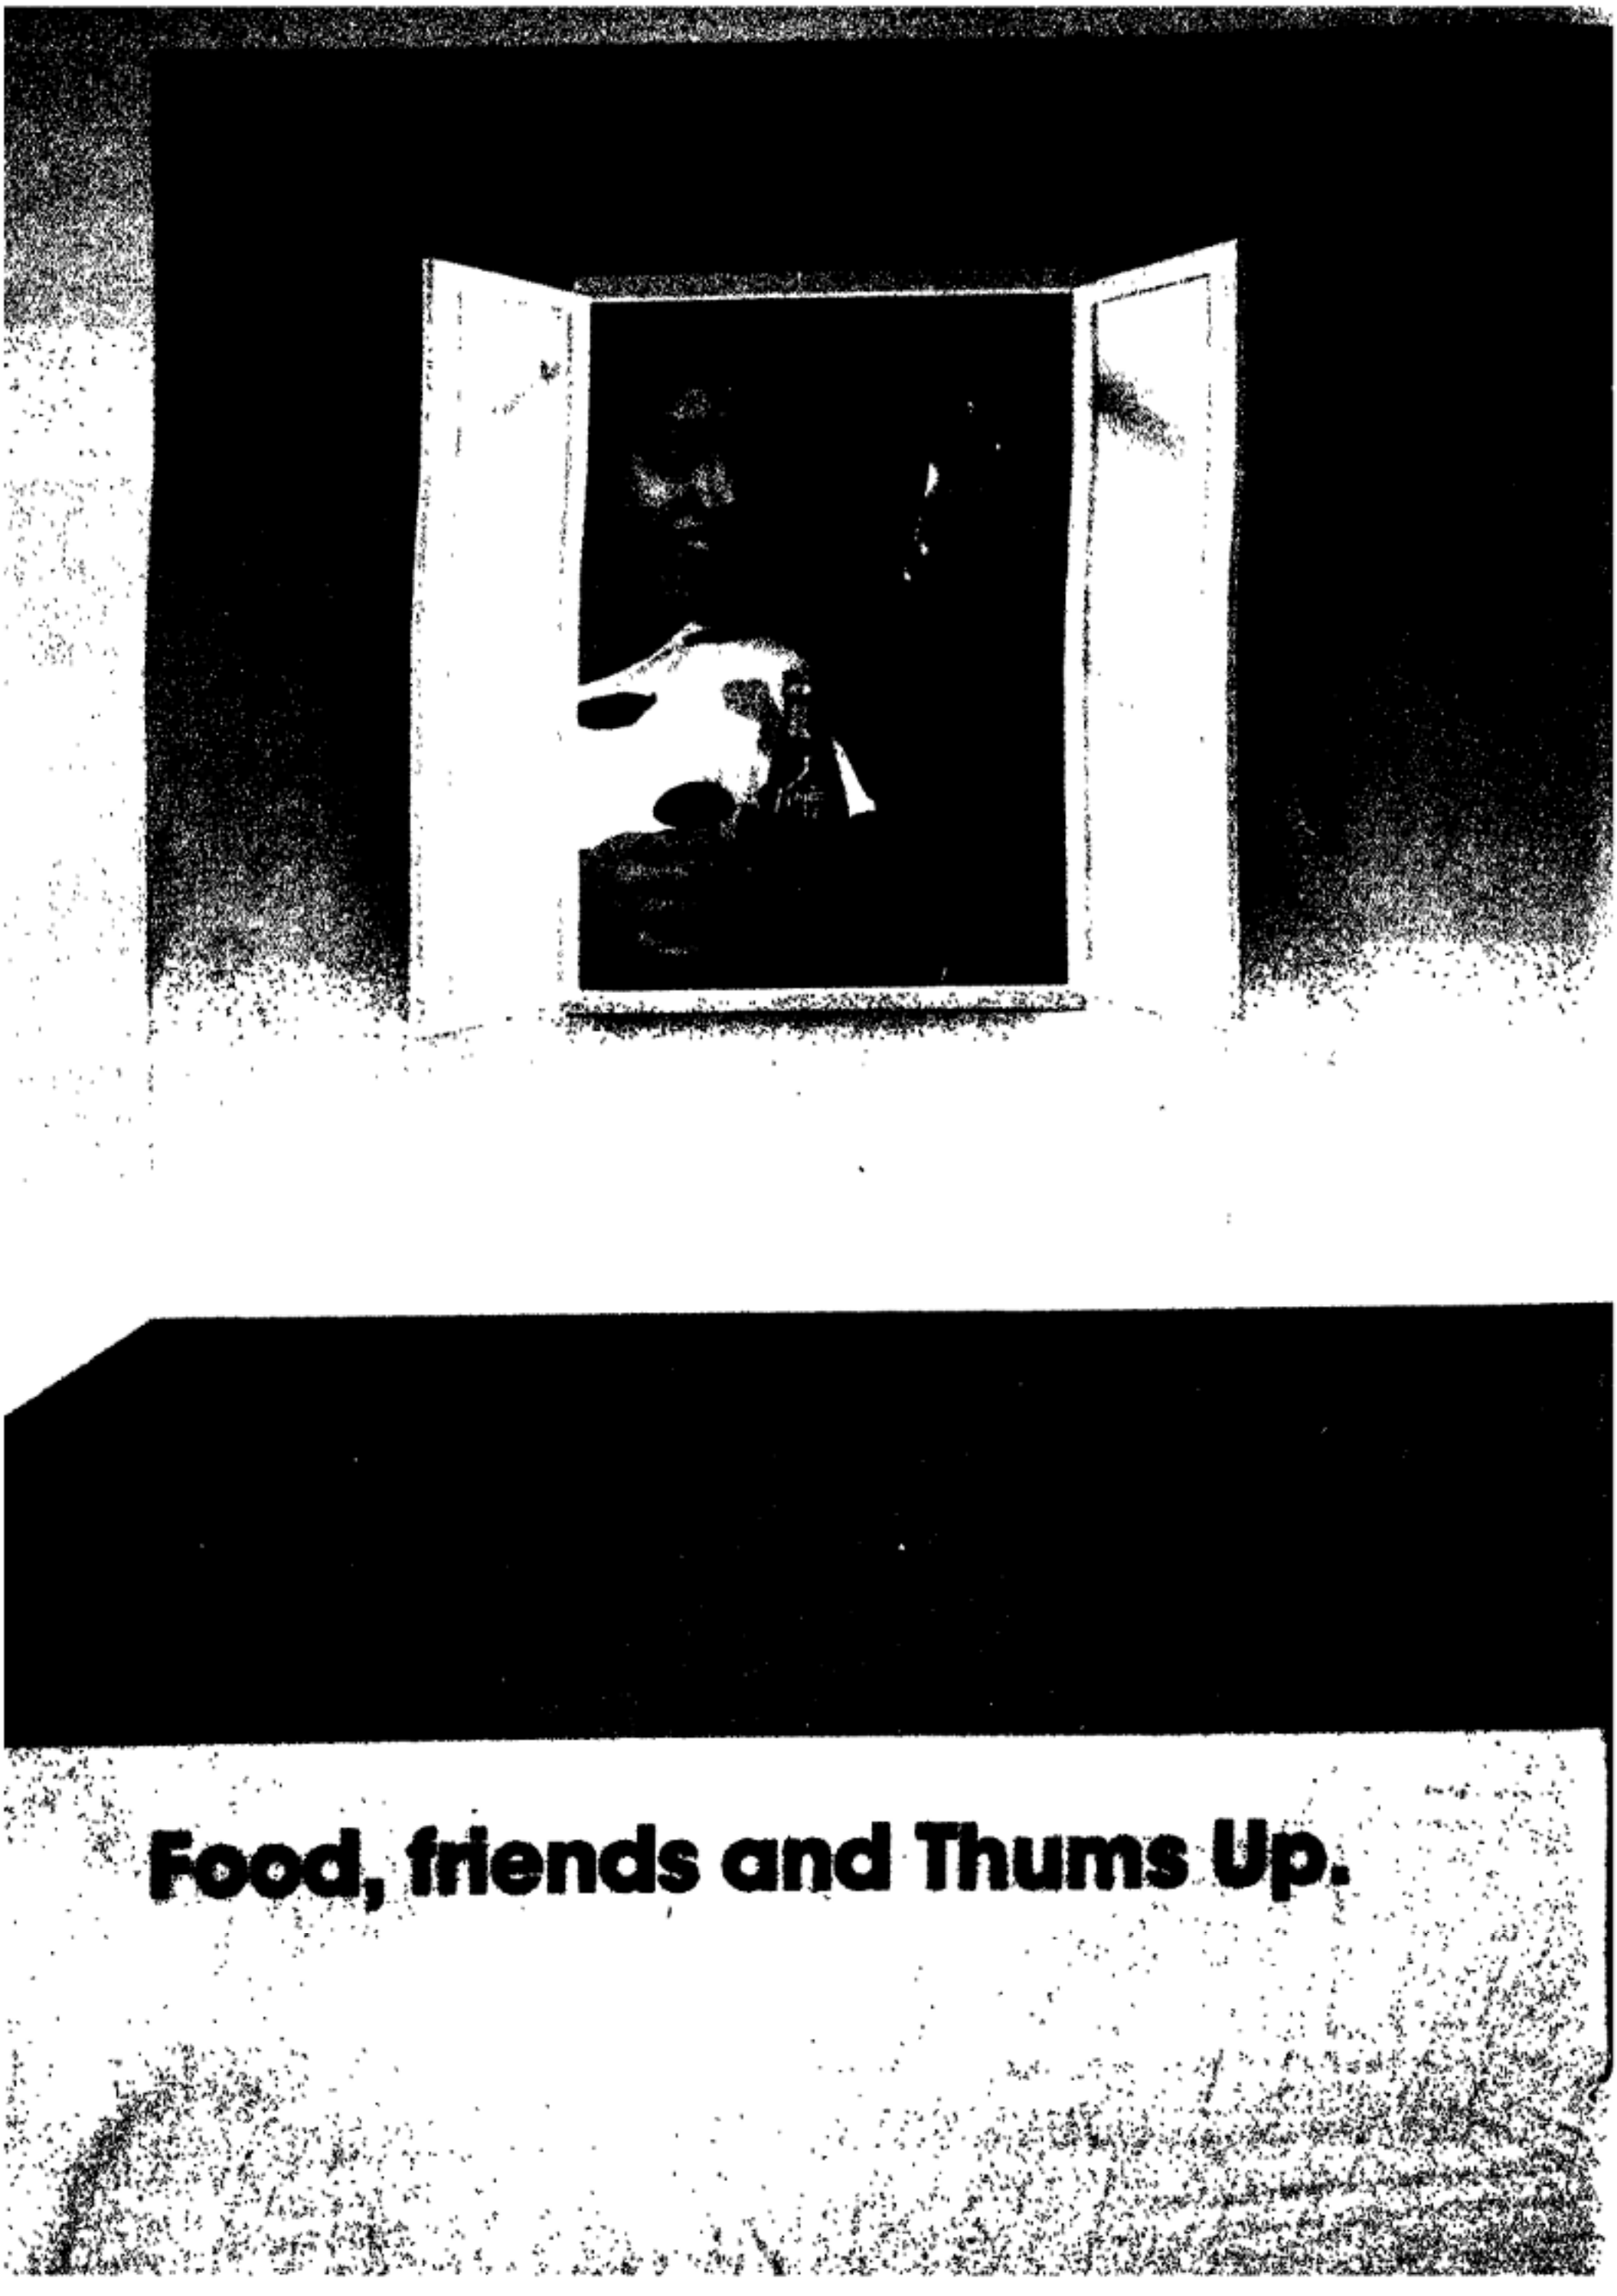
Kodacolor VR 100 is Kodak's sharpest colour print film, suitable for extreme close-ups and scenes with much detail.



Rendition of vibrant colours and clarity make Kodacolor VR 200 amazingly versatile and ideal as a general-purpose film.

For fast-action or fading light the right film is Kodacolor VR 400. Its clear fine-grain pictures make it perfect for sports photography, both indoors and outdoors, as well as for telephoto shots.

When the lighting is poor or the action is very fast, Kodacolor VR 1000 is the film to use. This remarkable film produces excellent results even in candlelight and in indoor situations where a flash is inappropriate, such as theatrical presentations.

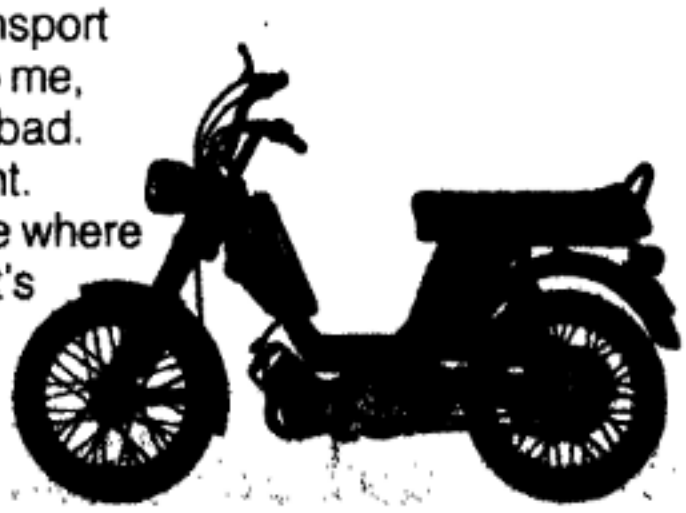


Even the revolutionary disc film is now available in the VR family as are the 110 and 126 films.

 Available at all leading photographic stores.*

India Photographic Company Limited—a Kodak affiliate

Food, friends and Thums Up.



Happy days are here again...

It's his practice to pay flying visits on his TVS 50 XL.

We were very impressed. Out in the countryside, we came across this young doctor with a mission. And little time to waste. "In an emergency, every minute counts", he said. "Out here, there's no public transport to speak of. If my patients can't come to me, I go to them. On my TVS. The roads are bad. But my TVS can take the rough treatment. Quite comfortably. In fact, it can take me where a car just couldn't. And thank heavens it's built for two. I've brought back patients who couldn't walk, to my hospital. I really depend on my TVS. It's not just a sturdy little machine. It's a life-saver!"

TVS 50 XL

we make it

CAS/BITVS/21/274

Are Teachers Destroying Secondary Education in UP?

Education in UP is a victim of three evils: a lack of funds, a lack of sincerity and a lack of morals

Education in Uttar Pradesh is in a sordid mess: official neglect, apathy, mismanagement and indifference have turned books, classes and examinations into a cruel joke on thousands of students who stumble out of school and college every year to swell the ranks of the unemployed. For most of them, education has been a colossal waste, the only lesson it has taught them is that hard work never pays; money does. Those who can afford it, bribe their way through examinations or just 'buy' their degrees. Government-aided institutions are shamefully run, thanks to a chronic shortage of funds. And while the government boasts of a phenomenal enrolment of one crore in primary schools all over the state, most of the children drop out after the first year, even if they go to school at all. enrolment between classes II and V thus falls to 45 per cent of the enrolment in class I. Despite this, hardly anything is spent on improving educational facilities.

For a state with a literacy of 27.38 per cent (well below the national average of 36.2 per cent) and a female literacy of 14.42 per cent, the fourth lowest for any Indian state (according to UNICEF's situation report on children in India, "In UP and Bihar, 87 women out of 100 cannot with understanding both read and write a simple sentence on their everyday life. The lack of education of women limits their awareness of the benefits of learning for their children") this is shocking. But who is to blame for all this, the government, teachers, parents, proprietors of schools and colleges, or all four? The state education department has not even bothered to look into the cause of the malaise; in the confusion, each of the four pillars of the system is blaming the others for its own selfish reasons. Not surprisingly, the symptoms are being mistaken for the cause: the recent campaign against the lakh strong statewide Madhyamik Shikshak Sangh was the latest in a series of attempts by the managers of privately-run schools to blame teachers for the ills of the education system. The reason, the Sangh has long been agitating for the abolition of the private managerial system of education, and its trade union activities have been a thorn in the flesh of the school-proprietors. The latter are all the more peeved because the teachers have a strong legislative lobby—the Sangh claims it had only 25 representatives in the earlier House, 16 MLCs and the rest MLAs, while the managers say they had 50 MLAs and MLCs—that pre-empts all adverse legislation, and ensures that their interests are never harmed.

It was during the time that campaigning was going on for the recent parliamentary and Assembly elections, in which a number of teachers and teacher-legislators had contested, that the Sangh came under severe attack from the Uttar Pradesh Parents' Association (UPPA). The association brought out large newspaper advertisements announcing "the 31 per cent result of the UP Board High School Examination of 1984, out of which about 28 per cent students passed in the third division and that too in most cases with mass copying, cheating and other unfair practices" and listed the results of 20 Lucknow schools which were the worst affected "by the trade union activities and politics of the Madhyamik Shikshak Sangh teachers." The schools with the worst results were Lucknow Inter College, where 85 students took the examination, and 84 failed, Rashtriya Uchtar Madhyamik High School, where 152 appeared and 144 failed, the Railway High School, Charbagh, where 52 appeared and 49 failed; Yogeshwar Rishikul Inter College, where 135 appeared and 126 failed; Technical Higher Secondary School, Vijaya Nagar, where 53 appeared and 49 failed, Harish Chandra Inter College, Sadar Bazar, where 157 appeared and 144 failed, and the Kumhrawan Higher Secondary School where 146 appeared and 133 failed. With the legend "Do not involve teachers in active politics" written above, the advertisement cited "involvement in politics, and worst kind of trade union activities, leading to frequent strikes, pickets, demonstrations, and indiscipline at educational institutions" as the major reason for the fall in the standard and quality of education in Uttar Pradesh.

"To prevent further deterioration in the results of secondary schools and to depoliticise educational institutions," the advertisement went on, "we kindly request your honours (it was addressed to the PM and leaders of major opposition parties) not to give party tickets in the forthcoming Assembly elections to teachers of government-aided schools and colleges who are drawing their salaries and all benefits from the state exchequer and who are appointed and whose services are now governed by the UP Government Education Service Commission, and who are disqualified to stand for election in view of the Supreme Court judgement in the Bihari Lal Dobray case decided on 23 November 1983 as per Article 191(I)(a) of the Constitution of India for holding office of profit under the state government." The advertisement warned that if any party fielded teacher-candidates in the elections, the UPPA would be forced to get their nominations withdrawn by filing objections under Article 191(I)(a) before the returning officers, as it did in the case of 15 teachers whose papers were rejected. The UPPA complained that a ticket to one teacher meant that teachers from "20 other schools in the adjoining districts get involved in the election campaign to ensure their companion's victory." This would paralyse all schools and since the board examinations were next scheduled for March 20, 1985, and not even "ten per cent" of the syllabus had been completed, this would be disastrous.

The Lucknow Arts College

The advertisement had its impact Parties were wary of giving tickets to teachers, but even so, a number of teachers did get tickets. Some were elected, even made ministers However, the UPPA did manage to get a number of nomination papers of teachers rejected The media campaign also created strong public opinion against the Sangh, a large number of people wrote letters to the editors of local dailies criticising its activities and blaming it squarely for the poor results.

According to spokesmen for the UPPA, a major educational obstacle would be overcome if teachers are not allowed to contest elections because as legislators they throw their weight about, bully school inspectors and board officials, and get away with anything Under the law, a teacher, unless he has submitted his resignation and duly handed over charge to his successor as per the rules governing his service, cannot stand for an election. Article 191(I)(a) of the Constitution says, "A person shall be disqualified for being chosen as, and for being, a member of the Legislative Assembly or Legislative Council of a state if he holds any office of profit under the Government of India or the Government of any State specified in the First Schedule, other than an office declared by the Legislature of the State by law not to disqualify its holder..." In each election a number of teachers manage to circumvent these provisions by saying that they have 'resigned' their jobs; the point is even if they have resigned, they have not done so three months before submitting their nominations to the returning officers or duly handing over charge, which is the legal requirement.

Another allegation against teachers in government-aided institutions is that they hardly ever teach. An example is the K.K. College, Unnao, which barely has 70 teaching days in a year. Gazetted and local holidays in the college add up to 34 days, the summer vacation (May 20 to July 7) is for 48 days, there are 50 Sundays, 44 days of casual, sick and other leave availed of by teachers, 66 days of board and home examinations, ten days of terminal examinations, 37 days of admission work in July and August, and six days of children's rallies and special holidays. The total number of days lost is 295, which leaves just 70 teaching days a year. Even on a teaching day, teachers hold classes for five hours and 20 minutes, while other public servants work for seven hours a day

Protest by Lucknow students

Perhaps because of the tremendous influence they have all along had in the government and Legislature (among the teachers in the present UP cabinet is Mrs Swaroop Kumari Bakshi; the earlier cabinet had Dr Ammar Rizvi and Ram Singh Saini), teachers in Uttar Pradesh are a pampered lot. In fact, as one school-owner in Lucknow referred to them, they are "government servants in all respects but two, that they cannot be punished and they cannot be transferred."

A number of Sangh teachers are also members of the UP High School and Intermediate Board, which has repeatedly come under criticism from parents and students. Among the various irregularities the Sangh members are alleged to commit are misleading students by publishing guess papers, hampering the conduct of examinations, encouraging mass copying in examinations, determining and changing examination centres at will, withholding results of students to settle personal disputes with them, issuing fake marksheets in exchange for huge sums of money, declaring results of students who have paid bribes, and delaying results. Often, it is only after they have taken the matter to court that students have got justice: the Lucknow bench of the Allahabad High Court on 28 July 1984 ordered the UP Madhyamik Shiksha Parishad to pay punitive compensation of Rs 200 to each of the 32 City Montessori school students and other students whose UP board high school examination results of 1983 were illegally witheld.

At a primary level, Mr Chaturvedi said, the problem is basically an arithmetical one "Without money it cannot be done. No wonder there is such a mushroom growth of private KG schools." The existing primary schools in villages have no equipment, no buildings, are housed in dilapidated structures; in many cases the buildings have been abandoned and classes are held under a tree. "We are satisfied with mere numbers. If there are one lakh primary schools, it is considered an achievement," Mr Chaturvedi said. Often the teacher student ratio in a primary school was 1:40 or 1:50. As for high schools, Mr Chaturvedi said, those receiving government aid were bound to deposit 85 per cent of the fees collected from arts students, and 80 per cent of the fees collected from science students with the government. This leaves very little to spend on running a school or college, let alone improving or maintaining facilities. "I am myself associated with an intermediate college. About four years back I wrote to the education secretary to increase the share of managements of schools and colleges. Fifteen per cent is inadequate. But the government will not raise the fees. My argument is why shouldn't fees be raised when there has been so much inflation over the years? Schools and colleges cannot be expected to provide better teaching facilities with so little money. The quality of teaching is poor, hence the poor results." Adult education, too, faces a problem of finances: imposing a fee is the best way to educate an adult, Mr Chaturvedi said. "The adult must feel he is spending money on something he should get out of the teacher." He also suggested a code of conduct for teachers in schools and colleges to ensure that they discharge their duties and abide by rules.

Mr Mandhata Singh, MLC, and leader of the UP Madhyamik Shikshak Sangh defended the practice of teachers standing for election without quitting their jobs ("how can you call a legislator's income a salary?"). He said that the UPPA was a bogus body, unrepresentative of parents; all it stood for was the interests of a string of privately-managed schools which the Sangh had been struggling against "This is being done to eradicate corruption, exploitation, nepotism, favouritism and sectarian ideas like casteism and communalism in the field of education .. Fake organisations like the School Managers Association and UPPA do not represent anybody except a few people who have commercialised education by charging exorbitant fees (City Montessori, he said, charges Rs 200 a month from pupils from classes I to X), and in addition extort money from every child in the name of organising various functions. There is a chain of Montessori schools in Lucknow whose net profit is about Rs six lakhs a month. And the management of the institution publicly announces through the columns of newspapers that it is not prepared to abide by the rules and regulations framed by the state government, like the Salaries Distribution Act and Intermediate Education Act."

But does his organisation own responsibility for the poor results? No. "This has its own deep-rooted reason. Lakhs of students at the higher secondary stage are being taught compulsory sciences, mathematics, social sciences and moral and physical education, etc., for the last three years under the ten plus two scheme, without a single post being created to teach these subjects. Science is taught without science labs and the teacher-pupil ratio, instead of 1:40 has now touched 1:150." Mr Singh said it was "shameful to note that an agreement reached between the Sangh and state government on 16 March 1984 concerning curbs on managements who refuse to abide by the provisions of law is yet to be implemented" and "let not anyone think that it had anything to do with the emoluments of teachers."

Mr Singh denied holding a brief for delinquent teachers but said that they were more an exception than the rule. Asked about an assault by a teacher-legislator on a district inspector of schools in Azamgarh last year, Mr Singh said, "The DIOS in question has to his credit lengthy charges against him submitted in black and white to the CM and this document runs into several pages, listing more than 40 charges of corrupt behaviour." He even agreed that the DIOS was assaulted; what he never said was how an assault on a government official by a teacher-legislator could possibly be justified.

Clearly, education in Uttar Pradesh is a victim of three great evils: a lack of funds, a lack of sincerity and a lack of morals.

Nirmal Mitra, Lucknow

Not so young but
so strong & healthy
what is his secret?

I enjoy life more and get more work done- thanks to OKASA

Now a new powerful formula No other tonic has it. Rare herbal extracts with 18 biochemicals, vitamins & minerals. World-famous OKASA. Proven medically effective – in its special way – every day.

At all leading chemists

OKASA

For a free booklet on OKASA write to

OKASA CO. PVT. LTD. Post Box No. 396, Bombay 400 001

The Varadarajan Tapes

A tape-recorded conversation reveals the collusion between the police and the city's underworld don, Varadarajan Mudaliar

In Bombay a different kind of star war is on As one of the bastions of the underworld empire crumbles from the onslaught of the counterforces, represented by the law, it drags a section of this force which collaborated with it, deeper into the mire. It started on the night of 23 February, when two senior inspectors of police, S L Deshmukh and I. J. Samson, from Matunga and Antop Hill police stations, went to meet Varadarajan Mudaliar, don of Sion-Koliwada and one of the leading lights of Bombay's underworld

The meeting was unfortunate for the policemen. Tapes of their conversation reached every newspaper in town—and some outside Forty minutes of taped conversation revealed the collusion of the city's law-enforcing agency with the underworld. The immediate purpose of the meeting: to reach an out-of-court settlement on cases filed by the don's lieutenants on zonal DCP, Y. C. Pawar.

Along with the tapes which crucified Deshmukh and Samson, who have been suspended since, came an unsigned letter from a reporter, who refused to identify himself for fear of the underworld, claiming that he had taped the conversation. Whether the tapes were planted by the don or not, they have created panic in Bombay's police force How many more heads would roll with the fall of the don is the question which is now being asked. The fear is not unfounded, because the don's henchmen have spread the word that more cassettes of taped conversation with even senior police officers are available with them. For police commissioner Ribeiro, the cassettes are a good opportunity to weed out the elements in his force who have unsavoury links with the underworld.

In the background of the Mafia's answer to Watergate, is the situation prevailing in this well-established network, in the Sion-Koliwada-Matunga belt. It is not merely dissent that has soured unity. It is learnt that a section of the gang has actually broken away. Discontent was brewing in the camp for some time among the Devendrans and Nadars who had been brought to the city from Tamil Nadu Recently a section parted with the don, under the leadership of his erstwhile right-hand man, Parameshwarbhai More than the empire breaking up, his waning power was demonstrated in the recent elections, where the man he campaigned against, Dr V Subramaniam, won from Matunga Subramaniam had earlier appealed to the police for protection from the underworld. This means that his vote banks are no longer delivering the goods, indicating that he is losing his grip on the slumlords, who control the voting in the slum areas under them.

After the suspensions of Samson and Deshmukh, Inspector Kumbhar and one or two others who were asked to replace them, refused. Kumbhar had a valid excuse: he had just fled to the safety of the crime branch from Antop Hill police station after supervising some of the clean-up operations in the area Most of the mess which got cleaned up naturally concerned the don, who controls a sprawling illicit liquor network, a flesh trade run by a eunuch and a chain of video parlours showing blue films in the area. This, in addition to controlling the retail outlets for stolen goods from the docks, where a well-organised Mafia supervised by him was making Rs 40 crores annually till it was smashed last year. The others are fighting shy of these two key police stations, either from fear of getting involved in the mess or having their past links exposed.

Varadarajan

The man representing the law and cynosure of the drama, DCP Y. C. Pawar, was transferred to the zone in 1983. It was only then that the city's most firmly-entrenched criminal bastion received its first shake. Earlier, most policemen from the DCP down to sub-inspectors posted in the police stations in the don's "jurisdiction," were bought over by him. Pawar's intransigence has cost him dearly. When efforts to politically pressurise the concerned authorities to transfer him from the zone failed, four criminal cases were filed against him by the don's henchmen in the Kurla court. In April last year, the Mafia also demanded his suspension in view of these cases pending against him, comparing Pawar to DCP Virk of Pune, who was suspended on the basis of a criminal case against him.

This system of functioning makes the traditional threats and knife-in-the-back method of the Mafia seem ham-handed. Reporters who had the audacity to write about the ramifications of the network and its activities, were treated to varying forms of time-consuming harassment like legal notices and cases being filed against them, after which not many dared to overstep the mark.

In the annals of crime Varadarajan will probably be remembered as the man who brought sophistication into its functioning. An understanding of the power of the media and the legal machinery, the backing of politicians and the need for a public image untainted by a criminal record, helped him function. The best public image was his garb of a social worker: a role he played to perfection. Like his contemporary, Haji Mastan Mirza, he started from rags and worked his way to power and riches.

Sometime in the early Sixties, a big time liquor dealer called Chella Mathu established the illicit trade in the Sion-Koliwada area. Prohibition which was then in force, helped him prosper. He recruited his men from the Nadar and Devendran communities of Tamil Nadu. They were employed for their proficiency in distilling illicit liquor. Equipped with the tools of the trade, they established themselves in Chunabatti, Mahim and Sion-Koliwada.

They had the knowhow and an ideal location for manufacture—in the surrounding creeks—but a lack of communication often got them into trouble. It was only when Chella Mathu picked up an enterprising youth named Varadarajan Mudaliar, that the liquor-brewers got a spokesman. Acting as a mediator for the community with the police, he was able to consolidate Chella Mathu's powers and cultivate the right connections. He finally became a man the law feared. The trilingual groups dominating the area soon came under his sway. Tamilian loyalties were buttressed by regional affiliations: the Malabaris came in with the induction of Khaja Thomas Kurien alias Khajabhai. But the Punjabis still had to be won over.

Local Punjabi tough, Tillu alias Dharshan Kumar Dhall, was recalcitrant. He was soon won over by methods which have now become legend. The local Matunga police were asked to expel him for indulging in anti-social activities Tillu had the brawn but no police contacts When his externment orders were cancelled after appeals to the home department, he fell in line. And with him swung Punjabi sympathies. The area was now centrally controlled and the empire was established.

Mohinder Singh Vig alias Soma rose from the ranks to become a senior deputy of the don One of his closest henchmen, Parameshwarbhai, who has now broken away, was brought to Koliwada from his ragpicking, extortion trade near Churchgate. Parameshwarbhai introduced Rajan Mahadeo Nair who operated from Tilak Nagar in Chembur. An auto-rickshaw union of over 1,200 members paid him protection moneya on monthly basis. His reign came to an abrupt end when he was gunned down in a shootout at the Esplanade Court in south bombay on 30 September 1983.

Khajabhai besides operating a fleet of 25 vehicles which transport liquor from Dharavi and Koliwada to various ports of the city, has a number of assets. These include the Zenith Restaurant in Koliwada (the joint strangely operated within 100m of a church, violating rules), Beijing Hotel, flats in Sardar Nagar and Matunga, distilleries at Khajawadi and Varajanagar, a rubber plantation at Kalladikode in Palghat and a palatial bungalow at Chandranagar. also in Palghat.

Soma, who was once detainedwith Khaja under the Slumlords and Bootleggers Dangerous Activities Act, has also found fortune in the city. A director of the Punjab and Sind Co-operative Bank, Soma is linked with a fleet of vehicles which are registered in the name of a mechanic, for whom he stood surety for the bank loan. Soma and Tillu, who runs a social welfare group, Jai Bhowani Mandal, on railway land, have both converted two-room residences into flats, by extending them into Maharashtra Housing Board land.

While the empire prospered with impunity, the counterforces and news media looked on silently. There were no criminal records, neither were there any proven offences against the don to write about. The don's henchmen, meanwhile, overstepped the limits and often had brushes with the law, but their problems were sorted out with the best legal aid available.

Fortune, however, did not smile for long. On 27 March 1983, the Directorate of Revenue Intelligence (DRI) seized contraband video cassettes and textiles worth Rs 46 lakhs at Dhamankhol in Raigad, where smuggling activities had been shifted to, after the police crackdown in suburban Bombay. The arrest of 18 persons including Ulhas Ghosalkar, editor of the Ratnagiri Times and the seizure of a van belonging to the Bombay Tamilar Pervai, founded by Varadarajan led the trail to the don. The residences of Khaja, Soma and Varadarajan were simultaneously raided by the DRI. Nearly a month later, Varadarajan was released on bail by the Ratnagiri magistrate while Khaja got a stay order from the Calcutta High Court. With the raid and the arrests, the don's link with crimes was established for the first time.

Though some instances established his powerful links, the citadel was shaking. This, coupled with a determined bid by the police to crush his fiefdom, has further shaken up the crumbling empire. Even officers who had once received his favours were used to raid and demolish his net work. For others on his once-favoured list, judgment day has come and it is anybody's guess when the don will be caught. Meanwhile, white-faced panic, heralded by the summary suspension of the two senior inspectors, has gripped the Bombay police.

Lekha Dhar, Bombay

The Dialogue

It could have been part of the sound track of Govind Nihalani's Ardh Satya. Varadarajan Mudaliar in conversation with senior inspectors S.L. Deshmukh and I.J. Samson of the Bombay police, sounds like Nihalani's don, Rama Shetty. Excerpts from the tape recorded conversation:

On the alleged attempt to reach an out-of-court settlement on the cases filed against DCP Pawar.

Inspector Deshmukh: We are conveying the message as directed.

Inspector Samson (interrupts): If you withdraw the cases against Pawar, he says he will get himself transferred by 8 or 9 March. (Later they caution him by saying that there is no guarantee that Pawar will not strike again, once the cases are withdrawn.)

Inspector Samson: He (Pawar) cannot be trusted. He is...(uses an abusive term); while he wants the cases against him withdrawn, he forces us to detain and harass you (Varadarajan).

Varadarajan: He had not agreed to meet me even for 15 minutes, despite the intervention of senior officers like Gupte (now retired).

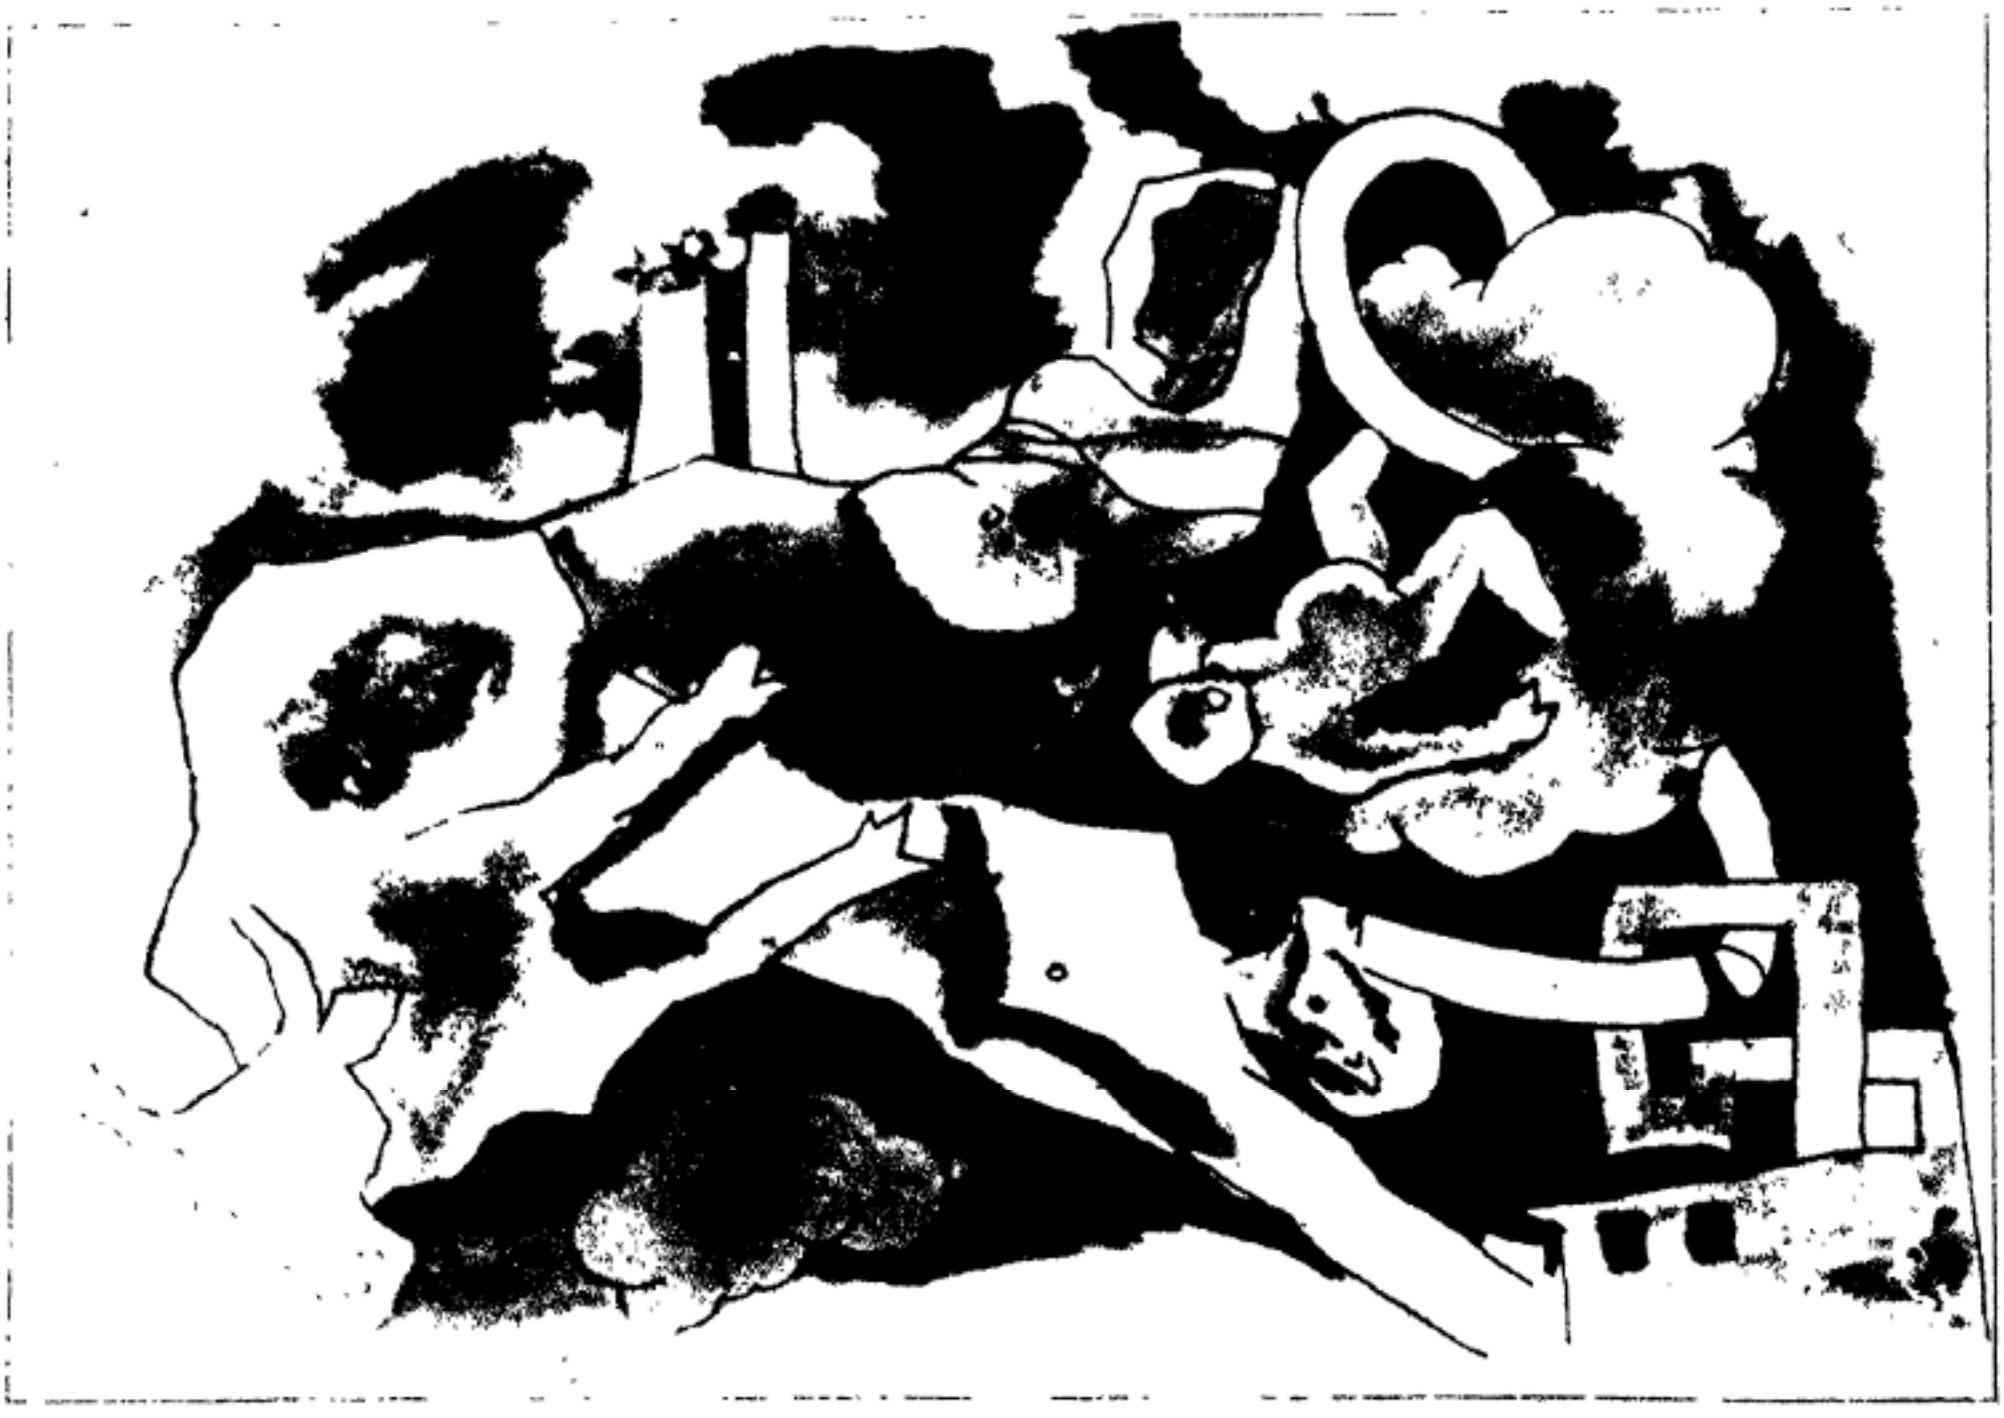
Deshmukh: But now he is ready to meet you. Not in his office on your residence, but a third place.

Varadarajan: Yes, okay.

Deshmukh: (cautioning him) You can never tell. He might hit you, he is a ...(abuses). If he raises his hand against you, break it.

Varadarajan*: (reacting angrily)* Tell him to get himself transferred first and then I will withdraw the cases against him.

Samson: He (Pawar) gets to know immediately if they (the reference here is to Tillu's matka activities) do something. He has his informers. He directs me to act, but I am not such a person. I told Pawar that I cannot hit anybody. I will do paper work, but not hit. I cannot drag you people to the police station. (Referring to Tillu's matka. Samson had earlier said that he had tried to inform them to stop after Pawar had questioned him about it.)



(In the course of the conversation names of other officers who had dropped by to see Varadarajan crop up. Names like Rambhau, Kamat and Gupta are mentioned, but no further indentification is given.)

Mrs Gandhi's assassination: 'Nobody has the right to kill anybody'

Husain: Maqbool and Fida

Assassinations is the theme of the artist 's latest exhibition, and the paintings have created a major stir. A look at the work and the extraordinary man with a brush in his hand, a twinkle in his eyes and a commitment in his heart.

The Bhopal gas tragedy*:accusing society of its collective guilt

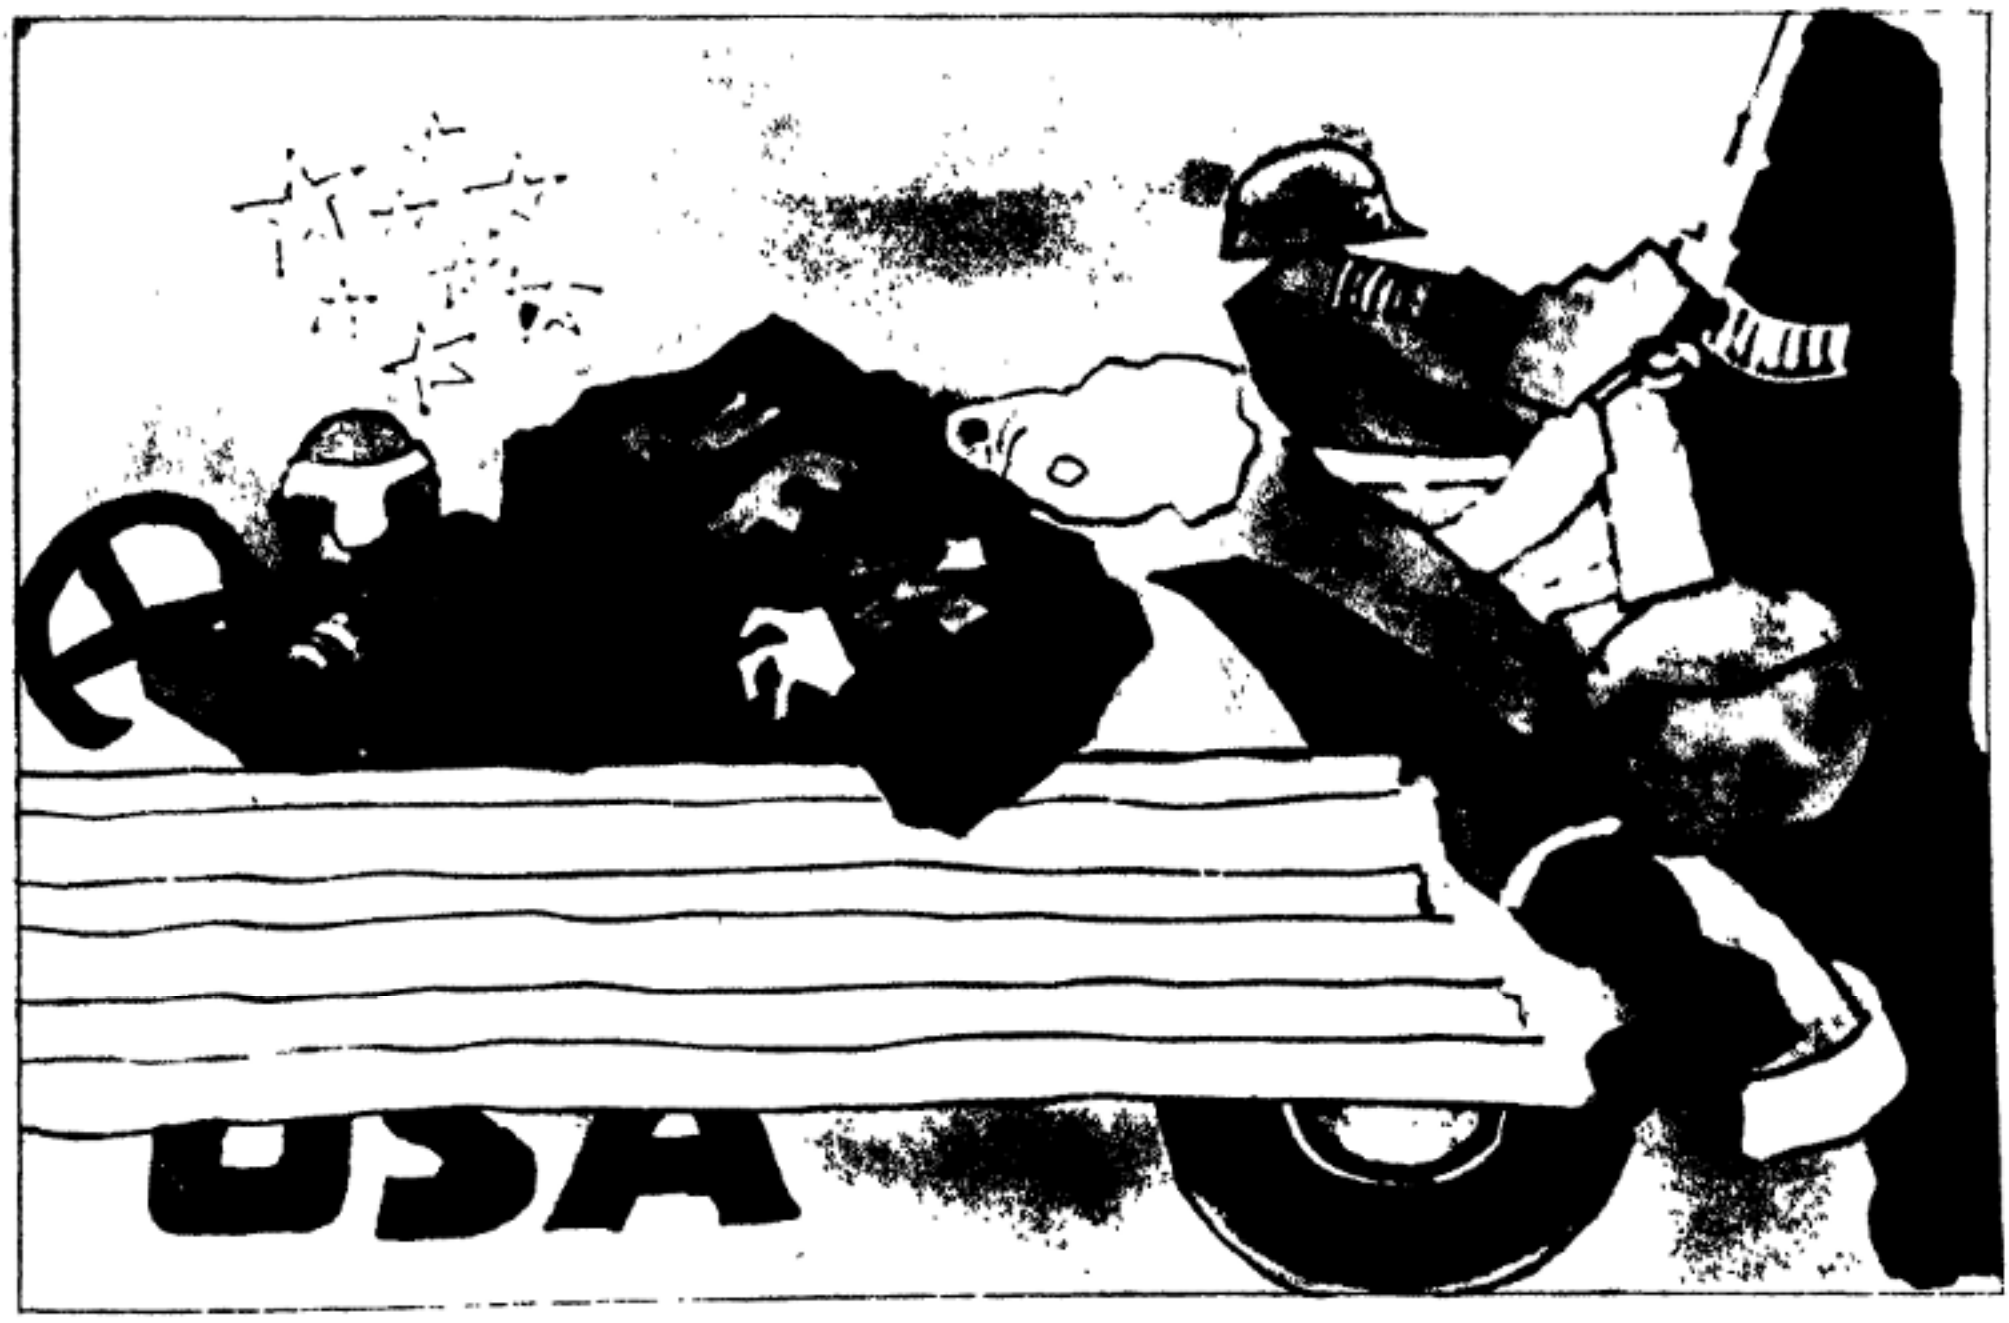
No endorsement from the artist is needed to say that M. F. Husain's paintings, which were exhibited recently at the Tata Centre in Calcutta, have been an outcome of Mrs Gandhi's death. One can imagine the shock Husain, whose admiration of Mrs Gandhi borders this side of idolatry, must have suffered when she was assassinated. To withstand it what else could he do but give expression to his grief through his medium of painting?



In doing so he has, inevitably perhaps, pondered over other leaders and heroes whose lives have been similarly cut short in this our violent century. The result is a series of paintings drawn on the sombre theme of assassination. Since he has mostly chosen—in fact all except two—political leaders as his subject, the theme becomes a statement with a political overtone. And coming as it does, from one who is regarded as the greatest living Indian painter, it assumes an importance which goes beyond questions of painterly qualities or artistic merit.

Husain has exhibited thematic series of paintings before. In the two exhibited in the past at the Tata Centre itself one was on Mother Teresa and the other entitled "From Gitanjali to Pather Panchali." The drawings in the first—collages in conception and composition—were depiction of saintly compassion and love. The second series was an artist's tribute to creativity. The paintings on assassination are wholly different in temper and inspiration from both. The immediacy of its relevance to our threatened and insecure existence deserves an appreciation from a wider circle of viewers than art critics and the cognoscenti.

M.F. Husain

A look at the persons Husain has portrayed in death or at the point of dying is revealing. Mahatma Gandhi, Indira Gandhi, Kennedy, Lumumba, Che Guevera, Allende, Mujibur Rahman, Trotsky: political leaders all, assassinated because of their beliefs, actions or preachings. But Husain's treatment of their martyrdom has no political coloration, red or black, no analytical content of cause and consequence. The inclusion of Lorca and John Lennon in this gallery of martyrs underlines his disinterest in the nature and direction of the forces which the assassinated generated and which culminated in what Shaw described as a final and extreme form of censorship. They were heroes who gave some meaning to people's lives and received, in return, love, adoration, trust, hatred and enmity. Their assassination is a mortal wound inflicted not to an individual but to ideals, beliefs and faith. What I found striking, a little disconcerting even, is that while Husain suffers the wound and the pain there is no condemnation. The colours, the lines, the compositions are pulsating and yet unemphatic, even tranquil. Does he not, it seemed to me, want to shame us for the "foul and midnight murders?" Does he not want us to be horrified and in our horror be profoundly concerned and questioning? For so horrendous a theme as assassination of great men, the paintings were strangely calm, almost serene.

The assassination of John F. Kennedy

Husain is, of course, too great a painter to need the aid of abstraction or rhetoric to express his emotions however intense. I have seen and known how with only a few brush strokes he can light up hidden corners of the mind. But here the subject is too disturbing for easy acceptance of the economy he adopts, or the assurance he conveys in a white surface with two palm imprints and Tagore's words on C.R. Das's death to the effect that dying you gifted away your immortality. For, the dimension that violence has assumed in our times makes assassination a part of a process graver than the taking of an individual life however revered and precious.

This brings me to record another personal reaction. If Husain—as I presume has been the case—was shocked by Mrs Gandhi's assassination into stepping on to a road hitherto untrodden by him then the journey is not likely to end, nor the purgatory be over, with reckoning of the killing of the great and the noble.

Of the thirty-odd paintings in the exhibition, only three are on large canvases in which acrylics and strong hues have been used. One of them is not on the martyred eminent but on the asphyxiating and abrupt ending of lives of unknown men and dumb animals at Bhopal. It is a logical extension of the theme For, what happened at Bhopal was assassination, no less, of thousands of people And here only Husain, almost in spite of himself, evokes our sense of horror and accuses society of its collective guilt If his love and empathy for human beings and his adoration of life and joy have been overwhelmed by Bhopal, can he now shut recall of Auschwitz and Hiroshima?

R. B.

A Portrait of an Artist

For Husain the canvas is not enough

How do you define a man like M. F. Husain who walks out of his home, promising his children he will be back in half-an-hour after a cup of tea at the dhabha across the street (in Delhi) and returns more than a month later? He suddenly felt like going to Mahabalipuram and he did. Husain, the wandering—mostly barefoot—painter-poet-lover is like a kite fluttering high in the sky: tug at it a bit hard and it breaks away

This wanderlust has its origins in Husain's childhood. He was born in 1915 at Pandharpur, Maharashtra (Husain himself gives the date of birth as 17 September but then quickly says: "It is an imaginary date, I am a Leo"). When he was six months old his mother died When he was six years old he lost his only emotional anchor his paternal grandfather. His father remarried around that time. Soon after, Husain was sent to Siddhpur in Gujarat, where his maternal grandfather was the head of a religious sect. From there the rolling stone was sent to a madarsa in Baroda. Back in Indore, where Husain's father, Fida Husain, had moved some time after Husain's birth and where he worked as an accountant in a group of textile mills, the future painter became, literally, the boy on the streets. He would set out with food and his paints on a bicycle and that lantern (enshrined in some of his works) and paint into the night, often waiting for the dawn which would give his paintings that hazy touch of mystery.

Cinema, spectacle and fancy clothes were his forbidden pleasures. He was allowed to see films twice a year: on the occasion of the two Ids. But Husain followed his father one night to the cinema hall and at the door told him that he should be allowed to see the film. This fascination with the world of celluloid was to lead him to Bombay where he became a billboard painter in 1937.

The other forbidden pleasure was clothes. Husain coveted a pair of red silk socks. But being one of eight children, the red silk socks remained a fantasy until he asked his uncle for money one evening. Husain was beaten up that evening with chains by his father. The Husain of today, antelope skin trousers in winters abroad, kurtas or white denims in summers, picks up a pair of costly shoes in Geneva and leaves them behind.

The third forbidden pleasure: the various festivals and Ram Lilas which his family—Sulaimani Bohras—did not exactly approve of. Or, even the spectacle of the magnificent tazia processions of the feudal city of Indore. His famous horses and his mythological figures were born in those days. They are part of his ever-expanding encyclopaedia of images.

The boy-in-the-streets metamorphosed not too long afterwards into the billboard painter immortalising the likes of Naseem Banu or Sohrab Modi on cinema hoardings in sweeping baroque images 40 feet above the ground (two cans of paint hanging from his big toes) by day, and sleeping on the footpath of Faras Road junction at night. Those were the romantic days. Husain almost reached the pinnacle of this profession when he was second only to the maestro of billboard painters in the profession, Bhide.

In 1941, he married Fasila, the daughter of the woman who stayed in the building opposite his corner of the footpath. His future mother-in-law had felt sorry for him and asked him to eat with the family. For seven years, Husain worked for a firm which made children's furniture and toys and generally lived the life of a householder. A turning point could have been his trip to Mathura in 1941. On his back-to-the-roots journey to classical art, Husain often says that the three most important influences on his work are classical sculpture, especially of the Gupta period, the Basholi school of miniature painting for the bold colours and absence of perspective, and the folklore culled from the fiestas and festivals of life.

On the journey from the roots to the gods and goddesses who people myths and legends and who are not too far from the wellsprings of Indian culture, it was not too big a step to becoming a founder-member of the Progressive Artists Group in 1947. The group waged a war for individuality and to remove the shackles of revivalism and British academic art. It was a fight which Husain still seems to be carrying on, especially in his tirades against the arbiters of taste in contemporary India. The assassination series he is currently engaged in painting does not make him see red as readily as present-day managers of art and culture. Husain is at his angry best when talking about the coming festivals of India in France and in the United States. "Pupul Jayakar says that she is an authority. She thinks that only what was done 5,000 years ago is all right and that nothing being done today is worth anything. She reminds me about the story of the owl, the symbol of wisdom. There was a blind owl who would just keep walking straight and everybody thought that the owl was a giani and followed it. The owl walked into a ditch, the rest of them followed."

Husain is going to have yet another salon de refuse, this time in the home of such salons: Paris. There he will hold a "sideshow" of his new Mahabharata series which he will paint in Paris, probably a little before the year of India in France begins.

To get back to Husain's life. In 1950, Husain held his first one-man show, one of which was sent to the Salon de mai in Paris. From then on he was not short of patrons and guides: Schlesinger who bought numerous works of the group, especially those in need for Rs 50 or Rs 100, Von Leyden, the art critic of the Times of India, and later on Homi Bhabha. There was, of course, Badrivishal Pitti in Hyderabad, who still has some of Husain's classics. In 1953, 15 of his works were shown at the Venice Bienniale. In 1955, he won the Latin Kala Award, in 1959 an award at the Tokyo Bienniale. The Padma Bhushan came in 1973. A high point was in 1971 at the Sao Paulo Bienniale when Husain had a one-man show. Picasso too had an exhibition on at the same time. Picasso never went to Sao Paulo, and the other maestro left in a huff because the Indian Ambassador to Brazil did not go to Sao Paulo. According to Husain, the Ambassador later filed a report stating that he did not attend the inauguration because the painter was "dead drunk." Husain's great vice is drinking endless cups of tea.

Husain painting the ceiling of a church in Bombay designed by Charles Correa

In 1967, Husain won the Golden Bear at the Berlin Film Festival for his film, Through the eyes of a painter. By the Seventies, Husain had become the topic of discussion in many drawing rooms in metropolitan cities. Some would even come up to the painter (who does not know how to say no) with bits of cloth and ask him to paint them a canvas to match their curtains and sofas.

The price of a Husain began to be measured by the number of square inches. Newly-wed couples would total the money received for the wedding present to buy a Husain. Husain became internationally known as well as a household name. Paying rupees one lakh for a Husain was not an impossibility. Even his doodles now sell. And as the name of Husain grew, so did the legend about the artist who never spends more than three weeks in a city. While his work through the various series evolved and accumulated its own vocabulary of images, symbols and metaphors (those horses, he chuckles, are only for the fools who buy them), so did the little myth about his own life: his car, painted with horses or gopis and Krishnas, his barefoot perambulations, his striking clothes, the various myths about his lack of punctuality (he never wears a watch), his vanishing habits (he borrowed a new car from Natwar Singh, presently minister of state for steel "for a minute" and returned it after a week; he had gone to Kanpur) his generosity (he gave away an entire collection of paintings to a Czechoslovak woman he fell in love with, Marie Zurkova, in Prague), his performing shows: while the director of a Czech museum delivered his 20-minute speech, Husain had finished a huge canvas, moving from left to right and not going back once, and his speed in painting .his brush moves with the same ease as the hands of the women of Madhuban when they paint their walls).

One could go on and on about this phenomenon called Husain who has variously been described as a charlatan, genius, iconoclast and a gypsy. The lasting image of Husain is of a man more interested in the process of painting than in the finished work itself, too much of a painter in a hurry to not lose the onrush of images than a connoisseur of art. A man for whom the canvas is not enough. Husain is everywhere and only time is going to sift the worthwhile from this magnificent painting machine for whom painting is breathing or life itself. The paint brush is the most faithful companion on his journey.

Madhu Jain

SUNDAY SPECIAL

"The Price of My Paintings Lies in the Eyes of the Beholder"

M.F. Husain told Madhu Jain

Maqbool Fida Husain, 70-going-on-19, has never been considered a political painter. Or even a political person. Rather, this prolific artist who paints in a rush as if there were no tomorrows (he is often called India's Picasso), is occasionally criticised for being comfortably on the right side of the establishment—his playful irreverence in the world of art notwithstanding. Husain's works have always been powerful statements on the human situations, even though they are not overtly political. But during the last decade, his themes have been decidedly political. There was his series on the Emergency, on terrorism in the early Eighties and now, post-31 October 1984, on assassination—whether it be of Mrs Gandhi or the common man (Sikhs in the aftermath of Mrs Gandhi's assassination, Bhopal gas victims, etc). When SUNDAY met Husain, he was between two exhibitions: the assassination series in Calcutta (most of which had been sold) and the coming exhibition in Delhi. He was yet to make most of the paintings. Chances are that the paint will still be wet when the exhibition begins; he paints on a where-is-as-is basis.

Typically, Husain rolled out the eighteen-foot Indira Gandhi assassination painting on the grass outside and sat on the edge. This was Mrs Gandhi in brilliant orange and red; sixteen red petals for the bullet holes. Talking about it, Husain mumbled into his Biblical snow-white beard: "Almost like sleeping beauty, isn't she?" Would she ever wake up, we ask? "There is no prince charming in Indian politics," replied he. And the interview begins, with fits and starts over three days—following the moods and restless bare feet of M.F. Husain.

M.F. Husain: "I am doing too little"

Q When did you paint Mrs Gandhi's assassination?

A: The day after. I went to Trimurti House, came home and began to paint. I finished in two to three hours.

Q: Mrs Gandhi does not look as if she is dead...

A: I wanted it to be a suspended image—not dead nor alive—only her presence. As you can see, all I have drawn is her sari, there is no body in between, there are no feet, although there is a face in repose almost like Sleeping Beauty.

Q: There is a watch on her wrist and the time is 9.20. What is the significance of the hand?

A: It is a questioning hand. Yeh kya hai, kyon hua (why is this happening)? The hand is important, it is a mudra.

Q: The fence at the bottom looks particularly threatening.

A: There is a fence like this near where she fell, I made it more pointed as if they are daggers. And the body which has been torn is a body after torture like the painting I did of Gandhi. There is no blood.

Q: What about the Gandhi painting?

A: The body is like a piece of paper which has been torn and thrown away. The head is drawn away from the rest of the body.

Q: What is the goat doing there?

A: It is the symbol of non-violence. Gandhi even took a goat to London when he went for the Round Table Conference... the stick below is broken, just like a bone. I am particularly satisfied with this painting; it has said all about 20th century assassinations: this was the major one. I had done a painting on the Gandhi assassination during the Gandhi centenary for the Gandhi Peace Foundation, but they refused to take it. They had wanted a portrait, not a Gandhi, falling, his cane falling. This painting is now in a museum in Boston...

Q: Why is it that of all the assassinations during the last few years, Mrs Gandhi's sparked off your series?

A: This was the most dastardly. To kill a woman, and in that treacherous, heinous way. Never has this happened in world history. Indira Gandhi's favourite song was Ekla chalo re (I will walk alone) and here she is ekla...with nothing else but her hand. A woman's hand which one should protect, not...

Q. Does this mean that you are becoming involved in politics?

A: You have to be involved. Earlier there were political murders: in various kingdoms sons killed fathers. But 20th century murders are different; they have changed the course of history...Stalin had Trotsky killed, JFK was killed by some parties, Allende was killed by the Americans. When I chose this theme I was aware of the fact that I could have painted just Mrs Gandhi but I wanted to make the series universal. I treated the subject on a human level. Nobody has the right to kill anybody whether he is a tyrant, a leader or a common man in the street.

Q: What about your political affiliations?

A: I do not believe in any political party. I believe in individuals like Gandhi or John Kennedy; they are more effective than parties. Ideologies change. Look at Marxism: the Chinese have said that it has become obsolete and has to be adopted to changing times. Two or three years ago I wanted to paint a portrait of the 20th century: people in literature, music, dance...scientists, but the assassinations came in between...

Q: Perhaps, these are the true portraits of our century. What about Ram Manohar Lohia? You are said to have been close to him?

A: Zinda dil ke the. He was interested in art, in eating...we used to eat in Jamma Masjid. Whenever I did a portrait of Pandit Nehru, Lohia never objected. Nor did he ever ask me to sign a petition or participate in any movement, despite our friendship.

Q: Did he influence you in any way?

A: I met him in Hyderabad through Badrivishal Pitti, the first man to help me. One day he told me: 'You paint Birla and Tata, why don't you paint the Ramayana not with a halo around it or as folklore.' 'Our culture,' he told me 'was tied to the Ramayana or to the villages.' So, I did 100 paintings on the epic...

Q: And your famous horses?

A: I never left the sawari of horses-...the horses of imagination run fast and are hard to control. Actually, there is so much material but our minds have been spoiled by western education, especially the artist's. It was, therefore, important to go to the Ramayana—to our roots to enrich the imagery with the Ramayana. Then there is the Mahabharata I wanted to take those images and place them in today's context, not just to illustrate it.

Q: How did you meet Pandit Nehru?

A: Nehru loved art but he did not understand too much about it. His interest was there because of Zakir Hussain. What a man Hussain Sahab was? He came to an exhibition and introduced himself thus: Mujhe bhi Hussain kehte hain (they call me Hussain too).

Q: What has influenced you?

A: There are so many. My first portrait from the Ramayana was of Ravana doing the golden age dance—all those hands and limbs. I wanted to show the energy. I was always fascinated by the nautankis. I was always being told not to go to the Ram Lila: Kya dekh rahe ho (What are you looking at)? they would say at home. But I loved it: the costumes, the stage... When I did my 40-foot Shivji ki barat painting, I put in all the bhooths, witches bhayanak janwars. I took all these paintings to a village near Hyderabad and arranged a mela. In the city they do not understand but in the villages the children would come for two hours every night. I had put the paintings of Ram Sita and Laxman in a bullock cart and brought them into the village to the accompaniment of music. Nobody asked me why so and so did not have an eye or a mouth. They were spellbound, as if it were all very natural. You see here you can put some orange paint on a stone and people call it Hanuman, the symbol is enough, the shraddha is there.

Q: What about Islamic imagery?

A. My horses. Duldul was the name of the horse of the Prophet. All my imagery is from the epics; my roots are there. The epics are alive, even today look at the festivals.

Q: Has your being a Muslim made any difference to your work?

A: In the villages the difference between Hindus and Muslims is not really present, especially in the South.

Q: Did you go through a difficult time during partition? Did it not affect the way you thought or painted?

A: When I was about eleven, I was in an Islamic boarding school in Baroda where we were given religious training...But we wore khadi and Gandhi topis. Later, in the late 30's and early 40's I was in Bombay. My anger was directed against the Angrez. I would see these English inspectors on the road and wonder what these strange Englishmen were doing there. I made a painting of an Englishman with a white hat sitting on a chair in a gali. Next to him I painted a sleeping dog—I wanted to show him as a dog.

Q: What about the Quit India movement? You were in Bombay then?

A: I made sketches of the time...of the pandal from where speakers spoke...Our politicians were the stars of the times. What beauty! Jawaharlal Nehru looked like a filmstar. I liked Kamala Devi Chattopadhaya. Gulab ka phool thi. Sarojini Naidu. What intellect, what jaban.

Q: How did you live through partition?

A: I was in Bombay and I had a beard. I remember walking down the road and people would point to me and say 'Pakistani, Pakistani.' In 1948, I came to Delhi. I walked down Janpath and people would say, "There he goes. It was tense even in Bombay during the riots. But whenever people told me not to go out, I would say why not. Maar denge tho mar denge. Ab kya kare, jisse mohabat ho gaye. (if they kill me, they kill me. What can I do now? Now that I love this country). I was never tempted to go to Pakistan. I have no vasta (relation) with Pakistan. Some of my relatives went there. I have no contact with them; nor have I ever been to Pakistan. Khamakha ka shak (unnecessary doubt) Muslim fanaticism is so dangerous; there is no jawab to this. Nor is there any freedom in a country like Pakistan. I am an artist and I want to express myself. In Pakistan an artist cannot make any figures; he has to use

The Maulvi and Brahmin

A tribute to Mother Teresa calligraphy. Islam never said no to human figures; it is the mullah's. The university in Egypt has a record of the Prophet's visit to the Kaaba. When he went there, he found images of many deities. He had all of them taken out, except one image of Mariam. The Prophet said, 'Do not remove this.' So how can people say there can be no images. The Saudi Arabians, the Wahabis, are the ones who are completely against images.

Q: What about Hindu fanaticism?

A: Hindu fanatics have learned from Muslims. It is now a worldwide phenomenon; the Christians are waking up now.

Q. Communalism is certainly contagious...

A: It has to do with a loss of faith. People want to cling on to something, some ideology. People have become disillusioned with Marxism. These forces come and sweep away everything—only time can stop these winds. Great civilisations have been wiped out.

Q: Can we talk about your paintings with political themes. What about the series you did on Bangladesh?

A: I made 15 feet by six feet paintings. One was of a tank, I put a flower on it. Another was of a Bengali woman emerging; this was Indira Gandhi in a Bengali sari—an image of Bangladesh. Later, several artists went on a truck collecting money for the widows in Bangladesh.

Q: Well, then you do depict current affairs in your own fashion.

A: When Morarji Desai was chief minister (of Maharashtra), he was a sakht dushman (tough enemy). He was against modern art. He felt it was a fad which would go sooner or later. When we went in an artists delegation to ask him to relax rules about the import of colours he told me: "You are worried about your dhanda (business) right? Why don't you find something else to sell?"

Q: This was your politically angry outburst?

A: Yes, I made a huge painting of him—I made him a monkey; he does have big ears, doesn't he (chuckles mischievously).

Q: When was the second instance?

A: This was against the revivalists—all the heads of art colleges were Bengalis who could not see beyond Abanindranath Tagore and Nandalal Bose. These were mediocre painters; the only geniuses at Shantiniketan were Rabindranath Tagore and Ram Kinkar—the rest were midgets. When man is a personality, when he has the total force of expression, there is no need to learn technique.

I feel that only a woman can rule India. Because she has zid; zid hai, shakti hai...If she decides to act, she will not be deterred.

Q: What about your Emergency paintings, the ones you were so widely criticised for? V.C. Shukla used them effectively as propaganda to justify Mrs Gandhi's Emergency.

A: Nobody asked me to make them. I was in Madras the day Emergency was declared. That day I began to paint at 8 am and did not stop until 6 pm—when I had finished three six feet by four feet paintings of Durga, Bharat Mata (this was India as a woman) and Sita. I admired Indira Gandhi because she did what Jawaharlal Nehru could not do: she banned the Jamaat-e-Islami and the RSS, two cancerous organisations. She had the courage to do this; she was the real Durga. This was not an act of the Congress. Here was one individual who took a very bold step. The third painting was of Sita. There are four hands pointing accusingly at her; there were four opposition parties then. People accused me of supporting the Emergency. (Points to the print of the Bharat Mata painting, where Gujarat would logically be located) See this is shaped like a breast; the most sensitive part... After this I did a series on violence and terrorism, which I signed Mac Bull.

Q: When was this and which subjects did you treat?

A: 1982. I did not focus on any one place; Israel, Falklands, Assam, Punjab. I was inspired by Bunuel's film, That Obscure Object of Desire. All this joins up with the assassination series. In one of these I use Amitabh Bachchan as a symbol of violence, all that dishum, dishum. In the same series was Phoolan Devi. But I disguised her, made her a bit more sophisticated. She has a gun in her hand but she is standing on a manch (platform) and there are microphones.

Q: Could you tell us more about your three faces of Mrs Gandhi, the Emergency paintings?

A: There was a lot of controversy, even in New York, Germany. Badnami sahi, naam tho hua... I remember Ezra Pound's poem on Mussolini in which he said that creative people were fascinated by power, evil or otherwise... to defeat an evil force you have to be equally forceful.

Q: Shakti, in other words?

A: Yes.

Q: How much do your paintings cost?

A: The worth of my paintings depends... if you like it, rupees five lakhs is too little; if you do not, rupees five is too much. The price is in the eyes of the beholder.

Q: What is your next series on?

A: On the raj. I would like to treat the British raj like a comic strip. They became caricatures. I do not want to paint a political history of the British raj—what was good or bad—none of that. But I would like to depict the visual aspect... When I was a child in Indore I saw how the Maharaja (of Holkar) would behave in front of the British collector...all these Khan Bahadurs and Rais were traitors. Lohia used to call them 'toady bachas.' The British left, but the angreziat remained: the choti hazri in the mornings, the badi hazris are still there.

Q: What else did Lohia impress upon you?

A: When I was given the Padma Bhushan in 1963, he asked me to return it.

Q: Do you believe that we are entering a naya zamana with Rajiv Gandhi?

A: Yes. Look what he said in the SUNDAY interview: I have come but I will go back if I cannot manage. The last elections were significant. The course of history has been changed. The values of the 30s, 40s and 50s have become obsolete.

Q: Do you think India is ready for democracy?

A: Is there any democracy in the United States? Yes, in the Constitution. But who killed Allende and Che? What do the secret organisations of powerful countries do to remain in power? I feel that a good man is needed at the helm of affairs, like Gandhiji. He was never power-hungry.

Q: And Pandit Nehru?

A: Apne nawab the... nayat sharif admi (He was like a nawab; a very honest man). He had an angrezi tariqa (English ways). He was a bit like the member of a royal family, regal in attitude. But he was not a politician, rather a visionary—what hopes he had for the country!

Q: And Indira Gandhi?

A: She is the most powerful woman in the history of the 20th century. When she began, we thought she could do nothing. But look at how she evolved—methodically and not by any chance—there were so many people out to destroy her. But she emerged...shakti. Woman power comes in here. Once you have that, nobody can stop you; Goli maar ke hata diya, par isse kya hota hai (A bullet might have removed her but what does that do?)

Q: Can India only be ruled by a woman?

A: I feel that only a woman can rule India.

Hanuman

Q: Why?

A: Because she has zid, zid hai, shakti hai (she is stubborn and has strength). If she decides to act, she will not be deterred. Nehru had sharafat, baat maan lete the. Indira Gandhi was alone, she thought alone, walked alone... ekla chalo re.

Q: In your list of good painters in India, you do not name a single woman. Woman can rule but not paint?

A: The potential is there. Then we did have Amrita Sher-Gill. A woman can become Prime Minister, President, great actress and even Margaret Thatcher. But her biggest role is that of a mother. Man cannot even become a father, he has no part in the birth of a child. There is nothing like a woman. Even the Prophet said that the first person to step into Jannat (heaven) would be a woman. I suppose the first step to hell would also be taken by a woman. Everywhere she will be the first, whether it is heaven or hell.

Q: I believe that you are planning to make a full feature film?

A: Yes, in black-and-white and a silent movie...There is no script yet but I have two or three characters related to certain situations.

Q: Have you cast the film yet?

A: No. But I would like to have Smita Patil; she fits my concept of a certain form—slightly rugged and yet sophisticated. She is the ideal image in my mind; not the sweet and pretty kind. I used to see her when she read the news in Bombay. I liked her face from that time, although I have never met her.

I love women from the age of eight to 80...Perhaps my face is such. The fault is with God; he gave me a Casanova face.

Q: So, we come back to the subject of women...

A: Woman is very important, especially in the Indian context; here it is shakti. The West had most of its important sculptures of man: Apollo, the various Greek gods. We have our goddesses.

Q: We also have brides being burned. You have not done any work on atrocities on women?

A: No. I have not. But I love women so much...perhaps I should have.

Q: There is this image of a Casanova about you.

A: Well...I love women from the age of eight to eighty...What can I do about this reputation? Perhaps my face is such. The fault is with God; he gave me a Casanova face. But I feel that even in excess, of love, there should be discipline, with the emotions. Otherwise, there is dissipation. There should be a sort of order. I do not like to treat a woman as an object or as just a companion.

Q: This search—this quest for the woman or women—could this be because you lost your mother when you were a baby?

A: Perhaps. When I was six months, my mother died. There was no other woman at home. Just my dada and my chacha who was unmarried. When I was six, my father re-married. My step-mother was educated, she was good to me. But psychologically, I never accepted her. For years I lived with my dada. I was literally on the streets; I only came home to sleep. This is where I must have got my wandering habit from: who was I to go home to. And this lack of a mother might have been what draws me to women.

Q: You mean an inner loneliness under all your exuberance?

A: Yes, an inside sadness. I have six children—two boys and four girls, but I always stay out. I love my children; but I am detached. My children are all all right. But I never used to worry about them; I always felt that what had to be, would be; they should be allowed to grow naturally... Fortunately my wife is traditional and disciplined. If she had been like me tho bas khatam (finished). It is a good combination. She would always ask the children or me where we were going. I told her to put a black board on the door on which any of us could write where we were going. No need to ask baar, baar where you are going.

Q: Are you as unconventional in your relations with your family? What about your relationship with your children?

A: My daughter had a very unconventional wedding, it was in a park in Bombay. I sent all the relatives cards on which I had made Shiv and Parvati, both of them nude; Shivji is holding the breast of Parvati in one hand. The Muslims were shocked by the invitation. This daughter is in Madras now. I draw designs, she gets wooden blocks made and prints saris with them.

Q: Husain sahab, don't you feel you are doing too many different things?

A: No. I might work in different mediums, but the basis is the same—whether it be textiles, tapestries, films murals. I still feel that I am doing too little; my capacity is much more, so much more. I feel I should run 20 things simultaneously...One should go beyond the techniques, it should be on the tip of the fingers; the struggle is one of vision that is within. Therefore, it is important to go through experiences. This is the reason why I travel. The important thing is simplification: I imbibe things, make sketches and then simplify; one can get carried away by technique. To eliminate is the most important, to come to the minimum—that is art. If you see my Mother Teresa paintings—there is no face, no body, just the folds of the sari, the loving folds...This was not achanak (sudden). I learned this from Italian paintings. Look at Michelangelo: there was no need for a face to say anything: the folds said it. In my series on the Andhra cyclone which I called cyclonic silence, it is all black— there are bodies floating, but I put one white sheep—it was the only element of hope. People came to the exhibition and they would cry. This image had only one or two elements in it.

Q: Like your assassination series?

A: There was no blood, no bullets. But I feel that I have not completed it; they are literary incidents. I want to change the form and simplify it. Gandhi is the only one I am satisfied with—and to some extent Indira Gandhi: the rest are too literal.

Q: To return once again to politics, a subject you keep running away from. This bhakti cult, or charisma which seems to be very widespread in India, could you say something about this?

A: This is a worldwide trend. The rightists are coming into power everywhere—rightists for me means fascism. Morarji Desai is a fascist. He says he is a Gandhian—the way he talks. But if power were in his hand for ten years he would change Hindustan. This man has disguised his fascism in the name of Gandhism.

Q: Then, coming back again to Gandhi...

A: Gandhi was not a political thinker. He did, however, identify with the common man. But later, bringing in bhakti and prayer was backwaas (nonsense)...To become a saint, that is what the effort was towards. This was not politically relevant. But of course, he did do the work he had come to do. He is a major figure in world history because of his concept of non-violence.

Q: You have not been described as a political artist, but your paintings often make digs at the rich. In your drawings of Assam you have written these lines: "She resides in her tattered shroud. As tenderly plucked tea leaves are being cruelly roasted the diamond studded Marwari ladies roll around giggling."

A: Yes, the Marwaris own many plantations. Chus liya hai (Marwaris have squeezed Calcutta dry). They are villains, including Mr Birla. The only honest industrialist is Tata. There was a wedding in Hyderabad and Mr Birla asked me: 'Why do you make all our devis and devtas nude?' Then, he pointed to those marble sculptures made in Jaipur of Radha and Krishna and says: 'Why don't you paint things like this; there is so much shanti in them...' After saying this he points to the people present at the wedding and adds: 'How would all these people look if you saw them nude?' What a thing to say!

There must be a taboo about not seeing a body totally nude, even of your wife. Even the Pope has said that you should not look at your wife with lust—then what does one do: ma baitha diya (they see the wife as a mother). These people are like the Pope.

Q: You have been quite irreverent about religion as well...

A: In 1956 I did a series on science and religion. One of the paintings was called Mullah and Mariam; I had painted Mariam nude...Then in my series on Sufism, I had painted the Kaaba and near it a donkey. People were furious about my having put a donkey next to the Kaaba; a delegation went to Morarji Desai—he was Prime Minister then.

Q: You don't seem to care too much for maulvis either?

A: When I was a child, a maulvi used to come home, he used to be given paranthas, tea and some "malai" (cream) which we were never given. He used to demand them We were angry

The rightists are coming into power everywhere—rightists for me means fascism. Morarji Desai is a fascist.

GUJARAT

Anti-reservation Stir Turns Communal

Eleven die in violent clashes

The street, Mahajanwada Pole in Ahmedabad's Kalupur area, was strewn with rubble and stones. The area may well have suffered an earthquake. But the disaster was no act of God but the result of communal riots which began on 18 March and left till the time of writing, 11 people dead in its wake.

By 22 March, over 1,000 soldiers and hundreds of policemen from Maharashtra, Madhya Pradesh and Rajasthan along with the local constabulary were patrolling the riot-torn city. The union home minister, Mr S.B. Chavan, airdashed to Ahmedabad on 20 March for an on the spot study as the rioting had brought back memories of the 1969 riots when nearly 800 people died. The violence asserted officials, this time was nowhere like in 1969. But though fewer lives have been lost, the rioting appears to be more systematic and perfectly timed to catch both the police and the new ministry of chief minister Mr Madhavsinh Solanki on the wrong foot. So badly shaken was the government that for three days it did not issue any curfew passes, even to the press. And yet, one could move around the curfew area in a car. Not only did the trouble spread fast but the targets of the mob seemed to be houses, shops and other establishments of people belonging to both communities in congested areas of Dariyapur, Kalupur, Shahpur, Gandhi Road, Fernandes Bridge, Relief Road, Fuvara, Teen Darwaja and Jamalpur. Some of these areas experienced communal violence for the first time in many years. Riots last took place in Teen Darwaja in 1946 and even in 1969, Jamalpur, thickly populated by the poor and lower middle class of both communities had remained calm.

This time hooligans had an active hand in the riots. Looting and burning of houses and shops were the major activities rather than killing people. Till 21 March, as many as 210 incidents of arson and looting were reported in the city. The attacks were clearly well-planned. First, the shops and houses were heavily brick-batted. Then burning rags were thrown inside after which the looters broke in taking away everything that could be carried away. The rest was set on fire. The union home minister, Mr Chavan, was shown some of these "fire-missiles" on 20 March when he went round the riot-torn areas in Dariyapur, Kalupur and Fuvara. Rags were tightly tied or sewn together to form a compact missile which was then dipped into kerosene and set on fire. The burning bundles, called kakda were then hurled at the targets. Final figures were still not available as most of the walled city areas were placed under indefinite curfew from 18 March. The loss however is likely to run into lakhs of rupees as scores of shops and houses of both Muslims and Hindus have been gutted.

The opposition parties have demanded a judicial inquiry by a sitting judge of the Gujarat High Court to inquire into the circumstances leading to the communal riots and what should be done to prevent a recurrence. But the home minister, Mr Amarsinh Choudhary has rejected the demand in the Legislative Assembly. The opposition leaders have alleged that there were a large number (about 7,000) of illegally held firearms in Ahmedabad. They allege that during the initial hours of rioting on 18 March one person Gautam Patel, was shot dead but the government has denied this incident.

Besides kakda, the rioters used a variety of missiles including acid bulbs, soda water bottles, stones, knives, and even cement balls studded with nails. But how the anti-reservation stir turned into a communal riot remains unanswered. The anti-reservation stir, which began on 17 February in protest against the increase in the number of reservations in jobs and education for the socially and educationally backward classes had been nearly a month old. On 16 March, the Solanki government postponed the implementation of the decision for a year after the agitators threatened a Gujarat bandh and a boycott of examinations. Although this was a victory for the agitators wanting a cancellation, they were not happy with just a postponement and decided to go ahead with the bandh and the boycott plans.

The All Gujarat Education Reforms Committee (AGERC) of the students supported by their guardians in the cities, had asked people to observe the bandh peacefully In an effort to dramatise their protest, a call for "sounding the death knell" of the reservation policy by beating thalis at eight pm on 18 March was given to the people. The authorities believing that the agitation would run its ritual course before petering out, failed to take strong preventive measures. Although a police contingent had been mustered, most of the policemen had not been issued firearms lest a constable might fire a round causing a chain reaction. Many of the policemen were armed with only canes or lathis.

When the thalis were beaten on 18 March, the students protesting the against the reservation policy went on the rooftops to beat their own thalis. As soon as this started, brick-batting and throwing of kakdas began. Nobody still knows who started

Troops on guard in the riot-torn city of Ahmedabad

Sunday Standard

it all but it appeared to be pre-planned because the trouble quickly spread to close-by areas of Dariyapur and Kalupur. Within an hour, pitched battles were being fought. At 10.30 pm an indefinite curfew was imposed and the police had to open fire a number of times that night killing three people. Another person was stabbed to death.

A top official told SUNDAY that the state administration immediately asked for police reinforcements from neighbouring states and also requested the army for help. By then precious hours were lost and the rioting grew worse. By noon on 19 March, about 400 troops had been deployed and a large police force was on duty. But throughout the day and despite indefinite curfew, looting and arson continued. By seven pm that day the entire walled city was placed under an indefinite curfew and the police told to act firmly and not to spare trouble makers. There are conflicting reports about what happened on the night of 18 March. The police opened fire in Dariyapur when a police party led by an inspector, Mr B.L. Parmar, was attacked with burning rags, acid bulbs, soda water bottles and stones when it tried to intervene in a street battle between two groups. Burning rags were also thrown inside nearby houses by rioters and eight houses set on fire.

The walled city of Ahmedabad, built in 1426 A.D., is an ideal area for hit and run tactics and difficult for the police to patrol and control. The roads are narrow and winding, leading in turn to labyrinthine streets called poles, which are even narrower and branch off into lanes and bylanes. Patrolling the streets are dangerous as one cannot see what is happening all around. A miscreant can run off into any of the innumerable bylanes which join other streets and escape. The police can also be harassed from the rooftops of the narrow streets without the constables getting any wiser as to who was attacking them and precisely from which rooftop. Even the army jawans unfamiliar with the area faced problems: getting lost in endless chases.

After the riots began in the city, goondas began looting and the mobs followed suit. Newsmen visiting the affected areas saw shops still burning after the looting. Even when Mr Chavan toured the city, shops were still smouldering in the Kalupur area, having been looted and set on fire the previous night. Another feature proving the involvement of a large number of anti-social elements was the systematic looting of shops containing valuables. Shops belonging to both Hindus and Muslims were burnt down.

Sondeep Shankar

Firemen battling the flames in the old city of Ahmedabad

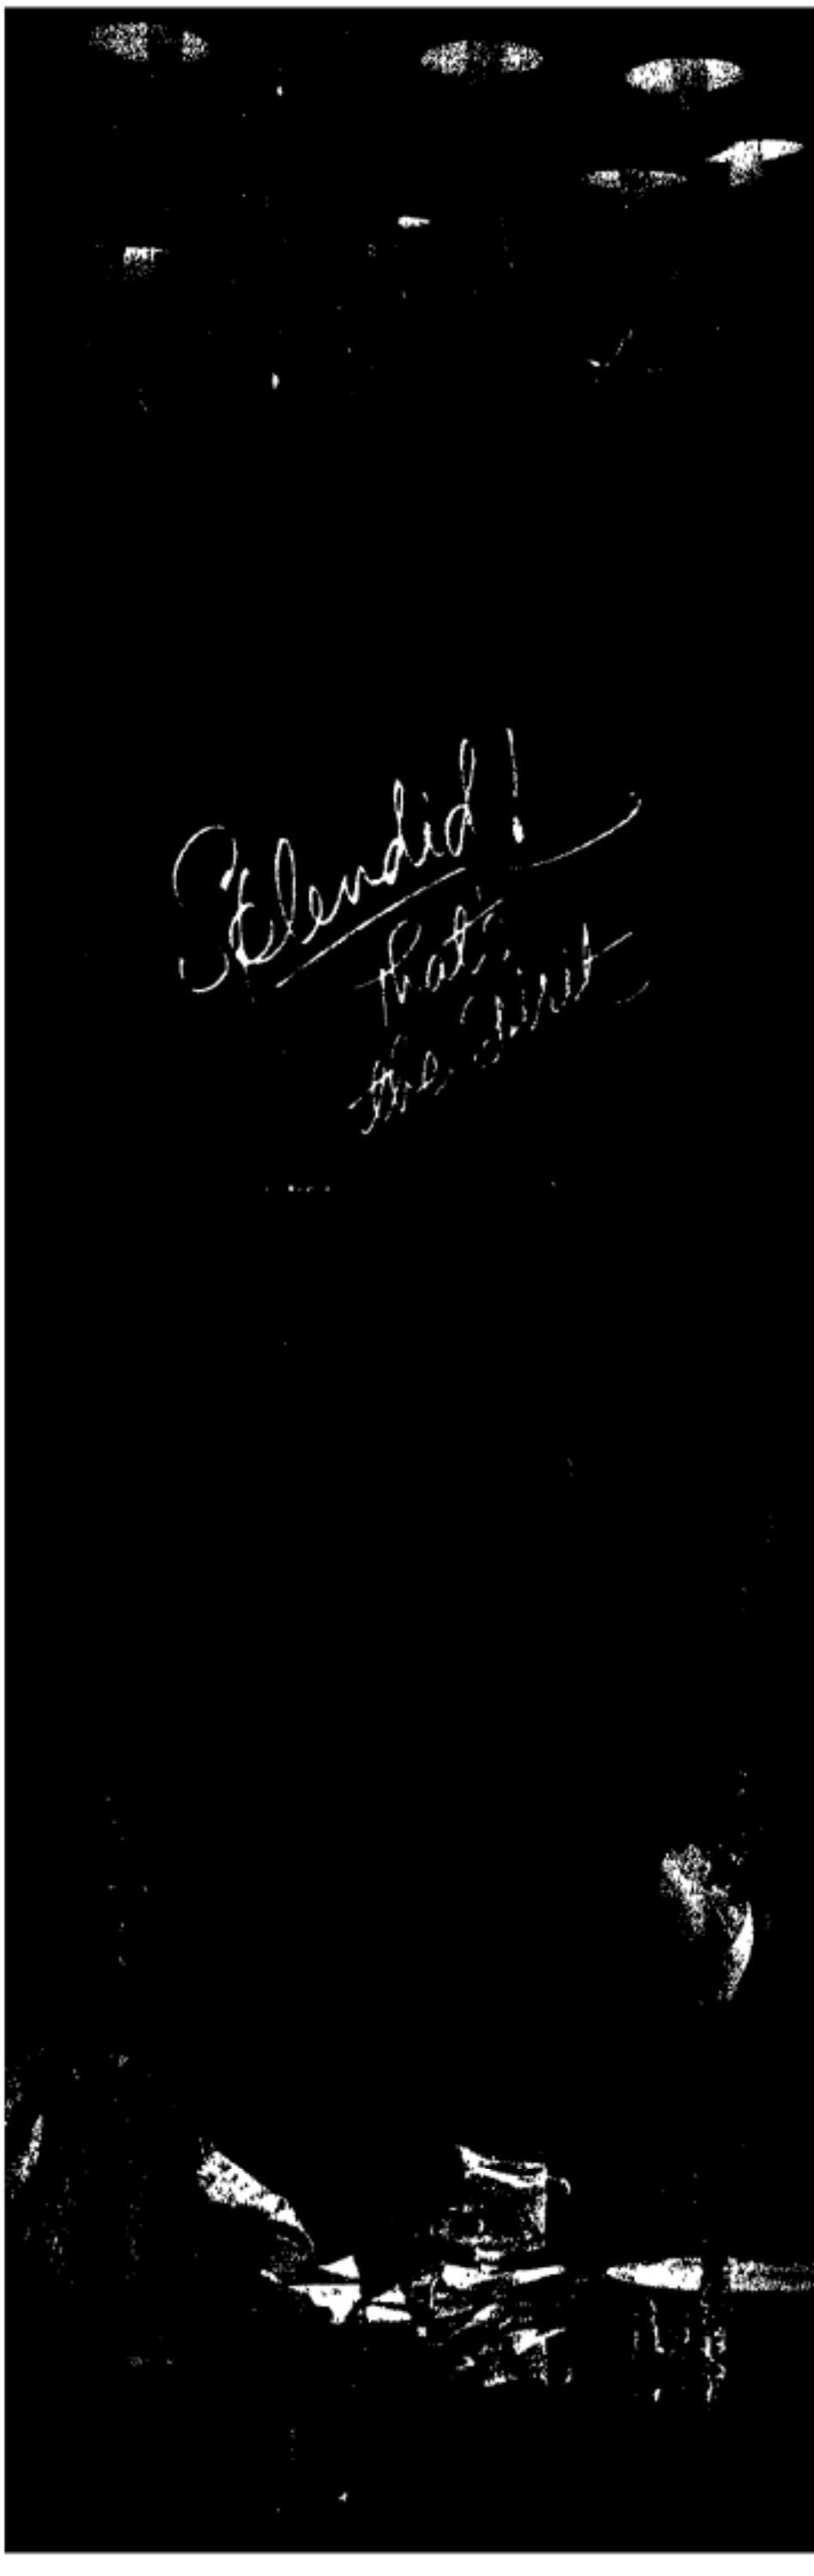
Several factors contributed to the situation getting out of hand. The new home minister, Mr Choudhary, did not have enough time to familiarise himself with either his subordinates or his new office before disaster struck. His police commissioner in Ahmedabad, Mr Y.B. Jhala, who was to retire just before the elections, had been given an extension and was due to leave in a short while. He did not have time to build up rapport with most of his top police officials which led to more confusion. Shocked by the recent illicit liquor tragedy in Ahmedabad, Mr Choudhary had ordered massive raids on illicit liquor dens in the city which had put almost all of them temporarily out of business. According to the police, the large number of hangers-on in the dens who deliver bottles to customers, or collect money and pay off money were left unemployed. Each den would have had 20 to 25 such people and they are alleged to have begun the arson and looting.

There have been complaints about the police being passive spectators, especially when distress calls were made from the old city on 18 and 19 March. On the other hand, from 20 March when the top brass was told to curb the violence, people accused the police of harsh treatment. Among those who made these complaints was Mr Lalbhai Kundiwala, the Congress(I) MLA from Jamalpur, who claimed that the police were needlessly ruthless in his area. He said that policemen had beaten up people sleeping out on the pavements in Jamalpur where both Muslims and Hindus live. The police wanted them to get indoors and when they did not, they were beaten up, said Mr Kundiwala.

The anti-reservation agitators have denied their involvement in the communal riots and they even suspended their agitation for a few days. Meanwhile, the Congress(I) leaders have been suggesting that the opposition was responsible for the riots. The Jaganmohan Reddy Commission that inquired into the 1969 riots had identified sensitive points in Ahmedabad for specific watch. But since that report was published, a whole new generation of police officials has come up, who have very little idea of the area they are responsible for. By 22 March, four days of arson, looting and violence had left 11 people dead and at least 28 injured. Eight were killed in police firings and one by stabbing. A top official pointed out that the fact that the number of dead in the rioting was low and that most of the killed had died in police firings meant that the forces had intervened in time.

But almost everyone agrees that anti-social elements were responsible for the rioting. The government is now thinking of an Anti-Goondaism Act because the normal police legislation is not adequate to effectively tackle the goondas. But more than anti-goondaism legislation would be needed. Ahmedabad, has a population of about 20 lakhs of which around 3.5 to four lakhs are Muslims a majority of whom are poor. Communal riots which began in 1969 have been frequently causing problems. There has also been a rise in the aspirations of the poor. As a sociologist explained, when aspirations are not fulfilled, people look for explanations and the easiest explanation is to blame one section or the other. The latest manifestation of this was the animosity between the upper and lower castes even among Hindus, a feeling which has been aggravated by the reliance of politicians on caste and communal votes in the past years.



Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

You are looking at our new International selection of suitings.

SUITINGS FROM THE Cezari COLLECTION

BOMBAY DYEING

DELUXE

Splendid!
For the First

RICH MATURE MELLOW
TO BLEND SMOOTHLY WITH YOUR STYLE

The Silent Killer

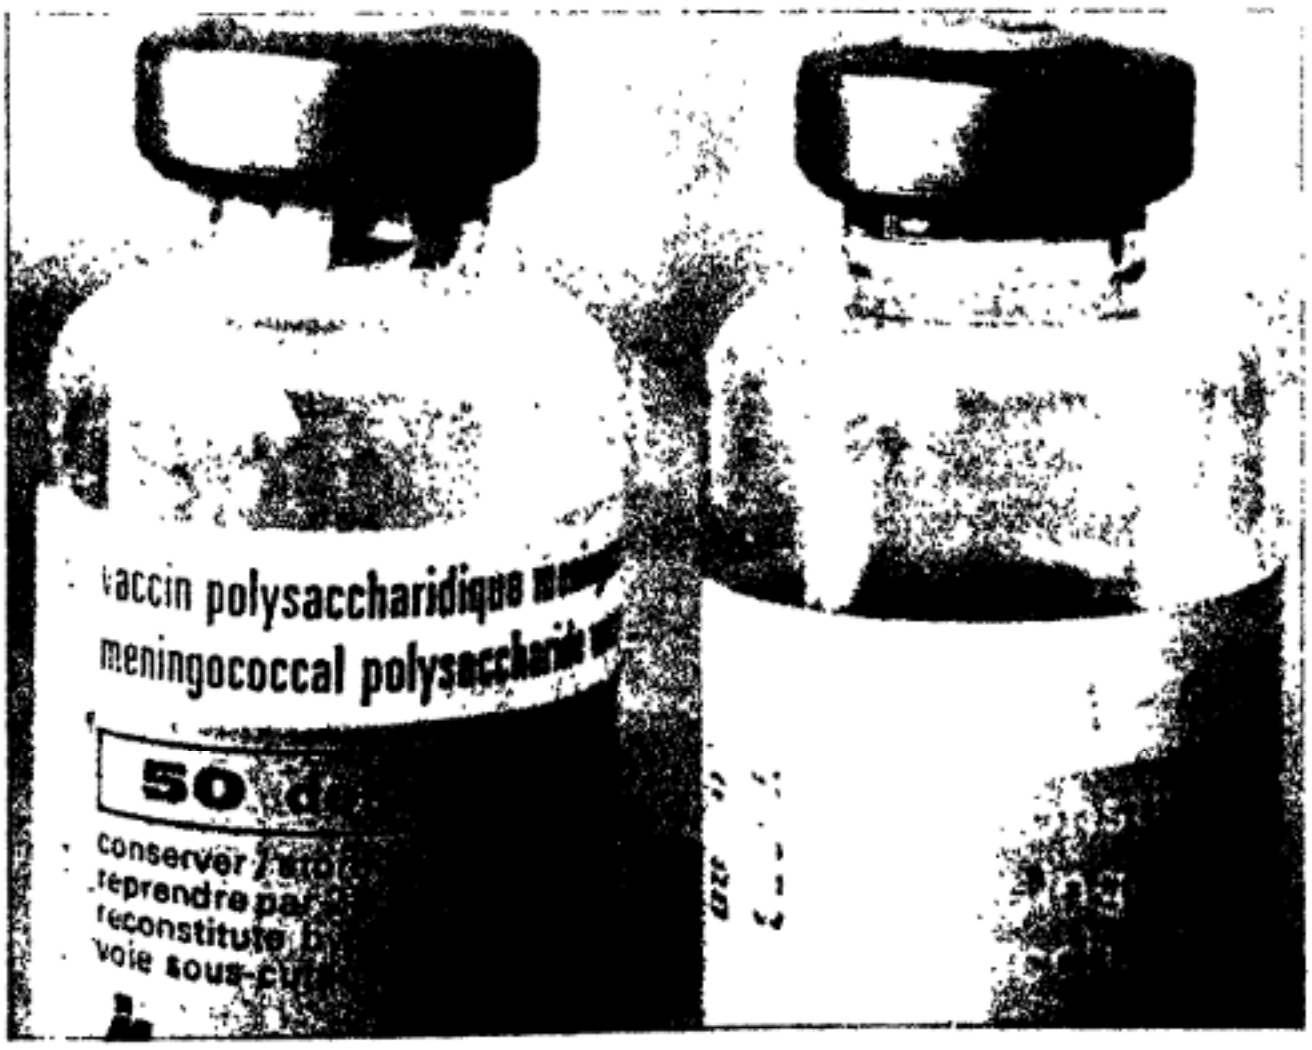
Deaths due to meningitis in Delhi continue to rise

The outbreak of meningitis cases which began this year has reached epidemic proportions. The killer disease has already claimed 261 lives in the capital and the toll continues to rise every day. Figures of deaths from seven large hospitals are alarming. In January, 274 cases of meningitis were reported and 56 patients died. In February, the seven hospitals admitted 997 meningitis cases out of which 134 patients died. In March, the number of deaths rose even further. In the first week, 381 cases were reported, 35 proving fatal and in the second week as many as 436 cases were registered of which 36 persons have died.

What is even more alarming are reports of an increase in meningitis cases from other towns. According to figures available with the National Institute of Communicable Diseases, there has been a definite rise in meningitis cases in parts of Uttar Pradesh, Haryana and Madhya Pradesh. Patients from Faridabad, Gurgaon, Panipat and Agra have rushed to New Delhi where treatment is being given to meningitis patients as part of emergency operations. Figures are also pouring in from other parts of the country which have established beyond doubt that the disease has spread outside the capital. At the Calcutta Medical College hospital for example, more meningitis cases have been reported in two months than in the last three years, establishing the fear that incidence of the disease has risen sharply.

The last time meningitis broke out in the country in such epidemic proportions was in 1976 when several hundred people succumbed to the disease. Since then only a few patients had been hospitalised for meningitis. According to Dr G. K. Vishwakarma, medical superintendent of Safdarjang hospital, which recorded the highest number of meningitis deaths this year, there has been an unprecedented rise in meningitis cases and the situation was fast becoming serious. He, however, felt the incidence of meningitis has now been controlled because of the creation of public awareness and the import of meningitis vaccines.

However, according to Prof. O. P. Ghai a noted medical specialist, the threat posed by the increase in meningitis cases is still grave. He felt that the danger arises not so much from those suffering from meningitis but from the carriers of the disease. For every patient of meningitis there are as many as 300 carriers who have the bacteria either in their throats or noses but have not communicated the disease. The meningitis bacteria of any carrier can enter the blood circulation and cause death within 24 hours.



Medical practitioners treating meningitis cases feel that if all symptoms of the disease have to be eradicated from an area or city, at least 70 per cent of the population would have to be vaccinated. At present, the government has imported 98,000 doses of the Meningococcal Meawgitis vaccine which have been distributed to various hospitals in the capital. The vaccine was imported from a leading French pharmaceutical firm through the World Health Organisation (WHO) and has been administered to family members of meningitis victims, doctors and nurses.

The government has spent Rs ten lakhs for the import o. the vaccine which is produced by a few firms in Sweden, Canada and France and is not easily available in the open market. It is apparent that the vaccine was made available to India because of help extended by the WHO and the serious demand for the vaccine, especially in the capital. Now, most of the vaccine imported has been administered and large quantities have been sent to hospitals in other parts of the country where meningitis cases have been reported.

Though there are a large number of vaccines in the Western countries for the prevention of meningitis none of them has been found to be effective against all nine types of meningitis bacterium. It is fortunate that researchers in New Delhi's hospitals were able to identify the bacterial strain in meningitis cases reported as meningococcal A and C to counter which the vaccine imported has been found effective. Otherwise, the vaccine would have had a limited preventive effect since it can protect a patient from attacks by only two of the nine bacterium of the disease.

Despite the import of nearly one lakh doses of the meningitis vaccine from France, the number of cases being reported in New Delhi and elsewhere continue to rise. The question that will soon come up for discussion is whether or not to import more vaccines once the present reserve is used up. The silent killer of the capital has already begun to claim lives in other cities. It should be prevented from reaching epidemic proportions there as well.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

Used vials of the meningitis vaccine

GUJARAT

The Drink of Death

Illicit liquor kills 27 persons

Mohanlal Vankar, a 40-year-old mason, had just finished his work on the evening of 11 March 1985. Before returning home, in the Gomtipur-Rajpur area of Ahmedabad, Mohanlal visited a bootlegger to buy lattha or illicit liquor. (A small bottle known as pauva costs around Rs four only). The tired mason was looking for something that would raise his spirits. He quickly finished his drink and went home for dinner. When he woke up the next morning, the mason was suffering from blurred vision, and acute nausea and started vomiting before he was rushed to hospital. About 60 others were also hospitalised and within three days, as many as 27 persons died in Ahmedabad.

The incident led to a controversy about the total prohibition policy in Gandhiji's home state. The Solanki government which has returned to power after a massive victory in the Assembly polls swiftly set up a one-man commission of inquiry, headed by a retired district judge, Mr C.C. Morakhia to go into the tragedy and suggest how such mishaps could be avoided. But, the reaction to the killer brew deaths was familiar. Death by poisonous illicit liquor is common in Gujarat where drinking without a permit is a crime and getting a permit is very difficult. In 1977, a series of illicit liquor deaths occurred in the state and a commission of inquiry was set up.

Then, in the 1980 election manifesto the Congress(I) had promised that the liquor laws would be made more pragmatic (a euphemism to describe a relaxation in the liquor policy as in Maharashtra). But the government got cold feet, largely because of the prospect of stiff opposition from people opposed to any liberalisation. Later, the government appointed the Miyabhoy Commission and received a report which has been gathering dust in Gandhinagar.

Total prohibition which was imposed in Gujarat in 1960 has many supporters in the state. But prohibition also created problems as the liquor law is not stringent. Bootlegging is rampant in the state and bootleggers and police officials are often in close collaboration. Permits are granted only to those who have medical certificates and obtaining a permit, which is a lengthy process enables a person to buy a limited quantity of liquor from one of the few recognised shops in the entire state at a very high price. Inevitably, black marketing in liquor and adulteration are common.

The poor however, have to depend on the local brews, prepared from mahua flowers or rotten gur or by treating chemicals like methyl alcohol. The brew is made as cheaply as possible and occasionally illicit brew makers use poisonous chemicals. The local brew in Gujarat is called lattha and there are stills in many villages and in big cities like Ahmedabad, Surat, Baroda and Rajkot. In 1980, bootleggers had fought with each other in Baroda, a battle which led to communal riots in the city. In November 1977, over 100 people died after drinking lattha in Ahmedabad, and many more lost their eyesight. Such tragedies occur periodically in different towns in the state. These tragedies hit the headlines only when a number of people are affected. The toll illicit liquor takes among individuals is unknown because these incidents are hardly ever brought to the notice of the authorities.

Illicit liquor, also known as Cologne water, gives an instant "kick," to the drinker. But faulty manufacture or adulteration by mixing dangerous chemicals is common and the victims invariably are the poor. It was no different in Gomtipur-Rajpur. Most of the 60 persons affected by the spurious drink were labourers, including some textile workers. The first victim of the killer brew was reported from Natvar Vakil's chawl where the 65-year-old Shankar Karsan died. At first, his relatives thought the old man had died a natural death, but soon the news of poisonous drink victims in the nearby chawls began to spread. The civic authorities and the police sent vehicles fitted with loud hailers to tell people to report without hesitation if anybody was suffering from the effects of the killer brew. Soon the hospitals began to overflow with liquor poisoning cases. One of the dead was 38-year-old Dahyabhai, the sole bread winner of his family. He leaves behind five daughters and his 27-year-old widow. In most cases, the story is the same.

A liquor tragedy victim

Initially, the news stunned the government into inactivity. The ruling party had not made any mention of the prohibition policy in the recently concluded Assembly polls, but the demands for a thorough review of the existing policy will come up because the new Legislature was scheduled to meet from 18 March. However, the appointment of the Morakhia Commission and the transfer of five police officers appear to be routine measures. The government is known to have set up such commissions, partly as public relations exercises and partly to defuse a potentially troublesome situation.

Nevertheless, the new home minister, Mr Amarsinh Choudhary, indicated that the report of the Miyabhoy Commission may soon be brought up in the state Assembly. But that would hardly solve the problem because contrary to the expectations of most opponents of the total prohibition policy, the commission is understood to have recommended stiffer treatment for offenders. Other states and countries have faced the same dilemma in the past. Prohibition cannot be successfully implemented simply because dictates on personal habits are invariably flouted and because prohibition is not in force in the states around Gujarat. The state government indicts nearly a lakh people every year but liquor laws are disobeyed more easily than any other law of the land. The rich drink better liquor but the poor can only drink the illicit brew. And until prohibition is lifted or other preventive measures taken, deaths from drinking illicit liquor will continue.

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

JAMMU AND KASHMIR

Fighting the Drug Menace

Narcotics peddlers arrested in Srinagar

Eighteen-year-old Abdul Latif suddenly went "mad" recently. Screaming and hurling abuses at everyone, he was taken away by the police. The doctors who examined him later found him sane but a "junkie" or drug-addict addicted to "brown sugar" a pinkish opium derivative similar to heroin. Cheap (only Rs 30 per quarter which is enough for four sessions) and available in even the local cigarette shops in Srinagar, it is one of the most dangerous drugs in Kashmir.

Latif is not an exception. There are thousands of boys and girls (4300, according to the police) who have recently become addicted to drugs in Kashmir. Doctors in Srinagar have attended many patients who have become addicted to "brown sugar" and were suffering from depression, severe pains, nausea, and loss of weight. Only two or three doses of the 'pink coloured powder' are said to be sufficient to get someone "hooked" permanently. "But if the patient is made to feel that you love him and are interested in his personal well-being he may recover," said Dr. Miraj who has successfully treated many patients.

Last month, when the word about the unfamiliar "brown sugar" and the implications its consumption brings with it spread and it became known that the dreaded drug was being commonly used by the younger generation in Kashmir, protests by many social and religious organisations throughout the valley followed and the matter also figured in the state Assembly. The state police department was also severely criticised for having failed to bring those involved in contraband trade to book.

The superintendent of police (crime), Mr Javed Makhdoomi, was asked to conduct the raids and break the drug-connection. The raids on posh hotels, house-boats on Dal Lake and some palatial residential houses in Srinagar which were conducted by Mr Makhdoomi himself led to the arrest of Anwara Begum, a Pakistani national from Abbotabad, her Kashmiri husband, Abdul Samad Guru, and their two pretty young daughters, Dilshada and Suraya, and 30 others. "Brown sugar" and 2,000 US dollars were seized along with other narcotics, foreign currency, blue films and incriminating documents. Anwara Begum, known as the "Queen of narcotics" in certain circles is claimed to have been in the heroin trade for the past three years. Investigations revealed that she and her daughters had been jailed earlier for drug peddling and prostitution but no action was taken after she threatened to name prominent government officials involved in such activities. After she was given bail by a local court she was allowed to continue her activities. It was only after protests by the public and after Mr Makhdoomi was shifted to the crime branch that she and her associates were arrested.

However, Anwara again moved an application in a local court seeking bail but it was rejected when the police pleaded that her release would hamper their investigations. It has been claimed that some foreigners including three Afghan nationals are also involved in the racket. Mr Makhdoomi has sent special teams of police to Delhi and some other parts of the country to arrest these foreign nationals there as well as locals who have fled to escape arrest. The help of the Delhi police, the Narcotics wing of the Central Bureau of Investigation and state police departments has also been sought. Interpol will also be approached, said police sources. One Afghan national Muhammad Aman has been in police custody in Srinagar after the police raided his house in Srinagar and recovered a large quantity of narcotics and foreign currency. Lawyers in Srinagar courts have also refused to defend Anwara when she approached them. "We did this with the intention of discouraging her and the like," said a lawyer. It was only after hiring a lawyer from outside that Anwara could again move her bail application in the court of the chief judicial magistrate in Srinagar. At the time of writing, no decision on the second application has been taken by the court.

According to Mr Makhdoomi, Anwara Begum was caught supplying "brown sugar" to her two agents in a house-boat on Dal Lake on 25 February. Her nearby residence was also raided and "brown sugar" and foreign currency were seized.

Drug addiction among college students, including girls is on the rise. According to reports the drug addicted girls are made to act in blue films and forced into prostitution. Anwara's two daughters were allegedly used to procure young girls. Police sources hoped that the arrests would help to bust the prostitution racket in the city as the flourishing flesh trade in posh hotels, house-boats and guest-houses in Srinagar has triggered off protests in the Valley. Former chief minister, Dr Farooq Abdullah has blamed the police in a recent statement. It is believed that the police have been taking no action because of the involvement of the son of a leading politician.

Yusuf Jameel, Srinagar

Anwara Begum (left) with her daughter Dilshada

RAJASTHAN

The Politics of Opportunism

Uproar over Raja Man Singh's death dies down

As the flames from the funeral pyre of Raja Man Singh of Bharatpur killed in a "police encounter" on 21 February leapt into the sky, angry promises to avenge his death were made by those surrounding the pyre. Some of them were made by political aspirants for the Assembly elections who had not been on speaking terms with the Raja for the last 20 years. All of Rajasthan would burn now, they declared. Nobody from the Congress(I) had dared to show his face at the funeral and a few days later the chief minister, Shiv Charan Mathur resigned.

Barely a fortnight afterwards, the Congress(I) won five of the eight Bharatpur Assembly seats, including that of Bharatpur city which the Congress(I) had never managed to win before. The Deeg issue, which cost the Congress(I) many seats in other parts of Rajasthan and in Uttar Pradesh, petered out by the afternoon of 22 March after chief minister Harideo Joshi stated in the House that the case had been transferred to the Central Bureau of Investigation and the deputy superintendent of police who allegedly ordered the firing in which Raja Man Singh died, had been suspended. He also said that a judicial enquiry had been set up. Unfortunately, Bhairon Singh Shekhawat of the BJP and leader of the opposition was unable to speak up in the House on that day as he had not taken his oath as an MLA until then. Shekhawat was, however, in the Vidhan Sabha Bhavan. When this correspondent met him, Shekhawat said, "I have not even taken my oath since I have high blood pressure," when he was asked why he had not taken up the Raja Man Singh issue.

While the Deeg incident was practically the only issue the opposition took up during the first three days (interestingly, the Rajasthan Governor, O.P. Mehra did not mention the incident in his address) there seem to be disagreements over the incident within the opposition itself. The death of the Jat prince has begun a series of reactions in Rajasthan politics, with many MLAs wanting to use the incident to further their own image, or tarnish others'. K. Natwar Singh, the minister of state for steel and the Lok Sabha MP from Bharatpur, stands at the centre of this struggle for power. His entry into Rajasthan politics has made many politicians both in the ruling party and the opposition insecure. Some of the opposition MLAs want to politicise the issue and involve Natwar Singh in the Deeg incident—Nathi Singh of the DMKP made a critical statement in the House implying the role of Natwar Singh in the incident.

Jagdish Yadav

Natwar Singh

According to an opposition MLA, there are a few MLAs who want to implicate Natwar Singh and the district officials in Bharatpur because this would place them in a better bargaining position. A few MLAs fear an escalation of tension between the Jats and the Rajputs over the Raja Man Singh incident. The Raja was a Jat, the DSP, K.S. Bhatti, a Rajput. Said Mr Yadhunath Singh of the DMKP, "We are afraid that there could be tension between the Jats and the Rajputs if the matter gets out of hand." He wondered why the guns fired at Raja Man Singh have not been confiscated. To complicate matters further, it is also believed that the Rajput lobby will eventually defend K.S. Bhatti.

Madhu Jain, Jaipur

BOMBAY

Photographers' Appeal Turned Down

Instead of the world champions and their World Cup making the front pages of Sunday's newspapers, the news of photographers boycotting the arrival at Sahar airport hit the headlines. Photographers and journalists went two hours before the one am arrival time of the victorious champions, "because we knew there is always trouble with the airport authorities" said Daily's Mukesh Parpiani. "We approached the deputy general manager, operations, International Airport Authority (IAA), Mr Agarwal and asked for permission to go outside the customs enclosure so that we could take pictures of the cricketers as they emerged. We even approached the director-general of the IAA, Mr Tilak, but they would not listen. They said we could take pictures of the cricketers when they came out of the airport and boarded the bus. This was impossible because there was not enough light for this, and the huge crowds that rush towards the cricketers make it impossible for photographers to take pictures.

They allowed TV people outside the customs lounge and we only asked for the same treatment." They finally tried to push photographers and journalists into the terminal manager's office which could accomodate barely 15 people and from where they could see nothing. Once the cricketers arrived, there was total confusion and relatives and friends of the customs and airport officials were seen in the customs enclosure. The photographers and journalists were outside the airport building shouting slogans.

This is a normal feature, said several of the photographers interviewed. "This time we were in a majority so we could protest. The airport authorities would not even listen to the state minister for sports, Mr Nakul Patel," said one of them. What the photographers with the daily newspapers and magazines resent is the way freelancers who work on behalf of ministers get airport passes. Another pampered group is the one which consists of foreign TV and cameramen, who often represent small papers, said the angry photographers.

Olga Tellis, Bombay

Star Attraction

Alokе Mitra

Vasundhara Raje

There are 200 MLAs in the Rajasthan Assembly, and 100 journalists to cover its proceedings; many among the latter can often be found dozing in the room next to the gallery. But during the opening session of the Assembly this time, a near-stampede took place when Vasundhara Raje was sworn in; glamour had at last returned to the Assembly after a long time. The daughter of Rajmata Vijaya Raje Scindia of Gwalior is the newly-elected MLA from Dholpur on a BJP ticket. She is also the new star attraction in a generally more youthful Vidhan Sabha with her long, lustrous locks and big eyes. Ms Vasundhara Raje who lost the last parliamentary elections when she contested from Bhind, won handsomely in the legislative elections, despite the fact that both her husband and his mother campaigned against her.

Mum's the Word

Jack Taylor

Keeping mum is not easy. Jack Taylor (47), who now heads the Special Projects Team of the Dallas Times Herald had the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) chasing him when he refused to divulge the source of his explosive article relating to the defence department of the US government. Taylor and Carol Green (40), a lawyer specialising in the defence of press freedom, were in India recently to address a three-day seminar on investigative journalism organised by the United States Information Services (USIS) in Jaipur in the third week of March with 30 indigenous sleuths. Taylor says that he was cleared of charges of espionage, but if ever he did another story which embarrassed the government, the file could be brought out again.

Director's Debut

The line between theatre and cinema has become increasingly thin. The latest to cross over is Bhanu Bharti, formerly of the National School of Drama which has in the past gifted us Naseeruddin Shah, Om Puri and Raj Babbar. Bharti will, in September, direct a film based on two plays of Frederic Garcia Lorca: Yerma and Blood Wedding which will be set in the deserts of Rajasthan for the local exotica. Starring in the film are Bharti's co-student at the NSD, Naseeruddin Shah, as well as Anupam Kher and a new find, Kiran Thakur Singh. Bharti is at present directing a rather unusual play in Jaipur. It is Pashu Gayatri and has been written by the noted Malayalam writer K. Narayanan Pannicker. The actors are a group of Bhil tribals from Udaipur district with whom Bharti has been working for some time. Bharti wants to set up a permanent repertory of tribal actors.

More Than Glamour

Will Silver Screen shake off the stardust? Uma Rao who took over Stardust from Shobha Kilachand when the latter started Celebrity has returned after a break of a few years with her own film magazine, Silver Screen which is going to be launched on 1 April. It is going to be a magazine for developing tastes and an audience which has grown up, according to Ms Rao. What is new about this magazine is a section on Hollywood: there will be 20 pages with news from Los Angeles. That does not mean that Bombay and Madras will be edged out: there will be 35 pages for the films produced at home. But here again Ms Rao promises a "fresh approach." Will Silver Screen be a pioneer?

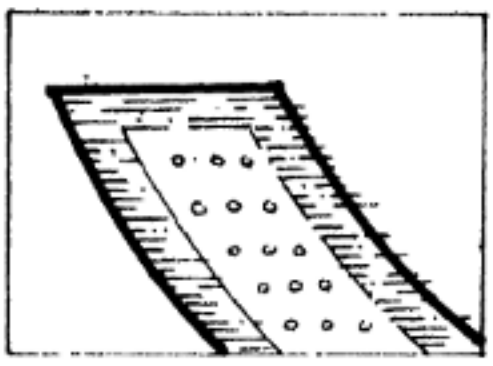
Theatre of Nostalgia

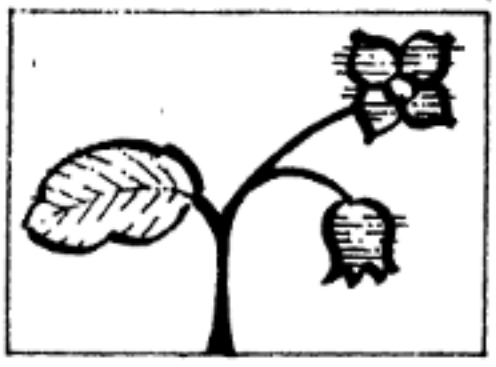


Jayanta Das

Shashi Kapoor with Jennifer Kapoor

The grand old Gaiety Theatre might be given a second life. The former centre of the high life on the Mall in Shimla will probably be bought by Shashi Kapoor who plans to start a repertory company for his Prithvi Theatres. The other place Kapoor has his eyes on—and this for reasons sentimental—is the beautiful opera house where he and his wife, the late Jennifer Kendall, would often meet before they married. Both theatres are anachronisms from days when going to the theatre was an event: they now look sad and dilapidated, and are not even a shadow of their former glamorous selves.

Band-Aid Helps in Psoriasis



Dr Ronald Shore of Johns Hopkins university in Baltimore, USA, has come upon an interesting discovery: that band-aid can be used in treating psoriasis, a skin disease marked by red patches covered with scales. Dr Shore applied a band-aid after taking a small skin sample from the centre of one psoriatic plaque, and when the band-aid was removed, it was noted that the part of the psoriatic plaque which had been covered by the adhesive portions of the band-aid had cleared totally. The part of the plaque that had been covered by the pad remained unchanged. "Prolonged application of tape will probably prove most beneficial when combined with other therapies," Dr Shore said, "since lesions in a minority of patients clear totally when it is used alone."

The New Factor

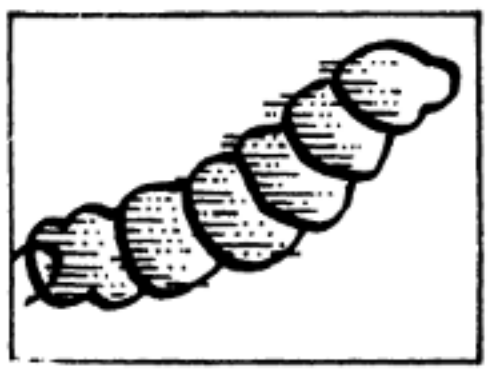
A research led by Prof. J. D. Swales at Leicester University in England is investigating the possibility that the composition of the membranes which surround the body cells affects blood pressure. High blood pressure is the most important known risk factor that leads to strokes and heart attacks: two of the major disabling and killing disorders of modern life. In England, for instance, up to 20 per cent of the population suffers from high blood pressure, but approximately half the people who have high blood pressure are unaware of it. While some scientists believe that differences in salt intake lead to high blood pressure, there is proof also that dietary fats influence blood pressure.

Prof. Swales' team believes that changes in the cell membrane could alter the way in which cells handle such substances as sodium, potassium and calcium. These abnormalities can be demonstrated in the white and red blood cells of the blood and it seems likely that there are similar changes in the muscular cells of the blood vessel cells.

True Seed for Healthy Potatoes

Scientists in Britain are working on a project where small farmers in developing countries will be able to grow healthy and abundant crops of potatoes from true seed. The traditional method has been to grow potatoes from seed tubers. In Europe and America sophisticated schemes have been developed over many years to produce high quality seed potatoes. The cost of this seed is relatively low compared to costs of production. In developing countries, the potato is still considered a luxury vegetable, the main reason being the high cost of seed tubers. Only a couple of handfuls of true potato seed are needed to plant one hectare of land, compared to two tons of tubers.

How Do Fish Navigate?



Whales and dolphins can navigate by means of the earth's magnetic field, according to US scientists. Marine mammals tend to beach themselves at places along the Atlantic coast where the strength of the magnetic field is low. The researchers compared the sites of 212 live strandings (those in which animals swim ashore rather than being washed up dead) with the magnetic patterns on the ocean floor. 95 per cent of the strandings occurred where bands of minimum strength intersect the shoreline. Researchers still do not know why whales and dolphins strand themselves. Also, if they have internal compasses, where are they located? In a few animals such as bees, fish and birds, scientists have identified the sensory organs containing crystals of magnetite, an iron oxide. Although magnetite has been found scattered throughout the bodies of several species of dolphins, scientists have yet to determine whether the animals can use it to get their bearings.

WHO's Successful Programmes

The World Health Organisation (WHO) has checked the alarming increase of schistosomiasis, which is a common menace to about 20 million people. Also known as bilharziasis, after the German pathologist Theodor Bilharz, the disease affects one out of 20 people in 74 developing countries but is largely unknown in northern, temperate climates. The disease causes rash, cough and chest pains, cramps, diarrhoea, fever, blood in the urine and enlargement of the spleen and liver. A form of bladding cancer is also linked with the infection. Children under 14 usually contract the disease through swimming, adult men through fishing and farming and women through washing clothes.

A New Cure for Cancer

And now, silkworms for cancer. Japanese scientists are working on a technique where they can make silkworms produce the protein interferon, the prime candidate for a cancer cure. Daiichi Seyaki, a Japanese company, has introduced a new biotechnological method using silkworms to produce alpha-interferon, which is one of several forms of the protein which is produced naturally in human cells as a defence mechanism against infection.

The strategy relies on a virus that commonly attacks the silkworm and infects its cells. Once the virus is inside the cell, it produces large amounts of protein within the silkworm. By isolating the part of the virus gene that controls the production of protein and replacing it with the human gene that makes interferon, interferon may be produced instead.

Illustrations Prabir Sen

VARIETY

THIS INDIA

Illustration: Devasmita Dutt

TRIPUNITHURA (KERALA): A footloose ram has taken to travelling by bus in this town. He shuttles practically every day, between the temple towns of Chottanikara and Tripunithura, covering a distance of about ten kilometres But a ten kilometre trek can be too tiring even for a quadruped So he hit upon the idea of riding a bus. The private bus operators, known to invite anyone in, did not grudge the new passenger. The ram even has his favourite bus which he takes on its first trip at daybreak He spends the day roaming round the marketplace, fighting off "rivals" encroaching on his "territory" near the bus stop. Come nightfall and he is ready for the return trip. The same bus waits for him every day. The ram steps in through the front door as nonchalantly as any seasoned commuter and occupies his favourite place, the space just behind the driver's seat. The bus crew generously allow him to travel free—Indian Express (P Suryanarayana Murthy, Gudivada)

GANGTOK: Two candidates in the Assembly elections in Sikkim got only one vote each: probably their own. One of them was a candidate of the Sikkim Prajatantra Congress and the other an independent. Many of the Prajatantra Congress nominees did not even cross double figures—The Times of India (B.B.L. Sharma, New Delhi)

BANGALORE: Mr A.R. Ayajit has created a possible record by registering a grand cipher in Belgaum constituency in the elections to the Karnataka Assembly. He is one of the 296 "protest candidates" put up by the Kannada editors' forum against the alleged "bogus voting" by the Maharashtra Ekikaran Samithi. All the candidates withdrew in favour of the Congress(I), but managed to garner some votes—Indian Express (J. Ravishankar, Bangalore)

NEW DELHI: A brave couple foiled a robbery attempt in their house in Jwala Nagar in Shahdara area on 7 February and helped the police arrest three men including an Uttar Pradesh Police constable. The three culprits visited the residence of Mr C. K. Jain and asked his wife if there was a room for rent. The suspicious housewife asked them to meet her husband in his shop in Chotta Bazar in Shahdara area. Within minutes of the three arriving at Mr Jain's shop in Chotta Bazar, his wife telephoned him and warned him about the strangers. Catching the gist of the conversation, the three men tried to escape but were caught by bystanders after Mr Jain raised an alarm—Indian Express (J. Trehan, New Delhi)

MOUNT ABU: A polling party travelled 12 km by jeep and trudged through thickly-forested mountain track carrying ballot boxes to help the 23.3 voters of Utraj village exercise their franchise in the Assembly election of Rajasthan. Located 1,700 metres above sea level the village is the highest point between Mount Everest and the Nilgiris—The Searchlight (Rajesh Sahay, Jhumri Telaiya, Bihar)

THANJAVUR: Forest officials were keeping a night-long vigil to catch one of the two crocodiles that had strayed into Karumbur village near Kumbakonam recently and taken refuge in a tank People have not been entering the tank. It all started when the villagers were shocked to see two crocodiles, three metres long, crawling on the street, perhaps, in search of prey. The residents caught a crocodile while the other escaped into the tank—The Hindu (M. Govindarajan, Madras)

BOMBAY: The calendars of a well-known transport company, found displayed in a locality in north-west Bombay, led to the busting of a two-woman gang involved in several thefts in the western suburbs. The women who were rag-pickers and hailed from Madras, had stolen electrical goods worth Rs 25,000 from the company's godown by breaking open the shutters thrice in a fortnight, the police said. They had also stolen the tell-tale calendars—a bundle of about 1,000—and distributed them in a hutment colony—Indian Express (B. Anandi, Bangalore)

WITHOUT COMMENT

Does he not know that he rides a tiger and this tiger is a maneater?—Atal Behari Vajpayee, on Rajiv Gandhi's drive against black money, in Indian Express

Indian journalism has got fat, flabby, lazy and mercenary—Rusi Karanjia in Imprint

Patriotism is a commodity equated today with the Congress(I) and the majority community—George Fernandes in The Illustrated Weekly of India

When I have renunciated all my comforts, even the show and glamour, what is this little thing (the Maruti). Service must bring you glamour and not the vehicle you ride. I can even come by bicycle—NTR in The Telegraph

The F-16s that they (the US) have sent us are for the generals like little boys playing with toys—Air Marshal Asghar Khan and leader of the Tehriq-i-Istiqlal Party

This is a budget where the union government wants to have its cake and eat it too—Biju Patnaik, on the union budget, in The Times of India

I'm afraid it's red like anyone else's—Prince Charles, remarking on his blood, some of which he recently donated, quoted in Time

Prabhat Kumar

She (Rekha) is really original. You can't say Rekha is like Madhubala or Meena Kumari, she is totally original, custom made, one piece—Shashi Kapoor in Star and Style

In this edifice that is coming up, one brick could well be yours.

If you are a Peerless certificate-holder.

Because Peerless puts the certificate-holders' Fund in Government custody, in the form of Fixed Deposits and other securities. This money in turn is utilised by the Government to fund projects vital for the nation's growth; dams, power and fertiliser plants, canals, roads and railways. Every Peerless certificate-holder is therefore contributing towards the nation's industrial progress. Moreover, the certificate-holder is assured of 100% security for his investment, because this money cannot be withdrawn except to pay certificate-holders and that too only after prior permission is obtained from the authorities concerned. This is the kind of safeguard that makes Peerless unique amongst companies engaged in similar line of business.

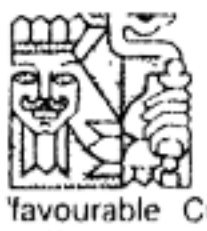
It is no wonder then that millions of Indians have invested their future with Peerless in complete trust. Because it has come to mean so much more than India's premier non-banking savings company. An institution with a heart. Providing direct and indirect employment opportunities; promoting art, culture and sports; donating to humanitarian services. And above all, promising hope and security to the man with small means.

Total investment in Government custody—over Rs 500 crores.

PGI-5811

The Peerless General Finance & Investment Co. Ltd.

India's largest non-banking savings Company.



BEGINNING 31 MARCH 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) This is a week of mixed fortunes Businessmen and professionals will make steady headway Creative artists and sportsmen will also prosper At home your children will be a source of inspiration However, your financial prospects are not so bright you may have to borrow money to tide over this lean period This is also a bad phase for marriage negotiations
Good dates: 1, 2 and 3
Lucky numbers: 5, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: South

LEO (15 August—14 September) Do not take hasty decisions regarding your career consult e'ders before finalising plans. Businessmen are likely to benefit from this favourable period On the financial front most of you will gain money through an unexpected source The home front will remain cheerful This is also a favourable week for lovers you can go ahead with marriage plans
Good dates: 1, 3 and 4
Lucky numbers: 3, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: North

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) Doctors, politicians and those connected with the security services will find this period extremely favourable Creative artists and sportsmen will receive rare honours However businessmen are advised not to make fresh investments during this phase The home front will add to your worries. This is not a good time for love and marriage
Good dates: 2, 3 and 6
Lucky numbers. 2, 3 and 7
Favourable direction: South-east

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) Try and avoid disputes this week Enemies will be active during this phase. do not take even your close friends and relatives for granted Financially, this is a bleak period On the domestic front, someone close to you may misunderstand you However, this is a bright period for creative artists The phase is also favourable for love and matrimonial alliances
Good dates: 4, 5 and 6
Lucky numbers: 4, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) The stars foretell a bright period for all of you If you are in love and intending to get married, this is the ideal time to do so Legal problems should also be settled during this phase On the financial front, most of you will gain money or property Policemen will receive awards for bravery Your health will also improve but do not neglect your diet
Good dates: 31, 2 and 5
Lucky numbers: 1, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: South

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) The time is particularly favourable for sportsmen most of you will come out with flying colours in competitions Professionals and businessmen will also make slow but steady progress The domestic front will add to your joys this week Those above the age of 45 should keep a vigilant eye on their health and diet
Good dates: 1, 4 and 5
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 8
Favourable direction: North

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) This is an extremely lucky week for all of you Businessmen are advised to push their efforts to the utmost while professionals should utilise the opportunities that come their way A journey towards the middle of the week will prove financially profitable This is also a good time for lovers you may go ahead with marriage plans.
Good dates: 31, 1 and 2
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 5
Favourable direction. North

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) Speculations will yield favourable results and businessmen should not hesitate to take risks On the professional front however, you are likely to face opposition from your colleagues Students are advised not to fritter away precious time At home the health of your wife will cause concern Lovers are advised not to execute adventurous plans
Good dates: 2, 5 and 6
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 6
Favourable direction: West

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) This is not a good week for most of you The domestic as well as the professional front will bother you throughout this period Your deteriorating health will add to your worries this week You may have to borrow money from friends to tide over this period Avoid risky financial deals A letter will bring good tidings
Good dates. 3, 5 and 6
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction. South

CANCER (15 July—14 August) This is a favourable week for those in love but guard against misunderstandings The phase is equally good for professionals. Businessmen will get opportunities to expand their empire. On the economic front most of you will gain through inheritance The domestic front will remain peaceful. A letter will bring good tidings But do not neglect your health
Good dates: 3, 4 and 5
Lucky numbers: 3, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: South-west

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) This is an ideal week for those in love go ahead with marriage plans You may have to undertake a long journey towards the middle of the week The time is also favourable for politicians. On the financial front, however, you are likely to suffer setbacks The domestic front will add to your worries Your health will deteriorate steadily.
Good dates: 1 3 and 4
Lucky numbers: 6, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: North-east

PISCES (15 March—14 April) Your financial prospects will look up and you will be able to repay most of your debts Businessmen should not hesitate to undertake risky deals Professionals will also benefit from this favourable period At home your children will be a source of joy Lovers will find their parents in a compromising mood. However your health will continue to bother you
Good dates: 31 2 and 4
Lucky numbers: 2 5 and 6
Favourable direction West

For those born on the 1st, 2nd or 3rd of any month:

Most of you are extremely shy by nature you always try to keep away from friends and relatives. You spend a lot of time reading books and magazines most of you will make good professors or doctors. You are also very practical in all your dealings. This is why your relatives look upon you for advice. Women born during this period are extremely fair and they make good housewives.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LAKHS OF EDUCATED YOUTH EVERY YEAR UNDER GOVERNMENT & BANK SCHEMES!

Wanted matric & more educated unemployed youngmen & women from all towns/cities/villages of India for employment under the scheme for providing self-employment to educated unemployed youth, for setting up Business, Trade, Small Scale Industry or Service Centre etc. introduced by the Government of India, being implemented on top priority basis. Under this scheme, without any guarantors, on hypothecation basis, Bank will give you loan upto Rs. 25,000/- returnable in easy instalments (& Government will give you "FREE" subsidy upto Rs. 6,250/- not to be returned by you). Priority is being given to ladies & technically qualified people. But all non-technical youngmen & women are also eligible. Rs. 25,000/- to Rs. 2 lakhs are also available for proposed industry & Rs. 25,000/- to Rs. 1 lakh is available for proposed business under bank employment plan. Income prospects for enterprising youngmen & women from Rs. 1,000/- to Rs. 5,000/- P.M. or even more. Those desirous of availing the benefits available under the above schemes for Business, Trade, Industry or Service Centre of their own or in association with 'NTC or 'STC' or those who want loan from Rs. 25,000/- to Rs. 30 lakhs or more from State Financial Corporations for industry may send rupees twenty through M.O. or Postal Order for detailed prospectus in English or Hindi & application form & other material to Manager, National Trading Corportion (Regd.), 2047/6, Chuna Mandi, Pahar Ganj, New Delhi-110055. Phone: 529362.

BHOPAL GAS TRAGEDY

The Risks Must Be Publicised

Victims of the MIC leak from the Union Carbide factory

A fact-finding team of four doctors of the Medico Friend Circle (MFC) has expressed serious concern over the manner in which medical research is being conducted on Bhopal gas victims and the callousness of the authorities in not giving proper information and advice to pregnant women exposed to the poison gas. In a report presented to an all-India convention of various health, environment and activist groups—the Zahreeli Gas Kand Sangarsh Morcha—at Bhopal this February, the doctors have raised several specific demands related to these two issues:

- The government should immediately publicise the potential dangers facing pregnant women exposed to the gas during the first trimester, so that these women can still take a timely decision to terminate pregnancy. To facilitate such a decision, adequate facilities for ultrasonagraphy and amniocentesis should be provided without delay. This measure is described as urgent because many pregnant women are now crossing the safe period for termination.
- All exposed couples of reproductive age should be advised to avoid conception until they are totally detoxified. They should have access to contraception through all available public and private channels.
- Details of all medical research projects should be made public and a public debate be allowed on the relevance and propriety of such research.
- All researchers should be required to get the informed consent of every individual, or guardian of such an individual, who is the subject of any such research.

During their investigations in Bhopal, the MFC doctors found that a large number of research projects have been launched and that "the research interests of the doctors are tending to take priority over the need to provide service to the people." The team also found that women have suffered from abortions, still births, diminished foetal movements, suppression of lactation, abnormal vaginal discharge, and menstrual disturbances. Pregnant women have not been told of the possible risk of birth defects as a result of exposure to the gas.

Vimal Balasubrahmanyan, Secunderabad

Jostling crowds, winding queues

VARIETY

CHESS

The current regulations for awarding international titles are unfair and, strangely enough, the country which suffers most under the system is the Soviet Union.

The essence of the problem is that title norms may only be attained in international competition, while most Soviets play all of their chess internally. The result is that there is a vast shoal of untitled players within the USSR each of whom could knock down the new breed of international masters like ninepins, but has never had the chance.

One such character is Zarub Azmaiparashvilli, an untitled Georgian who beat Karpov in the 1983 Soviet championship. The following game is taken from the tournament in Albena last September in which Azmaiparashvilli shared first place with Tal. His opponent's grandmaster title is made to look like a prime target for the Trade Descriptions Act.

White, Z Azmaiparashvilli Black, I. Farago. Nimzo-Indian Defence

1 P–Q4 N–KB3 2 P–QB4 P–K3
3 N–QB3 B–N5 4 P–K3 0–0
5 B–Q3 P–Q4 6 N–B3 P–B4
7 0–0 PxBP 8 BxBP QN–Q2
9 Q–K2 P–QN3 10 R–Q1 PxP
11 PxP B–N2 12 B–KN5

A move of inferior reputation, but such assessment does not fully explore the consequence of the ensuing pawn sacrifice.

Farago (Black)

Azmaiparashvilli (White) to move

12 . . BxQN 13 PxB Q–B2
14 B–Q3! QxBP 15 N–K5 Q–R4
16 Q–K3 Q–Q4 17 Q–R3 P–KR3?!

A move he lives to regret. Instead 17 . . . KR–B1 18 NxN QxB 19 NxN+ PxN 20 QxP+ K–B1 is very playable.

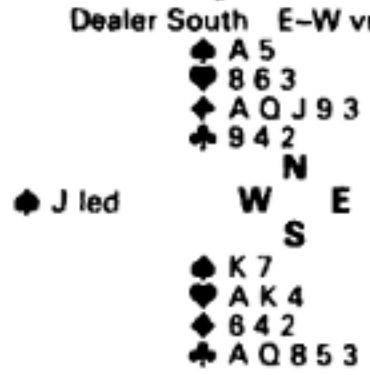
18 B–QB4 Q–Q3 19 B–B4 Q–K2
20 R–Q3! NxN

The prospect of 21 R–KN3 prompts Black to try to resolve matters.

21 PxN N–K5 DIAGRAM
22 BxRP!

Did Black overlook 22 . . . PxB 23 QxRP Q–N4 24 R–KN3? Certainly his reply smacks of defeat.

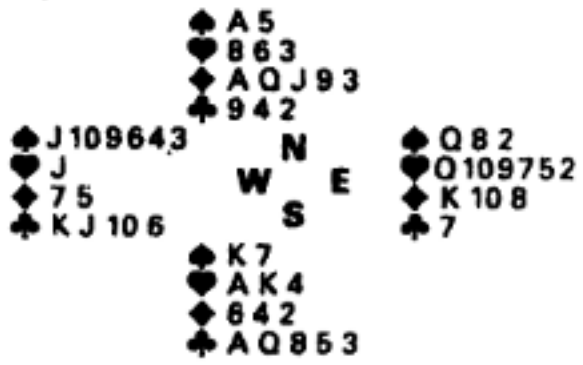
22 . . . N–N4 23 Q–R5 PxB
24 QxP P–B3 25 PxP QxP
26 QxQ RxQ 27 R–KN3 R–N3
28 P–KR4 R–QB1 29 RxN Resigns



Electing not to fight on two pawns down after 29 RxR 30 BxP+

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE



You may think you have seen, or read about, most forms of deceptive play, but this is something new:

Dealer South E–W vulnerable

South is in 3NT and West leads ♠ J. South wins and calculates that four diamond tricks will be enough for game; however, the diamonds may be 4–1 and it must be right to lay down the ace of clubs first, because if West has a singleton king, four tricks in clubs will be available.

West's king of clubs does fall under the ace, so South happily leads a low club, intending to pick up East's J 10 x x. But alas, the full hand is:

West wins the second club and clears the spades. It occurs to South that he might have countered West's brilliant deception: he can lead a diamond to dummy's ace and play a club from the table. When East shows out, South can revert to diamonds.

You hold as South:
♠ 10 6 2 ♥ K 10 4 2 ♦ 3 ♣ A K Q 7 6
1NT on your right, you pass, Two Hearts on your left (transfer), double from partner, Two Spades from the opener. You bid Four Hearts, obviously. In More Deadly than the Male (Faber, £8.95 or £3.95) Rixi Markus explains why this bid (which she made) was wrong; it's first-class bridge and first-class writing.

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. Name the Prime Minister of the Republic of Congo (Zaire) who was assassinated on 17 January 1961.
2. Spanish is the official language of all South American countries except one, where Portuguese is spoken. Which one?
3. What do the following have in common: Antonio Vivaldi, Nicola Paganini, Yehudi Menuhin and Fritz Kreisler?
4. What is the hardest natural substance found on earth?
5. With which American President do you associate the radio broadcasts to the American people called "fireside chats"?
6. In medicine, what is myelitis?
7. What is gun cotton?
8. What was the Nazi doctrine demanding land from other neighbouring countries as "living space" for Germans called?
9. With which sport do you associate the penholder and the shake-hand grip?
10. Name the bacteriologist who discovered the anti-bacterial enzyme lysozome and penicillin?
11. Name the largest office building in the world?
12. The flag of which country has a dragon on a red and yellow background?
13. How is Lev Davidovich Bronstein better known as?
14. Which international financial organisation was proposed at the Bretton Woods conference and established on 27 December 1945 for the development of world trade?
15. The foil, the epee and the sabre are used in which sport?

ANSWERS

1. Patrice Lumumba.
2. Brazil.
3. They are famous violinists.
4. The diamond.
5. Franklin D. Roosevelt.
6. The inflamation of the spinal cord.
7. An explosive substance, manufactured by saturating cotton with nitric and sulphuric acid.
8. Lebensraum.
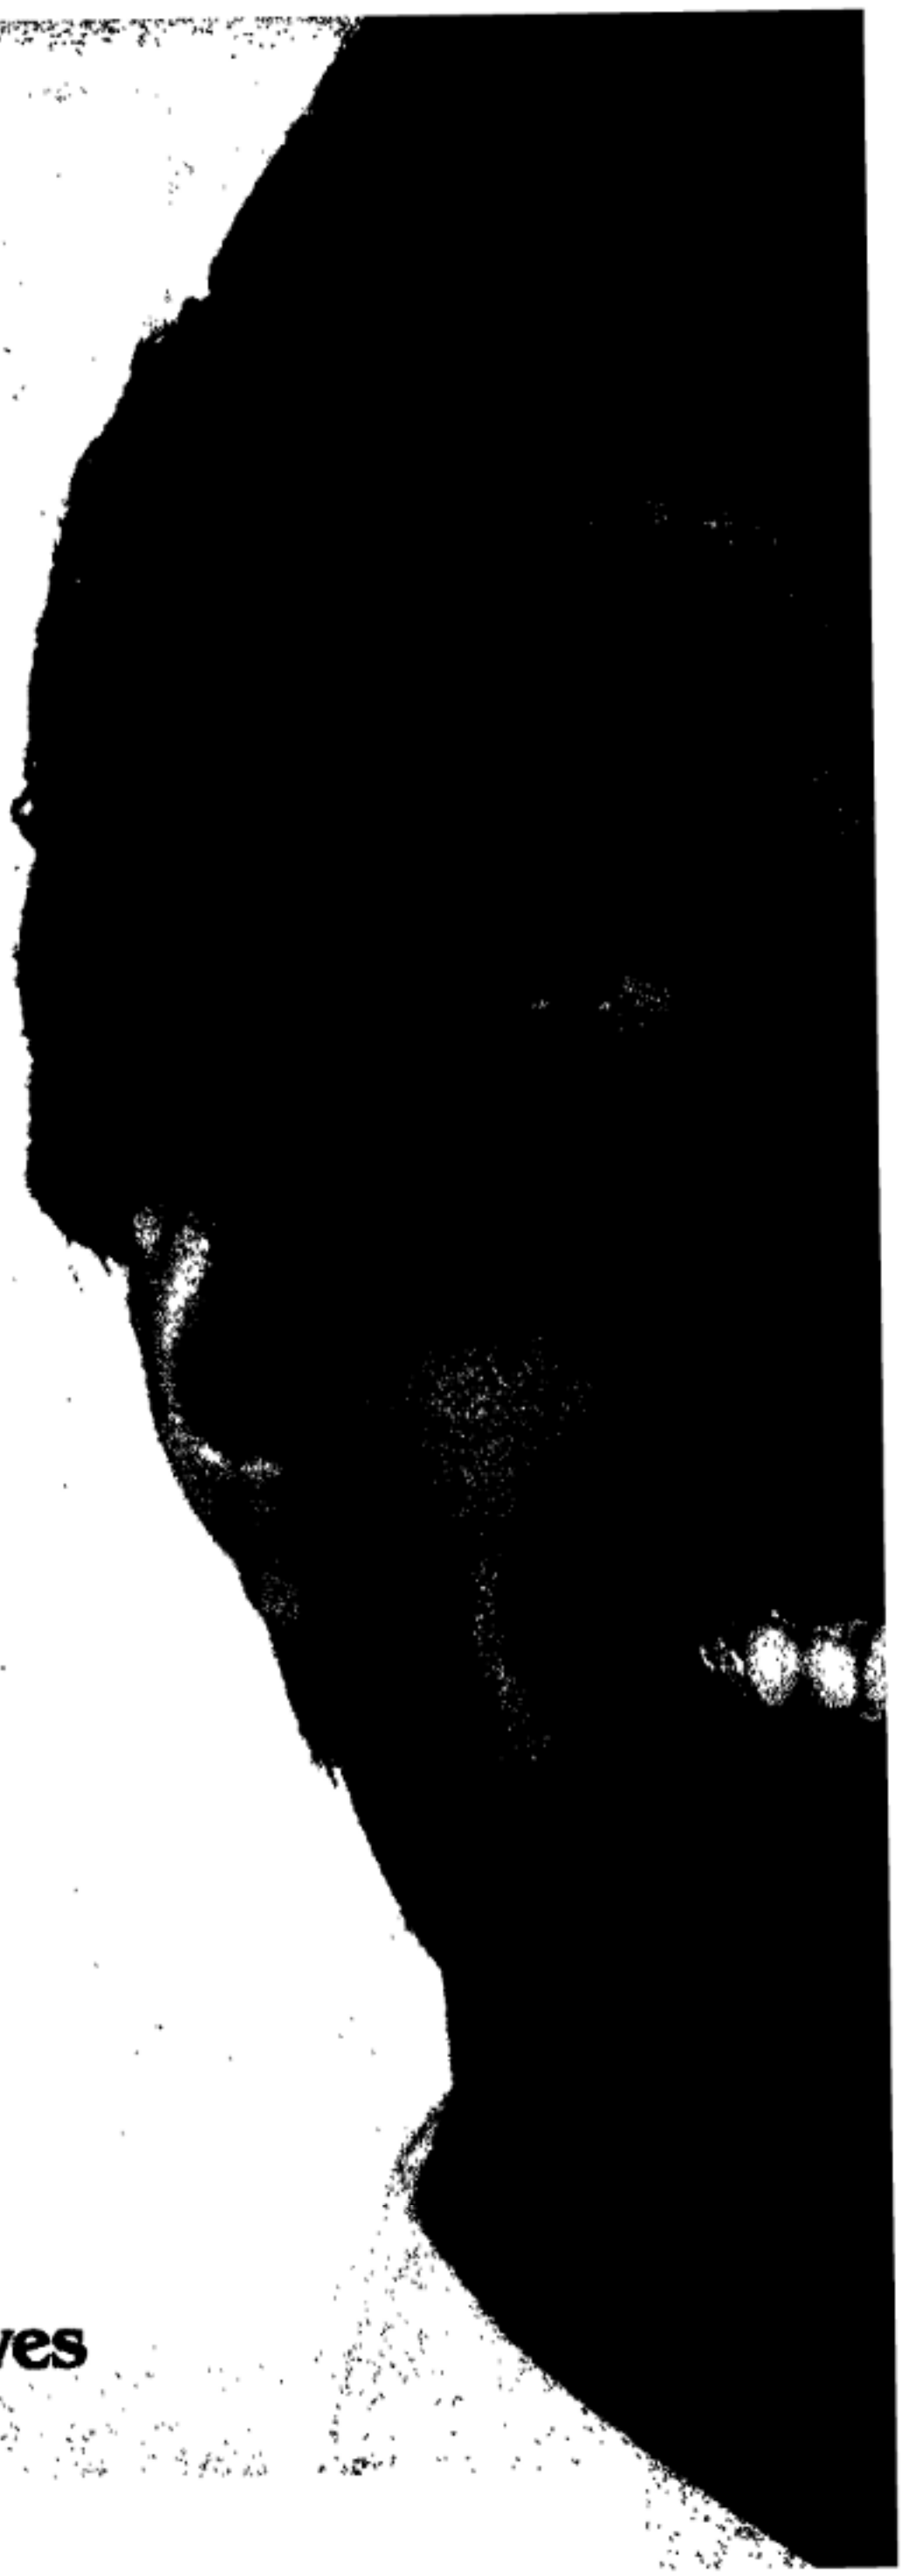
9. Table-tennis.
10. Alexander Fleming.
11. The Pentagon which houses the US military setup.
12. Bhutan.
13. Leon Trotsky.
14. The International Monetary Fund (IMF).
15. Fencing.

or a bank that's a real pleasure to visit.

The choice is entirely yours.



You can continue to put up with the noise and the confusion every time you visit your bank.

Or you can find a bank that treats you the way a bank should. With a little courtesy. A little attention. And a little enthusiasm.

At HongkongBank you will find all three in plenty. What you won't find is the aloofness that some people seem to read into an international name.

Walk into our nearest branch. Look around and see the difference for yourself.

And make your choice.

HongkongBank

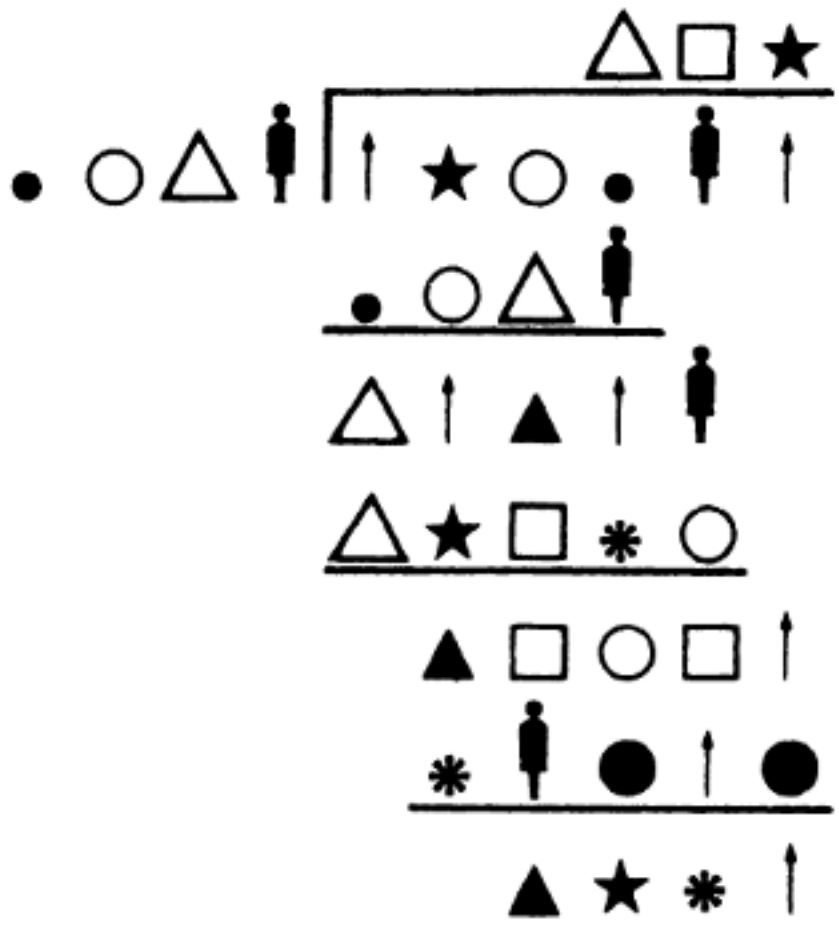
The Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation

Bombay Calcutta New Delhi
Madras Visakhapatnam
Merchant Banking Division Bombay
The British Bank of the Middle East Bombay

Because your money deserves a little more respect.

ULKA-HKB-CU-3

TEASERS



BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

Quizzbizz

If!

SYMBOLS	= 19
LOGO	= 15
ADVERTISING	= 9
Then, QUIZZ	**= ?

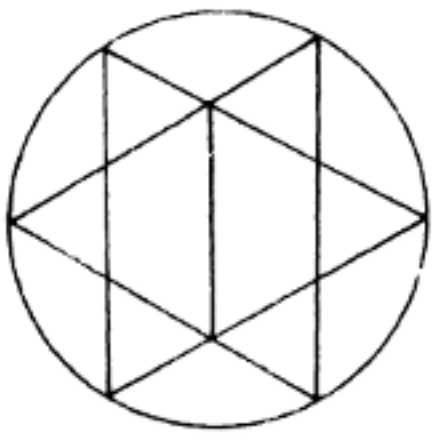

Figure it out

In this division problem digits from 0 to 9 are still represented by symbols.

Can you decipher this symbol division?

Shape Sleuth

Without lifting your pencil and crossing a line, trace the following figure in one single stroke.

Quick Think

How quickly can you form one nine-letter word, first, and then re-arrange the nine letters to form two new words:

AEDDNNOLI

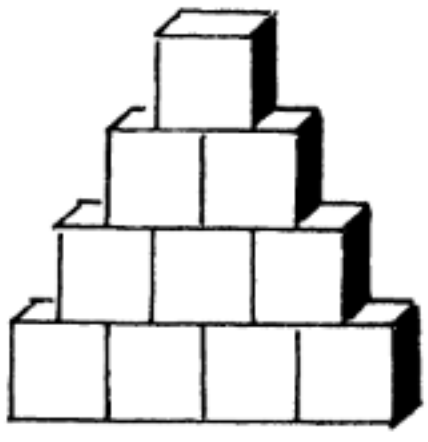
Mind Bender

	9	4	1	1
6	8	2	2	3	2
0	7	6	3	2	1
7	8	7	4	1	3
8	9	8	5	4	2
1	2	9	7	5	9

In the figure above, interchange rows of numbers in such a manner that in the final position, the top five rows add up to give the new number in the bottom row.

Word Power

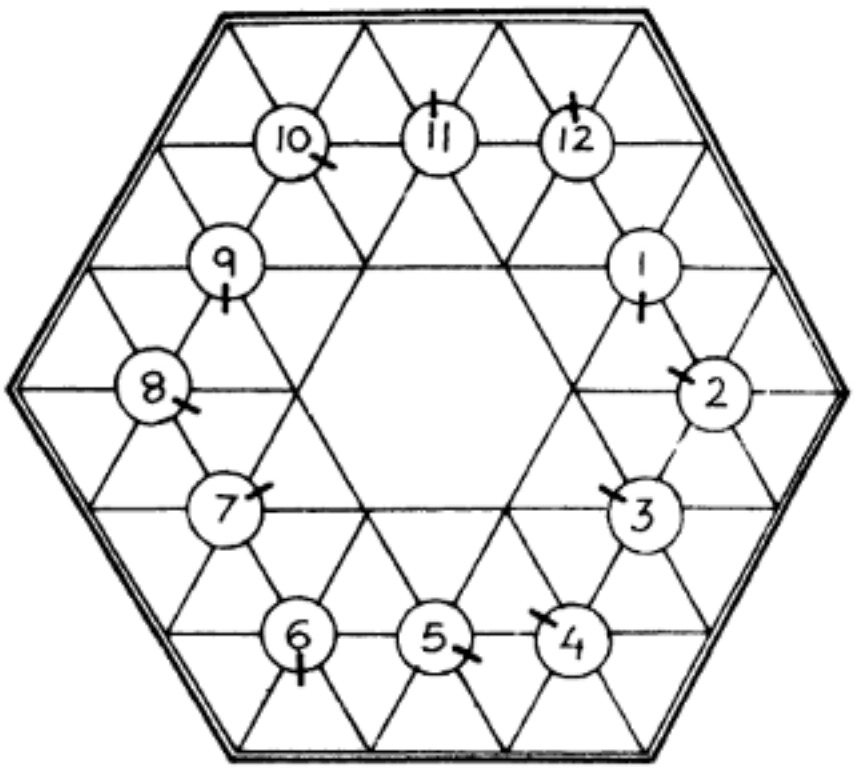
Take a six-letter word, change one letter only and shuffle the six letters to form a new word. Now change another, and shuffle the new set of six letters to form a new word again. Do this till you have gone through as many letters of alphabet as possible. Look at the example below: We started with CRAVES.



WORD	LETTER SUBSTITUTED
CRAVES
CRAZES	Z
TRACES	T
TRACKS	K
RACKET	E
CARPET	P
NECTAR	N
GARNET	G
BANTER	B
BARMEN	M

and so on, till all the letters of the alphabet are used up. The score for this chain of words is:

6 (number of letters in the word) X 9 substitutes = 54



Can you make a chain of 7-letter words, starting with any word of your of your choice, and get a full houses: a score of 7 X 26 substitutes or 182?

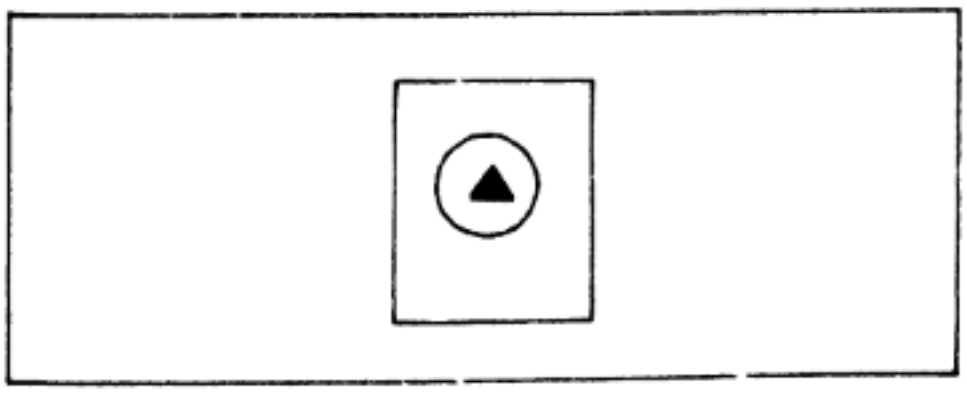
Blockbuster

A, C, D, E, I, M, N, S, W, Y

Word Play

This word maze will contain 12 words, when completed, one letter per space, reading in either clockwise or anti-clockwise direction. The clues to the words are given below:
1. Royal females 2. Site of excavation 3. A room next to the kitchen 4. Male goose 5. Caring around 6. Milky acid 7. Not lenient 8. Relating to a tribe 9. More than a laugh 10. Sufficient 11. Mix around, for Zen 12. A male bee.

What's in a Word?



Here is a group of words that have been squashed together. There are two on each line. Can you disentangle them and say what the original words were?
P E B R A N I T U T T L E

C C H O R E C O A L A M T E

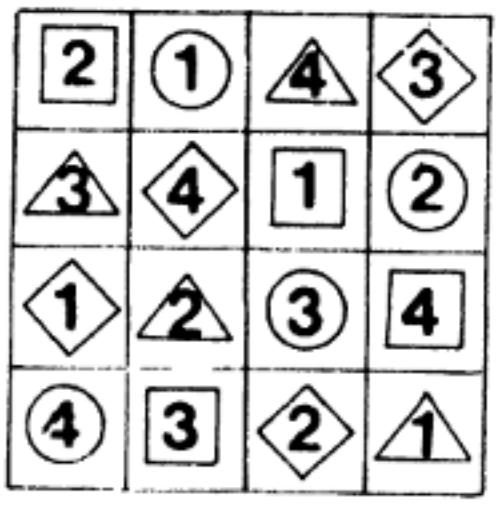
Solutions to last week's Teasers:

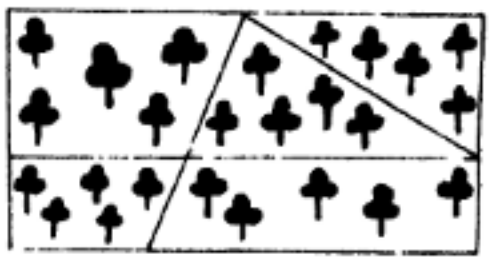
Scrambles: Green, Range, Armed, Slave. Paint and Grasp.
Shape Sleuth: C
Witsharpener (Page 71): History, Contemplate, Pinafore, Mathematic

Mind bender:

Witsharpener: Anu Kumar (1) and her brother Gajendra (3 x 1) get 4; Bina Rajwade (2) and her brother Dev (4 x 2) get 10; Kaveri Sharma (3) and her brother Nandu (3) get 6; Damayanti Lal (4) and her brother Piyare Lal (4 x 2) get 12

Think Tank:





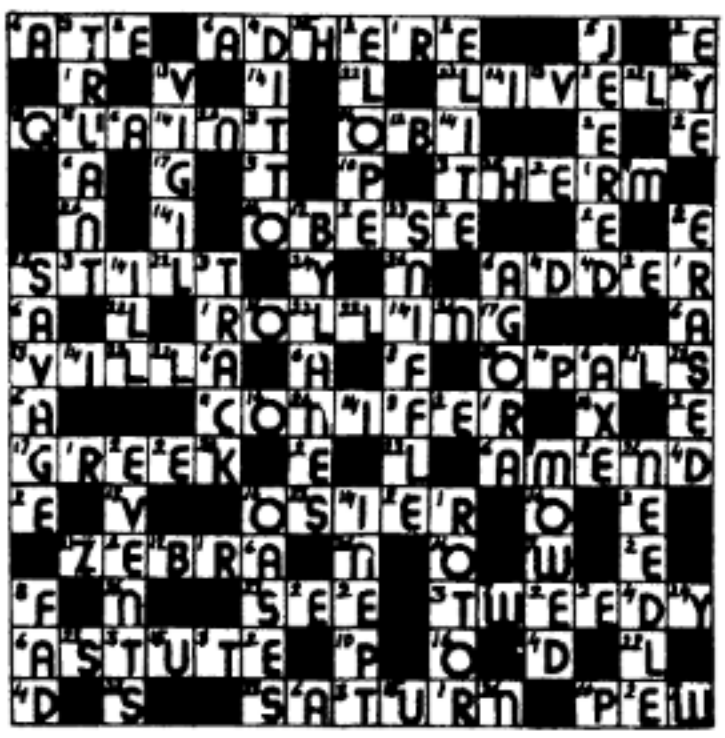


Figure it Out:

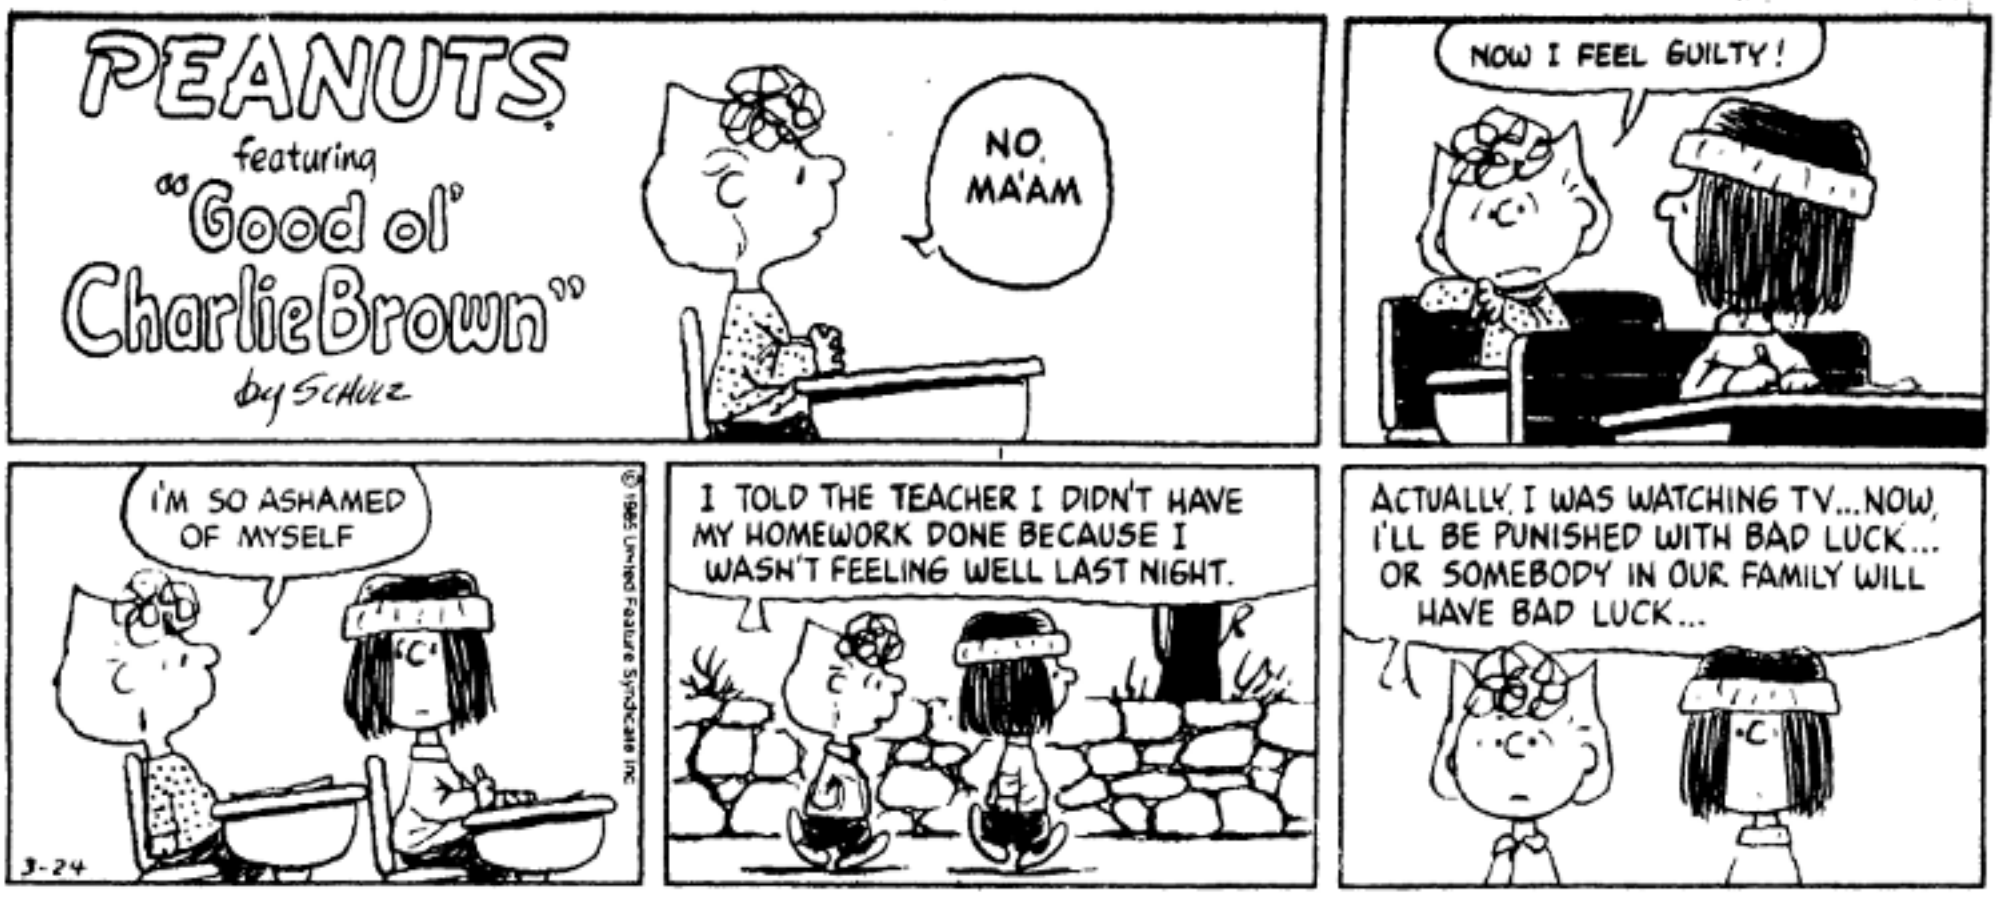

Quick Think: Aunt Gita must be one of my father's sisters. As he has one more brother than he has sisters, there must be two more males than females in his family and Aunt Gita must therefore have three more brothers than sisters. As she has twice as many brothers as sisters, she must have six brothers and three sisters, so that I have five uncles—one of the brothers is my father—and four aunts, including Aunt Gita.

Cryptocross.

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13
R	E	T	D	J	A	W	F	M	P	C	B	Y

14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26
I	U	O	G	X	Q	K	Z	L	S	Y	H	N

"My indigestion has become a chronic problem now. I suppose I should just learn to live with it".

No, you don't.
With Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls.

Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls give long-term relief from digestive problems Because they contain pure garlic oil that has been recognised by Ayurveda, and modern medical science, to have great curative properties.

Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls also help in reducing cholesterol levels, easing joint pains, preventing recurring coughs and colds.

Just two Ranbaxy's Garlic Pearls twice a day keep you in good health.

RANBAXY'S
GARLIC
PEARLS

All the cures that nature put in garlic—without the smell.

OBM/9260/1

Durgaprasad

Jayaprada: not friendly

Jayaprada has her share of fans and ardent admirers. Said one who is quite close to her, "I cannot understand Jayaprada. She has everything in her favour. She is good-looking, has a good figure and is a good actress. Then why is she so scared of being friendly. She is so cold and remote always. Why can't she relax and enjoy herself when she can."

Deepti Naval was very disturbed. A gossip magazine carried an item which said that she was married before she married Prakash Jha, and had left her husband somewhere in New York before she came to Bombay six years ago. The item also mentioned that Prakash too had a wife tucked away somewhere in Bihar. "How can they be so ridiculous? Don't they know how much they hurt two individuals who are just starting off in life?" Deepti asked with tears in her eyes. Prakash, however, just laughed off the whole thing.

Sarika who is facing bad times is being tempted with lucrative offers to play the vamp in Hindi films. "The day she agrees to do that she will beat all the other vamps and even some of the leading ladies hollow," says director Subhash Ghai. But Sarika has not given in to the temptations yet. The man in her life is against the move, it is said.

Shobhan Babu has promised never to act in a film, with two big stars. He did not like what happened to him in Mahasangramam where he co-starred with Krishna. What happened is that Shobhan was completely over-shadowed by Krishna. Hence, the decision to act in films alone.

Recently a Telugu producer approached Rajnikanth to act in a 3-D film. He offered him a large amount of money, in fact, double his normal rate. But Rajnikanth refused bluntly. Apparently he did not take up the lucrative offer as it would clash with his callsheets.

Has Manoj Kumar lost his magic touch? This question is being asked in film circles in Bombay these days. In fact, Manoj Kumar has never been the same again after he made Kranti, his last successful film. Soon after the film was completed, he went underground and did not come of his hideout for months. At that time, a number of stories came out of the gossip mills. Some said he was seriously sick. Others said he had become an alcoholic specially after the tragic death of his father. To make matters worse he was even rushed to hospital to be treated for a mysterious ailment. A film called Santosh which was, till then, in the making for more than five years was further delayed and another film, Ricky, which was planned to resurrect his son Kunal's sagging career also suffered. The worst is over now. The great actor is trying his best to make a comeback to form. He has completed work on both Santosh and Ricky, and is busy putting things together to start Clerk. Mohammad Ali and Zeb, the star couple from Pakistan, are acting in the film, while Manoj himself will play the title role. He has approached Rekha and Naseeruddin Shah but they have yet to sign up.

Jayant Das

Mandakini: exposed

It is not so easy to be a Raj Kapoor heroine. Actresses like Padmini, Vyjayantimala, Dimple, Zeenat Aman and Padmini Kolhapure realised it when they worked with him. He made them expose their bodies under some pretext or the other. The latest to have undergone similar treatment is the youngest Raj Kapoor discovery, Mandakini. She is playing a "very different role" in the film and people who have seen the rushes and pictures of the young girl are already talking about her exposing her body without being obscene or vulgar. "For me the female form is God's most beautiful creation and I don't see anything wrong in exposing a beautiful body. What's the use of hiding a body that should be seen and admired?" Raj asks.

The more Radha tries to pass on some of her extra films to elder sister Ambika, the more the producers turn away from her. Radha is being flooded with Telugu films, too many in fact. So, like a good girl she tries to pass the producer on to Ambika. It is Radha or someone else, certainly not Ambika, say the producers. Asked why this was so, one producer said, "Ambika is the south's Amrita Singh. She is not at all feminine and even lacks the glamour that Amrita has."

DELHI DIARY

Unexpected Punctuality

Sonia Gandhi created a stir at the Teen Murti House on 18 February. The auditorium of the Nehru Memorial was booked by an organisation called Development Research Group, for a discourse by vice president R. Venkataraman. The theme was: "Indira Gandhi—eternal woman." A routine invitation had been sent to the Prime Minister's house and the scheduled time given in the invitation was five pm. The vice president had been asked by the organisers to reach the auditorium by 5.30 pm, keeping in mind that functions never start punctually. The Prime Minister's wife, who was not being expected, turned up at the auditorium exactly at five, accompanied by Pupul Jayakar. The organisers were visibly embarrassed. Dhanya Kumar, the secretary of the group, desperately tried to explain to Sonia Gandhi the reason for the delayed arrival of the chief guest. The efficient image of the Rajiv Gandhi administration seems to be receiving able support from Sonia Gandhi.

Sonia Gandhi with her daughter Priyanka

Jinxed Deals?

The Indo-Soviet arms deals seem to jinxed. The ministerial level talks have been postponed twice due to the deaths of VIPs. When Indira Gandhi was assassinated in October, the then defence minister, S. B. Chavan, was in Moscow to negotiate arms purchases. He had to rush back home. The present minister, P.V. Narasimha Rao, was leaving for Moscow along with defence secretary S K. Bhatnagar to restart the aborted talks, when the news of Konstantin Chernenko's death was announced. While the Indo-Soviet deals are being delayed due to some jinx, the purchases from France have run into rough weather after the spyring of Coomar Narain (which necessitated the departure of the French envoy and a deputy military attache) was busted. Meanwhile, there are reports from Washington that the Reagan administration has offered to help India in the "modernisation" of the armed forces and expressed its "readiness to give serious consideration" to Indian requests for military equipment. Will India be able to enter a "buy-American" phase? The American offer, however, is not unprecedented. Every time an Indian team plans a visit to Moscow, such "offers" come, which are not followed up by Washington.

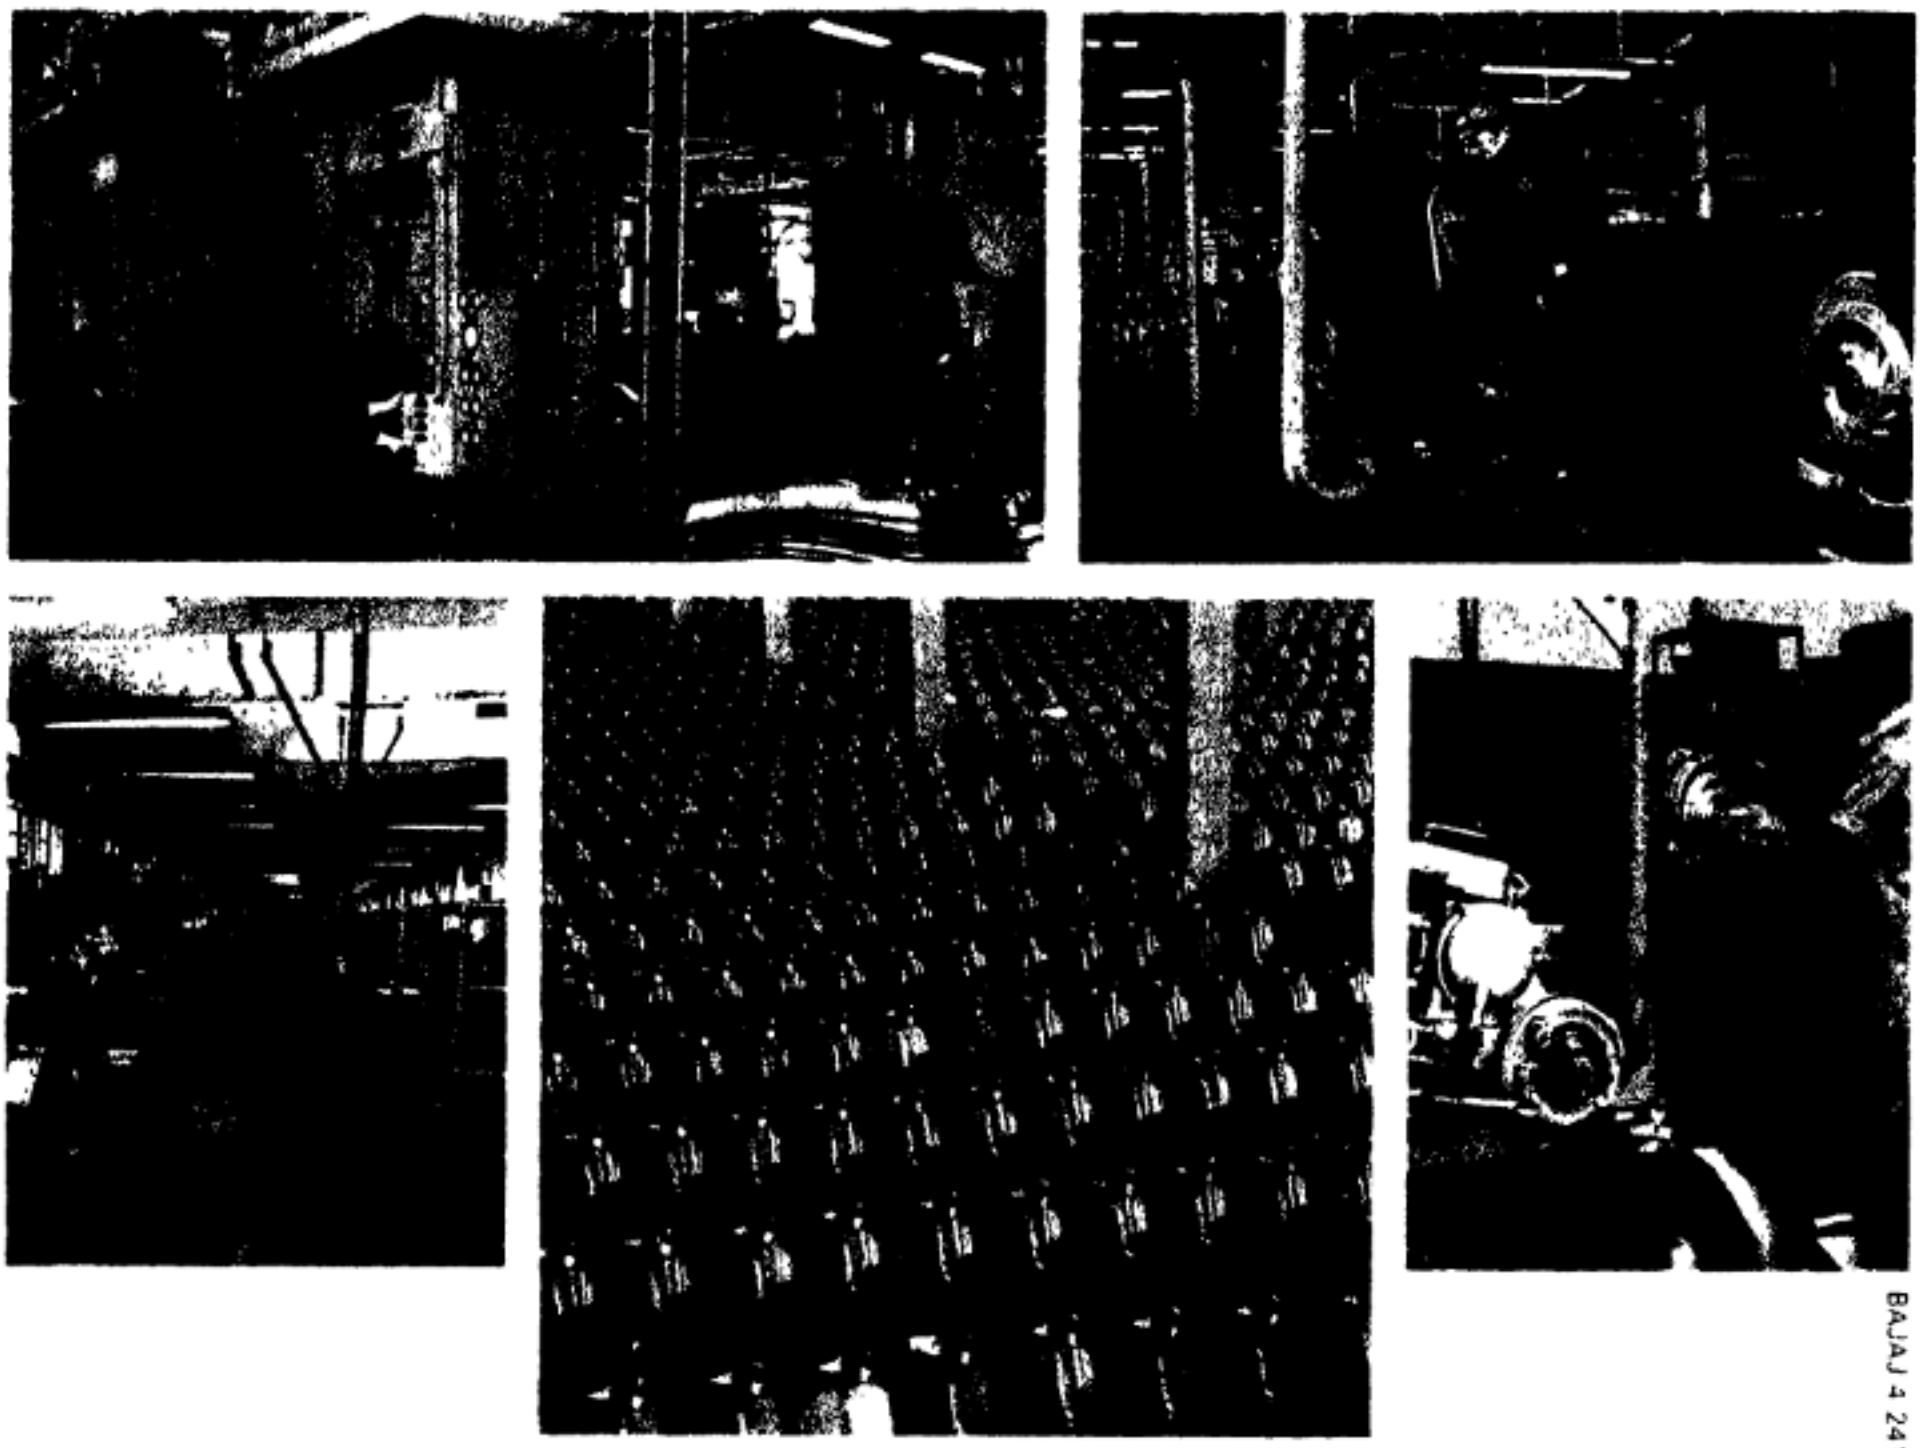
TAILPIECE. Which way do important files in the information and broadcasting ministry move these days? The grapevine has it (and it is no rumour) that the movement is from Gill to Gadgil. S. S. Gill is the ministry's secretary, V. N. Gadgil is the minister in charge.

D.E. Nizamuddin

Clean Sweep

For the Janata Party chief, Chandra Shekhar, the Assembly elections have been a boon. Not only has his party won in Karnataka and emerged as the largest national opposition party, in his Lok Sabha constituency, Ballia, the party has won all the five Assembly seats. Chandra Shekhar had lost the Lok Sabha polls by 58,000 votes. The combined lead of the five winning Janata candidates this time was 60,000 votes. This means a swing of around one lakh votes has taken place in Chandra Shekhar's favour within barely ten weeks of the Lok Sabha polls.

There are eight Assembly segments in Ballia district, of which five are in Chandra Shekhar's constituency. Two out of the rest of the three seats have been won by the DMKP. Only one seat in the Ballia region has gone to the Congress(I).



Chandra Shekhar

Governmental Inequality

The young firebrand trade union leader of Delhi, Lalit Maken (who represents South Delhi in the Lok Sabha) has stirred a hornet's nest. While public sector employees have been getting increased wages, government employees are awaiting the award of the fourth Pay Commission. Maken has calculated that a clerk in the public sector gets Rs 457 more than a government clerk (while their inefficiency is similar). Maken, who has led many successful agitations and now commands majority support in most trade unions of Delhi, has demanded that the wages be made at par.

KOHINOOR
And no
two moments will ever be the same fiesta
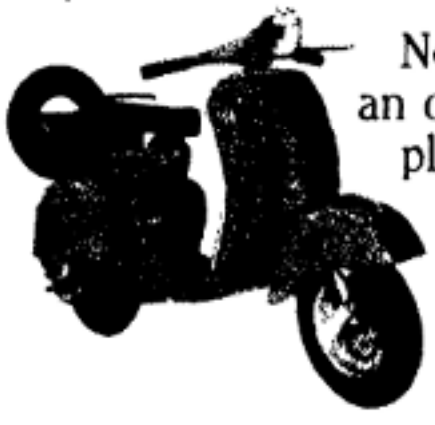
3 FLAVOURED COLOUR CONDOMS
A ttk Product
3 colour condoms in one pack

Regd No WB/CC/256 TN/MS(C)376 MH-By-South-680.

BAJAJ 4 2416



Bajaj Automatically

If someone asked you to name India's largest scooter manufacturer, whose name would come to mind first?

If you were told there is a plant in India which turns out one scooter every minute, who would you think of first? Bajaj Auto, automatically.

But the waiting list for Bajaj scooters is too long even for such a plant; though it is as big as any single scooter plant in the world.

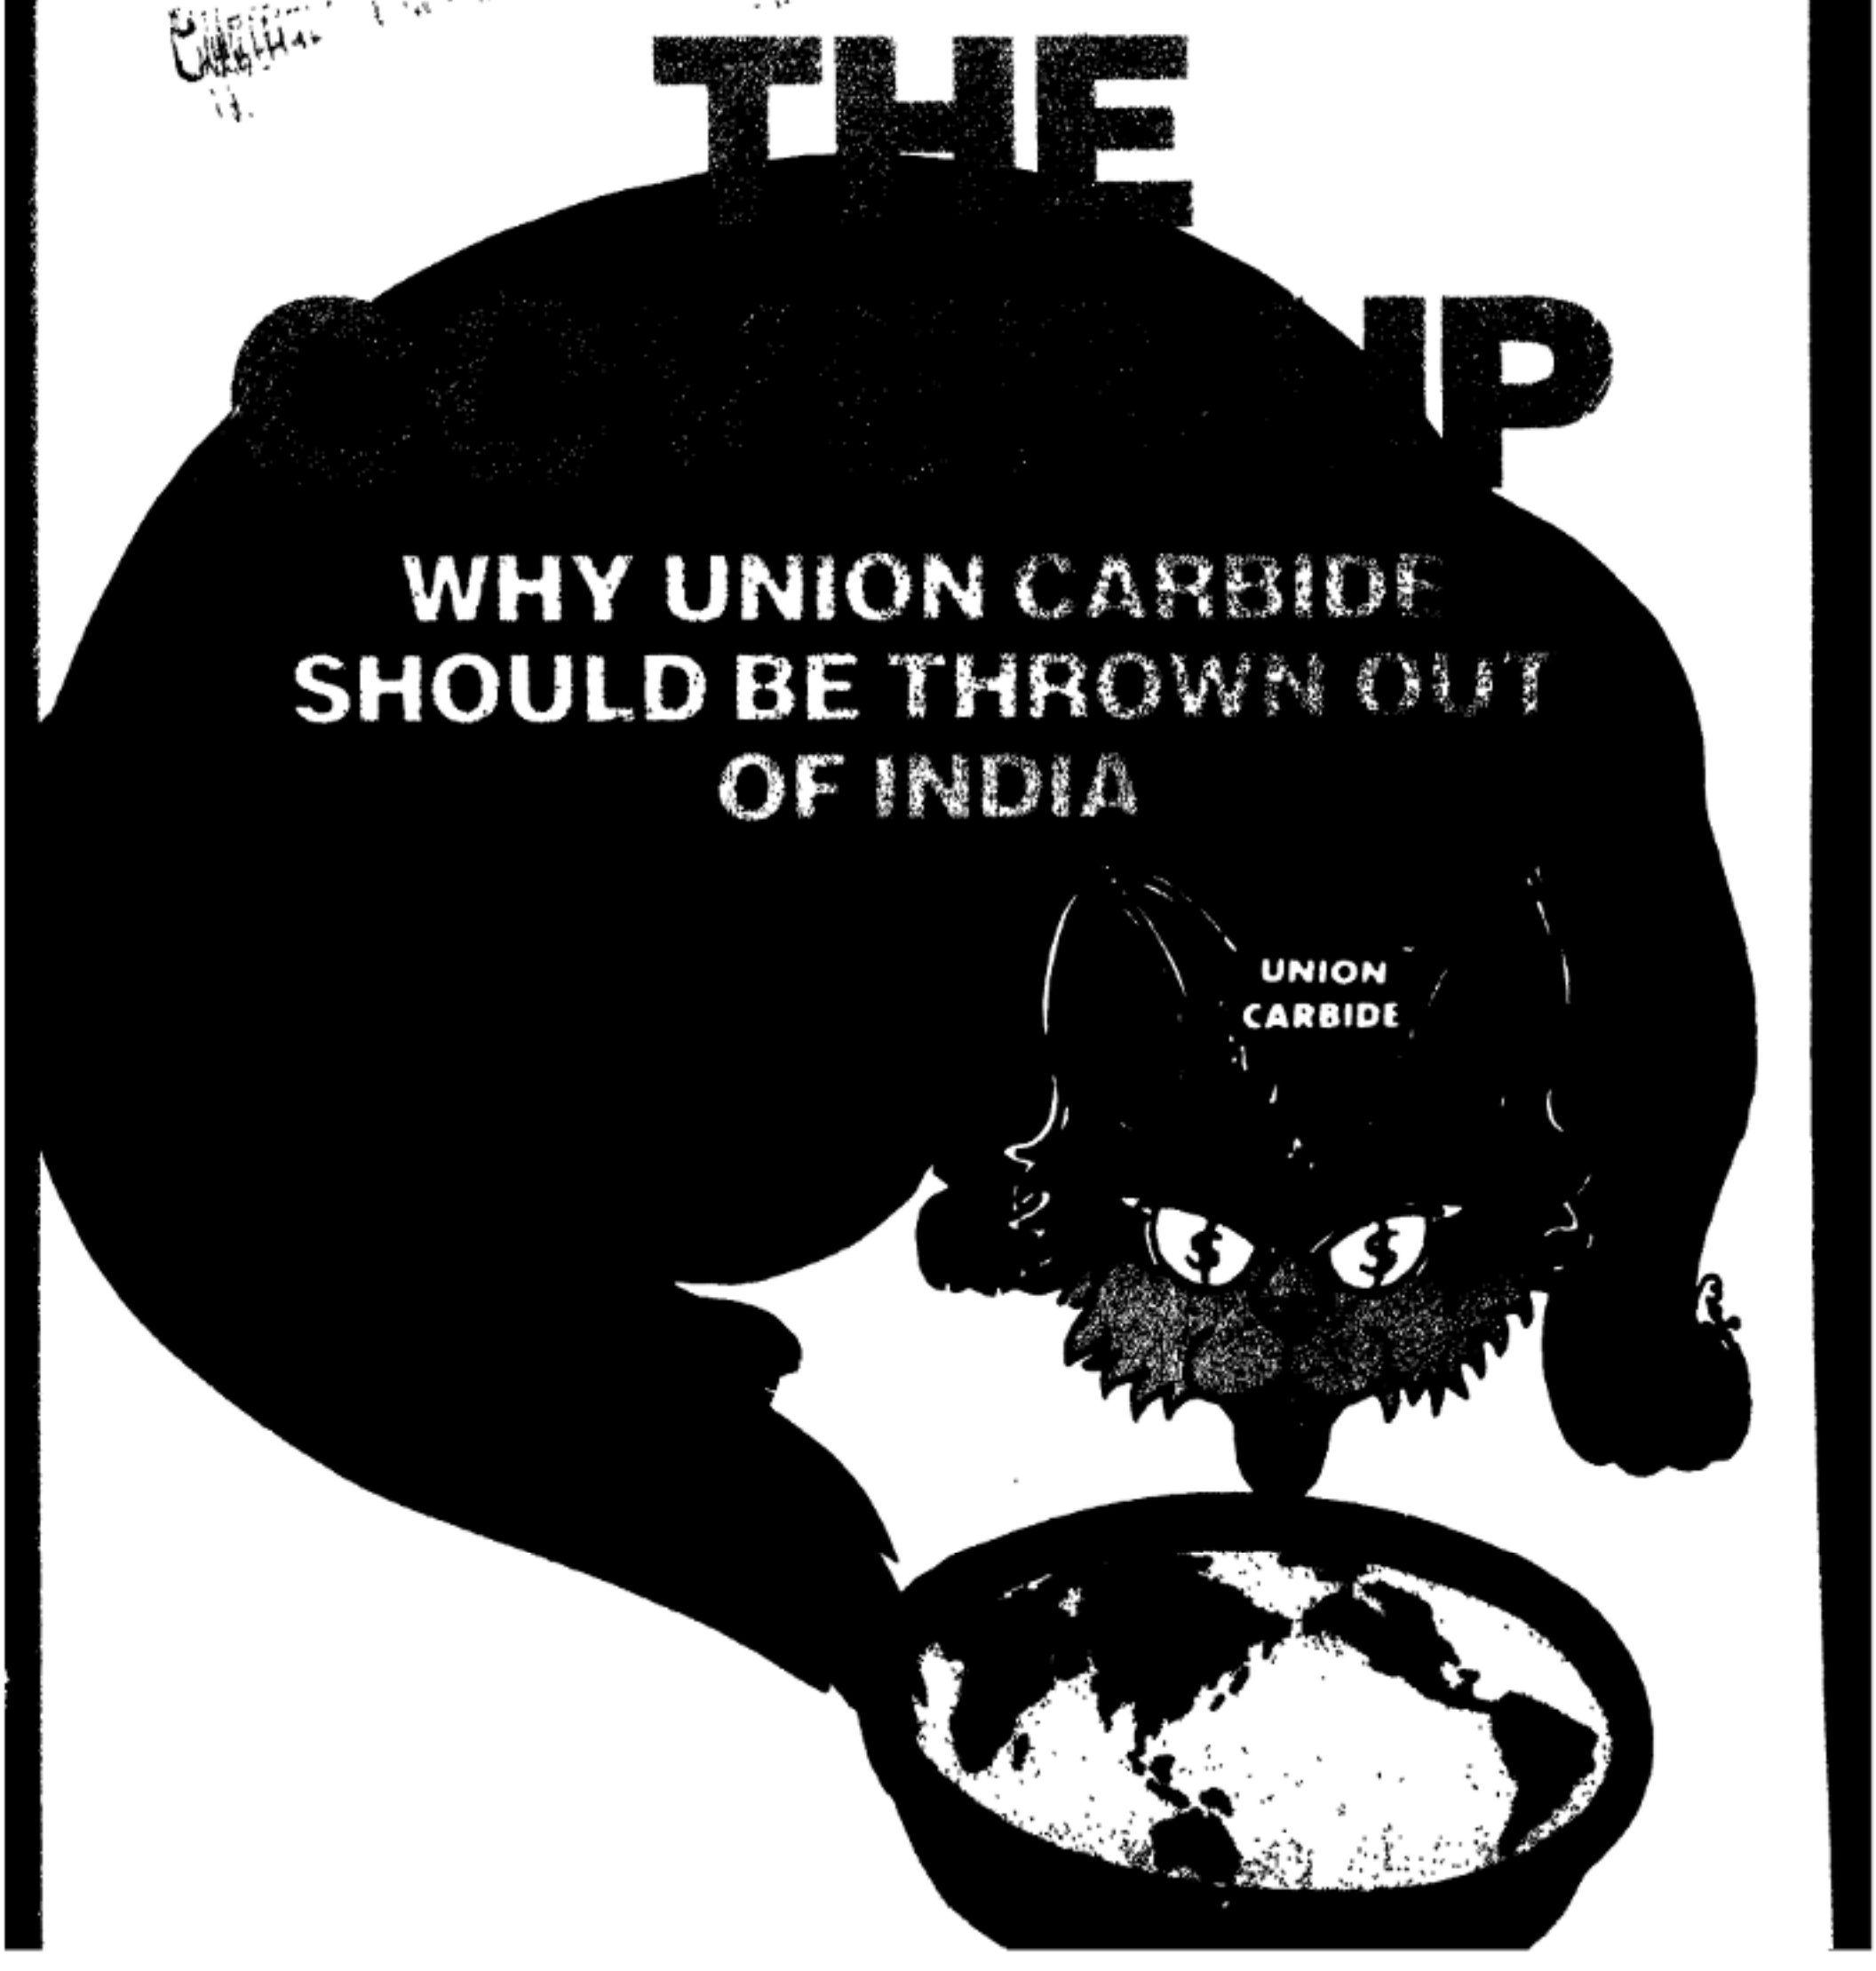
So, Bajaj Auto is setting up two new plants which will help us to produce over 700,000 vehicles a year.

Normally, it takes years to commission such an operation. But with our experience, we plan to start production at Aurangabad by mid-1985 and U.P. by 1986.

Which should keep Bajaj Auto the leader for years to come: automatically.

bajaj auto ltd

Value for money, for years



7—13 APRIL 1985 ■ AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION ■ RS 4.00

SUNDAY

THE

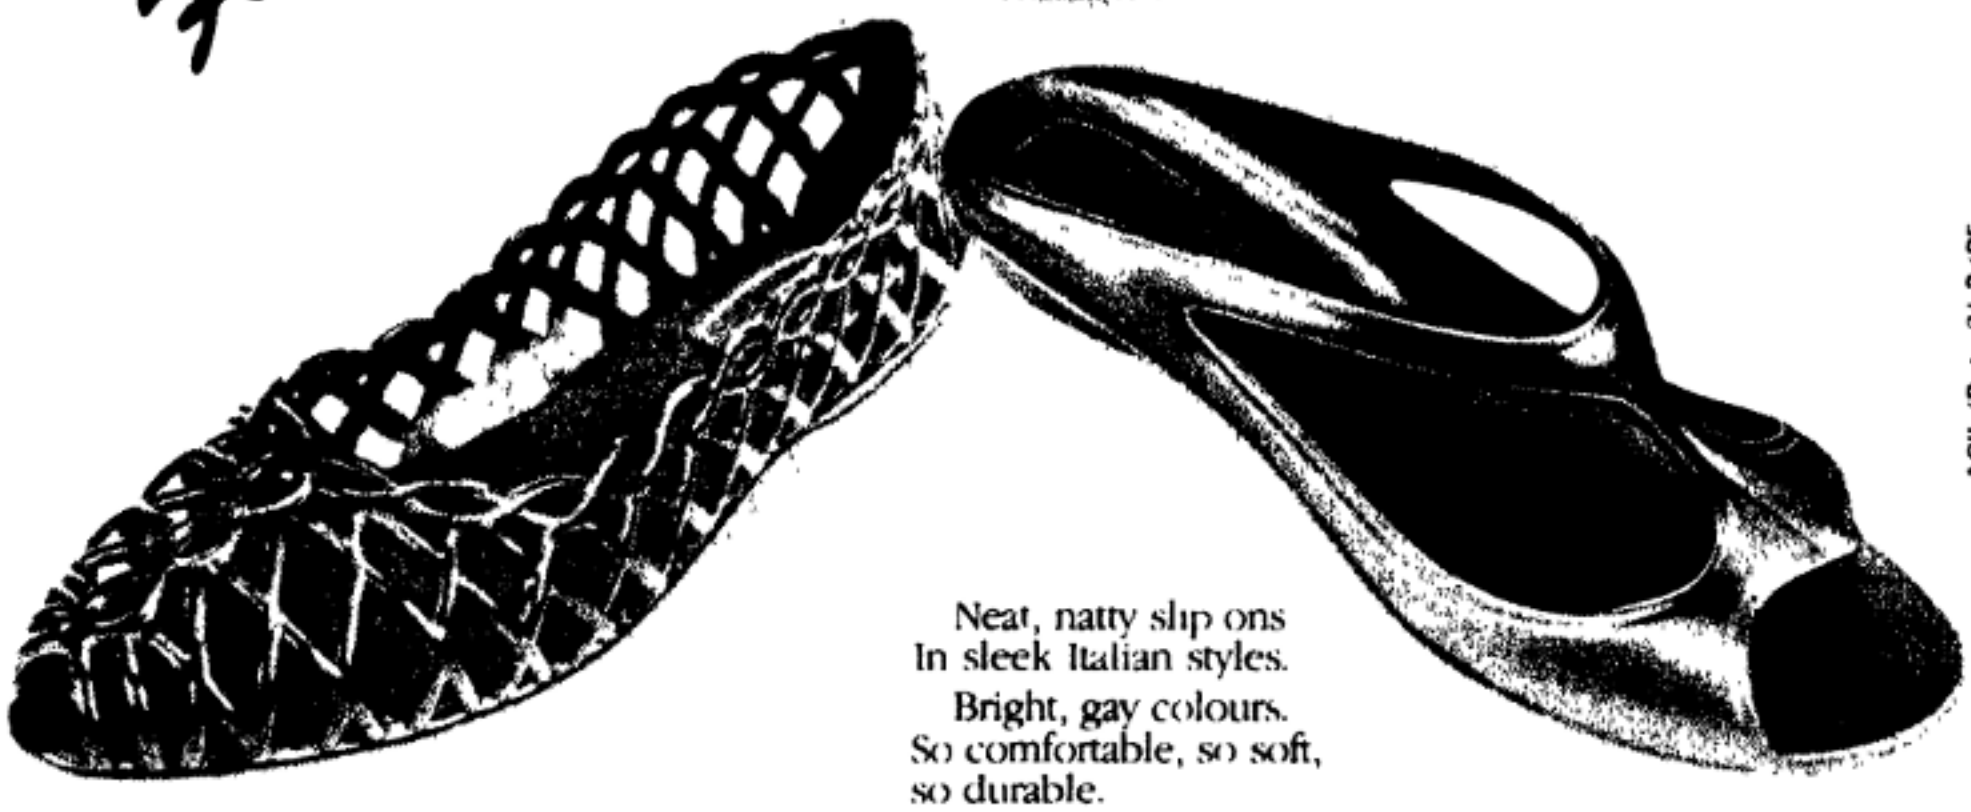
UP

WHY UNION CARBIDE SHOULD BE THROWN OUT OF INDIA

OCM

SUITINGS
THE PERFECT FABRIC

70/30, Silver, SZ,
Silkcraft, Lincoln,
Executive & Millionaire Suitings.



The colourful walls of Shekhavati...
The contemporary touch of OCM

Introducing

VERLON

Fun Fashion.

Neat, natty slip ons
In sleek Italian styles.
Bright, gay colours.
So comfortable, so soft,
so durable.
Walk in them,
work in them.
Lounge in them,
loaf in them.
They're new.
They're exciting.
They're from Bata.

Feet style from Italy

VERLON

Available at select Bata/BSC stores

ACIL/Bata/V-3/85

Superstar Material!

Amitabh. The No. 1 star in the Bombay Dyeing-Cine Blitz Star Contest.

A men's wear range with star quality!
Elegant shirtings. Suitings with flair.
Wear Bombay Dyeing — and you'll make the scene wherever you go.

BOMBAY DYEING

SUITINGS • SHIRTINGS

BDM-1570

7—13 APRIL 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 ISSUE 22 Rs 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS

COVER STORY 14

The Cover-up

Four months after the world's worst environmental disaster struck Bhopal killing 2,500 people and maiming many more, when the deadly MIC gas escaped from Union Carbide (India) Limited's pesticide plant, its parent organisation in USA, Union Carbide Corporation, has come out with a report squarely blaming its Indian subsidiary for the tragedy. SUNDAY correspondents examine the report and analyse how the US multinational is trying to pass the buck on to its Indian subsidiary.

SUNDAY SPORTS 38

Victory in the Desert

With the victory in the Rothman's Trophy, India has emerged as the undisputed champions in one-day cricket. Zaheer Abbas writes on the Indian team's success in Sharjah.

Page 14

Page 30

CONVERSATION 30

'I Want to Love Everybody'

Bangladesh President General H. M. Ershad talks to M. J Akbar.

COMMENT

Dateline M. J. Akbar 7
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 9
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 11
Opinion 12

NEWS 46

Misinformed Minister?
SP Accused of Rape
P.U. Shanmugam: Accused?

VARIETY

People 64
This India 65
Sundayweek 66
Science 67
Chess/Bridge/Quiz 69
Teasers 70
Peanuts 72
Khaas Baat 73
Delhi Diary 74

PUNCHLINE/KUTTY

Cover: A poster from an exhibition on the Bhopal gas tragedy held in Bombay

Editor M.J. Akbar

Associate Editor Tooshar Pandit
Assistant Editors
Saumitra Banerjee, Tirthankar Ghosh
Editorial Staff
Bindo K. John Henry Jacob,
Rajiv Bagchi, Srinjoy Chowdhury
Chief of Bureau, Delhi:
Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
Principal Correspondent, Delhi:
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow:
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay:
Olga Tellis
Bangalore:
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras:
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad:
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati:
Seema Guha
Srinagar:
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001
Air surcharge for North-Eastern states except Tripura 30 paise and 20 paise for Srinagar ex-Delhi

Tomorrow begins here

Computers from BPL. For better information processing.

They are being used increasingly, even for unconventional applications...

In the engineering entrance exams for instance. Where the computer evaluates answer papers, prints out results and maintains academic records.

Like the Computer, BPL's other Office Automation Products also go a long way in increasing efficiency and productivity: Small Business Systems, Word Processors, Automatic Plain Paper Copiers, Electronic Scanners and Private Automatic Exchanges.

There are other vital areas that BPL serves too. With Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement), Computers, Communications, Components and Consumer Electronics.

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Texmate, USA; Sanyo, Japan and IMS, USA. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL: Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nationwide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has.

BPL-INDIA

In pursuit of perfection

Computers • Communication • Components
Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement) • Office Automation • Consumer Electronics

114

DATELINE / M.J. Akbar

Shantiniketan: You know you have come close to nature when unpredictable things start falling on your head. We had just entered the city when a small, dried, green mango came down sharply, the victim of a child's accurate catapult. With so many trees, catapults and mangoes around, this sort of thing is presumably inevitable. But far be it for city types like me to scoff at the wealth that nature has to offer. And very soon, quite imperceptibly, the serenity of Shantiniketan begins to seep into your consciousness. It is all straight out of the picture book. Beautiful young women and earnest, soft-spoken men sitting under trees, chatting, waiting for the open-air class to begin. Snatches of song in the distance. People from all over the world come to taste the magic of an environment created by a unique genius who became both the voice of a culture and a culture. There is a pride in Bengal and Bengali here, a deep and powerful pride which is not aggressive but which can be touched easily by a fake gesture, a wrong word. When Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi comes to Shantiniketan to preside over the convocation, the one mistake he can't afford to make is pass any disparaging judgment on any aspect of Bengal's health. One more remark like the one about Calcutta's terminal condition, and chief minister Jyoti Basu need do nothing more to win the next election.

It is a bit strange that a member of the Nehru family should have fallen out with Calcutta. The family's ties with Calcutta's greats had been strong and affectionate. Motilal and C. R. Das were the greatest of friends, and much of the mythology about the behaviour of the best kind of lawyer owes to them. It is absolutely true that the two would spend the whole day in the sharpest debate, on behalf of their respective clients, set spies on each other to check battle plans, and then split a bottle of the best whisky in the evening. Their friendship took on a political dimension in the creation of the Swaraj Party—they shifted away from Gandhiji in their assessment of the role of the Legislature in the freedom struggle. Both gave their homes to the nation. Motilal's most important hour in Indian politics was also the Calcutta Congress of 1928. Jawaharlal kept up the association, particularly through his great and oft-expressed admiration for Gurudev. It was in recognition of this bond that Gurudev kept a separate room in his house for the Nehrus, near his own bedroom—and this is the room Rajiv Gandhi will occupy when he spends a day at Shantiniketan.

When Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi comes to Shantiniketan to preside over the convocation, the one mistake he can't afford to make is pass any disparaging judgment on any aspect of Bengal's health. One more remark like the one about Calcutta's terminal condition, and chief minister Jyoti Basu need do nothing more to win the next election.

It is, like the rest of the house, simple, elegant, without the slightest trace of ostentation or effort. It is a part of a home. On the walls are just three photo-portraits of Gandhiji, Nehru and Acharya Jagadish Chandra Bose. A large poster bed takes up space just off-centre, and against one wall is a beautiful low, wooden settee. Beyond the small ante-room is the verandah which overlooks a gravelled courtyard and the exquisite rose gardens. This is the way it once was. This is the way it still is. Thank God some things don't change.

The most lasting impression one brought back from Shantiniketan was the sheer kindness of the people, and their sincere pleasure while helping, whether it was an Ajit Poddar showing one theaudio-visual unit (he needs a new microfilming unit—surely Bengal can provide him that much!), or the manager of the tourist lodge, S. Chakraborty, ensuring that lunch was a pleasurable affair. Or—and most of all—the unknown person who helped my seven-year-old daughter put on her shoes, patted her on the back, and went on. There is time in Shantiniketan for the fellow human being—and if that was the only thing they taught there, the whole institution would still have been worth preserving just for that.

Calcutta may not be dying (cities like Calcutta never die, nor do they fade away), but it is clearly indisposed (both no further than the electricity). But I am truly glad to report that Shantiniketan is in the best of health—apart, incidentally, from the electricity.

Pandit Nehru in Shantiniketan, circa 1952

Our dudhwala often travels with us on our holiday!

A trusted friend for twenty years

Holidays are fun, but you can't always be sure about the quality of the food you get. Milk, for instance, especially when you have children.

Amul Milk Powder is like an instant dudhwala. You have pure wholesome milk all the time. For children and adults to drink. For curds, lassi, kheer, halwa, rasogollas, or even a cup of tea.

The great advantage of Amul Milk Powder is that the consistency of the milk remains the same. Has remained the same, in fact, for twenty years.

Amul MILK POWDER

It's like having a dairy in your home.

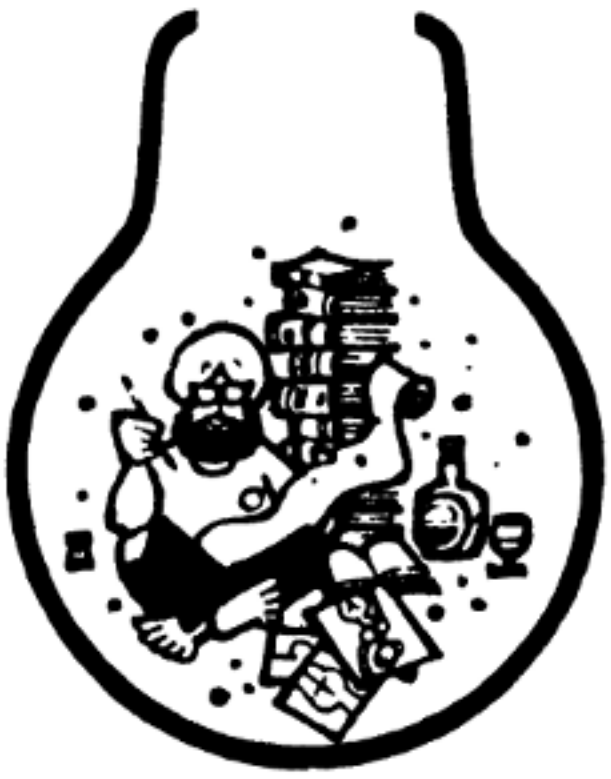
Marketed by: Gujarat Co-operative Milk Marketing Federation Ltd., Anand.

RADEUS/AMP/10-83

Family Planning: Punjab Style

I have before me an advertisement issued by the director, health and family welfare of the Punjab government published in the monthly journal, Art of Living. Since the journal is devoted to art and culture, the department took pains to draft a special which would conform to its literary standards. It is hilarious. The heading reads: "The Beautiful Landlady Without Mercy." The writer had obviously read La Belle Dame Sans Merci without digesting its message. A landlady without mercy is approached for accommodation by a "school teachress" recently transferred to the village.

"Number of children?" asks the landlady "frowningly." The "teachress" admits to having a three-month-old baby.



"What is the guarantee that you won't multiply soon? My previous house was anyway spoilt by a football team called family. The helpless parents could not afford to pay the rent even. I forewent two years' rent to get the house vacated!" The poor "teachress" promises to pay rent regularly. The cruel landlady agrees to consider her case favourably provided she has a tambi (copper T) inserted and vouches for its "100 per cent efficacy." Apparently the "teachress" has already a second child in her womb. "Then get a nivaran (abortion) from the primary health centre near here: Do you agree?"

The "teachress" agrees. She also agrees not to undergo tubectomy. The landlady summons her husband as witness to the fact that ever since she had laparoscopic tubectomy he has become more obedient. Her husband acknowledges his gratitude: "You underwent a major operation after all. I avoided a minor one. So I must respect you. Is this "henpeckedness?" he asks.

Do you get the message? Punjabis apparently do.

Filmstar MPs

Filmstars make winning candidates but very rarely good parliamentarians. In my five years in the Rajya Sabha I have known six of them: Nargis Dutt, Sivaji Ganesan, Amitabh Bachchan, Sunil Dutt, Vyjayanthimala and Jayalalitha. Nargis did not live long enough to prove her worth. Sivaji Ganesan made a dramatic appearance when he came to take the oath. Thereafter he has rarely been seen in the House. Amitabh, Sunil and Vyjayanthimala are newcomers and haven't yet had the opportunity to contribute anything worthwhile. For one, they are members of the ruling party and the Lok Sabha has so many of them that they will not be given many chances to speak; they would have done better with the opposition. For another, they do not seem to have decided on their priorities. Their shooting and dancing commitments cut into Parliament's sessions: shooting and dancing are evidently more profitable than the Rs 75 per diem given for attendance in the House. Only one, Jayalalitha, seems to have finally opted for politics against continuing stardom. Right now she has the best of all the worlds. With the eclipse of M.G. Ramachandran she has become Tamil Nadu's biggest vote-catcher. She has her feet in both camps: as a member of the AIADMK, she is more than acceptable to the ruling Congress. And being nominally a part of the opposition, she gets more opportunities and more time to speak. She exploits them to the full. She is a rare combination of beauty, brain and talent, tenacity and ambition. I heard her speak twice on the budget. The last time she followed Prof. Nirmal Chatterjee and ex-finance minister Pranab Mukherjee. After these formidable exponents of budgetary problems, I feared Jayalalitha would come a very poor third. She was the picture of self-confidence. Her good looks assured her of undivided attention, her mellifluous voice and the solid stuff in her speech commanded respect for over half-an-hour. She smiled her way through topics like abolition of excise on soap and relief for fishermen of Rameshwaram.

This lovely lass has taken her place in the centre of India's political stage and, being a Hindi-speaking Tamilian, is assured of a central role for many years to come.

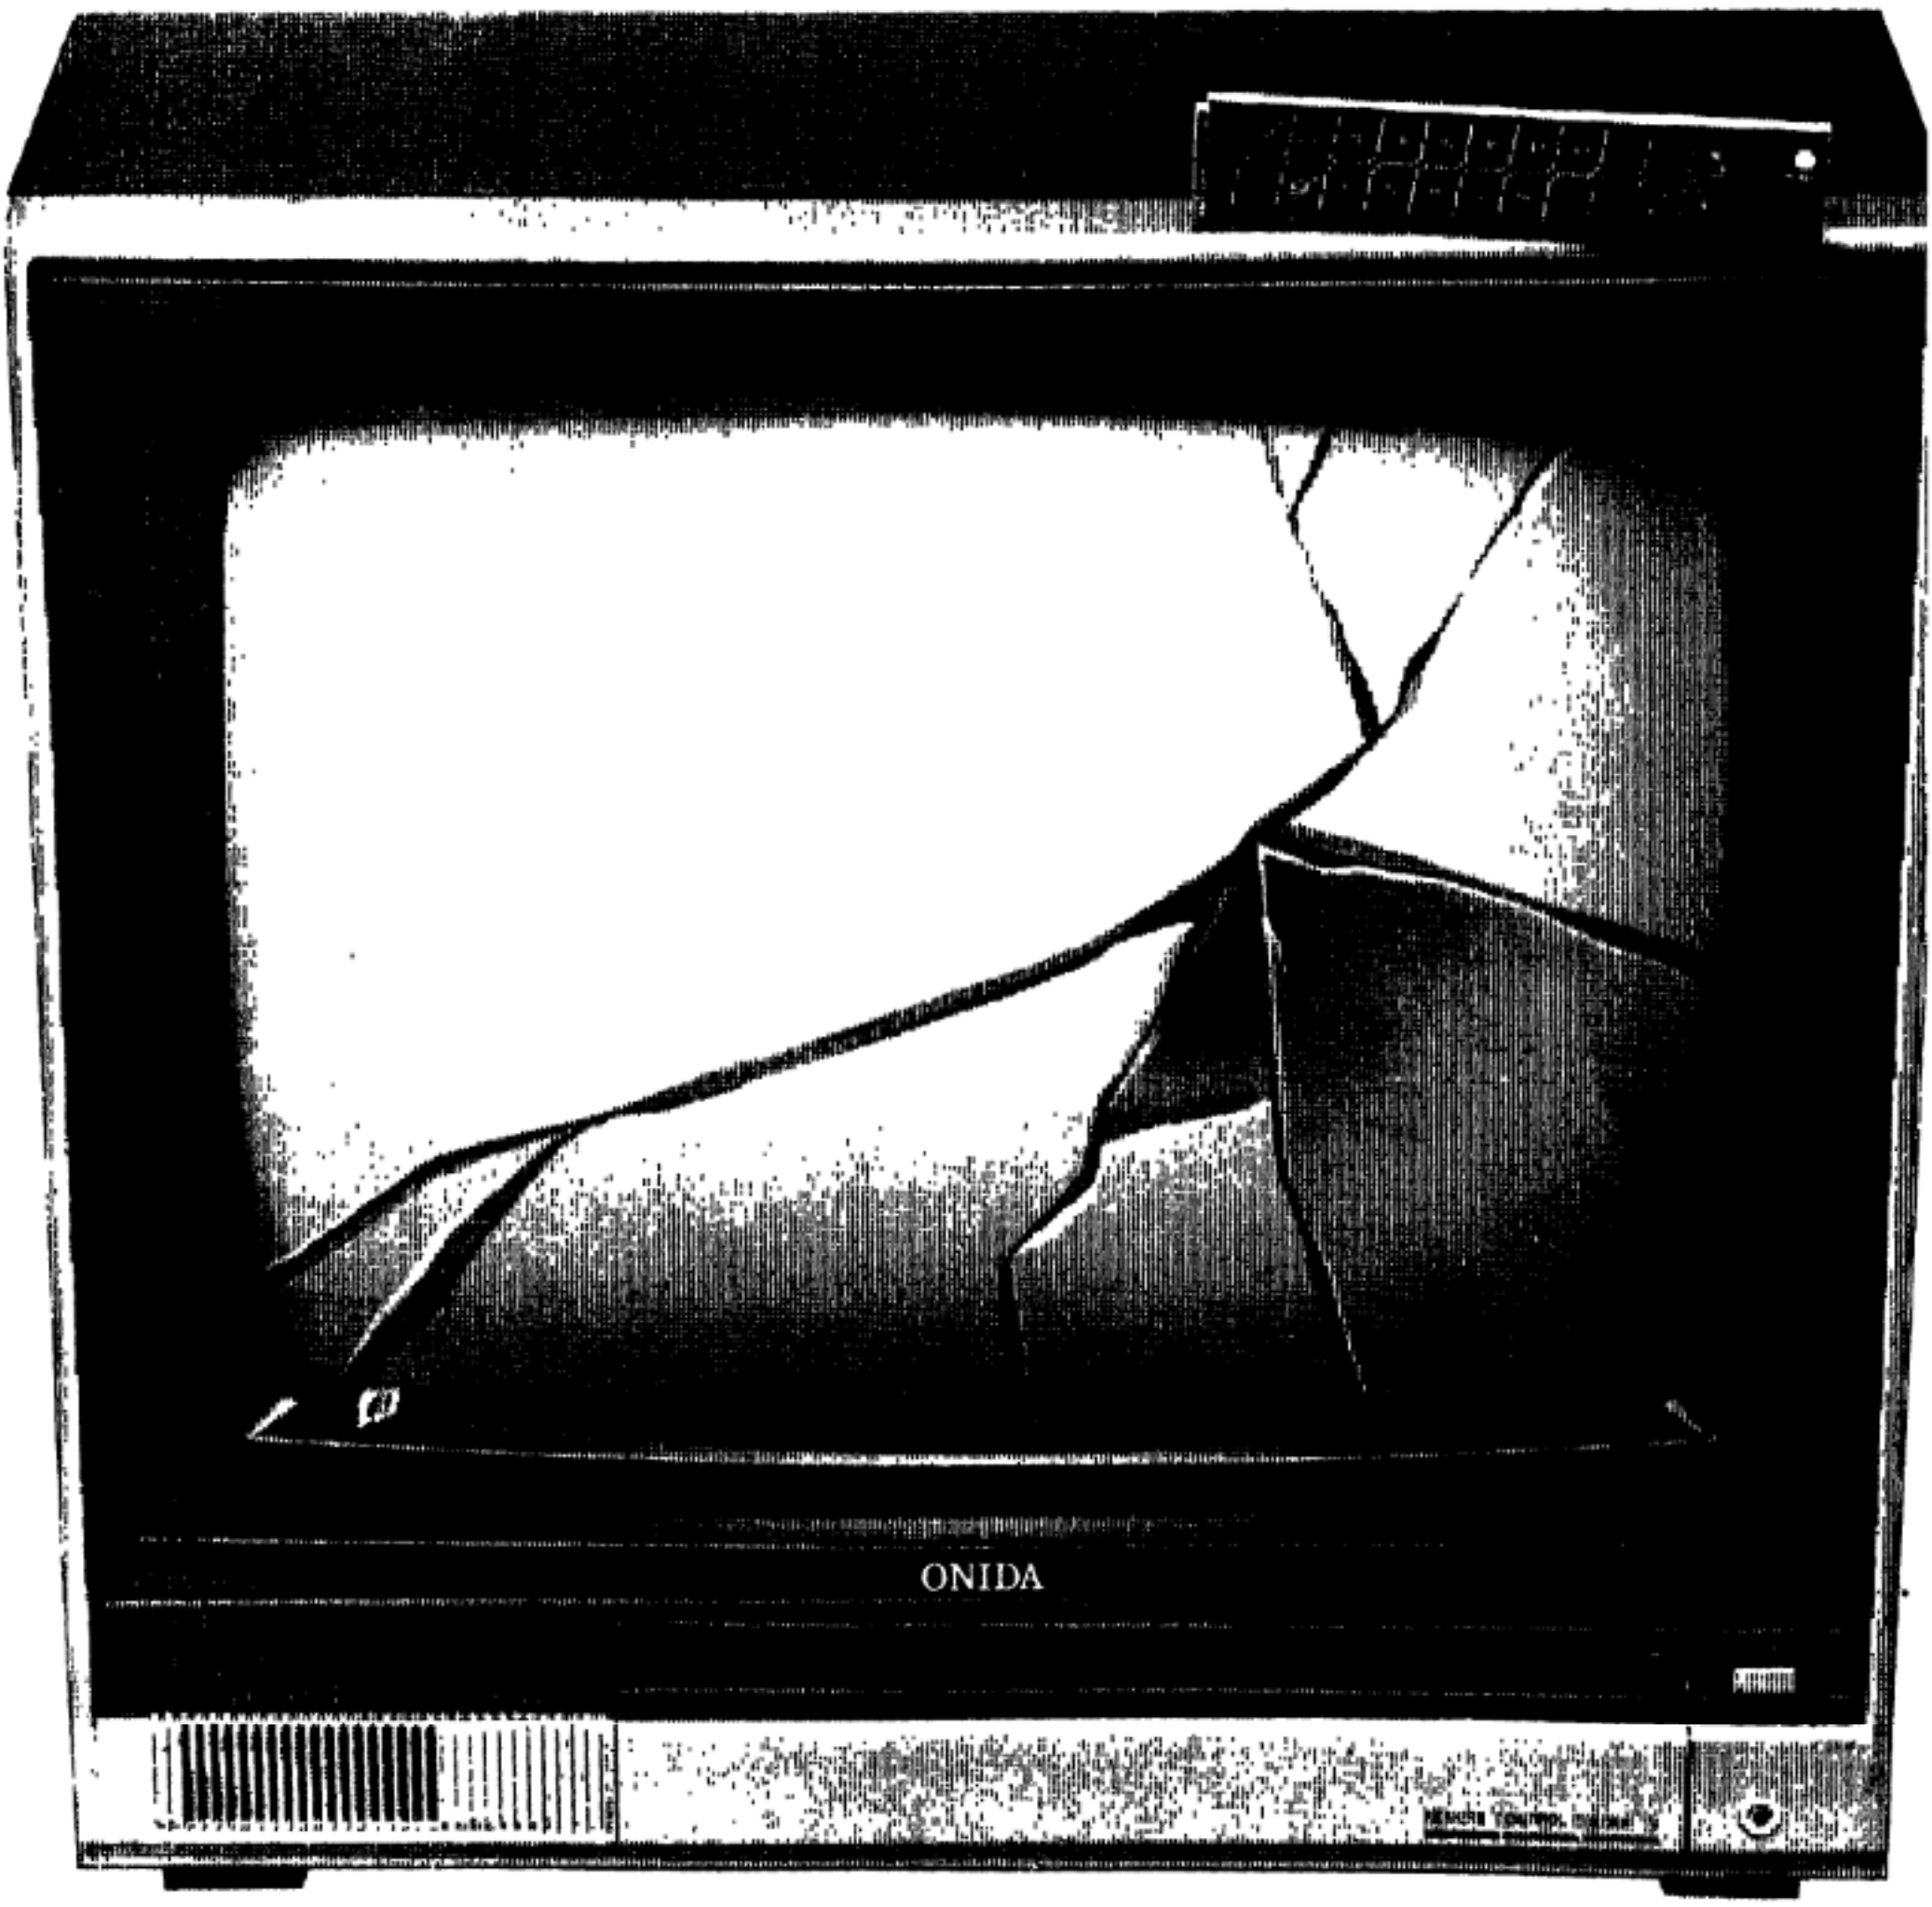
Solar Eccentricities

At the time I am writing this piece, New Delhi is a veritable paradise on the earth. By the time you get to read it, the same paradise will have turned into a hell of heat and dust. Right now it is the season of leaf-shedding and new leaf. Neems, peepuls, banyans, mahuas cast off their withered garments to don fresh, pink and green foliage. Semuls, corals, flame-a-bauhenias are in flower; bougainvillaeas blaze away in crimson, scarlet red, mauve and pink overflowing walls and hedges. Gardens are full of flox, anterrhinums, carnations and marigolds. The city is a riot of colour. Whichever way ye turn there is the face of Allah.

Over the years I have kept a diary to record phenomena of nature: the day the mulberry tree facing my window began to turn green; when the dry as dead-wood vine overhanging my balcony suddenly sprouted into life; when flies, ants, midges and wasps began to make nuisances of themselves; the courtship of Bengal Tree Pies, nesting of kites and vultures and lapwings calling on moonlit nights. I even record temperature and times of sunrise and sunset. I compare notes taken on previous years with the present. I detect a few minor variations which do not seem to have much significance. But one phenomenon for which I rely on reports issued by our observatories and are published by most newspapers on their front pages makes me somewhat uneasy, viz the length of days and nights over the year. My records reveal that over the years our observatories have been issuing exactly the same time for sunrise and sunset. I have no doubt that staff do not base these timings on personal observation but issue carbon copies of data they have in their files. Perhaps they are right and over millions of years the sun has risen and set at precisely the same time on a particular day.

However, will they or some reader more knowledgeable than I, explain to me why when days begin to lengthen or shorten it should not be by the same time at both ends?

According to observatory handouts while the sun continued to rise at 7.15 am for the first fortnight of this year and once, on the 8th even a minute later, to go back to 7.15 for another week in the same period, its time of setting changed from 5.37 pm to 5.49 pm. Similar solar eccentricities will be noticed by those who can scan weather reports. Does the earth wobble as it turns? Or are our weathermen drunk?



The most envied colour TV within a stone's throw!

Now, it's easy to have a [illegible] Merrily, [illegible] many laughs.

Send a few of your neighbours [illegible] Watch their faces [illegible] Then [illegible] to life colour they've ever seen on a TV screen! And have been deeply regretting the fact that they're stuck with colour TVs that are obviously a generation behind!

You may of course argue, your neighbours are the nicest lot. Such violent emotions would never cloud their noble minds no matter how much they envy your ONIDA TV. Well... lucky you!

ONIDA is the Authorized Service Centre of JV Japan. In case you want more details rush to the nearest Deal

ONIDA

20"colour TV with cordless remote. It's been worth waiting!

Uttarpara Jaikrishna Public Library
Uttarpara - Pin-712258, Hooghly

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Join the Government, See the World

"Join the Navy and see the world," the old slogan the Navy uses to attract recruits, can now be put out by all segments of government service, civil or military. Though there is an order—by no means the first one—that public servants should go abroad only when they must and that any file containing a proposal for a visit abroad should go up to the top for approval, no one seems deterred by it

How many officers do go abroad on duty every year and for what purpose? These are questions which go unanswered, and no amount of badgering elicits replies from officers. The information is probably more 'classified' than anything else. But a few months ago I tried collecting information on foreign jaunts, department-wise. I met with some success The figures are not really up to date and are far from complete. But they still afford some idea of how anxious our civil servants are to travel to distant lands to 'serve the country better.'

In nearly 18 months between January 1980 and July 1981 as many as 3,853 officers went abroad and spent Rs 38 crores of public money on air passage, boarding and lodging. Of these, 454 officers were from the ministry of defence. But perhaps this is understandable. The purpose of their visits has not been divulged for obvious reasons. The rest includes 344 officers from the department of atomic energy and 241 from the department of electronics. Again, these are 'high technology' departments, and India does need to know more about technological advancement abroad. This leaves more than 2,800 officers of non-technical ministries who went abroad during this period. Of them, 200 were from the department of economic affairs. And one should realise that the finance ministry is one of the authorities which are meant to sanction such trips.

More than 2,800 officers of non-technical ministries...went abroad during this period (January 1980—July 1981). Of them, 200 were from the department of economic affairs. And one should realise that the finance ministry is one of the authorities meant to sanction such trips.

One explanation for so many officers of the economic affairs department going abroad, I was told, is that they are required to attend Aid-India Club meetings. But then the Aid-India Club meets only once a year. What the officer who forwarded this explanation seems to have forgotten is that there is hardly a senior officer of the economic affairs department who has not landed himself on a lucrative World Bank job.

On checking their destinations I found that most of the officers who had gone abroad went to the USA, UK, France and West Germany, in that order. Only a handful went to neighbouring countries, Pakistan, Bangladesh and Sri Lanka—perhaps because these countries are not 'phoren' enough. Strangely, no government department was willing to answer questions about the number of times a cabinet minister or a minister of state in charge of that department had gone abroad. Even when I asked questions on trips reported in newspapers, the stock reply was, "Details cannot be divulged." As for trips within India, both ministers and officials tend to use any pretext to go out of Delhi. When the Rajiv Gandhi government assumed office, the general instruction issued was that officers should be available at their headquarters and should avoid travelling as far as possible. I do not know if it still holds good.

Ministers, however, show little hesitation in travelling without purpose. Work is 'created' if there is none to be done And the old line between official trips and private jaunts was blurred many years ago. The number of times ministers visit their home states or home towns could work out to an astounding figure. There are sojourns of this kind practically every weekend. The other day a minister complained to me that the use of railway saloons had been unnecessarily stopped. His justification for the complaint: he did not get to see his family members because of 'heavy work'; travel by rail-car saloon would provide him with an opportunity to meet them

The extent to which state governments misuse aircraft is scandalous. Ministers are almost always using them Today there is nothing unusual about a central minister assigning a state-owned aircraft for party work—conveniently shown as 'official' for the records. In the past Sanjay Gandhi always had these aircraft at his command and also Rajiv Gandhi, when he was the Congress (I) general secretary made use of the facility In the recent elections, the election commission did not want the chief ministers to use state-owned aircraft during the polls. Some CMs were reluctant to abide by the instructions. The chief election commissioner had to write to the chief secretaries to ensure that planes were kept 'guarded' during the campaign period. But Bhajan Lal, the Haryana chief minister, used his state plane on the plea that it would be available to the opposition leaders if they wanted to hire it. Naturally, the opportunity 'to hire it' never came. N. D. Tewari of Uttar Pradesh and Arjun Singh of Madhya Pradesh, now Governor of Punjab, have also used their planes all the time, unofficially.

India can draw consolation from the fact that it is only ministers and not officials who misuse state aircraft.. Or, am I wrong?

OPINION

Bright Star

SUNDAY had rightly described Ramakrishna Hegde as the Star of the Future (17—23 March). Unlike many others, he is a chief minister with overwhelming popular support. He heads a government in Karnataka which actually works. However, I think that his services would be more useful at the national level.
Rashmee Roshan Lall, Meerut

•The people of Karnataka should be congratulated for voting Ramakrishna Hegde back to power. The new lease of life given to the Janata Party should be fully utilised by its leaders at the national level.
V. N. Narayanaswamy, Madras

•Though the people of Karnataka voted for the Congress(I) in the last Lok Sabha elections, it was in no way a vote of no-confidence against the Hegde government. In the Assembly elections the people snubbed Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's call for the same party rule at the centre and the state. Mr Hegde won because of his administrative ability and his clean image compared to the infamous leaders of the Congress(I) in the state. If only we had a leader of the stature of Ramakrishna Hegde at the national level, the opposition would have given the Congress(I) a tough fight in the last Lok Sabha elections.
Smita Narang, New Delhi

•I am sure that Ramakrishna Hegde will play a meaningful role in national politics. His resounding victory at the polls only proves how popular he is in his state.
N. Pichaipillai, Trichy

•R. K. Hegde had played his cards well. The way he came back to power shows how shrewd a politician he is. My congratulations to the people of Karnataka for making the right choice.
M. Mohanty, Rairangpur (Orissa)

•In keeping with true democratic spirits, Ramakrishna Hegde resigned from the chief ministership of Karnataka after his party's debacle in the Lok Sabha elections. The people rewarded his honesty and sincerity by voting him back to power with an overwhelming majority. Other politicians should emulate his example.
S. V. Subba Rao, Bangalore

•The voters of Karnataka deserve to be congratulated for making the right choice.
Arabinda Kumar Padhee, Bargarh (Orissa)

• The mandate in favour of Ramakrishna Hegde was a mandate in favour of value-based politics. It has also exposed the hollowness of populist slogans like one-party rule. The Indian electorate is extremely mature and Rajiv Gandhi should not take it for granted. The euphoria generated by the historic mandate in the Lok Sabha elections has subsided and the Congress(I) must produce tangible results to remain in power.
P. Govind, New Delhi

• The people of Karnataka voted for value-based politics as against the money-based politics of the Congress(I). The people reposed faith in the political principles followed by Mr Hegde and the Janata Party.
A. Baruah, Dibrugarh

• Ramakrishan Hegde is a rising star. He should now extend his vision beyond Karnataka and unite the disillusioned opposition.
Anwar Alam Qumaispuri, Patna

• Ramakrishna Hegde is indeed a bright star on India's political horizon. Hegde's dramatic triumph has proved that India possesses a mature electorate capable of differentiating between the good and the bad. He can now form a viable opposition to the Congress(I) at the national level.
K. Chidanand Kumar, Bangalore

• The cover story was well conceived but I did not appreciate a cigarette-puffing Hegde on the cover.
P. Padmanabhan, Somanur (TN)

• Hegde's political maturity paved the way for his stunning victory in the Assembly elections.
Sabuj Sen, Calcutta

Shocking Racket

Tirthankar Ghosh's investigation, Innocents in Bihar Jails (10—16 March) shocked me. What was disturbing was the fact that court officials were also involved in the racket of fake warrants. The victims are usually very poor and they sell their meagre belongings to evade arrest by the police.
Shankerlal Lahoti, Gulbara

•The racket in fake warrants does not exist in Bihar alone. Wherever people are poor and ignorant, the police find a way to bully them.
Biraj Patro, Madras

•In a state where "the CM, ministers and vice-chancellors are accused of selling jobs," according to journalist Janardhan Thakur, "where illegal trade in liquor is carried out from the bungalow of a minister, where a police officer indicted by the Supreme Court for defrauding buys the post of an IG for a couple of lakhs and then goes on to pile a couple of crores during his term" the racket in fake warrants is hardly surprising.
C. B. Sahai, New Delhi

Factual Error

A statement made by D.E. Nizamuddin in Audit Blues (Delhi Diary, 24 February—2 March) is not true. Referring to the appointment of T.N. Chaturvedi as the comptroller and auditor general of India the author writes: "Before him (T.N. Chaturvedi) no civil servant, including those of the prestigous ICS had held this post. Why was this top audit post given to an IAS bureaucrat and not to a seasoned auditor?" The fact is that the post of auditor general of India was always held by an ICS officer during the British rule and even after independence the post was held by an ICS officer, Mr Ranganathan. Mr Chaturvedi's immediate predecessor was also an IAS officer. The functions of the comptrol ler and auditor general require vast administrative experience and hence the choice of IAS officers for that post.
B.G. Murdeshwar, Bangalore

• D.E. Nizamuddin is not correct when he wrote that the post of the comptroller and auditor general is traditionally manned by IAAS officers. In fact, Mr Chaturvedi's predecessor, Gian Prakash, was an IAS officer while a former CAG, A.K. Chanda was an IRS officer.
M.A. Ahad, Bhubaneswar

A Rare Dialogue

An interview becomes absorbing only when the interviewer and the interviewee match each other's wits. Readers had the rare opportunity of going through one such interview when M. J. Akbar spoke to Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi ('The Assassination was Done Not to Kill Mrs Gandhi, it was Done for the Reaction', 10—16 March). But I think that some of the PM's answers were very sketchy as, for example, on the Kashmir issue. However, I agree with Mr Akbar that Rajiv Gandhi has generated much hope in the public mind after assuming office. Everybody feels that he possesses the key to solve all the problems. I hope he does not let his countrymen down.
B. Ganesh, Jamshedpur

•The dialogue with the Prime Minister was informative. I felt as if I was a silent participant at a dinner attended by Rajiv Gandhi and M. J. Akbar. I specially enjoyed the section on Kashmir.
Aijaz Chishti, Srinagar

•The interview contained many memorable quotes. One was the PM's assertion that he "never sought revenge against the Sikhs."
Nirjhar Das Gupta, Calcutta

•SUNDAY took the right decision to carry the full interview in one issue.

Rajiv Gandhi

Rajiv Gandhi's replies to M.J. Akbar's tricky questions were frank and illuminating. I am eagerly waiting to see how the PM tackles the Punjab problem. He has taken a step in the right direction by releasing the Akali leaders.
Snehasis Bagchi, Durgapur

•The PM's ability to take quick decisions were evident from some of the answers.
Pramod Sahoo, Chirimiri (MP)

•It was a wise decision to publish the interview in a single issue. The comprehensive interview was illuminating.
Surinder Sahni, Pune

•Rajiv Gandhi is just a few years old in politics and yet he faced M. J. Akbar like a seasoned politician. I appreciated his confession that morality in politics is a forgotten word.
Shyamal Gupta, Burdwan

•The interview-based cover story on Rajiv Gandhi was timely and absorbing.
Nazmul Siddiqui, Khustia (Bangladesh)

•I was impressed by Rajiv Gandhi's frank admission that the speech delivered by him to the nation on the first day was not entirely his own. For that matter even an orator like John Kennedy had his speeches prepared by experts.
S. Jayaraj, Coimbatore

• The interview with the PM was exhaustive. A speedy solution to the Assam and Punjab problems is what we expect from him.
Priyabrata Sen, Dibrugarh

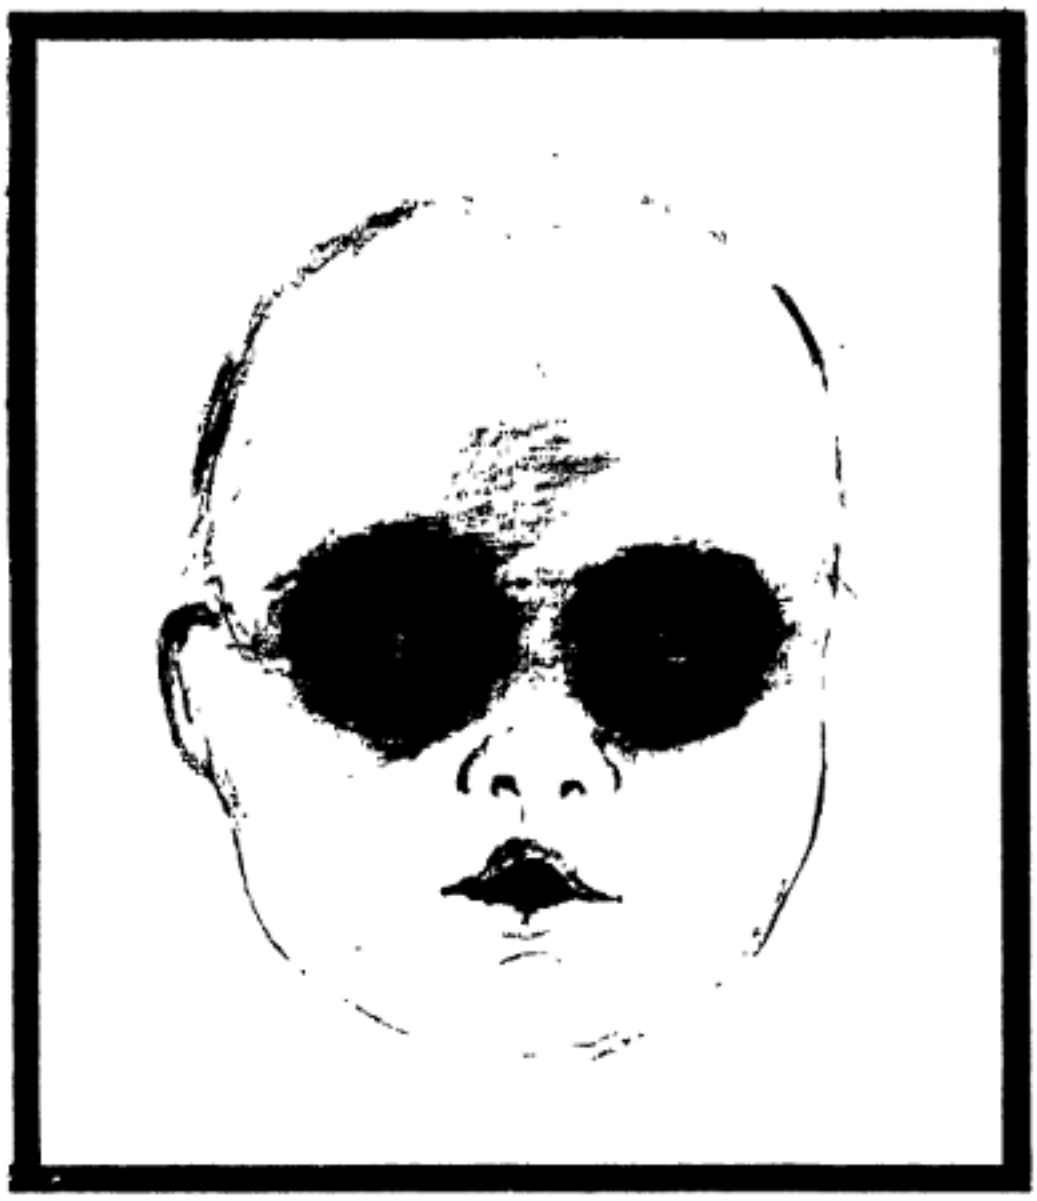
Publisher's Plight

M. J. Akbar's brief write-up on the dedication with which publishers carry on their vocation, has come as a breath of fresh air (Date line, 3—9 February). It is easier to swim with the current and run down the often-maligned publishing community. Therefore, your bold initiative in presenting an objective assessment of the actual position is to be highly appreciated.

Publishers, as rightly pointed out by you, are indeed a devoted lot who have chosen their profession more out of commitment than the lure of making quick profits. Most people are not even aware that, in India, financial institutions do not offer credit facilities to the publishing industry since books are not considered sufficient guarantee for the security of their loans. Publishers have, thus, to fall back entirely upon their personal resources for all their activities.

Further, the state enjoys monopoly over the publication of text-books for government-run schools throughout the country. This constitutes almost 70 per cent of the total publishing activity in India and accounts for a business of over Rs 1,000 crores. (In fact, 85 per cent of publishing is in the hands of the state.) This has deprived publishers of a strong and stable financial base. As a result, publishers unlike their counterparts in other democratic countries, are generally not in a position to undertake academic publishing which, quite often, is not economically viable but is necessary to fulfil social obligations and project India's great cultural heritage in other parts of the world.

The phenomenal rise in the prices of paper during the last decade has dealt a crippling blow to the publishing industry. Since paper accounts for nearly 70 per cent of the cost of production of books, the abnormal increase in the cost of paper has pushed up prices of books beyond the reach of average readers. The number of potential buyers, too, has unfortunately not increased because of various factors including low literacy rate, general lack of reading habit and progressive decrease of purchasing power in the country. Add to that, the peculiar nature of our marketing operations, slow-moving nature of our product, and the consequent uncertainty and irregularity of returns, and the picture of a publisher's plight is complete.



It would be relevant to add that it goes to the abiding credit of Indian publishers that the prices of books have not increased in league with the rising costs of raw materials. Profit margin of publishers has thus correspondingly decreased. Unmindful of this situation and other factors mentioned above, publishers continue to carry on their vocation with dedication and commitment to the higher cause of a reading society.

Notwithstanding all this, if some persons, out of ignorance or prejudice, continue maligning publishers, I believe they are being far more sinned against than sinning!
Narendra Kumar, Managing Director, Vikas Publishing House, Delhi

COVER STORY

THE COVER-UP

WHY UNION CARBIDE SHOULD BE THROWN OUT OF INDIA

The injury has been enormous. The insult is even greater. Death, disease, deformity continue their havoc in Bhopal, with even foetuses and newly-borns falling prey to the deadly MIC gas which leaked from the factory. But Union Carbide Corporation, USA, anxious to save the dollars of its shareholders, is trying to wriggle out of its responsibility for this unthinkable crime by passing on the blame to "Indians" and quietly exonerating the parent company. The Indian employees were to blame for negligence; the Indian government did not keep a strict enough check on the safety measures at the Bhopal plant. This, to say the least, is astonishing, particularly since this great multinational called Union Carbide has more than fifty per cent holding in the Bhopal plant and the management was under its direct control. The government of India has now discovered that faulty design by the parent company may have been the main culprit. Can we allow multinationals like Union Carbide to get away with what is literally much, much more horrible than murder? We examine the whole array of the Bhopal fallout: Who is to blame? What is the state of the legal battle? What health hazards does MIC poisoning still pose to the survivors?

Illustration: Bulbul Sharma

COVER STORY

Carbide Chairman Anderson is Lying

Although Union Carbide Corporation chairman Warren M. Anderson is denying responsibility for the Bhopal gas tragedy, facts state otherwise

It is a game that some multinationals specialise in. Following a public outcry against Tylenol deaths, Johnson & Johnson, which marketed the drug, mounted a massive public relations campaign disowning responsibility for the deaths. Another multinational, Manville, claimed bankruptcy when thousands of shipyard workers exposed to the asbestos it was manufacturing developed lung diseases and cancer and sued for damages. With claims for damages worth $200bn piling up against it in US courts, Union Carbide Corporation, which would be completing 100 years in business next year, could have gone the Manville way—and yet be in business. It would have been safely protected by bankruptcy laws which offer immunity against legal claims.

But the Carbide Corporation has chosen a daring but simple course: to pass the buck to its Indian subsidiary. Ever since the poison gas leak in its Bhopal pesticide plant killed more than 2,500 people, Union Carbide had been insisting that there was nothing wrong with the plant; it was something of an act of God that the gas leaked out of an underground storage tank. It even hired an expensive public relations firm to sell this idea.

But now Union Carbide has adopted a different ploy. it is actually saying that the plant was dangerously unsafe. It took seven of its top scientists and engineers more than two months and over 200 laboratory experiments to find this out. The study released last month by Carbide chairman Warren M Anderson presents Union Carbide's excuse and possible defence against impending legal battles. The defence is, the safety standards in the Bhopal plant were very poor but the blame lies with the Indian managers who were running it. The disaster could have been avoided had the plant been properly maintained. This was announced by the same William Anderson who had been claiming all these months that "our safety standards in the USA are identical to those in India. Same equipment, same design, same everything." Mr Anderson has clearly got caught in his first lie.

The report states that the scrubber which would have neutralised toxic methyl isocyanate (MIC), the poison gas, by treating it with caustic soda was inoperative for more than two months; the circulating pump for the scrubber did not function properly, the flare tower where escaping gas would have burnt itself out was not operating on the night of the disaster, the cooling device designed to keep the highly volatile MIC gas safely stored in liquid form was not functioning properly for more than five months, the temperature alarm which should have been set off automatically with the rise in temperature inside the tank did not sound.

However, the most sinister part of the Carbide team's study is the suggestion that local managers of its Indian subsidiary were not only callous about the plant's safety but may have even deliberately caused the world's worst industrial disaster by introducing water into the storage tank. The study team's scenario for the disaster is: either by design or accident some 240 gallons of water went into one of the MIC storage tanks setting off a runaway reaction, heating the chemicals up to a temperature of 200 degrees C. The chemical vapourised at that temperature and escaped into the air as safety devices failed. UCC chief Anderson has declared rather pompously that "the question of sabotage will have to be answered over in India."

A victim of MIC gas shields her burning eyes from light

Mr Anderson has given his verdict on very scant evidence. By its own admission the study team's investigation suffered from limited access to information and its report cannot therefore be considered sufficient for arriving at any definite conclusion. The team was in India for only 24 days, of which it spent about 14 days in assisting the Indian experts engaged in neutralising leftover toxic gas. In the nine or ten days the team had to itself to study the problem, it met only two persons—the works manager and the production manager of the plant—who could be of any help to the investigators. The team was neither permitted to interview any of the Bhopal plant employees who witnessed the incident nor could it inspect relevant documents. The government of India has already dismissed the team's study as "speculative, unwarranted, unjustified and motivated" to establish the guilt of the parent Carbide Corporation for the Bhopal disaster beyond any doubt.

Already Indian experts have challenged some of Carbide's findings. For instance, the director general of the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research, S. Varadarajan, who not only supervised the neutralisation of stored MIC gas after the disaster but also has more access to information, insists that only a small amount of water triggered off the reaction, aided by an improper mixture of the MIC. The Carbide study also acknowledges that some amount of carbon steel entered the MIC mixture and sped up the reaction. Normally carbon steel should not have been present in the MIC mixture. How then did it get into the mixture? The Carbide team's guess is that the answer lies in some of the valves and tubes made of carbon steel.

The use of carbon steel is explicitly forbidden in a plant handling MIC gas. The Union Carbide handbook on MIC published in 1976 says: "Storage of commercial MIC in carbon steel, tin or copper containers must be avoided since catalysts are formed from these metals on standing." Since carbon steel is cheaper than stainless steel, Union Carbide overruled objections from Humperies and Glasgow, which had built the Bhopal plant, regarding the use of carbon steel. Cutting costs in other areas too compounded the tragedy.

Admittedly, Union Carbide's Bhopal plant was not doing well. The plant was operating at less than one-third of its capacity and losing heavily on profits. To make up for the losses Union Carbide opted to take the easiest option: reducing its personnel. In 1983 the number of operators in the MIC production unit was scaled down from 12 to five. The maintenance engineer was dispensed with. Many senior technicians were shifted to other Union Carbide facilities. Indeed, Union Carbide was keen on closing down the Bhopal plant and was ready to pay up to Rs 30,000 to anyone willing to resign.

But the fact remains that Union Carbide Corporation (USA) holds 50.9 per cent of the stocks in its Indian subsidiary which makes it the majority shareholder and thus legally and morally responsible for acts of omissions and commissions of its local managers. It is after all Union Carbide, USA, which took all major decisions including the choice of staff to man its Indian subsidiary. Thus, it was the parent company in the USA which had been flouting the safety measures at the Bhopal plant. In a sworn affidavit a former head of the Indian subsidiary, Edward Munoz, has claimed that despite objections from its Indian subsidiary Carbide, USA, insisted on storing large quantities of toxic MIC in Bhopal.

There is also no reason for Union Carbide to now act surprised at the security lapses in the Bhopal plant. Its inspectors had reported as far back as 1982 that if corrective steps were not taken soon, the Bhopal plant had the "potential for a serious incident or more serious consequences should an incident occur." Union Carbide Corporation just ignored the warning and did nothing to rectify the flaws and the faults in its Bhopal plant which ultimately led to the disaster. Even six months before the catastrophic poison gas leak in Bhopal an internal company memorandum had warned the US Carbide Corporation about a possible runaway reaction in its chemical storage tanks. This warning too went unheeded.

From the beginning, Union Carbide officials had been acting strangely. First, they tried to minimise the damages that the MIC gas could bring about by saying that the gas was not as lethal as it was being made out to be. A dose of oxygen would put the victims on their feet again. Even after the whole world, including US President Ronald Reagan, expressed shock and grief at the tragedy, there was not a word of regret or sorrow from the Union Carbide Corporation of USA. Neither did they volunteer any information on the effects of MIC either on animals or on human beings: nor did they state which drugs could bring relief. Union Carbide Corporation is known to have carried out extensive tests on animals to find out the effects of MIC gas but the government of India, despite numerous requests for the test results, has failed to secure them from the giant multinational.

Mr Anderson and his senior colleagues in the USA are now trying to disown responsibility for the gas leak in Bhopal, but it may not be very easy for Union Carbide Corporation to get away with it. The evidence is too overwhelming for such a cover-up to succeed. Like its share prices, Union Carbide Corporation's credibility too has taken a nose-dive. The chairman of the US House of Representatives' Health and Environment Committee, Henry Waxman, succinctly summed up why Union Carbide's ploy could not succeed: "I have come to a point where I do not think we can take Union Carbide's word for what happened in India." Only recently the US Union Carbide Corporation was fined $3.9 million by the US Environment Protection Agency for supplying doctored information.

Evidently, Union Carbide of USA is prepared to go to any length to save its investments. Since the issue of responsibility is directly connected to the quantum of compensation that Carbide Corporation of USA would have to pay to the victims, it was perhaps inevitable that it would try to shift the blame to its Indian subsidiary. In the process the facts the Corporation is trying to ignore are that its Bhopal plant was a poor imitation of its Virginia plant and its safety standards were incapable of coping with emergency situations like the one that led to the world's worst environmental disaster. How then are the local managers of the Indian subsidiary to blame for the catastrophe? Obviously, Mr Anderson looks at the matter differently.

Tooshar Pandit

Carbide Blames Carbide

Desperate to save itself, Union Carbide Corporation is now blaming its Indian subsidiary for the world's worst industrial mishap

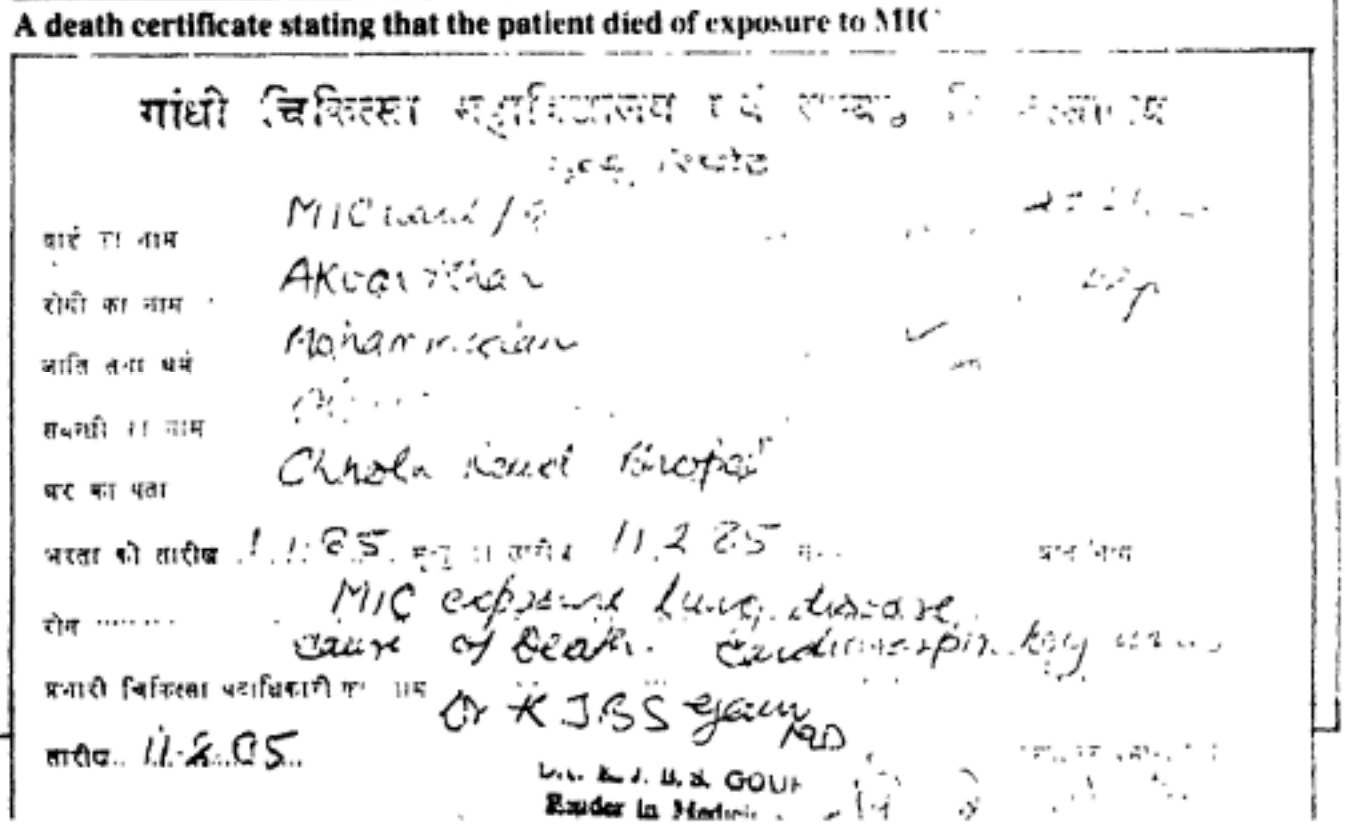
For beleaguered Union Carbide, after the long journey through specious arguments, justifications and pleas, it seems to be the end of the road: While at Danbury, Connecticut, the Union Carbide Corporation (UCC) chairman Warren Anderson was clearly hinting at sabotage or negligence as the cause of the Bhopal disaster, those in charge of the Indian subsidiary found their blood pressure mounting. Were their American bosses trying to pin responsibility on them? Although top officials of Union Carbide India Limited (UCIL) have been maintaining a studied silence on Anderson's statements, the buck has definitely travelled down to the American multinational's Indian subsidiary.

Speaking to SUNDAY in what was his first meeting with the press after detention for the accident, UCIL managing director V.P. Gokhale said about the UCC's report: "It would be premature to comment on the investigating team's report until the findings are confirmed." He also declined to comment on Anderson's statements, putting the blame squarely on the Indian subsidiary, in view of the "legal problems and constraints." While the "legal problems" continue and the government argues with Carbide over the compensation amount for the 2,500 victims, their dependants and relatives are likely to face a long drawn war over technicalities.

The Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster (Processing of Claims): Ordinance 1985 came into being in February. The ordinance empowers the central government "to ensure claims arising out of, or connected with the Bhopal gas leak disaster are dealt with speedily, effectively, equitably and to the best advantage of the claimants and for matters incidental thereto." It is learnt, however, that the government is likely to reach an out-of-court settlement with the company. A UCIL official here estimated that the amount paid by the company would be around 100 million dollars. However, a company spokesman ruled this out as "highly speculative and motivated."

Commenting on the likelihood of an out-of court settlement, advocate Indira Jaisingh, a member of the Lawyer's Collective who was recently in Bhopal to represent the victims, said this would be the best choice. Litigation in India would take too long and it would prove too expensive. Even though the courts were not allowing contingency fees, lawyers would have to be paid on an hourly basis.

Keeping in line with his chief in the USA, Mr Gokhale also argued in favour of an out-of-court settlement as litigation would delay compensation. But, he added, "The public is misled into believing that compensation is the only answer. The need of the hour is rehabilitation." And he has a suggestion: "I am willing to let part of the Bhopal plant be used as rehabilitation centres for the survivors." He conceded that Carbide's rehabilitation work has been limited so far and that "nothing really suffices in the light of such a tragedy."



Suffice it certainly does not. So far the only rehabilitation work has been by way of setting up papad, hand glove and agarbatti-making centres. And this from about Rs 3 lakhs collected by the Carbide employees' relief trust. Thirty per cent of this amount is to be used for relief immediately while the rest of the money will be saved for long-term programmes, according to Dr Chakravarty of UCIL, who is one of the trustees. In short, the company has hardly had to trouble itself about relief measures as "the government has refused all aid in view that it might affect the case."

The crucial question now is: Where does the blame lie? With the world's 27th largest multinational corporation or its Indian subsidiary? Who will foist the blame on whom? Or will the Indian government also be dragged in "for contributory negligence" to split the kitty? In an apparent bid to "find out the answer," UCC assigned seven of its civil engineers and scientists headed by Ron Van Mynen, corporate director of health and safety, to investigate the case and determine the probable cause.

After spending 24 days in India and collecting a residue from the fateful MIC tank No 610, the team simulated possible conditions leading to the gas release and subsequent formation of the elements found in the residue, in their US laboratories. By its own admission, the team could not present a single scenario to fit the accident, since "sufficient critical information was missing in each case due to restrictions placed on the team by the Central Bureau of Investigation." The team examined many possibilities, "including those deemed remote or unlikely" and arrived at a hypothesis to explain the accident in which it has a "high degree of confidence." "The incident was the result of a unique combination of unusual events," the report says. One such "unusual" phenomenon is an abnormally high level of water in the MIC tank which is believed to have reacted with the lethal gas aided by equally high levels of chloroform.

Interestingly the report fails to

A death certificate stating that the patient died of exposure to MIC trace the source of the water which UCIL experts here say is not available so abundantly at the site. It is clear while reading the report that everything subtly points to sabotage or gross negligence. The report observes: "The exact source of the water is not known, but laboratory work demonstrated that the 1,000-2,000 pounds (120-240 gallons) would have accounted for the chemistry of the residue. Water could have been introduced inadvertently or deliberately, directly into the tank through the process vent line, nitrogen line or other piping." A UCIL official here who wished to remain unidentified corroborated this view and even said "disgruntled workers" had a hand in this. The sabotage theory clears the air for UCIL: What better story than 'union rivalry' or 'workers out to wreck the company' for a clean defence?

But for UCIL the clouds are gathering again as the UCC report brings in the negligence theory strongly, squarely shifting the blame to its Indian subsidiary. Check:

"The vent gas scrubber had been removed from an operating mode to a standby mode on October 23, 1984, after the MIC unit was shut down with a total MIC inventory of 183,000 pounds in tanks 610 and 611. The return to an operating mode was dependent upon the operator being alerted to a problem and taking prompt action to activate the circulating pump. The flow meter did not indicate that caustic circulation had been started. The operator did not go into the unit and check the pump and verify a flow. Prior to the incident, the flare had been removed from service from maintenance work and was not operating at the time of the incident.

"The temperature of MIC in tank 610 before the incident was at 15 to 20 degrees centigrade as compared to the requirement of zero degrees centigrade. The lower temperature would have retarded the reaction rates and considerably extended the time available for corrective action. The refrigeration system provided to cool the MIC in the storage tanks had been made non-operational in June 1984."

These observations lose their gravity when reports about the fault in the plant's structural design (by the parent company), strangely overlooked by UCC, USA, investigators, say that vent gas scrubber (VGS) is designed to operate only at low temperatures and pressures, while the gas is released at a high temperature and pressure. The flare tower which burns up gas not neutralised in the VGS is meant to handle only small quantities of the gas. In this case it was 40,000 kilos. The refrigeration system, according to a report by the Delhi Science Forum (DSF), "was switched off as an economy measure." The report adds that many vent lines, feed lines etc. are in poor condition and items that should be replaced every six months have been used for two years. Such conditions could lead to the entry of chemicals, whose presence even in minor quantities can trigger runaway reactions, the report says.

Besides this, it is pointed out that the design of the MIC storage tank itself was faulty. Buried and encased in cement it is difficult to inspect or repair. Also, MIC should not be stored in such vast quantities and it was also not adequately cooled in view of the very hot summer in the area. The DSF report also states the difference between the UCC plant in West Virginia and the plant in Bhopal, as substantial evidence that multinationals, while transferring technology to Third World countries, forget to transfer the quality and safeguards used at home. The pressure gauge which indicates pressure when the RD (rupture disc) in tank 610 ruptures, is manually monitored and not linked with the autowarning alarm or control room as it is in West Virginia.

The plant in West Virginia is provided with a computerised monitoring and control system, which the Bhopal plant lacks. Countering this observation, Mr Gokhale said that the computer installed at West Virginia was for logging production operating data and was not a part of the safety system. This was so at least until 3 December last year. They could have made changes after the tragedy, he said, adding that the Bhopal plant was also the first of the UCIL plants to get a computer (in June 1984), but was unrelated to safety measures.

Having allayed fears of a repeat performance in the US, the report was made public, subtly nailing UCIL with sabotage or negligence. There were obviously no reactions to the report here. As one official put it: "I have four options. In can agree with the report, in which case I am agreeing with its deduction, which looks bad for us. I can refute its findings, in which case I am openly going against the findings of UCC, our parent company. I can offer no comments. Or I can wait till the CBI and Indian scientists come out with their findings, before voicing my opinion."

Even if the conclusions lead to gross negligence, the fact remains that all senior personnel were trained in America. Works manager J. Mukund was educated and trained in USA by UCC, assistant works manager Dr Roy Chaudhari and the manager, MIC production, were also trained at West Virginia. And UCC did exercise control over the working of the plant and hiring of personnel.

Commenting on the possible evasion of responsiblity by UCC on the issue of negligence, a lawyer said that unless it was proved by audit reports that UCC was directly monitoring the controls of the company, it would be hard to pin the blame on them. They might even be able to evade the responsiblity of structural design faults, if they could prove that the original plans had been altered or modified in some way. A representative of Carbide's legal department, when asked whether the cause of the accident (negligence or sabotage) would affect the compensation, said, "The out-of-court settlement is for civil damages (compensation to claimants) and it has nothing to do with criminal proceedings. The government has to decide about continuing with criminal proceeding. But in the interest of the victims, compensation has to be paid."

It is left to be seen whether Union Carbide will bear the burden of the entire settlement, which would cover the victims, retrenched employees of the Bhopal plant, numbering around 900, and others directly affected by the tragedy. There is a possibility, as a section of lawyers here feel, that Carbide might drag the government in for contributory negligence, pointing out that had it cared to duly carry out inspections of the plant, and strictly enforced various acts governing industry, pollution control and environmental safety—which are its duties—this would not have happened. The division of blame would also ease the burden of compensation on the multinational and its subsidiary. If Carbide has to part with a sizable sum of money by settling the matter out of court, sharing the blame would be helpful. This would mean both the company and the government would have to share the penalty.

The emerging view seems to be that UCC will try its best to shrug off most of the blame. The report, if anything, substantiates this. Right now, UCIL seems to be virtually "sitting on the fence," letting the government and UCC sort out the matter between themselves. How long this will last remains to be seen. The ball might well roll into UCIL's courts, holding it responsible for history's worst industrial accident, along with the government.

Lalita Dhar, Bombay

COVER STORY

The Case Against Carbide

A CBI report finds enough damaging evidence for the Indian government to sue Union Carbide

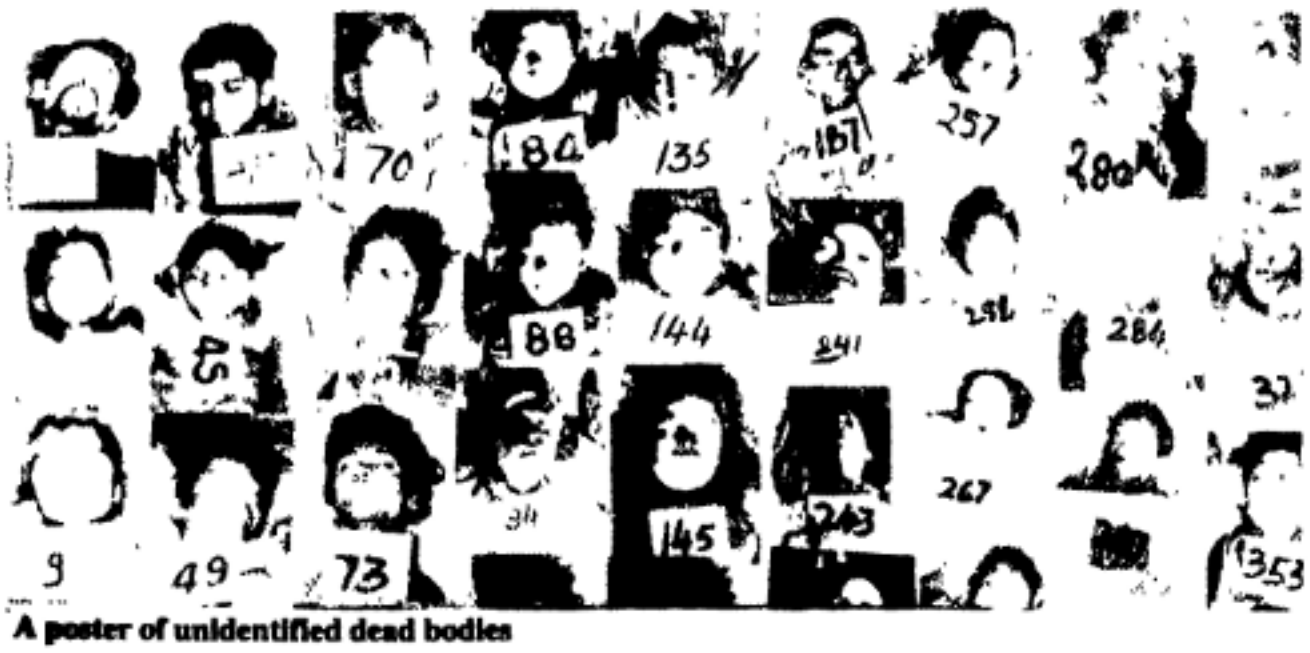
The legal battery of the government of India is finally ready to zero in on the Union Carbide Corporation, Connecticut, USA. Armed with the powers to be the sole representative of the Bhopal gas victims in court, the government has appointed as their attorneys, Robins, Zelle, Larson and Kaplan, a Minnesota-based firm to prepare the case against the corporation. Going by the "technical report" released by the multinational at Danbury on 20 March and subsequent statements by the Union Carbide chairman, Warren Anderson, the firm is going to fight tooth and nail to disclaim any responsibility for the disaster.

The vital question today is: Have the 16-week long investigations come up with enough evidence to establish the culpability of the parent company in court? This was obviously the question debated at the first meeting between the visiting attorneys from Minnesota: Ms Roberta B. Walburn, Mr Michael V. Ciresi, Mr Bruce Afinzen and Ms Ann Barcelow (legal assistant) and the CBI investigating team at the office of the joint director, Central Bureau of Investigation, in the capital on 29 March. After months of painstaking probe, the CBI officials are confident of providing enough gunpowder to the legal blow. The documents and records seized from the Carbide factory have come up with startling disclosures that establish without a doubt that the parent company was well aware of the malfunctioning of the Bhopal plant. Not only that, they were also partners in crime in sanctioning short-sighted design changes in the plant which finally led to the entry of water into the MIC storage tank

According to CBI investigations, in May 1984—hardly six months before the tragedy—the Union Carbide Corporation approved of a design change in the pipelines leading to the MIC storage tanks which was directly responsible for the water entering tank No. 610 on the fatal night. It was decided then to interconnect the relief valve vent header (RVVH) line with the process vent header (PVH) line which led out of the storage tanks to the vent gas scrubber. The reason given for the design change was "to provide a route for toxic gases to the scrubber which neutralises the gas in case any one of the vent headers was undergoing repairs." It was this interconnection which provided the route for the water which came from the plant via the RVVH line into the tank.

At 8.30 pm on 2 December, the workers on night shift began flushing four filter pressure safety valves located at ground level far from the storage tanks. The washing continued until 9.30 and then was resumed after an hour's break around 10.30 pm. The CBI officials have found that two of the filter valves being washed were choked. This led to the accumulation of water and the continued pressure of water being forced into the pipe helped the water level to rise through the isolation valve at a height of eight feet into the main header which is at a height of nearly 20 feet. From here the water got siphoned off into the lower RVVH line with the gravitational pull and finally via the interconnection into the MIC tank. According to reports, the nitrogen pressurisation of the tank was also not effective and the water freely poured into the tank, triggering off the runaway reaction.

The CBI officials, who had disconnected the pipeline from the storage tanks on the morning after the leak, drained out as much as 27 litres of water from the structurals on 14 February. This totally refutes the theory of sabotage—with water deliberately poured into the tank—being floated by certain company officials. The water was found in almost all connecting pipelines tracing the entire route from the point of washing to the RVVH line.



The CBI team has also found a document from the parent company to the Bhopal plant drafted only a week before the gas leak which indicates plans to shift the plant to another country. While they would not disclose the name of the country or the particulars of the document, officials said that this decision was also being taken in the light of the malfunctioning of the plant. Further evidence of the negligence of the parent company is provided in the Paulson Safety Survey Report 1982. The report which is full of praise for the working of the plant in the covering letter, later confesses that not a single valve of the plant was found to be in working order, the CBI officials said. There was, however, no remedial action, and the valves which gave way in the 2 December leakage were all these faulty original ones installed in 1979.

The CBI investigation also indicts the Union Carbide Corporation for reasons other than design defects. According to reports seized from the research and development centre of the plant at Bhopal as well as documents traced from other offices of the firm, the corporation had conducted a number of experiments on animals and plants and was well aware of the effects of MIC. According to one investigating official, the firm used to get piecemeal research done at the various laboratories and then put the results together to arrive at an overall conclusion. The Bhopal R and D centre too had been used for finding out some of the efects of MIC on animals and plants. The firm, however, denied any knowledge of long-term or medium-term effects of the toxic gas following the tragedy.

Tank No. 610 which has been dug up for investigation by the CBI

गैस दुर्घटना में लापता मृतक

A poster of unidentified dead bodies

Reports seized also show that the parent company was fully aware of the possible danger of cyanide poisoning through MIC, and the antidotes required as early as 1978-79. Does this mean that the knowledge was wilfully suppressed by the firm when the doctors at Bhopal were floundering in the dark? Apart from establishing the responsibility of the parent company, the accusing finger of the CBI also points at the local workers and management. The immediate attack against them is the fact that the pipelines being washed were not "blinded," that is the tanks were not disconnected from the lines.

As for the neglect of the management, there is no dearth of pointers. The temperature and pressure indicators, both vital instruments in such an eventuality, were not in working order The well-reported dismantling of the flare tower and non-functioning of the vent scrubber are glaring examples of callous disregard of the potential hazards in their production process. Further design defects located indicate that even if the two were functioning, they were not equipped to handle the magnitude of such a leakage. While the capacity of the vent scrubber is only 86 kg of gas per hour at 35 degrees Celsius the amount that pased through was well over a hundred times that quantity at more than 200 degrees Celsius. The flare tower in turn is even less equipped to handle such large amounts and CBI officials maintain that instead of helping it would have caused an explosion to add to the damage. No attention was paid to these in-builts defect at any stage despite small accidents earlier. The style of functioning, moreover, of the plant was even more casual. During "Operation Faith," it was found that a certain amount of MIC was present in the third storage tank which was supposed to be kept empty.

Later investigations revealed that a little over one tonne of MIC had been transferred to this tank on 17 October after which plant officials had forgotten about it altogether. The CBI investigations are also dwelling on the culpability of the government of Madhya Pradesh in granting the licence without adequate checks regarding the safety measures provided. It also puts the blame on the government for allowing the residential colonies to grow around the plant despite being fully aware of the hazardous chemicals being produced.

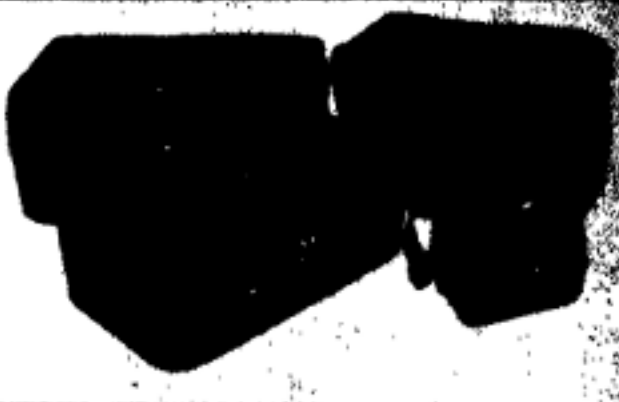
A report by an engineer of the state pollution control board in 1981, when the plant had applied for an augmentation of capacity, clearly states: "Now that the factory is running, we can do little about it. But no further settlement should be allowed around the plant." However, just weeks before the disaster, the then Madhya Pradesh chief minister, Mr Arjun Singh, had personally distributed pattas granting land rights to the hutment dwellers around the factory. The role of the politicians and bureaucrats in concealing the facts about the firm is also being investigated. In this connection, the role of Mr M.N. Nagu, director, health services, Madhya Pradesh government, following the tragedy is reported to be suspect. Mr Nagu's brother, Mr R.N. Nagu, who was a former inspector-general of police had the contract for security arrangements of the plant, CBI officials pointed out.

The CBI's own investigations are more or less complete. But they are still awaiting the findings of the scientists and chemical experts to finalise their reports. Storage tank No 610 has been dug out (contrary to press reports, the tank is not underground but on surface level). It was, however, covered with a three-ft deep earth mound with a further foot deep concrete coating. The cracking of the cement coating following the leakage had earlier been attributed to heat generated estimated to be as high as 400 degrees Celsius. But it has now been found on uncovering the tank, that the shell of the tank itself had bulged out to such an extent with the pressure created by the reaction that the cement surrounding it had cracked.

The tank is scheduled to be cut open on 6 April. At first only video cameras will be lowered into the tank to photograph the remnants. Only then will samples of the polymers, if any remain inside, be taken to analyse the exact nature of the reaction. This would mark the last stage of the investigations and the final report is expected around the end of May. But the CBI officials point out, even as the formal report is being prepared, there is enough ready evidence against both Union Carbide Corporation and Union Carbide (India) Limited to proceed against them in court. The attorneys from Minnesota—who, incidentally, according to the official spokesman of the American Centre did not even inform the American embassy here of their visit—are being allowed access to all the evidence collected by the Bureau. They were flown to Bhopal for three days to conduct an on-the-spot study of the plant.

The team returned in the first fortnight of April armed with all the evidence to take Warren Anderson and his men to court. The case is expected to be filed within a fortnight. The government is also going to appeal to all the private suits lodged in the US courts for a joinder. Although the quantum of relief to be demanded is yet to be disclosed, according to reliable estimates, Union Carbide is heading for a billion dollar suit.

Tarun Mishra, New Delhi



The world is going soft today

..... and feeling lighter for it!

Now Skybags brings the Soft Revolution to India. VIP's exciting new range of nylon luggage is the ultimate in travelling style and comfort. Fashioned from strong, tear-resistant nylon, Skybags are light-weight, roomy, beautifully functional and sensationally tough. So before you pick your next destination, pick your Skybags ... and you'll be off to a flying start!

Skybags

SOFT · STRONG · STYLISH

Nylon luggage from the leader VIP

LINTAS VIP S 4 2819

RAYMOND'S SUMMER STRATEGY FOR SHORT-SLEEVED SHIRTS.

1 Collar — [illegible] superior lining, [illegible] and perfectly shaped.

2 Buttons — best proof.

[illegible] new styles of casual shirts. Crafted from [illegible] collection in every detail.

[illegible] Slacks, Reversible Trousers, Suits, [illegible] Why will you?

Simpsons

The Crime Continues

On an average at least two deaths due to MIC exposure are being reported everyday in Bhopal. Many who have survived are diseased or dying. Even foetuses have been affected; one child was born with holes where his eyes should have been.

Bhopal has become a laboratory of human guinea pigs. Everyone who was exposed to the 50,000 pounds of deadly methyl isocyanate which floated out of a leaking Union Carbide India Limited (UCIL) plant on the fateful night of 3 December 1984, leaving 2,500 dead, 50,000 maimed and 1,500 severely affected, is now a hapless victim of medical experiments and selfish political designs. The situation threatens to take a turn for the worse as reports of fresh cases of MIC poisoning pour in. On an average, two MIC-affected residents of Bhopal die every day—either adults who were exposed to the gas, or deformed newly-borns or children born prematurely. Even foetuses have been affected, today doctors are advising every woman who was pregnant at the time of the tragedy to undergo an abortion. Clearly, the catastrophic gas leak has converted Bhopal into a mini Hiroshima, and the brutal effects will be felt by the generations to come.

Medical experts in Bhopal today are waging a losing battle against an unknown disease and an unidentified poison. With their backs to the wall, the authorities in Bhopal have embarked on a cover-up operation. No results of the medical experiments being carried out on the affected persons have been made public. As a result, the victims of gas inhalation, relief workers and doctors themselves are confused about the repercussions of the tragedy. Only the sufferers among the survivors speak the truth.

Out of the total population of eight lakhs, nearly two lakh people in Bhopal are "MIC-affected." They are suffering from diseases like pulmonary tuberculosis, respiratory burns and disorders of the lung, the eyes, the liver, the kidney and the brain. Many ailing survivors may perish in the coming months. And that is not all. There are other effects of syndromes caused by exposure to the deadly toxic gas that are cause for further alarm and shock. Soon after 3 December, the effect of the gas on about 1,000 pregnant women living in the 16 areas of Bhopal which had been declared as "gas-affected" was feared. Doctors opined that negative effects of MIC gas on pregnant women would be most apparent in children born around May-June-July, since formation of the child is nearly complete after the first trimester (three months).

Records of births and deaths of infants in Bhopal have proved otherwise. The first case of deformed birth (suspected because of MIC exposure) was of a child born in Bilaspur's Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel Hospital. The mother of the child had been near the Union Carbide factory at the time of leakage and had been exposed to MIC. The child born to her by a Caesarean operation weighed 4.5 kg and had two gaping holes instead of eyes. The baby had no fingers and toes and the skin looked scorched. The birth of the "freak baby" was widely published though doctors and gynaecologists in Bhopal declared it a normal case of retarded growth. The Sultania Janana Hospital is among the largest women's hospitals in Bhopal. Between 20 and 30 infants are born in the hospital every day. According to junior gynaecologists and midwives at the hospital's maternity ward, the cases of premature or retarded birth among children being born are abnormally high in number. As many as 50 per cent of the children being born are either underweight, premature or have some physical deformity. Many of the children born have not survived. And, where the baby does survive it is in a precarious condition and has to be sent for emergency treatment to either the Hamidia Hospital or the Medical College Hospital. Sushila, aged 20, gave birth to a stillborn child on 29 March. A resident of Shahjahanabad Colony, Sushila had a difficult pregnancy ever since she was exposed to the MIC gas. She complained of restlessness, fatigue and breathlessness. After a prolonged labour a frail baby girl was born to Sushila. Before the baby's birth, senior gynaecologists had examined the mother with ultrasound equipment. The child that was born had a deformed head formation. The back of the child's head was an extended cyst-like formation and part of the skull was missing. This child too had scars and burn-marks all over its body. The baby died the day it was born. Said Sushila: "It is the gas that has killed my child. Ever since the time I inhaled the gas, the progress of the child was not normal. But the doctors told me nothing. They simply gave me medicines and injections."

Krishna Bai, a MIC gas victim, gave birth to a dead baby in Bhopal

Records of such abnormal births at the Sultania hospital or any other large hospital in Bhopal are not available. In this case though the case papers were not with the doctors on duty or with the parents, the gynae register recorded the birth as a case of "anencaphaly," that is when the head of the child is not formed. Entry No. 1335-465 states that the child was born at 7.05 am to Sushila, resident of Shahjahanabad Police Lines, Bhopal. The record also states the child was born after 36 weeks of pregnancy after an abnormally long labour. The mother of the child is "MIC-exposed." A look at the register reveals many more abnormal births to MIC exposed women in the past three months.

There are confirmed reports of births of other deformed children at Sultania Hospital. On 20 February, for example, three unnatural births took place in the maternity wards. One child was born without a skull, another with unformed limbs, while the third was born two months before completion of pregnancy. The last child had patches of blue skin and was born without hands. No record of any of these births is available. One such child born the same day is still surviving at the Railway Colony. The baby is covered with blue and black spots and senior doctors are believed to be visiting the house and monitoring the progress of the baby.

Reports of stillborn or abnormal births have also been received from private nursing homes and maternity clinics in Bhopal. Nurses at the Ghoois Nursing Home and Termination of Pregnancy Centre, Kalbala Road hesitantly disclosed details of such births. There was a high percentage of premature births and in the past two weeks at least three children had died because of deformities. Nurses also disclosed that a biochemistry team was presently undertaking research of all births and deaths at the centre. The team had been removing placentas of new born babies from the clinic for experiments.

Though no official announcement has been made in Bhopal about abnormal births after MIC exposure in mothers, gynaecologists have been advising pregnant women to have their pregnancies terminated if in an advanced stage. While doctors dealing with MIC cases are disinclined to establish a high percentage of unnatural births because of MIC exposure, a report published by the Indian Council of Medical Research on the "Health effects of toxic gas exposures at Bhopal" in January had clearly stated this. The report mentions: "During the acute period 36 pregnant women were hospitalised for symptoms of respiratory distress. Five of them aborted, of whom three were definitely attributable to MIC effect. Two expectant mothers died due to MIC effect. Of the 30 antenatal cases, ten were seriously affected and four of them had normal deliveries." It was suggested in the ICMR report that "a five year follow-up study be undertaken to find out morbidity referable to CVS and respiratory systems. There is a need to identify abortion rate among MIC-exposed women, the intrauterine growth retardation among the next generation of children..." It is obvious that the ICMR scientists suspect long-term effects of MIC gas on pregnant women and infants.

Why then are pregnant women not being cautioned against the odds they face in childbirth after being exposed to the MIC gas? Simple administration of serious and heavy doses of medicines to ailing and expectant mothers has only worsened the plight of pregnant women. What is worse, women who had inhaled the gas have been showing other symptoms. Clinics and dispensaries situated close to the Union Carbide factory, alongside Jayaprakash Nagar, Chhola Kenchi and Railway Colony, which were the worst-hit localities, have an increased number of women patients. Thousands of women exposed to MIC and undergoing treatment for exposure have complained of variation in menstrual cycles. Some women have complained of menstruation five times in the course of one month. Lactating mothers have repeatedly informed doctors about a reduction in milk and a change in the taste of the milk. On the other hand, MIC-affected men have together with general fatigue and poor body health complained of impotency.

An underweight baby born to a MIC gas victim in Bhopal

Many victims are being treated at the new 30-bed hospital set up to meet the unprecedented rise in cases of MIC exposure. Though the hospital (once the residence of the police DIG, Bhopal) is equipped with respirators and provides facilities in skinagraphy and pathological tests, prevailing conditions at the hospital are appalling. Over 500 cases of MIC exposure are being attended to by the small team of doctors at the hospital. In the last week of March the 30-bed hospital recorded a rise in the number of patients treated: more cases of MIC afflictions were reported. On 29 March, the hospital treated 900 cases of MIC-exposed victims, the highest so far.

The medical specialist treating MIC cases at the hospital Dr (Mrs) S. P. Verma said that treatment was being given to victims for respiratory disorders, fatigue, loss of appetite and pulmonary complications. Serious cases were being given regular doses of sodium thiosulphate, of which they had limited stocks. She also explained that a large number of the gas-affected victims coming from areas close to the Union Carbide factory were suffering from serious mental disorders. "Many of the patients seen by us have got severe mental disbalance. They are being given psychiatric treatment here," she said. Jaan Mohammed, a railway porter suffering from severe pulmonary complications and mental strain was cited as one such case. Said he: "How do we know what is going to happen the next time? This is the third time the factory has caused death. The next time the gas will kill all of us." The old porter, who had nearly been blinded by the gas and was witness to a previous gas leakage and a major fire at the Union Carbide plant close to his home, is in a state of mental trauma. Incapacitated and unwell, he sees the Union Carbide factory as a monster that has wrecked his life.

Of the two lakh Bhopal gas leakage victims undergoing treatment, 10 to 12 per cent have psychiatric complaints or are suffering from acute mental depression. This means 20,000 victims are on the point of mental derangement if they are not provided psychiatric treatment immediately. But, strangely, such treatment has not been started at all. This despite the fact that a team of

Scant Relief

Within hours of the gas leak in Bhopal, the government of Madhya Pradesh had announced relief for the victims of the gas tragedy. Rs 10,000 would be given to the family of each person dead, and 1,500 for each person who had suffered physically due to MIC poisoning. However, four months later, the relief given to the number of victims does not tally with the figures of those affected or killed. While the number of dead has been declared as 2,500, only in 900 cases has monetary relief been given. A list of 1,320 persons had been made after verification from hospital records and identification by the dead person's family. A second list of 123 persons is now ready. When will the victims left out in the first list receive their dues?

Take the case of Bihari Lal, a casual labourer, who has not received any payment from the government after the tragic death of his wife. "Nobody listens to us. I have tried to meet the chief minister for my money, but the government has killed us without poison." The wife of Bihari Lal, Halki Bai, was admitted to the hospital in a critical condition after inhaling the gas and died soon after she was discharged. The death certificate with Bihari Lal clearly states his wife was killed because of MIC poisoning. Though details of his wife's death have been taken from him, on enquiry he was told the file had been sent from the collector's office where his name had been listed, to the local police station for further verification. At the police station the file was declared missing. Bihari Lal is himself suffering from severe effects of MIC exposure and is one of the hundreds of poverty-stricken victims of MIC exposure who have been ignored by the authorities during distribution of relief.

There are reports that the payment of relief money has been handled in a careless manner. Dozens of victims have not received the full amount of relief and there are others who, impersonating as relatives of dead persons, have received payments instead. Officers at the collector's office, however, claimed that all relief payments had been done in an orderly fashion and there had been no scope for irregular payments since all victims had been given crossed cheques for Rs 10,000.

The role of the various voluntary relief organisations in providing rehabilitation of MIC-affected victims has caused some amount of confusion and controversy. There are very few associations and organisations which have done substantial amount of work among the gas victims. One such active group which has been working in Bhopal is the Nagarik Rahat Punarwas Committee headed by Tapan Bose, the famous producer of the documentary film on the Bhagalpur blindings, An Indian Story. The committee has been very active in relief operations and Tapan Bose has succeeded in filming the entire sequence of the tragedy from the time of 'Operation Faith.' The film was shown to thousands of victims on 12 March, the 100th day of the disaster. The 80-minute film has the commentary of noted film actor, Naseeruddin Shah, and is a poignant recapitulation of the horror that is evident in Bhopal today.

The Kishore Bharati and its president, noted researcher and scholar, Anil Sadgopal, is the other active social service group. Members of the Kishore Bharati have been advocating the use of sodium thiosulphate on MIC victims without exception. Only recently, activists of the Kishore Bharati staged a dharna at the hospitals where MIC victims were being treated, demanding administration of sodium thiosulphate. Similar demonstrations and protest rallies have been organised by other relief organisations, namely the Zaharili Gas Kand Morcha, the Medico Friends Circle and Saheli for whom Bhopal has become a fertile ground for fighting injustice and oppression.

Ritu Sarin, Bhopal

psychiatrics had visited Bhopal in December and had made important observations about the mental health of the victims. The team included Prof. D. B. Sethi, chief psychiatrist at the K.G. Medical College, Lucknow and Dr D. Shrinivasa Moor of the National Institute of Mental Health and Neurosciences, Bangalore. The report of the team had concluded with these words: "Symptoms of anxiety and depression are foremost among the patients but it is difficult to say if these are just emotional reactions on the effect of the character."

Instances of mental disability among gas victims are rising. In the orphanage set up by the government, two children had received early psychiatric treatment. The children are still in a state of deep shock. They were separated from their families in the night of 3 December and now are on the point of lunacy. One of the young boys' speech has been impaired since the day the gas escaped. No psychiatric or neurological treatment is now being given to either of them, or in fact to any of the thousands for whom the events following the leakage have become a continuing nightmare and who have lost their near and dear ones.

The tragedy of Bhopal's victims is that having fallen prey to MIC, they have become targets of medical experiments and haphazard treatment. As Dr Arya Lohia, medical officer of UCIL, explained, at the time of the tragedy not a single death had occurred in any part of the world because of MIC exposure before. The Union Carbide Corporation (UCC) in the USA has evidence of treatment given to 86 MIC-affected persons over the years, but none of the persons exposed to the gas had either died or been seriously affected.

Soon after 3 December, the main point of contention was whether the victims should be administered sodium thiosulphate, an antidote for cyanide poisoning, or not. This controversy has not been sorted out till date even though sodium thiosulphate is being administered to some victims. The remote possibility of there being cyanide poisoning in MIC-affected persons was first discovered by Dr H. Chandra, head of the forensic department, Hamidia hospital, where autopsies of all persons killed by MIC exposure were conducted. The prognosis of Dr Chandra was that the blood of those persons killed was cherry-red, as in the case of cyanide poisoning. (In the 1976 report on methyl isocynate, printed by the Union Carbide, it is stated that thermal decomposition of MIC may produce hydrogen cyanide.)

Immediate administration of sodium thiosulphate to all victims was recommended if cyanide poisoning had taken place. The chairman of UCC, Warren Anderson, who visited Bhopal hours after the gas escaped brought with him sufficient supplies of this drug. A German toxicologist, Dr Max Daunderer arrived in Bhopal on 7 December with large supplies of sodium thiosulphate. Still the antidote was not given to the victims. A few days later, when news of suspected cyanide poisoning in Bhopal was known internationally, a representative of UCC himself recommended the use of sodium thiosulphate. Within a week of the tragedy, Dr Bipin Avashia, an Indian working as medical director of the Charlson plant of Union Carbide, USA, sent a telex message to the Bombay, Delhi and Bhopal offices of the company: "If cyanide poisoning is suspected use amly nitrite. If no effect use sodium nitrite 0.3 gms and sodium thiosulphate 12.5 gms." Says Dr Chandra, "The telex message was a clear admission that the Union Carbide's parent company itself suspected MIC to have decomposed into cyanide, the reason for the cherry-red blood in the dead persons' bodies."

The "miraculous antidote" was eventually administered to critical MIC cases on 14 February, more than two months after thousands had died an instant death. (80 per cent of the deaths in Bhopal following the gas leak took place outside hospitals; only 438 deaths are recorded in the various hospitals on 3 and 4 December.) Hundreds of lives could have been saved if the injections had been administered to victims at an earlier stage. But what is more surprising is that even after the reaction of sodium thiosulphate on at least 50 per cent of the victims has been found to be satisfactory, the intravenous injection is not being administered in a regulated manner. Instead of the stipulated dose of 12.5 gms, some victims are being given doses of only 1.5 gms of the antidote. At least 1,000 persons who are among the worst affected should have been given sodium thiosulphate regularly. However, not more than 500 victims are reported to have received it. With limited stocks available (20,000 vials were received in January), there are allegations that only very critical cases or influential patients are being given the injection. Panna Lal, 55, a resident of Chhola Mandi, one of the worst hit areas, complained bitterly about not receiving adequate medical attention. He showed the prescription he received from the Hamidia Hospital and records of previous treatment given to him. "Ever since the gas escaped it has become a living death for me. I reach the hospital with great difficulty every day and after waiting for hours the doctors simply say the injections are over. But I can see that they are giving the injections to other people," he moaned.

A mother who had been exposed to MIC with her new-born child at a hospital

'A Special Court is Needed to Deal With the Bhopal Tragedy'

Hans Raj Bhardwaj, union minister of state for law, told SUNDAY

Q: Precious time has been lost in sorting out the issue of compensation for the victims of the Bhopal gas tragedy. Has the law ministry any plans to expedite relief for the victims?

A: The government has been keen to tackle this problem and soon after I came to the ministry, the attorney general K. Parasan and Justice P.N. Bhagwati of the Supreme Court and I went to Bhopal to assess the situation. We wanted to make sure that the best legal aid and advice is rendered to the victims of this tragedy. There was a suggestion made to us that we will get better compensation in the United States as compared to India because the law of torts and damages in India is not strong in the matter of quantity of compensation. Keeping that in view, we sent the attorney general to the United States and wanted him to report back to us on these issues. He has since come back to India and on 31 January submitted his report. In the confidential report presented to the government he has made certain suggestions.

I have my own views on this case and the government has to take a decision on the matter. We have studied in detail the report submitted by the attorney general and have also looked into various representations that have come to us from American and Indian lawyers regarding this case.

Q: Is it not true that for several weeks after the tragedy, victims and public at large were confused and misled about the legalities of the case. This was specially so when several American lawyers descended upon Bhopal and promised the victims fantastic sums of money as compensation. The victims did not know what their role was going to be if they appointed an American lawyer, what the lawyer's cut from the compensation would be and in fact, some victims who have appointed American lawyers do not even have the lawyer's names and addresses. Why didn't the government take steps to stop such exploitation and create an awareness among the victims?

A: You are correct that there was some confusion. I do not know what ensued before the new ministry took over, but I know that when we took office, our first priority was to attend to this case and to solve the legal tangle. Earlier, of course, Bhopal was flooded by American lawyers and they created an impression among the victims that they will get them huge amounts as compensation. Under the impact of tragedy, the victims, mostly simple people gave the American lawyers "wakalatnama" and power of attorney without ascertaining what they were going to do for them. It is a fact that American lawyers came to Bhopal to earn their briefs. So the moment we learnt about all this, we took notice, went to Bhopal, discussed matters with the state government there. We said that if the law of the land is inadequate why cannot we legislate the law for our own people? We should solve our own problems and if the law falls short of the challenge, we should amend it and legislate a new law. Also, if Parliament is not in session, we can issue an ordinance. So at present, I want to have an ordinance promulgated for setting up special courts, vested with special powers to deal with this exigency and I am sure that very soon we will set up a court in India where a claim will be filed for and on behalf of the victims by the state itself and we will see to it that Union Carbide responds to it and submits to the jurisdiction of Indian courts. I find it difficult to reconcile to a situation where we submit to a foreign court and leave everything in the hands of foreigners. I feel very concerned about the plight of the victims.

Interviewed by Ritu Sarin

The government, in spite of such complaints, has not created sufficient public awareness of the deteriorating medical state of MIC victims. On 27 March, the chief minister, Motilal Vora, made a detailed statement in the Vidhan Sabha about the tragedy, listing the various relief measures adopted by the government for the victims: "The state government has laid out about Rs 10 crore for providing relief and treatment. A sum of Rs 1.87 crore has been received from the Chief Minister's Relief Fund to help those affected by the gas tragedy." The statement also claims it is the responsibility of the government to "the present generation and the coming generation that all possible compensation be given for whatever unfortunate has happened."

The developments in Bhopal, now on the world map of disasters, are being closely watched. Physical effects of methyl isocyanate on human beings are being analysed in laboratories in India and abroad. Children born with physical signs of gas exposure are being kept under strict observation. Though authorities are not willing to admit daily deaths by MIC exposure, records at the cremation grounds near the affected areas disclose that a high percentage of deaths taking place in Bhopal are a result of MIC exposure. At the Shri Vishwa Ghat, the largest cremation ground near the Union Carbide factory, out of 73 persons cremated in March, the death register records 20 deaths due to "MIC gas exposure." At least four of these cases are of stillborn children, with visible signs of gas exposure. Is this not proof enough that the death and disease syndrome at Bhopal is continuing?

There is soon to be an explosion of literature and writings on the catastrophe at Bhopal. One hundred different books are being authored by eminent environmentalists, scientists and toxicologists who landed in Bhopal in the weeks following the disaster. One of the first such literary works examining the genesis and consequences of the tragedy is to be released soon. The book, The Cloud Over Bhopal—Causes, Consequences and Constructive Solutions has been authored by eminent environmentalist Dr Alfred Degrazia, who has written ten books on international disasters. Dr Degrazia described the Bhopal tragedy as a "treachery on the people of Bhopal, a disaster which is feared to have worse consequences than the Hiroshima bomb blast." According to him if the quantity of gas which leaked would have been sprayed over Bhopal, the entire population could have been eliminated. Now, he says, Bhopal has become a testing ground for experiments. The victims, he felt, are being treated as if they have an existence without spirits or souls.

Ritu Sarin, Bhopal

COVER STORY

Bhopal: The Dangers Ahead

Studies done by independent organisations reveal the grave health problems which Bhopal's population has to face in the future

Contrary to the assurances given in Parliament by the government about the state of health of the people in Bhopal after the gas leak from the Union Carbide factory, studies done by independent medical sources reveal grave problems for the population, living primarily in slum areas. A group of doctors from the Bangalore based Medico Friends Circle which visited Bhopal two months after the tragedy found the most shocking state of neglect. For instance, in spite of clear evidence of cyanide poisoning from 2 December, the administration of the known specific antidote, sodium thiosulfate was banned. Only after a fatal lapse of two months has this decision been officially reversed and even today clear guidelines for its administration to patients have not been issued, nor is the injection yet being made available in the quantity required for massive detoxification of the affected population.

Union Carbide (India) or Union Carbide (USA), should have immediately airlifted sodium thiosulfate to India because it is not manufactured here. But whether deliberately or not, they failed to do so. Even today, according to Dr Hiresh Chandra of Bhopal, who did the autopsy on the dead, there is not enough of this antidote available. The question that remains unanswered is why Union Carbide officials in the USA did not acknowledge immediately that it was cyanide poisoning, when they were aware of it. Why had they repeatedly claimed that the gas was harmless and not a killer?

On 15 March, full three months after the tragedy Union Carbide announced an in-depth programme to study the toxicological effects of over-exposure to methyl isocynate (MIC). The Carbide vice-president for health, safety and environmental affairs, Mr Jackson Browning, said that the corporation plans to expand on previous research programmes on the effects of MIC on animals and it will take six months to complete it. While announcing this he admitted that the corporation did have a good deal of information available on the acute and short-term exposure to toxicological properties of MIC. He said this information, previously made available to the US regulatory authorities, has also been communicated to the Indian Council of Medical Research (ICMR).

The point here is. If the previous studies were available, why did the Union Carbide authorities not fly down the only antidote for cyanide poisoning? Surely these studies revealed the possibility of cyanide poisoning in the event of such a leak. Mr Browning seems to be on the trail of a big cover-up operation, saying that Union Carbide will now sponsor a metabolism study in animals to evaluate whether a single large exposure to MIC can, for example, lead to the generation of cyanide. They claim that there is no known biological mechanism by which MIC inhalation could result in cyanide poisoning within the animal or human body. Browning brazenly expresses doubts about the reports "from India that a number of deaths did not appear to be associated with MIC over-exposures but rather were suggestive of cyanide poisoning among other possibilities."

Another grievous complaint is that crucial information about the nature of the gas as well as the findings of the autopsy were withheld from the medical community as well as the public by both Union Carbide and the government, incapacitating the attending doctors and creating unnecessary fear among the people. Even more devious was the information fed by medical officers of Union Carbide, Dr Jaeger of the World Health Organisation and the Ishwardas Committee of the government of Madhya Pradesh, in the form of statements to the press like, "There is no evidence of cyanide poisoning" and, "Only lungs and eyes have been affected."

Two months after the tragedy, according to the Medico Friends Circle, the following complaints persisted:

- A large number continued to suffer from blurring of vision and intolerance to bright light, preventing them from pursuing their occupations.
- Thousands of people have developed chronic lung diseases as a sequel to the gas exposure and it seems that they will be permanently handicapped. Records of selected patients subjected to sensitive lung function tests show definite abnormalities suggesting both 'obstructive' (where air passages are obstructed) and 'restrictive' (where the lungs are unable to expand due to fibrosis) lesions. X-ray evidence of fibrosis is also now becoming apparent.
- People also suffer on a large scale from gastritis, fever and psychological stress of varying severity.

Most disturbing, however, is the study done on the epidemic of gynaecological diseases by Dr Rani Bang and Dr Mira Sadgopal. According to them, while a lot of attention is being devoted to the ill-effects of the Bhopal gas leak on the general population, silence is being maintained in the area of women's health. Women have been complaining of a variety of problems, but not much notice is being taken either by the government or the medical teams. The two doctors say there is an urgent need to inform pregnant women about the possible risk of deformed babies and make available to them the choice of medical termination of pregnancy (MTP).

A study was made on 24 women in Kazi camp and 31 from Jayaprakash Nagar who registered during the first hour with the clinic voluntarily. Pelvic examination was done in 33 women only as the remaining 22 did not want to be examined for various reasons like unmarried status, advanced pregnancy, etc. Their findings were:

- White vaginal discharge in 37 women of which 33 had this symptom since exposure to the gas.
- Excessive menstrual bleeding in 19 women out of which 17 had it since the gas exposure.
- Pain in lower abdomen in 16 women, all since the gas exposure.

• In two cases, husbands were rendered impotent since the gas exposure.

The most consistent abnormal findings were:

• Discharge from the vagina which was typically profuse, thick, whitish yellow without any foul smell or local irritation. This was unlike any commonly found vaginal discharge of infective origin.
• Retroverted (backward bending) position of the uterus with severely restricted mobility for 21 out of 33 (64 per cent) women who allowed vaginal examination. Normally retroverted uterus is found in 10 to 25 per cent of women and a normal uterus is mobile.
• Adnexae (structures around uterus like tubes, ovary, etc.) palpable in 25, impalpable in eight, tender in 25 (painful on examination) and non-tender in eight. Normally adnexae is not palpable and tender
• Cervical erosion (ulcer on the cervix) and/or endocervicitis in 22 women.
• The uterus was of normal size in all the non-pregnant women except in the case of one woman who had a doubtful fibroid uterus.

Among the women examined two had abortions and two had still births following the gas exposure. Sixteen were pregnant of whom one had an incomplete infected abortion and two had clinical suspicion of intrauterine growth and retardation of the foetus. What was criminal on the part of the government and the medical relief teams was the fact that none of them told the pregnant women of the possibility of the risk of deformed babies or was given the option of MTP. The total number of lactating women at the time of gas exposure was 14, of which eight suffered from suppression of lactation by a degree of 50 to 75 per cent, while six were unaffected.

The two doctors found that even attending gynaecologists seemed ignorant of the connection of gas with pelvic inflammatory disease (PID). They argued that it was the result of pre-existing tuberculosis in the slum women. However, Doctors Bang and Sadgopal say that tuberculosis pelvic inflammatory disease usually constitutes only five per cent of the cases. It is non-tender and is usually associated with infertility and reduced menstruation. Absence of all these features in the women examined ruled out this, PID being of tuberculosis origin.

The women, particularly in the slum areas, have a major problem but no one seems to be sympathetic towards them. They tend to dismiss them as fake complaints.

A weak,deformed child born after the gas tragedy, with her mother at a hospital in Bhopal

While the government and even the ICMR have been accused of keeping the findings to themselves, Union Carbide (India) and its parent company in the USA have played a more devious role. Its crowning act of criminality against the poor people of Bhopal is that three months after the tragedy and only after exposure by the Indian press about its deliberate neglect and ineptitude, the American giant multinational announces studies on the effects of MIC and even doubts the issues raised in the Indian press. Among the so-called studies announced by Browning is one on: "Evaluating the condition of animals at various points in time after a single, large exposure to methyl isocynate with specific emphasis on the respiratory function. This should answer questions raised in India as to whether or how long any irritation from MIC exposure exists, whether there is any likelihood of delayed effects and provide information from which physicians can decide the most appropriate treatment."

For whose benefit is this? Was this not thought of earlier? Are they planning another leak at the Bhopal factory so they can use the findings of their belated study? Or, are they planning some leaks from the old factory of Union Carbide in Bombay which is being bought by Mr Dhirubhai Ambani of Reliance Textiles. Can we rely on Union Carbide any more—whether it is in Bombay or in Bhopal?

Olga Tellis, Bombay

CONVERSATION

"I WANT TO LOVE EVERYBODY"

General H.M. Ershad talks to M.J. Akbar

If sincerity was enough to solve problems, Bangladesh would be much better off today that is, both in terms of economic development and political evolution. General Husain Muhammad Ershad tells anyone who will listen that he wants to leave behind a Bangladesh richer than he inherited and a political system rid of coups, unstable governments and a nervous shouting match with democracy. Does a man whose power devolves essentially from the colour of his uniform mean it? Anyone who is a poet can't really be a Machiavelli, can he? You may or may not like the general's poetry, but he does concentrate on love, peace, and a new world freed of hunger and oppression. However, the opposition parties of Bangladesh are less than impressed. The difficult dialogue between the government and the political parties has been continuing for a while now, but the search for a mutually acceptable political system seems as far from success as ever. General Ershad wants to guarantee a place for the armed forces in the power structure: that is the only way to stop coups, he insists. The political parties will not accept any conditional version of democracy. They are demanding elections without any interference from the army, and the assurance that power will be handed over without any qualifications to the party which gets a majority. When the talks broke down, General Ershad decided to circumvent the political parties and go directly to the people through the tried method of a referendum. It was an exercise in the quest for legitimacy: the opposition answer was to boycott the poll held on 21 March. The official results showed an overwhelming victory for General Ershad, but its credibility was in doubt. General Ershad spoke to M.J. Akbar just after the results had been declared, in the drawing room of his residence in the cantonment area of Dhaka.

President H.M. Ershad talking to Mark Fineman, South Asia Correspondent of the Philadelphia Enquirer at the golf course in Dhaka

Q It seems, Mr President, that the most significant thing that has happened since we last met is that you have become totally disillusioned with your country's politicians. Is that a correct assessment?*

A: I shouldn't say disillusioned, I would rather say disappointed. Many of them are old politicians, many of them took part in the liberation war, and I am sure all of them love the country. But in the last year-and-a-half or so we expected a little more from them. We thought that the political process which we had started will culminate in general elections, we will have an elected Parliament. Unfortunately, though I have been meeting their demands one after another, they refused to come to elections. I fail to understand why. The military rule? What I have not done for them! The concessions I gave to the political parties—you will not find such an example anywhere in the world. Unfortunately, they thought it my weakness, and they kept on pressing harder and harder. And they have brought the country to a state where, I should say, the law and order situation deteriorated so much that no government worth the name could stand it any more. Therefore, the whole process we started, which we thought will end in elections, was frustrated.

Q: Why do you think the civilians refused the option of proving that they were stronger than you through an election?

A: First, these politicians should have understood that this military government is not a foreign military government. This military government had to come because they failed. And you must be knowing that when we assumed the responsibility in 1982, the whole country welcomed us. The whole country. And we actually received a lot of congratulatory messages thanking the armed forces for saving the country.

Q: But that is only an assumption on your part.

A: No. There was no opposition (to the takeover). All political activity is open. The political parties were very much there. But I do not think anywhere in Bangladesh that day anybody opposed the takeover. Therefore, the country was at such a stage when I took over that people appreciated (the coup). After that, more than three years have passed. I have taken a lot of measures and by those measures I think the country has benefited. Now, I keep on telling them (the political parties), that we are one of you. We are not a foreign army, we are not a Pakistani army or any other army. We fought for the liberation of this country. And you forced us to takeover. Now let us sit down and decide the future course of action. Let us see what can be done for the creation of an elected government, an elected Parliament. Therefore, whatever they do to oust the military government: where will the military government go? We cannot sit on a ship and go to Pakistan and Karachi. We have to stay here. This is our country. Therefore, their very assumption was not correct.

President Ershad at a Dhaka orphanage

Q: Maybe they thought the military had become very unpopular and any deal with the military would affect their credibility with the people.

A: They just assumed that the military government is unpopular. See how contradictory they are. They say, 'You are very unpopular, your government is very unpopular.' At the same time they say, 'You cannot preach for any candidate.' So I said, if I am unpopular, and my government is unpopular, then if I support somebody he should also be unpopular. The political parties are telling two things. That means the military is not unpopular

Q: You know, in some of your recent statements there is almost a quality of contempt for politicians.

A: As a man I want to respect everybody. I want to love everybody. And we have grown up in a society where elders are respected and we still maintain that, I especially, because those values are very important for us. We may not be rich otherwise, but we are very rich from that point of view. But the way they (the political parties) behaved, the way they destroyed public peace, property, and the good name of the country—I do not just understand why they did it. Is it only power? Is it only position? Or is it something else? Therefore, I feel that when they should have shown leadership, and convinced all political parties to come to an understanding for election, they failed to do so. And if as a political leader you cannot assume the leadership and convince others who were against

I don't want to have any enemy. I never suffered because of this philosophy. Many people said many things against me, but ultimately they came to me again. So that's the way I think we should live. I believe in that way. And ultimately, by love you win over everybody...

I think I am the greatest friend of India.

the election, then what sort of leader are you? That is why I feel they failed in their task. Of course, whatever they wanted I did.

Q: Now, if they are so bad, so harmful to the country, why do you want them back in the government?

A: They failed at one time, they may not fail the next time. But, they should be told that they failed. They must also understand that they must come up to the expectations of the people. They must rise.

Q: Your nation has had two spells of really civilian government—under Sheikh Mujib and later on in the post-Zia period, and both

Teeing off: Ershad golfing at the Kurmitola Club

As a man, Rajiv Gandhi seems to be very nice: more or less same nature as mine. And I thought that he will be able to solve this (problems)...

times the experience was curtailed by military intervention. How do you feel about civilian rule in Bangladesh?

A: We are a new country. Trials, tribulations, ups and downs, will always be there. We are a country of a hundred million people, a country without resources. And then we are born of a bloody revolution, of a bloody liberation war. You can't expect that the country will be running very smoothly. And you can't expect the leader to leave everything to the people. It is difficult. There are many aspirations of the people which cannot be fully fulfilled. But even then they tried their best. And we were making progress. Many things happened; probably some of the things could not be helped. For example, in 1974 during Sheikh Mujib's regime there were floods, and maybe they had no resources to combat it. Maybe they failed to do so. But it does not mean that he did not want to do it. That is how it was.

Q: Now one of the first things that you did when you came to power was launch a campaign against corruption. Do you think that among Bangladesh politicians, the idealism of the liberation war is now over and they have become purchasable?

A: I do not want to blame my predecessors. But I think that is ample proof that politicians can be bought. But of course I did not do that; otherwise I wouldn't have had this trouble. Anyway, this is not an aspersion on them. The question is that in a society like this where resources are limited and so many people ask for more and more—naturally that element of corruption creeps into the society. I shouldn't say, I cannot make a general statement that the politicians are corrupt, but in a developing nation some elements of corruption are there in society. You cannot eliminate it.

Q: There are rumours in Dhaka, and I say that there are rumours, that there was a deal on the anvil between you and the Awami League, a deal which was based on the Awami League demanding Taka four crores in order to come to terms with you.

A: Please do not insult a political party like that.

Q: I said they are rumours.

A: They are an old political party, and this is very unfortunate. I do not accept these things. You can blame me. You should not blame a political party like that. We had contacted all political parties, and we thought they will come to elections. Naturally, we are in communication with them, and we have been asking them, what do you need to participate in elections? They said, we need this, we need that; you do this, you do that. And we tried to fulfil all their demands one after another. At any time if the Awami League or the BNP were very near to participating in elections, that did not mean that they were to be paid money. No question about it.

Q: Was there talk about the number of seats that would be allotted to the political parties?

A: These are the crooked minds which work to spread these rumours, just to undermine some political party which was talking to the government. Or any political party or any persons talking to the government for a better understanding or relations. These are unfounded rumours. These are not true. It is very unfortunate that some people are so vicious as to spread this sort of rumour. Political parties have honour and dignity.

Q: One of the realities of democratic politics, since we are on this subject, is that when political parties prepare for elections, they need a certain amount of financing in order to put up 300 candidates or 400 candidates. And one of the needs of political parties, which you were talking about, is money. How can such money ever come to a political party without some form of corruption?

A: (Laughs) I do not run a political party. But you are right. To fight elections, you need money. And therefore when I took over in the beginning I proposed that we all should sit down and decide how many political parties will be there in the country, and whether these political parties can be financed by the government or not. A definite budget every year, so that they do not have to resort to any corruption, or go door-to-door to collect money. But that of course can only happen after a Parliament is elected. Now, we have something like 72 political parties. Why can't we have three or four political parties like other countries? And then the government can say, okay, you have a one crore budget, and spend this money to organise your party, and fight future elections. And thus we can make the whole thing very civilised. But you are right. They all need money. Every political party needs money, and this is not a good practice.

Q: You too have a political party. How do you finance your political party?

A: I do not have a political party. I said, any political party that supports me has my support.

Q: But how is that financed?

A: I do not know. You ask the secretary general of the party. (Laughs).

Q: Now, one of the charges made against civilian governments is that discipline collapses. You said that progress is hampered and you have done more in three years.

A: No, I was talking about the recent political activities. They (turned freedom into) licence. The way the students were behaving, the way the other political parties and workers were behaving—you know they made life miserable. Totally. So this sort of thing we don't expect from political parties. There are norms within which they should function, but they really went beyond it. That's what I mentioned. Not about the past discipline of the society. Where there is politics there is always some indiscipline. Look what is happening in India and all nations. But we are a developing nation—we thought that at least they would function keeping everything to a certain limit. Things really went beyond. People got really scared in this country. Their lives and property were not secure.

Q: One of the charges that has been made or one of the suspicions that certainly exists, is that foreign powers are trying to finance or control some Bangladesh political parties. Do you find evidence of that?

A: I cannot emphatically say 'yes', but I cannot also say 'no'. That's the problem in this country. If we have three or four political parties, then we can see into it. I tried to control it. I said that any foreign money coming to this country has to be deposited in the ERD first, and distributed. Not only political parties ...

Q: ERD?

A: External Resources Division. Not only political parties, there are many voluntary organisations who get money from outside and we do not know how they spend this money. But the money to political parties, if it is at all coming, comes through the back door. And I said that I have no evidence, but at the same time I can say, from the way the political parties spend, they are being financed from outside. This is very unfortunate. But it does happen.

Q: Do you suspect India of giving money to any political party?

I am making roads for villagers... If that is corruption, I will do that corruption throughout my life.

General Ershad visiting a flood-affected area in Comilla district

A: They should give it to me if at all they give it (laughs heartily). Because I think I am the greatest friend of India, so they don't have to give it to somebody else (continues laughing).

Q: (After the laughter is over) But seriously do you suspect India or USA or China of having a role in this?

A: I would not say that. It is too direct.

Q: The opposition parties have accused you of making too many liberal offers in your speeches—that roads will be built, of giving handouts, of creating a political base for yourself by using state resources How do

What I have not done for them (the country's politicians)! The concessions I gave to the political parties—you will not find such an example anywhere in the world. Unfortunately, they thought it was my weakness...

you react to that charge?

A: I am not making a road in my house; I am making roads for villagers which they need very badly. If that is corruption, I will do that corruption throughout my life. Building a road, poor chaps they are asking for roads. Why the hell didn't you do it? Asking for a bridge, asking for a school, asking for a college, asking for a hospital—what's wrong in it? If as a President I cannot do it, why should I remain President of this country? That is development, isn't it?

Q: Would you describe yourself as a soft dictator?

A: I was never a dictator. I am the most democratic-minded man. I don't think anybody who has been here from 1972 to 1982—I don't think any political party enjoyed more democratic rights than it has enjoyed during my time. Press freedom, elections.

Q: Do you think there is press freedom in the country?

A: Press freedom! There is press licence, not only freedom. They could write anything and everything. You just look at the papers before the first of March, go through it. From top to bottom in some of the papers, there was just abuse of the government, nothing else. Including me. We thought gradually things will settle down. You know, I tell you with great pride, it is settling down. Initially they (the press) were very hostile. I said, write anything you like. And then they really saw reason and gradually settled down, and things were improving. But even then, a few newspapers, few means very few—they were printing provocative news, inciting people. One example I can give you. One student was killed, late at night. Nobody knew who had killed whom. The newspaper next day accused a party which has a leaning towards the government. Result? The students went and burnt the hall. This was news which was inciting the students, inciting the public. This is very destructive. This is not proper journalism. And then giving a verdict—you can't give a verdict in a newspaper. Someone is murdered in Kaligunge and the newspaper gives a verdict that so and so is murdered and so-and-so should be hanged. Even the police is not sure of the murderer, but the newspaper knows. There is a procedure. Somebody is to be arrested, interrogated, FIR lodged, case has to go to the court and the judges will give the verdict. Here, a newspaper gives the verdict. This is not correct.

Q: But, honestly, looking at the Dhaka press, it does not seem as if it has too much freedom.

A: Now, yes; after first of March we said, 'No.' I will gradually release the restrictions. And they will write anything. I don't mind criticism. I tell them, please tell me what I am doing wrong. Yes, criticise my government, my policies, my actions; constructive criticism is always welcome because that helps the government. When I sit in the cabinet, for the first one hour I look at the newspaper cuttings. For the first one hour, we discuss the newspaper clippings and then I tell the ministers, 'You please correct this or that.' After that we begin the normal cabinet work. I give a lot of weightage to newspaper reports. Lot of weightage.

Q: I am sure journalists will be quite delighted to learn that.

A: They know it. Every day, the first one hour I discuss the newspaper cuttings. Because, every fact cannot come to my notice. That is very difficult. The other day, there was a letter to the editor in Bangladesh Times: In Dhaka contractors used to supply bricks, now the government is supplying them. Here the complaint was that the bricks had been supplied by the government from the old stocks, and a contractor got the money—a major share. I straightaway started an enquiry.

Q: Of the main leaders opposed to you, the ladies Hasina and Khaleda, who do you think is stronger politically?

A: (Laughs) It is for you to decide, how can I say?

Q: I am only a visitor for a few days. You have been dealing with them, you know your country better.

A: To me they are both political leaders and I should not say somebody is better, somebody is worse.

Q: But you had experience in dealing with both. Who do you think has more political support?

A: Political support can only be known

President talks to an old woman during his tour of the Bangladesh countryside through an election, isn't it? Only people can say who has more support. I cannot say so.

Q: The opposition, however, does seem to have a point when it says that democracy is really not possible until the army decides, in principle, to leave power. And you have not accepted that point.

A: Leave power to whom?

Q: Leave power to a civilian government, whoever the people might elect.

A: How do I do that?

Q: By an election outside the bounds of a martial law.

A: There is no question of martial law: (let us have) elected everything. But martial law has to be there, till the results are out. Nobody wanted that martial law should be withdrawn And I also declared that me and my government is going to be neutral in the elections. But the election has to be held under martial law, because there is no Constitution.

Q: But are you personally ready to surrender power?

A: Can I give you an example?

Q: Yes, please.

A: The first thing is that there is no power in Bangladesh, just all responsibility. Totally. From morning six o'clock to next morning six o'clock, only responsibility. And the whole responsibility is the President's.

Number two: when I declared the first election, it was a special election. They said, no, they would not allow a special election because if the President is elected he can always influence the Parliament So I said, let us have the presidential and parliamentary elections together when nobody will influence anyone else. This was on 27th of May 1984. At that time there was no political party supporting me. So, the President offering a parliamentary election, without a political party's support—doesn't it amply show that he had no intention of clinging to power?

Q: No, but you have always kept a rider that the army has to have a role in the future structure of power.

A: Army will have no role.

Q: That itself negates democracy?

A: No, it doesn't You are talking like a colonial. The Bangladesh army and the Indian army is not the same army. It is a different army in a small country. The question is, that the army has a role in government; why? There have been 18 mutinies in the army. Have you tried to analyse why these 18 mutinies have taken place?

Q: Why?

A: Because our army fought for independence. We broke our oath and fought for our country's liberation. We cannot stand by and watch the country we helped create slide down. We want to build the nation too; give us a place.

Q: One of the ideological shifts that have taken place after the army took over is the stress on Islamisation. Are you taking the country towards fundamentalism? And is that a problem in better relations with India?

President Ershad addressing a public meeting on the outskirts of Dhaka

A: No, not at all. You must understand Islam in our country's context. It is quite different. We are not radical, we are not asking for any fundamentalist sort of a thing. What do we want? We want Islamic teaching to go down to our young people, so that the vices of our society, which are now gradually increasing, can be checked. And this, you yourself would know, Islam is a code of life, and we try to preach it and implement it. There is nothing more than that. That does not come in the way of good relations with India; not at all

Q: Would you call Bangladesh an Islamic state?

A: No. Bangladesh is not an Islamic state. Bangladesh is a country where a majority of the people are Muslims, and the way of life of this majority is Islam. From that point of view we are a Muslim state But there are other religions also. And we really enjoy complete communal harmony. There are very, very good relations among the people

Q: But this suspicion of India as a kind of threat: what is the reason for that?

A: We have certain problems, and these problems are not being solved by India. Why? These problems cannot remain unresolved so long. What is reason? Why do Indians do it?

Q: What do you think? What is your view?

A: That's what we fail to understand. Do they want that we should be a vassal state of India? Do they want that they should have a say in our affairs? That is the suspicion in the minds of the people. Otherwise in the

When I sit in the cabinet, for the first one hour, I look at newspaper cuttings. For the first one hour, we discuss the newspaper clippings and then I tell the ministers, 'You please correct this or that...' I give a lot of weightage to newspaper reports.

I was never a dictator. I am the most democratic-minded man. I don't think anybody who has been here from 1972 to 1982—I don't think any political party enjoyed more democratic rights than it has enjoyed during my time.

last 14 years, since the question of reversion, water sharing could not be done. Why? The water belongs to Bangladesh since the creation of the earth. Why today because different states have been created, should we be deprived of this water? It is a very big question in the minds of our people. What is there? We are not saying, give all the water to us. As a matter of fact it is our right. We are lower riparian, we should get the water. Even then, we said let's share it. You are not even ready to share it. So what will people think about you?

Q: But despite the fact that the agreement has not been renewed, the supply of water has not been stopped by India in the dry season.

A: Yes, by your mercy. An independent nation cannot be at somebody's mercy. It must be a basis of sovereign equality. We may be a small country, but we are a nation This is an insult to us. Okay, we are giving you water? That is not correct. The water belongs to us also.

Q: Do you think the people of Delhi—after all, equations are built up very much in terms of gestures also—do you think Delhi is very happy when it hears anti-India rhetoric emanating from the Dhaka press?

A: Dhaka press? Anti-India rhetoric? The press is very free. I didn't see anything of this sort. Your papers also write such things. But all the press is not like that. Perhaps some radical press, or some fundamentalist may write against India. But that is not the view of the Bangladesh people.

Q: But Bangladesh Times? They wrote that Indian behaviour is uncivilised.

A: Indian behaviour is not uncivilised; Indian behaviour is just very unkind (laughs)... (In Tinbigha) there are three bighas. We have 12,000 people living there. I

An official inspects a ballot box during the referendum: the box meant for the 'yes' vote had a picture of General Ershad on it as the President could not go to see them! How unfortunate it is! A signed agreement. A High Court judgement. Still you are not giving it. And we have given our portion of the land to you. How will people feel? There is drought, we need to reach food. We can't do it.

Q: I think the problem is the creation of an overbridge.

A: Nothing like that. This is a problem of intention.

Q: Do you see any change after Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has come to power?

A: We are yet to see. But I met him and I liked him also. I met him before also during Mrs Gandhi's time. As a man he seems to be very nice: more or less same nature as mine. And I thought that he will be able to solve this. But he must be very busy now, with general elections, state elections. But really I have high expectations from him.

Q: Do you think there has been a reduction in the rhetoric of confrontation in India?

A: I think so And even in Bangladesh.

Q: Now one of the things that still has a potential of becoming an issue is the creation of a fence across Assam. Do you accept the Indian position that there is a lot of illegal migration?

A: Not at all. Not at all.

Q: But you know, I can tell you that I have personally seen this illegal migration: Bangladeshis moving into Assam or elsewhere.

A: Moving into Assam? Now why will Bangladeshis go to Assam? Tell me. There is uncertainty, there were communal riots the other day, in which thousands of people were killed. If a Bangladeshi is living here, at least he is living in peace. I don't think there is any famine in Bangladesh that people will leave their hearths and homes and cross to Assam. Somehow or the other, this does not sound very logical to me. Yes, people may be trickling into Assam to go elsewhere; or some Biharis may be trickling out from Bangladesh to go to Pakistan. That is quite different But a settled person, a Bangladeshi, going from here and settling in Assam is just not possible. Maybe you will say Hindus. I don't think Hindus are leaving; they are not so uncomfortable that they will leave Bangladesh and go to Assam. But the question is, if anybody is leaving our country and illegal migration is taking place, there are consular services. We should know from the diplomatic sources. Our government should be informed that this is happening. We have not received any communication from India that this has happened. Suddenly one fine morning I find a border fencing coming up across the border. A bolt from the blue. How has this happened? The whole idea seems to be very insulting to us.

Q: That I can accept, but the fact remains that Muslims are going over into Hindu majority Assam. Maybe the Muslims do not accept that this will necessarily lead to riots. Maybe they are destroying the whole theory behind partition.

A: No. I am not going to go deep into the matter—you can't expect simple villagers to deliberately negate the two-nation theory. The problem is similar to Hindus coming to Bangladesh. Many people are coming to Bangladesh. People who left their homes and are now trying to settle down here for few months. And this traffic will keep on going. But that does not mean that a border fence will stop it. Who can stop a human being? It is not possible. In any case, they will cross if they want to (laughs)...

Q: Do you sense a rise in a pro-Pakistan attitude in Bangladesh, as evidenced from the hockey match behaviour?

A: It is not one incident alone which can be a yardstick. You can hear this if the Indian leadership, or the Indian High Commissioners here correctly inform Delhi about the sentiments of the people here. Why has it happened? They must analyse this. You helped us during liberation. You have been extending help and cooperation and assistance through trade agreements. Then why should this happen? Because of the small irritants. India does not want to give us water; India wants us to starve to death. That becomes the impression. These are the very small points. Nothing else. We have no animosity with India. Not at all. There are very small, one or two points here and there. If they can be removed, I can tell you we would be best of friends. You have gone round the country. Have you noticed anywhere anybody talking against India? Anything, anybody? Have you seen anybody expressing any feelings against India?

Q: In fact after Mrs Gandhi's assassination there were large crowds which went to see the exhibition on her.

A: Yes. The anti-India feeling is just not there. But these are the things, the political issues, which, if not resolved, will keep our relation strained. I know Mr Gandhi has some difficulty. And at the same time, my difficulties he must understand. And then we should come to a solution. And once it is done, I tell you these two countries can live in great friendship and peace.

Q: Would you, as a part of the exercise, allow greater exchange of cultural groups? For example, why not send 'Chayanot' to India?

A: Why not? At times, because of resource constraints, we may not be able to send them. But many people are going every day. Many students are now studying in various Indian universities. That has not stopped. But you know, internally, we feel very hurt.

Q: You said you have problems: I quite appreciate that. One of the things that happens if somebody tries to become friendly with India is that he is immediately labelled an Indian stooge by some of the extremist parties here. Are you willing to take that kind of pressure?

A: Me? For the greater growth of Bangladesh, I am ready to extend my hand of friendship to anybody. Why not? If by saying India is my friend, I get the water problem solved, why should not India be my friend? No difficulty. And you know my attitude, and you know the Indian leadership's attitude towards me. If you do not know, you must know that. For instance, the SARC concept. It was initiated by us and we are really following it. We are going to hold the summit in Dhaka; we hope we can do it.

Q: I hope SARC succeeds.

A: It will succeed. India just can't get out of it! (Laughs).

Q: The Bihari-Pakistani refugee problem has been going on for a whole generation. Do you see any solution in sight?

A: Only Allah knows. The problem is, they are Pakistanis and they don't want to stay here. They have to go to their own state. And the sooner they go, the better for us. Because they are living in misery; we can't look after ourselves. Whatever resources we have, we try and help with that. The Pakistan government should really try to do something about them. We have had talks with them. We are asking for money from all sorts of sources. It is a major problem for us. Another profession is going on (there, in the camps) which we can't look after. And they don't want to remain in Bangladesh. If they decide, once and for all that they want to be Bangladeshi citizens, we can look into this. But they don't want to stay. And so Pakistan has to do something about this.

Q: Finally, how's your son?

A: (Laughs.) My son is grown up now—two years old. (Checks whether his son, named Shaad, has woken up. He is still sleeping.) He keeps my office hours. Goes to bed at one at night, like me.

Q: What do you want him to be—a soldier, a politician, or a poet?

A: I think he will decide his own future. But the chap is of a very good nature, very friendly—like his father (laughs)... His father has a personal love for the people of the country. I want to love everybody. That's my nature. I don't want to have any enemy. And I never suffered because of this philosophy. Many people said many things against me, but ultimately they came to me again. So that's the way I think we should live. I believe in that way. And ultimately, by love you win over everybody. I will win over these political parties.

Ershad: Poet-President

A poem from his book of verse, Light the Golden Lamp

Only One Road to Freedom

There is only one road
To freedom
And against oppression
And life's many inequities
For our bare survival
We have set aside fear,
We have taken an oath
To fight for our right,
The long night of sorrow
Will come to an end,
And we will build
A new Bangladesh

Why will Bangladeshis go to Assam?...There is uncertainty, there were communal riots the other day, in which thousands of people were killed. If a Bangladeshi is living here, at least he is living in peace. I don't think there is any famine in Bangladesh that people will leave their hearths and homes and cross to Assam.

'India Has Qualifie Champion of C

Pakistani cricketer Zaheer Abbas on t

India deserved to win the Roth mans trophy—and 45 thousand dollars—for their performance in Sharjah. They were the most tenacious team in view, and it was this virtue more than any other that won them the day against both Pakistan and Australia.

With this victory, India now qualify for the accolade of undisputed champions of one-day cricket But while this may be a time for celebrations in India, I would put in a word of caution. The wins here and in Australia prove that India are a very good team, but I would not say they are necessarily the best team in the world.

This may sound like sour grapes, because Pakistan has lost thrice to India in the last one month. But I sincerely say that most of the world's top teams—the West Indies, India Australia and Pakistan—are very much at the same level, and it all depends on which side is playing better on a particular day. India have been having an incredible patch of good fortune, and I rejoice with them for it However, I would say that it has been a great amount of team work that has brought the Indians their wins in Sharjah. No one man stood out among the eleven, but all of them put their efforts together for the common goal. I think that is why the judges had to debate for such a long time in selecting the man-of-the-series.

Kapil Dev: victorious captain

Sunil Gavaskar deserves this award more than anyone else. Apart from the sensible innings he played against Australia, it has been his fielding in many different positions in the field that has earned him the prize. It is not easy to be so fit and sprightly when you are over 35 years of age. Ask me, I should know. Those little aches and pains take longer to go away. But Sunny has kept himself very fit. And for that, hats off to him.

I wish some of the other members of the Indian side would take a lesson from Sunny. He stays away from vices and spends time on his fitness training. In fact, he has toned up the fielding of this team. Azharuddin, I am glad to note, is following his example by staying away from the three Ws, but I cannot say the same thing for one or two of the other team members whom I do not wish to mention by name.

I also wish the Pakistani team would take a lesson from the Indians. I thought that for sheer talent, the Pakistanis were even better than the Indians. But they did not quite play together as a team. I found it hard to believe that a batting line-up like they have on paper could not have got the 125 runs they needed for a win in the first match. They were 35 for one, so it meant they needed just 90 runs with nine wickets in hand. But they could not make it. While I would give the credit to the Indian bowling and fielding in some measure, I would blame the Pakistani batsmen more for not concentrating. I would agree that the pitch was difficult, because it was turning a lot and the ball was not quite coming onto the bat. But the batsmen should have stayed and made the runs in

' as the Undisputed ne-day Cricket'

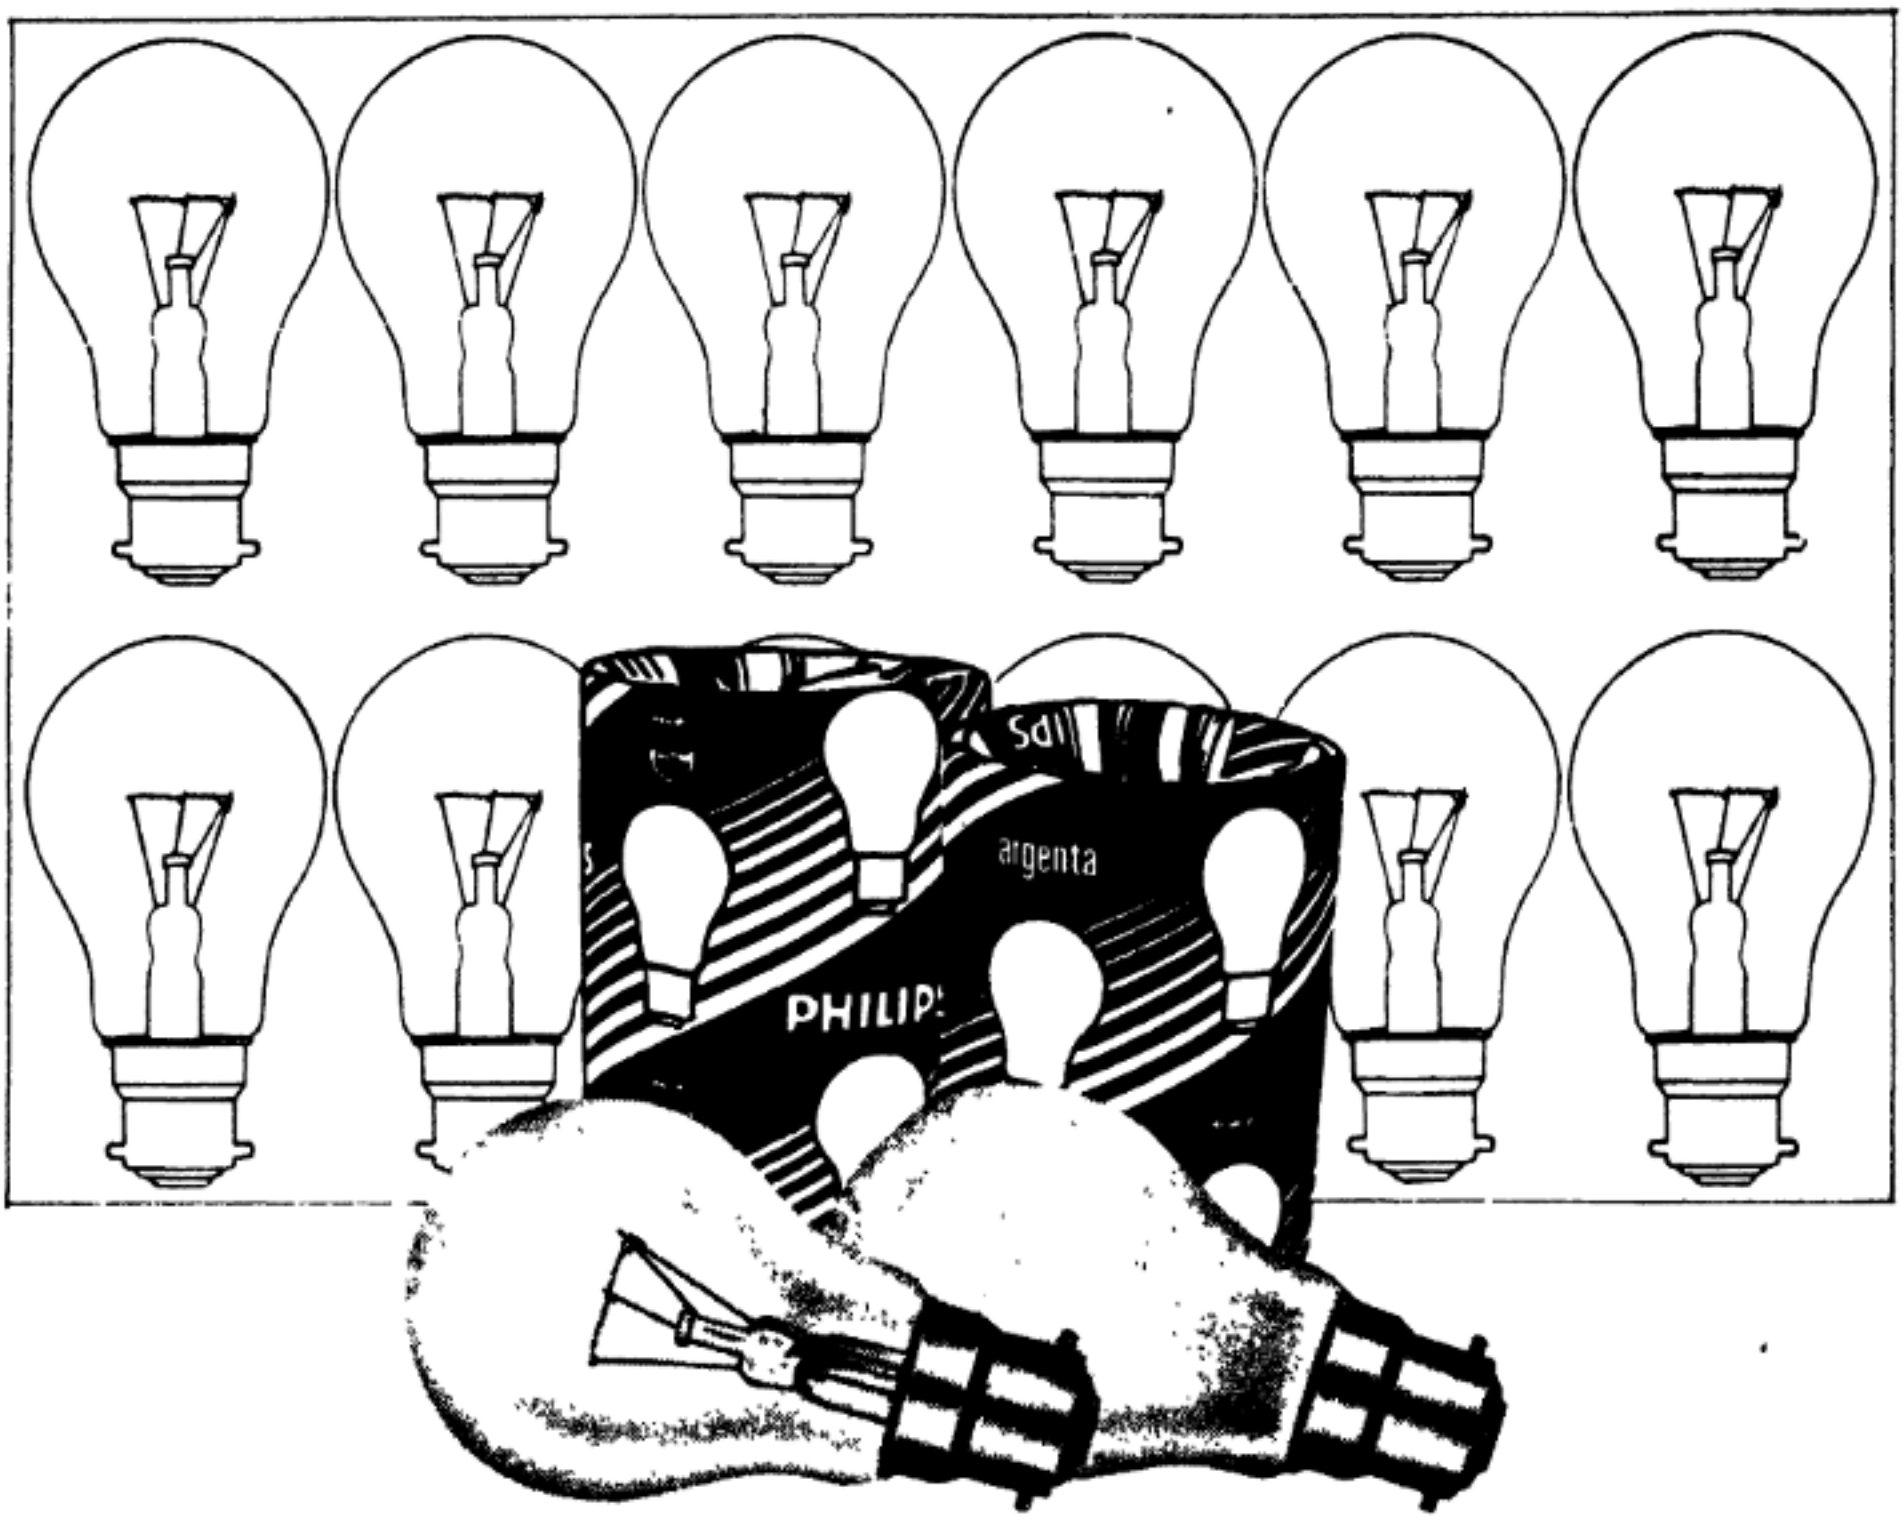
Rothmans Cup tournament at Sharjah singles and twos, instead of trying to go for big hits, like, say Imran did.

A lot of praise is due to England for that fight they put up against Australia, though they were later outclassed by Pakistan. In that team also, another 'old man' played the starring role. Norman Gifford may be 44, but he is still as fit as any one else. If this direct throw off the last ball of their match against Australia had run out Steve Rixon, England would have been in the final. And considering that the English side was a pale replica of the team that toured India, it was a great achievement, indeed. I single out Robert Bailey from that bunch for big things in the future. He is a very sound batsman, technically, and is also useful as a change bowler. He is doing great things for Northamptonshire in county cricket. I think the day is not far when he will play for a full-strength England squad that includes the rebels who had toured South Africa three years ago.

I was somewhat disappointed with Australia's performance, though they had the potential to play much better. Their left-handers really bothered the Indians and can be a thorn in the side on any world-level team. But none of the other players came up with worthwhile batting displays. Craig McDermott is a fine prospect for Australia. He is very quick, and brings the ball in most of the time. He may be only a shade slower than Imran Khan. He will mature as a bowler on Australia's tour of England, a month from now. Greg Matthews is a good find by Australia. He is very enthusiastic, and is useful in all three departments. The wicket was helpful to him, and so he made the ball do quite a few tricks. He fully deserved the special prize of 1,000 dollars that was given to him for an outstanding performance in this tournament.

The competition produced low scores because of the state of the wicket. In previous years it was plumb and true and batsmen would have a good time on it. But now it has suddenly started taking quite an amazing amount of turn. It is an encouraging sign for spinners who may play on it in future.

And future matches there most certainly will be. Mr Abdul Rahman Bukhtiar has cricket blood running in his vein, and now that ventures like the Asia Cup and the Rothmans Trophy have proved resounding success stories, he is likely to bring in at least three or four of the world's top cricketing nations here every year. I think Pakistan and India will be permanent invitees, and be glad to accept the invitation because of the lavish hospitality. Also because there is so much response from their countrymen settled here.



Finally, congratulations to Javed Miandad and Dilip Vengsarkar for getting their benefit matches here next year, when Vijay Hazare and Nazar Mohammad (Mudassar's father) will be the minor beneficiaries. It is good to know that the services to cricket of outstanding Indians and Pakistanis are being finally recognised and rewarded.

Gavaskar: superb fielding

PHILIPS

All bulbs look alike

But when it's Philips you're sure

Don't go by looks alone. Be sure you get quality too. Be sure you buy only Philips bulbs.
That way you know you're getting a brighter light that lasts longer. And . . . full value for money.

Philips bulbs.
When you can be sure, why go for a look-alike!

PEI-1284

Philips – the trusted Indian household name for over fifty years

Mohinder Amarnath: Mr Consistent

It took two knocks on the head to turn Mohinder Amarnath from a good, gutsy batsman to one of the finest in the world. The first, a Richard Hadlee bouncer split his skull during Indian tourists' match with Nottinghamshire during the 1979 tour of England. The other from a Rodney Hogg lifter in Bombay a few months later, floored him and sent his father's old sola topee flying. As he returned to the pavilion, hit-wicket bowled Hogg, his test playing days appeared to be over.

But a change of stance, hours of net-practice, a word or two of advice from his father, the redoubtable Lala Amarnath and a mountain of runs in local first class cricket and "Jimmy" was back. A "controversial" selection on the Indian tour of Pakistan in 1982, he justified the selectors' faith in him by staging a remarkable comeback. While the rest of the Indian batting surrendered meekly to Imran Khan and Co, only Mohinder held firm scoring nearly six hundred runs in the six tests including three hundreds. Imran, at his fieriest best, acknowledged that he was the best player of fast bowling in the world. Then, against the rampaging West Indian battery of Holding, Garner and Marshall in the next series, Mohinder was the man of the series hitting over 500 runs in the four tests. In the Prudential World Cup in England, months later, his consistent batting and his accurate slow medium pace bowling won him the man of the match awards in the semi-finals and finals

What followed when the Carribeans came to India that winter was not only a nightmare for Amarnath but also bewildering for cricket fans all over the world. Illness, loss of confidence and bad luck led to a ghastly patch of five ducks in six test innings. In the pressure cooker atmosphere of the Indian cricket ground, a career resurrected with so much patience and perseverance was left in a shambles.

Pakistan is no place to pick up the pieces of a shattered career. And Amarnath's selection after such a disastrous domestic season raised eyebrows. Again, the Indian batting collapsed, but Amarnath stood firm fighting off some hostile Pakistani bowling and rather tricky umpiring. In the following series against Gower's Englishmen last winter, Jimmy Amarnath was one of the most consistent rungetters.

Mohinder Amarnath: vital role

In Australia, during the World Championship Cricket he had little to do with the bat being pushed down the order to fulfil the demands of limited over cricket, but his bowling on pitches which had little for him was as usual accurate and difficult to score off. Always a man for a crisis, it was Amarnath's stodgy knock in the match against Australia when India was 120 for 7 and the Kangaroos beginning to sense an upset win, which led to the Rothmans Cup victory. At 37, with 3,241 runs and 29 wickets in 49 tests behind him, he is one of the fittest members in the side, and still has a few seasons of international cricket left in him.

Srinjoy Chowdhury

AMETHI

Election With a Difference

How Sanjay Singh 'worked' for his record-shattering victory in the Assembly poll

Is it a genuine case of popularity or the case of a man consumed by the passion of being popular? Dr Sanjay Singh, MLA and minister for transport in the Uttar Pradesh cabinet won the recent Assembly elections from Amethi with a record-shattering count of votes. (He acquired a doctorate in Hindi literature last year.) Sanjay Singh polled 1,24,017 votes, the highest by anyone ever in an Assembly poll in the country, defeating his nearest rival, B.C. Mishra of the BJP by over 1.22 lakh votes and what is more, extracted 27,292 more votes than what Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had got in the Amethi Assembly segment in the December 1984 Lok Sabha elections. Rajiv Gandhi had only polled 95,060 votes. The basis of this phenomenal feat lay in another phenomenal statistic—Singh's candidature had prompted 95 per cent of Amethi's electorate to line up at the polling booths. Nothing wrong with that high turnout—even a hundred per cent poll is normal according to the Election Commission, only a sign of what a healthy, conscious democracy India is becoming, perhaps. But circumstances before, during and after the poll indicate otherwise. Was Sanjay Singh's popularity stage-managed? The pre-poll scenario first.

It is somehow intriguing that of all the opposition parties who claim to have a presence in the area, only two—the DMKP and the BJP—were in the fray Several people from the Janata Party, it is said, had filed their nominations but one after another, they all withdrew their papers. Maneka Gandhi's Rashtriya Sanjay Manch, a much paraded party in Amethi, could not find a single candidate worth his weight. Then a strange thing happened to the candidature of Rambahal Roy, the DMKP man in the field. A few days before the last date for withdrawing the nominations, the election officer in Amethi was presented a "request" that Rambahal Roy wanted to withdraw from the contest. The request was immediately entertained and Roy's name scratched out from the list of contestants even though Rambahal Roy did not himself make the request. The DMKP candidate made several last-ditch efforts to convince the election officer that the "request" for withdrawal was fake and that he intended to contest the elections but he would hear none of it. The DMKP, whose candidate, Haricharan, had polled nearly 14,000 votes in the 1980 Assembly election and had, thus, the potential of shattering Dr Singh's dreams, was taken care of.

Sanjay Singh walking behind Rajiv Gandhi in Amethi

Left in the field were B.C. Mishra of the BJP and five other "independent" candidates, all of whom are said to have been "set-up" by "doctorsaheb" as a matter of electoral strategy. Most in Amethi insist they were all dummies who were used by Sanjay Singh in order to complete his design. The number of votes that these "independent" candidates got is itself quite an indication. Lal Bahadur got 41 votes, Ram Das 79, Raj Kumar 87, Ram Shiromani 103 and Jagat Pal 178!

Sanjay Singh

Sanjeev Premi

As for B.C.Mishra of the BJP, he wasn't even allowed to enter Amethi for his campaign. When he did try to do so, he burnt his fingers. On 14 February, Mishra was accosted by a group of hoodlums outside the Amethi tehsil headquarters and warned that if he tried to campaign in the area he would pay with his life. Mishra registered his complaint at the local police station against Nandkumar and Harishankar Pathak, known to be confidants of Dr Sanjay Singh, and 15 other persons. No action was taken. A series of attacks followed. On 20 February, Mishra's election office was ransacked and for a second time threatened that he would be killed. Two days later, his car was stoned while he was campaigning. Mishra had been registering a complaint almost everyday in vain. Letters and telegrams sent to the election commissioner were also ignored while terror continued in Amethi.

Dr Sanjay Singh, however, does not admit that terror-tactics had played a role in his historic victory; Mishra's performance was abysmal, he says, because he is a man who does not have any base in Amethi, for whom even the local BJP cadres did not care to work enthusiastically. But how did he manage to poll more votes than the Prime Minister himself? Singh, known in the area as "Rajkumar"—he is the adopted son of Rananjay Singh, the feudal lord of Amethi—has several reasons. He credits the popularity of Rajiv Gandhi for his unprecedented victory. But surely he has not become more popular than the Prime Minister. Or has he? He would rather not speak on that but he does give an interesting twist to the suggestion. Rajiv Gandhi, he says, got fewer votes than him because Maneka Gandhi was opposing him. "This was not so in my case...There is no opposition party left now in Amethi." Sanjay Singh has wiped them all out, and is rather proud about his feat.

The poll-percentage statistics of Amethi, while astonishing in themselves, become more unbelievable when one talks to the voter of Amethi. You run into a man who has not voted, more often than one who has. Several of them, when they went to cast their votes, found their names had already been ticked, a common happening in elections in India. It is the scale on which the entire operation was mounted that is of interest. In about 70 booths the polling was 80 per cent. In booth numbers 11, 31, 32, 39, 42, 48, 78 and 128 the poll percentage went as high as 89. Booth numbers 16, 35, 36, 37, 40, 41, 54, 55, 59, 76, 77, 114, 136 and 161 registered a rate of 90 to 100 per cent polling! Is Dr Sanjay Singh really such an attractive personality?

Rigging was a more probable explanation. The tools used were ingenious. One of them was the group of five "independent" candidates. According to electoral laws of the land each candidate is allowed two polling agents per booth. Taking the polling agents of the Congress(I) and the five independent candidates into account, Sanjay Singh had a total of 12 men at each booth, far outnumbering those of the BJP's B.C.Mishra who had only two at each. To back Sanjay Singh's lobby was the entire Amethi administration, already in the pocket of the ruling party. The job was fairly simple. But these agents, it seems, proved more loyal than the king himself. The voting percentage, when it goes higher than 90 is always subject to suspicion and Sanjay Singh had reportedly given express instructions to all his men not to "let it" exceed 89 per cent. But their zeal to please him won over. Now, it is learnt, Dr Singh is taking all those men to task in whose booths over 90 per cent polling was registered. A thankless task, indeed.

A Special Correspondent, Amethi

CONVERSATION

"Our Federations Are Not Taking Interest in Sports"

Union sports minister Rajkumar Jaichandra Singh tells SUNDAY

Rajkumar Jaichandra Singh, the minister of state for sports and youth affairs, perhaps has all the credentials for being a part of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's scheme of things. He is a new face in national politics, has an unstinted record of loyalty to the Gandhi family—as a professional lawyer he even argued a case for Mrs Gandhi during her days out of power—and at 43, he is of the right age. Besides, he talks in Rajiv Gandhi's tongue. He likes to deal with younger people, is not afraid of criticising the previous administration, sounds more professional and has his eyes on the 21st century

Jaichandra Singh joined the Indian National Congress in 1964, much before he had completed his education, and rose up the rungs of the Manipur Pradesh Committee of the party to become its general secretary in 1980. Four years later he came to Delhi as a member of the Rajya Sabha and almost immediately after, became part of the new government formed by Rajiv Gandhi on 31 December 1984. He spoke to SUNDAY about his new job and the plans he has for the future of Indian sport. Excerpts:

Q: This is your first stint in the Union government and in a ministry that is fairly new...

A: Yes, the tasks ahead of us are very challenging and I am happy I was given this job. We hope to be able to do something for Indian sport in the time to come.

Q: You've been a sportsman yourself?

A: I have, yes. As a student I played hockey and football. I have always been interested in sports. To this day I follow events closely even in games that I did not play Cricket, tennis, swimming. People can't hoodwink me on sport anyway, I know the technicalities.

Q: Why do you think we have failed thus far to become a major sporting nation?

A: It is because we have not been broad-basing our sports. Rural sectors have been completely, I would not say neglected, but you know, those areas have not been explored at all. We have to go down to them. Take the example of P.T. Usha. She comes from a village and a very poor family and I think many of our good players today are there waiting in the rural areas. We have been concentrating only on the major towns and metropolitan cities. So, if we go lower down to the villages and provide them with some infrastructure, create some interest and awareness in them and give them a bit of an incentive at a certain level, we should be able to produce some good sportsmen. I think there is a lot of potential in this country and if we get the right policy and have enough funds we should be able to produce international players, even in the individual events.

Q. Are you doing anything new about this?

A: We are. During the course of the next plan we are thinking of providing at least a mini-stadium in each district. We have about 420 odd districts in the country and not more than a hundred and twenty are having infrastructural facilities at the moment. So we must give the minimum requirements to the remaining districts like a stadium that will have a track, a football field or a hockey field, even a basketball court. Not everything can be provided at that level but some basic requirements which may not be very costly and which are popular to some areas. Like football grounds all over West Bengal, Kerala and even the North-East. We are also encouraging the National Rural Sports event that we have been holding.

Rajkumar Jaichandra Singh

Q: But how much of actual talent-search is going on?

A: We have not done much here but we are starting...We have asked the Sports Authority of India (SAI) to organise sporting events at that level and concentrate on the younger age groups, say between 7 and 12 years and 13 and 16 years of age. This will be the main job of the SAI. We are also keeping in touch with the state governments and the various sports federations so that we could organise sports at the grassroots' level.

Q: What is the main role of SAI?

A: The main thrust is of course to broad-base sports in India which is the most important thing. We will be setting up some sports hostels, I think in each state, within the next five years. This plan will no doubt depend on the funds that we get from the Planning Commission but if we do get sufficient money we would make these hostels with at least a 100 beds in each for sportspeople to come and stay while they are being coached so that we can keep up the standard. Even if each state in this country has one hostel exclusively for sportsmen we will have done quite a lot. Then we are also going to adopt a few schools. The plan is to begin with the central and sainik schools where they already have good facilities for sports. We can capitalise on this by giving them some extra coaching facilities.

Q: What are your future plans?

A: There are too many....

Q: No, just the major ones. There are plans for initiating a national

Asian Games 1982: India's Shaheed beats Bangladesh goalkeeper Adil Khan to score one of the dozen goals for his hockey team games event on a regular basis, aren't there?

A: That's right. Though nothing has been finalised as yet, I can tell you that we are thinking of having a national games event every two years. This will be on the model of the Olympics and the Asiad. I have asked the department to examine the proposal a little more in detail.

Q: When will they begin?

A: We should be able to start the first this year itself. Perhaps, by the end of the year, or maybe early next year. But positively by then. It is not far away.

Q: A lot was said after the Asian Games. Earlier the excuse was that we don't have the facilities for sport to develop. But that changed after the Asiad. Even officially it was claimed that Indian sport was receiving a big boost: all these stadia and the equipment. But results thereafter have not been very encouraging either.*

A: That was only in Delhi. Sports is a long-term investment. Just giving them a stadium will not do. The interest has to be created. We have to make sports more popular in schools, colleges and universities. In fact, it is quite painful that the standards at the university level have been steadily going down instead of improving. Something will have to be done about this. The state governments also have a lot to do. Our federations will have to take interest. Most of our federations are not taking interest in sports. Just some of us sitting here in Delhi cannot do everything. The federations have to keep on organising events at every level so that talent can be spotted. But they are just not interested.

Q: What are you doing about this?

A: I have been calling up each one of those federations one by one. I have already met the basketball people, the equestrian federation officials and only recently some officials from the Indian Hockey Federation (IHF). Some of these federations will have to be sternly told to be serious (in their work). They are not. I am not at all satisfied with their work. They will have to be disciplined. Elections will have to be held on time and only those people who are genuinely interested in sports should be brought in. But then again we have limitations because the government cannot interfere directly because they are all autonomous bodies and even if we do interfere, the press will kick up a row (laughs). So, we are slightly at a disadvantage. But if they don't function properly we will have to put our foot down somewhere. You know, selectors themselves are sometimes absent from matches...not once but several times in a row. It happened recently with two hockey selectors. If selectors themselves are not present...I think the IHF should have some action. It is not the job of the minister or the ministry to remind them. But now I have taken some steps. I have told the IHF to hold the elections by April. I have also issued some guidelines. I would go in for younger coaches, not someone who has become outdated. I would like to have people who have one foot in this century and the other in the 21st. Someone who can work today on what's going to happen in the future.

Q: How satisfied are you with the use the Asiad infrastructure is being put to?

A: We are working out something on that too. The SAI is trying to open up the facilities more for the public. As it is they have opened up but there are a whole lot of stadia in Delhi and some proper device will have to be worked out.

Q: If you remember, sports goods worth nearly four crore rupees were imported during the Asian Games. What is happening to them?

A: I wouldn't know really. You see, some are in the SAI but I am trying to work out something on how to use them. The moment the broad-based programme of the SAI starts functioning we will start using the equipment too. We can give some to the state federations also. I will be looking into it.

Q: An obvious question; What's happening to the Olympics, are we getting it?

A: I have asked the department to examine this. We have made a bid for it but unless we are sincere and serious about it, unless the department is prepared for it we can't hold them successfully. Then the finance ministry will have to be consulted because it involves a lot of money but we are working it out.

Q: Do you think we can hold it?

A: Finance is the main constraint. And that's what we are working out now.

Q: But given the time span, do you think we can have the infrastructure ready?

A: Oh yes. Most of the things are here; a new Olympic village will have to be constructed and some more things. Television will have to play a major role because the Olympics can be profitable as shown by the Los Angeles Olympics, if the television coverage is wide.

Interviewed by Sunkersetan Thakur

PARLIAMENT

Misinformed Minister?

Khurshed Alam Khan's reply in Parliament is misleading

Is the minister of state for external affairs, Khurshed Alam Khan, being misled by officers? The written reply to a Parliament question tabled by him on 21 March suggests so. A treasury member, Ratan Kumari, had asked in unstarred question number 560 in the Rajya Sabha the names of the Indian missions abroad where the posts of ambassadors or high commissioners were lying vacant. The question was addressed to the Prime Minister, who is also the minister for external affairs. Khurshed Alam Khan replied on the Prime Minister's behalf. The answer given to the Parliament was misleading. The minister must have relied on the material prepared by the foreign office, but the responsibility to the Parliament being that of the minister, the wrong reply certainly puts Khurshed Alam Khan in an embarrassing position.

According to the minister's reply, the missions at Beirut (Lebanon), Bogota (Colombia), Lilongwe (Malawi) and London (United Kingdom) did not have heads of mission. While this is true, the whole truth is that on 21 March, some more missions did not have ambassadors and high commissioners. The Indian High Commissioner to Canada, R. Shivaramakrishnan, died of cancer last year. His post is still lying vacant. And Canada is an important posting—but somehow this was ignored while compiling the Parliament answer. The Indian ambassador to Bulgaria, B. Devarao, retired on 28 February. His replacement has not been sent. Considering the importance which India attaches to its friendship with the Soviet bloc, the vacancy at Sofia should normally not have escaped the attention of the minister. The decision of the governments of India and New Zealand to upgrade the level of representation to the High Commissioner's rank (the Kiwis had downgraded the post due to an economy drive some years back) has made the mission in New Zealand also technically headless. The Kiwis have appointed the conqueror of Everest, Sir Edmund Hillary as their envoy to India. New Delhi is yet to decide about Sir Edmund's counterpart. Nearer home, the Indian mission in Rangoon (Burma) was rendered headless when the last envoy, G.G. Swell, a career politician, decided to come back and contest the Parliament elections. Dr I.P. Singh, Indian ambassador to Spain, has been named as his successor, but till someone is appointed in Dr Singh's place at Madrid, he is unable to take up his assignment in Burma. So, on 21 March, apart from the four missions mentioned by Khurshed Alam Khan in his reply, there were some other Indian missions abroad which did not have ambassadors or high commissioners. Who misled the minister, which in turn resulted in wrong information being furnished to the Parliament?

The administrative setup of the foreign office has been under strain in the last few months. Not many decisions regarding the posting of senior officers have been taken. While senior officers of the rank of joint secretary and above have been reporting back to the headquarters after assignments abroad or training stints, there is no machinery active which can utilise their services. As a result, there are around half a dozen senior officers in the ministry of external affairs today who are not assigned due work. In place of the normal strength of three additional secretaries, there are four posted in the foreign office now. New posts have been created to tide over the flood of senior officers in South Bloc. The coordination division, which is the heart of the foreign office, has been split up into "coordination" and "special coordination," so as to accommodate an extra joint secretary. Two officers of the rank of joint secretary have been on extended leave due to lack of work in the past few months.

Apart from the missions listed above, where the heads of mission are either to be appointed or stationed, the posts in Brazil, Zaire, Afghanistan, Argentina, Egypt, Spain, Finland, Panama, Senegal, Ghana and Fiji are due for change of guard in the next few months (due to the expiry of the envoys' terms). No filework has been initiated in the foreign office to fill up these posts. Normally, it takes at least four months to station a new envoy: after the name is decided, an agreement (as per international law) has to be obtained from the host country, the envoy designate has to be briefed by the foreign office and the allied agencies and only then be can be sent to his assignment. Considering the average four-month period taken for such a process, nearly 20 Indian missions will remain headless in the months to come.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

Khurshed Alam Khan

Uttarpara Jaikrishna Public Library
Uttarpara – Pin-712258, Hooghly

GUJARAT

The Stir Continues

Anti-reservationists intensify their campaign

Despite the communal turn to the agitation that left 13 persons dead in the riots which took place from 18 March to 22 March, the anti-reservation stir in Ahmedabad does not show any signs of subsiding. The students who had suspended their agitation when communal riots rocked the city, have taken their fight to other areas of the state, notably Saurashtra. With the spread of the stir, the scope of the demands too seemed to go up. The stir was launched originally against the 18 per cent proposed increase in the quota of reservations in jobs and education for the socially and educationally backward classes (SEBC), but the stir leaders are now calling for "re-establishment of meritocracy and the right to pursue excellence."

The stir, launched in mid-February, has entered its sixth week and the appeals of central leaders like Mr S. B. Chavan, union home minister, to students to call the agitation off seemed to have fallen on deaf ears. In fact, the leaders of the stir appeared to have drawn strength from the fact that the Prime Minister, Mr Rajiv Gandhi, has proposed the evolving of a national consensus on the reservation policy. CM Madhavsinh Solanki has already given in to the original demand of the anti-reservationists by postponing the proposed quota hike by a year.

The communal riot in Ahmedabad has been subtly linked up with the anti-reservation agitation by the government. Although the All Gujarat Education Reforms Committee which has been leading the anti-reservation stir has disclaimed responsibility for the communal turn of the events, the state home minister, Mr Amarsinh Choudhary, said in the Assembly that the violence in the state had taken a toll of 18 lives and left behind damage worth Rs one and a half crores. The toll includes 13 killed in Ahmedabad.

The government has refused to institute a judicial probe into the communal rioting in Ahmedabad, though it has blamed the opposition parties for it. The Prime Minister, after a two hour tour of the riot-torn areas, on 23 March, blamed the opposition who, he said, had lost in the elections and still did not want to abide by the verdict of the people. Mr Chandulal Chandrakar, union minister of state sent by Mr Gandhi to Ahmedabad, accused the Bharatiya Janata Party of engineering the riots.

Mr Gandhi's remarks incensed the opposition. Mr Chandra Shekhar, the Janata Party chief who had also gone round the strife-torn areas in Ahmedabad, acidly pointed out that the Prime Minister was trading in human misery. Curiously, neither the ruling party nor the BJP named the people involved in the rioting. Nor did they offer proof. The BJP leader, Mr L.K. Advani, who visited Ahmedabad after the riot, claimed he had heard people saying that a former minister and a former legislator of the Congress(I) were responsible for the rioting, but he did not name anyone specifically. It appears that there will be no judicial probe and the political parties will be satisfied with accusing each other. While almost everyone claims that the communal flare up was a pre-planned affair in which goondas played a vital role, it would probably never be known who triggered the anti-social elements into action.

About 1,108 persons have been rounded up in Ahmedabad in connection with the disturbances, including 767 curfew offenders. The rioting has left 52 injured. The police registered 114 cases of arson and looting as over 150 houses and shops were set on fire. However, only 11 persons have been detained under the National Security Act. But the state government has referred to the riots as just "disturbances." In all announcements made by the state, the word "communal" has been carefully deleted.

The anti-reservation agitators who had suspended their stir for a few days have resumed their activities. The reason was the arrest on 23 March of three student leaders, Mr Vivek Patel, Mr Kanu Patel and Mr Amit Desai, when they went to the circuit house annexe in Ahmedabad to submit a memorandum against the reservation policy to the Prime Minister. On 25 March, a magistrate ordered their release on personal bond but they were immediately taken into custody under the National Security Act. The All Gujarat Education Reforms Committee, has accused the state government of making scapegoats of the students and on 26 March, some 400 junior doctors at the Ahmedabad Civil Hospital went on an indefinite strike, protesting against the arrests of the student leaders. That day, bandhs were observed by anti-reservationists in a number of towns in Saurashtra such as Rajkot, Bhavnagar, Jamnagar, Junagadh and Surendranagar. A leader of the All Gujarat Parents Association, which has joined the students, said that groups of students and others would mobilise people throughout the state against "the evils of the reservation system."

The students committee called the

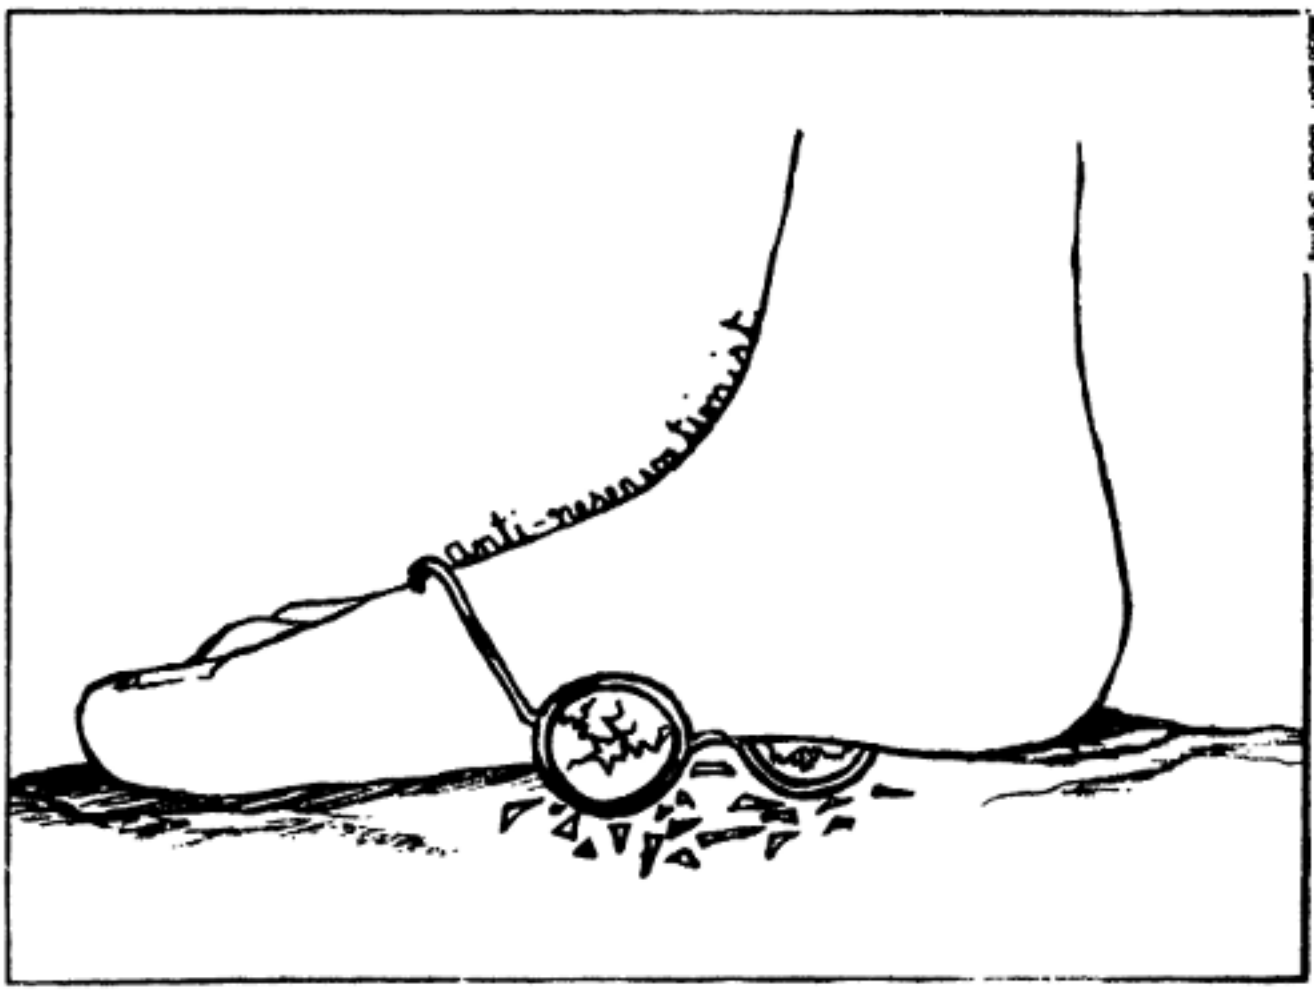

Illustration Rahul Sharma

Akhil Gujarat Navrachna Samiti, sent a memorandum addressed to the Prime Minister, listing a ten point charter of demands which goes much beyond the original demand against the quota hike for the SEBC. The main demands are: 70 per cent of students admitted in any college should be on merit. Reservations should be phased out gradually in a predetermined manner. A system should be established where a person could get the benefit of a special reservation only once in his life. The difference in marks between an open merit admission and reserved candidate should not be more than ten per cent. The benefit of the reservation should not extend to the third child in any family. Economic criteria should be adopted for identifying backward sections instead of caste criteria and until the reservations were phased out, a system of supernumerary seats for meritorious students should be adopted, which means one merit seat against one reserved seat.

The committee said that its agitation "is a last ditch effort by the students and people of Gujarat to save meritocracy." However, the stir would be conducted only on peaceful Gandhian lines, it said and disowned responsibility for the communal riots. "We have nothing to do with these unfortunate events," it said. The stance of the students committee, reinforced by the parents association, has unnerved organisations and leaders of the backward classes. Mr Himat Charan, convenor of one such organisation, has warned that the backward classes would not take it lying down if the anti-reservationists persisted in their activities. "A volunteer force of the backward people would have to be created soon," he said.

Meanwhile, the government has appealed to the anti-reservationists to give up their stir promising them justice when a review of the policy took place. The government has also pleaded with the opposition to clarify its stand on the anti reservation stir. Even as the stir continues, the fate of some 4.75 lakh students due to sit in HSC and SSC examinations continue to hang in the balance. Their examinations due to begin on 18 March were put off to 25 March and then postponed indefinitely. If they are not held soon and results declared before the next academic year begins in June, their future would be affected.

Tushar Bhatt, Ahmedabad

PUNJAB

A Time for Action

Khushwant Singh urges PM to solve the crisis

The mood in Punjab is one of anger. As the Akali leadership—even the moderates—tread the hard line, simmering discontent is beginning to surface in the form of "kesari patkas and dupattas." That is the colour signifying preparedness to sacrifice for religion. The eminent journalist, Khushwant Singh, a nominated Rajya Sabha MP and one who thought that Operation Bluestar was a serious error of judgement, feels that the situation in Punjab is extremely dangerous and unpleasant. About a month ago, he wrote a detailed two-page letter to Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, urging him to take certain steps to retrieve the consistently deteriorating state of affairs in the state. "I was very disturbed at some recent trends," writes Mr Singh, "the large-scale migration of Sikhs to Punjab from different parts of the country, the training of terrorist units, the appearance of saffron all around in Punjab. So I thought of writing to the Prime Minister. We must realise, after all, that Punjab is the only land-link we have with Jammu and Kashmir."

Mr Singh has made several suggestions in his letter to Rajiv Gandhi on decisions that he must take preparatory to a solution of the continuing crisis in Punjab. He has demanded the institution of a high-power judicial enquiry into the killing of Sikhs during the riots that followed the assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi and an unilateral announcement from the government on what demands, being made by the Akali leaders, it is prepared to concede. His suggestion is that the Prime Minister himself make this announcement from the Golden Temple. "He should be talking directly to the people," says Khushwant Singh.

Although Khushwant Singh takes no credit for it, just sometime after he had written the letter, the government released nine Akali leaders including Sant Harchand Singh Longowal, Jagdev Singh Talwandi and Surjit Singh Barnala. Several others, however, were detained. Khushwant Singh describes this move as "mischievous." "It will create more discord. The government will ultimately be left with no one to talk to. Who will be left if the government tries to create divisions this way?" Mr Singh asks. He also asserts that all talk of government having "secret talks" with the Sikhs is not true. Such moves as this one are only shrinking up the avenues for a dialogue on Punjab.

Another point that Khushwant Singh had made in his letter was about the economic situation in Punjab. One of the reasons, he feels, for the success of the terrorists in influencing the youth of Punjab was the lack of better opportunities for them. While on the one hand the green revolution has reached a plateau stage and opportunities abroad have dried up, industry is almost non-existent in the state. There is a great deal of frustration in the educated youth of Punjab today. With this backdrop in mind, he had demanded the announcement of an economic package for the state too.

What is going to happen in Punjab now? Khushwant Singh does not have a clue. "In any case, the atmosphere is very unpleasant. The colour of vengeance spreading all around, tapes supporting Satwant Singh and Beant Singh being played everywhere...I don't know where things are going." Does he think the government is going to do anything about Punjab. "I don't know," he says, "a few days after I sent the letter to the Prime Minister I got a letter thanking me for it and saying that it was being passed on to the cabinet subcommittee on Punjab and today when I raise a question in Parliament Rajiv Gandhi himself gets up to answer but he is always contradicting himself...at the moment it is just crystal-gazing, I don't know what the government is prepared to do. It is certainly not communicating with the Sikh people. Is it even big enough to say that the army operation in June last year was a grave error?"

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

Khushwant Singh

RAJASTHAN

SP Accused of Rape

Wife of senior police officer allegedly molested

Though rape by uniformed men is not a new phenomenon in Rajasthan, the recent incident at Bikaner involving the highest police official of the district, the Superintendent of Police (SP), has rocked the whole state. What is more is that the SP attempted to rape the wife of his seniormost colleague in the district: the additional SP, Mr R.D. Goyal. Mr Rohtas Kumar the SP of Bikaner is a controversial figure. Before his posting in Bikaner, he was SP of Bharatpur from where he was transferred for inciting caste conflicts in the police and the public. But this time he appears to have landed in greater trouble. His additional SP, Mr R.D. Goyal has charged him of molesting and attempting to rape his wife.

According to the two identical complaints by Mr Goyal with the DIG Bikaner Range, Mr Samarvir Singh Pawar, and later with the director-general of police, Mr Raghunath Singh Kapoor, Rohtas Kumar came to the residence of the additional SP in the evening of 23 March. Though the SP had informed Mr Goyal on telephone that he was dropping in that evening with his wife, he came alone. Goyal says in his complaint that the SP was drunk and explained that since Mrs Rohtas Kumar was not well, she could not accompany him.

In the complaint Mr Goyal says that some time later, some persons came to the Goyals' residence to meet the SP. The SP asked Goyal to speak to them as he was in no shape to meet them. He also requested Goyal for some paan. Goyal left the room to meet the visitors leaving his wife and the SP in the drawing room. After sending away the visitors, Goyal was coming back to the room when he saw Rohtas Kumar coming out. When asked why he was leaving without having paan he replied that he was in a hurry and had to leave. Goyal returned to the room to find his wife in tears and in a state of shock.

Goyal claims his wife could not speak to him for about ten minutes and continued sobbing. Later she admitted that the SP had misbehaved with her and molested her. Only after this did Goyal realize why Rohtas Kumar had left in such a hurry. Finding no trace of the SP, Goyal met the DIG Bikaner Range, Mr Samarvir Singh and narrated the whole story. The DIG asked him to write out the complaint which he did immediately. Despite the DIG's desperate efforts to find Rohtas Kumar, the SP remained untraceable throughout the night.

Meanwhile, Mr Singh spoke to the district collector and also consulted Mr O.P. Behari, the area development commissioner and the seniormost IAS officer at Bikaner. After consultations between the three, the DIG informed the director general of police (DGP) at Jaipur the next morning. The DIG also sent a wireless message ordering the transfer of Rohtas Kumar with immediate effect and ordered that he be relieved of his charge and sent to Jaipur. Intriguingly, the order of relieving the SP of his duties was later revoked and he was asked to proceed to Jaipur to explain his case to the DGP. Goyal was also called to Jaipur.

Why did the DGP revoke his order? It is believe that it was done at the behest of an ex-MLA who was Congress(I) candidate for the Vidhan Sabha in Bikaner district this year. After leaving Goyal's house on 23 March, Rohtas Kumar is reported to have spent the whole night at the residence of the same ex-MLA at Bikaner, who is believed to be close to CM Harideo Joshi.

Despite all the efforts to keep the incident a secret, the news was given coverage by the Rajasthan Patrika on 26 March. The matter was raised in the Vidhan Sabha and agitated MLAs demanded the immediate suspension and arrest of the SP and the registration of a case of attempted rape against him. The chief minister's announcement of a departmental enquiry in the matter did not pacify the MLAs who demanded prosecution of the SP. A number of MLAs also alleged the in the house that he was a habitual offender. Miss Pushpa Jain of the BJP expressed her anguish that the government was having a dialogue with the culprit since he is a high police official. "Had there been an ordinary citizen involved in this case, would the government have adopted the same course?" she asked and demanded the immediate arrest of the SP. Mr Devi Singh Bhati, Janata MLA, stunned the House by alleging that, "Rohtas Kumar molested the wife of a magistrate in Chittorgarh, misbehaved with a lady teacher in Bharatpur and raped a lady advocate in Bikaner. In yet another case, a lady government employee had beaten him up for his indecent behaviour." The list is unending and distressing, he claimed. Mrs Vidya Pathak, BJP, described him as a sex maniac and said that the proper place for Rohtas Kumar was a lunatic asylum.

Rohtas Kumar

Chief minister Joshi's repeated assertion that he will not spare the guilty and was awaiting the enquiry report by the inspector general of police, Mr V.K. Kaul, who had gone to Bikaner for investigation of the facts, did not pacify the members and under pressure from the House, he had to announce that an FIR would be registered against the SP. He also promised to transfer the SP from Bikaner and the order transferring Rohtas Kumar to the Police Academy, Jaipur was issued two days later.

During the past couple of years, the number of cases of rape have gone up in the state. Altogether 15 cases were registered against police officials ranging from constables to inspectors in the last two years. In Kotputli, two policemen raped a woman which sparked off an agitation in January last year and led to a police firing, killing three persons. In yet another case, a 45-year-old woman Sundri was called to the Nasirabad police station in connection with an investigation. She was then raped and murdered by the station staff. Incidents of rape by policemen in the Police Academy compound were also reported last year. Mr Rohtas Kumar has now been posted to the same police academy. Meanwhile, the Rajasthan Police Service (RPS) Officers Association has condemned the shameful act and has unanimously demanded severe punishment for the SP.

Milap Chand Dandia, Jaipur

UTTAR PRADESH

School for Vandals

Students of Lucknow College of Arts protest against crime

Until a month back Lucknow University's College of Arts and Crafts could boast of a set of unusual extra-curriculars—hooliganism, violence and crime. For the more serious of the college's 250 boys and girls, the campus was a scene of terror. Toughs enrolled as students freely flashed knives and guns to threaten the boys, or 'impress' the girls with their bravado. Resistance, even from the authorities, could mean violence. Now the man allegedly promoting the culprits—none other than the college's own physical training instructor, Shiv Singh—has become the target of a determined hunger-strike by a group of students who are sick of it all and want him and his proteges out.

The strikers, who claim to have the support of the rest of the students, have paralysed the college since 24 January Despite repeated requests by the principal and vice-chancellor to call off their agitation and allow classes to resume, the students have not relented. They will break their strike, they say, only after their demands are met. The authorities have set up a three member committee to enquire into the charges, but say that no action can be taken unless the inquiry is complete So the strike continues.

The trouble began on 23 January when two students, Mamoon Noomani and Mukesh Pandey—a protege of the P.T. instructor were involved in a fight outside the college gates. According to the students, Noomani, who was on his motorcycle, was suddenly attacked by Pandey and an "outsider" who stopped him, and beat him up. A teacher, Prof. Satish Chandra, who had rushed to mediate was also heckled. In a statement the professor made later, he said, "The outsider had caught hold of my collar."

A number of students. Sushil Kumar, Imtiaz Ahmed, Bhim Sain, Satish Srivastava, Sukhvinder Singh and four others, who happened to be watching, raised an alarm. "Our principal, Prof. R. S. Bisht was with us at the time," said Sushil Kumar. "He was told to go to the police, but he didn't. Later, we phoned the police from his office, and the police arrived." The students also allege that Shiv Singh, who was conducting a cricket match on the playground alongside the road, "had prior knowledge of the attack" but did nothing "perhaps because he had planned it himself."

Students of the Lucknow College of Arts and Crafts on strike

The strikers complained about a number of other incidents involving Shiv Singh and his "band of rowdies," more serious than the one on 23 January. Sometime back a student, Anil Kumar Shukla, was attacked by another student Rajendra Yadav, Singh's own nephew, who had a tamancha (countrymade pistol) in his hand at Shiv Singh's instance." Said Shukla, "I was coming through the rear gate with my bicycle... I had just returned from hospital when Shiv Singh spotted me and shouted, 'Pakro sale ko mardeo.' Thankfully the proctor, B.N. Adiga was attracted by the commotion. He came and asked what the matter was. I could see Shiv Singh warning Yadav immediately to hide the gun. Yadav then gave it to Gajendra Kushwaha, who was standing nearby. He hid it. Later the rowdies walked away, growling, Yahan goliya chalegi, aur jo rukawat bana sabko ura dengey. The words were meant for Adiga. The principal was hardly any help. When I went to complain about the incidents to him, he only pushed me aside and said, 'Bahut bura hoga' and asked me to go away."

The students had earlier lodged a complaint against two of Shiv Singh's proteges, Rajiv Katiyar and Vijay Handa, alleging that they were not entitled to take admission in the arts college as they had enrolled themselves in the National Degree College. After checking up with the college concerned, the principal had ordered their expulsion under the university rules which prohibit double courses. "A number of Shiv Singh's boys keep enrolling themselves for different courses only to stay on," said a striker. Among them are Rajendra Yadav Singh's nephew who has already done his three year woodwork course and has now got admitted in first year clay modelling. "He beats up anyone he has a dislike for," said a striker. Also in the college are Avadesh Yadav Singh's sister's son; Singh's wife Rekha Yadav, Singh's niece, Seema Yadav and proteges like Arun Kumar who has already completed his BA pass course and is also doing the master of social work course.

The present hostel warden, Bhairon Nath Shukla, has already submitted his resignation to the principal after what happened on 23 January, the climax to the series of exchanges between the rowdies and the students. Even the teachers, it appears, have formed two camps, one pro-Shiv Singh, the other against him. Said the proctor informally, "I have been here since 1982. So many reports have been sent to the police. If there are fights between two groups of students, I can settle the matter. But when a staff member is involved and has support from other quarters, I cannot do anything." The proctor admitted that countrymade weapons were brought into the college sometimes.

According to the agitating students, Shiv Singh has been a menace having served as hostel warden for five years before he was forced to quit that post in 1981, following a similar agitation. "Even now, he is in-charge of the National Service Scheme, and games, and pockets a lot of the funds."

Shiv Singh himself denied these charges. "The trouble started when, after resigning from the post of warden in 1981, I said in my letter that as long as the inquiry into the charges against me are pending, those who were agitating against me should not be given hostel seats. But despite giving this in writing, they were given hostel accommodation. So, those boys kept plotting, bringing in outsiders, terrorising..." Singh alleged that a number of those who had agitated against him in 1981, and were involved in the present strike were rowdies themselves. "As a games teacher, I feel, that if there is discipline, there should be complete discipline. Unlike the other teachers, I am strict. And because of this I am unpopular." Singh also alleged that the fight between Pandey and Noomani was actually over a girl's attention.

The boys had accused him of threatening them, even while they were on strike: "He told one of us that his body would be found outside the college if we took our agitation too far." He even taunts us, saying "you'll get tired of running around," one of the boys said. "That's not true," said Singh answering the charge. What about his gang of toughs? "The people around me, I assure you, are from very good families, IAS etc. and it is these elements in the strike who tease and pester them.

Said the principal. Prof. Bisht, who claimed that each and every complaint submitted by the students to the proctor had been passed on dutifully to the police, and action had always been taken promptly. "the students have two demands. The first concerns students. The second, a teacher. Action against the students involved in the incident on 23 January 1985 can only be taken after a thorough investigation. As for the second demand, the vice-chancellor is the only authority who can take a decision regarding a teacher, according to rules." For the students, this is not enough. The VC continues to tell them to withdraw the agitation, and allow classes to begin. But the students have refused to budge. "Our future's involved," they argue. "We have to decide once and for all whether to have people in the college who are interested in art, or those interested in violence."

Nirmal Mitra, Lucknow

KERALA

Back to Ayurveda

Programme to increase production of medicinal plants

It is perhaps unfortunate that Indians require the west to make them appreciate their own scientific heritage. Yoga, traditionally practised by rishis, and a small segment of the population in the country has become fashionable in India only after it became popular in the West. Similarly, ayurveda, thanks to the Westerners, particularly the West Germans who have even begun commercial production of ayurvedic substitutes of chemicals in the drugs manufactured by the multinational pharmaceutical firms,is beginning to gain popularity.

Kerala is universally considered to be the home of ayurveda. The Kottakkal Arya Vaidyashala in Kerala has not won just national, but international acclaim. From eczema to mental retardation, the Vaidyashala has its own ayurvedic medicines which are slow-acting, but effective. The legion of patients who swear by the Vaidyashala is increasing and despite the advances made by allopathy, small specialised ayurveda practitioners in Kerala still successfully deal with snake-bites, stomach ailments or bone diseases. The recipe of the formulations is a family secret passed on only from father to son.

Ayurveda is not a very refined form of medication through which the part of the medicinal plant, be it the leaf or root, is isolated by distillation. Ayurvedic formulations are invariably in the form of tonics. The extraction process in allopathy is so advanced that only the active ingredient or the organic compound required for the particular ailment is isolated. It is the most concentrated form which explains why the same amount of relief provided by a single allopathic tablet may be provided by a bottle of ayurvedic tonic. This also explains why allopathy offers quick relief (and is therefore popular) while ayurveda is slow-acting. But today, despite the giant strides taken by allopathy, there is a tendency to popularise ayurveda. This is because unlike allopathic drugs, the ayurveda formulations have no side effects. Secondly, though allopathy is "quick-acting" often just the symptoms of the ailment are cured but not the ailment itself whereas the ayurveda formulations cure the disease itself.

The medicinal plants garden of the Kerala Agricultural University

The research programme launched by the Kerala Agricultural University (KAU) at Trichur attempts to evolve a low cost technology for the production of medicinal plants for ayurvedic purposes. Plans for commercial cultivation of plants to cope with the demands of the pharmaceutical industry are being made.Of the wide range of medicinal plants that grow in Kerala, about 200 species of herbs have been collected, identified and transplanted in the KAU. In charge of this project is the department of plantation crops and spices headed by Prof. Sreekandan Nair. Out of this 200, there are about 160 plants which are considered to be ayurvedically important.

Some of the important plants found in the "germ plasm" or "gene bank' of the KAU are Rauwolfia Serpentina. From the root of this plant, the alkaloid called Reserpine is extracted which is widely used for reducing blood pressure. This is a commercially viable plant because it is used by pharmaceutical firms as its chemical substitutes have often been found to have serious side effects. Catheranthus Roseus, popularly called Shavam Nari in Malayalam (probably because it is commonly found in graveyards) is used for treating leucaemia.

Another herb, Centella Asiatica is used for treating nervous problems and skin diseases including leprosy. The Aloe Barbadensis being cultivated in the KAU, is good for hair growth and for curing boils. Kerala is supposed to have the largest area under cultivation of lemon grass in the world which is a base for Vitamin A and all over the country, medicinal properties of Juss Meliaceae or neem are well known. Out of the oil extracted from neem, the Trivandrum Ayurvedic Research Centre has developed "Nimbidin", which is said to be very good for psoriasis (a kind of skin disease).

Other important herbs are Alorus Calamus which is used for treating stomach ailments Diascoria Floribunda (also known as Diasgenin), which is essential for contraceptive pills, and Nuxvomica which is very good for rheumatism.

Due to the indiscriminate collection of these herbs there is today a threat of extinction of some of these species. The project hopes to begin the replantation of some of these species by passing on the cuttings of the plants to the Aushadhis and Vaidyans (ayurveda clinics and practitioners) free of cost, so that they can cultivate it for themselves. The project also has an experimental section. It has been found that Kerala is suitable for the commercial cultivation of medicinal plants like Rauwolfia Serpentina, medicinal yam and Catharanthus Roseus. To reduce costs, the project is concentrating on the possibilities of introducing these plants in the multi-species cropping system. For instance, research has shown that certain medicinal plants grow very well when cultivated as an intercrop in rubber and other plantations. Such inter-cropping will go a long way in popularising the cultivation of medicinal plants. Experiments are also being conducted to increase yields. In addition, the experiments are geared to evolving low cost technology for the cultivation of these plants. Another aim of the project is to popularise home remedies.

An additional project is therapeutic horticulture. In the west, horticulture has been found to have immense value to a gamut of patients, particularly the aged, the physically and mentally retarded children. The department is supplying plants to two institutions for handicapped children, one of which is based in Trichur. The department not only supplies plants but provides guidance on how to cultivate the plants. Constant supervision is maintained by the department on the progress of the growth of the plants.

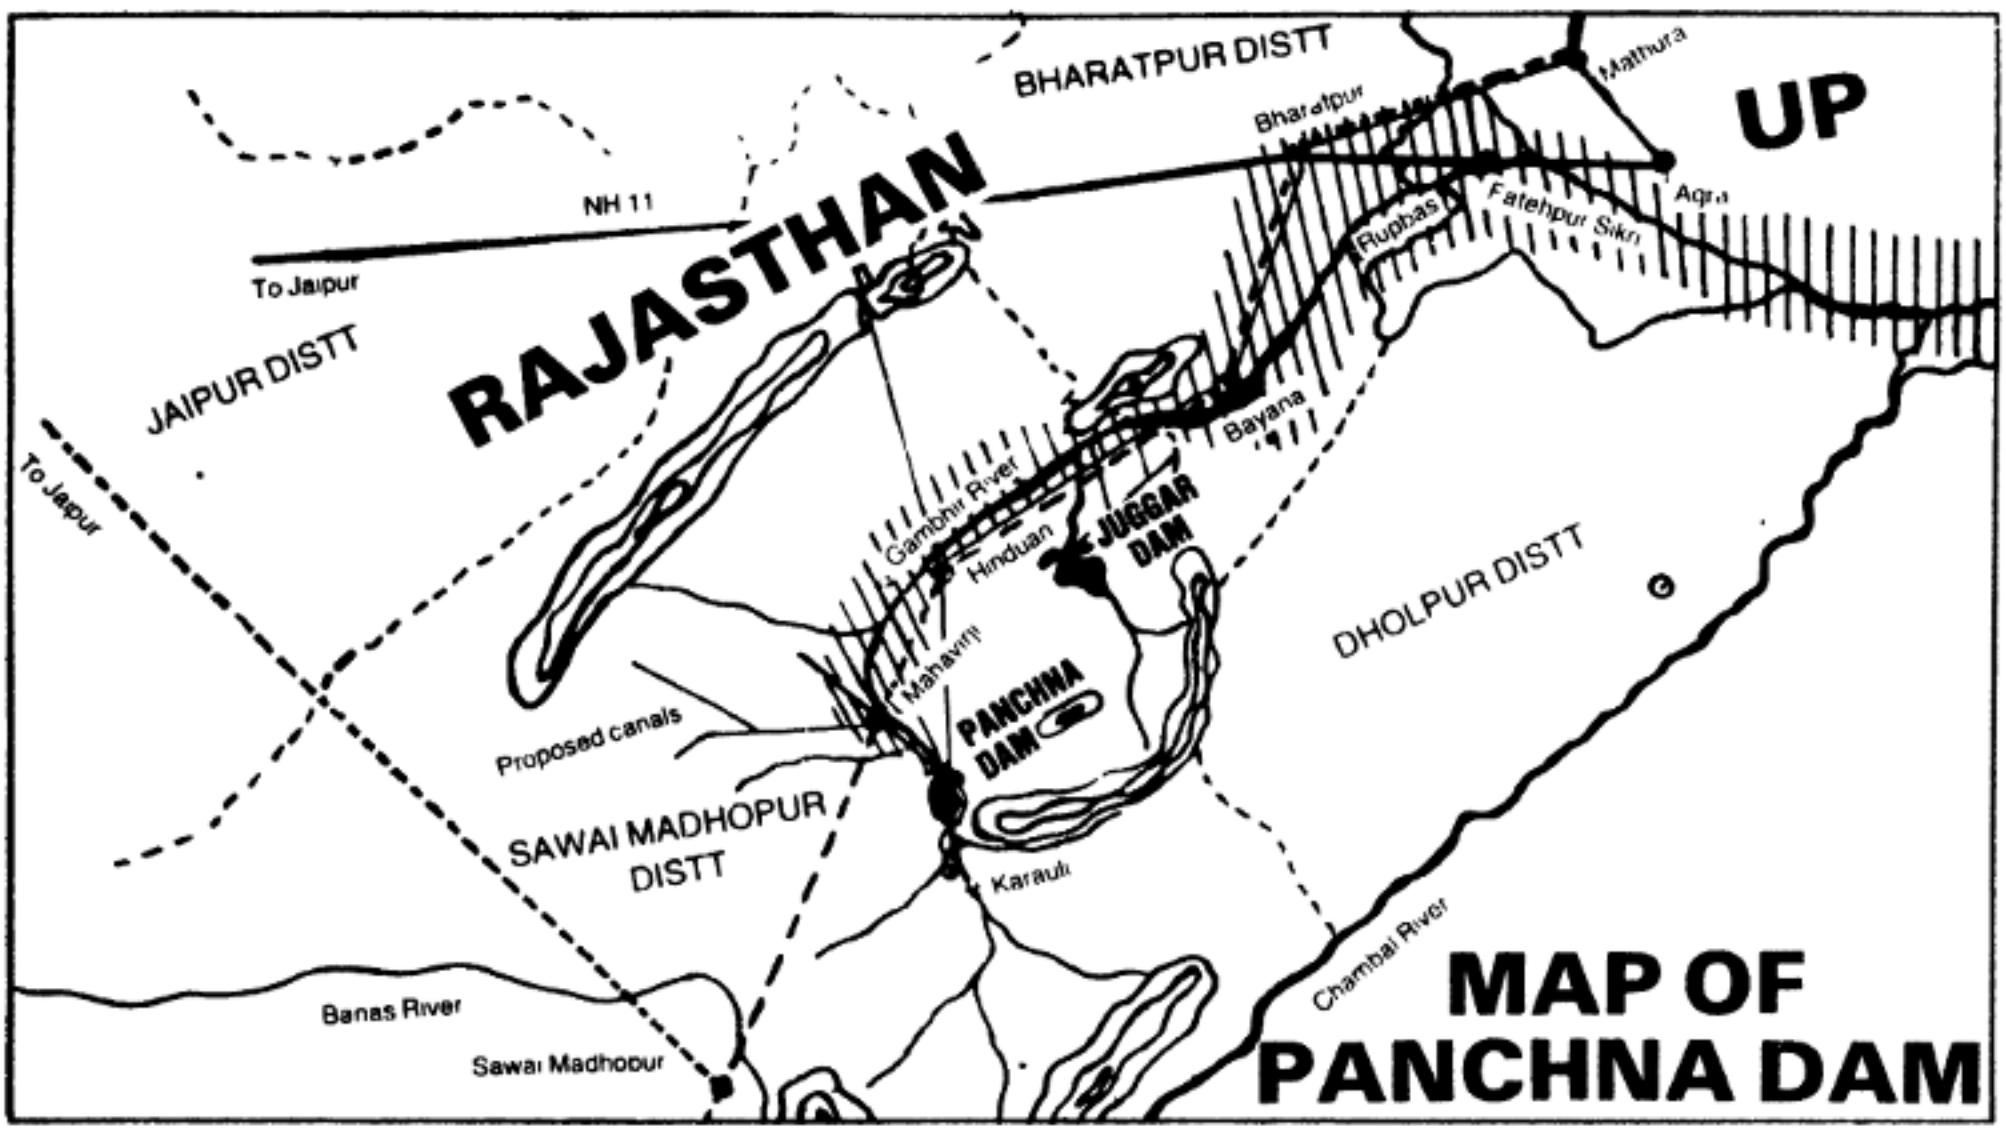
Anita Pratap, Trichur

RAJASTHAN

The Dam of Doom

Investigations by experts vindicate report by SUNDAY

The investigative story, "The Sorrow of Rajasthan" (published in SUNDAY 15 April 1984), had revealed that people staying in a number of villages adjoining the Panchna dam, barely ten kilometres from Karauli, a town in the Sawai Madhopur district of Rajasthan, were panic-stricken. It said, "The cause of their anxiety is the massive Panchna dam on the river Gambhir, which, constructed with the least regard for safety rules and within a record time of six months, is as vulnerable as a sand dune. The dam meant to irrigate vast areas of land and thereby bring prosperity to the poor villagers will, in actuality, bring misery to these people"



In the original plan approved by the Planning Commission and the Central Water Commission (CWC), the Panchna dam was slated to store only 700 million cubic feet (cft) of water but at the construction stage, the original plan was revised to raise the storage capacity of the dam to 2,100 million cft by the then superintending engineer Devendra Nath Dhandha without obtaining an approval from the appropriate authorities.

Scientists taking soil samples at Panchna Dam

The original plan approved by the Planning Commission and CWC entailed an outlay of Rs 1.03 crores for a 45 feet high earthen dam, but its height was arbitrarily raised to 85 feet and Rs 6.5 crores were spent on the construction of the earthen dam. The total cost estimates have gone up to Rs 21 crores. Though the dam is still far from being completed, Mr Dhandha was honoured at a state function on 15 August 1982 by the State Governor for his "extraordinary skill in completing the Panchna dam in a record time."

SUNDAY had said that "the dam is in actuality a potential killer threatening to wash away the areas surrounding it...the Panchna dam is like a sand dune. It will burst the moment it is filled to capacity. In the event of such a happening, the worst affected will be the famous Jain pilgrimage centre, Shri Mahaviriji. The waters of the dam would also engulf towns like Hindaun, Bayana, Bharatpur and Fatehpur Sikri in addition to scores of villages up to Agra. The tragedy which might occur would surely be more horrifying than the one experienced a couple of years ago in Morvi, Gujarat."

A map of the Panchna Dam: the shaded area along the river Gambhir shows the areas likely to be affected

After the article was published, the government of India ordered the CWC and the Central Soils & Materials Research Station (CSMRS) to investigate the Panchna dam and to suggest remedial measures for improving it. The field investigation by the CSMRS scientists continued for a couple of months and included soil sampling from various places at varying depths to test the quality. The director ERDD-II, CWC, Mr Z. Hasan inspected the site along with deputy directors of CWC and CSMRS, and the superintending engineer and executive engineers in charge of the dam. The CSMRS and Mr Hasan have already submitted an interim report about the test results vindicating SUNDAY's stand.

The interim test report says that the Panchna dam is a mound of sand. It says, "the soil obtained in the sample checking had negligible effective cohesion value." Test reports indicate that the earth used for the construction of the embankment was either silt or fine sand. The CSMRS report says that in-situ permeability in the soil samples ranges from $1.77\times10-5$ to $8.85\times10-3$ cm/sec. which in a silt predominant soil calls for special protective measures to avoid erosion and piping due to high seepage gradient. Down-stream protection by means of filter drainage, pitching and turfing, are no doubt very important."

The investigating team collected two samples of soil from the area where clay is said to have been used in the construction of the dam. The samples contained 11 to 14 per cent clay. The report however says that whether the same soil has been used cannot be ascertained as the information on the soil characteristics of the core of dam is not available. "This can only be verified by tests on the samples collected from the core." But the fact that the materials used in the core were non-plastic has already been established by a few laboratory tests conducted earlier by the director (designs), Rajasthan. This has been mentioned by Mr Z. Hasan, director, ERDD-II, CWC in his letter dated 1 September 1984, addressed to the superintending engineer, Panchna Dam.

In his inspection report Mr Z. Hasan categorically states that materials used in the dam consist of fine sand and silt. "These materials offer little resistance against erosion and get scoured easily due to rain. Deep gullies and rain cuts were noticed on both up-stream and down-stream slopes." He says, "There is some seepage through the dam which is also seen on the down-stream...this seepage indicates that the material in the foundation and embankment are not impervious and the core of the dam is not effective, though the water level at the times of inspection was 2.06 metres below the excavated level of the spill cut."

Mr Hasan writes, "On the down-stream where the seepage has been noticed, rockfill has been dumped over a filter of gravel. The work of dumping the rockfill is being done on an ad hoc basis as the design for the dam is yet to be finalised based on the investigations undertaken." The director has stated that the dam was constructed before the design was approved, and without drawings of the cross sections

Mr Hasan in his inspection report has observed that the finalisation of the proposals for strengthening of the dam will be possible only after receiving the report of investigations carried out by CSMRS, but he is making certain suggestions to be implemented without delay "in order to avoid any deterioration in the present condition of the dam."

The CWC director has suggested that the top of the dam should be completed and proper drainage provided so that rain water is carried through surface drains. He also said that immediate action ought to be taken to repair the gullies formed by filling them with suitable materials.

With the SUNDAY article vindicated by the reports of the authorities, will the government take suitable action against the guilty engineers, contractors and their political protectors? Or will the government allow the Panchna dam to join the line of killer projects like Union Carbide Plant and allow tragedy to hit lakhs of people in Rajasthan?

Milap Chand Dandia, Jaipur

ANIMAL BEHAVIOUR

Research on the Rhesus

A lady's study on the monkeys of Tughlaqabad

At one time during her pregnancy she was so obsessed by monkeys that she actually feared she would give birth to one. People warned her that if she read and wrote so much about apes, her child would at least look like one, if not be one. Then came Dev Kabir, her son. "And I was so relieved," says Mrs Iqbal Malik. Her research on monkeys went ahead She kept visiting the Rhesus monkeys in the ruins of the Tughlaqabad fort near Delhi and did the first doctoral thesis done in the country on the subject.

Monkeys at the Tughlaqabad fort and perhaps even the people around must have wondered why the lady wandered in the ruins the whole day, taking notes, playing little games with the monkeys or, at times, just sitting and watching. It was difficult initially, breaking into the monkey-domain. They attacked her, scared her and drove her away. But then it was all a matter of patience and understanding and few understand the monkeys of Tughlaqabad as well as Mrs Iqbal Malik, reader of Zoology at the Institute of Home Sciences, University of Delhi. She has studied them regularly since 1980 and continues doing it even after receiving her doctorate. "I have devoted my life to learning more about them," she says.

Iqbal Malik

It began as a childhood hobby. Mrs Malik was always curious about the animal world and specially about monkeys. That is why, she maintains, she studied Zoology—and incidentally got a first class first in her M.A.—but the interest remained latent till she met Dr Southwick, a renowned primatologist from the University of Colorado, on one of her trips abroad. Dr Southwick had already done some research on monkeys and he encouraged Mrs Malik to do it in India She did and produced a work that has been read and appreciated all over the world.

According to Mrs Malik the monkeys "are more organised than human beings." They live in well balanced societies with a rigid hierarchical system, have fixed habits and a daily activity pattern that is remarkably regular. What is more, it changes according to the season—siestas in the summer, long afternoons out in the winters. "Their behaviour is so organised, at any time I could tell where a particular monkey would be. They even have fixed sleeping places," she added

Male chauvinism too is an essential instinct among the monkeys. The group leader is always a robust male who walks with its tail up The females do the bulk of the work, but remain in the background and are paid little attention. One remarkable thing that Mrs Malik has noticed about this particular tribe in Tughlaqabad is the steep rise in the number of male monkeys over the last four or five years. When she had first gone to the area the male-female ratio had been at a normal 1.2.5. Today the males have made it up to bring the sex ratio to 1:1. One of the reasons for this might be the sudden rise in the monkey population in the fort from 120 in 1980, to 480 in 1985. And with this proliferation has come to surface another important characteristic of the Rhesus. The researcher found that the monkeys cannot withstand a boom in their population and once their number exceeds a certain limit there has to be a split. A group breaks away and establishes its own area of influence under a new leader. In the case of Tughlaqabad it was found that whenever the population touched 100, a fission occurred. Between 1980 and 1985 there have been five such fissions in the population.

But how will it help? In several ways, thinks Iqbal Malik who has now begun work on the evolutionary processes of natural selection and adaptation among the Rhesus monkeys. Over the years she has come to believe that the Tughlaqabad fort is the ideal habitat for the Rhesus and a deeper study of the environs here could help conservationists. Besides, these monkeys have one very important thing in common with human beings—the RH factor. Says she, "Various inferences about human behaviour can be drawn from Rhesus monkeys For example, the physiological reactions of the human body to a drought. One cannot experiment human beings for this, one certainly can on the Rhesus. "Man can be grateful to monkeys for more things than one."

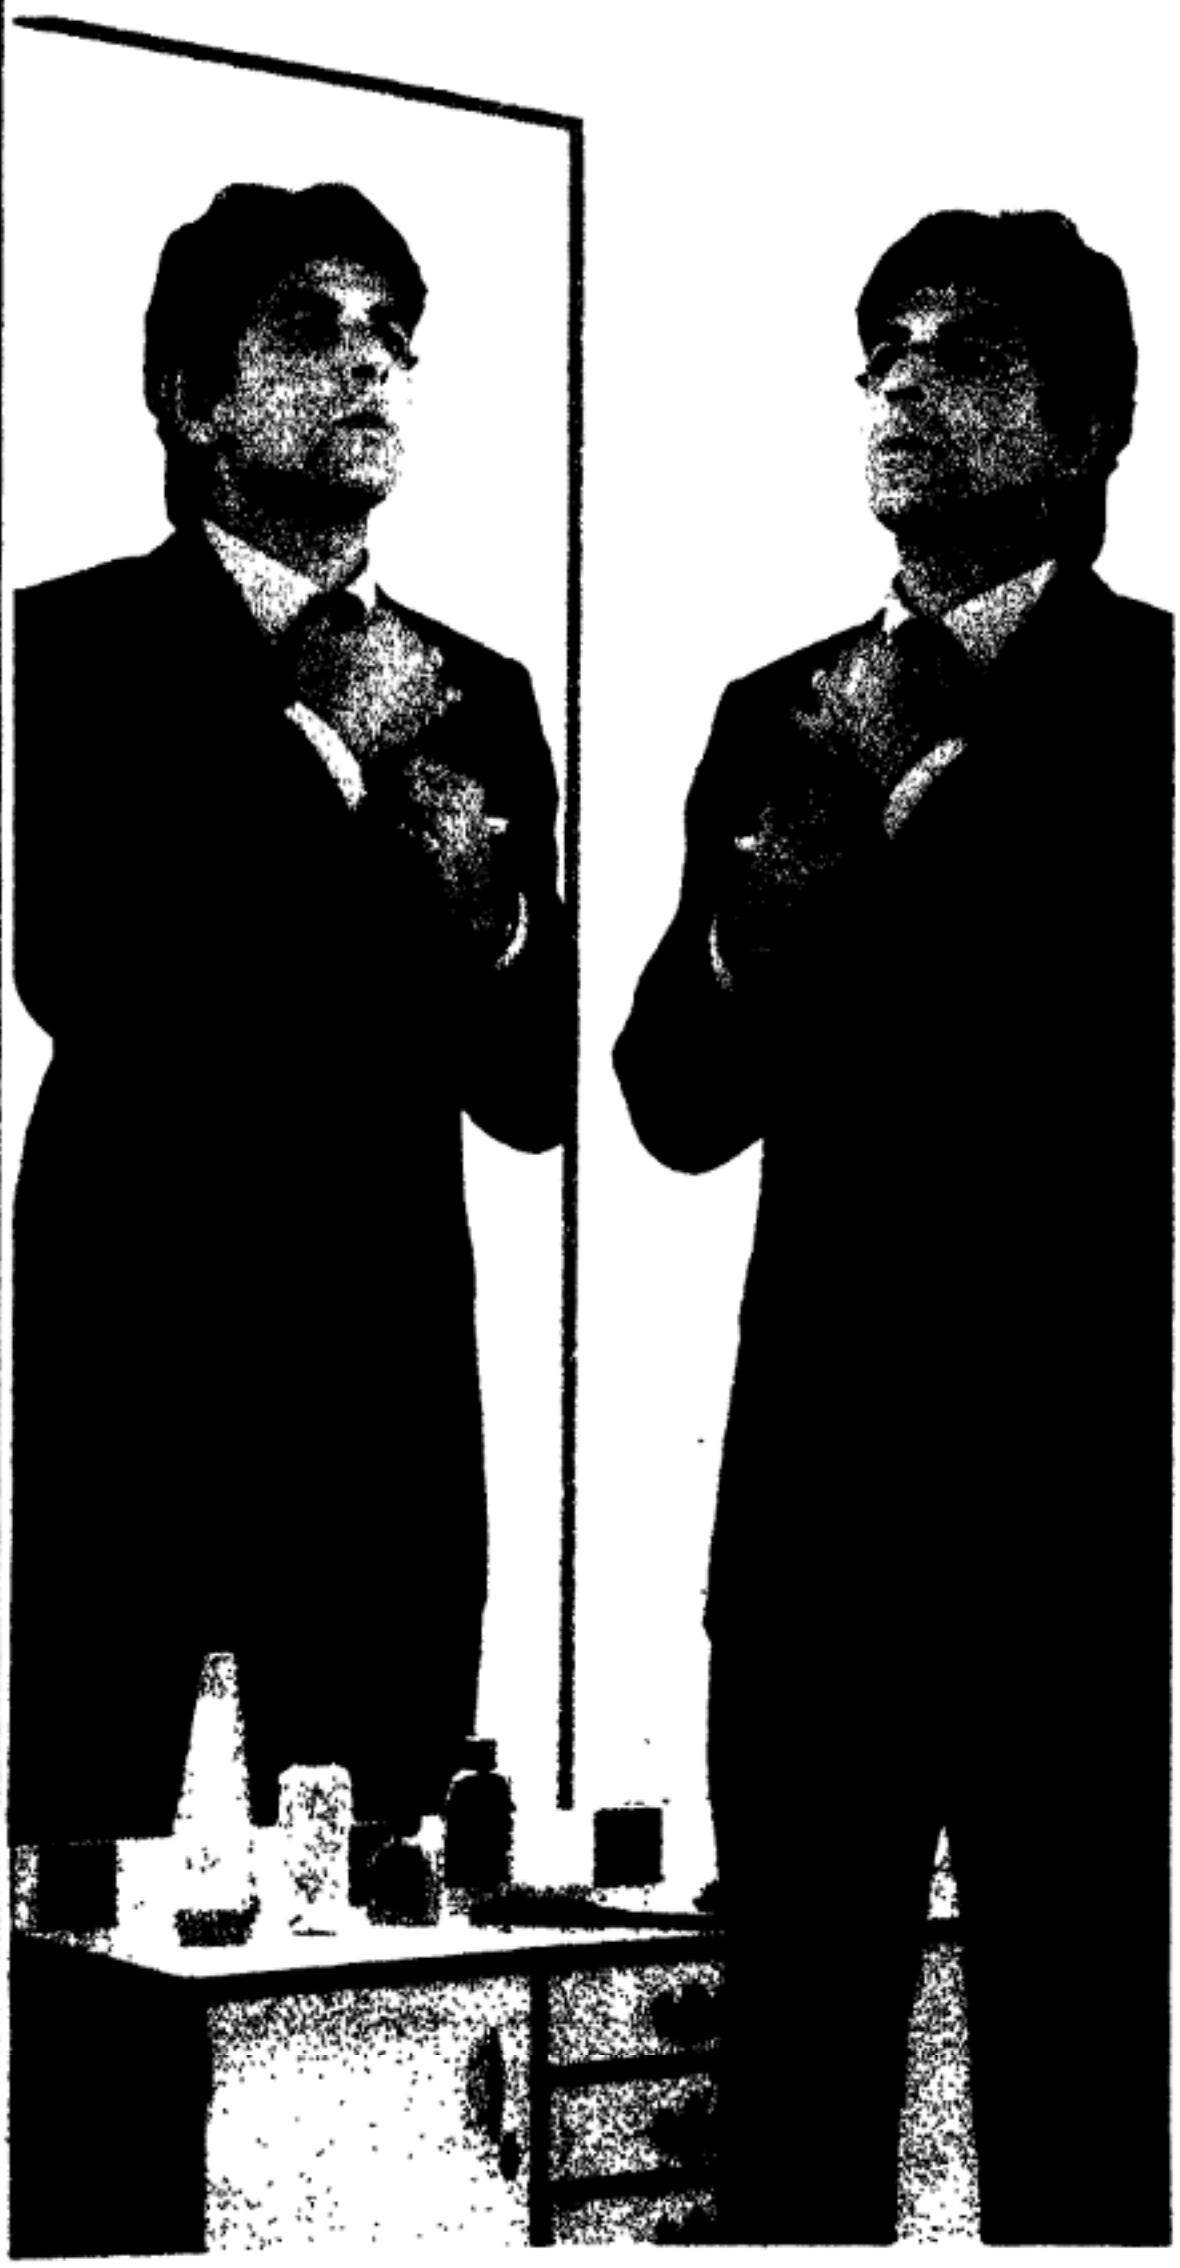
Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

NEW DELHI

What's in a Name?

At the behest of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, the proposal to rename Willingdon Crescent after Mrs Gandhi has been dropped. Soon after her assassination, the New Delhi Municipal Committee decided to name one of the capital's best known roads after Mrs Gandhi and the huge cement plaque on Willingdon Crescent bearing the road sign was rubbed off.

Till 25 February, the road remained nameless before Willingdon Crescent was again repainted on the plaque. It is believed that Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had expressed his "displeasure" at the municipality's haste in taking such a decision. The NDMC's proposal to rename Ram Manohar Lohia Hospital as Mrs Indira Gandhi Hospital was also turned down by the PM, who it is believed, does not like the idea of renaming public institutions with every change in government.



Lohia hospital used to be known as Lady Willingdon Hospital, after the wife of one of India's viceroys, although the word "Lady" was seldom used while referring to it. The name was changed after the Janata government came to power in 1977. Mr Gandhi is understood to have told civil and other government officials that they should put up proposals for the construction of new hospitals and other public institutions and desist from the practice of renaming old ones.

A Special Correspondent, New Delhi

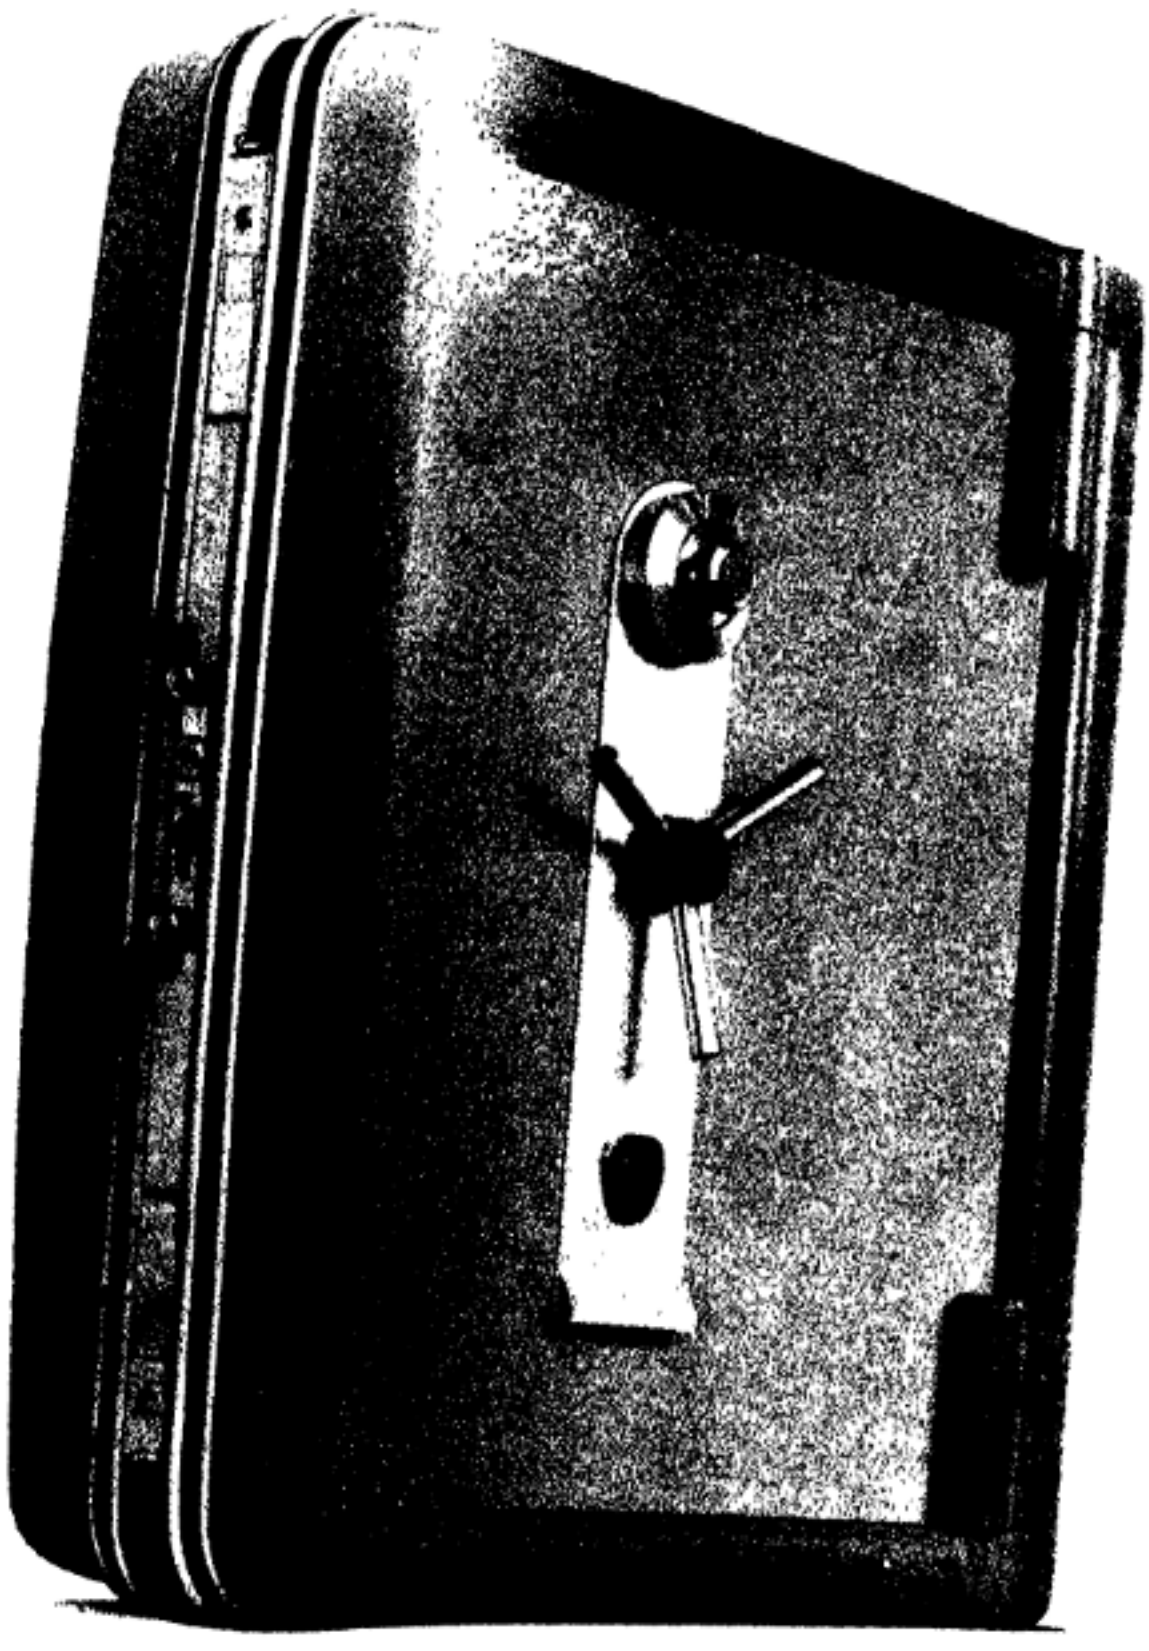
HINDON RIVER MILLS

DCM SILK MILLS

Catch your true reflection in these live, vibrant fashions.

Rich textures, subtle shades. In a wide range to complement your every mood. Woven on sophisticated, fully automated machines, stamped with the excellence of intensive R&D and indeed recommended by top fashion designers. An exclusive collection brought to you through India's most enlightened and largest chain of showrooms and retailers.

Suiting. Shirting.
Dress Materials.
Sarees.



HINDON RIVER MILLS

DCM SILK MILLS

Two of India's most sophisticated textile mills.

Available at more than 500 exclusive DCM Retail Stores and other leading textile stores.

You can take chances with your luck.
But if you want security of your luggage trust Safari.

Are they really worth it? Those anxious hours at airports or when you are away from your hotel room? When fear lurks in your mind that somebody has opened the bag and made off with the valuables inside.

The six-lever vault lock of Safari is specially designed for maximum security. As the key turns, a pilfer-proof slide engages into locking position to secure your bag. The locking slide is encased in a steel channel completely protected from tampering. Screwdrivers, knives or even more fearful implements in professional hands are known to have failed in opening the Safari lock.

Safari. It survives.

safari

The luggage that knows its business.

ULKA-SL-400-84

AIADMK

P.U. Shunmugam : Accused

Old charges brought up again

Fickle fate seems to enjoy playing games with senior AIADMK partyman P.U. Shunmugam. The former general-secretary of the AIADMK wielded immense clout during MGR's hospitalisation only to be eclipsed immediately after the CM's triumphant return. He received a boost when MGR made him the pro-tem speaker of the Assembly but then after he served his purpose he was discarded, not to be heard of till 18 March when he was inducted into the cabinet as minister for local administration Ever since he joined the AIADMK, Shunmugam had been nurturing hopes of becoming a minister one day. Unfortunately for him, his euphoria about becoming a minister was ruined by two nasty controversies, both taking place in rapid succession.

The first related to his alleged involvement in the sensational "attempt to murder Indira Gandhi" in 1978. When Mrs Gandhi had visited Madras in October 1978, the DMK had organised a black flag demonstration in protest against the arbitrary dismissal of the Karunanidhi government in 1976. The demonstration turned violent and a case was filed against the DMK chief M. Karunanidhi, DMK MLA Rahman Khan and P.U. Shunmugam (then in the DMK) by the state government charging them for making an attempt on Mrs Gandhi's life. The case is still pending in the court.

The Assembly witnessed heated exchanges on 25 March when the DMK objected to Mr Shunmugam's inclusion in the cabinet. Mr Rahman Khan (DMK) co-accused in the case, questioned the legitimacy of Mr Shunmugam becoming a minister when the case was still pending in court. He demanded to know how the prosecution could, without fear and interference, pursue the case against Mr Shunmugam who had now become a minister and, therefore, an integral part of the prosecuting government. He felt it was highly immoral for the AIADMK to have included Mr Shunmugam in the council of ministers during the pendency of the criminal case and drew attention to a number of examples when the minister concerned resigned his post when he figured in a criminal case. He cited the example of Goa's minister for education who resigned when he faced charges for exercising improper influence to secure a pass in an examination for his daughter A minister in Nagaland was asked to resign by the CM when it was learnt that he had misbehaved with a woman On the other hand, in Tamil Nadu a person who was implicated in a serious case of conspiracy and attempt to murder had been honoured by the same government, observed, Mr Khan In a bid to defend Mr Shunmugam's ministership, Mr K.P. Ramalingam (AIADMK) said that the Janata government at the centre had made George Fernandes a minister even though he was accused in the Baroda dynamite case. Mr Rahman Khan jumped up immediately to assert that Fernandes was included in the central cabinet only after the Janata government had withdrawn the entire Baroda dynamite case on the ground that it was a conspiracy to frame the opposition leaders.

P.U. Shunmugam

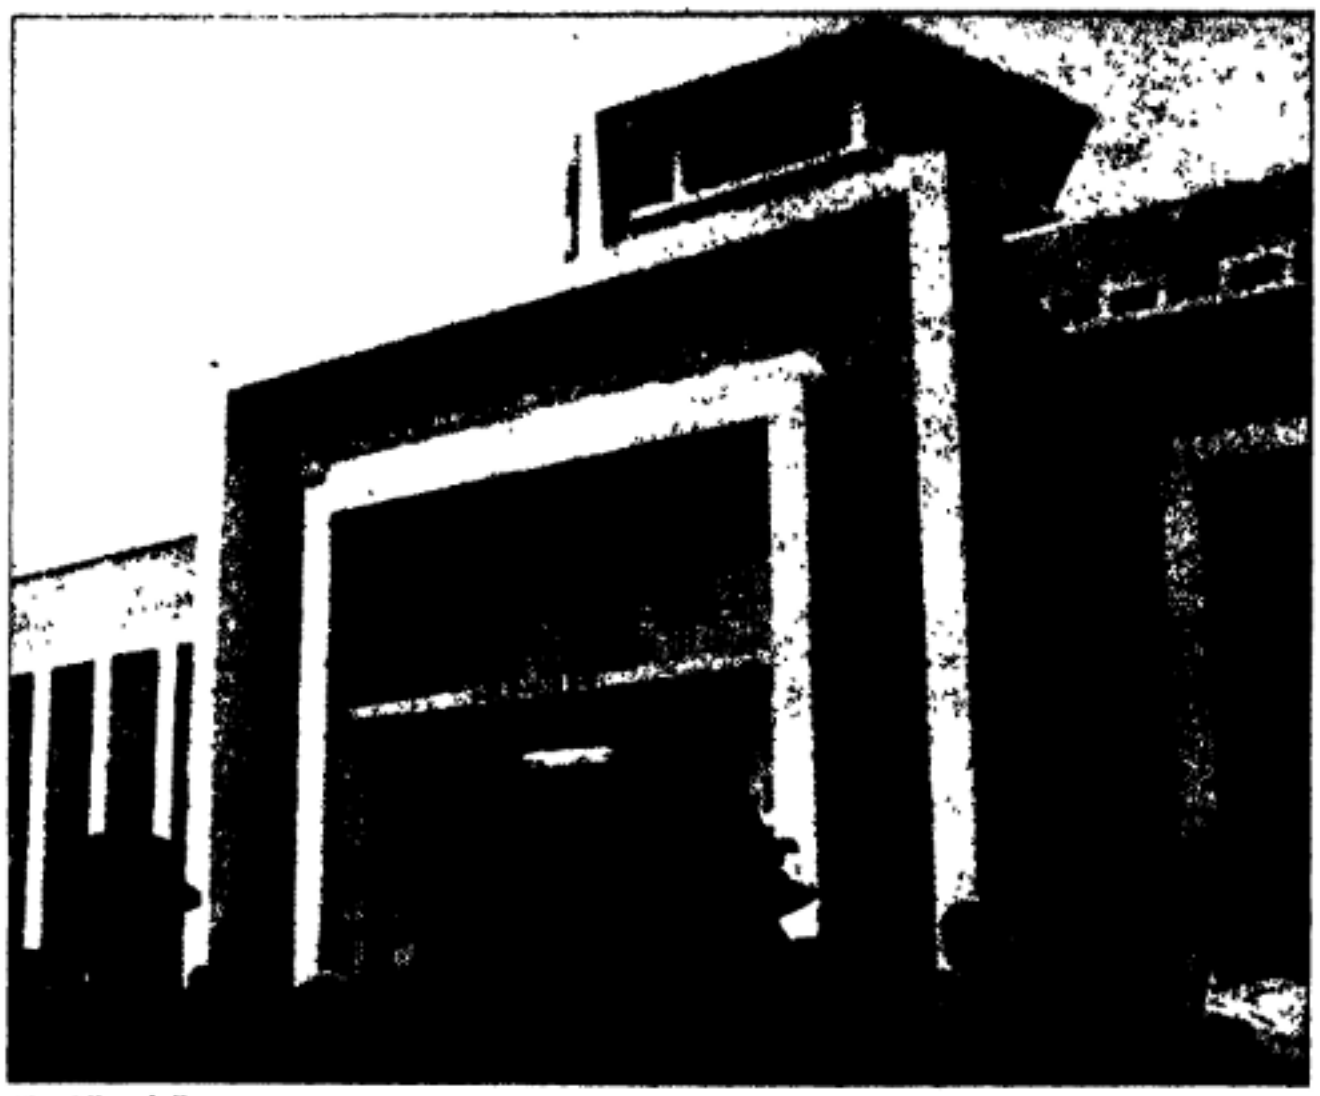
The result of the fiery salvoes fired by the AIADMK and the DMK in the Assembly was that Mr Shunmugam was forced to offer his resignation from the minister's post if he was found guilty by the court. That, ironically was his first statement in the house as minister The incident was undoubtedly a stormy start for the new minister but two days later he got embroiled in a nastier controversy. Damaging reports appeared in a section of the Tamil press the day after the incident in the Assembly According to the reports, the house of Mr Selvam (Mr Shunmugam's son) was raided by the Central Enforcement Directorate for FERA violations. Incidentally, Mr Shunmugam and his son stay together in the same house. The reports added that unaccounted wealth and foreign currency had been seized from Mr Selvam's possession. On 26 March attempts by Mr V.P Chintan (CPI-M) and Rahman Khan to raise the issue of the raid in the Assembly was quashed by the speaker P.H Pandian. The next day he disallowed an adjournment motion tabled by Mr Rahman Khan on the premise that the activities of a central government agency involving an individual did not concern the state government The entire opposition sans the Congress(I), staged a walkout.



Mr Shunmugam sought to defuse the situation by making a personal statement in the house. He categorically denied that there had been a raid on his house by the Enforcement Directorate. He condemned the press reports as being baseless and scurrilous. According to Mr Shunmugam, his son Selvam had gone to Malaysia recently. On his return he had been gifted with a video camera for which necessary customs duty had also been paid. On 11 March, an official from the foreign exchange department had come to inquire about the video camera. He returned satisfied after the necessary documents were shown. Mr Shunmugam's explanatory statement might have succeeded in settling the issue in the Assembly on that day but it has failed to quell the growing doubts and suspicious in the minds of the public, notwithstanding the official denials from the enforcement directorate. When contacted by this correspondent, officials of the enforcement directorate chose to be remain tight-lipped giving one the distinct impression that there was more to the case than met the eye The grapevine has it that the central government agency suspects Mr Selvam's alleged involvement in gold smuggling. In any case it is a little difficult to believe that an official would make an inquiry about a mere video camera, particularly if the customs authorities had issued the necessary documents.

Anita Pratap, Madras

PRISONS

A New Jail for Delhi

Tihar jail unable to handle increase in convicts

The Tihar jail

A 78-acre plot of land has been acquired by the Delhi Administration in the Trans-Yamuna area of Mandoli in Delhi for the construction of a modern and sophisticated jail. The idea for the new jail was first mooted in 1981 and a set of proposals was handed over to the government last year. According to the proposal, the new jail would cost Rs 27 crores and would be constructed by the year 1990.

Once the blueprint for the jail is approved by the home ministry and allocations made in the Seventh Five Year Plan, a committee of experts would be appointed to make a survey of the world's best jails. Said R.S. Sethi, inspector general (prisons), "We are planning to construct one of the most modern and secure jails in Asia. Experts in the field will be involved in the execution of the prestigious project." He added that various concepts in jail construction are presently being examined. One of the jails being studied as an ideal model for the Mandoli jail is the Talson prison in Houston, USA. Whether the basic design of the jail should be triangular, circular or multi-storeyed as is the trend in most Western countries will also be decided soon.

The need to construct a new jail for the capital has been felt for some time. The capital's Tihar Central jail constructed in 1958 does not have enough capacity to house the swelling population of criminals of the capital. The maximum capacity of the Tihar jail is 1,200 and because of the shortage of cells at Tihar, a camp jail meant for agitation prisoners has been constructed near Tihar. The camp jail is now called the Tihar District jail and houses about 800 convicts. The central jail has been divided into three independent units last year and separate sections have been marked for convicts, undertrials and women and juvenile prisoners.

When the Mandoli jail is constructed, the number of prisoners who can be lodged in prisons will double. The Mandoli jail is proposed to have a capacity to house 1,500 convicts and undertrials. It has also been suggested to the government that the jail have an independent unit for lodging women and juvenile prisoners and a separate jail to house mentally retarded prisoners. For prisoners who are convicted for less than a year, a borstal or an open jail (like the Hissar jail) will be constructed. There will also be a training institute, hospital, fire-fighting unit and school within the jail complex. To ensure tight security, a special police force will be trained and close-circuit television and metal detectors installed.

It had previously been suggested to the government that more than one new jail be constructed for the capital because of the growing crime rate and difficulty of transporting prisoners from courts situated at long distances. The idea was to construct five new jails, one for each district for the five district courts. But according to the inspector general, the only jail to be constructed for the capital shortly is the jail at Mandoli. There is, however, the likelihood of a third jail being constructed in North Delhi in a few years time. The Delhi Development Authority has already handed over the possession of the 78-acre plot at Mandoli for the new jail. The land has cost the Delhi administration Rs eight lakhs. Once the project is cleared by the government and the allocation of funds made, the construction of the most modern jail in India will commence.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

ANDHRA PRADESH

Mysterious Murder

Local businessman's death embarrassing for Telugu Desam

The new Telugu Desam government faced its first major embarrassing moment in the state Legislative Assembly over the mysterious death of a local businessman Amar Singh of Dhoolpet in Hyderabad. The liquor dealer's death raised a number of questions on whether he died as a result of a brutal beating by excisemen or due to a feud with rival excise contractors. Despite the state excise minister exonerating the officials of his department in the Assembly, the excise department's role in the circumstances leading to the death of Amar Singh is not clear. The most disturbing allegation is that Amar Singh was beaten to death in the presence of excise officials who had arrested him by goondas employed by excise contractors.

By all accounts, the 50-year-old Amar Singh, his son Anand Singh and nephew Prakash Singh were taken into custody from their home in Sitaphalmandi by an excise raiding party on 17 March at 7 am. Anand Singh and Prakash Singh were released after some time but Amar Singh was declared dead at the Osmania General Hospital later that day. Replying to a call attention motion in the Legislative Assembly, excise minister Mudragadda Padmanabhan described Amar Singh as a "notorious rowdy." "Even the excise department officials would be afraid to use force against such a person," the minister said. The arrests were made "with great difficulty" he added. The early morning raid on Sunday led to the recovery of 160 litres of illicit alcohol from his residence at Sitaphalmandi in Secunderabad. However the excise minister withdrew his description of Amar Singh as a rowdy after MLAs demanded that the minister provide proof of his allegation. Finally, home minister Vasanth Nageshwar Rao cut short the heated discussion when he announced that the government would order a thorough investigation into the affair by a crime branch CID team.

According to Anand Singh, the excise party which raided their house on 17 March was accompanied by musclemen of some excise contractors. He was taken with his father and cousin to the arrack depot at Narayanguda. His father, Amar Singh, was taken to another room and beaten mercilessly by the goondas of the contractors. Anand Singh and his cousin Prakash Singh were then brought to the Narayanguda police station but the excise officials told them that they were being merciful because they were young and told them to run away. They were told by the excisemen that Amar Singh was at Osmania Hospital. When they rushed to the hospital, they learnt that Amar Singh had died. Anand Singh said that the hospital authorities informed him that his father was brought to the hospital by a constable who fled after leaving the body without identifying either himself or the body. The two boys then lodged a police complaint.

As the news of Amar Singh's death spread in Dhoolpet a crowd of about 100 persons turned violent attacking arrack shops at Jumerat Bazar, Kolsawadi and Seetharambagh. In a letter to the chief minister, Mr N.T. Rama Rao, Anand Singh alleged that the excise men were in collusion with the contractors and had arrested them without a warrant and that it was the contractors' goondas and the excise men who were responsible for his father's death. According to a liquor dealer, Amar Singh had once been the kingpin in the city liquor business till he began concentrating on other business activities about four years ago. It is Amar Singh's son Anand Singh who has entered the liquor trade and many of the contractors are against it.

According to an excise department complaint made on 17 March at Narayanguda police station, three persons were arrested on that day and Anand Singh and Prakash Singh were lodged in the excise offices at Narayanguda but they escaped and Amar Singh was sent to hospital. The newly appointed excise minister's attempt to save his department's officials by saying that his department did not have a hand in the death-in-custody of the former bootlegger only created a greater furore. However, as a lot of heat has been generated during the discussion, the government decided to order a CID inquiry about the alleged death in excise custody.

Shubha Singh, Hyderabad

CRIME

Britain Seeks Sethia's Extradition

The British have sought the extradition of Rajendra Sethia. A request was made to the ministry of external affairs on 5 March, listing nine criminal charges faced by the Indian-born businessman in London, including one case against him by the Arab Allied Bank. The British High Commission has informed the foreign office that there is a warrant of arrest against Sethia for a case registered at London's Marlborough police station on 8 February 1984.

According to the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) officials handling the investigation of the case, no progress has been made as yet on the extradition case. They feel, the request would be processed only after Sethia is free of the criminal charges in India. A CBI team will also be leaving for London. Though no date has been fixed for the team's departure, the CBI is already in touch with Scotland Yard, Interpol and the Fraud Squad, London regarding transactions entered into by Sethia and his company, Esal Commodities in London.

Rajendra Sethia

Till 13 March 1985, the day when Sethia was remanded to judicial custody by Delhi's metropolitan magistrate K.C. Lohia, the CBI had received documents of the case from only one of the three Indian banks: The Punjab National Bank. All files of transactions with Esal and confidential reports of the bank on the case have been handed over to the CBI. This evidence is being examined and Sethia is being interrogated in his cell at the Tihar jail. However, documents from the two other banks, the Central Bank of India and the Union Bank of India, are still to reach the CBI.

A day before he was remanded to judicial custody, the CBI filed their first criminal case against Sethia. The case (No. RC 185) was registered with the chief metropolitan magistrate, Calcutta. It charges Sethia with forging a false passport under the name of Raj Kumar Dugar and also accuses him of attempting to flee the country under a false name on 2 March. Now, before the maximum period of 90 days when the judicial remand will expire, the CBI will have to examine all evidence against Sethia and file cases in Indian courts, before the legal process in Britain can begin.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi.

KERALA

Tug of War in the UDF

Infighting in the UDF hampers administration

The contradictory claims of the coalition partners of the United Democratic Front (UDF) ministry is stalling the smooth functioning of the administration and forcing the government to eat humble pie at every stage. The latest political stunt comes from the Indian Union Muslim League (IUML) and the four-member National Democratic Party of the high caste Nair Hindus. The IUML claimed a Rajya Sabha seat from the two which were represented by UDF partners, Congress(I) and the Kerala Congress. They had no claim whatsoever on the seat but it was part of the by-now-common ruse adopted by all the parties in the UDF, to get "benefits." As "reward" for withdrawing their claim to the seat, the IUML forced the government to withdraw two important measures.

The Governor P. Ramachandran had announced in his speech before the budget session that the Public Works Department would be split for administrative convenience. The PWD portfolio is handed by deputy chief minister and IUML leader, Avukaderkutty Naha, who gave the green signal to the proposal thus paving the way for part of the department to go to Congress(I) irrigation minister, M.P. Gangadharan. But the IUML rank and file, however, was not willing to yield a "profitable" part of their ministry. Another Bill which the IUML forced the government to withdraw is the Kerala Private Forests (vesting and assignment) Amendment Bill 1984 which aims to reopen cases against North Kerala landowners (mainly Muslims) who had, through court cases, reclaimed forest land taken over by the state government. The Achuta Menon government through the Kerala Private Forests (vesting and assignment) Act 1971 had taken over nearly two lakh hectares of forest land in North Kerala to be given to the landless but the Muslim landowners struck back through the courts and got back nearly 60,000 hectares of the land. The new Bill would help the government to fight these cases again with foolproof evidence but the chief minister capitulated before Muslim landowners' interest and has promised to withdraw the Amendment Bill. The landless will have to wait while the UDF changes its attitude.

Three legislators of the National Democratic Party recently wanted their ministerial nominee to be dropped and threatened to quit the party. After efforts for a reconciliation failed, the chief minister asked the NDP health minister, Ramachandran Nair to go on leave to avoid a showdown. The minister's faction has threatened dire consequences if he is dismissed. Meanwhile, in an interesting development, the Marxist MLA Varkala Radhakrishnan gave notice for a privilege motion in the House alleging that the health minister "has been wilfully prevented from presenting himself before the House."

Binoo John, Trivandrum

BUSINESS

Deeper in the Red

Disastrous performance by state-government owned firms

Mismanagement, negligence and callousness by the state-owned companies in Kerala has resulted in a disastrous performance in 1983-84 with only one of the seven major companies showing a profit. These seven companies, under the Kerala State Industrial Enterprises Limited suffered a total loss of Rs 473.79 lakhs compared to a loss of Rs 227.93 lakhs the previous year.

That the state government industries department lacks proper management techniques is evident from the fact that most union government enterprises in Kerala have performed well. The Fertilisers and Chemicals Limited, for instance, showed a significant improvement by transforming a loss of Rs 711 lakhs in 1982-83 to a marginal profit of Rs 10.54 lakhs. Hindusthan Latex Limited, manufacturers of Nirodh contraceptives earned a profit of Rs 82.97 lakhs last year and capacity utilisation reached an all time high of 98.3 per cent. Instrumentation Limited which manufactures control valves, safety relief valves and other equipment recorded a growth rate of 13 per cent and the sales turnover increased from Rs 1260.63 lakhs to Rs 1485.85 lakhs in 1983-84. The unit's net profit before taxation was Rs 298.72 lakhs. Another union government venture, Modern Food Industries, is also operating with a profit of over Rs 73 lakhs this year.

The Kerala government's industrial plans are evidently bogged down by red tape as in the case of the Small Industries Service Institute. The institute prepares about 100 reports on reserved industries, ten industry prospect sheets and 14 all-India reports. The technical consultancy service of the institute organised three seminars and one open house discussion on "non-destructive testing of castings." Officers of the institute took part in 14 plant-level committee meetings and visited 20 units to "explore the possibilities of further ancillarisation." Yet, in one year, the institute has identified only nine new items for ancillary development at a considerable expense.

The coir industry which employs 4.30 lakh workers is facing a shortage of coconut husks and the decline in demand of coir products. Coconut husks procured last year was about Rs six crores less in value in 1983 and in a desperate effort to better the plight of coir workers, cooperative societies including manufacturing societies have been formed, bringing about 52 per cent of the work force under its wing.

The Kerala State Road Transport Corporation is also facing numerous problems. Recently, the government announced the division of the corporation into five sections, but the plans had to be withdrawn a week after the announcement due to a strike threat by transport unions. Successive governments in Kerala have made it a "habit" to nationalise routes without having buses to run on them. In fact, the city transport system in Trivandrum, the state's capital, is so poor that commuters have to wait over two hours each day to reach destinations less than ten kilometres away. However, the novel suggestion by the Congress(I) MLA M.M. Hassan in the Assembly recently to float cooperatives for the unemployed for running buses in the city was not accepted by transport minister Sunderesan Nadar.

Binoo K. John, Trivandrum

STOCK MARKETS

A Post-budget Boom

Bullish trend in share prices

While economists were lauding V.P. Singh for his innovative budget and the chief minister of West Bengal Jyoti Basu denouncing it as 'anti-people,' the stock markets all over the country were gearing up for one of the biggest tijis seen in recent times. V.P. Singh's budget may have been to the inconvenience of the common man, with the rise in petrol prices but the industrial sector of the country couldn't have hoped for a better budget.

The finance minister's carrot for the industries included an increase in the assets limit for MRTP companies from Rs 20 crores to Rs 100 crores, an increase in the wealth tax exemption limit from Rs one-and-a-half lakhs to Rs two-and a-half lakhs as a cut in the top rate to two per cent, and a reduction by five per cent in the structure of corporate taxation in the country. To top it all, the minister announced that corporate tax the following year would be further reduced by five per cent, while in the third year he proposed to do away with surcharge on income tax payable by companies. Among the other direct incentives, the estate duty and the Compulsory Deposit Scheme (CDS) were abolished.

The budget, in addition, delicensed 25 broad sectors of the industry so that procedural delays were cut to the minimum in sectors where maximum capacity was required. This included electronic equipment, machine tools, leather goods, steel structurals, drugs and drug intermediaries. For the tea industry, the companies concerned were permitted to plough back 20 per cent of their profits for replantation. All these factors were directed at making the Indian industry more competitive and sensing the veering of the economy towards the laissez faire system, the stock markets in the country boomed. The word boom, however, would be an understatement. Most values recorded a rise seldom seen in the life of the market.

What was initially regarded as a budget which "did not carry a thing to promote investment in equity shares of companies and a sore disappointment to marketmen" resulted in an extraordinary strengthening of values. Among the first to respond to the relief accorded to the tea industry—marketmen had anticipated just the reverse—was Tata Tea. Having touched Rs 68.75 at its lowest limit on the eve of the budget on nervous bull liquidation and short selling, the scrip soared to Rs 76 on the very evening the budget was announced. Pivotals were mainly traded in Calcutta that evening and with the exception of Peico Electronics, which climbed from Rs 50 to around Rs 55 within a few hours, few scrip recorded sizable gains immediately.

On 17 March, most scrip began to shake off their lethargy. Tata Tea had by now lifted to Rs 80 on kerb trading, Assam Frontier changed hands around Rs 52, a rise of Rs four, Doom Dooma improved from Rs 67 to Rs 78, while George Williamson strengthened by Rs eight to Rs 84. By the end of the week, more precisely 21 March, the stock markets in Bombay and Calcutta had recorded unprecedented gains. ACC, Rs 411 on the day of the budget, had touched Rs 440, Colgate from Rs 197.50 moved to Rs 244, Indian Organic had advanced from Rs 62 to Rs 71, Ingersoll Rand had progressed from Rs 189 to Rs 221, Reliance Textiles had moved ahead from Rs 143.50 to Rs 165.50, SPIC had climbed from Rs 55.25 to Rs 63.25 and Indrol had shot up from Rs 120 to Rs 161!

In Calcutta, Tata Tea went ahead to touch Rs 90, George Williamson firmed up to Rs 92, Warren Tea shot up from Rs 45 to Rs 66, Peico Electronics touched Rs 64, Lipton India from Rs 29 touched Rs 39, while Hind Motors, denounced previously by speculators, soared from Rs 38.50 to Rs 46 in the post-budget trading. "I have never seen the market move like this," said Shashikant Doshi. 'Thestock market always works in anticipation of the future. The market had responded to the five per cent corporate tax cut of this year and the next year as well. The future of most industries is bright " Doshi felt that the rest of the year would also be bullish.

Hectic activity after the budget

The speculative splurge both in Bombay and Calcutta prompted the stock exchange authorities to modify conditions to curb the runaway rise in values. Initially, the Calcutta Stock Exchange (CSE) authorities forbade speculative transactions in Tata Tea, asking brokers to square up transactions and submit daily accounts of purchases and sales. As a result, the rise in Tata Tea was restrained to Rs 90. Next, the authorities in Calcutta halted trading in 11 other scrip an ' finally froze the entire hand delivery section, asking the brokers to wait before the payments were finally made.

Mr S.L. Bardhan, president of the CSE felt that this runaway trend poses a threat to the technical position of the market. Most marketmen felt that with the entire year's progression being concentrated in a single clearing, most scrip had soared by Rs 10 and 20. Short sellers were reduced to hectic short covering. Coupled with bull support, the market stretched all limits As a result, short sellers yielded some Rs 13 crores (unofficial source) in the process.

Mr Bardhan was of the opinion that this boom was basically due to certain operators from the commodity market who had made quick gains there and capitalised on the stocks boom. Moreover, the bullish interpretation of the budget along with higher advice from Dalal Street lifted pivotals. As a result, the Business Standard share price index which was 189.3 on 30 July last year, 192.3 on 28 December and 209 before the budget, shot up to almost 220 on 29 March. 'The market sentiment is exceptionally strong," said Shailesh Bhansali of Stewart and Company in Calcutta. "The extent of speculation is so vast that operators will readily buy 1000 shares of a particular scrip in forward trading but will not venture to pick up delivery of even 100 shares!"

Mudar Patherya, Calcutta

TIBET

A Chinese Takeover

Tibetans are becoming a minority in their own land

Since May 1984, over 60,000 Chinese workers have been brought into Tibet under the new economic programme, a fact that is worrying the 110,000 Tibetan refugees in India, and their emigre-government based in Dharamsala in Himachal Pradesh, as it means the reversal of the Chinese policy of 1980. That year Hu Yaobang, the secretary-general of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) had toured Tibet and publicly apologised for its economic backwardness and failure of the Chinese policies. He also promised to withdraw 85 per cent of the Chinese cadres from Tibet. During 1981 and 1982, some Chinese were sent back, but now, the flow appears to have been reversed.

According to sources in China, the new arrivals have replaced about 30,000 Tibetan workers employed by the Lhasa municipality's 16 labour units and the Tibetan workers have been advised to find jobs in villages. About 20,000 Tibetans in other towns like Gartok, Xigatsay and Gyantsey have also been replaced. The Chinese claim that the new arrivals are "technical experts" and "semi-skilled workers" who have come to complete developmental projects in Tibet for which local people are not available. But the refugees do not think so. "How come these new arrivals have dislodged manual Tibetan workers from jobs," ask Tibetan youths.

Refugee sources add that the new settlers are young males who have been promised higher living standards and permanent stay in Tibet by the Chinese authorities if they marry Tibetan women. Tibet watchers feel that it is a part of an overall strategy by Beijing to make Tibetans a minority in their own land. To substantiate their argument, they cite the example of four principal minority groups in China, including the Manchus of Manchuria and the Mongols of Inner Mongolia, who have now been swamped by Chinese Hans in their own lands. In 1950, Chinese settlers formed four per cent of the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region. Now they form 54 per cent of the population.

Till 1950, Tibet an independent country did not have any Han population. The severely cold and dry climate and the absence of roads connecting China to Tibet had made Tibet a remote and difficult land for the Hans. But after the People's Liberation Army (PLA) moved into Tibet in 1950, Beijing began its policy of colonisation of Tibet. First, they divided Tibet into the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and eleven autonomous districts and two autonomous counties severing two-thirds of Tibet. These areas were then merged with Chinese provinces. "The bulk of Tibet has statistically vanished, making the remainder (TAR) seem small and insignificant," says Tenzin Lhundup, an expert on Tibetan affairs.

During the last 30 years, the erstwhile south-eastern and north-eastern districts of Tibet which have been merged into the provinces of Sichuan and Chinghai, are being repopulated by Hans. So is TAR (U-Tsang, as the refugees call it), where about half a million Chinese civilians (three times the number of Tibetans) now live There are also half a million PLA troops stationed in Tibet.

Dalai Lama

The refugees are alarmed at the large scale arrests of Tibetans in TAR. Even Amnesty International (AI) in its September 1984 report has discussed the prisoners of conscience detained in Tibet. These include: "Tibetan nationals detained on religious grounds or accused of supporting regional independence, people arrested at various times for showing loyalty to the exiled spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhists, the Dalai Lama, and other peaceful activities" in Tibet. Refugee sources say that over 100,000 Tibetan political prisoners are incarcerated in 17 major and numerous lesser or district level prisons. Tenzin Lhundup claims that Amdo (now Chinghai) houses China's largest network of prison camps, with over ten million inmates.

While the Chinese are going about with the colonisation of Tibet, they have also initiated a dialogue with 50-year-old Dalai Lama Tenzin Gyatsho, about his return and also of the Tibetan refugees to Tibet. Besides three fact-finding missions from Dharamsala to Tibet in 1979 and 1980, two delegations of the Dalai Lama also visited Beijing in 1982 and 1984 for talks. Both of them have met with no success. In fact, the 1984 delegation was humiliated in Beijing because the Chinese publicised to the press the five conditions they have set for the Dalai Lama's return, before discussing them with it. The Chinese said that the Dalai Lama was welcome to visit Tibet or settle down in China "to promote unity between the Han and Tibetan nationalities." But he would have to accept Chinese rule over Tibet, live in Beijing except for occasional visits. In return, he would be nominated as one of the 22 vice-chairmen of the National People's Congress, (the Parliament of China) like the Panchen Lama, who has been staying in Beijing since 1979.

The Dalai Lama says that Tibet is geographically, racially, culturally and historically different from China and has never been an integral part of China. However, the Chinese leaders disagree. "It will never do for anyone to play with the idea of an independent Tibet," told Yang Jingren, head of the United Front Work Department of the CCP, to the Dalai Lama's 1984 delegation. The Tibetan refugees are genuinely worried about the deliberate attempts by the Chinese to settle Han people in Tibet. The refugees fear that if colonisation goes on unchecked for another two or three decades, the Tibetans would not only become a minority but also politically insignificant.

The only thing which may slow down the colonisation of Tibet, is the harsh climate to which Hans adjust with great difficulty. The high cost of living and lack of modern facilities, especially in rural areas are other discouraging factors. The worst problem is the hostile attitude of Tibetans towards Hans. Despite 30 years of Chinese presence in Tibet, the local population rarely mix with the Hans.

A.J. Singh, Dharamsala

MALAYSIA

On the Road to Prosperity

But racial tensions are causing problems

Prime Minister Datuk Mahathir Mohammed may not have the overpowering magnetism of Tunku Abdul Rahaman, the builder of modern Malaysia, but he does have a certain amount of charisma. Malaysians fondly remember him to be the man who led the Barisan Nasional (National Front) coalition to a runaway victory in the 1982 general elections and brought economic prosperity to the country.

The Mahathir government has kept the economy afloat by increasing the exports of its rich natural resources like tin, rubber, palm oil, timber and by producing enough petroleum to meet its internal requirements. With its per capita income of $2,000, Malaysia's standard of living is higher than any other South or South-East Asian country apart from Singapore. According to economists, the standard of living in Malaysia has not only been rising but also rising equably. There are indications that by the time the fourth Malaysian economic plan is complete, the economy will register a growth rate of 6.7 per cent and will be poised for a great leap forward.

But the government continues to face a number of problems. It is imperative that the country should have peace and stability in order to continue the economic revival and for that close cooperation between the three major constituents of the ruling coalition—the United Malay National Organisation (UMNO), Malay Chinese Association (MCA) and the Malay Indian Congress (MIC)—is necessary. Unless this can be ensured, emphasises Mahathir, who is also the president of the UMNO, the dominant partner in the ruling front, the ambitious development plans of the government will not succeed.

But the UMNO's allies, notably the MCA, have been affected by inner-party bickerings which have prompted the deputy Prime Minister Musa Hitam to state that the MCA would do well to "opt out of the Barisan (the ruling national front)" for a while and utilise the time to clear its internal problems. The national front leadership feel that if the MCA fails to come to terms with itself, it is likely to affect the ruling alliance and help the opposition parties—the fundamentalist Islam Sa-Malaysia

Datuk Mahathir Mohammed

(Pas) and the Democratic Action Party (DAP). The DAP enjoys the support of a large portion of the ethnic Chinese who comprise 36 per cent of the country's population of 15.2 million.

The suggestion by the deputy Prime Minister reflects the government's concern for maintaining the country's delicately balanced multi-racial political structure. The government has obviously not forgotten the lesson Malaysia had of the communist insurgency supported by the Chinese or the 1969 race-riots, the worst in the country's history. The Malaysian Communist Party (MCP) remains active, particularly along the Thailand-Malaysia border areas and ethnic tensions in the country though below the surface, continue to simmer.

What has alarmed the Malaysian government is China's financial assistance to the MCP. As the Prime Minister said during his visit to Australia last August, "China has failed to withdraw its political support to the various insurgent movements in South-East Asia including the Malaysian Communist Party whose membership is predominantly ethnic Chinese." This explains why the government is concerned about the MCA's continued infighting as every supporter the MCA loses to the DAP and the MCP could be a potential source of trouble.

Bhola Chatterjee, Calcutta

UNITED KINGDOM

A Plot to Kill Rajiv Gandhi?

Jagjit Singh Chauhan denies the Blitz report

Dr Jagjit Singh Chauhan, the self styled "President" of the "Republic of Khalistan" emerged recently in the garb of a man of peace. In a specially summoned press conference in London he gave a clear message of "peace and brotherhood" to "my people." But the literature he distributed at the press conference left no doubt of his intentions to carry on anti-Indian propaganda in this country, thanks to the licence given to him for the purpose by the British government.

The immediate purpose of the press conference was Dr Chauhan's intention to refute an article in Blitz on 9 March which warned of an alleged plot to kill Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in Paris. Dr Chauhan said, "The report in Blitz on 9 March is a total fabrication. I stand for the sovereign entity of the Sikh nation which the Indian government finds inconvenient. Therefore I am branded a terrorist...It is well known that I am a pacifist and disapprove of violence. I want to place on record a categorical denial that there is any plot hatched in Khalistan House to assassinate Rajiv Gandhi during his tour or at any other time or for that matter to assassinate anybody else."

Jagjit Singh Chauhan

Observers present at the press conference felt that Dr Jagjit Singh Chauhan had called the meeting, only because of the pressure put on him by the British government.

Peter Pandey, London

Kapoor's Latest Dimension

Nothing about the Raj Kapoor clan, the girth included, can be one-dimensional. Ritu Nanda of Niky Tasha fame does not go in for simple televisions. The one she launched, with Papa Kapoor, looking like a benign godfather at her side, in late March is 3-D, priced at Rs 9,300 with four pairs of glasses, one lens green, the other red. The 3-D television was duly garlanded and a tilak was put on it. Raj Kapoor said in his vote of thanks that India had two sacred rivers: the Ganga and the Jamuna and that he hoped the tributary of his family, his Ritu, would flow on smoothly and do good work. Kapoor has obviously forgotten his Sangam.

Ritu Nanda (centre), managing director of Niky Tasha with her father Raj Kapoor (left) and Hasso Hoffman (right), at the launching of the company's 3-D television in New Delhi

Ritu's new television requires a third angle—the 3-D technology has been provided by a West German firm, Abdy, whose chairman Hasso Hoffman was present at the launching. India is the first country outside West Germany to acquire this technology.

Media Watcher Extraordinary

The death of Iqbal Malik, 64, the noted media critic will create quite a vacuum in the critics' circle. A former deputy director general of Doordarshan, Malik kept the official dispensers of information and entertainment on their toes with his incisive pen. Seldom one to mince words, Malik had recently become quite a severe critic of Doordarshan, knowing as he did the scene from inside that red brick building in New Delhi. He set up the first TV training school in the country. His demise will be a loss to his wife, Amita Malik, herself a noted critic.

Dance of Life

Chandralekha with her startling white hair and her haunting, beautiful face is herself a celebration of life. The danseuse extraordinary who captivated Europe with partner Adonis—like partner Kama Dev some years ago—stunned audiences in Bombay with her 'Angika' recently. Conceived, choreographed and directed by her, 'Angika' puts the body and innovation back into the centre of the dance. Since her return to the dance stage last year, after dabbling in various things in the meantime, Chandralekha has in the world of dance created quite a stir by stripping Bharatnatyam of the merely decorative or ornamental and zeroing in on the essence and the essential. It is, as she says, "dance divested of esoteric, idealised, sublimated, exclusive notions of origin and reinterpreted in terms of the poetry and power in the bodies of men and women." Chandralekha gives us the traditions of dance and the body language in India—and a song of the self in all the Whitmanesque sweep and verve.

Chandralekha

Understanding India

Playing Holi in Vrindavan can lead to colourful encounters. Moira Moynihan, the effervescent daughter of former US envoy to India, Daniel Patrick Moynihan was like a giggling rainbow in Vrindavan during Holi when she came across Rajiv Sethi, the festival man who has exported movable melas in the past. Mrs Moynihan is now the special assistant to Sethi for the Folk-Life Festival which will be held in the foyer outside the venerable Smithsonian Institute in Washington DC this fall. Inside, there will be Aditi, a celebration of life a la Indienne. There is even an organisation called Friends of Aditi Society in the US which has as its members Mrs Moynihan and Mrs Shankar Bajpai, wife of the Indian envoy to Washington DC.

Another Ascent

New Zealand could not have sent a better man than Sir Edmund Hillary to New Delhi to break the ice: New Zealand closed down its High Commission in India three years ago for reasons said to be economic. Muldoon, the previous Prime Minister, blew hot and cold and Sir Edmund will be the first High Commissioner after the interlude. This man of the mountains who was the first along with Tenzing Norgay to scale the summit of the Everest is a familiar and well-loved face in the country having returned a number of times—whether it is to lead expeditions down the Ganga on rafts or visit friends or one of his favourite cities, Calcutta.

Edmund Hillary

This is also the mountaineer diplomat's first regular job, beekeeping and farming were previous preoccupations. Among Hillary's priorities is to increase the trade between the two countries, not forgetting the human factor.

VARIETY

THIS INDIA

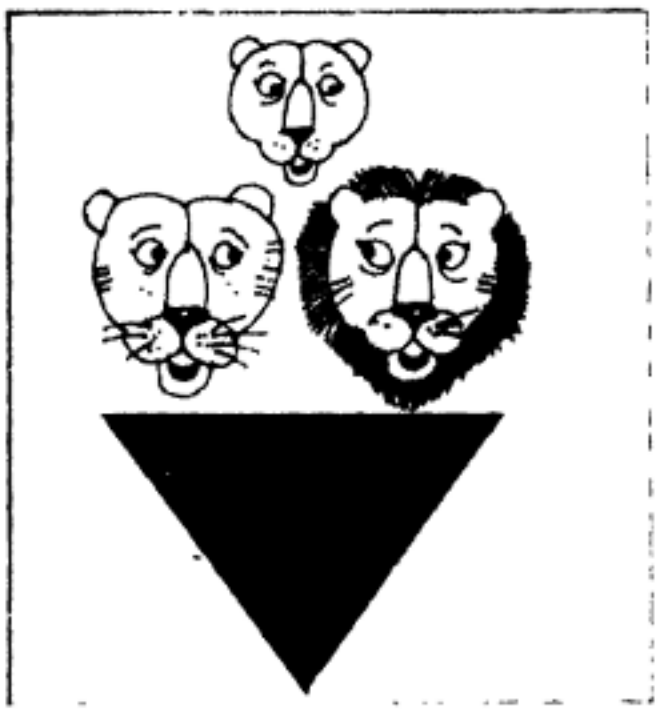

Illustration: Debashis Deb

BANGALORE: Lions at the Banerghatta National Park near here will undergo vasectomy to prevent deformities in the progeny caused in breeding. According to Mr K.M.K. Appayya, chief wildlife warden, the park had obtained nine lions from the Mysore zoo of which three died. Inbreeding among the lions—a mixture of African and Indian breeds—had caused deformities and some cubs were born crippled, he said. Attempts to secure other lions from zoos in exchange for those at the park also proved futile—The Searchlight (K.P. Roy, Patna)

JAMMU: Jagdish Chander of Aligarh has chosen an unusual way of pilgrimage to Vaishnodevi. He crawls his way to the holy shrine. By the time he entered this holy city on 9 March, he had crawled 1,400 km, taking 15 months to do it—The Times of India (Hardeep Singh Gill, Chandigarh)

TIRUPATI: A Hyderabad-based Muslim business magnate recently offered to the Tirumala Tirupati Devasthanams 108 flowers made of gold foils worth over Rs five lakhs with a request to use them for Lord Venkateswara at the time of archana. Accordingly the temple authorities are using them every Tuesday at the time of the Ashtoththara Nama Archana, an early morning ritual—The Hindu (S. Jayaraman, Thanjavur)

RAMANATHAPURAM: The Ramanathapuram district collector, S. Gurumurthi, who has been confronted with the problems created by the unprecedented influx of the Sri Lankan Tamils, has been called upon to perform the functions of a "marriage broker." Talking to newsmen here on 8 March, he said he had received a letter recently from a young Malaysian businessman, expressing his desire to marry any one of the refugee girls who had reached India. The 28-year old businessman, Mohan, had left the selection of a bride to Mr Gurumurthi's choice—The Times of India (D.N Rajan, Kalwa)

BOMBAY: If the business of insurance is all about protecting man from the acts of God, the Indian insurance industry is one up on its counterparts elsewhere: it is indemnifying the Lord's property against the acts of man. The temple of Lord Venkateswara atop the hill at Tirumalai in Andhra Pradesh is fully insured for a "few crores" of rupees by the United India Assurance Company. The Tirumalai Tirupati Devasthanams (TTD) which administers the temple property, has also insured the jewellery on the idols against theft—Business Standard (R. K. Jaisansaria, Calcutta).

RAJKOT: Not a single vote was cast at Ribda booth of Gondal Assembly constituency in Rajkot district. The district collector, Mr Devendra Kumar Sikri, said that no one exercised his franchise—Indian Express (Amarjeet Singh Bhatia, Dehra Dun)

CALCUTTA: After nearly 26 years a suit, filed in Calcutta High Court on 28 May 1959, came up for hearing on 12 March. The plaintiff, Mr Dhiraj Ghosh, prayed for a declaration that he was still in class I service of the central government and that the order of termination of his services was illegal. Mr Ghosh was the regional tourist officer, posted in Calcutta, when his services were terminated on 26 September 1955. He was to have retired from the service in March 1967—The Statesman (Arun Gupta, Calcutta)

NAGPUR: A former Class IV employee and a minister's chauffeur will be among the new legislators taking oath as members of the Maharashtra Legislative Assembly later this month (March). Mr Harish More (Cong-S), who was elected from the Tiroda (reserved) constituency in Bhandara district, was until recently a Class IV government servant filling overhead water tanks at the MLA hostels here. A warm welcome awaits him from his former colleagues when he comes to stay in that hostel as an MLA. Mr Ramdas Gaikwad (Cong), who won from Akola, was a chauffeur of the state minister, Mr Ajhar Hussain, who did not get the party ticket this time. Mr Hussain not only proposed Mr Gaikwad's name in the nomination papers but sat in the driver's seat to campaign for his former driver—The Times of India (S. K. Sinha, Delhi)

WITHOUT COMMENT

I feel the finance minister is like a punching bag. At the first sight, there is an instinctive desire to give him a punch—V.P. Singh, union finance minister, in The Telegraph

I don't understand his English. Possibly he (Rajiv Gandhi) knows better since he had studied in Cambridge—Jyoti Basu, on Rajiv Gandhi's statement that the CPI(M) was exploiting Calcutta

I tell you, it's a good competition, healthy competition Whoever wins, will have no grouse but the competition should continue—Ramakrishna Hegde, on the competition between the two 'Mr Cleans,' Rajiv Gandhi and himself, in Current Opposition politics is a hard thing. It requires great patience and endurance—Chandra Shekhar in Asiaweek

Comrades, this man (Gorbachev) has a nice smile, but he's got iron teeth—Andrei Gromyko, speaking to members of the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee on 11 March, in The International Herald Tribune

It's only in India, Pakistan and Bangladesh that elections tend to be noisy affairs. Maybe because we are such noisy people—Zia-ul Haq in Probe India

As First Lady I'm an accident—an accident of being married to the President—Imelda Marcos, wife of President Marcos of the Phillipines, in Asiaweek

How shall I compare my experience in Calcutta...it is like Saul's journey through Damascus. My eyes opened in India and I realised in what terrible, frightful circumstances we are living—Gunter Grass in The Illustrated Weekly of India

BEGINNING 7 APRIL 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) This is a lucky week for most of you Businessmen and professionals will make steady progress Sportsmen and creative artists will also prosper during this phase The domestic front will remain peaceful. The phase is also favourable for marriage negotiations However, your financial prospects are not so bright Your health will add to your worries this week Legal problems pertaining to property will bother you

Good dates: 8, 10 and 12
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North-east

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) Those above the age of 35 years should keep a vigilant eye on their health. Businessmen should be wary of deception while professionals should be cautious while dealing with their superiors. Your financial prospects, however, will brighten but avoid extravagance Social engagements will keep you busy during the weekend. Those above the age of 45 should be careful of their health and diet.

Good dates: 7, 9 and 4
Lucky numbers: 5, 6 and 7
Favourable direction: West

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) This is a week of mixed fortunes. At home someone close to you may misunderstand you Students are advised not to fritter away precious time Financially this is not a good week and businessmen in particular should avoid risky financial deals However, this is a favourable phase for professionals: a promotion or a posting to a place of your choice cannot be ruled out. Your health will improve

Good dates: 9, 11 and 13
Lucky numbers: 6, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: South

CANCER (15 July—14 August) Success in all your ventures is a certainty for most of you this week. A job is in the offing for those unemployed. A promotion cannot be ruled out for those employed Businessmen should make the most out of this lucky period. This is also the ideal time to get married. Parties will keep you busy during the weekend but do not overstrain yourself Your health will also improve markedly A pleasant surprise is in store for most of you this week.

Good dates: 7, 8 and 9
Lucky numbers: 2, 4 and 5
Favourable direction: North

LEO (15 August—14 September) Professionals are advised to refrain from taking hasty decisions regarding their career. Do not lose your temper and deal with those at home sympathetically Social engagements will keep you busy during the weekend but do not mix business with pleasure. Lovers will find this period favourable Your health will also improve markedly but do not neglect your diet Your financial prospects will look up this week.

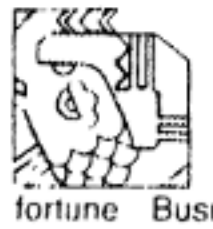
Good dates: 8, 9 and 10
Lucky numbers: 3, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: South-west

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) Friends and relatives will be very helpful to you. Businessmen will get opportunities to expand their business Those unemployed are likely to get jobs. A promotion cannot be ruled out for those employed in the public sector This is also a good period for marriage negotiations A letter will bring good tidings But do not neglect your health or diet Avoid unnecessary arguments with those at home.

Good dates: 9, 10 and 11
Lucky numbers: 1, 4 and 8
Favourable direction: East

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) This is an excellent week for those in love go ahead with marriage plans Creative artists will also find this period favourable Your financial prospects look bright but try and save something for the rainy days At home your children and relatives will keep you happy If you have legal problems pursue them during this period Watch your health closely and consult a doctor at the slightest indication of discomfort.

Good dates: 11, 12 and 13
Lucky numbers: 6, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: North-west



SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) A domestic upheaval may cause anxiety but deal with those at home diplomatically. Your expectations will not materialise but do not get depressed as things will brighten up soon However a sudden stroke of fortune will enable you to repay most of your debts. This is the right phase to materialise marriage plans. Your health will also improve markedly. A letter will bring pleasant surprise towards the end of the week.

Good dates: 10, 11 and 12
Lucky numbers: 6, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

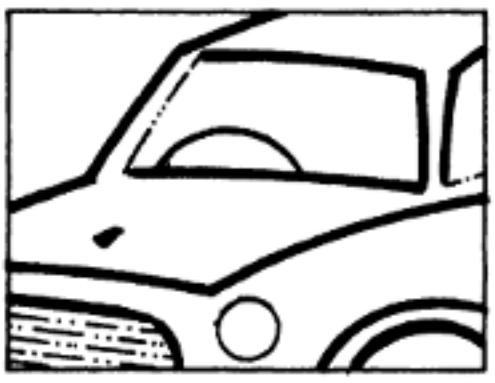
SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) The stars shine brightly on all your efforts this week Push your business and professional interests to the utmost. A letter towards the middle of the week will bring pleasant surprise. At home your wife and children will be a source of joy to you Your financial prospects are also bright. A pleasure trip will prove financially profitable This is also a good period for love and marriage negotiations

Good dates: 7, 9 and 12
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 4
Favourable direction: West

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) An eventful week lies ahead of you You will gain money or property through a sudden stroke of fortune Businessmen will bag lucrative contracts while professionals will earn the praise of their superiors. Disputes relating to property will be solved amicably in your favour This is the ideal time to get married. Your health will also improve A pleasure trip which you were looking forward to is in the offing

Good dates: 8, 10 and 13
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: South-east

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) From the financial point of view this is not a good week The domestic front will also bother you. Speculative ventures will not yield favourable results However, there is good news for those employed in government concerns a promotion or a posting to a better place is in the offing. This is also a favourable phase for courtship and marriage negotiations. A pleasure trip will prove financially profitable.



Good dates: 9, 11 and 12
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 8
Favourable direction: North

PISCES (15 March—14 April) Do not take any crucial decisions this week. Professionals are advised to be tactful while dealing with their superiors. Businessmen should be wary of deception Lovers are advised to postpone marriage plans. Financially this is a bleak period and you may have to borrow money to tide over this phase. However, those unemployed are likely to find jobs. Your health is likely to improve but do not neglect your diet.

Good dates: 10, 12 and 13
Lucky numbers: 1, 3 and 9
Favourable direction: West

Older Motorists: A Problem?

Are older motorists a greater danger to other road-users than younger men and women at the wheel? In West Germany, traffic experts are increasingly feeling that older road-users could prove a growing problem: they are more accident-prone than the average. The Americans, for instance, have found that women drivers, over 75 in particular, cause quite a number of accidents. And eye-specialists feel that more elderly people ought to be banned from driving at dusk or in the dark. Statistics show that 11 per cent of people in their 50s, 27 per cent of people in their 60s and 34 per cent of those over 70 cannot see properly at night. A Volkswagen survey states that 58 per cent of motorists over 50 are mistakenly convinced their sight is all right.

Experts say there are also typical mistakes old people make, especially when changing lanes, turning corners or respecting right of way. They attribute these mistakes to muscle trouble; older people being less able to turn round and proverbially stubborn. However, Olaf Kiesewetter, West German lawyer and traffic offence specialist, does not think so. "Motorists young and old make the same mistakes." He feels that accidents could be cut down by making older drivers feel relaxed at the wheel. Motoring magazines, he says, could do useful work in keeping older drivers in touch with the latest developments: for instance, publishing more articles on subjects such as new road signs.

Sing and Whistle While You Work

Singing and whistling are among the cures for boredom at work, according to a report of the Bavarian government. The report says that people are often not used to their full capacity because of the repetitive nature of their work. As a result, their mental capabilities begin to atrophy. Monotony, it says, causes the heart to beat irregularly, the pulse rate to slow, and less oxygen is taken in. Signals are not seen, reaction times are slow, performance declines, and accidents happen. The report does not find any evidence to prove the widely-held theory that women and less-intelligent people are better able to tolerate tedious work. Work using the newest of technology is also prone to boredom.

Now the Bavarian government is distributing free to more than 3,000 firms a brochure with suggestions for alleviating boredom. They include changing work, more communication through group work, physical movement and more short breaks instead of fewer, longer ones. Another suggestion that is being developed by psychologist Bartenwerfer, who compiled the report, is using a variation of the Sony Walkman idea so that employees can listen to music of their own choice during the day and at the same time hear essential work sounds such as colleagues calling and danger signals. In isolated cases, he also thinks that singing or whistling might help.

World-class quality that's so easy to maintain —even at home!

SOMA METAL FITTINGS

Precision -engineered to save you trouble; ensure smooth performance

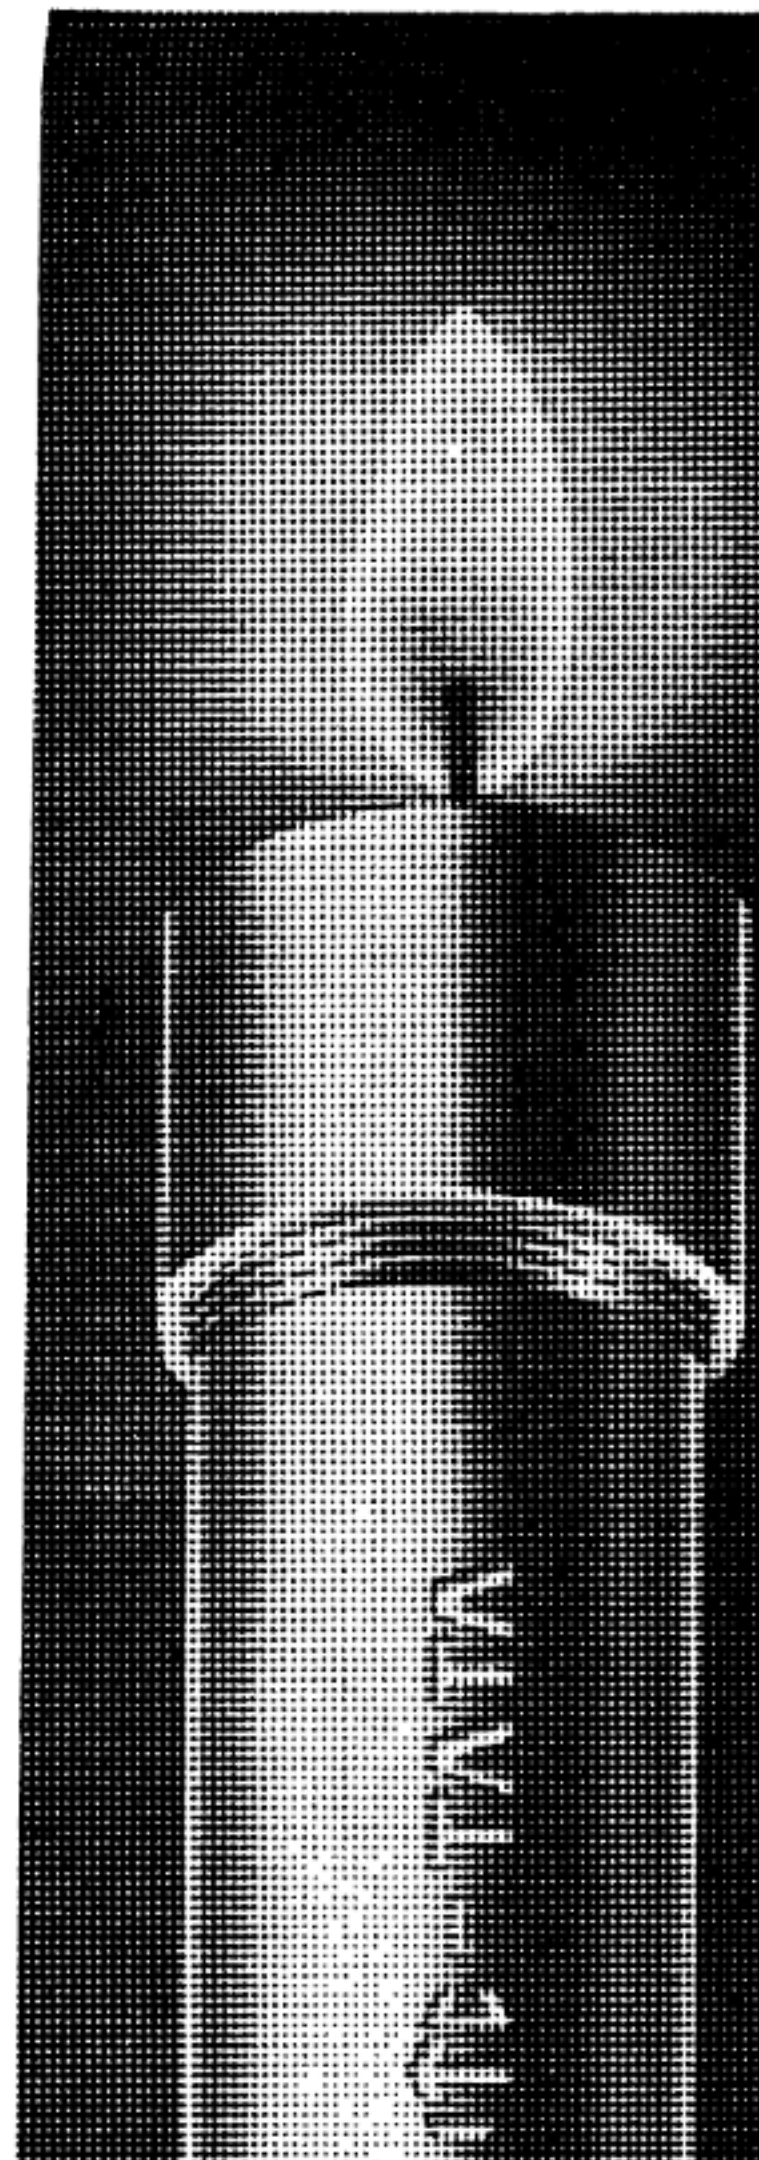
SOMA Specialities

Attractive, easy-grip handles in chromium — all interchangeable

Choice of Elegant and Heavy-duty models

Easy maintenance — at your fingertips

Always keep a replacement cartridge handy — it's available wherever you buy SOMA fittings. Should your tap malfunction, simply unscrew the top, ease out the cartridge, slip in the refill and secure the top.



SOMA PLUMBING FIXTURES LIMITED

SAA/SPF/7A 2

From the makers of

VITREOUS HINDUSTAN SANITARYWARE

2 Red Cross Place, Calcutta 700 001, India

At the top. Even after thirty years.

Thirty years ago, Indian Tube pioneered the manufacture of tubes in India.

Today, Indian Tube still leads the industry. Not only because it was one of the first on the scene, or because it is the largest manufacturer of tubes in the country.

Indian Tube is at the top because of the superior quality of its products and its ability to anticipate the needs of industry.

Isn't that what leadership is all about?

ITC – TATA

THE INDIAN TUBE COMPANY LIMITED
(A Tata Enterprise)

VARIETY

CHESS

There cannot be many fields of activity in which the Icelandic championship is news, but chess is one. The young Icelandic players have built up a wholly deserved reputation over the last few years. Leading the campaign has been 21-year-old Johann Hjartarson, whose victory in the 1984 championship came as no surprise and who promises to become one of the leading players in Europe. I can think of few players of his age capable of producing a game of the class and maturity of the one below.

His opponent incidentally is Helgi Olafsson, another of the rising stars, not to be confused with Fridrik Olafsson, grandmaster and ex-FIDE president. There are a large number of Olafssons in Iceland, mainly due to the large number of Olafs.

White: J. Hjartarson. Black: H. Olafsson. English Opening.

1 N–KB3	N–KB3	2 P–B4	P–B4
3 N–B3	P–K3	4 P–KN3	N–B3
5 B–N2	P–Q4	6 PxP	NxP
7 0–0	B–K2	8 P–Q4	0–0
9 P–K4	N–N3

H. Olafsson (Black)

Hjartarson to move. (White)

This whole variation has become a Scandinavian speciality. Black generates a lot of piece play, but Hjartarson demonstrates impressively the inherent power of White's centre.

10 P–Q5	PxP	11 PxP	N–N5
12 N–K5	B–B3	13 P–B4	B–B4
14 P–QR3	N–B7	15 R–R2	N–Q5

Black appears to be doing very well, but a series of powerful blows now destroy the well-manicured image of his position.

16 P–QN4!	Q–B2	17 B–K3	PxP
18 N–K4!	B(B4)xN	19 BxB	N–N4
20 Q–Q3	Q–B6	21 BxP+	K–R1

DIAGRAM

22 BxN!	PxB	23 Q–B5!	BxN

24 Q–R5!

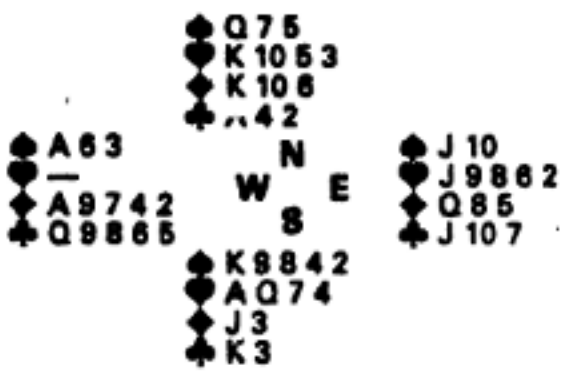
The transformation from move 15 is amazing. Moreover, what did Black do wrong?

24 . . .	B–Q5+	25 K–N2	P–N3
26 BxP+	K–N2	27 Q–R7+	K–B3

28 R–K2!

Elegantly introducing his last piece. If 28 . . . PxB 29 R–K6+, while the threat is BxP followed by R–K6+.

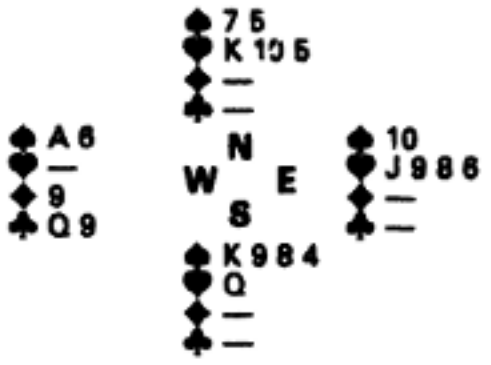
28 . . .	Q–B5	29 Q–R5	K–N2
30 R–K7	N–Q3	31 Q–N4	K–R1



32 Q–N5! Resigns.

MICHAEL STEAN

BRIDGE



The eventual finalists in the women's section of the Olympiad, Britain and the US, met in the first qualifying round. Most of the luck went America's way, but the British scored a notable success on this deal:

Dealer East Love all

The British East-West defended in Four Clubs doubled, losing 300. Sally Horton (previously Sowter) and Sandra Landy reached Four Hearts on the North-South cards. West led the ace of diamonds and switched to a club. Prospects (to the Vugraph audience) looked poor for the declarer, who had been very unlucky in an earlier slam. However, the play went:
♦ A, ♣ A, heart to ace; ♣ K, spade to queen, club ruff; diamond to the king and diamond ruff, leaving:

South, who had made seven tricks, cashed ♥ Q, then exited with a spade, and was assured of two more.

TERENCE REESE

QUIZ

QUESTIONS

1. How is Kalaatilit Nunaat, a large island in the northern hemisphere better known as?
2. In computer terminology, what is a bootstrap?
3. The first "concentration camps" were begun by the British in the 1900s. Where and for whom?
4. In Egyptian mythology, who is the jackal-headed god of funerals and mummification?
5. What is the equivalent rank of an army brigadier in the Indian Navy?
6. Uttar Pradesh is the most populous state in India. Which is the second most populous state?
7. What does the term "to send to Coventry" mean?
8. Gumshields are worn by persons participating in which sport?
9. Which county is known as the Garden of England?
10. The most populous "urban agglomeration" in the world is the Keihen metropolitan area. Which two major cities does it consist of?
11. Name the most expensive feature film ever made?
12. The lightest known element is hydrogen. What is the lightest metal?
13. In football, what is a banana kick?

ANSWERS

1. Greenland.
2. The programme or set of commands that get a computer moving into action.
3. In South Africa by Lord Kitchener for the Boer civilians.
4. Anubis.
5. Commodore.
6. Bihar.
7. To disregard someone completely.
8. Boxing.
9. Kent.
10. Tokyo and Yokohama.
11. Star Trek, a Paramount production, directed by Robert Wise and released in 1979 it cost 46 million dollars to make.
12. Lithium
13. A kick where the ball swerves through the air.

TEASERS

BY SHAMLU DUDEJA AND CHAMPAK BASU

What's in a Word

TWINE		PAIN, SHORT & SHARP
HAVE		PULL HARD
SPUN		TREAT WITH CONTEMPT
HERS		FLAVOURFUL PLANTS
PLOT		STEER
EARN		ACQUIRE KNOWLEDGE

?? □□□□□□

Add a letter to each of the words with the help of the clues alongside. The six letters added will provide you with a creature that can be a pet.

Quick Think

Twenty people in a gathering of 36 have black hair, the rest grey hair. 24 of the group do not wear spectacles and of those who do, 7 have grey hair. How many of those who do not wear spectacles have grey hair and how many have black hair?

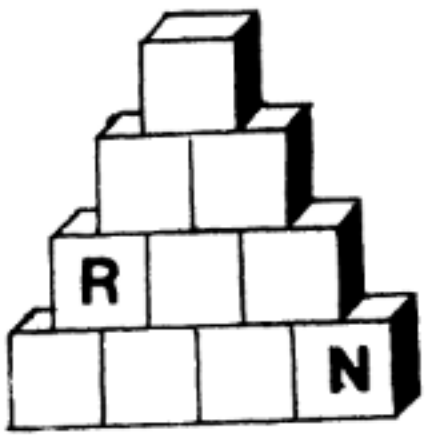
Scrambles

STONE □□□□□○

RILED □□□□□○

ADDER □□□○□

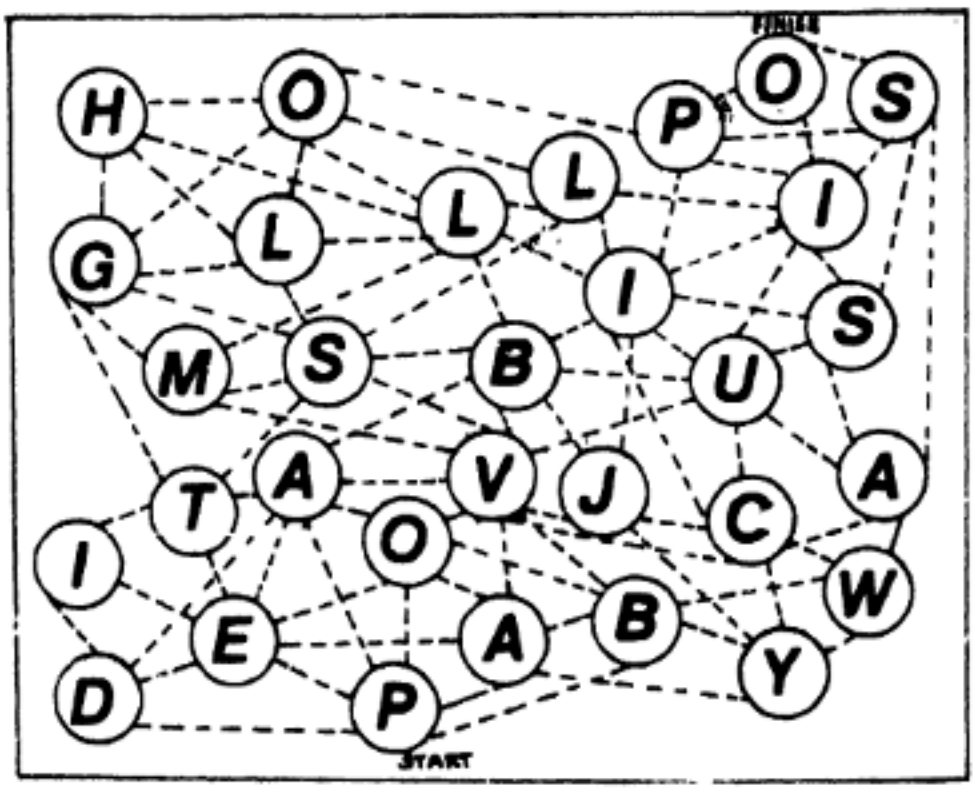
HATRED □□□□□○



POSER ○□□□□

ANSWER: ○○○○○○

Unscramble the words given. Then rearrange the circled letters to form something pointed.



Blockbuster

E,P,N,L,A,U,I,R,L,L

Fit the ten letters given above into the pyramid so that they form eight four-letter words reading downwards. Two letters have already been placed in order to give you a start.

Personality Plus

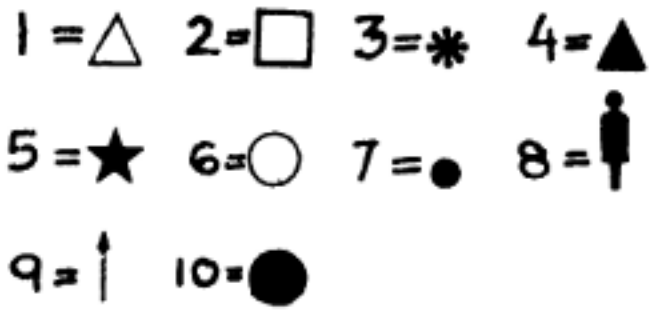
The name of a famous person can be spelt out in the maze above by proceeding from the start and moving on to the adjacent letters, without backtracking. The clues given below may help. Can you name the person?

1. The son of a drawing master, this personality took his mother's maiden name.
2. He was born in Spain but lived in France.
3. Apart from his main activity, he practised sculpture, illustrated books and designed pottery.
4. He and a fellow artist initiated a new school of painting.
5. He had a blue period which was followed by a rose period

Give yourself points according to the chart:

Without any clue and within a minute	30
Without any clue and over a minute	26—29
With first clue	21—25
With second clue	16—20
Third clue	11—15
Fourth clue	6—10
Fifth clue	1—5

Blankagrams



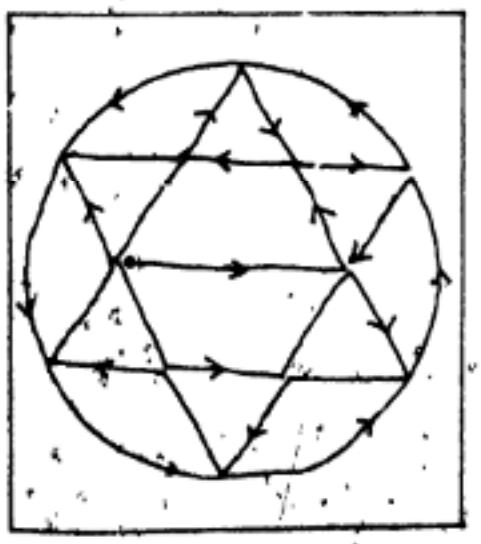
Your job is to provide the missing questions to the answers below.
For example, the question to answer No. 1 could be: "When was the last leap year?"

1. 1984, when February had 29 days."
2. "Waltzing Matilda."
3. "Yes, sir, yes, sir, three bags full!"
4. "21st—27th October, 1984."
5. "Terms of Endearment."
6. "Upstairs and downstairs, in my lady's chamber."

Solutions to last week's Teasers:

Quizzbizz: The score represents the place value of the letter used in the word twice.
SYMBOLS: S = 19; O = 15; ADVERTISING: I = 9; QUIZZ: Z = 26.

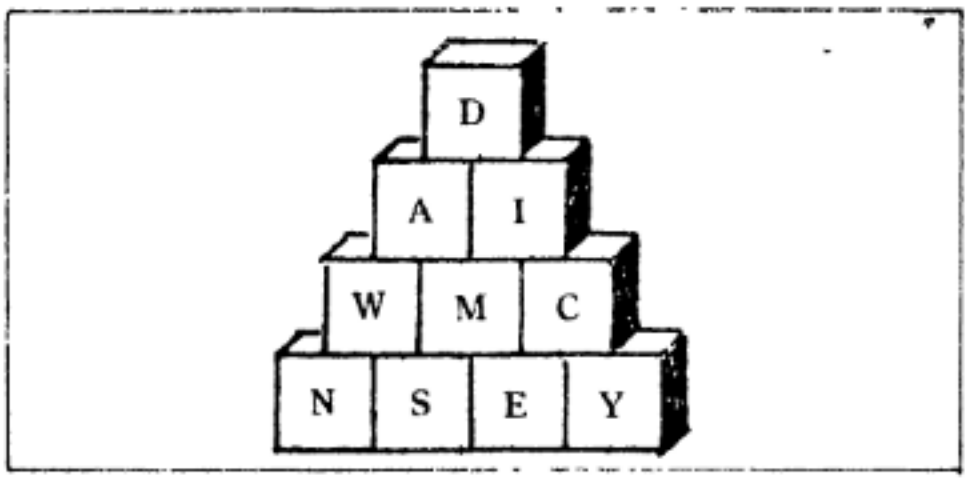
Figure it Out:



```
        125
   ------
7618 ) 956789
       7618
       -----
       19498
       15236
       -----
        42629
        38090
        -----
         4539
```

What's in a Word: Peanut, Brittle: Chocolate, Cream.

Quick Think: Dandelion; one possible pair: Nailed, Nod.

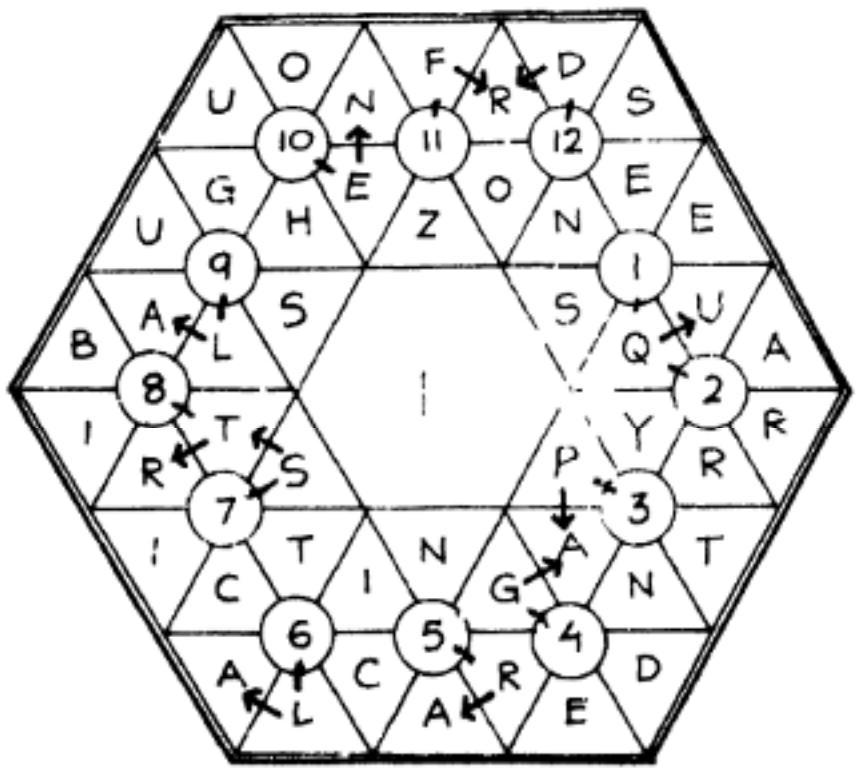


Shape Sleuth:

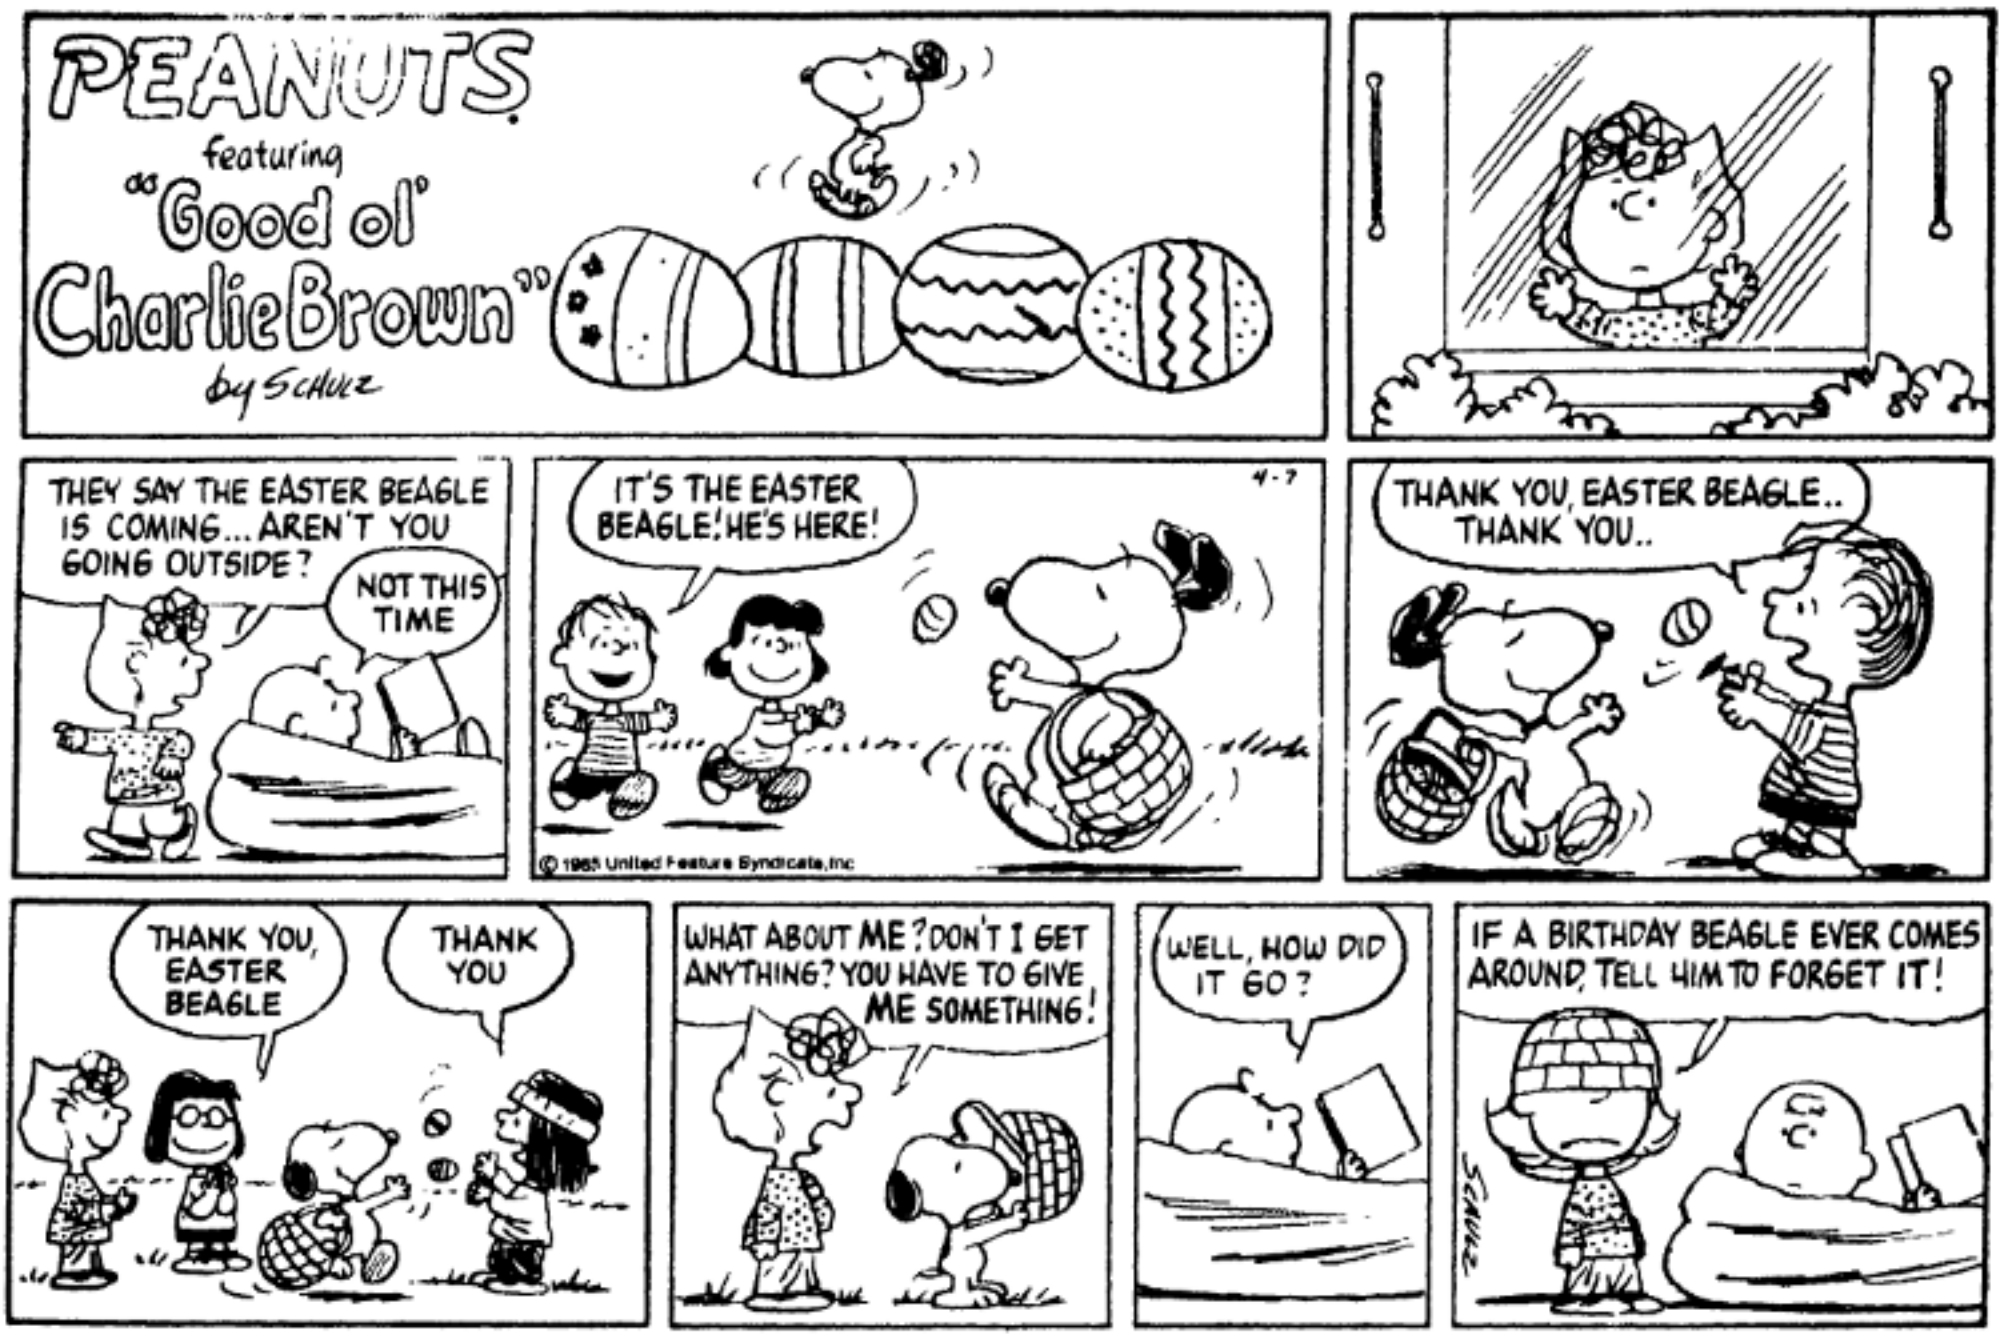
Mindbender:

	1	9	1	4
2	3	8	2	2	6
1	2	7	3	6	0
3	1	8	4	7	7
2	4	9	5	8	8
9	5	2	7	9	1

Blockbuster:



Dawn, Daws, Dams, Dame, Dims, Dime, Dice, Dicy



Word Power:

Word	Letter substituted
Aroused
Squared	Q
Quartes	T
Natures	N
Parents	P
Garnets	G
Staring	I
Orating	O
Roaring	R
Jarring	J
Rearing	E
Aligner	L
Avering	V
Fearing	F
Reaming	M
Bearing	B
Brazing	Z
Barking	K
Bracing	C
Carding	D
Scaring	S
Garnish	H
Rushing	U
Sharing	A
Washing	W
Waxings	X
Swaying	Y

Our score: 7 X 26 substitutes=182

Word Play:

SCIENCE

A Wordy Processor

The word processors of the future will do more than save time in the typing pool. Computer manufacturers, software houses and publishers are working towards computer programmes which will help you not only to type and reproduce a document, but to compose it as well.

Most popular word-processing programmes now come with in-built dictionaries. When a document has been typed, the operator can check the work against the dictionary and any unfamiliar words (usually misspellings or proper names) are highlighted. The dictionary can be added to.

Wang, an American computer company, has gone one stage farther. During the past two years it has bought electronic reproduction rights to some of the world's best known reference books: the Random House Dictionary and Thesaurus, the Concise Oxford Dictionary, Roget's Thesaurus and big dictionaries from leading French and German publishers. It plans to provide the user with several buttons—labelled, say, "dictionary", "thesaurus", "French", and "German"—which will produce, respectively, a definition, a range of synonyms, or foreign language translations for a particular word or phrase. In 1985, Wang will launch the first of a range of products which blend reference-book publishing with office automation.

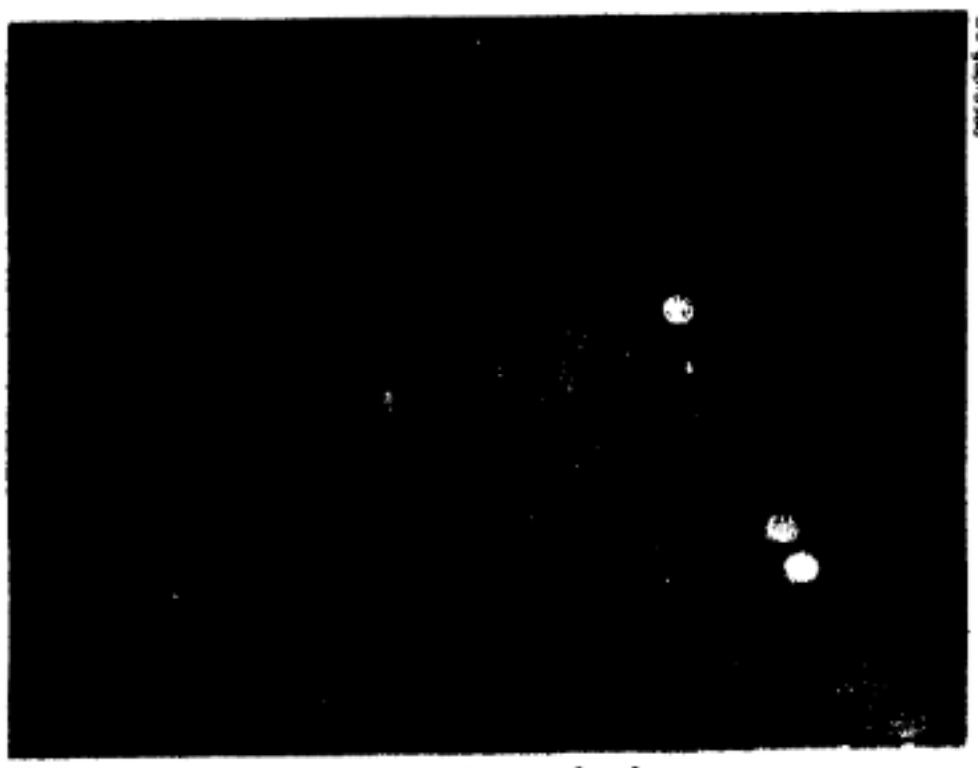
IBM is also getting into the act. It is involved in a project to update the Oxford English Dictionary, one of the largest books in the world. This effort will open up new possibilities for linguistic and historical research, but so many of the words it contains are obsolete or obscure that it is unlikely to help the humble office clerk. Wang, IBM and others are also looking at methods for rendering linguistic data bases "interactive" in ways which books can never be. This may lead, for example, to the translation of technical documents and the "filling in" of papers from tersely worded outlines.

An obvious limitation of the pure electronic dictionary or thesaurus is that the reference "book" deals only with the meanings of words or phrases. Most stylistic errors have nothing to do with lexicons. But ambitious plans are under way to develop "style-critiquing" software—an ugly word for programmes which offer alternatives to stylistically awkward passages.

Wang is developing several style and usage works, including the Chicago Manual of Style and Fowler's Usage. Programmes derived from these books will catch archaic expressions, trite, wordy or commonly misused phrases and certain sorts of punctuation and simple grammar. They will also do a stylistic analysis on a whole document, by finding out the average length of the sentences and checking the level of vocabulary. If the document is very elaborate the computer might say "you will need a PhD in linguistics to understand this;" if the writing is simple it might say "your boss should understand this."

By arrangement with The Economist

Vijayeta Pandit : certain of success



Hema Malini has at last accepted the fact that she can no longer be a young heroine. So, she has moved aside to let younger filmstars like Sridevi, Jayapradha or even Dimple, who is the mother of two children, take her place. Hema is now willing to play a mother's role as she has done in Mahesh Bhatt's Zamin. Says Hema, "I have had enough of success. I am thankful to God for giving me the kind of success very few have had. I have had my share of fame and money. I don't want the people who gave me everything to push me out and so I have decided to withdraw myself. I have no regrets at all."

Kumar Gaurav is busy fighting a battle for survival. Things seem to have gone from bad to worse after he married Namrata, daughter of Sunil Dutt, MP. His marriage seems to have put the producers off.

Talking about Hema brings us naturally to Dharmendra. He loves his daughter, Esha, so much that he visits her every day. Reason: "It is such a pleasure watching her grow up," says Dharmendra. Incidentally, the actor is taking an active interest in his family because "the children are growing up fast and they need my help"

Kumar Gaurav with Poonam Dhillon

Hema Malini : moving out to make way for the new Vijayeta Pandit, the girl who was once so deeply in love with Kumar Gaurav that she had even thought of giving up her career to become his wife, is now planning to stage a comeback. She has signed up a number of new films and some of her leading men are Anil Kapoor, Kamalahasan, Rajnikant and Jackie Shroff. Said she : "I want to show Kumar Gaurav that I can do something and that I can be more successful than him. How can anyone who has hurt me so badly prosper in life?"

DELHI DIARY

The First Night

Bansi Lal

In the railway budget, while increasing fares, railway minister Bansi Lal has been benevolent to long distance passengers, by levying night surcharge only on the first night's journey and removing the surcharge for the subsequent nights. This made a newsman remark after the budget was presented that Bansi Lal has recognised that "the first night after-all is the first night." The minister, however, avoided a "first" that day. Customarily, the railway minister briefs the press at the Rail Bhavan after the budget. This year, neither Bansi Lal nor the minister of state, Madhav Rao Scindia, turned up for the press meet. The task of defending the increased fares and freight was left to the officers.

Sarin's Successor

The post of secretary, defence production and supply, seems to have been reserved for the officers of the Indian Audit and Accounts Service (IAAS) After the departure of M C. Sarin, the new incumbent, D N Ghosh, too is from this service. The IAS seems to have given up this prestigious post for a sister service, which is rare In the recommendations of the third pay commission, this post was to have gone to the Indian Ordnance Factories Services (IOFS), but the IAS, while accepting the IAAS as a competitor, apparently does not want any other service to hold this post. The choice of D N. Ghosh will not be good news to wheeler-dealers who abound the corridors of the department Like Mr Sarin, he too is a seasoned auditor and does not allow scope for audit objections while passing deals. In his early days in the steel ministry as financial adviser, the judging of accounts by the then chairman of SAIL had been exposed.

Well Informed

The recent report in SUNDAY about the influence wielded by Dhirubhai Ambani of Reliance Textiles in the corridors of power has started bringing out more stories about Ambani. According to one, when Vishwanath Pratap Singh was removed from the union commerce ministry in August last year, the then commerce secretary, Abid Hussain, came to know of his minister's exit not from official sources but from Dhirubhai Ambani As commerce minister in Indira Gandhi's cabinet (as also finance minister in the Rajiv Gandhi team) V.P. Singh did not play ball with Ambani. He was appointed president of UPCC(I) while he was on a foreign tour—the news was conveyed to him in Vienna. A surprised Abid Hussain was informed about the change when he received a phone call from Dhirubhai Ambani. The intimation came later.

Raw Deal for CBI

The Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) is receiving a raw deal. The offices of the agency, which are at present scattered in six buildings all over the capital, are being moved to a new building in the Lodi Road complex, adjacent to the office of the Research and Analysis Wing (RAW), the external intelligence outfit. The first people to move to the incomplete building have been the top officers. There are no proper water supply connections in the building. What is worse, some top CBI men have been trapped in the lifts, which apparently had not been properly tested before commissioning. Will there be a CBI probe regarding the construction of this building?

Priyanka's Debut?

The elder child of the Prime Minister, daughter Priyanka, was seen in the visitor's gallery of the Lok Sabha on 16 March when the maiden budget of her father's regime was being presented. Accompanied by Rajiv Gandhi's political aide, Makhan Lal Fotedar, Priyanka sat solemnly through the 108-minute reading of the budget and did not show any signs of disinterest at any stage. Later, at the Central Hall, someone was heard saying that the one book worth reading from among the works of Jawaharlal Nehru was Letters from a Father to a Daughter. The father-to-daughter tradition seems to be maintained as far as interest in politics is concerned.

Praise for Sleuths

Home minister Shankarrao Chavan has busted many myths which had been created by the investigating agencies in the past few months. At one go, in the opening days of the budget session, he clarified that Coomar Narain had been spying not for 25 years (as reported by almost every section of the press; SUNDAY reported differently) but for three years. He also laid at rest speculation that there was any link between the spy case and the assassination of Mrs Indira Gandhi. (Some reports had been circulated in the media suggesting that there was a link.) Apart from these, he broke another media myth: that agencies other than the intelligence bureau (IB) were credited with the busting of the Coomar Narain spy ring. The minister was candid in his praise for the counter-intelligence officers: "In the entire history of the intelligence bureau, this is the first time, this is the first major incident of this nature, which the intelligence agencies have been able to unearth," he said while complimenting the sleuths. But this news was underplayed in the daily papers. After all when wrong reportage has taken place, the most convenient thing to do is to look the other way when the truth is out.

Sandeep Shankar

S. B. Chavan

D.E. Nizamuddin

Some names become a legend.

Sunil Gavaskar and Dinesh Exclusives.
Names uttered always,
in hushed tones of quiet pride.
Pioneers both. Gavaskar, that most incomparable batsman, meets his match in Dinesh—a fabric that's the result of a tireless quest for perfection in men's suitings.

Together, they're unbeatable—the material timeless legends are made of.

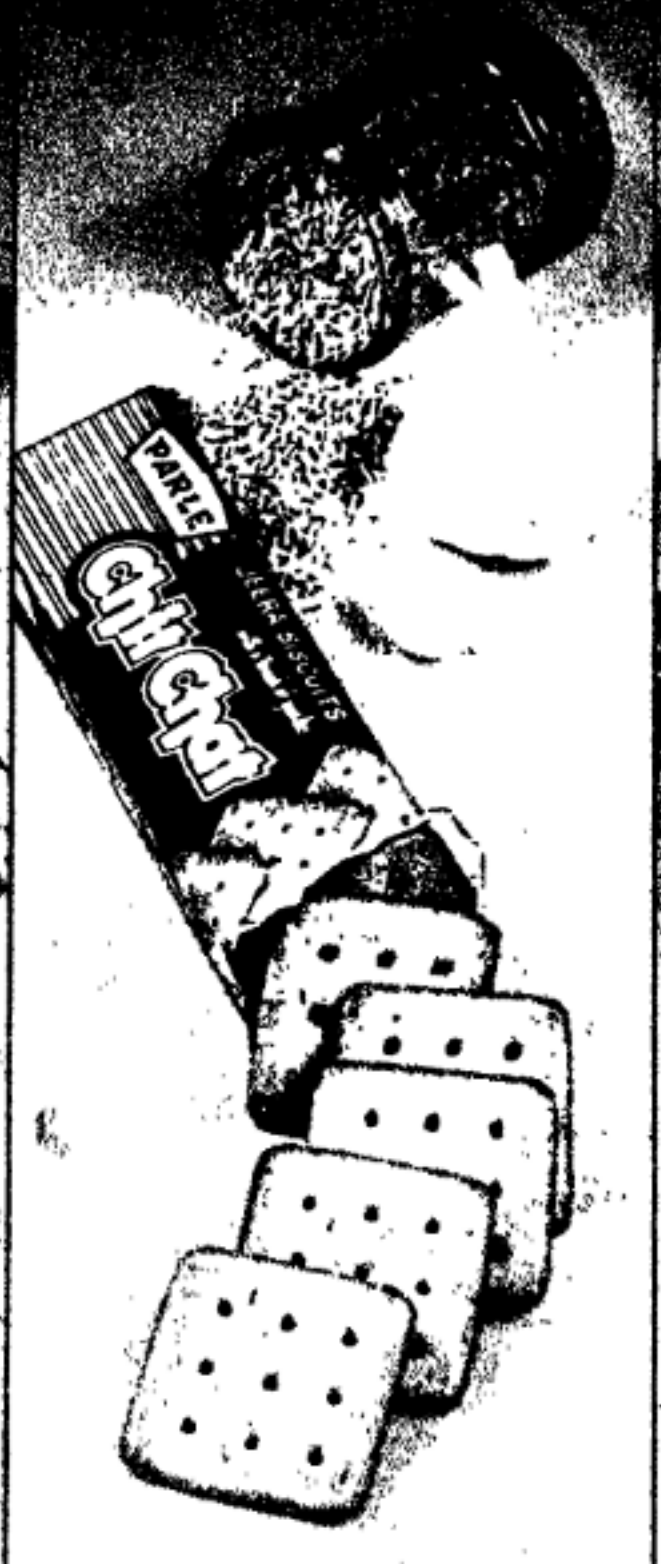
evernu/84/SDM/104

Decades later... still the leader.

Sunday Weekly 7 April 1985 Regd No WB/CC/256/TN/MS(C)376 MH-By-South-680.



PARLE

A Parle view of cheese'n'spice and all things nice.

Easy to start, difficult to stop.

PARLE
CHEESLINGS

The sensationally spicy talk of the town.

PARLE
ChitChat
JEERA BISCUITS

If you must make masti, make it Musst!

PARLE
musst
MASALA PUFFS

everest/84/PP/36

Investigation: A Sunday Death in Orissa

SUNDAY

A design by Shantanu Sheorey

THE YEAR OF THE AIDS

Introducing Televisions from

ORSON

BLACK AND WHITE TELEVISION

- Built in AVR (Automatic Voltage Regulator)
- Earphone socket
- Convenient sliding controls
- Contemporary styling with rich wooden cabinet
- Superb picture quality with sharp & bright images
- Long life due to highly reliable tropicalised components which undergo the strictest quality inspections

COLOUR TELEVISION

A spectacular success story

Today in India, Sony Black & White Television and Stereo Music Systems are manufactured at Orson's factory in Bombay opening new vistas in home entertainment. And Sony have chosen Orson on the basis of technical competence and service strength — both truly of international standards.

Three colour televisions

Now Orson proudly offer three state of the art colour televisions of superior quality and contemporary styling. Televisions manufactured at one of India's most modern factories, equipped with sophisticated soldering machines and instruments, assembly lines, all housed in an airconditioned dust-free environment. And rigorous tests ensure uniform quality — all this, backed by effective after-sales service, whenever you need it.

"Linytron" circuit with space-age high performance chassis

Equipped with improved IC chips and low noise FET, the "Linytron" High Performance chassis offers higher sensitivity, fidelity and ultra stability when voltage fluctuates. The result is brighter and sharper colour picture quality anytime, while fewer components mean extended reliability.

Other features

- Auto search tuning system
- Quick start picture and sound
- Built-in AFT (Automatic Fine Tuning), ADC (Automatic Degaussing Circuit) and AGC (Automatic Gain Control) for stable reception
- Stylish cabinet designs with elegant woodgrain finish

Ask your nearest Orson dealer to give you a demonstration of Orson Colour Television models ranging from standard colour models to sophisticated remote control master pieces. All this and Orson after-sales-service at your beck and call.

ORSON ELECTRONICS LIMITED
Bombay Madras New Delhi Calcutta

Orson - Tomorrow's technology today.

DCM

DCM Retail Stores always give you a lot more. A lot more in quality. A lot more in range. A lot more in economy. A lot more in durability. Four reasons why more families chose DCM for almost a hundred years.

DCM SILK MILLS

SWATANTRA BHARAT MILLS

Suitings, shirtings, sarees, dress materials, bed linen, towels, furnishing fabrics and school uniforms.

Over 550 exclusive stores all over India

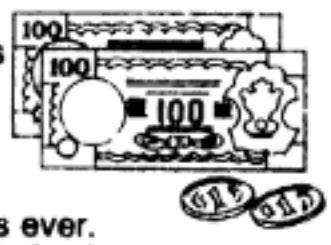
DCM

QUALITY SINCE 1889

JULKA-D-DCM-270

HEARD THE LATEST?

Two-in-Ones and Cassette Recorders...
to international standards of design, quality and performance.
Right here in India from PHILIPS.
Backed by nation-wide service.

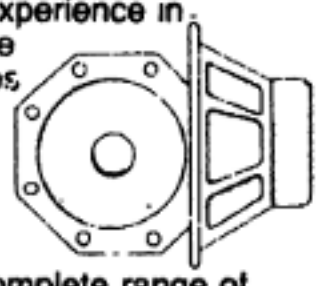


WE OFFER YOU THE BEST CHOICE!

PHILIPS

ALL THINGS CONSIDERED. WHEN IT'S PHILIPS, YOU'RE SURE.

No matter which model you buy. If it's Philips, you're getting a lot more than anybody else can offer.



You get your money's worth.
Philips Two-in-Ones and Cassette Recorders cost a lot less than you think Innovative techniques and economies of scale have brought down Philips prices considerably. Quality however is as high as ever. So you get value nobody else can match.

You've got class. You've got style.
Philips is constantly developing new products. Introducing new designs. Now for instance, you have a wide choice of everything from pocket radios to top-of-the-line Stereo Two-in-Ones. A lot of new models to pick from. Each one better looking than the next. Throughout, the styling is international. Who else gives you so much class?

You'll like the sound of it.
As far as the quality of sound is considered, Philips reigns supreme. By design. Philips has over 50 years of experience in the field. We keep pace with the latest advances in the world of audio technology. For instance, our Stereo Two-in-Ones offer you features like chrome terro compatibility, a complete range of input output sockets, soft touch cassette eject, long-life recording and playback heads, sensitive built-in microphones, L.E.D. indicators and an I.C.-based output stage. Even our mono sets have Auto-stop, Electronic Motor Control and high efficiency speaker systems. No matter which set you choose, you're assured of greater clarity, richer, fuller sound. And you can hear the difference!

You can really depend upon it.
Every Philips product is built to last. To give you years of listening pleasure. Right from raw materials and components, to the very heart of the system – the Tape Transport Mechanism – and packaging, quality assurance keeps to high international standards. There's no compromise. We've built a reputation on it. A reputation that any Philips owner will vouch for.

You're never too far from Philips.
No matter which part of the country you're in, there's a Philips dealer within easy reach. Any time you need service, or a replacement of spare parts, we're there to serve you. The Philips dealer network is over 1200 strong, country-wide. We make sure that after we make a great product, it stays that way. For years. Who in the world offers you such a great deal? Right here in India?

Service Service Service

Philips – the trusted Indian household name for over fifty years

Growing children need Complan

Only Complan has 23 vital foods they need every day.

Children normally complete most of their growth by the age of 15 or 16

Proteins are the nutrients which directly contribute to growth. That's why your children need COMPLAN — now. COMPLAN has the best protein – milk protein (20%). It also contains 22 other vital foods

COMPLAN is available in delicious flavours.

vital foods in planned proportions

Protein	Riboflavin
Fat	Nicotinamide
Carbohydrate	Calcium
Calcium	Pantothenate
Phosphorus	Choline
Sodium	Pyridoxine (B_6)
Vitamin A	Vitamin B_{12}
Potassium	Folic Acid
Iron	Vitamin C
Iodine	Vitamin D
Vitamin A	Vitamin E
Vitamin B_1	Vitamin K

No need to add milk.

Complan® complete planned food

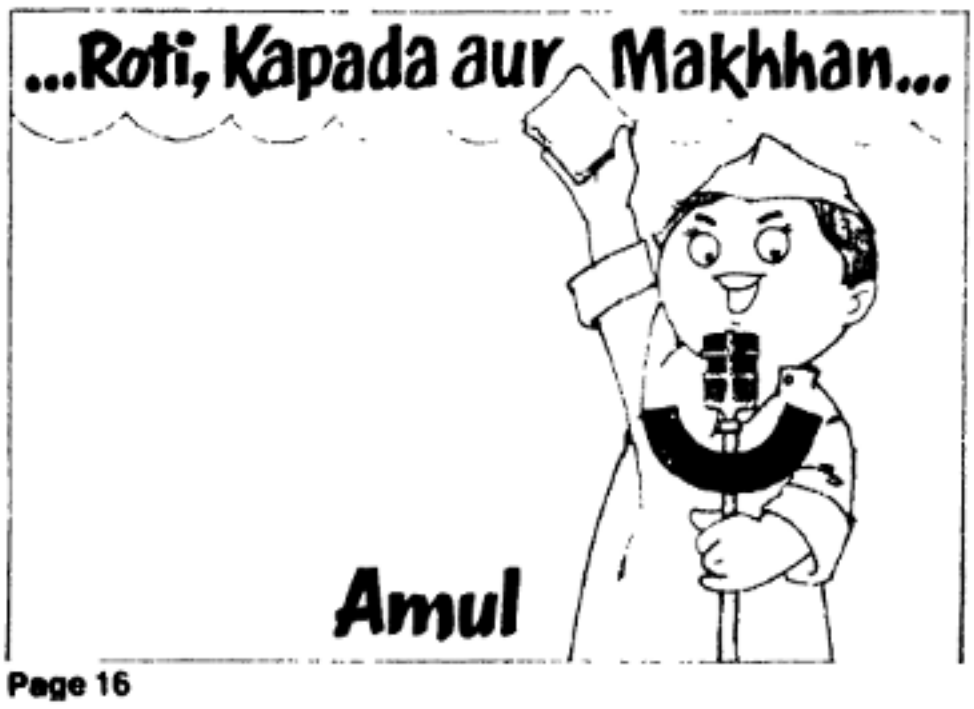
GK&E B84 GLC.68

14—20 APRIL 1985

SUNDAY

VOLUME 12 ISSUE 23 Rs 4.00
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

CONTENTS



COVER STORY 16

1985: The Year of the Ad?

Indian advertising has grown to dread budgets. But the union budget of 1985 is a charter of revival for the beleaguered agency. In the spurt of activity which greeted the announcement of incentives to the corporate sector, studios are being refurbished and artists and copywriters are thinking up fresh lines, images and insight. 1985 seems set to become the year of the advertisement. A survey by Sunday correspondents

Be Indian, See Indian

With the transformation of Doordarshan to a money-spinning medium, there has been a spurt of "homemade" TV serials. A detailed report. Plus interview with Manohar Shyam Joshi, the maker of Humlog. Also a report on the commercials produced by Doordarshan

Page 16

Page 30

INVESTIGATION 30

A Sweet Deal in Orissa

How far is the accusation that IMFA in Orissa is getting undue favours from the J B Patnaik government true? An investigation

INVESTIGATION 41

Case of the Missing Lakhs

Mystery surrounds the alleged theft of Rs 26 lakhs from the bedroom almirah of Bachcha Pathak, the Congress(I) general secretary of Uttar Pradesh. A report from Shubhabrata Bhattacharya

COMMENT

Dateline M J Akbar 9
Gossip Sweet and Sour Khushwant Singh 11
Exclusive Kuldip Nayar 13
Opinion 14

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Delhi Diary 74

PUNCHLINE/KUTTY

Cover: A design by Shantanu Sheorey

Editor M J Akbar

Associate Editor [illegible]
Assistant Editors
[illegible]
Editorial Staff
[illegible]
Chief of Bureau, Delhi
[illegible]
Principal Correspondent, Delhi
Madhu Jain
Special Correspondent, Lucknow
Nirmal Mitra
Correspondents
Bombay
Dipti Tellis
Bangalore
Chidanand Rajghatta
Madras
Anita Pratap
Ahmedabad
Tushar Bhatt
Guwahati
[illegible]
Srinagar
Yusuf Jameel
Art Director
Bipul Guha
Deputy Art Director
Amiya Bhattacharya

Printed and published for Ananda Bazar Patrika Ltd by Bijit Kumar Basu from 6 & 9 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700 001

Air surcharge for North-Eastern states [illegible] Tripura and Srinagar ex Delhi 20 paise

A quick solution to the rush hour traffic

Office Automation Products from BPL. For total information management.

Their role in coping with the increasing volume of information flow, and as a result improving productivity through information management, is assuming greater importance.

Machines like the 852 Copier that also speaks will take the office closer to the future.

Office Automation Products from BPL. They also include Multi-user Computer Systems, Small Business Systems, Word Processors, Electronic Scanners and Private Automatic Exchanges.

There are other vital areas that BPL serves too. With Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement), Computers, Communications, Components and Consumer Electronics.

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Sanyo, Japan. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL: Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nation-wide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has.

BPL-INDIA

In pursuit of perfection

Computers • Communication • Components
Instrumentation (Industrial, Medical & Measurement) • Office Automation • Consumer Electronics

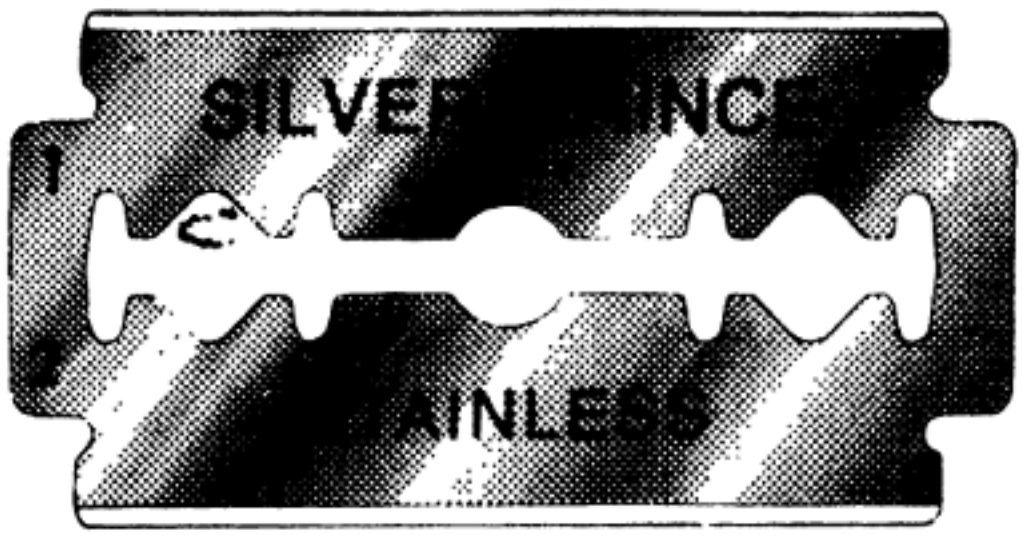
DATELINE / M.J.Akbar

New Delhi: Everyone has become a prisoner of his own set of words. Time has aged them; the words have become tired, frayed, battered by misuse and overblown by constant pumping. But they remain the cocoon which creates the definition of the person. The Left. In the beginning was the word, and the word was socialism. The word has become an amoeba, continually changing shape to include the latest claimant. But that doesn't matter. You can absorb anything within the shifting boundaries of the word, but never, never challenge its hegemony; never, never step outside the word into the world. It is slippery outside, and who knows when one might slip on the truth and fall flat on one's face. The Right. Capitalism. Ditto.

The emptiness of labels becomes more obvious when the capital's power brokers (the spectrum is not limited to shades of legislators and bureaucrats; it includes journalists, businessmen, hounds, lawyers, touts, hangers-on et al) turn their attention, as they kindly do once a year, to the nation's economy—at post-budget time. Is finance minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh Left, Right, Leftish, Rightish, Centre, Centrish? The truth is that he is nothing more and nothing less than Singhish, seeking to devise a way through the creeper-choked jungle that is the urban Indian economy. Labels fit ill. Was loosening some of the bureaucratic grip on the industrialist a very right-wing thing to do? What is the crop insurance scheme: pro-people or anti-people? Most of those denouncing the finance minister for his "pro-rich" liberalisation of the tax structure have been indulging in a bit of a fiddle because of the high tax rate all this while. Nothing evil; just enough to get by without surrendering every potential luxury to the state exchequer. Was this a budget for just 0.5 per cent of the people, as the Congressmen who had not been made ministers or given the kind of place they expected in the power structure were moaning? Probably. But if that implies that the last five budgets of the Congress(I) were devoted to 99.5 per cent of the people, then I am afraid I must beg your pardon and indulge in some abuse.

People see what they want to see in a budget, and like everything else in our country, there is enough evidence in anything to prove any point. For many "commentators" attack or praise of a government decision has less to do with the quality or merit of the decision, and more to do with their personal equation with those in power. If they haven't had their latest ego massage, or cut, X becomes terrible; otherwise X is a competent man trying to do his sincere best in the difficult situation he has inherited.

Indian politics, and Indian governance have become non-ideological. Neither action nor reaction is guided by the bend of a defined policy: the ruling MPs are those who made the right assessment about which party was likely to form a government after the December general elections, the opposition MPs are those who got it wrong. Decision and response from the opposition therefore are piecemeal. Those with self-appointed reputations try and hide this by words and labels. All that Vishwanath Pratap Singh had to do while making the same budget proposals and yet emerge a hero of the Left instead of the Right was to work in three paragraphs about the massive raise in bonus he announced for the working class, instead of keeping it down to just a sentence or two. And pepper every page of that long speech with rhetoric about wiping the tears from the eyes of the poor. That would have been enough to salve the easily amenable conscience of Delhi's concerned citizens.



For many "commentators" attack or praise of a government decision has less to do with the quality or merit of the decision, and more to do with their personal equation with those in power. If they haven't had their latest ego massage, or cut, X becomes terrible; otherwise X is a competent man trying to do his sincere best in the difficult situation he has inherited.

The fact is that the poor know they are being had. Left and Right mean nothing more to them than the tramp of a long march to nowhere.

Question of the Hour: Has our Member of Parliament from Gujarat been rehabilitated or not? Look at the sequence of events. The man who truly loses out after the assassination of his mentor (and he knows that better than anyone else, therefore the last minute rush to help friends in the industry) is Mr Pranab Mukherjee, finance minister and confidant extraordinary of Mrs Indira Gandhi. What exactly was the reason for his political clout no one really knows. Far from being a great leader of the Bengal masses, Mr Mukherjee had to find a seat in Parliament from Gujarat (a state where he has formally taken up residence to enter the Rajya Sabha). But there it was. Mrs Gandhi would listen to Pranab Mukherjee and therefore the country listened to him too. Rajiv Gandhi was a different Prime Minister, and while the fall was not entirely unexpected it could not have hurt any less. Where once Mr Mukherjee had held centre stage at budget time, he now had to applaud from the sidelines and use the media to say how happy he was that Mr Vishwanath Pratap Singh was doing the reverse of what he had done.

Then, resurrection The MP from Gujarat became the president of the West Bengal Congress(I). An agency which first circulated this surprising decision obviously had had a little help while writing the story from the Friends of Mukherjee Club. The decision was similar to what happened to Mr V.P. Singh when he was taken out of the union cabinet and put in charge of Uttar Pradesh before the general elections. And hints were circulated that Mr Mukherjee had been promised the chief ministership of Bengal after the "inevitable" Congress victory in the next elections.

The next day, the salt began to be circulated in political circles, so that the pro-Pranab version could be swallowed with a pinch of it. Pranab Mukherjee was not being promoted; he was only being sent to the districts to nip any potential revolt in Delhi with the help of other "stalwarts" kept in the cold. There was an enquiry on against his generosity to friends during his finance ministership. What is the truth? Only Rajiv Gandhi knows and he is not, at the moment, giving interviews on the subject We await the next instalment of the serial with bated breath.

TWICE AS MANY MEN USE SILVER PRINCE NOW THAN EVER BEFORE!

1 FREE BLADE IN EVERY PACK OF FIVE

Silver Prince. The stainless blade that has almost doubled its loyal following.
And no wonder! Men get more shaves, closer shaves, smoother shaves from each Silver Prince Stainless Blade

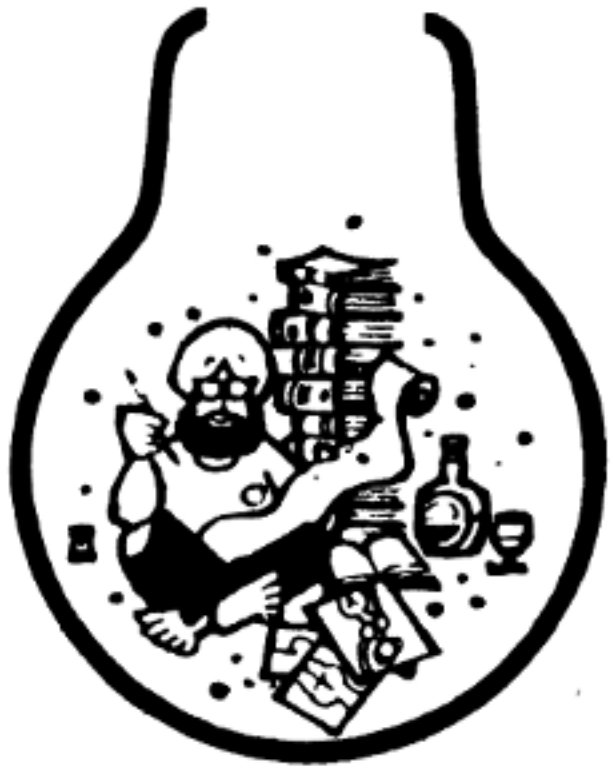
SILVER PRINCE

FOR MORE SHAVES.
SMOOTHER SHAVES.



A MALHOTRA QUALITY PRODUCT

impressions — 3101

In Vino Veritas

A wine-tasting festival in India would be as outlandish a notion as a urine-sampling festival in the United States. Nevertheless the unthinkable took place in New Delhi. The presiding deities were Steve Espie of the US embassy and his wife. His invitation asked me to invite other oenophiles in town. I had to look up the dictionary and found out that the word meant "wine lovers." I could think of only three couples who knew a little more about wines than that they came in three colours: white, red and rosee. This is not altogether surprising since we produce very little wine—the only two trade names known to me are Golconda and Bosca. What is often advertised on hoardings as "English wines," are not wines but spirits. The distinction between Beer, spirits and wine is vital Beer is brewed from hops, spirits (Gin, Vodka, Rum, Brandy, Whiskey etc) are distilled and are strong stuff Wine is made from fermented grapes. Its quality varies from region to region and year to year. Hence the annual fuss about sampling by professional tasters and declaration of same as vintage years.

India could become a great wine producing country provided our leaders shed their ambivalent attitude towards alcohol denouncing it in public, enjoying it in private. Our grapes are as good as any in the famous vine-growing countries like France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Spain and Greece Although wine-making is a comparatively recent development in the United States and Australia, some Californian and Australian (Coonawara Estate) products compare favourably with the best of Europe. Wine-making though an ancient art has no secret formulas. Our vintners could acquire the techniques as easily as our cheese-makers have done in producing excellent cheeses. All they need is the green signal from the government. God has given us excellent vines; what we need to do is to convert the first letter from "V" to a "W". Prohibitionists need not get very agitated over it. Most wines are very low in alcoholic content and much better for one's health than most tonics. All said and done when 90 per cent of our bodies are made of fluids, why quibble over the remaining 10 per cent? It is not for nothing that our ancients declared wine to be the drink of gods, milk of babies, tea of women, and water of beasts. However beware! Never dilute wine with water. It is the surest way of killing its body. G K Chesterton put Noah's admonishment to his wife during the torrential flood very succinctly:

"And Noah he often said to his wife when he sat down to dine
I don't care where the water goes if it doesn't get into the wine"

Back to the tasting business. The Espies laid out 13 varieties (seven whites and six reds) from seven countries with their vintages and descriptions Two bearers were in attendance to wash tumblers before we sampled the next variety. We were required to pronounce on eight points: aroma or bouquet (flowery, earthy, fruity etc.) flavour, body, texture, acidity, sweetness and aftertaste. I started off badly with the bouquet. I followed a wine-taster's advice "If, when tasting wine, you close your eyes and flowers appear before your inner eye, then the wine has bouquet." I closed my eyes but instead of bougainvilleas or roses, my inner eye perceived comely women My inner eye rarely perceives anything else

By the third sampling my head was in a tizzy I tried to soothe it by liberal in-takes of French and Italian cheeses. My in-built warning signal rang after I had gone through eight samplings I could not care about the rapture or the ineffable pleasure of drinking at someone else's expense. Five wines remained untasted. I could not appreciate Crabbe's eulogy which Steve Espie had put down as an introduction to "Bottle Notes":

"Wine, like the rising sun, possession gains,
And drivers the mists of dullness from the brains."

I took some chooran and a couple of aspirin tablets before retiring for the night. They did not help and my stomach was gassed beyond endurance. I woke at 2 am with a sour taste in the mouth. I swallowed many mugfuls of ginseng tea and spent hours of the dawn musing over the immortal qualities of wine. I came to the conclusion that as far as I am concerned there is no Veritas in Vino.

Why Circumcise?

Controversy over circumcision has raised its head in England again. This time a court decreed £5700 damages against a surgeon who botched up this minor operation by failing to see that the patient's foreskin was properly aligned before stitching up the wound. The main witness in the case was a Harley Street specialist, Dr Norman Pitt, who was for making circumcision compulsory. However, he was of the opinion that it is safer to have it done at a later age than is customary amongst Jews and Muslims. Dr Pitt quoted statistics to prove that the incidence of sexually transmitted diseases and cancer of the penis is much lower among circumcised males than amongst the uncircumcised What is more, women habitually exposed to sexual intercourse with circumcised males as married Jewish women (and presumably Muslim) are less prone to cancer of the cervix than those who cohabit with the uncircumcised. Also women who have had experience of both varieties of males have given their verdict in favour of the circumcised.

In India there is enormous amount of prejudice amongst non-Muslim communities against this practice The last time I wrote on the subject, some communally-minded readers accused me of trying to subvert their faith. If at all it takes a snip off the foreskin of the penis to subvert anyone's faith, there could not be much to it.

Wife-seeker

A man lost his wife He looked everywhere without getting a clue The police failed to find her Her photograph in the papers produced no results. In sheer desperation the man went to a temple dedicated to Shri Ram Chandraji and prayed for help. At long last Ram Chandraji heard his prayers and spoke: "Son, I cannot help you find your wife. When I lost mine neither I nor my brother Lakshman succeeded in locating her whereabouts. A few paces from here is the temple of Hanuman, Bajrang Bali. Go and pray to him and he may help you find your wife as he helped me to find mine."

Sheer perfection. Worth its weight in gold.

A fan so splendid,
it would outclass all your exquisite possessions.

Only for those who have taste & money.

Created & Perfected by POLAR

Polar Fan Industries Ltd.
World Trade Centre,
Calcutta-700 001

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

A Trial to Watch

"Does anyone know Gurmukhi?" asked roly-poly Shukat Ali Khan restlessly pacing up and down the courtroom in Lahore. He had flown down from London to defend the persons who had hijacked an Indian Airlines plane in 1981. His clients know only Punjabi, and not many in Pakistan are familiar with Gurmukhi. He wanted to know exactly what the hijackers had said in their draft statement to the court. At last one Pakistani who knew the script was found.

I watched the proceedings the other day—after obtaining a special entry card—and I must admit that the place did not have the atmosphere of a courtroom. True, there were lawyers in black gowns and there were piles of voluminous law books on the tables before the defence and prosecuting lawyers. The sessions judge, Fazal Karim, who presided over the special court, sat on a dais with Mohammad Ali Jinnah's portrait beaming out from the wall behind him. But there was something unreal about what was happening. Perhaps it was the fact that armed policemen and intelligence men far outnumbered all the spectators and lawyers put together; perhaps it was the plush auditorium, with its comfortable seats, perhaps the directive under which the press has to accept the version prepared by the registrar and cannot publish anything else. Whatever it was, I could not quite believe that I was witnessing a trial.

There was something unreal about what was happening (at the trial). Perhaps it was the fact that armed policemen and intelligence men outnumbered all the spectators and lawyers put together...perhaps the directive under which the press has to accept the (court) registrar's version (of the proceedings) and not publish anything else.

The press in Pakistan is not free. It is even less free to report on the trial. In fact, an Urdu daily, Nawa-i-Waqt, has already been hauled up for bringing out a special edition on the hijackers' trial. A notice served by the court on the paper said that the special edition "tends to prejudice the determination of the case, State versus Gajendra Singh and others, under section 6 of the Suppression of Terrorist Activities (Special Courts) Act, 1975."

The day I was present in the court, the hijackers were not brought from Lakhpat jail in Lahore, where they are supposed to be under detention. (Many Pakistan journalists told me that they were lodged in a bungalow, and not in any jail. According to them, the accused were too well-dressed and appeared too well fed to seem to be in jail.) I am told that the hijackers—five in all—raise slogans like 'Khalistan zindabad' as soon as they reach the 'courtroom' and then start talking aloud to one another in Punjabi, quite oblivious of the court proceedings. But they appear to be taking the trial seriously now. S. M. Zafar, whom they have hired, is a leading lawyer in Pakistan. The hearing on 30 March was adjournedat his request because he said that he had not had enough time to talk to his clients. The arrival of Shukat Ali Khan from London also is proof that the hijackers are not treating the whole thing as a joke.

Apparently it is some Sikhs outside India who have hired defence counsel Zafar, on behalf of the five accused. He is an expensive lawyer, and is assisted by Warren Sajjao, Khwaja Sultan and Dr Abdul Basit. Shukat also has been flown in at the expense of the Sikhs abroad. One Balbir Singh of the Sikh World Organisation is in Lahore to "follow" the case. The Pakistan government had received requests from some leading lawyers in Britain, America and Canada from persons keen to defend the hijackers but these could not be entertained on the ground that only Pakistanis are allowed to appear for the defence according to the rules under the Special Courts Act.

The Pakistan government, which at one time seemed to be reluctant to try the hijackers, now appears anxious to prove that it is not just holding a mock trial. There is an array of prosecuting lawyers—Advocate General Rasheed Aziz Khan, Assistant Advocate General Najumuzzam, Malik Abdus Salam, Inayetullah Cheema and Niaz Ali Shah—though each one of them has been a beneficiary of public funds in one case or another in which the government has hired them. There are rumours that the case would be decided by the end of June.

The fact that the 1984 hijacking case has also been taken up—though only under pressure from New Delhi—indicates that Islamabad wants to have both the cases disposed of as soon as possible. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's statement that India is watching the proceedings of the case has been an important factor in making Pakistan decide to speed up the trials. In fact the first trial was undertaken only when Rajiv Gandhi said that Pakistan's keenness to befriend India would be proved if and when they take up the trial of the hijackers. The Act under which the hijackers are being tried prescribes a sentence up to life imprisonment—which in Pakistan is not 16 years but 20 years—as the punishment. There is also a provision that prescribes the death penalty for such an offence. Recently one of those involved in the hijacking of a Pakistan International Airlines plane was executed. It is difficult to guess what punishment the Indian hijackers would be given. But they are unlikely to be let off lightly.

Significantly an official of the Indian embassy in Islamabad attends every hearing of the case: a measure of the importance the Indian government attaches to the trial. And now that there seems to be a serious attempt at detente between India and Pakistan, the trials may not be a cursory affair, after all.

OPINION

A Moment of Glory

MF Husain paid a fitting tribute to the victorious Indian cricket team (24—30 March). The cover painting was superb but the coverage of the Benson and Hedges tournament was far from satisfactory (Invincible Indians, 24—30 March). SUNDAY should have spared a few more pages to record the moment of glory for all Indians
S Umesh Naidu, Sindri

• The cover painting and the report on the victorious Indian team made absorbing reading After a long time the selectors displayed maturity by appointing Sunil Gavaskar as the captain and Kapil Dev as his deputy for the Benson and Hedges tournament The result was amazing: India won every match she played with convincing margins Team spirit more than anything else was behind India's spectacular victory
Sariful Hussain, Dibrugarh

• Congratulations to the invincible Indians for winning yet another one-day tournament When India won the World Cup in 1983 many sceptics described it as a fluke. They were proved wrong and going by the form India displayed in Australia I doubt whether the West Indians could have beaten them But I was disappointed to find such a short coverage by SUNDAY
Prabal Guha, Calcutta

• Ashis Ray rightly pointed out that team spirit led to the success. M F. Husain's cover painting lent attraction to the issue.
V N Narayanaswamy, Madras

• More than the sketchy report I liked the cover illustration of M F Husain.
Shyamal Pal Belonia (Tripura)

Not Involved

This has reference to the letter Inconvenient Facts (Opinion, 17—13 March) where Mr Aseem Prakash claims that the People's Union for Democratic Rights (PUDR) was an organiser of the protests against the unsavoury episode at St. Stephens College. While the PUDR strongly opposes the culture of cheap thrill at the expense of women and sympathises with those who have the courage to protest against it, it would be incorrect to attribute the demonstrations to our organisation. The issue was taken up by the students and teachers of Delhi University.
Sudesh Vaid, Delhi

Asian Dictators

I agree with Kuldip Nayar's view of the much debated ethnic problem in Sri Lanka (Distant Neighbours, 24—30 March) All Tamils settled in Sri Lanka are citizens of that country and India should strongly oppose the demand for Eelam It is an open secret that Tamil terrorists receive help from India The government should stop encouraging terrorists
Ajay Pant, Moradabad

• Honest efforts should be extended by India to the Sri Lankan government to solve the ethnic problem However, the Sri Lankan President, Jayewardene, should be willing to compromise on reasonable issues, dictatorial attitude will only complicate matters
Subas Ram, Anandapur (Orissa)

• J.R. Jayewardene's provocative replies to Kuldip Nayar's questions ('India is Bullying Me') is bound to adversely effect India-Sri Lankan relations. I was surprised to read the Sri Lankan President's outburst against M.G. Ramachandran Mr Nayar deserves praise for the patience he has shown in interviewing a man whose logic borders on the ridiculous and whose views are coloured by racial hatred.
N. Nandhivarman, Pondicherry

• I wonder why Kuldip Nayar did not deem it fit to ask the Sri Lankan President about the indiscriminate firing by the Sri Lanka navy on unarmed Indian fishermen fishing in Indian waters This apart, the interview was comprehensive.
G Vaidyanathan, New Delhi

• Tariq Ali's Behind the General's Election, exposed the evil designs of the President of Pakistan, Gen. Zia-ul Haq. 'The Asian dictator of the Pentagon'. I had never come across such an apt description of Zia. He has cowed down the people of a democratic country but one day he is bound to be overthrown by the people like Louis XVI
Sangram Mishra, Cuttack

Fight for Freedom

I was an orthodox youth living in a world of slavery and ignorance till I read M J Akbar's article on the reformist movement within the Dawoodi Bohra community (Dateline, 10-16 March). The write-up rightly highlighted how Bohras are living like slaves in free India. The priests and their representatives behave like dictators and there is no one to check their authority. In this context I would like to narrate a personal experience. I was at my native place attending the funeral of a Bohra. Among those present at the solemn ceremony was a reformist Bohra. Midway through the funeral, suddenly some hoodlums,who I think were hired by the representative of the high priest, dragged away the reformist Bohra while we helplessly looked on. Had I read Mr Akbar's piece before I would have had the courage to react. I thank SUNDAY for enlightening me.
Daud A. Bharthu, Bombay

• Exploitation is going on in the name of religion. I invite all the Bohras to come forward and lend strength to the reformist movement.
Mazahir Kalolwala, Godhra

• It is strange how the Bohras are tolerating an autocrat. But I was relieved to learn that a movement against the Syedna is gaining momentum. By best wishes to Asgar Ali Engineer for his efforts to liberate the Bohra community.
M.Y. Sadique, Bhubaneswar

• The Nathwani Commission has held the high priest of the Bohra community guilty of usurping the fundamental rights of the Bohras. Yet the Indian government is a silent spectator. I take this opportunity to thank M.J. Akbar and SUNDAY for the bold article.
Yunus K. Baluwala, Bombay

Change or Revolution?

I was surprised to read that Kuldip Nayar does not find sufficient reasons to rejoice over Rajiv Gandhi's performance so far (Does Rajiv Gandhi Really Mean Business? 17—23 March) In the very first paragraph Mr Nayar had dimissed the Anti-defection Act as a means to thwart the ambitions of the PM's partymen rather than those of unprincipled politicians With a massive mandate in the Lok Sabha, I don't think Rajiv Gandhi was bothered about defections, cleansing politics was his sole aim Towards the end of the tirade, Kuldip Nayar writes "What India needs is drastic change ." But change by its very nature is slow unless Mr Nayar is referring to a revolution

D.V. Nilkund, Bhadravati (Karnataka)

• In Prestige of the Judiciary Should be Restored (Exclusive, 10—16 March) Kuldip Nayar observes: "The fact that protocolwise a High Court judge comes next to a secretary to the government of India, shows the position of the judiciary now.. " This is not true and High Court judges clearly outrank secretaries.

P B. Venkatasubramanian, New Delhi

• My answer to Kuldip Nayar's question, Are Naxalites Dedicated? (3—9 March) is Yes Naxalites stood beside the exploited and they did not hesitate to sacrifice their lives for a noble cause But unfortunately a handful within the party misunderstood the motto of the movement and started terrorising people The Naxalite movement is still alive and will be alive as long as exploitation continues

Surjit Singh, Amritsar

• Instead on relying on the police version, Mr Nayar should have visited the 'disturbed areas' of Telengana to find out the truth. His accusation that Naxalites are resorting to violence and terrorising attack-sellers is not true.

K V Ramana Reddy, Kavali

Not an Occasion to Rejoice

I did not feel proud or rejoice, like M.J. Akbar, at the India government's decision not to deport the Bangladeshi poet Daud Haider (Dateline, 24—30 March) I can never forget that this same government killed so many poets like Daud Haider only because they had raised their voice against oppression In 1969 a popular poet, Subba Rao Panigrahi of Srikakulam was shot dead by the police in the name of an encounter

An eminent writer-poet and editor, Saroj Dutta, was murdered in coldblood in Calcutta by the police. Why didn't Mr Akbar raise his voice when Cherabanda Raju paid a heavy price for his revolutionary ideas?

S.M Rao, Calcutta

• This has reference to M.J Akbar's write-up on the death of the Soviet President Konstantin Chernenko. Over the years the Moscow-Delhi relationship was grown deeper and the death of a national leader of either country is mourned by the other. One is reminded of the Russian gesture when Indira Gandhi was assassinated: the Soviet embassy in India had brought out a booklet, USSR shares India's grief.

R. Venugopal, Korba (MP)

A Bright New Star

The cover story, Star of the Future (17—23 March), was timely and absorbing. The Janata victory in Karnataka was a morale booster for the opposition. Ramakrishna Hegde is the only opposition leader who can offer a credible alternative to the Congress(I) at the national level. The new star on India's political horizon is shining brightly and will continue to do so in the future.

R.R. Deshpande, Raichur

• When Hegde advised the state Governor to dissolve the Karnataka Assembly following the Janata Party's reverses in the Lok Sabha elections nobody even dreamt that he would stage such a spectacular comeback. Hegde's clean image and efficient administration ensured the Janata Party's victory.

S.N. Venkatesh, Sira (Karnataka)

• Ramakrishna Hegde was not correct when he said that the people are fed up with the Congress(I). In Karnataka, the Congress was without any leader of the stature of Hegde. The party's debacle in the Assembly elections was solely due to ineffective leadership. The Janata should not be too complacent of their victory.

N. Ellango, Tirunelveli

Hadley Chase Thriller

The investigative report on Rajendra Sethia who duped the London branches of three Indian nationalised banks read like a Hadley Chase thriller (A Playboy's Plunder, 17—23 March). A thorough probe is necessary to bring out as to how the managers of the concerned banks loaned such a huge amount without any security deposit As rightly pointed out by a section of the London press, the role of the former finance minister, Pranab Mukherjee, is intriguing.

A.N Veeraraghavan, Bombay

• Rajendra Sethia could not have cheated the banks had not top officials colluded with him. Rajiv Gandhi's 'clean image' will suffer unless the culprits are brought to book as soon as possible

C.B Dyuthikar, Bangalore

Pathetic Plight

I am not aware of a country called the Islamic Republic of Bangladesh mentioned by Srinjoy Chowdhury in his article, A Poet's Fight for Freedom (3—9 March). Yes, certain vested interests are trying to form such a country but it is yet to be born. I am still a citizen of the People's Republic of Bangladesh It is true that a section is waiting to persecute Daud Haider when he returns to Bangladesh but I would request Mr Haider to return to his native country. People like me are there to protect him.

Salima Wahra, Dhaka

• SUNDAY did a commendable job by highlighting the plight of Daud Haider. Mr Haider's voice had been throttled by the successive military regimes of Bangladesh and he had no way but to escape to India. I am still in the dark as a why the government wanted to throw him out when scores of people are granted political asylum in India every year.

Bireswar Mukherjee, Gauhati

Vital Omission

In the detailed article on Victor Banerjee (Victor's March, 17—23 February) the author blacked out the film Doosri Dulhan where Victor played a lead role opposite Sharmila Tagore and Shabana Azmi. When Kalyug, a film where Victor plays a minor role, was discussed at length I felt that Doosri Dulhan merited a mention.

J. Nath, New Delhi

COVER STORY

1985

THE YEAR OF THE AD?

Indian advertising has grown to dread budgets. All that "concern for the poor" and "socialism" ended up meaning another twist of the screw for the agency. The union budget of 1985, in contrast, is a charter of revival for the beleaguered agency. The enthusiasm it has generated is only too obvious: in the spurt of activity which greeted the announcement of incentives to the corporate sector, offices are being renovated, studios refurbished and artists and copywriters are thinking up fresh lines, images and insights. 1985 seems set to become the year of the advertisement.

This story could begin anywhere, anytime. At a bus stop or on a lonely moonlit night In the high offices of power or in your bathroom. Or on the moon. Advertising has gone where man has not. It goes everywhere man goes. A shadow almost, but a colourful, multidimensional one. Often when you see an advertisement, you would know the way things are going or will go.

Watch what happened in the offices of the Prime Minister and the finance minister in the days following the presentation of the union budget on 16 March. They were grappling with a flood of congratulatory telegrams. Not from big business and industry but from the world of advertisers. There were hundreds of them from different agencies and societies, clubs and federations. It was a bold budget, they said. It was growth-oriented and one that provided "direction and impetus for faster pace of change." Other than the repeal of the 20 per cent disallowance of advertising expenses there was hardly any mention of advertising in the financial bill. There was, however, a hike in MRTP from Rs 20 crores to Rs 100 crores, the delicensing of 24 major sectors of industry a reduction in the rate of corporate taxation, upgrading the limit for small-scale industries to Rs 35 lakhs, the scrapping of excise on computers and liberty for foreign equity companies to enter the Indian electronic market. These are big incentives for production and a boon for business. But the windfall, first, will come elsewhere More than anything else, it is a booster for the advertising industry as Harish Mahindra, chairman of the Indian Society of Advertisers (ISA) exulted after the presentation of the budget. There is a distinct edge to spirits in this even otherwise exciting world. Some workplaces are being lavishly renovated into plush studios, every day modern tools of work are being brought in; artists and copywriters are thinking up new sights and fresh lines Everywhere new strategies and new research programmes are being planned. "This is a very exciting moment for advertising," says Tara Sinha, the jetsetting chief executive of Clarion Advertising Services. Her words are echoed all around. The result of that accelerated activity is already beginning to show Concepts, modes, presentations are changing

"In the months to come I see the whole scenario change: advertising in the country will undergo a metamorphosis... Advertising as an industry will get its right place in the country's developing economy. The need for advertising has finally come to the forefront," says Ram Sehgal of Hindustan Thompson Associates, the biggest advertising firm in the country. "Who would have thought," he adds, "five years ago that a gas stove will become a thing of beauty."

Who made the common stove a thing of beauty is an important question The producer and advertiser or the consumer? Who is influencing whom? Is advertising determining lifestyles or is it the other way round? It is one of the things the advertising industry is interested in arguing out There has been a lot of long-standing criticism: that advertising is wasteful and socially unproductive, that it makes people want things they cannot afford, encourages unwarranted consumption and brings in aberrations in society. Perhaps a sign of the times is that advertising is now hitting back. A paper recently issued by the ISA rebuts these criticisms one by one. Advertising is not wasteful and unproductive, it says, because nobody is interested in wasteful and unproductive things. It is a serious business which involves professional people and a good deal of media and market research is aimed at cost efficiency "No conscientious, accountable management spends advertising money irresponsibly." It doesn't make people want more than their purses allow. The argument is turned around Advertising thrives when production thrives and production thrives when people have purchasing power "The whole of India is a big market today Do you think that would be so if there weren't enough people around to buy things?" asks Tara Sinha. Next, do advertisements change social outlooks? Says Stanley Pinto of Lintas India. "Advertising is a slave of social change It society changes, so will the style of advertising There has been a marked change in the thinking of the middle class and that has been reflected in advertising... I agree advertising has become more permissive but that is only because man-woman relationships have changed" He does agree though that at times it becomes quite a chicken-and-egg situation It could work both ways. Others agree on the influence advertisements exercise It is in fact a strategy with them Jaideep Samarth of Ogilvy, Benson and Mather (OBM) says he is there to "do something to people, not to say something to them." Strike a chord, set them thinking about the ideas of David Ogilvy, known as the father of modern advertising. And if his opinion is to be considered, Indian advertising is not doing too badly. David Ogilvy makes it a point to go through all the campaigns done by OBM "He has nice things to say though he is nasty at times," says Samarth.

One of the highly successful and witty DaCunha campaigns: increasing sales

There is another way the traffic moves in the advertising business: from the advertising agency back to the client. As competition in the market increases and techniques of advertising become more modern, market and media research too become more salient in the advertisers' scheme of things. Instead of just

"We Will Have to Restructure Ourselves"

Tara Sinha of Clarion Advertising Services told SUNDAY

When she was 24 and only 18 months in the business, Tara Sinha became the founder-director of Clarion Advertising Services Limited (formerly known as Clarion MCann), a blue-chip company in the trade for decades. A spiralling career-graph and today, at 51, she is Clarion's president and chief executive. In fact, she is the only woman there among several men. She thinks Indian advertising has reached an "extremely exciting" stage which, while being a boon might also pose some challenges to the industry. Nevertheless, "be enthusiastic" is the message she is passing around. Excerpts from a conversation with her:

Q: Do you think a boom is coming?*

A: Yes, certainly. The government has come out with a growth-oriented budget which will open so many avenues. Advertising booms if business booms and lots of incentives were given this time. The delicensing, for example, will encourage business investment. The people have got more purchasing power now and on the other hand, the delicensing and other benefits will encourage business investment. You can already see the two-wheeler market burgeoning. So is the case with the automobile industry, packaged goods... naturally advertising should boom.

Tara Sinha

Q: Is the industry prepared to take on such a boom? Are you professional enough?

A: Nobody is ever professional enough and surely this is going to be a big challenge. The advertising world has to deliver the goods. We would need some solid work to be done, both creative and otherwise. We will have to restructure ourselves in this exciting moment.

Q: Doyou have the equipment to tackle it?

A: Oh, we have a lot of talented people working but they might not always be enough. Advertising is a very hungry industry, very demanding. We might have a talent-short situation.

Q: How do we compare with the West in terms of technique and talent?

A: What I hear is that we are very good on the analysis part of it. Where we tend to slip is when we come to the consumer. We tend to forget that the consumer does not buy anything because of what is put in the advertisement but because of what he gets out of the product. We have to be more consumer-oriented. As far as the production is concerned we have made a quantum leap. We are really tops, we can match anything, anywhere, but again, when we come to films and television, we are way behind. We do not even have the right kind of actors and actresses for our purposes.

Q: How much importance do you give to market research before you go into a campaign? Some people seem to function in a vacuum...

A: There are two things here. Market research and advertising research are both very important. We are not here to put pictures and words together. Our expertise is in knowing the consumer, the market and our clients' products. You have to match both to arrive at a good combination... a good, successful campaign. You cannot function in a vacuum.

Interviewed by Sankarshan Thakur

taking on a campaign for a client and shooting it off from the studios, advertising agencies today have to dig deep into market statistics, measure the potential in terms of existing competitive products and then enter another boardroom to plan the media launch which involves as much planning as market research, what with television having come up in a big way. But again it is question of how one looks at it. There is considerable difference of opinion in the advertising world on what really is a good advertisement

Lintas india, one of the top three agencies in the country and known in the business as the "number one brand makers" is a totally market-oriented firm which believes that it is there to sell goods through its campaigns, not to win awards for creative excellence. "Ninety per cent of any advertisement," says Stanley Pinto, one of the agency's leading lights, "must have to do with the 'what' of things. The other ten per cent is the translation of that 'what' into 'how'. The advertisments we make might not always be very exciting, they might not win awards but they always have a strong selling centre " Lintas India is one agency which believes in the efficacy of conducting a market research and running sale-oriented campaigns. According to Pinto, Lintas almost works like an extension of the marketing department of its clients and for every campaign they go back to the client with their market studies. At times they have advised their clients about the feasibility of launching one product or the other. On several occasions Lintas' clients have taken the advice, modified their products and not regretted it. But with several agencies this does not work. They feel there is no necessity for the feedback service to the client and they defend it. Bharat Dabolkar who wrote most of the punchy Amul butter campaigns and is a top executive at DaCunha enterprises thinks all the "jargon" about market research is a "lot of nonsense." "Those who talk of doing market research are just bluffing, using it as a crutch to provide more respectability to their profession," Dabolkar says. He insists his campaigns are nothing more than "simple common sense"; it involves nothing more. Indeed he says the more he tried to see things in terms of market research, the more confused he became. "Market and creativity are two vacuums and advertising is the challenge of creativity, not strategy." He illustrates his point with campaigns for various tea brands. "Everybody knows strength and taste are the things advertisers are talking about. You are successful if you can say it better. What do you need the market research for?"

Others, doubtless, disagree. Their main argument: advertisements exist to sell. For this it is essential to understand human behaviour and the vicissitudes of the market. One has to have the heart to kill even the most creative of campaigns—"your own beautiful child" in the words of one in the business—if it does not have the selling potential. Most of all, opinion goes, a successful advertising man has to be a glutton for figures and information. That is quite a drab affair and it goes against the popular notion of advertising being a featherlight, glamour world.

That does not mean advertising is a dull place to be in. A copywriter who has recently shifted from journalism to advertising thinks her present profession is as exciting, if not more. "You keep meeting new interesting people who are a degree more unconventional than journalists and at times more thrilling. And there is always this challenge with new assignments coming." The environment, specially in Bombay, still India's advertising capital, is extremely professional. Work schedules are astonishingly precise and packed. Asked for an appointment, an execu

"A Whole Lot of Interesting Things Are Happening in the Ad World"

Bobby Sista of Sista's told SUNDAY

Shambhu "Bobby" Sista is one of the oldest hands—"a big, old dad" as someone put it—in the advertising business today, having been with it since the days of its infancy back in the Fifties to its present moment of youth. His father, Venkatrao Sista, was one of the pioneers of Indian advertising and the man credited with launching the country's first full-fledged advertising agency nearly 50 years ago. Bobby Sista himself took to the trade after studying advertising in England for two years at a time when the "need and awareness for advertising in India was just beginning to surface." He changed tracks for a brief period to become the marketing director of the* Readers' Digest *in the mid-Sixties but came back to skipper Sista's Private Limited to bigtime success

Q: You have seen advertising change over three decades.

A: Yes, the transformation has been phenomenal. At the time I began working, little was known of advertising in this country. People, even big industrialists did not seem to realise its importance. In the business itself the basic skills were still being developed. Not much was known of research or marketing, production techniques obviously were primitive when compared to what they are today. Today, advertising is a lot more professional, the techniques, the people, everything has changed.

Q: How would you compare the two eras?

A: It is very difficult to make comparisons. Every profession goes through a certain process in which there is competition all the time. The strong survive, the weak fall by the wayside but I would certainly like to say that the essential qualities of people involved in advertising then... they were giants, people with much more vision. They had much more concern for the profession than people have today. It is they who are responsible for making Indian advertising what it is today. It is they who, for example, had to first convince big business and industry of the value and benefits of advertising which was a lot of hard work. Also, the writers and artists involved in advertising at that time were great people. I mean any of the paintings of a man like O.C. Ganguly can be put up as a mural which is something you cannot do with the kind of artwork being produced today. (Smiles) Today, that aesthetic sense has gone.

Things have begun to look up with this budget. At least I have the feeling that the future holds promise....But what the ad world is unhappy about is the unfair measure of allowing 15 per cent discounts if public sector advertising is not done through private ad agencies.

Q. Is talent in short supply?

A: No, I woundn't say that, there are some very good people in advertising today but sometimes one does feel the pinch.

Q. What are the other problems that are facing the advertising industry today?

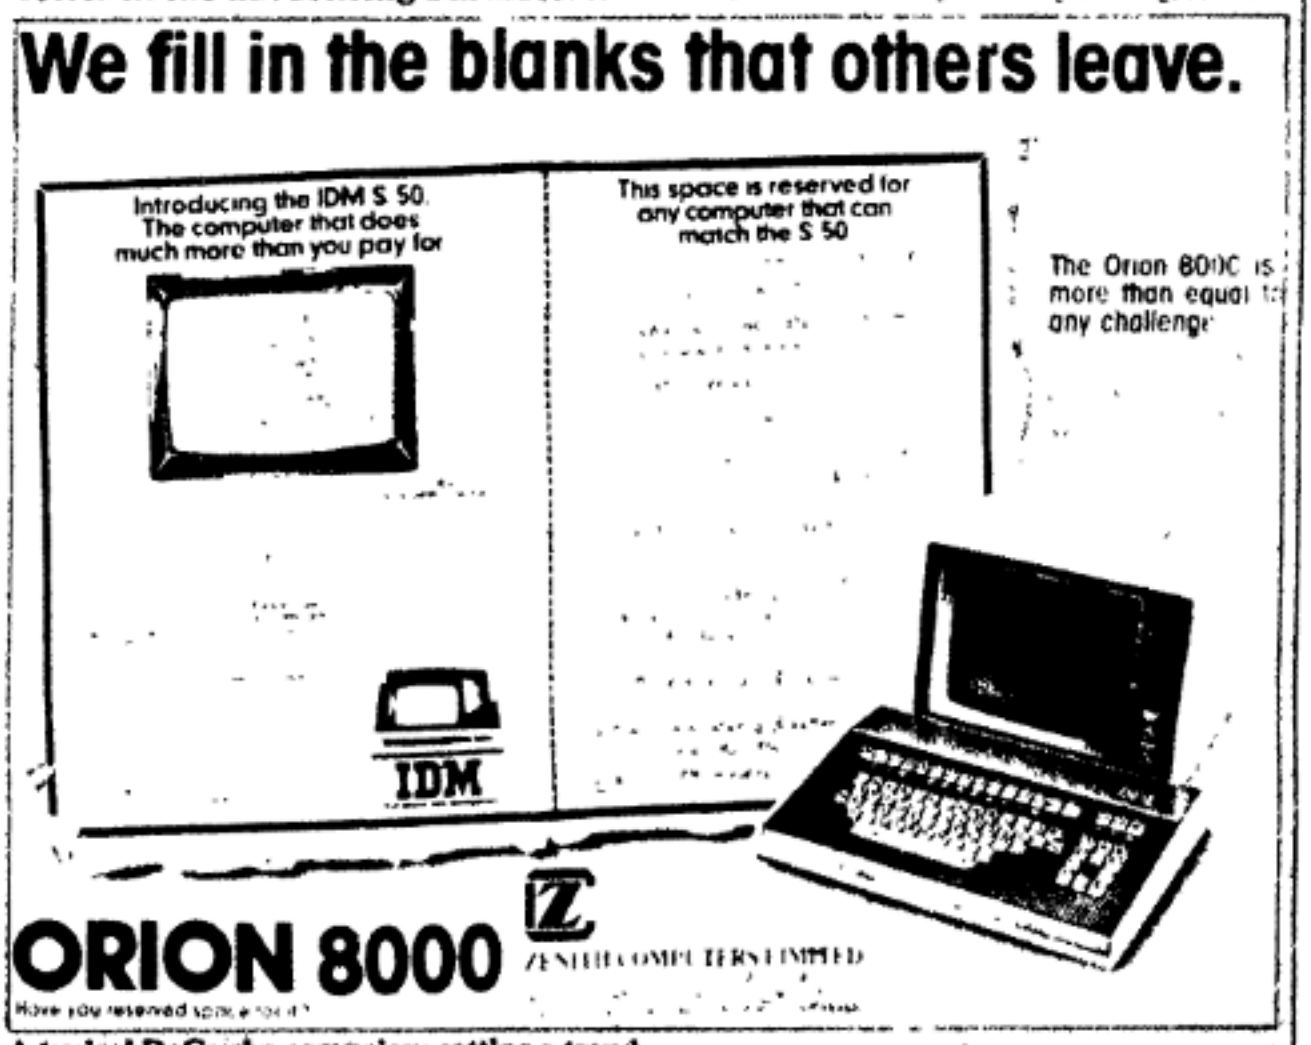
A: Things have begun to look up with this budget. At least I have the feeling that the future holds promise. We have even congratulated the government on the growth-oriented thinking but what the advertising world is unhappy about is this arbitrary, inexplicable, unfair and unprofessional measure of allowing 15 per cent discounts if public sector advertising is not done through private advertising agencies. I don't see what the logic behind this discount is. After all it is we who have got the expertise in the field. We developed all the skills and made advertising what it is today. These skills are not with the public sector. Then why the discounts? People do not realise it but advertising is one of the most insecure professions going. Today you might have all the good accounts, tomorrow you may not and you could really be down in the dumps. And the main culprit here is the public sector which not only hesitates but also, strangely, shifts its accounts from one agency to another every couple of years.

Q. But prospects, as you say, look bright for advertising.

A. Advertising in India is at a stage from where it can only go upwards. There is no sudden, overnight spurt visible but certainly a good period ahead. Coupled with this increase in consumer production has also come this new media vehicle—Doordarshan—which would be the biggest flow directly to the consumer. On the other hand, rural purchasing power is being tapped. Some say advertising is too urban-oriented, it isn't. The rural buyer is always coming to the nearest urban centre and he is influenced by what he sees there. A whole lot of things are happening in the advertising world... in a way we haven't even begun..

Interviewed by Sankarshan Thakur

Memorable Campaigns



What makes an interesting, memorable campaign? Different people have different reasons. Good artwork, a couple of catchy lines: would that be sufficient? According to some, those are the right ingredients. But not everybody is prepared to accept that. Such an advertisement might be memorable, not essentially successful. And success in the market is the major determinant of the quality of a campaign. About a year-and-a-half ago an agency had released what looked like an exquisite, fair-as-is-the-rose-in-May advertisement for ladies' undergarments. On paper, it looked perfect. Yet the product it attempted to launch failed. In spite of all the creative genius it had, the campaign failed to sell. As Vinanti Tikku, a copywriter in Everest Advertising Agency says, "It is no longer important to just write a nice line, it should be able to take on the market."

Liril is a living legend. It is a campaign that—after being in the market for almost a decade—is still as fresh to the eyes and as successful on the sale-statistics charts. Liril was a crisis-management product and something for which the advertiser can take full credit. It was launched at a time when the popular soap industry was under the stress of stringent price control. Hindustan Lever which gets almost 50 per cent of its turnover from soaps was badly hit. They needed premium soaps to compensate the setback in the popular soap market. They relaunched Pears and Lux Supreme but with limited success. Lintas India or specifically Alyque Padamsee, then decided to do something. The Liril campaign was entirely his. For 18 months he and his men at Lintas researched. What do women fantasize in their bathrooms? What do men think of while bathing? Finally Padamsee came out with a slot that was still vacant: freshness. In only its second year, Liril became the number one premium soap in the market. An interesting sidelight is that Karen Lunel, the model in that film, has according to some statistics, had more one-time exposure than any filmstar: the short was running in 2,500 cinema houses across the country at the same time. Another success that Lintas has recently had is the "Lalitaji" campaign for Surf.

Then there was this series of Hot Shot campaigns done by Sista's for India's first instant camera. The "Hot Shot lady" captured the imagination and the market and last year the campaign won a string of awards for excellence. As one of Sista's rivals in the industry put it, "The Hot Shot campaign took the fear out of photography." Its creator is a lady called Jean Durante, creative director of Sista's and considered by her chief, Bobby Sista, one of the best advertising brains in the country.

DaCunha is in many ways a trend-setter in the advertising business. It was the first agency to name its competitors directly in its campaigns: the Nutramul campaign quoted the prices of all competitive products in the market to show how cheap Nutramul itself was. "People began saying this was not ethical," says Rekha Kalekar of DaCunha, "but we don't think ethics were at all involved. We were not passing a value judgment on our competitors; it was only a factual statement, quoting their prices." This seems to be a lifestyle at DaCunha's. Only recently, IDM computers had advertised their product and left a space open in the advertisement for anyone who could match the quality of IDM computers. DaCunha immediately pounced upon the opportunity, reproducing the IDM advertisement and filling up the space left open with an advertisement for "Orion 8000" computers. "We fill in the blanks that others leave" said the campaign banner.

One could go on. Advertising is an expanding, diversifying world. Things are falling into slots. Judgment is becoming classified and trends are multiplying. At an audio-visual show in Bombay recently, Ravi Gupta of Trikaya Advertising Agency pointed out some new fronts Indian advertising was breaking into. Advertising for rural markets, shoddy till a year ago, has gone slick with films being produced on bidi brands. Surreal, startling images are being increasingly used—for example, Dodsal pipelines, FU's campaigns. Also in use are computerised special effects. Last but not the least, political advertising was given a fillip by Rediffusion. What we shall see increasingly in the days to come is more public service advertising. Agencies have already launched plans for forming a federation of advertisers whose main work would be to enhance social consciousness and produce anti-liquor advertisements, a propaganda war on bride burning, ill treatment of women, family planning, savings, etc.

A typical DaCunha campaign: setting a trend

Sankaran Thakur, Bombay

'Advertising Pays in the Long Run'

Ashis Mitra of HTA told SUNDAY

Hindustan Thompson Associates Ltd. (HTA) is a big name in the advertising industry. An associate of a worldwide agency, HTA has given a new dimension to advertising in India by initiating scientific methods of communication and market research. With an annual billing of over Rs 32 crores, it occupies the enviable number one position in the advertising business. Ashis Mitra, manager of the Calcutta branch (head office: Bombay) spoke to SUNDAY on the state and prospects of advertising. Excerpts:

Ashis Mitra

Q: What is the reason behind the sudden boom in the advertising business?

A: Indian industry has begun to recognise advertising as an instrument of marketing. With the rapid growth of industry and the fierce competition in the market, the boom in advertising was expected. One can say that the businessman has realised that advertising boosts sales.

Q: There has been a mushrooming of advertising agencies. Do you think that they are competent enough to deliver the goods?

A: There are over 400 accredidated ad agencies in the country out of which only 10 per cent are genuine ad consultants, the rest can be called suppliers. Many people are lured into advertising because it can make a very good one-man business. The investment is minimum and the returns fantastic. Advertising is a scientific concept requiring indepth market research and analysis of communication problems. Most of the ad agencies which have sprung up overnight do not have the wherewithal to initiate such a research. However, there are a few brilliant new faces in the business like Response and Grant.

Q: The transformation of Doordarshan from black & white to a colourful, entertaining medium has considerable significance. How will the print media survive TV's pull on advertisers?

A: It has survived everywhere in the world and it will survive in India. Certain forms of ad campaigns have to be carried out through newspapers and periodicals. Going by our clients, there has been no cuts in ad budgets earmarked for the print media. It is the film industry which is going to be affected.

Q: Of the total amount spent on advertising, less than 10 per cent is spent on TV. The pace at which the TV network is expanding, it is expected to consume 33 per cent by 1990. Do you think that publishers have sufficient reason to panic?

A: In a country where 70 per cent of the people cannot afford two square meals a day it would be ridiculous to assume that they will be in a position to buy TV receivers by 1990. It is no use opening relay centres and floating TV waves in the ether. It is not likely that television will gobble up 33 per cent of advertising revenue.

Q: In about three weeks of pre-election campaign, the Congress(I) spent ten crores on advertising. Do you think that the party opened up new avenues for the advertising industry?

A: I am happy that the ad industry has been called upon to play such a role. But as a matter of principle we do not do political campaigning primarily because we do not have the necessary wherewithal to communicate with the masses living in remote villages. India's vote bank lies in the villages and I have doubts regarding the role played by those Rs ten crores.

Q: Are you satisfied with the amount spent on advertising today?

A: Certainly not. India spends about 0.3 per cent of its GNP on advertising which is about the lowest in the world—even less than what Pakistan spends. The Indian corporate sector spends a meagre 1.5 per cent of their sales turnover on advertising. The managers should realise that advertising pays in the long run, that one should increase one's ad budgets when one is doing badly.

Interviewed by Rajiv Bagchi

tive in one of the advertising agencies fixed the time of meeting at 17 minutes past six. He later explained he had to be in the studio till ten past six and coming up three floors (including the time needed to wait for the lift) would have taken approximately seven minutes.

Advertising today engages some of the best creative brains in the country. Names like Alyque Padamsee, described by some as the most outstanding advertising man in the country, the right mix of the marketing expert and the creative genius, Kersy Katrak, Roger Pereira, Frank Simoes, Bobby Sista, Mike Khanna, Tara Sinha, Sylvester DaCunha, among others. Another generation of talented people is coming up Jean Durante, Suresh Malik, Ivan Arthur and Quinetin Cohello But with work expanding and becoming more demanding, agencies are beginning to feel the "creative pinch." Slowly the creative talent begun to be soaked dry.

In the mid-Sixties and early-Seventies advertising was all razzmatazz while the business that generated advertising was not too good. Things today are the reverse. Business has multiplied manifold but there is a distinct fall in the number of applicants because the glamorous sheen of advertising had evaporated and people had realised it was not only fun but also a lot of hard work. Sometimes lines have to be written and rewritten a thousand times before the final one is selected. A small paragraph may take weeks to compose. One brand name could take all the permutations a human brain can do with the help of a computer. Naturally, more people went the other way. Standards fell and creativity, most people seem to agree, is nowhere near what it used to be in the Fifties and Sixties.

"You Cannot Cheat the Common Man"

Alyque Padamsee, managing director, Lintas India, told SUNDAY

Advertising in India has come a long way with Alyque Padamsee. He had "strayed" into it more than two decades ago "because it paid well": Rs 300 a month. He found it interesting and then he began making it more interesting and meaningful. That is the part Padamsee would like to stress on. Padamsee is known more as a theatre man but he is the brain behind as many advertising successes as plays, if not more. Advertising, in fact, has become an extension of his work on the stage.

Alyque Padamsee: "Advertising is such an interesting job to be doing"

Q: The theatre has always influenced you, hasn't it?

A: Yes, even where advertising is concerned. Theatre taught me that unless you can involve people you are not communicating. It might be information but not communication. You have to put electricity into the information to make it communication. And communication is what advertising is all about. You are not only telling people something, you are doing something to them. I often tell a story to illustrate this point. There were two blind men on a street. Both had sticks in their hands, tin-cups for coins and placards hanging from their necks. The placard of the first blind man said: 'I am blind.' But the other one had written on his placard: 'It is spring and I am blind.' The first was information, the second communication. Take that family planning slogan itself. "Ek ya do bas" it said. I do not say it was bad or unsuccessful—perhaps people got bored with it—but something could be done to it. Something that could communicate better. And then we made this film. We took a jar, put one tomato into it, put another and a third one. Then we show this hand trying to shut the lid and all the tomatoes burst up. And then we show this line: "Ek ya do bas." People told me it was too highbrow and wondered whether the common man would understand it but we got an 80 to 85 per cent response. Even in cinema halls, in the galleries up front and in rural areas we could see people reacting to the bursting up of the tomatoes.

Q: Why have you stayed on in advertising, even after your success with the theatre?

A: Two reasons basically. Theatre doesn't pay well enough, advertising does. But more importantly, advertising is such an interesting job to be doing. There is so much interaction with life, so much about human nature that you come to know. Sometimes the things you come to realise are startling. For example, when we were launching a soap. Do you know the only time an ordinary middle-class woman is all by herself? All through the day she is either cooking or cleaning or looking after her husband and children. The only time she is all alone is when she shuts the doors of her bathroom to bathe. Then she starts humming and that bar of soap in her hand unlocks her fantasies. Those are the only moments a woman has exclusively for herself.

Q: So you work on that fantasy...

A: There is nothing wrong in having a fantasy. Everybody has a fantasy... You, I, everybody. It is a necessary release from the pressures of life. But let me tell you, I am one hundred thousand per cent against deceitful advertising. You cannot get anywhere with it. Do you think you can cheat the common man? No, he is very clever. Lots of people say advertising encourages extra spending. I do not think so. Nobody generally spends a rupee extra for things that he does not need. And nobody can be hoodwinked. The "dehati" is the man with the most common sense.

Q: This is a very interesting period for the industry, isn't it?

A: Yes. It has been such a good budget. We must congratulate the Prime Minister for having given us such a good one. The work will increase as business grows. I myself am recruiting more people this time than before. Then there are these very young, enthusiastic people who have gone out and opened their own agencies, making the scene so lively and competitive. They might be small, but they are very professional. We have all the "MBAs" coming in, experts in marketing and research techniques. There is much more thought content to advertising than it used to be. It is becoming more dynamic...it comes more than half the way to meet you which was not the case five or seven years ago. And television has come in a big way. An incredibly strong medium.

Q: What role do you see for advertising in the years to come?

A: The avenues are expanding. We are the only professionals in the communications business and soon the government will realise that...we have to deliver the goods.

Interviewed by Sankarshan Thakur

The problems of the advertising industry do not end here. There is the public sector which, to quote the managing director of one of the top agencies, has been "erratic and irrational" in its behaviour with advertising firms. Often they shift accounts without rhyme or reason. A major outflow medium is of course television now: the major focus of attention of advertisers. Ask anyone in the advertising industry and he will tell you how eager all clients are to put more money in this fast spreading medium. Suddenly the expenditure on advertising on television is galloping: an estimated Rs 30 crores in 1984, making a 50 per cent jump from Rs 20 crores in 1983. There are all indications that with the continuing expansion of the television network across the length and breadth of the country, inputs into television commercials will keep going up.

The question that is often asked is: Is there a threat to the print media? There can be no two opinions about it but the press has nothing to fear from television. Even when the television boom hit the West, it had left the press untouched. There could be an initial period of stress, particularly for the middle income press but the volume of press advertising is quite large. In 1984, while Rs 30 crores were spent on television, Rs 312 crores went into advertising in the print media. The written word always carries more weight. What television could really hit is advertising in cinema halls and in the outdoors.

But whatever be the balance, the volume of advertising is going to be much bigger and its presence will be felt more heavily everywhere. Never will there be a stage when there will be too much advertising. Where did it all begin? Someone remarked even the world's oldest profession needed advertising. Today there is no profession, in fact nothing that advertising does not touch. It follows us everywhere but in death.

Sankarshan Thakur, Bombay

A DaCunha creation: topical

"If Business Booms, So Does Advertising"

Stanley Pinto, director, Lintas India, told SUNDAY

Floor fifteen of Express Towers in Bombay is a revelation. It is the Lintas floor. Almost a dreamworld, the walls have blow-ups of Lintas' campaigns, panels of some of the best advertising specimens in the world and cartoon-quips on happenings inside the ad-world. In one cabin sits Stanley Pinto, the director of Lintas India. Short, stout and analytical, he spoke about Lintas and advertising. Excerpts:

Q: How do you rate the standard of advertising today?

A: It's a very professional world. Things are much better in the sense that more research facilities are available. We have access to a lot more information, marketing techniques have improved. Advertising thus, can be better focussed.

Q: Is the crisis on the creative side real?

A: Yes, there is a dearth of creative people and there are reasons for this. About a decade ago lots of people came into advertising, attracted by the glamour that was supposed to be here. The industry at that time did not need so many people so a lot of them, even good ones, were turned away. Today, the industry is expanding at a great rate but there aren't enough people wanting to come, perhaps because the glamour-myth has been exploded. So, a lot of mediocre talent has been given room. What is the alternative? Also, several talented people have gone freelance—they earn more money that way.

Q: You just said advertising is expanding. What is the extent?

A: Advertising is only the public face of business. If business booms, so does advertising. Take the sudden OPEC-inspired slump in business in 1974. Advertising was down too. I would not say advertising is booming in India today, the rate of growth is rather steady. But surely things are going to change in the next year or so.

Q: How is it likely to affect the advertising industry?

A: The increase in business will lead to a corresponding increase in advertising but there are other changes that are going to come. There is bound to be a mediawise redistribution of expenditure, a redivision of the media-pie. Television has become a much stronger medium with the middle classes specially. Cinema and a section of the press—the middle income press—will be under pressure.

Q: How much is Lintas influenced by the personality of the man who heads it: Alyque Padamsee?

A: A great deal, I should say. He is the most outstanding advertising man in the country. He knows exactly what to do before launching a campaign, is an expert on marketing techniques and a highly creative man. He, in fact, is the father of "Hindustan Lever" (of which Lintas India is the house agency).

Interviewed by Sankarshan Thakur

Be Indian, See Indian

The 'homemade' TV serial has arrived

Television has suddenly become Cindrella at the ball, with a new gown and the dirt washed off. Movie moghuls are rushing in from Bombay with sheaves of scripts and video cassettes of pilot projects for TV serials, hoping that theirs will be the glass slipper which will fit. The age of the Indian TV serial has finally arrived—late perhaps, but dramatically enough. The gold rush is on: Doordarshan has become an El Dorado for a dying film industry, already reeling from the deletirious effects of video piracy, and now, a spate of indigenous TV serials. The revised timings for the serials at 8.30 pm have cut into both the evening and night shows.

It all started with Humlog which came in as a lame, homely duck. It was a serial about a lower middle class family with its travails and triumphs which rushed past the finishing lines of rating charts, despite the cynicism of media critics. It crossed 85 per cent viewing, pushing Lucy, the favourite American sit-com (situation comedy) serial to the wings, and eventually off the screen. The world of advertising and the officials in the ministry of information and broadcasting woke up to the fact that they had a golden goose between themselves. While the tinsel world of Bombay could put in the creative talent, egged on by the advertising men who provide the money, Doordarshan could sell its precious TV time, a commodity advertisers are eager to grab.

Next to follow in the wake of the phenomenal and surprising popularity of Humlog was the slapstick TV serial Yeh jo hai zindagi, made at almost breakneck speed by Kundan Shah of Jaane bhi do yaaron fame. First, Shah was asked by Doordarshan to get six episodes (the requisite number before a serial can be aired) ready by December 1984, but in August he was told that the episodes had to be ready by mid-September. By February 1985, Doordarshan's audience survey had revealed that Yeh jo hai zindagi had a 91 per cent rating, leaving behind even Humlog, at 83 per cent. Even the perennially popular programme of Hindi film songs, Chitrahaar was not much above 80 per cent and the Sunday Hindi feature film (the box office hit, Masoom) got only 83 per cent rating. Lucy's top ratings had never crossed 50 per cent and Yes Minister, the BBC satirical serial, never crossed 30 per cent.

Imported programmes were out The accent and the idiom of the British programmes went over most heads, as did the humour. Finally the penny dropped: India is beautiful; be Indian, buy Indian—and see Indian. From 10 March this year, the TV serials made in India jumped to fourth gear: Doordarshan is screening, in its network programme beamed to 168 transmitters, six Indian TV serials a week, one episode of half an hour every evening (Humlog comes on twice a week) and an episode on Sunday mornings. Besides, there are many more in the pipeline.

Swaroop Sampat, Rakesh Bedi and Shafi Inamdar in Yeh jo hai zindagi

Most of the TV serials are from Bombay. Sponsors are now queueing up in New Delhi and as the secretary, information and broadcasting, S.S. Gill told SUNDAY, "We might have to start a rotation system of time slots for the advertisers... There is just that much time." It is almost as if the now fairly old new wave cinema—if that is what films which win the national awards or those which comprise much of the Indian panorama section of international film festivals in India or our exports to international film festivals abroad can be called—had found a lucrative outlet in TV serials or in telefilms. Television came to the rescue of cinema.

Sai Paranjpye's Ados pados, Kundan Shah's Yeh jo hai zindagi, Idhar-udhar (a Shobha Doctor idea), S. Sagar's Khandaan, Vinay Dhumale's Apradhi kaun? (a detective serial) have already made it to the little screen and it looks as if they are staying on. Doordarshan usually gives a contract for 13 episodes (about three months) which is renewable.

The Delhi Chalo call was given because the advertisers discovered after market surveys that they could get good mileage out of television. They had a captive audience and the attractive "umbrella coverage" for a large number of products. The runaway success of the sponsored shows which in the last year or so have increased the commercial revenue of Doordarshan from Rs 19 crores to over Rs 30 crores. But government officials are treading warily. They do not want Doordarshan's new found prosperity to defeat its original purpose—to inform and enlighten viewers. Says Harish Khanna, director general, Doordarshan, "I would not like to copy foreign serials... If the formula psychology becomes obsessive, we will rue the day... Revenue is not my objective, it is purely incidental." But it is a marriage of convenience, really, between Bombay and Delhi: "The pressures might of course build up, but we do have the final say and control over what is screened... And we need each other. They have the good programmes, and they need the air time. I cannot make deals with Rohini Hattangadi, Sriram Lagoo, Sai Paranjpye or Gulzar." What the success of the two serials has done is to prove that India too can make comedies and soap operas. Our neighbouring countries and many of the Asian countries import TV shows, lock, stock and barrel. The dearth of foreign exchange has proved to be a blessing in disguise for Indian television.

There is another reason for Doordarshan's open-door policy to the Bombay filmworld. With the 180 new transmitters and the expansion of the TV network there had to be accompanying software production. Doordarshan does not have the requisite infrastructure or the equipment. Said Khanna, "Television has only 18 studios after 25 years of television in this country. It is already infancy leading into obsolescence. Moreover, the private studios have better equipment than us..."

Information secretary Gill,who can be described as the midwife of Humlog which started it all, is also cautious about opening that door to Bombay and sponsored programmes too wide: "I deliberately held back my hand. Low tariffs have helped increase the catchment area. People will get used to escalating tariff, we will increase them in a few months." Aware that the shoe is now on the other foot, it being a buyers' market today as far as TV goes, the information secretary adds: "Elsewhere it is the pressure of the seller and the product itself which dictate terms. We now give the subject, approve the director, the project and script. We have tighter control and can ensure aesthetic quality and social content." In fact, Doordarshan only takes 13 episodes at a time. Gill said again: "We do not want the producers to feel very relaxed, they will start giving us junk."

Interestingly enough, it all began with what was to be a vehicle for a social message. Humlog was initially intended to be a copy of the Mexican government-sponsored soap opera Come With Me and We the Family, which had a definite social objective: family planning, or adult literacy, or status of women; in fact a hundred episodes tackled a single problem.

Illustration by Bulbul Sharma

Mr Gill returned from a trip to Mexico in October 1983 with a file on the popular Mexican soap opera. Doordarshan was supposed to cut a soap opera series, a family serial, to the Mexican master design, but with Indian situations. Humlog was like a Trojan horse of entertainment, carrying hidden in it "socially relevant" messages: family planning, honesty, hard work, etc.

After meeting many writers, Gill found Mr Manohar Shyam Joshi, who was then editing Weekend Review, had been with Dinman and Saptahik Hindustan and is a popular Hindi novelist as the most suitable person to write the serial. "I thought his imagination would not run dry after 30 episodes...We needed at least 200...and he inspired confidence," said Gill. Next came the director P. Kumar Vasudev who was returning to TV after a career in films (Kuwari Bahu was his latest film). The Humlog saga was on, with S.C. Garg, formerly of the Delhi TV centre, as the executive producer.

The importance of the success of Humlog cannot be emphasised enough. The ice was finally broken with that indefinable common man. There was something in this sentimental serial about a lower middle class family of three generations headed by Dadaji which drew TV viewers to identify themselves with it. The characters became household names: whereas an Amitabh Bachchan or a Rekha remain an Amitabh and Rekha after their myriad roles, Dadaji, the lovably inept Lallu, Barki, Chutki and Bhagvanti retained their TV names, often in their own homes as well.

So complete is the sense of identification that many young women have landed up in the house of the actress who plays Barki and demanded to know why she does not marry her boyfriend: Barki in one of the episodes cools off towards her fiance because she refuses to apologise to his uncle as he wants her to. In fact, the TV centre has even received threatening letters from people who write that they want to kill Barki because she has defied Indian social traditions by refusing to apologise to the uncle. Obviously, Humlog has got under the skin of most of the audience because it is so life-like. The Humlog family is everybody and anybody. Consequently, the heated reactions as well as the instant stardom of the Humlog cast when two of the actors were taken to the Hindustan Times office in Delhi to get their photographs taken for an article, the press practically mobbed them. Soap opera stars belong to the people as it were.

So intense is the involvement of the audience that author Joshi had to change the story: there is a compromise solution with the girl finally agreeing to marry the boy. When identification is complete and the reactions so intense—television has finally stepped over the thresholds of Mr and Mrs Average because of the aura of intimacy that the TV serial has—that Doordarshan will have to tread softly. The area is well-mined. For instance in one of the episodes, a new character Madhavi Nair goes to an old politician for a job as a journalist. When she leaves, the old man talks slightingly of her. Doordarshan has received a letter signed by 25 Malayalees objecting to this slur on a Malayalee girl.

When the line between life and art is removed, as is the case with Humlog, Doordarshan appears to have taken on more than it can chew. In the TV serial there is an organisation

ITV chief executive Ashok Raina with Young Tarang stars Nazia and Zoheb Hasan

Shailendra Singh

P.Kumar Vasudev, director of Humlog

A Giant Leap

Expenditure on advertising in India has been increasing by leaps and bounds. In the last five years the rate of revenue input in advertising has gone up by more than 50 per cent. The total amount spent in 1980 was Rs 196 crores. In 1984, the figure had jumped to Rs 403 crores. This despite the fact that a 20 per cent disallowance was placed on advertising in 1983 and the proportion of the hike from 1983 to 1984 was only 7.47 per cent. In the three pervious years the rate of increase was substantial: 27.04 per cent in 1981, 20.08 per cent in 1982 and 25.41 per cent in 1983. In all likelihood, the increase in expenditure now will be higher than at any other time in the past.

There are, perhaps, a thousand advertising agencies strewn across the country that contribute to and partake of the expenditure but a half of the total billing is controlled by 20 groups. A breakup in terms of capitalised billings:

Name of agency	Billings (in Rupees)
HTA	32 crores
Lintas India	22 crores
Clarion	20 crores
OBM	18 crores
Everest	10.6 crores
R.K. Swamy	10.5 crores
Ulka	9 crores
Chaitra	8.9 crores
Grant	5.9 crores
Rediffusion	5.6 crores
Sista's	5.5 crores
Shilpi	5.5 crores
Jaison	4.9 crores
DaCunha	4.5 crores
A.S.P.	4.1 crores
Frank Simoes	3.9 crores
Shobhagya	3.7 crores
A.C.I.L.	3.5 crores
Imageads	3.2 crores
Contract	2.2 crores

Note: These figures are liable to changes. Advertising is a fickle industry: accounts keep changing hands, new ones keep coming in.

Sankarshan Thakur

The Yeh jo hai zindagi team: (Standing, from left to right) Raman Kumar, S.S. Oberoi, Javed Khan, Farida Jalal, Rakesh Bedi, Manjul Sinha (director); (sitting, from left to right) Swaroop Sampat and Reena Pal called Bahen, loosely based on Saheli, a feminist organisation in Delhi with which Doordarshan had originally wanted a tie-up. In fact, the Mexicans would even send out social workers to their viewers who had problems.

What most of the people like about Humlog is the moral values it obviously does get across. Many viewers cite the example of the honest policeman, Khan, who is after a corrupt politician. One of the telling episodes in which the socially-relevant message comes across brilliantly is when Khan is going to be transferred because of his pursuance of the truth. His friend asks him to speak to an influential Muslim politician. Khan sarcastically asks him whether the time has come when a Muslim policeman can only turn to a Muslim politician. When the other policeman says that all those who belong to a minority have to help each other, Khan replies, "But I belong to the majority of those who believe in the truth." His line and attitude went straight to the hearts of the viewers

But the real question about Humlog is, will it in the end only serve to reinforce traditional views or will it become a vehicle, an engine of social change? It could easily become either. Never have we had such a powerful and influential medium at our disposal. Even those who do not touch Hindi cinema with a bargepole are addicted to this serial--even cynical journalists. Doordarshan could achieve this miracle, with Ashok Kumar, the narrator serving as shepherd guiding sheep away from the path of corruption. It could all go so wrong as well if Humlog goes off the rails.

The other TV serials are quite different. While Humlog shows the lower middle class and by and large appeals to them and those in small towns, Khandaan appeals to the upper class. It also shows their lives. The camera zooms in during the opening shots each week on Nariman Point: this is the world of big business—the high life. The talk is in lakhs, even the telephones are imported, as are the cars. A combination of Dallas with shades of Shyam Benegal's Kalyug, this serial has, however, introduced Bombay filmworld to TV with its stars: Girish Karnad, Sriram Lagoo, Rohini Hattangadi, Tanuja, Jalal Agha. It is absorbing.

Some of the other TV serials, like the runaway success story, Yeh jo hai zindagi show an upwardly mobile middle-middle class. But the serials are all Bombay-based cousins of Hindi cinema, albeit slickly made. Mr Gill says that this is so because all the writers are in Bombay or Delhi. The television serial is here to stay, courtesy Humlog, the forerunner which might eventually be replaced. TV serials have become an addiction with everybody waiting for the next instalment. The fact that the attention span need only be half an hour might partially explain the phenomenal success of the serials. But India has proved, for better or for worse, that she can make them, too.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

'Humlog is Meant for the Common Man'

Manohar Shyam Joshi, the creator of Humlog, told SUNDAY

Q: There is a great deal of controversy about* Humlog being too low-brow?

A: The Indian government wanted to make a soap opera based on the Mexican one. Miguel Sabido, the Mexican playwright and stage director is a relapsed Marxist and high-brow but was he deliberately low-brow for the government programme?

Q: And you?

A: My credentials as a novelist are high-brow—relapsed but still Marxist. The post-modernist school in fiction—Graham Greene, Salman Rushdie, Gabriel Garcia Marques—do not believe in all this modern hanky-panky. Frankly I find the French filmmaker Goddard as sickening and as cliche-ridden as a Bombay film... There is a cleavage amongst those who will see a Goddard film and those who will not... I think low and high-brow can be mixed; high-brow can become low-brow... Everything is a cliche, the post-modernist cry is: What is new? Life is a cliche, therefore,enjoy and see the funny side.

Q: And that is what you give in Humlog?

A: Mr S. S. Gill wanted a soap opera but with Indian situations. The Mexican variety is even more didactic and loud—blatant propaganda. If people find Humlog boring, what would the Mexican one be? Ashok Kumar appears after every six minutes. The Mexicans follow the American theory of a six-minute attention span. That is why every six minutes, there is a commercial. In Mexico they have their media personality who makes a point which has already been made.

Q: What kind of letters does Doordarshan receive?

A: Mostly letters from girls who say that they are like Barki and would like to revolt like her but have nobody to help them. We got an interesting letter from a girl who wrote: "Since the chromosome comes from the male, my father is responsible for my being a girl... Please get Ashok Kumar to broadcast this. I cannot tell my grandmother and mother-in-law this, but you can tell them so that they do not blame women if a male child is not born."

Q: How did you get involved in Humlog? From the Hindustan Times to soap opera is quite a change.

A: Mr Gill returned from Mexico with a file on the soap operas and called a group of us. Most of the writers said no because the money was not good. Gill told me that money could be discussed later, the priority was to do it—he almost made it sound like a national duty.

Q: Were you not to make the series in Bombay originally?

A: We were told in February last year to go to Bombay to select the actors and that the serial would be shot in the films division. But the advertising world knew that the 21st century was coming. The air was thick with phrases like quizzes, sit-coms, talk shows. I worked with ITV (Independent Television) to help devise a sit-com. Suddenly there appeared Shobha Doctor: she had ideas and a story, and as suddenly we were told that it would be Delhi and that there would be Shobha Doctor. The go-go lady, the dynamic executive... I had until then thought I was only a consultant. I had planned it as a government set-up. But Shobha Doctor wanted to work on a one-to-one basis: one writer, one director, one writer... I left Hindustan Times on 24 April and shooting began at break-neck speed. In fact, the original cast ran away, they were apprehensive. I had never even heard of soap operas, so I went to the US Information Service and boned up.

Q: There was a great deal of public uproar against the girl who refused to apologise to her boyfriend's uncle.

A: Eighty-five per cent of the mail was against the defiance of a middle class girl. "We will shoot her," people wrote.

Q: How did you find a way out of this situation?

A: The boy will eventually agree. I changed the story. Dada*ji*, our equivalent of the American psychiatrist tells the uncle, Jata Shankar, that since he still adheres to traditional principles, he should understand that the world had changed; the young girl, had she been a cynic, would have agreed to apologise to him but as she is also an idealist and sticks to her principles, she is just like him. In the clash of wills, his would have to go.

Q: Humlog has been the butt of a lot of criticism.

A: There are two kinds of intellectual elitists: those who would like to see Keki Daruwala and Muktibodh read their poems on television—the kind of art generally above themselves—or the second, who even if they do want something popular, their notion of popular is something western... Some of the critics are so patronising, (they) do not understand Hindi. Amita Malik thinks that Lallu is the family servant who speaks funny English... She wrote that Humlog is a combination of Daddi ma jaagi and Adhe Adhure. And then when she wrote about the trans-Jamuna audience of Humlog she was giving me another compliment—Humlog is meant for them, not for her.

Q: You mean television is not really for the intellectuals?

A: Well, Anil Dharker described Tabassum as a bad interviewer because of her loud gestures and moving eyes... This is what David Frost does as well. Or those American shows which begin with, 'Well, hi there folks!' After all, this is show business. People are not sitting in a dark hall. They are busy eating, talking... You have to get across to them, you have to be loud.

Interviewed by [illegible]

Shekhar Singh

Manohar Shyam Joshi

Doordarshan's Money Spinners

Doordarshan expects its earnings from commercial and sponsored programmes to touch Rs 30 crores annually

Shekhar Singh

Jayashree Arora: Humlog's Bhagwanti

What began as a discreet invitation by Doordarshan to private producers to improve TV programmes has resulted in the creation of a new genre of entertainment. It was in 1981 that Doordarshan decided to abandon its closed-door policy and open new vistas for private entrepreneurs. It hesitatingly sent feelers to advertising agencies and producers to assist in creating popular TV. Doordarshan had before it the recommendations of a committee set up by the then information and broadcasting minister, Vasant Sathe, which had initiated the commercialisation of Doordarshan in a big way. Before launching its commercial programme scheme, Doordarshan recalled the objectives of the committee: "The government wanted to augment its revenue, encouraging outside talent by getting sponsors and with some of the additional revenue obtained through sponsorship, improve Doordarshan's programmes."

Shekhar Singh

Rajesh Puri: the inimitable Lallu of Humlog

The response to Doordarshan's invitation at that time was far from heartening. Few producers or professional agencies were equipped with either hardware or software to give Doordarshan the entertainment package it demanded. There was a flurry of activity as professionals looked around for new talent which they could exploit on the screen of the 'idiot box.' Media planners were suddenly asked to learn a new vocabulary—story-board, pilot programme, time slots. Restricted to producing 10 to 20 second TV spots, they were pressed to expand their horizons to plan for 20-25 minutes' of viewing time.

Among the first to break into new territory on television was Concept Advertising which brought in for its clients a galaxy of ghazal talent (Pankaj Udhas, Peenaz Masani, Talat Aziz and Anup Jalota); the ever-popular programme of filmi song sequences, Chitrahaar and its counterpart in Bombay, Chhaya Geet, were quick to find sponsors. Trikaya Advertising went a step further by negotiating a Rs 15 lakh contract with Doordarshan: they produced the highlights of the India-West Indies Test series of 1983 for their client Thums Up, and enthralled millions of cricket fans. Then came the sponsored serials from across the seas—like Lucy and Telematch. TV had finally become an ideal medium for an advertiser.

If TV became an extremely suitable medium for an advertiser, for Doordarshan commercialisation of TV became a goldmine. Money from sponsors and advertisers became a steady flow replacing the earlier trickle. Consider the revenue earned by Doordarshan ever since it went commercial on 1 January 1976. At that time only static spots were allowed and advertising revenue from eight stations including Bombay, Delhi, Calcutta and Madras was a paltry Rs eight lakhs. Regular commercials were permitted in late 1976 and by the end of that year Doordarshan had netted Rs 80 lakhs. By 1980 commercialisation had added Rs nine crores to Doordarshan's coffers. With the rush of sponsored programmes the figure rose to Rs 20 crores in 1983 and an estimated Rs 28 crores in 1984. By 1984, TV became the second largest advertising revenue-earner next to press advertising. According to indications, advertising expenditure on TV in 1985 is likely to touch Rs 45 crores. Doordarshan officials themselves expect their earnings from commercials and sponsored programmes to touch Rs 30 crores this year.

When Doordarshan went commercial in a big way, it was clear that the response to its appeal would depend largely on its rate structure. Doordarshan had to offer advertisers a viable package for them to shift their attention from the time-tested medium of press and radio to experiment on TV. Examine the present rate structure of Doordarshan: a 10-second spot on the national hook-up during prime time costs charges Rs 35,000, out of which the advertiser is permitted two minutes of advertising. All production costs of the sponsored programme are to be met by the advertiser and not more than three products can be advertised in one programme.

The production cost of every programme or part of any serial works out to around Rs one lakh According to agency estimates, Doordarshan's own soap serial, Humlog, cost Rs 65,000 per programme, Khandaan produced by the HTA, Rs 85,000 and Apradhi Kaun over a lakh. Other sponsored programmes may cost more Paying Guest, a serial to be aired soon by Rajashree Productions (produced for Dabur and Ponds by OBM) is likely to cost Rs 1,50,000 per serial An exceptionally good programme with a star cast (there are several in the pipeline) and excellent production quality can cost the advertiser anything between Rs 2,00,000 and Rs 2,50,000 Add to this the cost of Rs 35,000, for each product and the sponsor can spend upto Rs 25 lakhs if he needs a minimum of 15-20 repeats of the spot in a year. It is because of the high costs of production, coupled with the fact that the facility of more than one product can be advertised, that most of the large sponsors with Doordarshan today are those which have a multi-product range before them. Take the largest sponsor on TV today: Hindustan Lever, Food Specialities, Tata Oil Mills, Reliance Textiles and Godrej. They have all responded enthusiastically to a multi-product appeal on Doordarshan, and have divided their expenses on TV among a number of products.

What advantages do advertisers have if they sponsor programmes on TV and what is the reason behind some advertisers (like Vicco Vajradanti and Lakhani Hawai Chappal) slashing their press and radio budgets for TV advertising? According to D K. Bose, media controller, HTA, advertising on TV has come to stay in India because it is a cost-efficient medium and because advertising on television attracts a captive audience of nearly 40 million people. "No other medium has the scope to reach such a large segment of society I am confident that with the success of commercial TV already established, in years to come, TV will earn more and more revenue for Doordarshan." A similar view in favour of increased advertising over TV was expressed by Avishesha Bhojani, account director, Ulka Advertising, which has got several sponsored programmes lined up for its clients and are to be aired in a few months' time "Advertisers have realised that TV gives greater mileage to the product than any other medium. It is a safe investment with a guaranteed audience response," said Ms Bhojani.

Doordarshan officials themselves admit that the tremendous rush for TV advertising and sponsored programmes took them by surprise. They are, in fact, facing great pressure from advertisers for time on TV and with limited time-slots, Doordarshan has been forced to refuse time to prospective advertisers. So much so, that if an advertiser wants to air a sponsored programme on prime time, he can only get a suitable slot after December 1985. (At present Doordarshan allows two sponsored programmes to be aired on the national hook-up between 8.30 pm and 9.30 pm. Four hours of sponsored time are allowed every Sunday). With limited time slots Doordarshan has to turn down offers for entertaining programmes and has been blamed for being indiscriminate in deciding which sponsor to give time to. There are no takers for sponsors

Popularity Ratings

From being the poor relative of Bombay films for years, television has suddenly become a major source of entertainment. People who earlier switched on TV sets only to watch the Sunday film and Chitrahaar, are staying at home on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings to watch their favouritie serials. Humlog, Khandaan, Yeh jo hai zindagi and Ados pados are the new serials that are keeping viewers glued to the box.

Yeh jo hai zindagi leads with a 91 per cent rating beating the American soap opera, Lucy, by 40 per cent, according to the Doordarshan audience survey "It is quick moving, good, clean fun. The main characters, Ranjit, Renu and Raja are very likable and get into situations which can happen to any of us," says Santosh Manchanda. The comedy appeals to everyone; children identify with the bullied younger brother, Raja. "My sister treats me just like that," was a comment made by a boy recently. "It is an action-packed comedy about real life and has no boring messages," remarks Ashok Hemrajani. A senior lady executive, however, stopped watching Yeh jo hai zindagi because she found herself talking just like Renu.

Humlog has a committed group of viewers who defend this family saga. "It takes an honest and sympathetic look at middle class family life," says Vinita Rawat. "The concept of family values is strong and the characters support each other. Unlike Khandaan, where everyone hates everyone." But others find Humlog dull and feel the series has run out of story matter. "It started well, but now Majhli cries too much. Typical Delhi Doordarshan amateur stuff," complains Meera Rai. "But Lallu is good," she adds. Lallu has a high popularity rating among children and so has police inspector Shamdhar. "He looks just like Amitabh Bachchan from the back," thinks nine-year-old Aruna. "It's for old people; it's too slow. The serials from Bombay are much more entertaining," says Rajesh Jaggi.

Khandaan, a slick Dallas-cum-Dynasty serial from Bombay, has a mixed following. "Intelligent but too serious," says Anne Khan. Many find it "artificial." Promilla Malhotra dismisses Khandaan with, "We are not interested in the problems of the millionaire class."

Ados Pados, a serial about a divorced father bringing up a child, does not have many takers yet. But the child character Robin has won a lot of sympathy by repeatedly failing his Hindi examinations. The main appeal of a successful serial seems to be humour—preferably the slapstick kind—and if that humour can be combined with real life situations, a hit serial is created. But the comedy has to be clean with no risque scenes or conversation. "There was too much talk about girlfriends in the BBC serials Our Indian serials are those we can watch without feeling embarrassed and, what's more important, the children can enjoy them," says Kapil Rai firmly.

Regular serial-watchers identify with one charactor or the other. Even though the names of the actors are unknown to most viewers, their TV-screen images have become a part of many a family. "If I miss an episode of Humlog, I have to run to the neighbours to find out what happened. I really worry about these people as if they were my friends," says Santosh Manchanda. This kind of audience involvement was totally lacking in the case of the foreign serials. "We used to watch those programmes without understanding half the jokes. Anyway they were no good. Sorry was really pathetic but we used to watch it because there was nothing else," says Vinita Rawat. Not any more. Indian soap serials have arrived with a tremendous debut.

Bulbul Sharma, New Delhi

on the second channel of Doordarshan in spite of there being a 50 per cent discount for advertisers. Doordarshan has also been hard-pressed by advertisers to increase advertising time on TV or extend broadcast time. "Doordarshan is acting like a rationing agency, not a marketing agency," complained one advertiser who has been trying for a time slot on TV which he has been promised only after six months.

Faced with an unprecedented response from advertisers and sponsors vying for time, top officials at Doordarshan are contemplating a revision of tariff and an increase in broadcast time. Doordarshan officials argue that the advertising rates offered by Doordarshan in its new programme policy effective from 1 March this year is an incentive for advertisers. Going by the present rates charged by Doordarshan for spots on TV, two minutes of advertising time would cost an advertiser over three lakh rupees. This time was being offered to the sponsor for a mere Rs 35,000.

According to S. S. Gill, secretary in the information and broadcasting ministry, the realisation that sponsored programmes on television has great potential came after a great deal of discussion and persuasion "Today the TV serial has become an established fact of life. With indigeneous production of serials, imported programmes like Lucy and Different Strokes are not missed any longer," he said. When asked why Doordarshan had offered prime time to sponsors at a discount rate, he explained that he had "deliberately decided on a low tariff. If we had made it an expensive proposition for advertisers, then the source would have dried up soon. The low tariff introduced by us has helped advertisers in cashing in on the boom." He felt the rates of Doordarshan for sponsored programmes were a mere pittance and that the tariff was likely to be revised soon. The tariff when revised would be at least "more than doubled."

Besides anxiously waiting for a revised tariff, advertising agencies and producers of sponsored programmes are also worried about the future prospects of setting up studios and production units of their own. Producers at Doordarshan have been instructed to look around for more ideas and put on the air new serials like Humlog. The films division too has been requested to produce films and serials which Doordarshan can offer to advertisers. This will naturally result in a proliferation of more and more programmes and will ease the great demand on private producers. Independent Television Company (ITV), was among the first of the private companies to offer Doordarshan sponsored programmes ITV produced the popular musical serial of Indian pop music, Young Tarang starring Nazia and Zoheb Hasan and is currently producing Quiz Time for its sponsors, Limca and Amul chocolates.

Said the chief executive of ITV, Ashok Raina, "The medium of commerial TV and sponsored programmes has been suddenly thrust upon the Indian audiences. Though the programmes are extremely popular, what is lacking is a cohesive policy on such programmes. Now that Doordarshan has asked the films division to produce additional programmes with a limited time slot, what will happen to producers like us? Why have us here when there is no time to air the programmes we produce?" A way out, according to Raina, is to allow private companies to sell serials directly to Doordarshan so that they could later offer the programmes to sponsors and advertisers.

There is likely to be a further spurt in sponsored, programmes being aired on Doordarshan as the infrastructure is being expanded for more television programmes. The package deal offered by the government in September 1984 to set up ancillary units for production is soon to be implemented. Over 100 private entrepreneurs were approached by the government to set up studios for video programme production. The equipment in the package (imported from Sony) costing Rs 23 lakhs was offered to private parties for Rs 15 lakhs There are about 30 such producers who will be receiving this equipment in a few months and will commence independent programme production.

To meet the daunting demand from advertisers for whom television has become the ultimate medium, Doordarshan is now faced with a situation where it does not know how to cope with the stupendous interest generated in commercial television. During its short journey from obscurity to unimaginable popularity, commercial television has decimated radio advertising, and affected other forms of media. Commercial television is now making inroads into the world of celluloid and threatens to annihilate cinema as well.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

See No Evil

"No sex please, we are Indian" seems to be the dictum that Doordarshan is following before allowing the sponsors to air any programme. After receiving a spate of complaints about objectionable contents in some programmes, Doordarshan has now put its foot down. "We have become hard nuts in accepting scripts and programmes," said S.C. Garg, programme controller, Doordarshan.

Contracts of several advertisers have been terminated prematurely by Doordarshan in the past few months because they were objectionable. Some of the commercials taken off the TV screen recently are the Clearasil commercial produced by OBM, Hot Shot (Sistas), Rexona and McDowells (both produced by Lintas). "We do not want the evils of celluloid—sex, violence and crime to be reflected on the television screen.

Television viewers have protested against commercials aired by Doordarshan on family planning, for example, the commercial on Nirodh. Doordarshan has consequently issued a directive for all such "adult commercials" to be aired after 9.20 pm. After 1 May, viewers will see all commercials of family planning, contraceptives and sanitary napkins, only in the late hours.

A special screening committee has been set up by Doordarshan to clear all commercials and sponsored programmes. The committee ensures that the hem-line of outfits adorning female models displaying products on TV, is below the knee and the films bereft of even a hint of sex. Nudity and obscenity are taboo.

Doordarshan has, however, not as yet paid heed to complaints from conservative viewers about the dialogues in some of its most popular sponsored programmes. Humlog, for instance, has been attacked by viewers for introducing elements of social disparity on television: marital discord, divorce and corruption. Strong objection has been raised to the dialogues used in Khandaan, another serial which is high on the popularity charts. Perhaps, Doordarshan should now evolve a new code of conduct against the use of offensive words which are heard often on TV serials, including Khandaan.

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi

A Sweet Deal in Orissa

The J.B. Patnaik government through a cabinet sub-committee decision has virtually allowed Dr Banshidhar Panda, owner of Indian Metals and Ferro Alloys, to get away without paying Rs 8.59 crores, which his company owes the state as electricity dues.

"I made a man of him." That is how Janata Party stalwart and former Orissa chief minister Biju Patnaik would like to remember Dr Banshidhar Panda, the owner of Indian Metals and Ferro Alloys Limited (IMFA), makers of the rare silicon metal which has a high demand in the world market. But Dr Panda has disappointed Biju Patnaik, who had at one point of time helped and encouraged him to set up IMFA. Biju Patnaik is upset because Dr Panda's dealings with the government have been the subject of a raging controversy for the last four years. Along with another Janata Party leader of the state, Srikant Jena, Biju Patnaik has alleged that the "unholy nexus" between the chief minister, J. B. Patnaik, and Dr Panda has been growing over the last few years at the cost of the state exchequer.

It all started in 1981 when the government-controlled Orissa Forest Corporation (OFC) supplied charcoal to IMFA at the rate of Rs five a bag. At that time, the Corporation supplied the same quality of charcoal to other parties at Rs 25 a bag. Says Srikant Jena, "The OFC gave this benefit to IMFA although, on principle, the highest bidder should have been awarded the contract. When we raised protests in the Assembly, the chief minister defended his government's action on the ground that IMFA was a local industry."

The government's dealings with IMFA have been questioned the most in the settlement of arrears amounting to Rs 8.59 crores which the firm has to pay for electricity consumed by it. When the Orissa State Electricity Board (OSEB) demanded the payment, IMFA moved the courts challenging the demand of the OSEB. The controversy regarding the payment of electricity dues arose when IMFA wanted an additional 30 MW of electricity for its charge chrome unit in Koraput district, two years ago. It would have normally gone unnoticed but for the acute power shortage gripping the state. The question that the opposition had then asked was: How could the government allow such a substantial supply when most public and private sector industries in the state were working much below the rated capacities owing to power cuts?

Dr Banshidhar Panda and his wife (left) with former defence minister R. Venkataraman(in the corner, next to the plaque) and Orissa chief minister J.B. Patnaik and his wife at the foundation stone-laying ceremony of IMFA's charge chrome plant at Choudwar

The question assumed importance in view of the fact that IMFA owed the OSEB more than eight crores of rupees. In fact, the State Electricity Board had issued a circular that it would not give additional power to any company which had a backlog of payments. Further investigation showed that the OSEB, just before sanctioning the additional power to IMFA, signed an agreement with the firm in December 1982 to settle the arrears. The agreement was concluded quietly at the government's instance as it followed the decision of a cabinet sub-committee. The only excuse the government gave for the additional supply of power was that the IMFA's charge chrome plant was a 100 per cent export-oriented unit.

The pact between IMFA and OSEB has been dubbed by the opposition leaders as a "favourable act on the part of the government." The agreement has been challenged in a public interest litigation in the Orissa High Court by Srikant Jena. The deal with IMFA, however, did not remain within the courtroom since Srikant Jena and others of the Janata Party raised it in the recently-concluded Assembly session.

The point of controversy which has been raised by the opposition leaders in the Assembly is over the terms of the settlement of the dispute through the payment of arrear dues. They have argued that the agreement has resulted in a virtual exemption or at best it has to pay a nominal amount. According to the agreement, IMFA is required to pay Rs 3.48 crores, which is officially described by the IMFA authorities as its "admitted dues," in 20 equal instalments over a period of five years. The dispute over the rest of the Rs 5.11 crores was to be referred to a board of arbitrators consisting of three retired High Court judges.

Dr Panda with former Prime Minister Morarji Desai

The first point of the agreement has been questioned in the public interest litigation on the ground that "the admitted dues of Rs 3.48 crores could be kept in banks to generate enough interest to pay off the instalments within the period of five years." As far as the second point is concerned, it is described as a still more concessionary gesture of the government towards the firm. Srikant Jena has pointed out that there is no deadline by which the dispute could be settled by the arbitrators and neither were there any guidelines. Contends Jena in his petition: "The reference to arbitration will also deprive the OSEB of the use of the amount and the interest on it."

SUNDAY met the chairman of the Orissa State Electricity Board, Mr S. K. Nanda, for his views on the appointment of the panel of retired judges. He was of the opinion that the constitution of the cabinet subcommittee panel had become "redundant" because the OSEB has decided to abide by the Arbitration Act. As per the provisions of the Act, said Mr Nanda, the IMFA case should be referred to a special arbitration tribunal since it involved an amount of over Rs two crores. Mr Nanda also added that a tribunal was yet to be appointed.

The opposition also raised another point in the Assembly. It deals with the agreement between IMFA and the OSEB. In view of the Electricity Supply (Orissa Amendment) Act 1981, it was pointed out "the legislature passed the Act with a view to enforcing uniform tariff to avoid discrimination and arbitrary concessions sometimes made to a few selected customers." Quoting the provisions of the Act, it is contended that under the legislation, IMFA "is liable to pay at the revised uniform tariff rate together with interest accruing thereon." The Act, in fact, empowered the OSEB authorities to realise its dues from any consumer since, according to the provisions, "no such realisation of amount or making or creation of demand shall be questioned in any court and, if questioned the objection shall not be maintained by such a court merely on the ground that there exists any agreement, undertaking, commitment or concession, fixing special tariffs or providing for fixation of special tariffs for the sale of electricity to such persons."

Dr Banshidhar Panda

The government's contention is that "when the disputes are referred to the board of arbitrators, they are expected to dispose of the same in the light of the statutory provisions in force. It is, however, open to the parties to settle the disputes pending in various courts and reach an amicable settlement providing for realisation of the admitted arrears as well as referring all other pending disputes to a regularly constituted board of arbitrators consisting of retired High Court judges." This official explanation has not satisfied the critics who persist in their allegation that "the concession given to IMFA amounts to whimsical squandering of public money in which every tax payer is interested." What has provoked the critics more is the government's "out of the way step to appoint a sub-committee to recommend the out-of-court settlement of the disputes with IMFA." The other point which Srikant Jena has mentioned in his litigation is "the irrational splitting up of the tariff." While the tariff part of the dispute has been settled for payment in 20 equal instalments, the surcharge has been referred to the arbitration panel. The official explanation for the grant of the instalment facility is that "in view of the heavy quantum of arrears, instalment facilities have been given to IMFA." As opposition politicians put it, the arrears would run into about Rs 10 crores if the interest is taken into account.

The controversy over what the opposition politicians describe as "special links" between the government and IMFA, has assumed a greater dimension with the alleged evasion of income tax by the company. Again it is Srikant Jena who has taken a leading role in pointing out the manner in which IMFA has evaded income tax. In a letter to the commissioner of income tax, Orissa, Mr Jena wrote that the firm had obtained relief from the income tax department since it was paying electricity tariff at the rate of 3.8 paise per unit. In reality it was making payments at the rate of 2.5 paise per unit and thereby paying less income tax. The matter which Mr Jena raised related to the period between 1968-69 and 1972-73. Said Mr Jena, "The difference of 1.3 paise in the two rates will total up to a huge amount on which no tax has been paid." When SUNDAY contacted the commissioner of income tax, G. B. Chand, he said "The case (against IMFA) has been reopened with the permission of the Board (Central Board of Direct Taxes). The reassessment needed the Board's permission since it was a case over eight years old."

Dr Panda's troubles may not end there. In May last year, a statement was made in the Rajya Sabha that IMFA had been fined over Rs 50 lakhs for the unauthorised manufacture of some items in its Therubali plant in Koraput district. The statement, said Mr Jena, had been made only a few days before the scheduled foundation-stone laying ceremony of IMFA's second charge chrome plant at Choudwar. "Despite my memorandum to chief minister J. B. Patnaik," recounts Jena, "and the then defence minister Mr R. Venkataraman not to grace the function, the protest was rejected and both the ministers went by IMFA's helicopter (from Bhubaneswar) to Choudwar to perform the ceremony."

The helicopter is another sore point with the opposition in Orissa. Said Biju Patnaik: "Dr Panda gave his helicopter to the Congress(I) and J B Patnaik for his state-wide election tours during the last parliamentary and Assembly polls. But when I asked him to give it to me for an election meeting of the Janata Party, he refused to part with it saying that it had been booked earlier by the CM. This was a lame excuse. Dr Panda has been indulging in politics without directly participating in any political party."

At the foundation stone-laying ceremony of IMFA's charge chrome plant at Choudwar. On the dais can be seen R. Venkataraman, former defence minister, chief minister J.B. Patnaik, his wife and Dr Panda

Mr Biju Patnaik should know for it was he who had asked Dr Panda to come to Orissa leaving his job in the USA. In 1961, when Biju Patnaik had gone to London, Dr Panda had met him there. "I found him a bright boy," recounted Biju Patnaik. A graduate in metallurgy from the MIT, USA, Dr Panda was asked by Biju Patnaik to come home and start a smelting furnace for ferro-alloys in the state. He did not have the finances and it was Biju Patnaik who, as chief minister, assisted him. Since then, Dr Panda has become a major industrialist of the state. Naturally he has had to keep in touch with politicians in power.

According to IMFA authorities—Dr Panda was unavailable for comment as he had gone to Sweden—electricity is the major raw material for the production of ferro-alloys. Said M.S. Dass, assistant general manager (public relations) of IMFA, "For the production of silicon metal, 60 per cent power is required. As regards the payment of dues to the electricity board we are not going to run away. We will definitely pay our dues." Mr Dass also said that earlier almost everyday there used to be disputes with the electricity board regarding tariff. They had all been settled. The factory in fact was closed down for three months because it had utilised all the power allotted to it. "We pay Rs one crore a month as our electricity dues," said Mr Dass. "I don't see what the difficulty is in our payment of instalments."

As far as the use of the helicopter is concerned, Mr Dass said, "When the chief minister asks us for the helicopter, we can't say no." Who paid for it, we asked. Mr Dass hedged about for some time before replying that someone did but he did not know who. According to Biju Patnaik, the rate for hiring a helicopter like the one IMFA has is between Rs 12,000 to Rs 15,000 an hour. Mr Dass also volunteered information that his company was involved in a lot of philanthropic work. And all the trouble regarding IMFA had been taken to court because of IMFA's rivals who were instigating the Janata Party to raise the issue in the Assembly. "We do such a lot of good work," said Mr Dass, "that our rivals are jealous of us." But does the philanthropic work absolve IMFA of its duties to the OSEB?

Sarada P. Nanda and Tirthankar Ghosh, Bhubaneswar

Former defence minister R. Venkataraman in the Choudwar plant

INVESTIGATION

A Classic Bungle

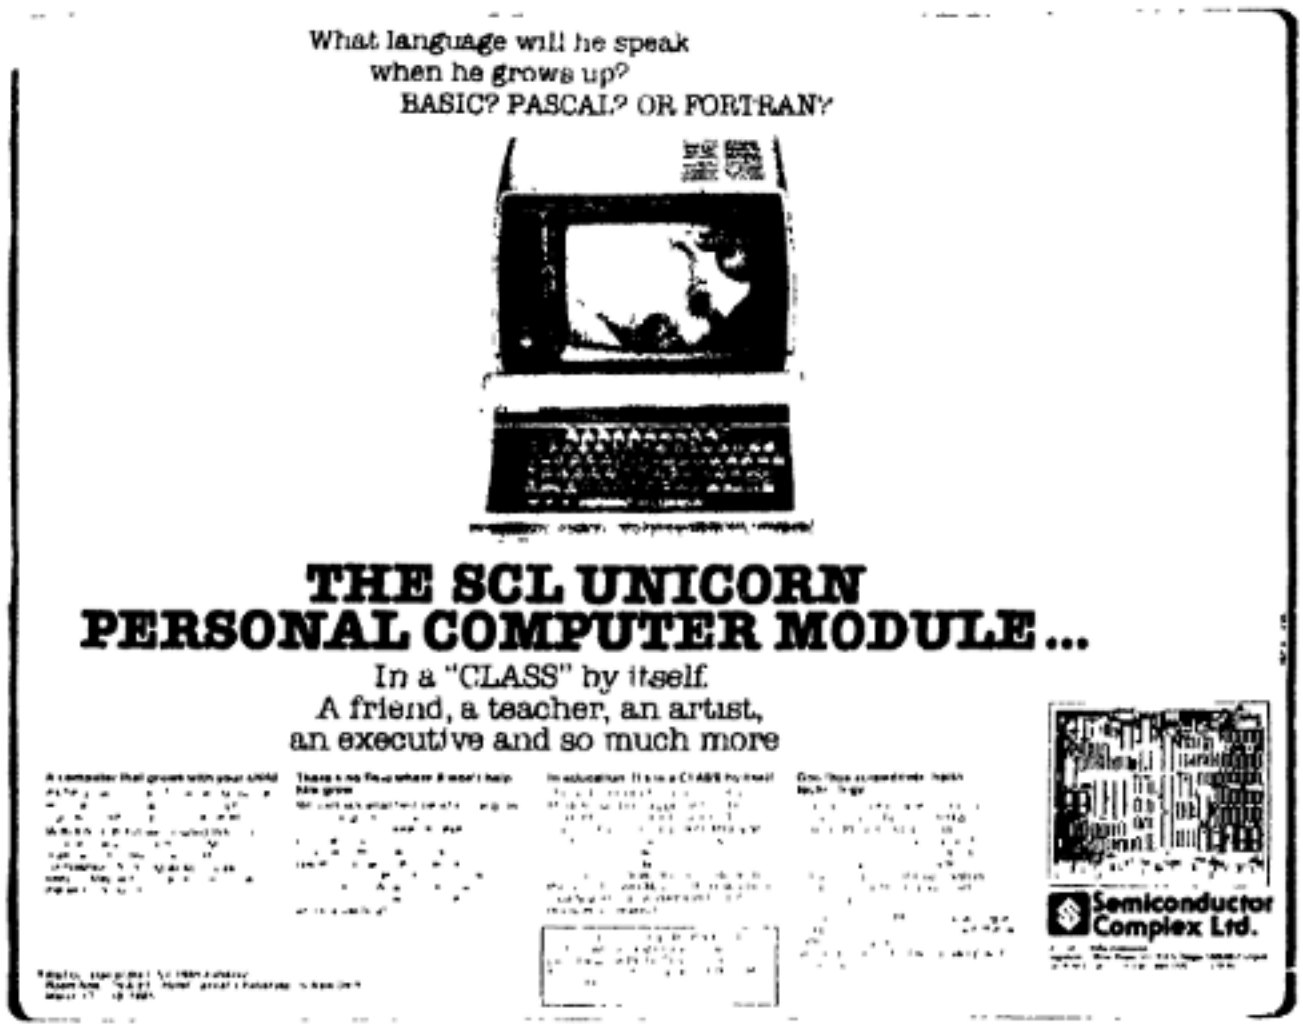
Computers for CLASS, a programme to introduce computers in Indian schools, have been acquired through a dubious deal with a bankrupt British firm

In a bid to take the nation into the 21st century, computers are being introduced in Indian schools. The programme for taking computers into Indian classrooms has been named Computer Literacy and Studies in Schools (CLASS). The way the computers have been acquired shows that while Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is trying to root out corruption, even in a vital programme like CLASS, bungling has taken place The computers, acquired through British grants, have been purchased at prices higher than the international price. What is more, Acorn, the British firm from which the computers are being purchased in semi-knocked down (SKD) condition went bankrupt early this year because of poor sales in the Christmas season, a period when British firms usually make profits. India has bought computers made in Hong Kong, via the UK and paid a higher price. The Hong Kong manufacturers had offered to sell the computers directly at a lower price, but this offer was not taken seriously. And when the Hong Kong firm was getting its pound of flesh, it did not bother after the initial offer to pursue the matter. If a British firm was making a quick buck at India's cost, it could not be a matter of great concern in Hong Kong.

The Prime Minister's office learnt about the financial position of the British supplier in February. On 20 February 1985, Arvind Pande, joint secretary in the PM's office, wrote letter No. 17(855)/85-PMSto Mr S.R. Vijayakar, secretary, department of electronics, enquiring about the crisis in Acorn Computers, UK, the suppliers chosen for school computers. The query was passed on to Mr Virendra Mohan, chairman of Semi-Conductors Complex Ltd. (SCL), the public sector firm entrusted with the CLASS project. According to a reply sent by the SCL chairman to the government on 25 February, Mr N. Saxena, general manager (modules and subsystems), of SCL had been despatched to London on 23 February (three days after the PM's office showed its concern). On 25 February, Saxena telephoned the SCL chairman from London and gave his report. To quote the letter of the SCL chairman to Mr S.R. Vijayakar (letter No. SCL/1004/1/85): "Mr Saxena has informed me today over the telephone that Acorn Computers ran into difficulty due to shortfall in sales during the Christmas season. Acorn has recently incurred a loss of pound sterling 10.9 million, against which Olivetti has given them pound sterling 18 million for 49 per cent equity, to tide over the difficulty. The staff has remained unchanged except for the chief executive. Changes in policy, if any, will be known after next two weeks. However, we have been assured that supplies to India will not be disrupted".

This reply to the query raised by the Prime Minister's office shows the status of the company to which the vital CLASS project has been entrusted. The very fact that SCL or the Department of Electronics (DoE) did not wake up to the crisis in the British firm till the Prime Minister's office ordered an enquiry shows that the new ethos which Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi is trying to spread in the government departments has not really percolated to lower levels. It is left to the Prime Minister's office to be vigilant, so that bungles can be detected.

The story of the CLASS project is also a reflection on the Indian company which has been entrusted with this important project. After about seven years in hibernation, SCL, a public sector company under the DoE completed civil construction work and infrastructure facilities by September 1983 and started wafer fabrication activity on 2 October. Amongst its proposed activities were large scale integrated circuit (LSI) design, maskmaking, wafer fabrication and assembly of electronic modules for watches and clocks, etc. On 12 March 1985, a half-page advertisement in The Times of India told of a new activity by this company. With a picture of a mother and child on a small screen of a computer, the SCL introduced to CLASS the Unicorn Personal Computer Module—which, it was promised, would be a friend, teacher, artist, executive and much more. This Unicorn Module was based on micro-processor chips that were being fabricated at the Chandigarh plant of the company, the advertisement announced.



The major change in the project implementation schedule of the company has been obviously approved by the DoE. The buy-back arrangement with the collaborators for the fabrication of the silicon wafers has fallen through and the company is carrying an unsold stock of around Rs 2 crores till the end of 1984. The direction from the DoE was to sell this stock only through Keltron in India. In this welter of confusion, whoever thought of this company starting the manufacture of personal computers with such a lot of promising features? Thereby hangs a tale.

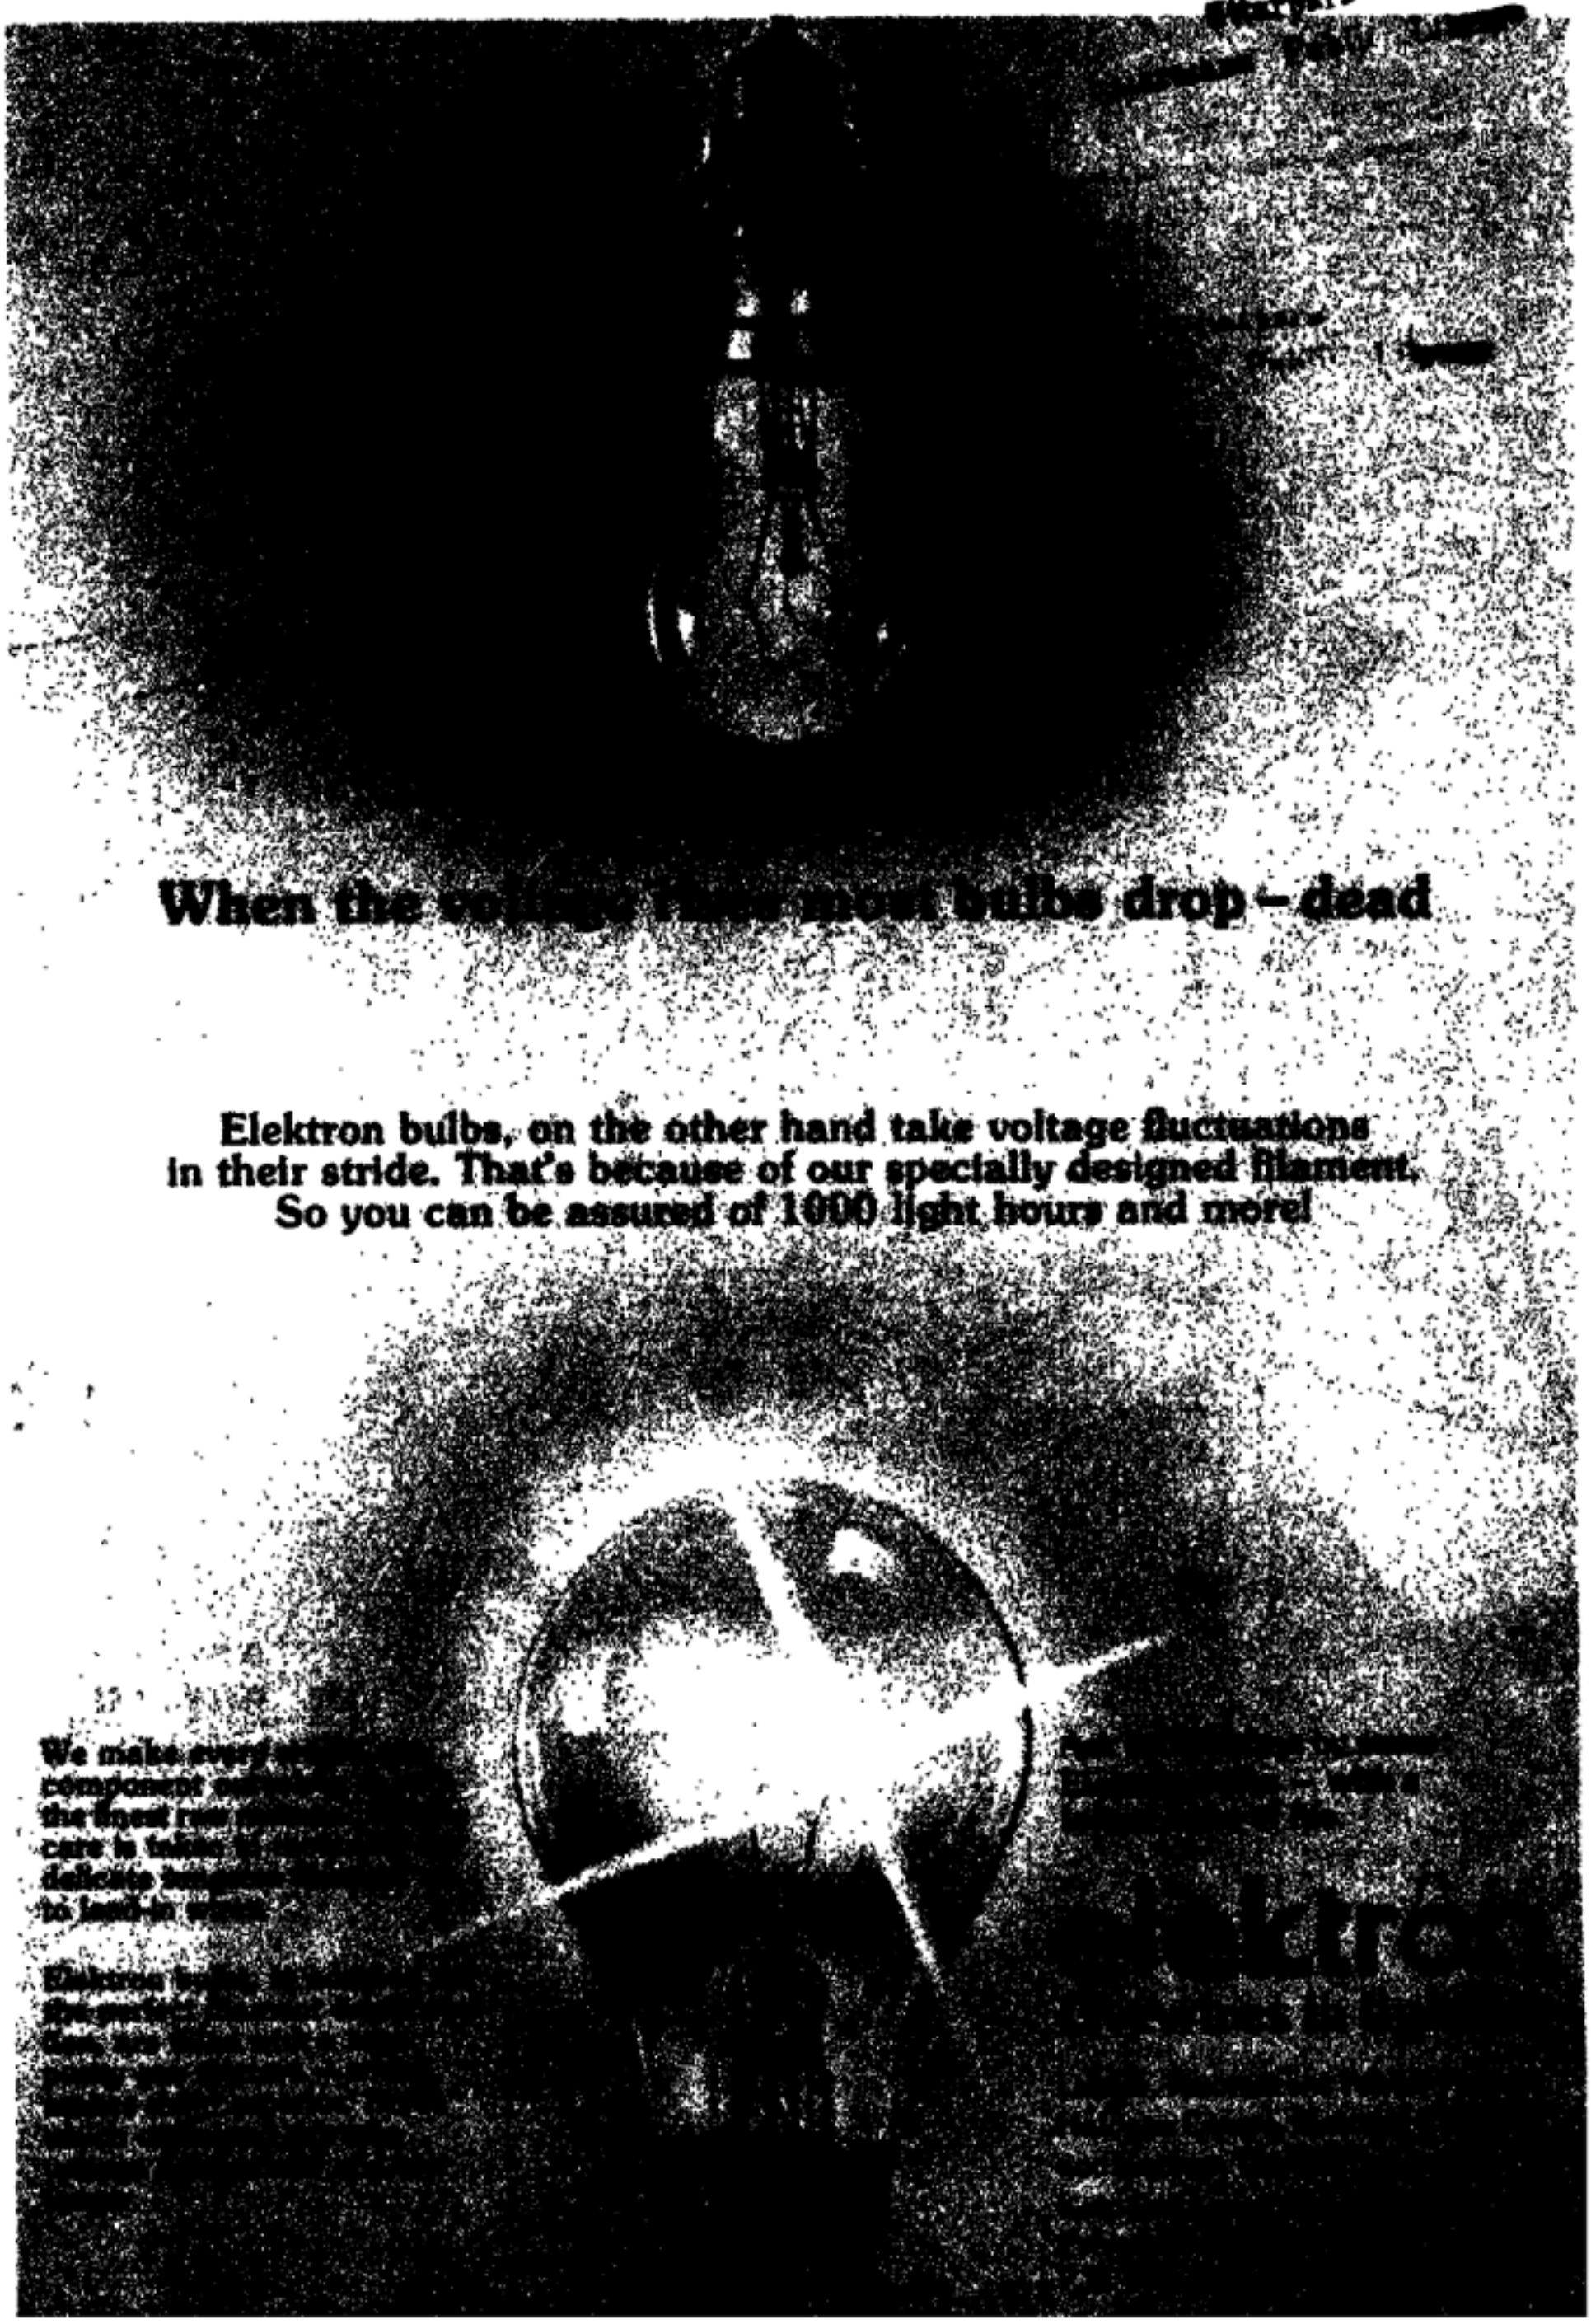
During November 1983, a note was initiated at the instance of the late Prime Minister, Indira Gandhi, to introduce computer education to the children at school so that they would be familiar with the advanced tools of teaching as they got ready to step into the next century. Approval came from the Prime Minister quite promptly. At the 68th meeting of the electronics commission on 24 December 1983, details of follow-up action on the CLASS project were discussed with the direction that the report of the evolution committee for the selection of a computer system for the pilot project be prepared and placed for the consideration of the electronics commission. The secretary, electronics, wrote to the ministry of education, conveying the approval of the commission on the project on 12 April 1984. Between 15 February and 8 May 1984, the ministry of education wrote to all the state governments and union territories to select and send a list of 250 schools in line with the objectives and criteria set out for the CLASS project and this was finalised on 29 June 1984.

The committee for the evaluation of computer systems for the CLASS project was set up around the last week of January 1984. About two months before this, during first week of December 1983, an Indian working at the British Council joined the DoE on a long term contract, as the head of the manpower department. He headed the implementation committee of the CLASS project.

Though the Prime Minister's approval in principle to the CLASS project was received by the DoE during November 1983 and the electronics commission was deliberating upon the details till June 1984, at the instance of the head of the manpower division, during January 1984 itself broad details of the arrangements were agreed on between the governments of UK and India in the field of computer education in schools. With the approval of the then secretary and deputy minister, electronics, a formal note was sent to then finance secretary, Mr P.K. Kaul (now the cabinet secretary), to avail of the British grant-in-aid for 1000 computers with accompanying teaching aids costing about Rs 2 crores. The ministry of education was also roped in to accept the British aid. By the end of May 1984, in a letter from Mr H.E. Swift, attache in the British high commission, to the department of economic affairs, the British government agreed that pending decisions on the pilot project (on which the ministry of education was still collecting information from the state governments regarding 250 schools and could finalise the list only on 29 June 1984), overseas development aid, under which the British government agreed to provide computer equipment for an initial training programme to be started in India, including 12 trainees also to visit India to assist in the conduct of training. Accordingly, 170 computer systems arrived in Delhi, a good one month before any decision was taken as to where the project would begin and how.

Such was the enthusiasm on the part of the officials that the then minister of state for education, Sheila Kaul, led a delegation to the UK from 10 to 15 February 1984 for an on-the-spot study of the use of computers in schools under the British system. This delegation had as a member the head of the manpower division of the DoE. The recommendations of the delegation were finalised by 13 March 1984. This was further approved by the electronics commission a week later. Another delegation of five members again went to the UK from 14 May to 28 May 1984, to give the finishing touches to the British offer of the entire package of computers for the CLASS project. In fact, the steering committee of the project started sitting every week during May and June 1984 to finalise all arrangements to receive the British systems for the Indian schools, though the state governments were in the process of selecting schools and teachers required for making it a success.

An advertisement for the SCL Unicorn personal computer



It was a swift decision, made on an emergency footing. In fact, the entire CLASS project was finally wedded to the British system. Was this the best system in the world? Was any enquiry made in any other country about the system of computer education in schools? Was the ministry of education so overawed by the DoE that pending all enquiries and decisions, the British system was thrust upon it, and due to such a hurry, upon the entire system of education in the country for all time to come? Those who know the answers are mum. The story, with further details, is unfolding slowly.

Though SCL started production of silicon wafers only on 2 October 1983, forgetting their accumulated loss over a period of seven years they arranged for the import of 1,500 to 2,000 SKD kits from a British firm during May 1984 to be assembled for sale to schools in India. As a member of the Indian delegation, a senior official of the company visiting the UK during May 1984, called the British firm's representative to his hotel room and negotiated the price of the computer kits, even though the other members of the delegation were unaware of such private negotiation. The prices agreed on by this official of the company were 40 to 80 per cent higher than the normal price. And these kits, in fact, were being sent from Hong Kong to the UK and were then being resold to India. One Mr Wang was not only involved but also sent a direct quotation to the DoE, for reasons best known to him, mentioning a price for the computers much below what the senior official of the company had agreed on. This was promptly suppressed by then secretary, electronics. The name of the British company doing such business in school computers was Acorn and their model was called the BBC micro computer BBC model—Acorn B. Meanwhile, of course, 1000 computers had arrived, as against 170, under British aid and were slowly getting distributed in the schools along the length and breadth of the country.

Two developments have taken place quite recently so far as the import of kits for 1,500 to 2,000 computers by the SCL is concerned. Without any rhyme or reason, the computer division of the DoE agreed to the import of computer kits by the company and the secretary, electronics, approved it. But the payment to the British firm was withheld till February 1985 as the finance people were not satisfied with the explanation of the company for such import. And the British company, Acorn, went bankrupt!

On 13 March 1985, the chairman of the electronics commission inaugurated an exhibition at the capital's Samrat hotel. "SCL-Unicorn," the Acorn computer acquired for schools in India, was among the attractions there. While the Prime Minister's office tried to investigate the bungling, the "Class-by-itself" deal was praised by the electronics commission chairman.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, New Delhi

When the drop – dead
Elektron bulbs, on the other hand take voltage fluctuations in their stride. That's because of our specially designed filament.
So you can be assured of 1000 light hours and more!
We make complement the finest care is delicate to

Our man from National Insurance...

at home amidst the wilds of Assam, covering the risks in oil drilling.

The virgin forests of Assam are pretty bleak as a place of work. Here, men brave torrential rains and inclement weather to hammer in miles and miles of precious steel into the bowels of the earth—in search of oil. Now, a tiny mistake at any stage of the operation—and you've lost millions of rupees in equipment and oil.

When the risks are staked so high you need to have total insurance coverage. The kind of coverage one has come to expect from National Insurance. While National is, essentially, an insurance company, it has field personnel who know the problems related to oil exploration like the back of their own hands.

This makes a world of difference when you're looking for insurance that gives comprehensive cover in high-investment, high-risk projects. National does it to your satisfaction.

National Insurance. Well connected with India's core industries. Not just oil and refineries, but iron ores, steel, tea, jute, shipping, chemicals—the lot.

National Insurance Company Limited

(A Subsidiary of General Insurance Corporation of India)

Professionals at work for the Nation

CLARION C-NIC-4

You've got to wear it to believe it.

The international scene is fast switching to precise and compact designer briefs in a bid to woo. And VIP feels you deserve it in India too. VIP Frenchie. A real international choice for a man of style and action. For men ready to step beyond convention.

VIP
Frenchie
The International brief that's crossed all barriers!

INVESTIGATION

Case of the Missing Lakhs

Who did the Rs 26 lakhs, stolen from the house of UP Congress(I) general secretary Bachcha Pathak, belong to?

A theft in the residence of Uttar Pradesh Congress(I) general secretary, Bachcha Pathak, has become the talk of the town in Lucknow. According to a report filed with the Hazratganj police station on the night of 10 March, six lakh rupees have been stolen from an almirah in the politician's bedroom. While attempts are being made by Bachcha Pathak to explain that the money in question was "white," the grapevine has it that the actual amount stolen, both in cash and kind (jewellery) is in the vicinity of Rs 26 lakhs.

Bachcha Pathak was the state's minister for cooperatives till he was drafted for party work last year. According to him, while two lakh rupees were his own, the rest of the money stolen belonged to his close associate, Narendra Pratap Singh. Why was so much loose cash (which was not part of political funds) kept in the house? According to statements made by Bachcha Pathak to the press, as his family was involved in certain contract deals, the loose money was required in his house. The theft is alleged to have been the handiwork of one Hansraj Tiwari, who used to stay in the residence of the politician.

The accused had appeared before the Kaiserbagh police station an hour before the FIR was launched in the Hazratganj police station and sought the police's protection as some people were "trying to murder him." Within moments of the FIR being launched, Tiwari was traced to the Kaiserbagh police station and detained. Though it is only a case of theft, bail was not granted to Tiwari till the end of March. Before making the arrest on charges filed by a VIP, the police did not conduct any enquiry—just the politician's word that hard cash worth lakhs had been stolen from his house was enough to put Tiwari behind bars. While the case of theft against Tiwari is sub judice, no attempts have so far been made by the competent agencies to ascertain the source of such large cash funds which were lying in an almirah in the politician's bedroom.

Hansraj Tiwari had approached Bachcha Pathak sometime back for help in getting a job. According to allegations made by Tiwari, Pathak, who then was the minister for cooperatives in UP, asked him for money for getting him a government job. Later, Tiwari was employed by the Land Development Bank and started living in Pathak's bungalow on Kalidas Marg (this road in Lucknow mostly has VIP bungalows). Tiwari has alleged that the politician's bungalow was a den of debauchery and he was appalled to witness the rape of a woman in the house some months back, after which he had decided to expose the VIP. He had contacted the state vigilance department and furnished details about the goings-on in Pathak's residence. Tiwari has also alleged that he was sodomised. According to informed sources, Tiwari was a pliable tool in the hands of Bachcha Pathak and a confidant of the politician till his girlfriend was raped in Pathak's house some months back. Thereafter, he gave the impression of being "loyal" to Pathak, while planning his revenge. The Harishankar Tiwari gang of eastern UP being close to Bachcha Pathak, Tiwari ganged with Virendra Shahi and waited for the opportune moment to strike. He was in regular touch with the vigilance department and had been passing on information about the goings-on in Bachcha Pathak's house. No action, however, was taken by the authorities though Tiwari was regularly informing them about the amount of money kept in the house, and other unsavoury incidents.

Bachcha Pathak

The sequence of events on the night of 10 March was intriguing. Around ten pm, Hansraj Tiwari jumped out of a white Ambassador car (USM 9855) near the Kaiserbagh Chauraha (crossroads) and approached a police patrol, pleading that he be saved from "murderers." The car, which had been held up in the traffic, disappeared by the time the police patrol could be activated. Tiwari was taken to the police control room, where he alleged that an attempt had been made by Narendra Singh and some others to murder him. He alleged that Narendra Singh (who is supposed to be the owner of the Rs 4 lakhs stolen from Pathak's almirah) had gone to the residence of Bachcha Pathak around nine that night accompanied by four others. They had assaulted Tiwari and shouted, "You have put the police on the trail of Bachcha Pathak, we will teach you a lesson." Tiwari said that he had been pushed into the white Ambassador and was being driven out of the city to be murdered. When the vehicle was stuck in the traffic, he raised an alarm and as a result a crowd gathered. When he was allowed to get out of the car, he ran towards the police patrol. Tiwari sought the protection of the police from the assailants and tried to invoke the good offices of some officers in the vigilance department, whom he had been informing about Bachcha Pathak's activities.

At five past eleven that night, Narendra Singh went to the Hazratganj police station and lodged a report of theft against Tiwari. In this report, Narendra Singh said, "I stay in the residence of Bachcha Pathak, general secretary of the UPCC(I) at 6 Kalidas Marg. I work as his PA and I had deposited Rs 4 lakhs of my money for safekeeping with Pathak. This money had been kept by Pathak in the almirah in his bedroom. In this almirah he had also kept Rs 2 lakhs of his money. Both Pathak and I had the keys to the almirah. In the days when Pathak was minister for cooperatives, an employee of the Land Development Bank, Hansraj Tiwari, had been sent on deputation to his staff. This man used to look after Pathak's residence in his absence. The key to Pathak's bedroom was kept with him. On 28 February I left for Varanasi. Pathak had gone to Ballia in connection with the elections. By mistake, I had left the keys to the almirah under a pillow. Today, on 10 March I returned from tour along with Pathak's nephew Ashok Pathak and Bharat Kunwar On opening the almirah I found that the Rs six lakhs kept there were missing. When I questioned Hansraj Tiwari, he admitted that he had stolen the amount and hidden it somewhere within Lucknow. I have brought Hansraj Tiwari along, please recover the stolen money from him."

Hansraj Tiwari was arrested that night, on the basis of this report He had reached the police control room with the patrol party Narendra Singh through his VIP contacts, knew this. Getting him arrested was not difficult. But even the director general of police, J. N. Chaturvedi, was amazed the next day when he was informed about the arrest. He was surprised how a man could be arrested in a case of theft without a preliminary enquiry. He told newsmen that he was ordering the release of Tiwari. But in the meantime, the police had produced him before a magistrate and the court had remanded Tiwari to 14 days' custody.

Tiwari has alleged that the politician's (Pathak's) bungalow was a den of debauchery and that he was appalled to witness a rape in the house some months back, after which he decided to expose the VIP.

Tiwari said that there was an income tax raid on the residence of Bachcha Pathak on 8 March. The income tax authorities had taken away the money, according to him. The police guard posted in the politician's residence told the press that on that night some people had come to 6 Kalidas Marg along with Hansraj Tiwari and after some time had left with a big suitcase. The guard did not suspect foul play because he had known Tiwari to be a confidant of Pathak.

Did the income tax department raid Pathak's residence? The answer is no. Then who were the people with Tiwari who left with the suitcase on the night of 8 March? Apparently Tiwari was working with a criminal gang to make off with the money. According to Lucknow's grapevine, the amount stolen was around Rs 26 lakhs but the theft report had mentioned only six lakhs as the complainant felt confident about explaining the source of only this amount of money. The chase on the night of 10 March was on attempt to recover the money from Tiwari. If they failed to recover it his pursuers had orders to bump him off so that the controversy did not become public.

The incident has created a furore. The fact is that lakhs of rupees have been stolen from a politician's residence. There are too many loopholes in the version given by either side and the matter being sub judice, it cannot be commented upon. However, the "clean" image of the Congress(I) has certainly been tarnished by the Bachcha Pathak episode.

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, Lucknow

Not so young but so strong & healthy what is his secret?

I enjoy life more and get more work done- thanks to OKASA

Now a new powerful formula No other tonic has it. Rare herbal extracts with 18 biochemicals, vitamins & minerals. World-famous OKASA. Proven medically effective – in its special way – every day

At all leading chemists

OKASA

For a free booklet on OKASA write to

OKASA CO. PVT. LTD. Post Box No. 396, Bombay 400 001

Diplomat, Editor, Workaholic

Prem Bhatia, editor of The Tribune, wins the 1984 B D. Goenka award

Prem Bhatia, the distinguished editor of The Tribune and recipient of the 1984 B.D Goenka award for journalism has had a varied and rather unusual career. After receiving his master's degree in English from Government College, Lahore, Mr Bhatia joined The Civil and Military Gazette as a sub-editor. His father, a member of the income-tax tribunal had wanted him to join the Indian Civil Service. When the Second World War broke out, Mr Bhatia joined All India Radio, in the counter-propaganda department which attacked the Nazis

From AIR, Mr Bhatia joined the public relations department of the army and quickly rose to be the youngest-ever Lieutenant Colonel in that department. This was a very special department indeed for it had people who were to become the domineering figures of the Urdu literary world. One of them was Faiz Ahmed Faiz. Public relations appeared to suit the young Lieutenant Colonel who moved to Bengal and joined the public relations department of the West Bengal government. The Statesman took him on shortly afterwards, and Mr Bhatia soon became the Statesman's special representative in Lucknow. His stint as the daily's man in Lucknow was to be a prelude for his later years as the Statesman's chief of bureau in New Delhi. Vijayalaxmi Pandit took him to Moscow in the late 1940 s as public relations officer when she was appointed India's envoy in Moscow

From public relations, Mr Bhatia returned once again to journalism: he was the Statesman's chief of bureau and its diplomatic correspondent in the mid-Fifties. But he was not to remain in the post for long: he joined The Tribune as editor for a year before joining The Times of India as its resident editor in New Delhi. Two years later he was appointed resident editor of the Indian Express in New Delhi.

Mr Bhatia moved away from journalism to a diplomatic assignment once again when in the mid-Sixties, he was sent to Nairobi as India's High Commissioner, where he remained for three years before his appointment as India's envoy to Singapore. His days in the diplomatic service over, Mr Bhatia became the chief editor of the Indian News and Features Agency (INFA) for a brief while before he went to Chandigarh as editor of The Tribune, where he has been ever since, doubling the paper's circulation in a little more than a year. He was instrumental in bringing out the newspaper's Hindi and Punjabi editions.

The Tribune's coverage of Punjab through the recent turbulent years won the paper and Mr Bhatia a lot of accolades and ultimately the Goenka award. Mr Bhatia certainly changed The Tribune's work ethic. He is so punctual that his employees say you can set your watch by him.

Every morning after he has read his newspaper, he calls the Tribune journalists at home and takes them to task for mistakes. He also knows how to get work done. When his Shimla correspondent had not filed a story for two weeks, Mr Bhatia telephoned him and asked him why there had been no stories from Shimla. The correspondent replied that nothing was happening. Then Mr Bhatia asked: "How is the weather?" The correspondent told him that Shimla had its first snowfall that day. "Well, then," said the editor, "file immediately on the first snowfall."

Prem Bhatia is interested in sports: golf at the weekends is a must. When he was younger, cricket was his passion and had the war not broken out when it did he might have played for India.

Madhu Jain, New Delhi

Prem Bhatia: 'A journalist is in the dock everyday or every week'

The Cloistered Passion of Radha and Krishna

BY SUDHIR KAKAR AND JOHN MUNDER ROSS

Radha and Krishna in an eternal embrace

For an Indian—or, more exactly, a Hindu—the love of Radha, the beautiful cowherdess who later became a goddess for some cults, and Krishna, the youthful dark god who is the object of widespread devotion, is less a story remembered than a random succession of episodes seen and heard, sung and danced. Over the centuries, their love has been portrayed in thousands of exquisite miniature paintings which have fixed the lovers in separation and union, longing and abandonment. The love story is heard whenever we listen to the great vocalists of Indian classical music—from Kumara Gandharva to Jasraj—sing the devotional songs of medieval saints who in their poems sometimes watch and at other times participate in the love play as Krishna's beloved. The story grips our imagination every time we behold the animated expressions, flashing eyes and sinuous movements of an Indian dancer who (as Radha) dances her anger at Krishna's infidelities or (as Krishna) begs forgiveness for his impetuous dalliance. The love affair is recreated each time a Krishna devotee participates in the communal singing of an episode from the story in a temple and especially when he or she, possessed by the spirit of one of the lovers, feels impelled to get up and ecstatically dance the god or his beloved.

The Radha-Krishna legend, then, is not a story in the sense of an orderly narrative whose protagonists have a shared past and are progressing towards a tragic or happy future. It is more an evocation and elaboration of the here-and-now of passionate love, an attempt to capture the exciting, fleeting moments of the senses and the baffling ways in which love's pleasures and pains are felt before retrospective recollection, trying to regain a lost control over emotional life, edits away love's inevitable confusions. It is not tragic but tender and, ultimately, cheerful.

The sybartic tenderness enveloping the caress of the lovers is striking. A long line of bards and balladeers, most of them indebted to the twelfth-century Sanskrit poet, Jayadeva, who decisively shaped the legend's outlines, have often described the setting of this love. A Hindu needs only to close his eyes and "remember" to see Vrindavan, an Indian garden of Eden spring into existence. In the perpetual sunshine of the myth, distinct from the mists of history, a forest thicket on the bank of the river Jumna awakens to life on a tropical spring day. The mustard fields at the edge of the forest, with their thick carpet of dazzling yellow flowers, stretch far into the distance. The air is redolent with the perfume of pollen shaken loose from newly blossomed jasmine and bunches of flame-colored mimosa flowers hanging round and heavy from the trees. The ears are awash in the humming of bees, the cries of cuckoos and the distant tinkling of bells hanging around the necks of grazing cattle. The call of Krishna's flute comes floating through the forest thicket, further agitating the already unquiet senses, making for an inner uprising and an alien invasion. The story, aiming to fix the essence of youthful love, has an amorous rather than geographical landscape as its location; its setting is neither social nor historical but sensuous.

In the falling dusk, Nanda, Krishna's foster father and the chief of a community of cowherds, asks Radha to escort Krishna home through the forest. On the way, in a grove, their "secret passion triumphs." Radha's thoughts come to be absorbed by Krishna who, however, is unfaithful to her as he sports with other cowherdesses—hugging one, kissing another and caressing yet another dark beauty.

When he quickens all things
To create bliss in the world
His soft black sinuous lotus limbs
Begin the festival of love
And beautiful cowherd girls wildly
Wind him in their bodies.
Friend, in spring young Hari (Krishna) plays
Like erotic mood incarnate

Radha is jealous as she imagines the "vines of his great throbbing arms circle a thousand cowherdesses" but more than jealousy she is infused with all the confusing emotions of a proud, passionate woman who feels deserted by her lover

My heart values his vulgar ways,
Refuses to admit my rage,
Feels strangely elated,
And keeps denying his guilt.
When he steals away without me
To indulge his craving
For more young women,
My perverse heart
Only wants Krishna back.
What can I do?

Solitary grief and images of a love betrayed and passion lost, recreated in reverie, alternate and reinforce each other, but seem somehow benign.

My eyes close languidly as I feel the flesh quiver on his cheek,
My body is moist with sweat; he is shaking from the wine of lust.
Friend, bring Kesi's sublime tormentor to revel with me!
I've gone mad waiting for his fickle love to change.

The power of Radha's yearning work a change in Krishna. Of all the gopis (cowherdesses), interchangeable suppliers of pleasure and feelings of conquest, Radha begins to stand out in Krishna's mind as someone special who is desired in her uniqueness. In Maurice Valency's formulation, from the "heroic lover" for whom no woman is exceptional and who simply desires a variety of amatory dalliances, Krishna becomes the "romantic lover" impelled toward a single irreplaceable mistress. The unheeding pursuit of pleasure, a bewildered Krishna discovers, has been brought to a halt by pleasure's worst enemies—memory and attachment.

Her joyful responses to my touch,
Trembling liquid movement of her eyes,
Fragrance from her lotus mouth,
A sweet ambiguous stream of words,
Nectar from her red berry lips—
Even when the sensuous objects are gone,
My mind holds on to her in a trance.
How does the wound of her desertion deepen?

Having been the god who strove to please himself alone, Krishna has become a man for whom the partner's well-being assumes an importance easily the equal of his own. He discovers that he would rather serve and adore than vanquish and demand. As a tale of love, this transformative moment from desire's sensations to love's adoration, gives the story of Radha and Krishna its singular impact. (It is a remarkable coincidence that three of the world's best-known works of romantic love which occupy pivotal positions in their respective cultures—Beroul's Tristan and Isolde in Europe, Nizami's Layla and Majnun in the Islamic world and Jayadeva's Geetagovinda in India—were all produced roughly at the same time in the twelfth century.)

In the couch of love

This is a chapter from a forthcoming book by the authors

To continue the story: hearing of Krishna's remorse and of his attachment to her, Radha, dressed and ornamented for love, awaits Krishna at their trysting place in the forest. She lingers in vain, for Krishna does not come. Radha is consumed with jealousy as she imagines him engaged in an amourous encounter with a rival. When Krishna finally does appear, Radha spurns him angrily:

Dark from kissing her kohl-blackened eyes
At dawn your lips match your body's color, Krishna
Damn you Madhva! Go! Kesava leave me!
Don't plead your lies with me!
Go after her, Krishna!
She will ease your despair.

But, in separation, Radha and Krishna long for each other with a mounting sense of desolation. Eventually, Radha's friend persuades her to abandon her modesty and pride and go to her lover.

Your full hips and breasts are heavy to bear.
Approach with anklets ringing!
Their sound inspires lingering feet.
Run with the gait of a wild goose!
Madhu's tormentor
Is faithful to you, fool.
Follow him, Radhika!

In the full throes of a sexual excitement when even her "modesty left in shame," Radha rushes to meet an equally ardent (and repentant) lover. Krishna sings:

Throbbing breasts aching for love's embrace are hard to touch.
Rest these vessels on my chest!
Quench love's burning fire!
Narayana (Krishna) is faithful now. Love me Radhika!
Offer your lips' nectar to revive a dying slave, Radha!
This obsessed mind and listless body burn in love's desolation,
Narayana is faithful now. Love me, Radhika!

Once the ecstatic love-making subsides momentarily in an orgasmic release, a playful Radha asks Krishna to rearrange her clothes and her touselled hair, as also

"Paint a leaf on my breasts!
Put colour on my cheeks!
Lay a girdle on my hips!
Twine my heavy braid with flowers!
Fix rows of bangles on my hands
And jewelled anklets on my feet!"
Her yellow-robed lover
Did what Radha said.

Jayadeva, legend has it, hesitant to commit sacrilege by having the god touch Radha's feet- the usual sign of a submissive lower status—was unable to pen the last lines and went out to bathe; when he returned, he found that Krishna himself had completed the verse in his absence.

The fascination of Jayadeva's creation is, of course, also due to its musical form. Jayadeva set each canto of the love poem to a different musical mode (raga) and rhythm (tala). It is a work which succeeding generations have regarded a marvel of music as much of language and meaning. And music, we know, that fine-tuned language of the senses, best captures the Dionysian or rather, in our context, the Krishnanian spirit and sensual spontaneity of the erotic. The erotic sensibilities of lovers, and of others with either the potential for love or its haunting memory, can be reproduced in music with greater fidelity than in words since there is a direct rather than signified correspondence between musical forms and the forms of emotional life. Love is not about something; it is. Jayadeva seems to have intuitively known that (in Kierkegaard's words), "the sensual mood is too heavy and too dense to be sustained by speech; only music can express it."

The lovers enjoy an intimate moment

The story of Radha and Krishna as it has come down to us today, differs from Jayadeva's version in only one significant respect. Jayadeva merely hints at the illicit nature of their love when he has an older Radha change from young Krishna's protective escort to become his lover, thereby also defying the authority and instructions of the chief of cowherds:

"Clouds thicken the sky.
Tamala trees darken the forest.
The night frightens him.
Radha, you take him home!"
They leave at Nanda's order,
Passing trees in thickets on the way,
Until secret passions of Radha and Madhava
Triumph on the Jumna riverbank.

Later poets (notably Vidyapati), who tend to focus more on Radha and her lover than on Krishna gave the illicit in the story a more concrete cast and a specific content. Radha is another man's wife and her liaison with Krishna, whatever its meaning in mystical allegory, is plainly adulterous in human terms. Radha is certainly not a paragon of womanly virtues detailed in Hindu texts; nor does she come close to any of the "good" or "bad" mother-goddesses of Indian mythology and religion. In her passionate craving for sexual union with her lover and in her desperate suffering in his absence, Radha is simply the personification of a mahabhava, a "great feeling" that is heedless of social proprieties and unbounded by conventions. Before attempting our own interpretation of the mahabhava of the legend, we must first briefly locate the love of Radha and Krishna in its cultural-historical context. As various scholars have pointed out, many different Indian traditions—religious and erotic, classical literary and folk—have converged and coalesced in the poetical renditions of the myth, especially Jayadeva's Gitagovinda, to give that particular work an allure that extends over large parts of the sub-continent.

In India, 'passion love' first appeared in the court poetry and drama of the so-called classical period of Hindu civilisation, spanning the first few centuries of the Christian era. Earlier, in the epics of Mahabharata and Ramayana, love was usually a matter of straightforward desire and its gratification. This was especially so for the man for whom a woman was an instrument of pleasure and an object of the senses (indiryartha)— one physical need among many others. There is an idealisation of marriage in the epics, yes, but chiefly as a social and religious act. The obligation of conjugal love and the virtue of chastity within marriage were primarily demanded of the wife while few limits were set on a husband who lived under and looked up at a licentious heaven teeming with lusty gods and "heavenly" whores, otherworldly and utterly desirable at once and most eager to give and take pleasure.

The Buddhist domination of Indian society which followed brought with it Buddhism's sombre view of life, in which the god of love was identified with Mara or Death. The new cosmology it imposed was not particularly conducive to developing a literature of passionate love. Nor did love enter through the back door of erotic mysticism. In the Therigatha, or psalms of notable sisters of the Buddhist order, marked by dutiful daughterly sentiments towards the Buddha, there is none of the eroticism of their medieval Christian counterparts who in their passionate outpourings conceived of Christ as a youthful bridegroom.

All this seems to have changed radically with the dawn of the classical period that spanned the first six to seven centuries of the present era. In the poetry and drama flourishing at the courts, love became a predominant theme, indeed one overshadowing every other sentiment. It is a love that is both deeply sensual and moulded by mutual passion. The woman is as ardent as the man and initiates the wooing quite as often. Indeed, the surviving poems of the few women poets show them to be even freer in their expression than their male counterparts.

The Sanskrit poems and dramas are characterised by a playful enjoyment of love's ambiguities, a delighted savouring of its pleasures and a refined suffering of its sorrows. Spontaneity, fervid abandon and love's transports are generally absent from this poetry. Apart from one or two notable exceptions, the depiction of love is on a miniature scale—short stanzas seeking to freeze one or another of love's emotions, cameos yielding glimpses into arresting erotic moments. What is considered important—and this is the core of the Indian theory of aesthetics—is to capture the rasa, literally, "flavour" or "essence," or the mood, of a particular passionate instant which can then be relished by the poetically cultivated connoisseur. The intensity of the mood is not enhanced through psychological depth but by accumulation of sensuous detail. Blurring the boundaries between internal feeling and external sensation, love is seldom described as something ethereal or treated in terms of the evaluated sentiment but is equated with a definite sensation or a feeling in its concrete bodily manifestation. As Barbara Miller remarks in relation to the Gitagovinda: "Passion is made palpable through the sensuous descriptions of movements and physical forms. Seasonal changes in nature and bodily signs of inner feelings are coloured richly to create a dense atmosphere of passion."

For most modern readers who have an affinity for the personal and the subjective, the emphasis of classical Indian literature on love as a depersonalised voluptuous state may delight the senses but does not touch the heart. For those whose sensibility has been moulded by individualism, it is difficult to identify with the impersonal protagonists of Sanskrit and Tamil love poems who are not a particular man or woman but man and woman as such—provided he is handsome, she is beautiful and both are young. The face of the heroine, for instance, is always like a moon or lotus flower, eyes like waterlilies or those of a fawn. She always stoops slightly from the weight of her full breasts, improbable fleshy flowers of rounded perfection that do not even admit a blade of grass between them. The waist is slim, with three folds, the thighs round and plump, like the trunk of an elephant or a banana tree. The navel is deep, the hips heavy. These lyrical yet conventional descriptions of body parts seem to operate like collective fetishes, culturally approved cues for the individual to allow himself to indulge in erotic excitement.

Now, a facet of the beloved woman's beauty is certainly impersonal in the sense that it is nature's gift, especially to youth, and its minimal presence is necessary for the eye to stay and linger, for the glance to become a gaze, for the poet to wax lyrical. As Auden remarks, "A girl who weighs two hundred pounds and a woman of eighty may both have beautiful faces in the personal sense, but men do not fall in love with them." For our more modern tastes, however, the part played by impersonal beauty is receding in favour of a personal beauty which is more an individual than a natural or cultural creation. The impersonal lust evoked by looking at a woman in parts—and at the parts of a woman, as in most traditional Indian poetry, is no longer the major ingredient of love. The choice of the beloved is no longer solely determined by her conformity to a great cultural model but also because of a uniqueness in which even her flaws are cherished. It is now the fleeting yet characteristic trivialities—the narrowing of her eyes in a quizzical smile, the nibbling of the fleshy part of the lower lip when engrossed in thought—which fascinate and enthrall the lover, the flash of aesthetic admiration superseded by the wave of adoration. In the verses of Shakespeare's great sonnet:

Radha and Krishna in the forest: oblivious to their surroundings

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun; ..
My mistress, when she walks,
treads on the ground.
And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare
As any she belied with false compare.

Furthermore, Indian poetry becomes inaccessible, even boring,

Krishna admires Radha's eyes

when its early freshness begins to wilt under the scholastic dictates which become more and more compelling in the later centuries. Not unlike the efforts of modern sexologists, Sanskrit poetics and erotics had now defined, analysed and categorised the many moods and situations of love. Lovers—men and women—had been stereotyped according to the ways they approach and react to love. They were further divided and subdivided according to rank, character, circumstances as well as the different shades of their feelings and gestures. With its insistence on the "appropriate" combination of types, feelings and situations, the scholastic steamroller crushed the creative expression of passionate love as effectively as Epic indifference or Buddhist disapproval.

From sixth century onwards, first in the south and then in the north, another shift took place which led to a reemergence of passionate love. As with most things Indian, the change originated in the religious sphere but then expanded to influence Hindu culture and sensibility in such a profound way that its reverberations are still felt today. Scholars have called the shift bhakti, the rise of devotional religions in rebellion against the petrification of contemporary Hindu practice. The poet-scholar, A. K. Ramanujan, has pointed out the parallels between bhakti and European protestant movements: protest against mediators like priests, rituals and temples in favour of direct individual experience of the Divine; a religious movement of and for the underdog and including saints of all castes, trades and both the sexes, a religion of arbitrary grace, monotheism and evangelism. Shiva in the south and Krishna in the north become the objects of bhakti's impassioned devotion and bhakti poetry, brimming with the love for the Lord, flowers in the vernacular languages which, to some extent, take over from Sanskrit, the language of "high" culture. Drawing on conventions of the classical literature of love and using an existing pan-Indian stock of symbols and figures of speech, the bhakti poets nonetheless strive for spontaneous, direct, personal expression of feeling rather than a rarified cultivation of aesthetic effect and the "emotion recollected" preferred by the Sanskrit poets.

Radha and Krishna, although linked to the heroine and hero of classical love poetry in many ways, are primarily products of the bhakti movement whose principal mood has always been the erotic. In contrast to much of Western poetry of sexual mysticism, though, Radha and Krishna are not figures of erotic allegory. Given bhakti's need of possessing and being possessed by the god and the fact that sexual love is where the fullest possession, the "closest touch of all," takes place, the creators and audiences of bhakti poetry seek to project themselves into Radha's love for Krishna through poems that recount all its passionate phases. For bhakti is preeminently feminine in its orientation, and the erotic love for Krishna (or Siva as the case may be) is envisioned entirely from the woman's viewpoint. The male devotees, saints, and poets must all adopt a feminine posture and persona to recreate Radha's responses in themselves. Radha's passionate love for Krishna, raised to its highest intensity, is not an allegory for religious passion but is religious passion. Jayadeva thus does not need to make a distinction or choose between the religious and the erotic when he introduces the subject matter of his poem by saying:

If remembering Hari (Krishna) enriches your heart,
If his arts of seduction arouse you,
Listen to Jayadeva's speech
In these sweet soft lyrical songs.

Befitting his status as the adi-guru ("first teacher") of Radha-Krishna cults, Jayadeva knows that the enrichment of the heart and the arousal of senses belong together.

The augmentation of passion or, more specifically, the heightening of sexual excitement is then the "great feeling," the mahabhava, that pervades the Radha-Krishna legend. Radha incarnates a state of permanent amorous tension, a here-and-now of desire that carries within itself a future expectation of pleasurable release but...oh, not yet! Her concern is not with "lineaments of gratified desire" but with their anticipation. Radha personifies an enduring arousal that does not seek orgasmic resolution. Hers is an effort to reach the very essence of eroticism. As she herself says in one of Vidyapati's songs:

Through all the ages
he (Krishna) has been clasped to my breast,
Yet my desire
never abates.
I have seen subtle people sunk in passion but none came so close to the heart of the fire.

In her interviews with the temple-dancers of Orissa, the anthropologist Frederique Marglin highlighted the fact that when these women talk of the love (prema) of Radha and other cowherdesses, they do not mean a chaste, platonic love but refer specifically to the fantasy (conscious in this case, but unconscious in many others) of unending and sustained sexual excitement. The absence of kama or lust in Radha's love for Krishna does not mean an absence of desire, but of orgasm. The dancers, who seek to enact for themselves the tension and intensity of the mythical cowherdesses, explicate the distinction by stating that one of Krishna's names is Acyuta, "the one whose seed does not fall." Marglin writes: "What is the meaning of Krishna's retention of his seed? My informant delineated several levels of meaning. First, there is the testimony of everday experience, in which sexual pleasure is only momentary. After orgasm the pleasurable erotic tension is gone; in such a manner one attains only temporary pleasure or happiness (khyanika sukha). Furthermore, by ejaculating one loses one's strength and becomes old. In this world, the world of samsara, pleasure is brief and one begets children, whereas in the divine play of Krishna there is continuous (nitya) pleasure and no children. The gopis are not impregnated...The shedding of the seed has ulterior consequences, i.e., a birth. Krishna's erotic dalliance with the gopis has no ulterior purpose or consequence. It exists for itself, in itself." It is indeed a dwelling in the immediacy of excitement, a locking in of body and mind in total erotic involvement.

Using classical conventions in which sexual excitement is denoted by certain bodily manifestations such as sweating and bristling of hair (the mention of sexual organs and genital sensations were always unacceptable), poem after poem seeks to convey the rasa of Radha's arousal. In giving central place to the body in the depiction of erotic passions—which are after all ideas which the mind would not have unless it were united to the body, the bhakti poets seem to intuitively recognise and affirm the truth of Auden's assertion that "Our bodies cannot love. But, without one / what works of love could we do." In Radha's excitement, produced by the anticipation of intercourse,

She bristles with pain, sucks in breath
Cries, shudders, gasps,
Broods deep, reels, stammers,
Falls, raises herself, then faints.
When fevers of passion rage so high,
A frail girl may live by your charm.

While in the sensuous fervour of foreplay,
There was a shudder in her whispering voice.
She was shy to frame her words.
What has happened tonight to lovely Radha?
Now she consents, now she is afraid.
When asked for love, she closes up her eyes
Eager to reach the ocean of desire.
He begs her for a kiss.
She turns her mouth away
And then, like a night lily, the moon seized her.
She felt his touch startling her girdle.
She knew her love treasure was being robbed.
With her dress she covered up her breasts.
The treasure was left uncovered.

At first glance, the large number of Radha-Krishna poems that describe the near-harrowing effects of their separation on Radha do not seem to support our contention that sexual excitement is their central emotion and its generation their chief purpose. Yet even leaving aside the fact that much of the content of separation poems consists of Radha's recollections of erotic pleasure—an effort to retain expectancy through reminiscence—we know that in romantic literature around the world, the division of lovers has been a well-known device for whetting erotic hunger. In life as in art, turnings in the path of love's fulfillment have always been found necessary to swell the tide of the libido. Separateness and union are not different categories of love, as the convention of Indian poetics would have it, but are intimately connected through the workings of desire. The lover's and the poet's dwelling on apartness represents his or her abjuring of possession that would deflate desire. Erotic passion, in de Rougemont's anthropomorphic formulation, always invents distance in order to exult itself more completely. Below the surface sadness, lies the lovers' need to create impediments to the enjoyment of their love, to deliciously postpone their delight

Sexual excitement is also a mental state, the product of those fantasies where, as Robert Stoller has pointed out, one oscillates between an anticipation of danger and the expectation of replacing danger with pleasure. The major fantasies, largely unconscious, which are reflected in the trembling attraction of Radha's love for Krishna are decisively formed and coloured by the theme of a forbidden crossing of boundaries

First, in the pervasive presence of the adulterous in the narrative there is an illicit transgression of moral and legal limits. Second, in striving to entertain the erotic feelings and sensations of the other sex, a lover would violate his primal sexual demarcation as a male. Furthermore, the arousal provoked by these fantasies is both preserved and brought to pitch by the stealth and secrecy in which the crossing of such bounds takes place.

The most obvious manifestation of the illicit, involving the crossing of boundaries set by social mores and norms, is found in the adulterous and later accounts which saddle Radha with a husband, throwing in a mother-in-law for good measure, persistently underline the adulterous nature of her love for Krishna. There was, of course, much theological uneasiness regarding this circumstance. Some commentators went to great lengths to explain why, since Krishna is god, he could not have actually coveted the wife of another. Others went to even greater lengths to prove the contrary, explaining that precisely because Krishna is god he is not bound by normal human restrictions. In the end, and perhaps inevitably, the community's quest for pleasure triumphed over its theological scruples in firmly demanding that the mythical lovers be accepted as unambiguously adulterous.

The identification of the adulterous with the thrilling and romantic is common enough in Western literary tradition. But in the Indian context, the link is possessed of a special resonance since there the dichotomy between the conjugal and the adulterous has remained sharp and charged with tension over many centuries.

Krishna washes Radha's feet

The third-century Tamil epic of Shilappadikaram (The Ankle Bracelet) is perhaps the earliest illustration of the "separate but equal" attractions of the adulterous and the conjugal for the Indian man. The sensuality and abandon in the descriptions of Kovalana's relationship with his mistress Madhavi in this epic, provide a strong counterpoint to the tenderness and uxorious dependability of his wife, Kannaki.

In the ritual sphere, right from the beginning, the god and goddess of sexual love have been segregated from deities who preside over marriage and fertility. Even today the so-called "love marriage," almost a contradiction in terms—and the subject of much excited gossip when it occurs—is mostly met with in the fantastical world of Indian movies and is generally deemed a daring Western import of the urbanised and presumably licentious upper classes.

As far as legalities are concerned, both the conventions and the laws about adultery have been and remain extremely strict. The epics considered adultery as one of the five great sins for which there is no atonement—the others are the murder of a Brahmin, slaying of a cow, unbelief, living off a woman—and warned against its frightful consequences. "In all cases a man must never approach the wife of another. For there is nought in the world which so shortens life as that the man on earth should visit the wife of another. As many pores as are on women's bodies, so many years will he sit in hell ..He that touches another man's wife is born as a wolf, as a dog, as a jackal, then born as a vulture, a snake, a heron, as also a crane." The law books reckon the adulterous couple among the seven kinds of murderers who may be killed with impunity and "if a man comes upon his wife in another man's arms, and kills both, then the king must not punish him." This is a state of affairs which, to go by some notorious court decisions of recent years, has not greatly changed. Manu, the ancient Hindu law-giver, is even more bloodthirsty in his opposition to adultery: "Whatever woman betrays (by intercourse with another man) her husband, proud of her beauty and descent, the king shall cause to be torn in pieces by dogs in an open place. The paramour shall be roasted on an iron bed; brushwood shall men throw (upon the fire); there shall the evil-doer be consumed."

Radha in Krishna's clothes: transcending the boundaries of gender

In mythology, too, the adulterous woman at least rarely escapes the consequences of her actions. Ahilya, the wife of a sage, who was more a victim of Indra's (the king of gods') lechery and less an enthusiastic participant in their short-lived revel, paid dearly for her unwitting lapse. Parshuram, commanded by his father, killed his own mother who, when out bathing, caught sight of a handsome king sporting with his wives and was "unfaithful in her heart." Even today, we know from clinical practice that in most sections of Indian soceiety adultery is rarely a matter of casual, common-place liaison. Even its fantasised contemplation by the woman is reacted to with moral dread and as a momentous psychological event.

In contrast, the poets and literati of the classical period, who have exercised a great influence on subsequent cultural attitudes and sentiments, at least of the upper castes, generally scorned the Hindu marriage as a preeminently social and religious duty. They saw in marriage a deadly foe of the passion to which they—as indeed most poets—have always aspired. In writing with nostalgia of scenes of love unhampered by matrimony or in lamenting the disappearance of love with marriage, the poets' scorn of conjugal love was unremitting.

Where the moon is not inveighed against and no sweet words of the messenger are heard,
Where speech is not choked with tears and the body grows not thin;
but where one sleeps in one's own house with he one owns subservient to one's wish;
can this routine of household sex,
this wretched thing, deserve the name of love?

With notable exceptions such as Bhavabhuti who rhapsodised over the tenderness and deepening affection of the marital tie, the poets and especially the female of this (artistic) species—Vidya and Bhavakadevi for example—idealised the rapture of the illicit liaison. In counterpoint to the damnation heaped upon her in religious and legal texts, the adultress was assured of the poet's admiration and sympathy. In the poetic and dramatic conventions, for instance, there are three kinds of women: the courtesan (veshya), the wife (svakiya), and the "other woman" (parakiya). The other woman is further subdivided into two kinds: the unmarried young girl (kanyaka) and the married woman (parodha). It is the parodha, the other man's wife, who best embodies the principle of eros (since, risking much, she has the most to lose) and is therefore considered the most desirable lover. As one Sanskrit poet writes:

So there are Women who attract with their loose ways prostitutes
and there is the deep shyness of one's own wife

the most beautiful and most graceful showing her love opening flower
but who in this world can fill one with joy like another man's wife loving with naked breast.

In contrast to the classical poets who stressed the frank elation, the incomparable "joy" of loving another man's wife, the bhakti cults gave more exalted reasons for making Radha an adulterous parakiya. For them the adulterous was symbolic of the sacred, the overwhelming moment that denies world and society, transcending the profanity of everday convention, as it forges an unconditional (and unruly) relationship with god a.. the lover. Stirring our sense of the esse..tial instabilities and disorderliness of passionate love, Radha would sing:

At the first note of his flute down came the lion gate of reverence for elders, down came the door of dharma,
my guarded treasure of modesty was lost,
I was thrust to the ground as if by a thunderbolt.
Ah, yes, his dark body poised in the tribhanga pose shot the arrow that pierced me;
no more honour, my family
lost to me,
my home at Vraja
lost to me.
Only my life is left—and my life too is only a breath that is leaving me.

In imparting adulterous love elements of the divine, the bhakti poets went even farther than the troubadours of medieval Europe who had equated it with "true" love. In the legendary and oft-quoted decision taken at the so-called Court of Love in Champagne in 1174 it was maintained: "We declare and affirm, agreeably to the general opinion of those present, that love cannot exercise its powers on married people. The following reason is proof of the fact: lovers grant everything, mutually and gratuitously, without being constrained by any motive of necessity. Married people, on the contrary, are compelled as a duty to submit to one another's wishes, and not to refuse anything to one another. For this reason it is evident that love cannot exercise its power on married people."

Both the Indian sanctification and the European romanticisation of extramarital love distract attention from its "real" fascination: its obviation of many factors that promote sexual anxiety and consequently inhibit desire. The structure of the adulterous, so far removed from the mundane, the longterm "dream of safety" and dependability of the conjugal relationship, may not be so easily subject to the Oedipal taboos which, in a marriage, often come to attach themselves to the partner. In other words, the adulterous relationship is relatively free of those instances of impotency or frigidity in marriage that involve a transference to the spouse of unconscious sexual attitudes, and prohibitions, entertained earlier towards the parent of the opposite sex. Freed of inner taboos, the adulterous situation yet partakes of its delightful excitement, with the betrayed spouse [illegible] as an outside impediment, both regulating erotic intensity and, insofar as he or she is an obstacle, enhancing it. Reliving the thrills of Oedipal fantasy, the adulterous lover does not confront the parent's image or injunctions in the person to whom he or she makes love. In this adventure, taboos have been left by the wayside and are not everyday matters.

In the Indian case, there is an additional consideration. The hierarchical dictates of the family call for male supremacy within marriage. The adulterous, in contrast, is free of all distinctions of relative status between man and woman. Radha can address Krishna as "tu chora (You thief)," which would be unthinkable for a wife who is constrained to use the most respectful form of second person address when speaking to her husband—a proscription which is hardly conducive to sexual abandon in the "master(s) bedroom." Furthermore, the clandestine life of the adulterous is [illegible] of snatches of stolen time, rather than long periods of coexistence. This mitigates demands for intimacy on levels other than the sexual. The body, shackled by social and moral restraints and enmeshed in a web of unconscious expectations and attitudes from the past, glimpses in the adulterous a promise of new-found emancipation and expansiveness.

The divine lovers, Radha and Krishna

Water is very likely to get contaminated in MS and RCC Tanks . . . . .

Sintex
IS THE SAFEST

While contamination by rust paint chemicals etc and increase in turbidity is almost certain in MS tanks it is found that in RCC tanks water may become extremely alkaline and unpotable with pH values going up beyond permissible limits

Besides RCC Tanks promote profuse growth of algae Further MS and RCC Tanks are extremely difficult to clean All of which give rise to serious health disorders

Only
Sintex
Water Storage Tanks keep the water clean hygienic and unaltered in quality Tests conducted at several leading laboratories and institutes confirm the fact that Sintex Tanks do not in anyway change the quality of water stored in them.

Moulded to seamless perfection from FDA Approved superior grades of polyethylene, SINTEX Tanks offer other advantages unmatched by conventional tanks

- Light Weight : Reduce dead load on structure
- Easy to Install : Can be installed easily and quickly
- Durable : Last for years and years
- Maintenance-free : Require no painting, no maintenance
- Versatile : Besides overhead, ground and indoor storage, can be used selectively for transportation and underground storage
- Repairable : Can be repaired easily in case of accidental damage
- Wide Range : Available in various sizes and shapes from 200 lits to 20,000 lits capacity

No wonder, SINTEX is the first choice of every discerning architect engineer builder and houseowner

For further details contact
Manufacturers

SINTER PLAST CONTAINERS
Plastics Division
THE BHARAT VIJAY MILLS LTD
KALOL (N GUJARAT) 382 721
Gram SINTEX
Phone 2687 • 2244
Telex 0121-296 BVM IN

Bdhan-SP-86

Sintex The Readymade Water Storage Tanks
A Quality Product of BHARAT VIJAY MILLS Manufacturers of the famous BVM CORDUROY

OFFICES AT

Ahmedabad
179, New Cloth Market
Ahmedabad 380 002
Ph. 362976, 361045.

Bombay
18, World Trade Centre Cuffe Parade, Colaba Bombay 400 005
Ph 211653, 217869

Calcutta
10 Middleton Street.
Calcutta 700 071. Ph 214028

Madras
123 Angappa Naicken Street.
(3rd floor) Madras 600 001

New Delhi
GP-3 Oslan Building
12, Nehru Place
New Delhi 110 019. Ph 661188

Therein it is unfettered by the spontaneous, vivid, if transient encounter.

Besides the adulterous overthrow of social convention, the crossing of individual sexual boundaries is the other major source of erotic excitement in the artistic treatment of Radha and Krishna. In painting, the depiction of this crossing ranges from the portrayal of the lovers in the traditional Orissa school where they appear as one androgynous entity, to some of the paintings from the Himalayan foothills where Radha and Krishna are dressed in each other's clothes or Radha is seen taking the more active "masculine" role in coitus. In poetry, Sur Das would speak in Radha's voice:

You become Radha and I will become Madhava, truly Madhava; this is the reversal which I shall produce. I shall braid your hair and will put (your) crown upon my head. Sur Das says. Thus the Lord becomes Radha and Radha the son of Nanda.

The inversion of sexual roles is even more striking in the depiction of their intercourse. The poet Chandi Das praises as beautiful ". .the deliberate, sensuous union of the two/ the girl playing this time the active role/riding her lover's outstretched body in delight" while Javadeva gives voice to what are normally regarded as "feminine masochistic" sexual wishes when he has Krishna sing:

Punish me, lovely fool!
Bite me with your cruel teeth!
Chain me with your creeper arms!
Crush me with your hard breasts!
Angry goddess, don't weaken with joy!
Let Love's despised arrows
Pierce me to sap my life's power!

Under the influence of nineteenth-century Western phallocentricity, one of the dubious intellectual "blessings" of British colonial rule, many educated Indians would become uneasy with this accentuation of femininity in a culture hero. The great Bengali writer, Bankim Chandra Chatterji, the proponent of a virile nationalism would write of the Gitagovinda:

"From the beginning to the end, it does not contain a single expression of manly feelings—of womanly feeling there is a great deal—or a single elevated sentiment...I do not deny his (Jayadeva's) high poetical merits in a certain sense, exquisite imagery, tender feeling, and unrivalled powers of expression, but that does not make him less the poet of an effeminate and sensual race."

In the bhakti cults, where the worshipper must create an erotic relationship with Krishna, the transcendence of boundaries of gender becomes imperative for the male devoteewho endeavours to become as a woman in relation to the Lord. In his case the violation of the biblical injunction "The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garments" is far from being an "abomination unto the Lord thy God." In bhakti, Lord Krishna not only demands such a reversal from his male worshippers but has himself set the compelling exemplar Consequently, tales of Indian saints who have succeeded in feminising themselves are legion To give only a couple of illustrations: the fifteenth-century Gujarati saint Narsi Mehta writes, "I took the hand of that lover of gopis (Krishna) in loving converse...I forgot all else Even my manhood left me. I began to sing and dance like a woman My body seemed to change and I became one of the gopis. I acted as a go-between like a woman and began to lecture Radha for being too proud...At such times I experienced moments of incomparable sweetness and joy " A.K. Ramanujan tells us that the voice of the Tamil saint-poet Nammalvar, who wrote 370 poems on the theme of love, was always that of a woman: Krishna's beloved, the girl friend who consoles and counsels, or "the mother who restrains her and despairs over her daughter's lovesick fantasies." Nammalvar's love poems alternated with other kinds of poems and a thirteenth-century commentary explained these shifts: "In knowledge, his own words; in love, a woman's words." A legend has it that Amaru, one of the earliest and greatest Sanskrit poets of love, was the hundred and first incarnation of a soul which had previously occupied the bodies of a hundred women. Narsi Mehta, Nammalvar and countless other,unknown devotees of the Radha-Krishna cults bear testimony to the primal yearning of men, ensheathed and isolated by their "phallic" masculinity, to yield their heroic trappings and delight in womanliness, others' and their own. These universal wishes are distinct from the pathological cases where similar fantasies and femininebehaviour might well be a manifestation of "homosexual libido," a retreat from phallic masculinity into anal eroticism. In other words, some of the devotees may indeed be closer to the case of Schreber, the psychotic German judge who was convinced that he was being transformed into a woman in order to become God's wife and give birth to a whole new race of men. Like Schreber, these devotees too may be defending against their fear and unconscious belief that they have been emasculated and consoling themselves with femininity as a compensation

A Kangra painting of Radha and Krishna

Yet for most of the worshippers and the saints, as for the rest of us, the wish to be a woman is not a later distortion of phallic strivings but another legacy from our "prehistoric" experience with our mothers. The mother has figured early on as the omnipotent force of a parental universe, making things, including fathers and other males, materialise as if at will. It is she whose breast and magic touch soothed the savage instinctual imperatives, she whose fecund womb seemed the very fount of life. Such maternal and feminine powers are earthly yet mysterious and transcendant, undiminished by the utter sensuousness in which they are manifest As the little boy grows toward manhood and assumes his predestined masculine role in society, he may come to exaggerate the brittle and rather obvious puissant attributes of the phallus and disparage those who do not possess it Yet what he does not have gnaws at him and in the veil of night (or in the veil drawn over consciousness in the ecstasy of religious possession) he would gratefully surrender his penis to the vagina and the woman who possesses it.

Sheltering from the rain

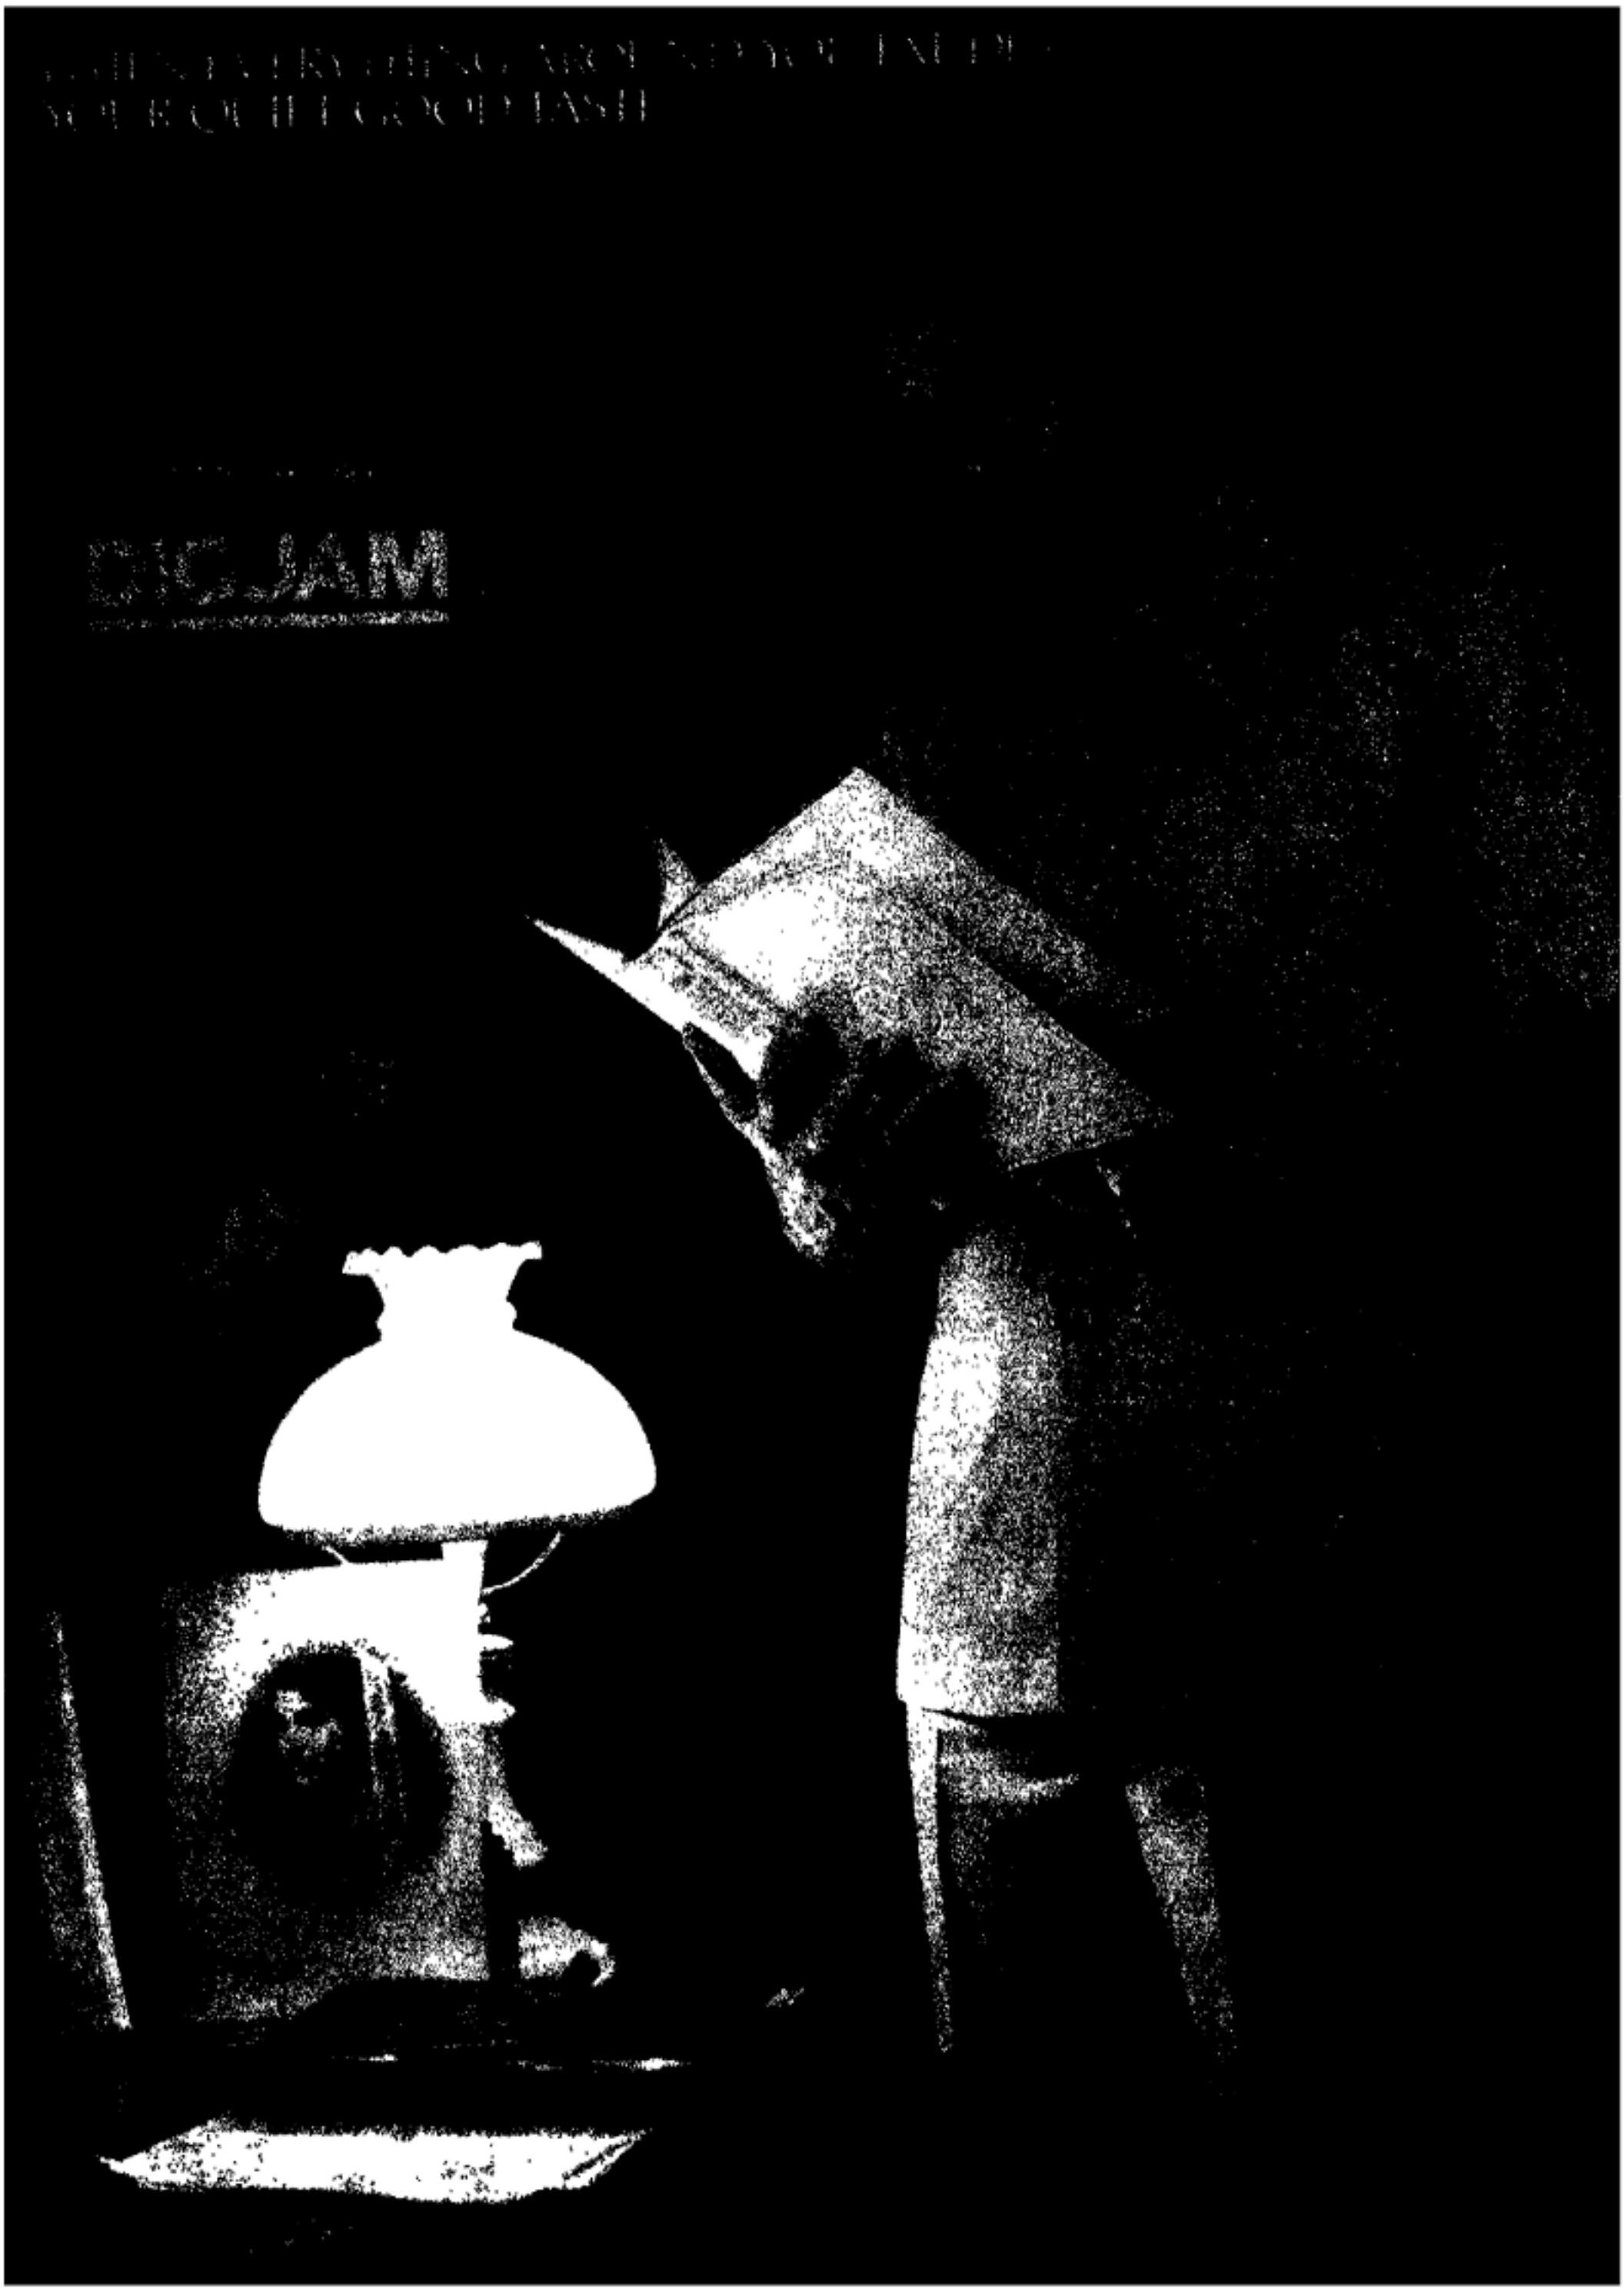
Krishna's erotic homage to Radha conveys something of the aching quality of the man's fantasy of surrender at the height of sexual excitement. He longs to be smothered and penetrated by the woman's breasts as he willingly shrinks in his mind's eye. Every fibre of his male organ is attuned to the welcoming wetness his eyes cannot see nor he know, straining even as he finally expels his seed from his self, an emissary journeying deep into the lover's internal dark continent. The thrusting penis, man realises once again, can never take or hold the woman. It merely enters her territory and touches her portals, only to shrivel and all too rapidly be withdrawn. Did it not provide a recurrent bridge to her, man would gladly cede his penis and castrate himself to be one with the beloved. The "secret of man," gods included, to borrow from Bruno Bettelheim, is that they want to be that which they cannot have: Woman.

The profusion of the imagery of darkness and night in the meetings of Radha - Krishna—as indeed in the trysts of Romeo and Juliet and of Layla and Majnun (or, for that matter, Tristan and Isolde)—underscores the secret nature of these fantasies. The paintings which show Radha and Krishna surrounded by darkness while they themselves are lit by a sullen glare from the sky, or portray the lovers enclosed in a triangle of night while around them the rest of Vrindavan's inhabitants unconcernedly go about the day's tasks, are visual metaphors for a sensualism which is simultaneously hidden from the world and from the lover's awareness. For Radha, as for Juliet, night and darkness are excitement's protectors as are silence and secrecy its friends. "Leave your noisy anklets! They clang like traitors in love's play Go to the darkened thicket, friend! Hide in a cloak of night!" advises one of Radha's friends. In a Basholi painting from Rasmanjari, the text describes the seated lovers thus: "Fear of detection does not permit the eager lovers' gaze to meet. Scared of the jingling sound of armlets they desist from embracing. They kiss each other's lips without the contact of teeth. Their union is hushed too." Many other portraits of Radha reveal that it is not only the world which must remain unaware of her sexual arousal. Radha, too, when in a state where "...love's deep fantasies / struggles with her modesty," would feign ignorance of her true condition—one part of Radha treating the awareness of her arousal as if it were a secret another part of her self must not admit knowing—and it is given to the poet to correctly perceive her struggle.

Words of protest filled with passion,
Gestures of resistance lacking force,
Frowns transmuted into smiles.
Crying dry of tears—friend,
Though Radha seeks to hide her feelings
Each attempt betrays her heart's
Deep love for demon Mura's slayer.

Other poets, identifying with a Radha who steals out at night to meet Krishna, graphically describe her fear while they merely hint at her suppressed thrill, sharpened by the threat of discovery, in images of storm, writhing snakes, scratched and burning feet.



O Madhava, how shall I tell you of my terror?
I could not describe my coming here
if I had a million tongues.
When I left my room and saw the darkness
I trembled:
I could not see the path,
there were snakes that writhed round my ankles!
I was alone, a woman; the night was so dark.
the forest so dense and gloomy,
and I had so far to go.
The rain was pouring down—
which path should I take?
My feet were muddy
and burning where thorns had scratched them.
But I had the hope of seeing you,
none of it mattered.
and now my terror seems far away ..
When the sound of your flute reaches my ears it compels me to leave my home, my friends, it draws me in the dark toward you.

We imagine that on hearing Radha's plaint, Lord Krishna, whose gaze into the recesses of the human heart is as penetrating as it is compassionate, smiled to himself in the dark. He would have surely known that the strains of his flute, like that of Pan's before him, is the perennial and irresistible call of the human senses.

And what do darkness and night mean to Krishna as he passively offers himself to Radha's embraces? Here, too, only under the cloak of night does the Lord reveal the deepest "secret of man"—that he would be a woman. In the night, visual and discreet modes of perception are replaced by tactile, visceral, and more synesthetic modes. Representations of the self and beloved fade and innermost sensate experience comes to the fore. As the illusion of bodies fused, hermaphrodic, is fostered, the fantasies around womanliness and sexual excitement feed each other, and Krishna "knows" Radha not with the eye but with the flesh.

Night's curtains never completely part in this gentler story, whose protagonist, moreover, is a god able to withstand and transcend such Protean changes. Hence the lovers survive, and tragedy is averted.

ALLWYN

BIG JAM

PUNJAB

Centre's Move for Conciliation

Akalis yet to reciprocate gesture

On 11 April, just a couple of days before Baisakhi, when the Akali leadership had threatened to launch a morcha, S.B. Chavan, the union home minister, made a series of announcements in the Lok Sabha that was seen as a bold initiative to restore normalcy in Punjab. Among them were: the holding of a judicial enquiry headed by a sitting Supreme Court judge into the Delhi riots following Mrs IndiraGandhi's assassination on 31 October 1984, the lifting of the ban of the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF) imposed on 19 March 1984 in the wake of increased extremist activity and plans of the government to order the release of more Akali Dal leaders under detention.

All these came in response to the demands that the Akali Dal had been making as a precondition to talks. It was also a step meant to stall the threat of another stir in Punjab. The initial reaction to the announcement was encouraging. In Punjab, where the atmosphere was becoming tense with Baisakhi just two days away, there was instant relief. Even the Akali Dal president, Harchand Singh Longowal, welcomed the initiative although he added that it had come late. The next day, the Akali Dal, after consultations with the Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC)leadership, put off its action plan. But very soon hope began evaporating when the Akalis began saying that the government had not conceded enough. The announcement of the postponement of the stir came with a footnote: the party "would be forced to take the next step," if the government did not accept all their demands by 1 June. These demands include the implementation of the Anandpur Sahib Resolution, the release of all Akali leaders and Sikh youths arrested during and after Operation Bluestar and the scrapping of the Terrorist Affected Area Act. The impasse in Punjab thus continues.

Harchand Singh Longowal

Events on Baisakhi day too indicated that the "bold initiatives" of the centre had not the desired effect. In fact Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi did not hesitate to say that the announcement had not prompted the Akalis to take any "positive steps" towards a solution of the Punjab tangle.

The Akali Dal chief Sant Harchand Singh Longowal has been quite unmoved, not prepared for any dialogue till the government gives a blanket clearance to all the demands. Some other Akali leaders were more alarming in the note they struck. Jagdev Singh Talwandi, leader of the Akali Dal (Talwandi group said that he did not oppose the demand for Khalistan or anyone who raised such a demand. On Baisakhi day, the Golden Temple saw the first open pro-Khalistan demonstration after a long time. As honours were being given to those Sikhs who had given up national awards or seats in Parliament in protest against Operation Bluestar, a group of AISSF activists wearing kesari turbans and shouting pro-Khalistan slogans climbed onto the dais and disrupted the function. On the streets of Amritsar too, similar slogans were raised as a massive procession proceeded from the Golden Temple to Shaheed Gunj where the first Nirankari-Akali clash took place on Baisakhi Day in 1978.

At the same time, Satwant Singh and Beant Singh, the alleged assassins of Mrs Gandhi, have been made "martyrs" by the Akali Dal. And Longowal defends this well-rehearsed logic If the government can honour "those who virtually destroyed the Takht" why cannot the Akalis make martyrs out of Satwant Singh and Beant Singh? None of the Akali leaders are,as yet, prepared to say a word on the future. All they do is reiterate their one-point demand: fulfil all their demands. At the same time, they stress that it is the government that is interested in increasing the tension in Punjab, not they. And as the Akalis remain on the offensive there are signs that the government too is beginning to stiffen up: It has already made it clear that it is not ready to release those who are charged with secessionist activities.

S.B. Chavan

The next important date for Punjab will be 1 June when the Akali Dal plans to launch its action plan, if by that time the government has not met all its demands. It has already announced it would be holding a "genocide week" from 1 June to 7 June and what happens during that period will depend on what happens between now and the beginning of June.

Sankarshan Thakur, New Delhi

BHOPAL GAS TRAGEDY

In Search of the Truth

The CBI's investigations are being completed

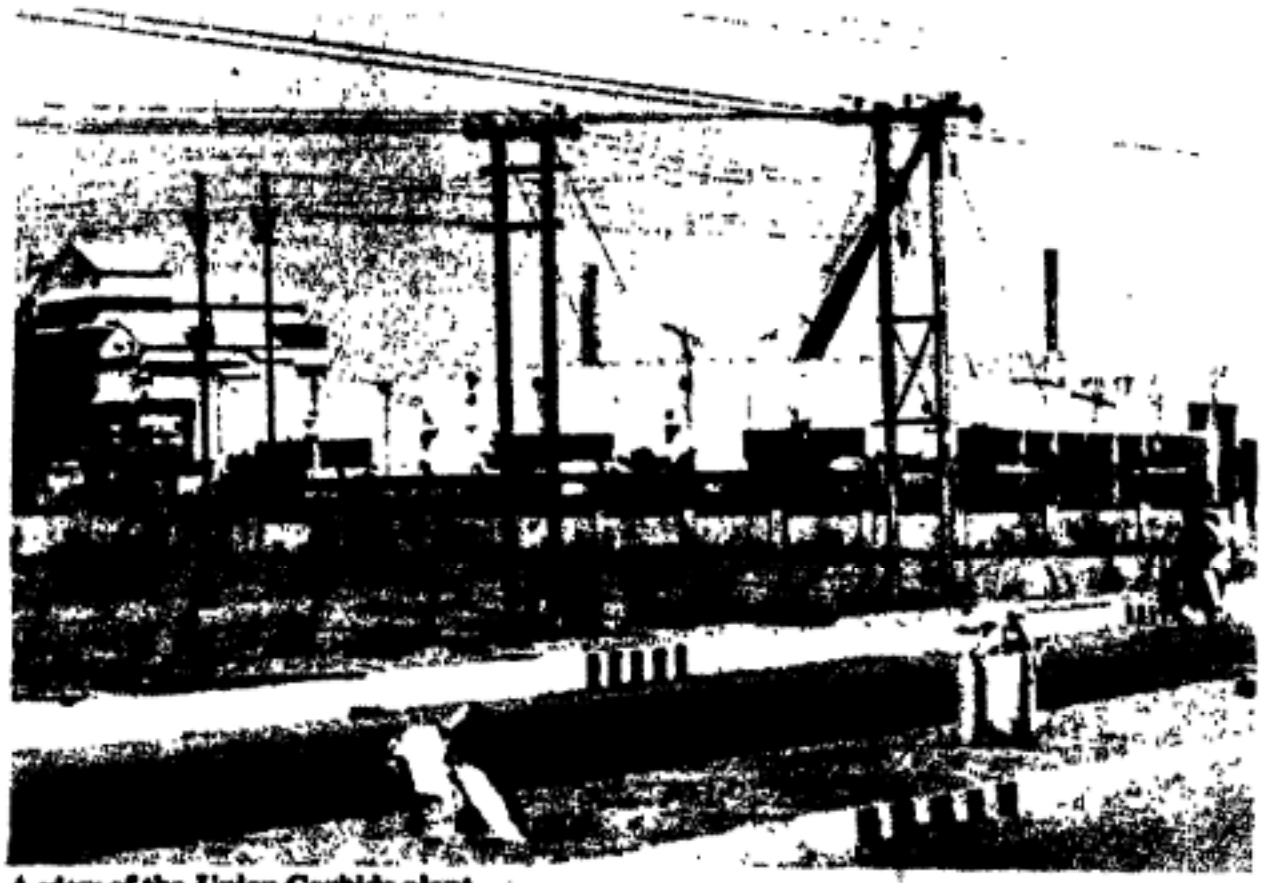
On 11 July, the multi-crore Union Carbide plant at Bhopal will be shut down. Operations inside the plant had been halted since the night of 2 December, when the methyl isocyanate (MIC) gas leaked from its tank No. 610. The Union Carbide premises were taken over by the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) who are completing investigations in order to ascertain how the leak occurred. The final stage of the CBI's investigations began inside the plant on 6 April when a team of six scientists supervised the cutting open of the 40-foot tank No. 610 dug out for the purpose. The operation, delayed for weeks, was to ascertain the exact amount of polymerised residue inside the tank and the nature of the chemical reaction that had triggered off the leak.

During the operations, samples of the polymerised residue of MIC were collected by the team of Indian scientists and experts from the Union Carbide Corporation, America. The scientists, who had expected a thin layer of the residue, discovered six, to eight inches of residue still inside the tank. Instead of the five tonnes of estimated residue, there were about 12 tonnes. With this discovery, the possibility of certain impurities inside the tank at the time of the leak arose again. The operations of the CBI, successful as far as collecting samples of the greyish-green residue and the metallic surface of the tank are concerned, could not be completed. The weighing of tank No. 610 has had to be postponed for a later date.

The results of the CBI investigation, following the opening of the tank, will be significant in view of the report presented by the parent company in America detailing the accident. The report prepared by a team of US scientists states that a sizable quantity of water had entered the tank and caused the chemical reaction. The report also mentions that the water could have entered the tank either "inadvertently or deliberately." The possibility of sabotage as implied by the report of the US scientists can be refuted only when the CBI presents its report on the disaster.

The most significant discovery of the cutting-up operations after 6 April was the finding of large amounts of carbon deposits on the roof of the tank. According to Indian experts present on the spot, the presence of carbon has established with "some amount of certainty" that the abnormally high temperatures generated inside the tank resulted in the decomposition of the MIC into hydrogen cyanide, which was released into the atmosphere with the MIC, causing the death of 2,500 people.

The suffering of the thousands of MIC victims will continue till scientists and medical practitioners can establish the exact nature of the exposure and the chemical reaction that triggered off the leak. Till today, experts are divided in their opinions on the treatment given to the victims. The impediment for the Indian and foreign experts struggling with the treatment of MIC victims is that there is no record of death by MIC exposure in any part of the world. A report sent from the Union Carbide Institute plant at Charleston, USA, concerning previous exposure to methyl isocyanate, clearly states that out of the 86 exposures recorded with them (which occurred between 1965 and 1973), 53 exposed persons suffered from respiratory complaints, 12 from skin irritations and 21 from eye defects. None of the victims had succumbed to complaints following MIC exposure.



Though the Union Carbide Corporation has ruled out the possibility of cyanide poisoning, it has already been confirmed that MIC turns into hydrogen cyanide under extreme pressures (the fact sheet on MIC No. F-43458 printed in 1976 clearly states this). Further, the gas victims themselves have shown symptoms of acute cyanide poisoning as evident from the large number of post-mortems.

The administration of sodium thiosulphate injections was recommended by the Indian Council of Medical Research (ICMR) which has conducted various surveys on MIC exposed persons. According to ICMR scientists, no serious adverse effects have been observed.

According to Dr S. Sriramachari, additional director general, ICMR, "It is a possibility that cyanide poisoning did take place when the MIC leaked, with the presence of some other chemicals," he said. But there are detractors to this theory who negate the possibility of cyanide poisoning. Among them is Dr N.P. Mishra, head of the medical department of Hamidia Hospital, Bhopal who argues that symptoms of cyanide poisoning cannot remain in the bodies of the victims four months after exposure. Dr Mishra said: "Cyanide kills within 24 hours and it is not possible for its effects to linger on for so long." He also felt that the administration of sodium thiosulphate to the victims has resulted in severe after-effects including vomiting, unconsciousness and convulsions.

The two opposing views of medical experts treating the victims in Bhopal are yet to be clarified. In spite of the obvious implications of the discovery of carbon monoxide deposits in the MIC tank, and the medical records of treatment given to the victims, thousands of people are being given conflicting treatment

Ritu Sarin, New Delhi.

A view of the Union Carbide plant

EDUCATION

Questionable Practices

Mass leakage of examination papers in Maharashtra

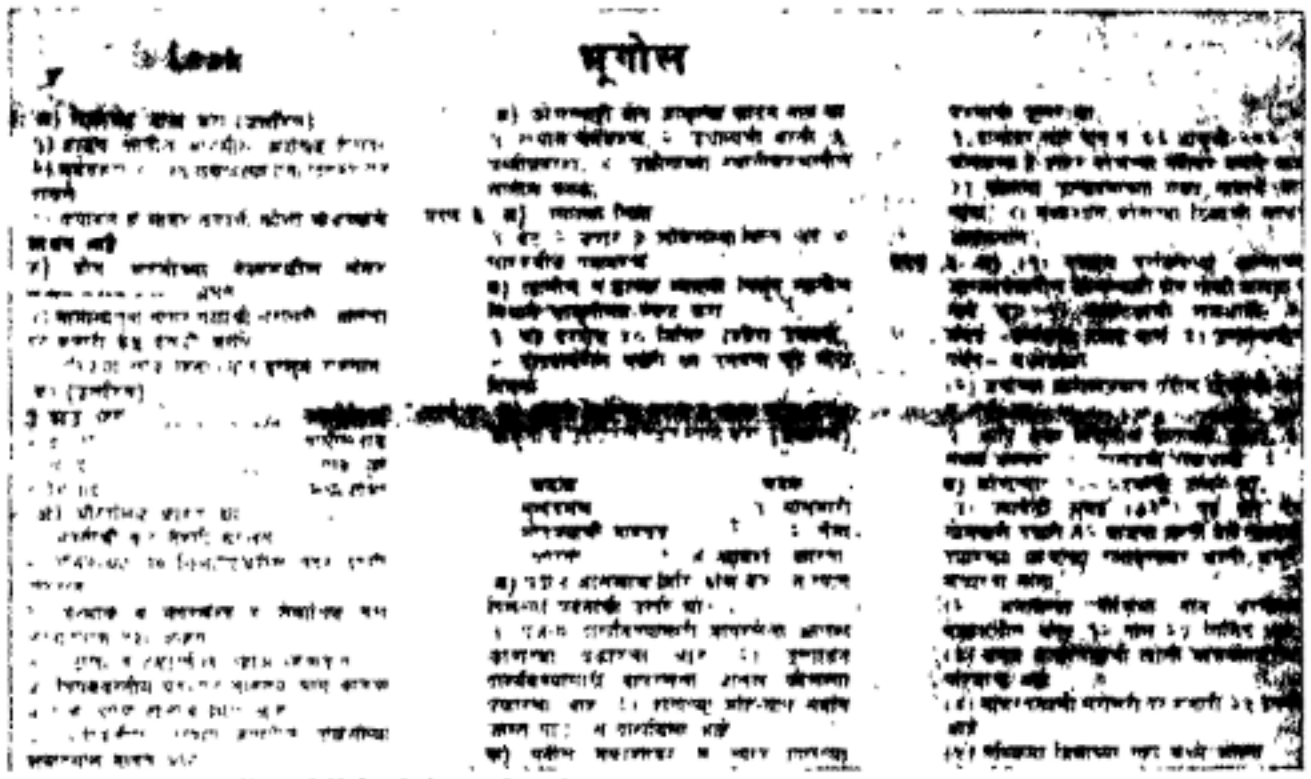
Never before has an examination in Maharashtra been so plagued by such massive leakages and the blatant sale of question papers. And never before have the board authorities in both Nagpur and Pune made a more strenuous effort to deny the obvious. Matters came to a head when the leaked question papers of the tenth Matric examination of the Maharashtra State Board of Secondary and Higher Secondary Education held last month were published in the local newspapers on 30 March 1985 . Not surprisingly, considering the thoroughness of the racketeers, the questions almost tallied with the actual question paper.

Long before the examinations, the crowd of people waiting at the bus stop for the super express bus from Nagpur was a familiar sight. It was the convenient rendezvous for both the buyers and sellers of the question papers. Xerox shops in the smaller towns where large crowds were noticed also did better business during the examinations, copying by hundreds the question papers.

The chairman of the Nagpur divisional board, Mr G.S. Pardeshi, had claimed that what were flooding the examination centres were "guess papers" and that the board was not able to do anything to catch the persons responsible for the alleged leakages. These denials did not convince anyone, least of all the students who found that the "guess papers" tallied by 80 to 90 per cent with the board's question paper. These denials were proved to be untrue on 30 March when the leaked-out geography paper tallied almost exactly with the actual question paper.

The Nagpur Patrika, Hitavada and Nava Bharat, three important dailies of the city published in their issues of 30 March the "leaked" geography question paper while the Nagpur Times and Lokmat which had copies of the paper did not print it. The printing of the copies of the "leaked" question paper created a sensation. As copies of the newspapers reached almost all parts of Vidarbha except the westernmost regions of Akola and Buldana districts, the questions were available to students in seven out of the nine districts of Vidarbha.

When the students who had either paid for the question paper or had read it in the newspapers went to the examination hall, they found that the official geography paper tallied almost exactly with the one published in the papers. The question paper printed in Nagpur Patrika contained all but three of the sub questions and covered 33 marks out of a maximum of 40. The question papers with the Nagpur Times and Lokmat were also nearly identical to the actual question paper. This time, there is no possibility of claiming that there was no leakage, but both the board and the government dragged their feet in the matter. At first there was a show of urgency and the examination committees of Nagpur and the Pune divisional board met to consider the leakage. But their decision was not made public.



The board has recommended a re-examination. In the Legislative Council Vilasrao Deshmukh, minister of state for education, said that R.S. Jambhule, chairman of the Maharashtra Board, would visit Nagpur to hold an enquiry. That was on 1 April 1985. But Jambhule did not reach Nagpur till 8 April. Meanwhile, students have been assured that there would be no re-examination in geography, even though the paper has leaked out. It is however, common knowledge that a large number of other question papers also leaked out. In fact, The Nagpur newspapers had with them a question paper of another subject but a last minute mix-up led to it not being printed. This paper also tallied with the official paper. The geometry paper was also available at Akola. But the board insists that only the geography paper leaked out.

How did the leakage occur? The board's regulation for the setting of the question papers, and their printing and storage are almost foolproof What is more probable is that some unscrupulous invigilator in charge of a rural centre, either in collusion with his deputy or by himself opened the sealed envelopes containing the question papers, took out one and sealed the envelope again. There is very little possibility of detection as no strict account of question papers is kept and very little can be done to keep a check on examination centres in rural areas. The stolen question paper was then sent to Nagpur, Akola or Amravati. There it was sold for thousands of rupees after which xerox or hand-written copies were made and despatched to various smaller centres. During the process the cost per copy came down and some question papers were sold for as little as Rs ten per copy.

There are also allegations that higher-ups in the board are also in league with the racketeers. This has led to a demand for the reconstitution of the state and divisional boards, members of which have held office for more than a decade.

The massive leakage, however, is not likely to lead to any dramatic improvement in the results, say the teachers. The only sufferers will be the good students who have worked throughout the year but may not do as well as those who have been fortunate enough to acquire copies of the question papers before the examination. Meanwhile, the men behind the rackets who must have made lakhs of rupees, are still untraceable. Nor does it seem likely that the investigations will progress very far.

M.V. Padalkar, Nagpur

A "guess paper" published in a local newspaper

TAMIL NADU

Policemen Run Amok

Constables beat up innocent people and damage property

There is something bizarre and frightening about policemen going on a rampage. And that is what happened on 1 April at Avadi, a suburb of Madras and an important township because of the defence establishments: the Heavy Vehicles factory, the Central Vehicle Research Development Establishment, the Central Vehicle Department and the Indian Air Force. The headquarters of the Tamil Nadu Special Police (TSP) and the Central Reserve Police(CRP) are also located in the town.

The TSP constables went berserk on All Fools Day, beating up sleeping civilians, looting and damaging public property worth thousands of rupees. Altogether 25 persons were injured It was not just another law and order situation. Here, the perpetrators themselves were the forces of law and order. But what is most reassuring is that the senior TSP officers whom this correspondent spoke to accepted the blame and did not attempt to make excuses on behalf of the errant TSP constables.

Daily at 7.30 pm, a roll call is taken at the TSP camp, after which the constables are allowed to go out. They can go to town only on medical grounds and that too after securing written permission. However, on 1 April, a few constables sneaked out to see a late night film show in a local theatre which was screening Ayirathil Oruvan (One in a Thousand) starring MGR and Jayalalitha. At the theatre, two TSP constables tried to force their way in with the counterfoils of old tickets. The theatre has its own goons to handle such situations, which invariably occur during late night shows. The altercation led to a fight between the theatre staff and constables who were being helped by about a dozen of their colleagues. The theatre staff managed to overcome two of the constables and detained them. Meanwhile, the manager of the theatre, Ms Kannan, made a complaint to the police. While she was recording her complaints, the two captured constables escaped.

They told the other TSP constables in the camp highly distorted and exaggerated versions of the incident, giving the impression that several TSP constables had been seriously injured, unconscious and dying. On hearing the story, the TSP commandant left for the police station to book a complaint about the two constables who he thought were still in custody. The other TSP constables inflamed by the alleged atrocities rushed out of their barracks and stormed into the theatre. Armed with soda water bottles and cold drinks from the theatre canteen they entered the auditorium and attacked the men, molested the women and beat up the children. The frightened cinegoers ran outside and soon a crowd of about 1,000 persons had gathered in the dead of night. The TSP men sneaked away and the local police had to contain the mob by requesting them to disperse. Enraged by the actions of the TSP men, the mob caught hold of Lance Naik Kumaresan of the TSP just as he got off the train and beat him up.

Hearing of the incident, the TSP constables went berserk, looting and damaging public property. Armed with iron rods, belts and lathis they ransacked the town and bazaar areas, forcing open shops. Said Benny, a shopkeeper, "My shop was closed. At about 12.30 at night the TSP men came and forced open the shop and ransacked it. They took away all the cigarettes, and smashed all the cold drink bottles and machines. "He claims he has lost goods worth Rs 11,000. Most of the shopkeepers near the Round Tana of Avadi town had a similar story to tell.

A lathi charge was out of question. The only solution was a police firing but that would have graver consequences because the rioters were constables who had access to a great deal of arms and ammunition in their depots. If one of them had been injured or killed in the firing, they might have opened fire with their light machine guns and killed hundreds of people. The local police tried to pacify them and finally by about 1.30 am, their anger and energy spent, the TSP constables returned to their barracks.

The Vyapari Sangam (traders' association) of Avadi declared a bandh to demand compensation for the goods damaged by the TSP constables and also wanted extra protection to safeguard them from such occurences in the future. With wisdom and foresight, the director general of police Mr V.R. Lakshminarayan ordered the immediate removal of the TSP battalions to Tirupattur Andkrishnagiri as the irate public may have retaliated against the TSP men the next day. The collector of Chingleput K.A. Mathews ordered an inquiry into the incident to be conducted by the district revenue officer Mr Chokalingam who is expected to submit his report by mid-April. Meanwhile, the TSP has suspended five constables on grounds of indiscipline.

The TSP comprises seven battalions which are to be used during emergencies, when the local and armed reserve police fail to contain a situation. They are used often because of inadequate manpower of the local police. On the night of the incident, there were two battalions of the TSP in the Avadi camp. One had returned from Delhi in October 1984 after serving a five-year deputation in the capital. They were in charge of VIP security but were brought back for a refresher course.

The incidents have shaken the local population. Benny expressed the growing fear of the common man when he said, "What guarantee do we have that the TSP men won't do this again? What guarantee do we have that the CRP and IAF men will not do this? For all we know the local thugs will take a cue from this and loot and damage our goods. Who do we turn to for protection?"

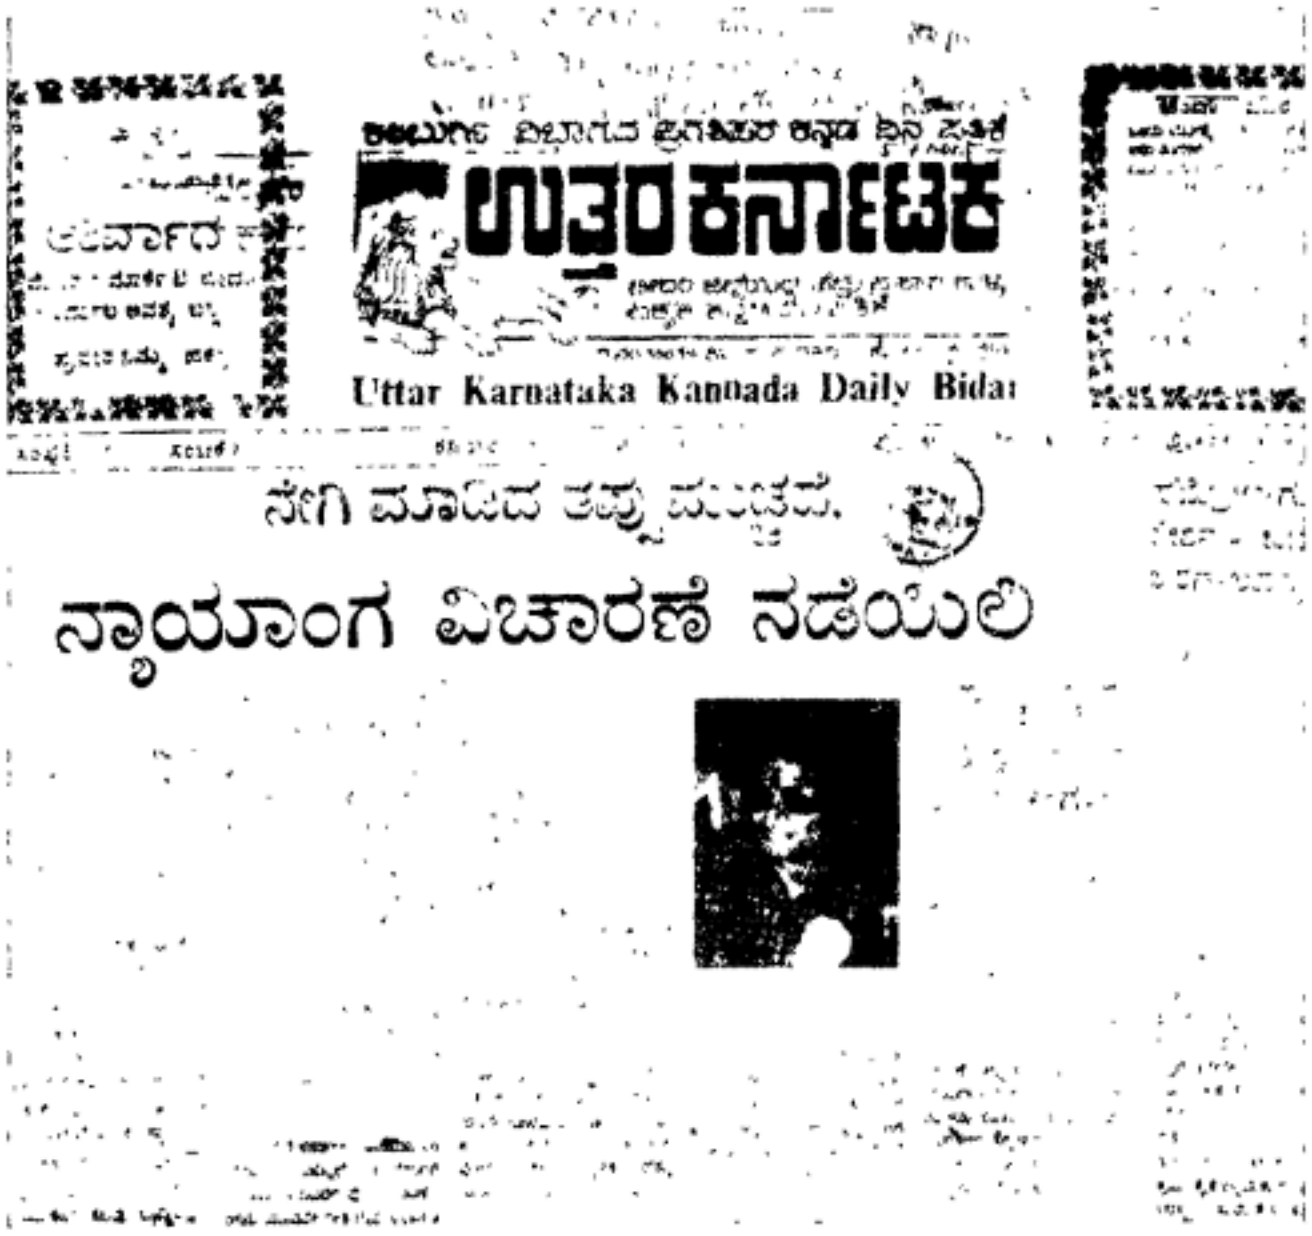
Anita Pratap, Madras

A shop destroyed by the policemen

KARNATAKA

Taking On the Press

Bureaucrat prevents publication of local paper



In the remote district of Bidar in north Karnataka, a deputy commissioner has successfully defied the judiciary, the executive and the legislature to stop a newspaper from functioning. The entire newspaper community in Bidar is up in arms, against the DC, Mr K.L. Negi, in a case that has raised eyebrows in many quarters.

Relations between the press in Bidar and Mr Negi were never very good. Long before Mr Negi came down on the local Kannada daily, Uttara Karnataka, the local journalists had frequent brushes with him, though not always at his instigation. In one of the first such confrontations, journalists were denied passes for the Prime Minister's visit during the election campaign on the eve of the Lok Sabha polls. The DC had a perfectly good reason for turning down the journalists' request (they wanted to meet Mr Gandhi on the tarmac of the helipad) because of the tight security regulations. But the manner in which he threw out the journalists aggravated an already strained relationship.

The crunch came when Uttara Karnataka, a four-page Kannada daily edited by Mr Shivasharanappa Wali published a report, according to which Mr Negi got into a drunken brawl with another official on Republic Day at the local officers club. The news made the headlines. In its enthusiasm to nail Negi, the daily followed up the next day with a front page editorial demanding a judicial inquiry into the whole episode. That happened to be the paper's last issue—for at least some time to come, the publication was suspended.

On the morning of 4 February, at 3.30 am, Mr Negi, accompanied by the assistant commissioner, the SP, Mr Srivarsava, two sub-inspectors and a vanload of policemen descended on Mr Wali's office-cum-residence and demanded to see the licences and the certificate of registration of the newspaper. Not satisfied with the documents produced, they locked up the office premises. Shivasharanappa Wali's battle for justice and freedom of expression had begun.

He came to Bangalore the very next day and immediately moved the journalists' union. On 9 February, Wali appealed to the High Court against the DC's order closing down his newspaper. Meanwhile, Negi also wrote to the registrar of newspapers, recommending that the newspaper's registration be cancelled, which was promptly complied with. However, Wali filed another petition before the High Court making the registrar a party to the whole case. Thereafter, the advocate appearing for the registrar filed a petition before the High Court, submitting that they had withdrawn the cancellation of the registration of the newspaper.

ಉತ್ತರ ಕರ್ನಾಟಕ

Uttar Karnataka Kannada Daily Bidar

ನೇಗಿ ಮಾಡಿದ ತಪ್ಪು ಏನಿತ್ತೆಂದು.

ನ್ಯಾಯಾಂಗ ವಿಚಾರಣೆ ನಡೆಯಲಿ

The front page of a copy of the paper

Shivasharanappa Wali won his case on 19 February. The High Court quashed the order of the DC and directed him not to interfere with the publication of the newspaper. If for any reason, a show cause notice had to be issued to the newspaper at a future date, then the matter had to be taken up by the DC of neighbouring Gulbarga, the court ordered. Wali could collect the High Court order only on 6 March. He immediately went back to Bidar to show the order to the DC, who promptly showed him the door. The editor then sent the order by registered post with acknowledgement due. Even after receiving the order, Negi refused to give him an appointment or lift the ban on the newspaper.

Instead, on 12 March the taluk executive magistrate served another order on the editor banning the publication of the newspaper on grounds that there was tension in Bidar town and Section 144 had been imposed. By now, the Assembly elections were over and Bidar town, which has an equal number of Kannada, Urdu and Marathi-speaking people, elected a Muslim MLA from the Congress(I). But the MLA himself disagreed with the order of the taluk executive magistrate. Laikkuddin, the Bidar MLA, says that while there was some tension between his party workers and the BJP, the situation was exaggerated and had no bearing on the publication of the newspaper. He has no doubt that Negi was excessively harsh on the editor of Uttara Karnataka.

The district administration's intransigence and defiance of the High Court order once again brought Wali to Bangalore. This time he approached the home secretary, Mr Muddappa, who immediately cancelled the order of the magistrate and warned that nothing should be done to give an impression that the government was interfering with the freedom of the press. But the district administration remained unrepentant. Even oral instructions from the chief minister, Mr Ramakrishna Hegde, appeared to have no effect. Mr Hegde's attention was drawn to the matter at the All India Mofussil Journalists Conference on 28 February at Mandya which he inaugurated in the midst of his hectic election tour. Since then, the chief minister has assured action at several public forums and later telephonically admonished Negi.

As late as 29 March, when the matter came up before the Legislature, nothing had happened. The home minister, Mr B. Rachiah, told both Houses of the Legislature that he had rescinded all orders banning the newspaper. But with doubt writ large on his face, Shivasharanappa Wali collected the official proceedings of the house in print, and a letter of authority from the home minister before he took a bus to Bidar, hoping to have his press rolling in time for the 57th All India Kannada Literary Conference scheduled to begin in Bidar on 5 April.

Chidanand Rajghatta, Bangalore

BOMBAY

A Racket up in Smoke

But political clout helped O.P. Bahl, the owner of Khyber

On 21 March 1984, 50 goondas led by one Syed Mohammad Hadi and A.W. Shahabas Khan (a relative of Karim Lala) took a morcha to the office of the "A" ward municipal officer, Mr D.A. Pinto, demanding that he should not prosecute Mr O.P. Bahl, owner of the Khyber restaurant in Bombay which burnt down on 31 March. For half-an-hour these goondas shouted slogans of murdabad and burst firecrackers. The corporation had to be superseded, they demanded and challenged Pinto saying that they would see how he could demolish Khyber's "Moghul Room." They also gheraoed Mr Pinto. Pinto, familiar with the ways of hooligans as also the antecedents of Hadi and Khan asked the goondas how much they were being paid to do this. There was silence in the room after which the troublemakers left.

Pinto has been carrying on a one-man crusade against the irregularities committed by Mr Bahl who was a Congress(I) MLA since 1980. Mr O.P. Bahl's fight to regularise the irregularities he committed with his money-power and political connections, is typical of every powerful hotelier. Mr Bahl is also the landlord of the four-building complex where Khyber is situated and has been harassing a number of his tenants.

Till Khyber burnt down, Mr Bahl continued to illegally use 879 square metres of area though he has a licence to use only 254 square metres. Cases have been filed against him by the state buildings, health and drainage departments but he has ignored all of them and continued his irregular dealings. Prosecution against him began from January 1984 for the unlicensed restaurant. Altogether 99 offence sheets were handed over and 66 cases filed. Bahl was held guilty in all the cases and fined only Rs 4,600 on 11 September 1984 by the Presidency Magistrate's court though the minimum fine is Rs 200 and the maximum Rs 1,000 for each offence according to the municipal law.

While Bahl managed to get away with it, his tenants lived in fear of being roasted alive. Between 1977 and 1979 when Bahl began the renovation work, Francis D'Souza, a young resident went to see the then municipal commissioner, B.K. Choughule (the present home secretary) to complain against the illegal chimneys, the noise and the smoke emanating from the cooling tower and the chimney. Mr Choughule visited the site but did nothing about it. In 1983, another resident Mr Bomi Sethna faced problems after Mr Bahl cut off the water supply. For two years there was no water in the toilets. Bahl then took over the bathrooms and converted the area for his chimney. A municipal standing committee of 40 persons had visited the site in November 1983 but again, nothing was done about it.

